By a process of elimination we came to the decision to pursue the third option, that of trying to bring together the various groups in our economy in an effort to work out a mutually agreed plan for scaling down the rate of inflation to a more acceptable level, that would be as effective, fair and equitable as possible. There is nothing easy about it. We are aware of the pitfalls and the frustrations. There is nothing easy about attempting to forge, in a federal state, a mutual understanding to govern the setting of prices and incomes among the various sectors of the economy. We are equally aware, however, that if we did not achieve a mutual understanding, the practical implementation of that understanding, even if we are able to achieve it, from day to day would be difficult, as indeed it would be under a mandatory system.

I submit to Your Honour that if Canadians look squarely at the critical threat confronting this economy and the courses and options open to us in dealing with the threat, they would agree that working together to fight inflation would far better serve their best interests than any of the other alternatives.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party made the allegation that the proposals put before labour, management, the professions and the other sectors of the economy, were unduly weighted against the working man in this country; in other words that they were unduly weighted against labour. I would say to him, and to the House, that the program being developed by the government in an attempt to halt the spiral of costs and prices applies to every sector of the economy and not just to labour. Because wages, salaries and supplementary labour income compose some 70 per cent of Canada's national income it is obvious that they are the most important single element in the income picture. But fairness, equity, and effectiveness just as obviously demand that all other kinds of claims on the national income must also be moderated if we are to bring inflation under control.

The working papers leaked to the press I believe were badly misrepresented and misunderstood. The fact of that leak seriously jeopardized the chances of arriving at an understanding among all sectors of the economy. I am going to summarize the substance of the proposals. Maybe the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) has not read the papers I gave him.

We proposed as discussion papers for a consensus, if that were possible, that all groups would be allowed to gain at least the target rate of the increase in inflation, that is to say, to preserve their real income. If the consumer price increase rose faster than the target rate the groups would be entitled to recover the difference in the second year, and would not be penalized for an underestimation of the target rate. Workers who had fallen behind the average increase in the last two years would be entitled to increases larger than the target rate of the price increase of up to 4 per cent.

Mr. Broadbent: How are the unorganized workers to get this?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Lower income workers would be entitled to a minimum increase of $600, and higher salaried groups would be subject to a maximum increase of $2,400. The unorganized worker would be put in a better position, as would pensioners, if we could get this problem of inflation under control.

Mr. Broadbent: That does not answer the question of how they will get the increase.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): And there would be provision made for exceptional cases. Also for self-employed professionals, professional fees could only be increased by an amount required to improve their net income by a maximum of $2400 available to salaried executives and professionals. In respect of dividends it is true, as I said to the House in reply to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), that we have not yet, either with labour or management, solved the problem of dividends and the question of trading off a fair return to the shareholder, but not excessive and not exceeding the return available to the worker, and still preserve the investment opportunities and enhancement for capital investment of those concerned.

On prices—and these were spelled out with the same detail as wages which is the reason I say that the proper balance was not paid to those two items in the report that was made of those working papers—on prices, first of all the general principle envisaged was that for the first year of the consensus the price increase would be limited to amounts sufficient to cover increases in unit costs; that is all. Where the allocation of costs to products was impractical, the onus would be on the company to comply with the general principle. Wholesalers and retailers would undertake not to increase the mark-ups on various merchandise and, where this was impractical, they would agree not to exceed the percentage gross margins realized during the base period.

In effect profit margins would come down as prices went up, unless volume increased. The general principles were not applicable to the export industries, and the Canadian Labour Congress is concerned about, as am I, and as are the industries, how to get a fair allocation in this area, but it is still under discussion.

In the food area there was no attempt at any time to impose a limitation on food prices at the farm gate or on fish prices at the net. Where food prices are not determined by the market, marketing boards will be expected to meet the intent of the general pricing principle. Processors and distributors, however, would undertake to comply with the general principles.

As for interest rates, the primary rate would be determined by financial markets, but the general pricing principles would apply to rates by banks, trust companies and loan companies.

With regard to rent, the working papers did not make any specific proposals because of the continued discussions with the provinces under whose jurisdiction that lies, and the Canadian Labour Congress officials have indicated that they would like to see the principles inherent in the B.C. program implemented.

Provincial governments are receiving the following proposals: first, new construction would be exempt for five years. Second, increases would be permissible up to the CPI target. Any increase over the targets would have to be justified by cost increases. In other words, what I am saying is that there was every intent that, if anything happens to be worked out, these discussions can proceed with a possibility of equity that is inherent in the system, and this has been made clear to every sector of the economy, namely, that every sector of the economy will bear an equal share.

The suggestions advanced in the working papers did not constitute a firm set of proposals by the federal government but some suggested approaches to provide a basis for further discussions among the various groups. I said from the beginning that the government did not seek to impose a consensus but to help a consensus evolve. The points put forward in the paper were intended to provide a focus for continuing discussion, and as such they are very much in keeping with the consensus process.

I believe it is quite possible to meet many of the concerns voiced by labour, for instance with respect to rents, dividends, professional fees and the position of the export industries. A number of areas of concern that have been raised depend on the extent to which the provinces are prepared to exercise their influence and authority.

I might note that four Atlantic premiers expressed in a recent communique their readiness to throw their full support behind the program for moderating inflation. We are still exploring the extent to which other provinces are also prepared to do so. That is also part of the difficult and complex process of evolving a consensus in a federal state such as ours.

In the absence of full provincial support and co-operation, many of these concerns could only be met by the establishment of an over-all mandatory federal system of controls. It is the only way, as I said in reply to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), in which we would have constitutional authority to do it under the peace, order and good government clause.

In discussions with various groups, we have made every effort to keep them fully informed on the nature of our discussions with other groups and their positions on different issues.

I recall that on January 22, as found at page of 2055 of Hansard, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby urged me to bring forth a new economic policy, as he said "whose objective is to achieve full employment soon, and at least mitigate the effects of this terrible inflation". He recognized the two problems as being equally important. I want to say to the hon. member that there have been precious few suggestions from the NDP as to how inflation should be brought under control. The traditional position of that party, restated this afternoon, is to advocate the establishment of a government agency empowered to control prices, but to ignore the other side of the coin, namely, wage and salary costs. Both have to be dealt with together if they are to be dealt with at all.

Since wages and salaries make up 70 per cent of the national income, it is perfectly clear that it is simply not possible to moderate inflation unless the rate of wage and salary increases is also moderated and there is some ability to obtain a consensus on this side of the market. The NDP also continues to remain ignorant of the fact—either ignorant or it ignores it—that bringing inflation under control in Canada is an essential prerequisite to re-establishing full employment, however you define employment.

I want to contrast the position taken by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby this afternoon with the position taken by some of his colleagues, including the hon. member for Cambridge-Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) and the premier of Manitoba. I recall that in the House of Commons on December 19, as recorded at page 2399 of Hansard, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby said he thought the Minister of Finance "entirely correct in expressing concern about restraint by those who are very well paid in our society". I am quoting the hon. gentleman's words.

He went on to say:

I think that a very good case can be made, for example, for a program that would impose serious restrictions on the capacity of middle and upper income people to extend their wage levels beyond the cost of living increases in the foreseeable future, while others are much lower in terms of their existing income and must deal with an inflationary economy.

I agree with that, and the bias in favour of the lower income groups was apparent in those proposals.

Mr. Broadbent: There is no guarantee they will get it.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby went on to suggest that an approach to organized labour would be justified, involving discussion of wage gains as part of a package that would involve tax reductions for average and low income people and a wealth tax on upper income earners. In other words, he felt our approach was worthwhile and justified, and that as late as December 19.

Although obviously the government will have to consider all its options in coming before parliament in a few weeks with the budget, I believe that through the process of consultation and compromise it should be possible to reach a mutual understanding that will best serve everyone's interests if the will exists to reach such an understanding. I understand the risk involved for certain leaders in the community, but I want to say that it is equally clear that if there is no disposition to do so, then there would be no difficulty in creating insurmountable obstacles to any agreement being arranged.

In every system involving moderation of prices and incomes, whether voluntary or mandatory, there will always be problems. No one will be perfectly satisfied with every aspect of the problem. It is inherent in this type of arrangement or in mandatory controls that there is a type of rough justice that has to be adhered to, and there will always be one group or another that considers itself treated unfairly, or that considers that another has been overly favoured.

I note the contention of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby that the government has no intention of controlling prices. He was quoted in the Globe and Mail of May 7 as saying:

Given the ability of corporations who manipulate cost data, the price control guidelines outlined in the government's proposals are simply not capable of effective enforcement.

He repeated that today in other words. If the NDP leader in the House seriously believes that to be the case, one might fairly conclude that their repeated proposals for the establishment of a price board of some kind is nothing more than a sham. Presumably the NDP believes that a regulatory agency would be able to prevent such manipulation. Otherwise they would not have harped so long on the need for some type of price review board.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I expect the minister to allow me to make a correction in view of the fact that he interrupted me in a recent debate, and I want to make sure that at least we understand each other clearly if we are going to disagree. My specific reference that he quoted was to the particular mechanism proposed by the government, which was involved in dealing with profits as opposed to the prices review board mechanism. My point was that you can disguise profits in a way that you could not disguise market prices.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I accept that clarification. However, the hon. member did use the words "price control guidelines". In any event, I hope that such a monitoring agency proposed in the discussion papers will be equally capable of doing so.

To bring this to a conclusion—and I thank the House for its indulgence—a process of seeking to develop a consensus on voluntary means of controlling inflation has necessarily been laborious and time consuming. When you are dealing in terms of consultation and in terms of a federal state, and you are trying to bring the various representative elements of an economy together, it takes time and effort. We believe that the time and effort will be well spent if this results in an agreement or an approach that offered some promise of breaking the cost price spiral while at the same time restoring healthy growth of output, employment and real income.

As a result of these consultations we came to the conclusion that any plan that evolved must be flexible enough to make it possible to deal reasonably with exceptional cases. It must make special provision for those at the lower end of the earnings scale in recognition of the fact that they are more adversely affected by inflation than others. It must enable those who have fallen behind the rising cost of living to catch up, and enable all of those who work to keep up with future increases in living costs. It must seek to forestall disproportionate increases at the upper end of the income scale that would result from application of flat, across-the-board percentage hikes.

We recognized that there would, of course, be problems in working out a plan that is totally satisfactory to everyone, but those problems would pale by comparison with the problems that would be created by our failure to work out some form of mutual understanding on prices and incomes.

In any event, the facts as I see them are fairly simple. What it comes down to is that the competitive position of our industries at home and abroad is in danger of being seriously undermined, and the future growth of output, employment, and incomes seriously jeopardized unless inflation is brought under control. Of the three alternatives open to us, voluntary co-operation offers the brightest hope of checking the rising spiral of costs and prices in a way that will best serve the interests of Canadians individually and collectively. If that turns out not to be possible—and the government is going to assess the present state of those discussions—then I will have to canvass the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and my colleagues on the options we are to bring before parliament. After we have had thorough discussions in cabinet those options will be brought forward in the budget, or at a time fairly close to or coincidental with the budget.

In any event I am confident that if Canadians face facts at this stage in the economy and weigh the choices and options, they will decide that we are far better off resolving our problems by working together than compounding our problems by working against each other.

I welcome the opportunity that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby has given me to put a few facts on the record to clear up this matter.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, during the last few minutes that the minister was speaking I had the feeling that I was listening to one of my own speeches, except that it was not as well delivered!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: First of all I want to say that I understand the minister may not be able to remain throughout the debate. He has an emergency on his hands, a hospital case. I hope when he leaves somebody else will come in and occupy one or two of the seats on the front bench and show some interest in this important subject.

I also hope that the minister will understand if I say some things that are fairly firm and pointed when he is not here to hear them. I think he can understand that some of these things will not be said for the first time, and they will be said with some feeling.

I intend to offer an amendment to the motion, Mr. Speaker. I want to say that I do not agree with everything the Leader of the New Democratic Party said, but if by any chance my amendment is not accepted by the House I want to make it clear to the minister that I intend to support the motion as one way of making as clear as I can how much I disapprove of the behaviour of the government in recent months.

It is eight months since the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) spoke to the Canadian Club in Vancouver and put the fundamental economic alternatives faced by Canadians in these terms:

> One way or another a balance is going to be struck in the allocation of shares of the national income between the various sectors of the economy. We can come together and seek to strike a fair and reasonable balance between such elements as wages, prices and profits through a process of consensus which will make possible continued strong growth of national income to the benefit of us all. Alternatively, we can allow the balance to be determined by the process of prolonged and bitter industrial strife, which could leave everyone considerably worse off by substantially reducing the size of the pie that is available to be shared between us."

It is strange how brightly the light shone for the minister so shortly after the election campaign. How tragic it is that, in the eight intervening months since the minister spoke those words in Vancouver, he and the government have shirked their responsibilities and just let time fritter away in an unconscionable manner. The unavoidable result of all this fooling around is that for many Canadians today the so-called consensus program looks like a sham, and from here at least it looks like it is in a shambles. All through the process there has been too much of an air of gamesmanship—too much secrecy—too little public information and too much confusion, sometimes seeming to be created deliberately. Considering the seriousness of the problems which face Canadians, the government's performance must be vigorously condemned by any member of this House whose concern exceeds partisanship.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) told us that he was really the one ultimately in charge of designing and selling this program. But I judge that he has tied a can around the neck of the Minister of Finance and is happy to see it rattle away as hard as it can.

Neither the Minister of Finance nor the Prime Minister really lent their own personal weight to the process, although perhaps the Minister of Finance is so deeply involved now that he is trying to swim. They didn't get behind this process as it was supposed to be developed. That was a dead giveaway as to how seriously they were taking it. They suckered a lot of Canadians very successfully during the 1974 election campaign, and it looks as though they have been at it ever since.

It is not hard to look back and see that the government came out of that election victory celebration with a terrible hangover. That is about all it came out with—except a majority, of course.

I think it hoped that things would improve fairly quickly in the American economy, and if it provided some short term stimulus in the November budget, that would tide us over a couple of rough quarters. As for inflation, Mr. Speaker, when you spend two months of an election campaign selling people on the idea that nothing can be done, then for some decent interval at least, if you are a sincere Liberal, obviously you must do precisely that—nothing.

Then we started to hear about the consensus, first from the Minister of Finance shortly after the new parliament met, or even before—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): In the throne speech.

Mr. Stanfield: I think the minister anticipated the throne speech—he was ahead of the Prime Minister on that point. Then we heard about it in the budget and on and on ever since. I think at the outset the minister expected a pretty speedy recovery of the American economy. He expected price inflation to abate, and he generally assessed that the economy could stand a little wage demand inflation as a function of catch-up. I think that was what the government wishfully thought last fall.

● (1620)

As a follow-through to the dishonest position taken by the minister and his colleagues—because everything the minister could see today concerning the dangers to the economy, the damage being done to the ordinary Canadian by inflation, and the threat to our competitive position, was equally apparent to anyone who was willing to look last July—the government adopted a basically sound idea. It explored the possibility of an incomes policy. Then it took this basically sound proposition and perverted it into something which I guess it hoped would appear to be an immediate anti-inflation program. So a new dishonesty was born, and a worthy concept has been discredited as a result.

An incomes policy approach is a longer term kind of thing that takes a lot of talking about and a lot of time. For months and months we did not know what the Minister of Finance meant when he talked about consensus. He would not tell us. It was something which was too confidential for this House and country. We were not to know about it. Finally he defined the basic elements of what he had in mind. We recognized then that he was talking about an attempt to achieve some form of voluntary incomes policy.

To try to achieve an incomes policy under duress is, of course, a strange way to do business. So, to give the minister and the Prime Minister and associates the benefit of the doubt, one must assume that the use of a longer term incomes policy proposal as a cover for the absence of any effective short-term action to deal with inflation started out simply as a time-buying operation—something to help them "make it through the night." I think that is the way it started.

When the minister presented his budget in November this was very apparent. The budget did nothing, absolutely nothing, to come to grips with inflation. All we got was another smokescreen about consensus. It was a time buying operation.

The minister's forecasts made at the time of the November budget were shot hell west and crooked within a few months. Sad to say, this has not been an infrequent development. Successive ministers of finance have made poor forecasts. The United States economy was not recovering quickly. Our biggest customer was tightening its belt and our balance of payments position was running from bad to worse. At last the outlook was terrifying the Minister of Finance. Unemployment was climbing, productivity falling, labour unrest growing, housing prices and interest rates started going up again, while housing starts, the value of the dollar, and confidence among the Canadian people were on the decline. So then the government suddenly had to put up or shut up on its consensus program. What began as a time-buying game became a game it had to play in earnest.

We have heard some of the most outlandish things since then. Now the minister says he wants voluntary agreement, or else! He holds out a threat. He has said—the program is voluntary, mind you—that he will introduce a restrictive budget to enforce his position if people do not go along. In effect he has said to labour, "If you do not go along with what we suggest, if you do not agree, we shall bring in a highly restrictive budget and then you will see what it is like."

I have a hard time taking all this seriously. I have to believe that it is more than gamesmanship. If the Minister of Finance is serious, the government, surely, is in the role of a hijacker saying, "Go where I want to go or I'll blow us all up." That's what this kind of play really amounts to. There is nothing so simple and innocent here as, "evaluating the options" or exhausting options. A highly restrictive budget now, Sir, would be the final disgusting act of a sequence of events born in dishonesty, nurtured in complacency, and matured in perversion.

When we saw the document—it is not a proposal; I do not know what it is—we knew then that it had made pretty good sense for the government to hide it. Last Monday, when the details were revealed by the Toronto Star, the minister said that it would be premature to comment on the details. On Tuesday he complained that they must have been "earlier working papers." On Thursday, after a statement by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp), and after it was common knowledge that they were the most up-to-date expression of the government's thinking that was before labour and business, the minister protested against the press report of the documents and said, and I quote, that they "did not fairly reflect the amplitude or totality of the proposition of proposals in discussion." That was his theme again today.

He left the impression that the reports were so distorted that he could not even recognize the documents as they were reported. Yesterday he asserted he had read the final documentation before it was sent out. What pathetic and tortuous evasion! After reading the documents one can say there is no doubt they had been fairly and vividly reported in the press. The fact is, Sir, that last week, after they started to be leaked out in print, the minister was ashamed of the documents. They provided no meaningful basis for a meaningful response from organized labour, and have only incited a sterile exchange of rhetoric.

Some will argue as to whether a voluntary restraint program can work, or be workable. I suggest that if it is to be workable, if it is to be acceptable, it must be comprehensive, and must elicit unanimity from all sectors of the economy. It must be expressed in specifics by the government. The government pretended it was working on this question all during the fall, all during the winter, and all through the spring, and then it laid an egg. This really stretches one's credulity.

An hon. Member: It was an abortion.

Mr. Stanfield: No. They do not permit abortions for those reasons.

The documents themselves do not necessarily suggest that the government intends simply to restrain wages. I do not intend to suggest that that is the government's purpose. However, they do reveal that where there are difficulties, where some decisions are required, the government has nothing to propose. On professional fees, prices for export industries, dividends, rents, marketing boards, financial institutions and monitoring mechanisms, the government stands exposed as indolent, irresolute, weak and rhetorical.

I have said that I will support a sincere and responsible effort by the government to formulate a program of voluntary restraints, but I am not bound in any way to support or endorse the way the government has conducted or is conducting this exercise.

First, I dissociate myself from the divisive rhetoric of the Minister of Finance. It is hypocritical and irresponsible to wage a campaign for common restraint with an analysis of the problem that singles out one group in our national community, and with threats of restriction that would single out the weak. I realize the effort of framing such a national program is difficult and politically dangerous. However, I do not feel it is excusable to employ the tactics of the demagogue when things get hot. If I may speak personally, I know something about the difficulties of advocating a demanding and tough response to inflation. However, I sincerely believe I did not threaten the unity that program would require by singling out villains, or threatening repressive and reactionary measures when it was attacked.

● (1630)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister describe the consensus process as the third option, but really it is nothing of the kind. A consensus, a recognition of our common responsibilities and an acceptance of the fairness of where we are going, must be the foundation of any effective program to bring inflation under control, while retaining the vitality of our national economy. A sense of common purpose coupled with the will to pursue a common goal surely is something more than an option.

I believe we possess such a spirit in this country, and with a reserve of common sense and determination we can restore the health of our economy. However, our unity is a fragile as well as a valuable commodity, and it is threatened not only by the economic problems we face, but by the conduct of the government at this moment. The Minister of Finance's advocacy of the consensus approach does not capture the common interest, but invites division and is leading to failure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: With this government everyone is really wondering what is really going on. This government deluded and misled the public prior to, during, and for a number of months after the last election campaign. It said, "There is little we can do. It is all foreign developments. Controls never work anywhere. There are disasters all over the place." Instead of facing up to the problem that anyone could see was facing the Canadian people, and urging Canadians to face up to the problem, the government has literally led the Canadian people down the garden path.

I call on the government to stop this unmitigated madness, to come to its senses, to come clean with Canadians, and use its mandate for the good of the country. There are some three years to go before another election. There were nearly four years when it started this. This is no time for short term partisanship. It is time for the government to face up to its responsibilities, face the problems of this country and tell the Canadian people what are the problems. If it does that it will certainly have the support of the official opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I move:

That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after "in particular for" and substituting therefor the words "its failure to implement a policy of restraint that will be equitable for all Canadians and appropriate for a healthy expanding economy".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: At first glance I have a tendency to hesitate to accept and put to the House the amendment moved by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). Taking into account that this is a very short day, I feel uneasy about inviting hon. members to become involved in a procedural debate. To my mind the proposal put forward by the Leader of the Opposition brings in not a completely new proposition but a completely new alternative solution. Because of this I have some reservation. I am not in a position to put the amendment in its present terms at this time. If hon. members want to express their views to enlighten the Chair, I will listen to their views as to the procedural acceptability of the amendment. Otherwise, I will take it under advisement and render a decision later.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have no desire to chew up any of the time available for debate this afternoon. I put the amendment forward as a constructive proposition. However, I would be very disappointed if we got involved in a procedural argument which would deprive members of their opportunity to speak.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have the same view, that this is not the day for a lengthy procedural debate. Speaking for my colleagues, I may say that we are prepared to leave the decision in Your Honour's hands. We have to do that anyway. I just want to make the point that on opposition days it has been the general rule not to allow amendments from another party if they completely alter the motion as put down by the party whose day it is. Amendments have been allowed if they add something which is incidental to the motion, but not if they strike out most of the main motion. I submit this amendment strikes out the philosophy we have tried to put before the House and puts in something else. That may be what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) wishes to do. However, I hope Your Honour will find that procedurally it is out of order.

Mr. Baldwin: I just point out to Your Honour two predecents where the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), in spite of what he just said, proposed amendments which were accepted by the Chair. They went quite a long distance toward altering the original motions. I simply put them before Your Honour without argument. On March 7, 1972, as recorded at page 600 of Hansard, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre moved an amendment to a motion which I had moved. As reported at page 1092 of Hansard for 1972, a motion moved by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) with regard to pensions was altered to a very substantial extent by an amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I will just take a minute to add my comments to what has been said. My concern is not whether it is traditional for one party to offer an amendment to another party's motion on an opposition day. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will agree the more substantial question is whether the amendment alters the motion in a fundamental way. I put forward the proposition that that is precisely what this does.

Looking at the words to be struck out, I do not think it is any coincidence that the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) would cut out the democratic socialist core of the motion of my party. In particular I refer to the concluding words where we call for "the related need for government investment planning." That is not coincidental to the motion, as the wording makes clear. Those words are preceded by "a need for". In our view that is inextricably connected with the original motion. Any amendment to strike out that wording would fundamentally alter the motion and, in our view, should not be accepted.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not know if I should proceed in this way, but because of the time limit I wonder if the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) would accept the suggestion to amend his motion by adding to the motion a "furthermore" instead of taking away so many words. I do not want to go into the basics of the main motion or the amendment. I have not studied that aspect. But adding words would allow the Chair to accept the amendment in its present form.

● (1640)

Mr. Stanfield: I am entirely reasonable. I want to fight inflation, not my hon. friends down there. If it is more acceptable to the Chair I could add, at the end, the words

"and for its failure to implement a policy of restraint that will be equitable for all Canadians and appropriate for a healthy expanding economy."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House agree to allow the Leader of the Opposition to modify his proposal?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stanfield: Then I move, seconded by my hon. friend from Peace River:

That the motion be amended by adding after the word "planning" the words "and for its failure to implement a policy of restraint that will be equitable for all Canadians and appropriate for a healthy expanding economy."

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party is moving today a no-confidence motion against the Liberal government, pointing out the failure of the latter to plan the national economic to fight not only inflation but also the persistent and uncontrollable rise of the unemployment rate in Canada.

While deploring the fact that the New Democratic Party does not offer any means to remedy the government's negligence and blindness, I must recognize that the greatly perturbed economical and social situation is a direct result of the laziness, and I would even say the inefficiency of the Liberal government, although it is a majority and a strong government. It might well be, Mr. Speaker, because it has a solid majority that things are so bad in Canada, especially in the labour field. This government does not listen anymore to people, it has drifted away from them; it is administering this country as though Canada belonged to it and without any concern at all for the fears and hopes of the Canadian people. There are, Mr. Speaker, excessive claims from one ocean to another. Others are reasonable. At all events, be they excessive or reasonable, the government is turning a deaf ear.

Mr. Speaker, it is not because the Canadian people provided the Liberals with a strong majority in the last federal election that the latter have the right today to legislate during four years without giving any consideration to the claims of the Canadian people. That is surely a harsh opinion, but why not? That opinion corresponds to what the Canadian people demand: this government told the Canadian people in the Speech from the Throne that inflation would be wrestled to the ground, that unemployment would regress and that the Canadian people would enjoy a good and long period of prosperity.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) repeated that in his November budget. He had forecasted all those good things, those nice promises that can be compared to those that were made during the last election. That is what the Liberals were saying during the last federal election, at the time they were turning down the Progressive Conservative proposal on a price and wage freeze.

The Liberals are bragging when they say that Canadians rejected price and wage freeze during the last election by voting Liberal. If that is true, then it was strickly a negative vote, a vote against Progressive Conservatives and not necessarily for Liberals. If, on the other hand, it was a positive vote, the fact still remains that Canadians sincerely hope for solutions other than price and wage freeze to the serious problems of inflation, unemployment and spiralling prices.

So, Mr. Speaker, no matter how one interprets the vote of the last election which gave the Liberals a strong majority, it must still be recognized that the results after nearly a year of majority Liberal government are yet to be seen and felt. What solutions does this government have to curb inflation? What solutions did the Liberal government take or intend to take to control in one way or another the increase in consumer prices? What are the solutions, Mr. Speaker? The government found a few of them. It decided one day since it was elected to set up a Royal Commission on Corporate Concentration to inquire whether they were making too much profit, whether their demands were exaggerated and whether their influence over the economy created a power parallel to that of the government.

Mr. Speaker, let us not go any further and hope for results that will not be forthcoming from that Commission since, first, that will be another commission whose recommendations will be left gathering dust on shelves, all the more, Mr. Speaker, as the name of one of the members of that Commission is Pierre Nadeau who is president of Petrofina Canada Limited, a large multinational Canadian oil company.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this Commission should not be asked to be more objective than necessary because, it is itself facing the same problem that the one it will investigate. This Government, which wishes also to deal with that problem, appointed another commission, the Meat Marketing Commission. Who is sitting on this Commission which has been mandated to inquire whether unreasonable profits are made by middle-men between the producer and the consumer? Its objective is to protect the interest of Canadian consumers in order to avoid abuses in that particular field as we know that today the meat business is extremely important in Canada, especially in so far as the quality of food is concerned. So, who is sitting on this Commission? Who are the investigating commissioners? Representatives or executives of Dominion Stores Limited and executives of Steinberg's Limited.

Again, Mr. Speaker, how could we hope to achieVe positive results and really protect the interest of Canadian consumers when the Commissioners are the very profiteers in the market they are investigating? It is all window-dressing; the government must have plenty of nerve to appoint such commissions as a face-saving move designed to demonstrate to the public its concern for such or such economic sector. But when one sees the resource people used by this government to make investigations, one is allowed to entertain reservations regarding the objectivity of the commissioners, but also of their recommendations, if any.

In his answer to the leader of the New Democratic party, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), the minister of Finance referred to the working papers prepared by senior civil servants and published in the 7th report of the ad hoc committee; and he suggested that opposition members should read carefully that document which is the first suggestion of a voluntary wages and prices restraint agreement in Canada.

It must be pointed out that the cost of living has increased in every sector of our economy, housing, interest rates, food or production cost. In every case, all the government did was to appoint commissions of inquiry which in my opinion are not trustworthy if you consider the members of those commissions, since the possibility of conflicts of interests has not been discarded.

Moreover, the government was elected and they said on the last election they would wrestle inflation to the ground, try to curb unemployment and try to make way for a fair period of prosperity for Canadians. Like all my colleagues, I heard them make such statements during the last election. The people of Canada trusted this government; they expected efficient solutions, since the ones who were most affected by price increases, by inflation or unemployment are indeed low income people, labourers, farmers.

However, no definite action was taken except for so-called pension escalations, but they had always been part of the budget speeches we heard, either in May 1974 or in November 1974. And we shall probably hear them sing the same song during the next one in May. Proposed fiscal measures are always to the expense of the average taxpayer. The government do not want to interfere directly with the mechanism of prices and salaries. They do not want to impose any rule or any program to the Canadian economy. This government prefers, as a policy, to let things go the way they want to, to make inquiries, to monitor possible abuses. Its economic leadership is superficial in that it does not try to find strong allies to wrestle inflation to the ground, or more efficient tools to stop unemployment.

● (1650)

I have read the working paper which the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) referred to in his speech. At page 7, on food prices, a problem which affects most Canadian consumers, it is stated that:

> With respect to food prices, it may be stated in general . . .

And this is a paper by senior officials which is supposed to be the Bible of this new agreement on voluntary restraint which is proposed to us.

> . . . that farmers and fishermen do not have the power to determine the prices at which their products are sold at the farm gate or the fish dock. Thus, the question of restraint does not arise.

This is what we find in the paper written by senior officials and which the Minister of Finance referred to.

What means have we today, if this request for voluntary restraint is not directed to farm producers, be they producers of wheat, meat or any kind of Canadian farm product? Whom is this request of the Minister of Finance directed to? To what extent is this request serious, since senior officials admit that they can do nothing, because, in the area of food, it is not the producers who control prices. If they are not the ones who have to exercise restraint, the middle men or those in charge of marketing will have to.

But marketing is controlled in Canada by Dominion Stores Limited and Steinberg Limited, among others, because they are not the only ones, of course. As I said, these companies have practically a monopoly on the marketing of almost every food product in Canada. They control marketing and probably production. And, Mr. Chairman, they are the direct cause of food prices increases.

However, I have grave doubts that the government will ever dare come to grips with this kind of monopoly or collusion in the Canadian economy or with those profiteering at the expense of both consumers and producers.

The minister called on us to read the document. My colleague for Bellechasse and myself put some questions to him during the question period, concerning the main cause of inflation. That is, the cost of money, the cost of interest charged by the Industrial Development Bank to small businesses, and by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for housing. The minister answered there was nothing he could do about rising interest rates, because this was controlled either by chartered banks, which are private corporations, or by the Bank of Canada in another sector. More importantly, he could not act because this was an international problem. So here comes the "national Trudeau excuse". Nothing we can do. This government, despite its majority, cannot do anything about the cost of money in Canada. But the governor of the Bank of Canada answers directly to the Minister of Finance.

So the Minister of Finance told us today there was absolutely nothing he could do about interest rates. His working paper he wants us to read, because this is his Bible, shows he will not act. Rather, he passes the buck to labour and employers. He says: "Exercise voluntary restraints, because we ourselves cannot or will not do it". He has no solutions to check inflation and unemployment in Canada. That is why he does not act.

On page 8 of the document we read:

Proposals regarding interest

. . . that is to say, increases . . .

—this, of course, comes from the minister's advisers, the ones who devised that consensus scheme—

. . . in interest rates charged by these institutions . . .

—banking institutions, chartered banks—

. . . should be justified by increases in the interest rates which they pay and their operating and other expenses. There has been no discussion yet with representatives of financial institutions.

That is the end, Mr. Speaker. The Minister admits in his working paper, which is the basis of a supposedly effective fight against inflation, that there has been no discussion and no contact between his department and the banking institutions concerning the level of interest rates in this fight against inflation.

Mr. Speaker, I say that Canadians would be stupid to agree to this voluntary arrangement contained in the minister's suggestion, without having first of all the Minister's formal undertaking that the same sacrifices will be demanded of the Canadian banking system as those which will be imposed to Canadians, with salary increases as determined on the first page of this paper.

One of the main causes of inflation and unemployment in Canada is our monetary system and money supply. It has been said in the House that there is inflation because there is too much money in circulation. In fact, Mr. Speaker, we understand today, since we have been hearing the older parties talking about money economy, that there is inflation not because there is too much money in circulation, but in fact because there is not enough money, because our money is losing its value, because it is depreciated and because the prices are spiralling and getting out of control.

There is a solution which strikes directly to the heart of the problem. Mr. Speaker, it is a solution that the creditistes have been putting forward for a long time and which is called consumer price discount. Today, we complain that what is most expensive and affects the prices most is the production costs. Because of prices and production costs, Canadians are going without commodities or food or else they go into debt to obtain them. Such is the situation for Canadians. If one reviews the Statistics Canada figures, one notes that the rate of indebtedness of Canadians is not only increasing continually but that it is reaching obviously dangerous levels.

However, Mr. Speaker, a Food Prices Review Board brochure entitled "What Price Nutrition?", published in February 1975, states that 52 per cent of Canadian families are going without appropriate or sufficient food and without healthy nutrition, because of the prohibitive price of food products in Canada. According to this publication, their diet lacks vitamins C, iron. This is very interesting, Mr. Speaker. I quote:

The significance of the Board's findings in this report is perhaps best considered in light of the Nutrition Canada Survey which was conducted over a 28-month period ending in December 1972. It found large numbers of Canadians with deficient intakes of key nutrients. Nearly 70 per cent of all women between the ages of 10 and 64, for instances, are not receiving enough iron.

[Mr. Fortin.]

Because of the prices.

More than 50 per cent of all Canadians, with the exception of children under 10 and men between the ages of 20 and 39, have sufficient intakes of calcium. Between 10 and 20 per cent of Canadians do not receive enough Vitamin C. And there are other examples.

Why, Mr. Speaker? Because people must watch their budget instead of concerning themselves with the quality of food products. They feed themselves according to their income. Our feeding habits, our physical health depend on the money available. Inflation has become so serious that not only the livelihood but also the health of Canadians are threatened and jeopardized.

The prospects are none too promising either. The minister said earlier that things will improve, that there is no need to worry or panic because that will be back in order.

I will not read all the article but in volume 7, No. 4, of the magazine entitled Revue de la main-d'œuvre, Quebec area, second semester of 1974, the prospects are described as follows:

The incidence of the economic slowdown will be probably fraught with consequences for the labour market during 1975; the unemployment rate in Canada should increase substantially because of the anticipated low employment.

Two whole paragraphs are just as encouraging. What an outlook!

As I said, Mr. Speaker, within a year, or six months, the same situation will prevail without any solution being found.

That is why I emphasize this point in order to draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and to incite him to consider the Social Credit proposals related to adjusted discount, which is not a price or salary control but simply an adjustment of wages against the price paid. An excessive increase of products is thus avoided, which allows producers to meet the consumers' demand. There is no other solution.

The government lacks the courage to act, it puts the responsibility on employers and on unions, but, for the time being, it has no proposal to put forward.

Mr. Speaker—

● (1700)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order please. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I join in this debate with mixed feelings because I believe we are really entering into a family squabble in two senses. The other evening those who were with us, and I see that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) is one of only two Cabinet ministers still with us—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: The President of the Treasury Board stated that he liked the views of the NDP, and he reminded us that, in the words of former Prime Minister St. Laurent, the only difference was that the NDP were in a hurry.

Mr. Baldwin: Both going backwards.

Mr. Stevens: I would also remind the mover of this motion that his good friends on the other side will presumably do exactly what he wants, namely, adopt some type of socialistic plan for the takeover of all productive sectors in the country. I say that because when we were at the meeting of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works only a few days ago one of my colleagues asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald)—I am sorry he is not in his seat today—about Petro-Can, and whether it was to be the government's policy in general that whenever there appeared to be a private company that it thought, whatever justification it might have, was not doing its full job, the government would form a Crown corporation. The minister said:

—whenever there has been an observed public need, Mr. Malone, we have taken this action, yes.

My colleague then said:

With that philosophy then, potentially all industry at sometime could be government owned?

The minister replied:

If all industry fails to perform and is not going to look after the needs of Canadians, then clearly the government is going to have to move.

An hon. Member: That is pretty good stuff.

Mr. Stevens: As the hon. member for the NDP says, that is pretty good stuff, but I would simply suggest that the motion today is an illustration of the fact that presumably there is a bit of a rift in this coalition between the NDP and the Liberal government.

In a second sense, Mr. Speaker, I suggest what we are seeing today is a rift within the NDP caucus itself. Those of us who watch "Canada AM", periodically will recall the words of the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman), who more or less cleared his soul and told the watching public exactly what was going on within the NDP. He said the fact was that they had lost their purpose and the Liberal party had swung so far to the left, and taken all their ideas, and there was really no future for that party. Therefore I believe that what we have in this motion by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) is an illustration of how he at least wants to demonstrate that there is some difference between the Liberals and the NDP.

In that respect, I am sorry he has framed the motion in this form, because while we on this side in the official opposition have very little faith in the way the government has been conducting the economic affairs of the country, we believe the motion is wrongly worded and implies at least some type of socialistic planning which is so much an integral part of NDP thinking.

An hon. Member: How will you vote?

Mr. Stevens: In answer to the hon. member who asks how I will vote, let me say that when you are faced with two evils you have to decide which is the worst. As our leader has indicated, and we certainly intend to support his amendment, in order to show our opposition to the government benches we will unfortunately have to vote for the hon. member's motion.

The Canadian Economy

Mr. Stevens: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) joined in this debate earlier, spending most of his time talking about the consensus program. He stated that one of his alternatives was a highly restrictive fiscal and monetary policy for the country.

This motion before us is really related to the mismanagement of our economy. Surely the government must accept the fact that our present problems can be laid at its doorstep. It is the high government spending and the almost unbelievable increase in the money supply in this country that has contributed more than any other single thing to the inflation we are living with today.

Earlier today I directed a question to the Minister of Finance in which I pointed out that Federal Reserve Chairman Burns in the United States has given a commitment to Congress that he will not increase the money supply in that country by more than 5 per cent to 7½ per cent. I asked our Minister of Finance if he had a similar commitment from the Governor of the Bank of Canada to assure that there would be some restraint in this country.

The minister replied, "Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman put this type of question to the House before. Over the whole 12-month period ending March, 1975, the increase in the money supply series has been 12 per cent, M-1,—"there he is referring to the primary money supply system—"a figure which appears to be within the range that is reasonable in the circumstances in terms of the nominal growth of the economy."

Here we have a Minister of Finance telling us that a 12 per cent increase in our money system is reasonable. He failed to point out of course that in the first three months of 1975, the first quarter, the M-1 growth in Canada was 33.1 per cent, compared to a growth in the same quarter in the United States of 4.4 per cent. He also failed to point out that if you review the growth of the money system in the United States and in Canada and compare the two growths, during the period our present Minister of Finance has been in office you will find that our money growth has been almost twice as fast as that in the United States.

Those are the facts. The minister must know this. He fails to level with the Canadian public. Instead he chooses to single out sectors of the economy, such as labour, and blame them for whatever inflationary pressures we now have or which he may feel will occur in the future.

If we turn to the matter of government spending I could give equally alarming figures concerning the growth in federal expenditures under this government. For example, federal government expenditures in 1974 were twice what they were in 1969, three times the amount spent in 1961, or 12 times the 1950 level. Let there be no mistake, that is the fertile ground in which the inflation we are now living with has been planted.

Dealing with this motion and the amendment thereto, I would suggest that first of all we must see how on earth we in this country got into the present position. This is the most fortunate country in the world. We have an alert, growing population, well educated people, and resources that are the envy of the world. We often overlook our good fortune. Canada, with slightly over half of one per cent of the world's population, has 7.3 per cent of its land surface, 15 per cent of its known fresh water resources, and a disproportionately large percentage of proven and potential reserves of many key minerals including, if you like, the Athabasca tar sands which have potential reserves of oil approximating the total proven conventional reserves of the rest of the world put together.

Similarly we are amongst the world's leading producers of food, grain and livestock. Indeed we have the potential to be self-contained in respect of most vital resources. With such potential one would expect that we could take a significant lead in the world in helping underdeveloped nations and relieving international tensions. At home we would appear to have every ingredient necessary to make our people number one in the world in true wealth, yet we find we are losing, not gaining, relative to other people in the world. Figures recently released show that Canada now is number six in per capita wealth. Imagine! We were number two in the world and we had reason to believe we could be number one, yet under the present Minister of Finance and the present government we have slipped from number two to number six on a per capita basis among the significant countries of the world.

With such a capability in respect of our resources and our people one would expect that poverty would become less and less in this nation. Yet we find the drive to lessen poverty in Canada has made little or no progress in the past 15 years.

I think it is significant to point out that in the previous 200 years significant gains were made in overcoming poverty in this country. If we go back to 1763 we find it is estimated that at that time 95 per cent of the people living in the colonies that are now part of Canada were poor by any standard. By the time of Confederation around 80 per cent were still below the poverty level, but by 1961 those classed as poor in the country were down to approximately 20 per cent. Since then, however, this percentage has remained static—I think this is significant—while the welfare bill in Canada has risen five-fold. In 1975 we will spend more than $22 billion, which is more in real terms than all government spending in 1961. Expressed another way, about 20 per cent of the nation's national income will be used to help relieve those less fortunate, but their plight does not appear to be improving. The modern notion that a state can spend its way out of poverty is not working in Canada.

Surely the time has come when we must seriously ask ourselves why we in Canada appear to be faring so poorly. If one believes the words of the Minister of Finance it would appear that he believes we will do still worse in the future. Why should our real growth now be projected at zero for the current year? In fact under our present Finance Minister we find that not only is our real growth turning to zero but that we have had more unemployment and triple the inflation that we had under former Finance Minister Benson, his predecessor, and we are heading into the highest trade deficit in our history.

Many of us can recall that we complained about Finance Minister Benson, but I can tell you that he was the height of fiscal and monetary responsibility compared to our present Minister of Finance.

I should like to touch on many other points. I would suggest that this government has really been the most permissive government we have ever had in Canada. It will be known as the Permissive Government. It is a government which is permissive on all fronts, not only on the economic front but in respect of law and order. This government has no equal in respect of its permissiveness. Rather than a Just Society they have given us a Permissive Society.

As has often been mentioned, income taxes have risen as a result of the government's action at a much faster rate than real terms would justify. Strikes are becoming an increasing problem; 9.2 million days were lost last year, one of the worst records in the industrial world, compared to 3.9 million days lost in 1969. These are the reasons we believe, in spite of the wording of the present motion, that we must join in condemning the government for the way it has been operating, particularly with respect of the economy. In seven years under our present Prime Minister we have had less real growth than in the previous seven years. Yet there has been three times the inflation, and a higher percentage of our work force unemployed.

Mr. Caccia: Why do you not mention the new jobs that have been created?

Mr. Stevens: At the present time the percentage of our gross national product that is going into government is 40 per cent compared to about 30 per cent in 1960. If this government activity fails, I suggest it fails by being too expansive.

● (1720)

Our friends to the left have often stated that they believe that the epitomy of state planning or of their socialized planning approach is Sweden. I suggest to them that Sweden is perhaps a good example of what not to do or, if you like, what to do if you must have a socialist state.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I would point out that in that state 95 per cent of the economy is still in private hands, in fact more than in Canada. I would also point out that the Swedes are very careful. Instead of interfering with the private sector, certainly by taking it over, they state quite openly that they believe that the private sector must be preserved in order that they can get the tax revenue needed for their welfare programs.

I would simply suggest that this little alliance of the NDP and, if we believe the President of the Treasury Board, the Liberals, who are really slow NDP'ers judging from his words, will lead us more and more into a state intervention system, one in which we will be placed virtually in a situation where our present economy will become worse and worse, partly due to the lack of direction from the government and partly the unfair interference from the government in the operation of our economy.

If we are ever to put an end to spiralling prices, high interest rates and economic stagnation we must stop the growth of government, especially in the commercial field, and we must put our monetary and fiscal house in order. To reverse the trend of fiscal irresponsibility we need stronger leadership in Ottawa. We must resist the current feeling that there must be more and more government spending and government involvement. It is hurting, not helping our progress.

I suggest to my friends to the left that our free enterprise system, for all its faults, has at least made this country prosperous.

An hon. Member: The workers did.

Mr. Stevens: But I would also suggest that it is a mile ahead of whatever is running second. Some like to proclaim the inevitability of the demise of this system. I suggest that there is no way in which this system will fall into a demise if we are alert. The fact is that our economic system has raised us from a poverty ridden group of colonies, where 95 per cent of the people were poor by any measure, into a great agricultural and industrial power. We now define poverty in this country at an income level that is higher than the average income level of the world's strongest communist nation, and at a level higher than the average income in 80 per cent of the nations of the world. Yet our government, through its inaction and misdirection, has placed this system in jeopardy.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, it will be very interesting to see the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) rise in his seat after his attack on the horrors of socialism and the horror of this party and vote in favour of the motion put forward by this party which calls for more government investment planning. It would be interesting to see him support that motion, as his leader will do, after the speech he has just made.

I must say at the outset that when I heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) today I thought for a while I was seeing the ghost of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) of a year or so ago, or of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) retreaded, because the minister's speech was like a rereading of their speeches.

With the wealth that we have in this country and with our resources it is a real tragedy that we have so much inequality and so many inequities between those who have money and the working people who produce the goods and services.

We have a government that claims it cannot do anything for the fundamental reason that it believes in the so called free enterprise system and free marketplace. Of course that no longer exists because today we have large corporations that make the decisions affecting the lives of every Canadian. We do not have the old free marketplace. The Minister of Finance in that type of situation is like an economic eunuch. He does not have any power whatsoever to guide the economy. The only thing he can do is to point a finger at another scapegoat, and the scapegoat that he has chosen on this occasion is collectively the working people of Canada.

Liberal governments have often chosen scapegoats in the past, and now in the recent statements they made they are attacking the working people who, they say, are responsible, because of their wage demands, for a push in the inflationary spiral. They say that the trade unions are responsible. I disagree. It is a highly irresponsible statement that is far from the truth.

The Canadian Economy

I want to spend a few minutes this afternoon speaking about the government's consensus proposals. I believe these proposals are both misguided and unfair. They are misguided in terms of the entire economy, and they are unfair to the working people from one part of the country to the other. They fail to address themselves to the very serious economic problems. They constitute an economic package that runs the risk of aggravating these problems. We are now in a serious recession in our country. The real gross national product fell by 1.3 per cent in the fourth quarter of 1974. After two quarters of stagnation, today's figures show a 2.8 per cent decline in the industrial output index which, adjusted over a year, represents a drop of some 11 per cent in 1975.

All this makes it very clear that we are now in a very serious recession in Canada, despite the predictions of the Minister of Finance last November when he spoke about a real growth rate of some 4 per cent.

Unemployment at a seasonally adjusted rate was 7.2 per cent in both March and April. We now have the highest unemployment rate of any time since the summer of 1961, and economists are predicting that by the end of this year our unemployment rate is likely to hit 8 per cent, and that perhaps one million Canadian people will be looking for work between Christmas and the succeeding year. Housing starts are down for the first month of this year and are running at about 50 per cent of the rate in 1974.

It is clear that we now need a substantial stimulation of the economy to get it moving again, to build homes, and to provide jobs. Our emphasis in parliament must be to create jobs and to stimulate and expand the economy. In fact the Minister of Finance himself from time to time in the past has recognized the urgency of the problem. He had even recognized the fact that higher output and production, a buoyant economy, in the long run are the best means to combat inflation in this country.

In its speech from the throne on September 30 last the government expressed the view that "higher production, not lower, is essential to slowing down price advances". I wish that it would follow its own advice in the month of May. In the budget of November 18 the Minister of Finance said that "the first essential is action to sustain demand". In a speech to that great workers' club, The Canadian Club of Toronto, on January 27, the minister explained that:

> The budget last November—was considerably more expansionary than that in May because of our recognition of the need to offset the economic drag imposed by continuing stagnation abroad.

In the same throne speech the Minister of Finance quoted with approval the review of the C. D. Howe Research Institute, as contained in its "Policy Review and Outlook for 1975," that it is an expanding economy that in time will enable us to grow out of inflation by providing the increase in real purchasing power Canadian families need to meet the increased cost of food and energy.

The Minister of Finance and his advisers said a few months ago that we need an expanding economy and we need to create jobs. But what happened to that analysis in the last few weeks? It disappeared and was replaced by an attempt, subtle and unmistakable, to lay the blame for all the ills of the economy on the Canadian workers for trying to grab more than their fair share of the national income. He tried to convey the idea that the greed of the Canadian workers has threatened to price Canadian business out of international markets. What he failed to tell us is that a year or two ago when we had excessive profits and price increases, it was those factors which were responsible for making our goods less competitive in the marketplace, rather than the wage increases which are still far below what the working people deserve.

Are workers getting more than their fair share? My party maintains they are not. For three years the government has let inflation go hog wild, has permitted prices to rise unchecked, and has let big corporations get away with profiteering. All this has had the effect of seriously eroding the purchasing power of wages and salaries. In real terms and as a proportion of the gross national product, wages have shown a substantial decline in the last few years.

Figures from the Canadian Labour Congress show that average wages and salaries in real terms—in terms of purchasing power—based on 1972 dollars have declined by 2.7 per cent from the fourth quarter of 1972 to the fourth quarter of 1974.

As a percentage of gross national product, wages and salaries dropped to 53.7 per cent in 1974 from a high of 55.1 per cent in 1971. During that same period corporate profits as a percentage of the GNP increased from 9.7 per cent in 1971 to 13.1 per cent in 1974. Where was the Minister of Finance when that happened? Why was he not protesting? He was dining on filet mignon and sipping champagne with his corporate buddies from Toronto's Bay Street—and the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). Why is he protesting now when the worker is striving to catch up because of the high profit increases of the corporations?

The Minister of Finance recognized—or in the past pretended to recognize—the merit of the argument I am making. I want to read something he said so that the minister and this parliament can realize the change of mind and heart that he has gone through. In this House on February 28 the minister said:

> It is now quite understandable that wage and salary rates are attempting to catch up so as to offer some sort of compensation for the erosion of income . . . as a result of rising prices over the last 18 months.

Then in a speech in Montreal on January 29 he said:

> Salary demands being voiced by organized labour are not out of step with today's reality. Workers are suffering real losses because of the rise in the consumer price index.

Believe it or not that is what the Minister of Finance said a few months ago, before spring came along and he changed his colour.

In a speech to the first ministers' conference last month, before he mounted the Tory bandwagon, he said:

> In many cases, the rise in the cost of living has more than wiped out the benefit an employee expected to gain from the pay increases he has obtained in recent years.

This was the minister just a month ago justifying what we see happening in the economy today. But now, having apparently recognized the justice of the workers' attempt to catch up with rising prices, he tries to do what the hon. member for Don Valley recommended a year ago—to impose wage controls that will see the workers' income fall further behind, and so he attempts to blame our economic problems on the workers' legitimate demands.

Our party will not tolerate that, Mr. Speaker. Our party represents the working people of this country. Our party stands for the redistribution of income and wealth so that the ordinary working person in this country gets the share that he deserves. He is the person who produces, and he deserves the major of the wealth.

Are our economic problems the result of the greed of Canadian workers? Of course not. Even the Minister of Finance admitted they were not. In his budget speech last November he attributed our economic slowdown to the deteriorating economic performance of the countries to which we export, to the decline in housing starts, and to a number of other factors not related to the Canadian worker. At that time he said:

> We believe that the principal threat to the growth of our production and employment comes to us from abroad.

In his speech to the House on March 13 he again expressed the view that our economic slowdown resulted from falling exports that were attributable—not to high wages in Canada—but to serious recessions in the United States, Japan, and the United Kingdom—our three largest customers.

Why, in the last few weeks, is the minister blaming the Canadian worker for the slowdown and the inflation in our economy? Again, in that speech to the Canadian Club of Toronto in January, he said:

> In 1975, the growth of Canadian output will inevitably fall significantly below potential, primarily because of lagging export sales as a result of economic stagnation abroad and a slowdown in housing construction.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that all the alarmist talk in recent weeks about excessive wage demands threatening to price us out of world markets is nothing short of bunkum. As we say in the farmyard in Saskatchewan, it is nothing short of pure horse fertilizer, and I know the Minister of Finance realizes that. I suggest that he has adopted this tactic of laying blame at the feet of the workers in a cynical and desperate attempt to divert attention from the real problems in our economy and from the fact that he does not have any new solutions for them.

What is the minister now proposing? He is proposing wage and price controls that will not solve any of our real problems but will only exacerbate the injustices and inequities in our society, and that will have no real long term impact on inflation in Canada. He is suggesting this on a voluntary basis, but if they are to work they will have the same negative effect as compulsory controls would have if they were implemented.

The government has cleverly attempted to create the impression that voluntary price and wage controls somehow are different. I maintain they are not different, Mr. Speaker. During the last election the Minister of Finance argued that wage and price controls would not work against imported goods, which represent about one-third of the goods we consume. He was right, of course, and he is right whether controls are compulsory or mandatory. That does not make any difference, and I am sure any economist would agree with me on that.

He also argued that controls have been ineffective in moderating inflation in other countries, and he was prone to point to the experience of the United States or of the Conservative Party in Britain. Why is the minister now trying to reach consensus? If voluntary controls are to work they will have the same effect as mandatory controls, and will cause the same distortion in the economy.

I do not believe that anyone can take what the minister is saying very seriously. He is saying that the working people whose wages are out in the open are the ones who have to toe the line, that they cannot have wage increases any higher than 12 per cent or $2,400 a year, whichever is the lesser. That sort of position will discriminate against the person working as a janitor, or working as a waitress. It will discriminate against the ordinary working person of this country, but not against the man making $20,000 a year, the member of parliament, the judge, the corporate executive, the lawyer, the doctor, or any other professional person earning fees.

I cannot take seriously any program which does not treat all Canadians equally, which does not have as its basic point and essential philosophy the notion of equality, the notion that we should narrow the gap between rich and poor, and redistribute income so that the low income person of this country will gain a greater share of our national wealth.

I notice, sadly, although with humour, that the minister forgot to tell us about interest rates. He forgot to talk about dividends, rents, and a number of other forms of income, because he represents the people in our country who get such income. He and the government govern for those people. He excludes interest rates because he thinks that the financial institutions can better look after them. He excludes dividends, because he thinks that we need large dividends in the private sector to stimulate the economy. These are things to which my party, a democratic socialist party, does not subscribe. We believe now that the priority is to stimulate the economy, to increase employment and beat inflation.

We need more production in the economy. We need to redistribute wealth so that ordinary, low income people will have a greater share of our national wealth. If we do this with significant tax cuts, these people can purchase goods and commodities, and we shall create jobs. We need to build houses; nothing stimulates employment more than the building of houses. We need to build 200,000 houses in addition to the ones already proposed or under construction. Building on this scale would stimulate the forest industry, the construction industry, and those industries which provide drapes, furnishings, carpets and other commodities which go into a house.

Our party also thinks that we need a national economic development plan under which the government, as the representative of the people, would do the planning and the investing instead of leaving this to the multinational corporations. That way we could invest according to our social priorities, not according to the dictates of the profit factor or the ledger. We would let the Canadian people make the decisions. Under such a plan our non-renewable resources would be placed under public ownership and developed by the provincial and federal governments. The Canadian people would control their own financial institutions, and decide what is really important for them.

We have to do this if the ordinary citizen is to share more equally in our national wealth. Surely it is the wish of the Canadian people, as it is of the NDP, to establish justice and equality in this country for one and all.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. It being 5.45 o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to section 9(a) of Standing Order 58, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the motion which is now before the House.

The question is on the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield).

All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment to the motion (Mr. Stanfield) which was negatived on the following division:

REQUEST FOR AID TO FOREST INDUSTRY IN QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I wish to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the deplorable situation presently prevailing in the forest industry in Quebec and in view of the very high unemployment rate which affects the Canadian society and economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That the House consider the opportunity to provide immediate assistance to the forest industry in order to revive the economy of our area.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There being no unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

SUGGESTED NAMING OF DONORS OF SWIMMING POOL TO ASCERTAIN POSSIBLE CONFLICT OF INTEREST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion that is self-explanatory. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That in view of the Washington announcement that a swimming pool will be constructed in the White House and that the President of the United States is prohibiting donations from business corporations and labour unions, that no donation over $1,000 will be accepted, that the total cost of the pool will be approximately $52,400, the House calls upon the Prime Minister to immediately follow this example of full disclosure by announcing forthwith all details surrounding construction of a $200,000 swimming pool at his official residence at 24 Sussex Drive with the names of all donors and the amounts donated being made public immediately in order to clearly establish whether or not improprieties or conflict of interest factors exist.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 and cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF USE OF GOVERNMENT SYMBOLS ON STATIONERY OF PRIVATE ORGANIZATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that educational institutions, government departments and Crown corporations are involved in what appears to be a deliberate scheme to identify a society with the government of Canada by the use of stationery and other devices, and in view of the fact that neither the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) nor the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) appear to know the background or to be knowledgeable enough to inform the House as to how this deplorable situation was allowed to develop, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That an immediate investigation take place pursuant to the Inquiries Act.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 and cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT WITH REGARD TO PUTTING RESTRAINT PROPOSALS BEFORE PROVINCES, LABOUR AND BUSINESS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Yesterday the Minister of Finance said, and I quote:

The suggestions advanced in the working papers did not constitute a firm set of proposals by the federal government—

That was with regard to the consensus program. Now that the meeting and discussions have taken place, is it the government's intention to put a firm set of comprehensive restraint proposals before the provinces, labour and business?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the proposals that were put forward for discussion purposes only are being followed up by discussions with the labour unions, the business organizations and possibly other groups. If out of these discussions emerge a more definitive set of proposals, of course they would be made. However, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, in a process of this kind we can only make progress if there is in advance some indication of the kind of support there would be for the proposals.

INFLATION—POSSIBILITY OF MORE MEETINGS WITH PROVINCES, BUSINESS AND LABOUR SEEKING CONSENSUS ON RESTRAINT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Are there in fact more meetings scheduled with the representatives of labour or business before the government makes this assessment as to the propects of a consensus program and the presentation of a budget?

● (1410)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the ministers who have had the most recent discussions have been discussing those meetings with their colleagues. We have not yet had a thorough appraisal and until that is completed I cannot answer the question.

Mr. Stanfield: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The whole thing seems to be in an even greater state of confusion than I dared anticipate. Could the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether it is the intention of the Prime Minister, since the Minister of Finance has said that a good deal is expected of the provinces if a consensus is to be really comprehensive, to canvass the provincial premiers to assess their reactions, even to the fragmentary and informal suggestions that they have received from the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it would be our intentions to have discussions with the provincial governments since, of course, in many areas the provincial authorities do have jurisdiction and authority. Whether it would be at the prime ministerial level or otherwise has not yet been decided.

INFLATION—POSSIBILITY OF MEETINGS WITH WOMEN'S GROUPS IN SEEKING CONSENSUS ON RESTRAINT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question for the Acting Minister of Finance. As the government during their consensus discussions have met with various groups, hopefully from all sectors of our population, including, for example, the CLC and certain business representatives, would the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether any similar meetings have been held with women's groups, such as the National Council of Women, with a view to arriving at a meaningful consensus, and if not, why not?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as you know, the government believes that one should not discriminate against women. If one is talking to the business community, one should not try to sort out the male side of the business community from the female side. Consequently, in looking at the large groups, government, business and labour, there has been no attempt to make special arrangements to meet the female side of any of those institutions.

INFLATION—POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER MEETINGS WITH CONSUMER GROUPS SEEKING CONSENSUS ON RESTRAINT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Acting Minister of Finance. As the representatives of the government have recently met during the inflation talks with certain labour union leaders and only yesterday with representatives of business, would the Acting Minister of Finance indicate whether, subsequent to the one hastily called meeting in Ottawa in early April, he has held any further meetings with consumer or social worker groups, such as the Canadian Council on Social Development?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge no further meetings have been held at the ministerial level with the groups mentioned. There have, however, been what are known as consultations at the technical level, which are meetings between officials rather than ministers.

INFLATION—REASON FOR REJECTION OF GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS FOR RESTRAINT BY BUSINESS—POSSIBILITY OF COUNTERPROPOSALS BY BUSINESS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the representatives of Canadian business with whom the minister met yesterday seemed to have rejected the government's proposals for wage and price control, can the Prime Minister inform the House whether he has been informed of the reasons for that rejection, and can he say whether the business community has given the government a shopping list of proposals, as the Canadian Labour Congress has?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the question, perhaps inadvertently, has conveyed the wrong impression. We did not put a proposal to the businessmen for wage and price controls. They may have expressed opinions on that, but according to the report that I had of the meeting, they were prepared to discuss constructively further with the minister and other ministers the whole question of seeking a consensus and exercising restraint in the economy.

Mr. Saltsman: A supplementary question. In connection with the meeting, can the minister indicate what was the nature of the reservations expressed yesterday, and what was the response of the government to those reservations?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the businessmen themselves have not reached any kind of unanimous position, that some were very much in support of the government proposals, others were doubtful of them and others proposed other means. We have agreed to continue discussions with them.

INFLATION—SUGGESTION ONLY RECOURSE OF GOVERNMENT TO CONTROL IS RESTRICTIVE FISCAL POLICY

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, in view of the three options posed by the Minister of Finance in the last several weeks for solving the alleged problems of inflation, namely compulsory wage and price controls, which has been rejected by the minister himself, and voluntary controls, which seems to have been rejected by those with whom the minister has been consulting, is it the Prime Minister's view that he has no choice now except to bring in restrictive fiscal and monetary policies?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, not at all. Nor would I agree with the premise that voluntary restraint has ceased to be a possible alternative. What I did note is that the hon. member was not talking about inflation but about alleged inflation, which is very interesting to hear.

NATIONAL SECURITY

BASIS ON WHICH CANADA BECAME MEMBER OF INTERPOL

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Solicitor General.

In view of the fact that no legislation has empowered Canada to become a member of Interpol, would the hon. minister tell whether there is any document empowering Canada to become a member of that international organization? If so, would the minister be willing to table that document?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there is correspondence setting out the methods by which Canada became a member of Interpol after the war. No legislation was necessary, but I will look into the possibility of whether these letters and correspondence can be filed.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary.

In view of the fact that communist countries such as Roumania, Yugoslavia and Cuba are already members of Interpol and are thus in a position to secure information concerning Canadian citizens through that organization and then pass such information along to other communist countries, members of Interpol or not, does the hon. Solicitor General foresee in view of that situation, any potential danger for Canada's security?

[English]

Mr. Allmand: No, Mr. Speaker. Interpol is used simply as a means of exchanging information on criminals activity. It is not used for security or intelligence matters in any other way, and the fact that Roumania, Yugoslavia and Cuba are members of Interpol does not constitute any threat as far as we can see to Canada or its citizens.

INFLATION—SUGGESTED EXPLANATION TO BUSINESS OF PRICE JUSTIFICATION LEGISLATION AS MEANS OF GAINING AGREEMENT TO VOLUNTARY RESTRAINT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question asked earlier by the Leader of the Opposition, and I direct it to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has announced he is ready to proceed with his price justification legislation, and since this would obviously form an important part of the government's anti-inflationary measures, will the Prime Minister explain to the House why the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was not present yesterday at a meeting of the business community in order to explain this legislation and perhaps put it forward as a means of getting them to agree to voluntary restraints?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in this government one minister relies on all his colleagues as he knows they will represent him in a very forthright way.

INFLATION—INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT WITH REGARD TO PRICE JUSTIFICATION LEGISLATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, is it the intention of the government to proceed with the so-called price restraint or anti-profiteering legislation before the end of this session?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Theat is certainly a distinct possibility, Mr. Speaker, but it would depend on when this session is intended to end. As the hon. member knows, between now and the end of June, the normal time for adjourning for the summer break, there are more or less 15 government days. If the hon. member glances at the order paper, to which there will be an addition as we will most likely have a budget which will require several days debate, he will realize that we cannot possibly pass all the legislation this government finds desirable, and on which the opposition has been dragging its feet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: Why do you not provide some leadership.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Kootenay West.

BANKRUPTCY

SOCIETY FOR THE STUDY OF THE HERITAGE OF CANADA—REASON FOR PERMITTING CLOSE ALIGNMENT WITH OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is addressed to the Secretary of State. I should like to ask the minister if he is able to tell the House and the country why an apparent massive fraud by the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada, which aligned itself so closely with the Secretary of State's office in terms of grants, deceptive wording and stationery, was allowed to operate without the apparent knowledge of the minister or monitoring by him or his department?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Well, Mr. Speaker, without accepting the language of the question, what I have done in response to the question raised by his colleague yesterday was to pull together the material and I would be pleased to share it when it is together which should be tomorrow or the next day.

Mr. Speaker: One supplementary by the hon. member for Kootenay West.

AIR CANADA

EXTENT OF INVOLVEMENT WITH HERITAGE CANADA—REASON FOR ISSUING BOTH FIRST AND ECONOMY CLASS PASSES TO EMPLOYEES OF TRAVEL COMPANIES

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Transport. Would the Minister of Transport advise the House to what extent the society is involved with Air Canada and the Canadian Transportation Commission and why it is that the practice of Air Canada seems to be to issue both first-class and economy passes to the employees of private companies engaged in the travel industry. Is this a practice of Air Canada, and why is it being allowed to continue?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I have great difficulty relating that question to a supplementary by the hon. member.

INFLATION—POSSIBILITY OF MEETINGS WITH FARM GROUPS IN SEEKING CONSENSUS ON RESTRAINT

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Finance. I should like the minister to tell the House whether in his attempt to seek a consensus on restraint he is communicating with the representatives of the primary agricultural producers of this country who have been hit the hardest by inflation. We want to make sure that the new program put forward will not give them the short end of the stick, once again, as has been the case in the past.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at an earlier stage there were meetings with representatives of the agricultural industry across Canada. They were quite extensive meetings. There have been continuing consultations by the Minister of Agriculture with these groups.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Acting Minister of Finance would agree to make a statement in the House concerning what plans there are for agriculture in the restraint program proposed by the government.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I should like to look into that question before giving an answer.

REASON FOR DELAYING INQUIRY INTO ACTIVITIES OF SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I am wondering whether the Prime Minister would confirm or deny to the House that one of the factors in the intolerable delay and stalling in respect of setting up a public inquiry into the SIU is that a number of the ministers of his cabinet including, I am lead to believe, the Prime Minister himself received some type of assistance during the election campaign.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Moose Jaw.

Mr. Lawrence: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham on a point of order.

Mr. Lawrence: Is that question out of order, Mr. Speaker, and if so, why?

Mr. Speaker: There is no obligation on any minister to answer any question. If there is no answer forthcoming, there is no need to pursue it.

Mr. Lawrence: I believe he is ready to answer.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Moose Jaw.

AGRICULTURE

GRASSHOPPER INFESTATION—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF SUPPLY OF CHEMICALS TO COMBAT

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the forecast threat of a grasshopper infestation in the prairies as serious or more serious than last year, can the minister assure the House that there will be adequate supplies of chemical to combat the threat.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, my information is that in order to make sure that the supplies are available, because of shipping conditions, aircraft are being used to bring in supplies of the chemical. I have been given assurance that everything will be done to make sure there is a proper supply on hand. I am waiting for an updated report which I should have tomorrow but which I do not have today.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, in view of the high cost of the chemical, is it the minister's intention to institute a program to give assistance to the farmers to help them in their part of the cost?

Mr. Whelan: Not at the present time, Mr. Speaker.

MONTREAL—ABILITY OF MARITIME EMPLOYERS' ASSOCIATION TO MEET LOAN COMMITMENTS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I hope that today he will be able to shed some light on the degree to which the government must now be asked to or must participate in the honouring of certain guarantees on loans made by the Maritime Employers' Association.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think it is known that loans have been made to the Maritime Employers' Association. I believe that in May of last year a loan of $7.2 million was made to MEA, through the banks, in order to finance the buy-out and the operational deficits of the organization. I know that in a week the MEA will probably have to refinance its organization because otherwise they might not be in a position to keep it going and to meet their obligations. What we are doing now is to look at the structure of MEA and the kind of relationship they have with the union. The first priority now is to maintain payments to the workers up to the end of June, and after that we will have to move one way or the other.

Mr. Forrestall: I have a supplementary question for clarification, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister telling us that at this point in time the government is not prepared to accept its responsibility with respect to guarantees in default of loans? Is the minister indicating that at present the government will not underwrite those loans in the event that MEA is not able to meet its requirements to the banks because of the relationship generally of one port to another in eastern Canada?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No, Mr. Speaker. Last year when we lent this money there was an understanding that it would be repaid with a surcharge of 20 cents or 40 cents. I believe it was 40 cents, and 20 cents was supposed to be paid back to the government, ten cents to each of the two banks involved in the deal.

Mr. Fairweather: Yes, the way I pay my loans.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Of course, we want the banks to stick to the agreement because we have to maintain payments to the workers. I cannot give a clear answer. They are now negotiating about how they will proceed to the end of June when we will consider a new scheme in order to maintain the port of Montreal in operation.

GOVERNMENT INTENTION WITH REGARD TO DEFICIT OF MARITIME EMPLOYERS' ASSOCIATION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether or not it is the intention of the government to underwrite the deficit of the Maritime Employers' Association with respect to the ports of Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec. This is a fairly straightforward question.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport has been dealing with this very subject. I have nothing to add to what he said.

IMMIGRATION

POSSIBILITY GREEN PAPER ENGENDERS RACISM—REQUEST FOR EMPHASIS ON CONTRIBUTION OF IMMIGRANTS

Hon. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it arises out of the recent tragic rash of apparently racially motivated violence in Toronto, culminating in the death of a youth in my riding last week and of a five year old girl this week. I am sure the government is concerned that the immigration green paper process, in focusing attention on immigrants and their effects on Canadian society—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Stanbury: —not excite, racism, as some fear it is already doing. Will the Prime Minister consult with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, the minister in charge of multiculturalism and the Secretary of State responsible for citizenship and national unity, to ensure that there is an intensive program in conjunction with the immigration green paper process to acquaint the public with the positive contributions to Canada which immigrants have made and are making to Canada—

● (1430)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanbury: —economically as well as socially, and to promote a greater sense of community and understanding in our multicultural society?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is making a very valid suggestion on a matter of great concern to this government, and I will certainly follow it up in discussions with the ministers, as he suggests.

In the meantime I want to repeat to this House what I have said before, both inside and outside of Canada, that the green paper is not a policy paper. It is one meant for discussion. But in any and all events, the federal government is committed, and will remain committed, to a policy which is non-discriminatory as between races, ethnic origins, language groups, countries of origin or religions; and second, that it will continue to rely heavily on an immigration policy which lends emphasis to the necessity and desirability of reuniting families; and third, we will always keep in mind Canada's desire to make exceptions in the case of refugees.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW ACT

ALLEGED STATEMENT BY PAUL MARTIN ACT NOT INTENDED AS BARRIER TO FOREIGN INVESTMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Was the Hon. Paul Martin, Canada's High Commissioner to Britain, stating government policy when he said in a speech to the Canadian-United Kingdom Chamber of Commerce, as reported in this morning's press, that the Foreign Investment Review Act is not intended as a barrier to foreign investment in Canada and that, and I quote, "Canada today is one of the least restrictive of industrialized countries with respect to foreign investment"?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, obviously that is a statement of opinion by the High Commissioner. I am glad it came out so clearly and in such forthright language. It will put an end to the innuendos about Paul Martin.

GOVERNMENT VIEW OF EFFECTIVENESS OF ACT

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Once again the Prime Minister has demonstrated his ability to not answer questions. I will try a supplementary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that at latest count 55 foreign takeovers have been approved out of a total of 66 applications processed, a rate of approval which is running at almost 85 per cent, does the minister consider the act to be operating successfully and in a way which will reduce the domination of our economy by foreign, and particularly United States, corporations.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think the act is working very well, and if there were more interest on the part of the hon. member's party, he would be able to receive answers by putting questions to me when I appear before the standing committee. I have appeared before that standing committee on two previous occasions for two hours each time, and there has not been one question from his party.

Mr. Symes: The government is batting 200 here. Neither the Prime Minister nor the minister has answered the question. I will try once again and ask the minister, who is responsible for these questions in the House, with respect to the particular takeover on February 25 of this year by Pacific Petroleum of oil and gas properties owned by Wizard Oils Limited and two other Canadian firms, can the minister explain to the House why he considers it of significant benefit to Canada to increase the foreign control of Canada's petroleum industry beyond the level it has already reached, which is 99 per cent foreign-owned?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member realizes that despite the minister's previous comment, the hon. member is not following that; this is precisely the kind of question that ought to be asked in the committee and not here in the House.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM AND CAMBODIA—GOVERNMENT INTENTION WITH REGARD TO RECOGNITION OF NEW REGIMES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government decided to extend diplomatic recognition to the new government in South Viet Nam?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes, on my instructions, yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. MacEachen: The Department of External Affairs sent a telegram to the foreign ministry of the Provisional Revolutionary Government of the Republic of South Viet Nam. The telegram informed the foreign ministry that the government of Canada thereby recognized the Provisional Revolutionary Government of the Republic of South Viet Nam as the sole legal government of South Viet Nam. The telegram also expressed the proposal of the Canadian government that discussions be entered into as soon as it is convenient to both sides with a view to establishing diplomatic relations.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question because this is very interesting. Has the government agreed to recognize the new government in Cambodia in light of events now taking place?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, that was done some time ago.

HOUSING

POSSIBILITY OF CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON MEASURES TO STIMULATE CONSTRUCTION PRIOR TO BUDGET

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, and it is further to his reply to me on May 2 that he would have to find ways to get housing programs moving faster. Given the critical situation in the housing sector, I would like to ask the minister if, in connection with the consensus program, he plans to meet with his provincial counterparts prior to the presentation of the budget, and if he will be proposing shelter guidelines at any such meetings.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to my colleagues the ministers of housing in all the provinces in the last several days. I also have met with them during the consultation process. We continue a very amicable, constructive, and co-operative relationship.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Could the minister say if there will be any formal meeting with the provincial ministers of housing prior to the presentation of the budget?

Mr. Danson: Formally or informally, I will be in touch with them, and we will be discussing all matters of mutual interest.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON IMPOSITION OF PRICE AND WAGE CONTROLS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Was the Minister of Finance correctly enunciating government policy when he categorically rejected involuntary wage and price restraints as one of the options open to the government to deal with the present problems?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is the first news I have heard of this. I wonder if the hon. member is not being misinformed when he quotes the Minister of Finance as having said that.

Mr. Baldwin: I ask the Prime Minister directly whether the government has rejected involuntary wage and price restraints as one of the options open to deal with the present economic situation.

Mr. Trudeau: I am glad the hon. member got round to asking the question directly. The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR DISPUTES IN QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CONTROL VIOLENCE

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. With regard to the escalation of labour disputes, and the considerable violence attached thereto, which has been such that the premier of Quebec has likened it almost to a form of war, what measures has the federal government considered to help deal with this situation and to limit the disputes within the confines of law and order?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that the disputes are now arising as a result of a provincial inquiry into the construction unions in Quebec, and the whole area remains within provincial jurisdiction. We stand ready to hold discussions with the province, if it wants to turn to us for advice, but we do not feel that it is desirable for us to intervene into one of their areas of constitutional jurisdiction.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CAMBODIA—POSSIBLE COMMENDATION OF UNITED STATES FOR CURBING ACTS OF PIRACY

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister sent, or will he be sending, a message of commendation to the United States government for the decisive and necessary action taken to curb acts of international piracy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. I have received one or two messages from the United States government explaining the reasons for their action and the outcome of the action, but I have not yet replied.

Mr. Muir: When the hon. gentleman has an opportunity to go over the whole matter, will he be replying along the lines I have mentioned?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would like to think about that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW ACT

DATE OF PROCLAMATION OF PART II

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of the recent policy statement of the minister of industry of Quebec indicating that his province now agrees that new foreign investment projects should be allowed to proceed only if they meet conditions which appear to be those required under the Foreign Investment

Review Act, can the minister now say exactly when the government will proclaim in force Part II of that act dealing with new foreign investments?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I expect to be discussing this matter with my colleagues in the very near future.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN IN QUEBEC—SUGGESTED SETTLEMENT OF GRIEVANCES

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Labour.

In view of the fact that the compulsory return to work was not welcomed by longshoremen and that several basic areas of conflict have yet to be settled to the satisfaction of the parties concerned, has the hon. minister considered the possibility of settling the matter in a satisfactory way, so as to avoid work stoppages for any minor reason?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have been watching the situation closely. I think one of the principal elements still remaining, and a subject of controversy, is the question of overtime. My advice is that the employer organization, the MEA, and the union are endeavouring to work this matter out, but in the meantime the men have returned to work and are working the normal hours.

TRANSPORT

TRANSFERENCE OF FISHING WHARVES TO FISHERIES MINISTRY—REASON FISHERMEN CHARGED WHARFAGE FEES

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Several months prior to the election of 1974 the then minister of fisheries advised fishermen that there would be a transfer of fishing wharves from the Department of Transport to the authority of the minister of fisheries, that policy in respect to wharfage would be reconsidered and the new policy enunciated. Would the Minister of Transport advise the House if these wharves have indeed been transferred to the Minister of State (Fisheries), and if so, why are wharfage fees still being assessed and fishermen being charged in court for non-payment of these while the new policy is pending?

● (1440)

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, actually they have been transferred to the Department of Fisheries. Indeed, after we talked together yesterday, I sent that note to the department. I hope to get the answer on the fees they have to pay, and for which I have no explanation at all.

[Mr. Gray.]

Mr. McCain: Will the minister instruct his staff to resist from attempts to collect wharfage fees until such time as the policy is clear and equitable for all rather than pointed at a few small fishermen?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, as soon as I have the answer, I will see what I can do about it.

ENERGY

CONSERVATION PROGRAM—DEPARTMENTAL CONSULTATIONS ON TRANSPORTATION AND TAX POLICIES AIMED AT SAVING FUEL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON EFFECTIVENESS OF PROGRAM

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On February 6 the minister announced the adoption of a conservation program for the use of energy in Canada. Can he tell us today whether he has had consultations with the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Finance about a comprehensive transportation policy and tax policy geared at saving fuel?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there have been interdepartmental consultations involving those two as well as other departments.

Mr. Gillies: Can the minister advise when he will be making a report to the House on the effectiveness of this program?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I will be glad to consider that, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSING

NATIVE HOUSING PROGRAM—REASON FOR REDUCTION IN NUMBER OF STARTS—ABILITY OF NATIVE PEOPLE TO AFFORD MORTGAGE INTEREST RATE

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. According to a recent press report, a new native housing program is being proposed, one which would build some 20,000 units over the next five years. On March 10, in committee, one of the minister's officials, Mr. Teron, said of the native housing program, "We are still committed to the 50,000 units for five years." Why the drastic reduction in the number of starts planned when we are facing such a serious housing shortage?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is no reduction in planned starts. I believe Mr. Teron was referring to those which come under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for Métis and non-status Indians whereas I believe the other reference made related to those under my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, for natives on reserves and status Indians off reserves.

Mr. Firth: Is the minister's goal for housing production under the native housing program for 20,000 or 50,000 units? Given the high unemployment rates and extreme poverty on reserves across this country as well as the incredibly low income levels, how does the minister intend to supplement incomes so that native people can afford a one per cent mortgage interest rate, let alone eight per cent or ten per cent?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, without going into great detail on all the programs the intention of my ministry is not to supplement income. In this case, we made housing available and we are doing it in concert with the native people. The programs have an initial objective of 50,000 units. We are working with Métis and non-status Indian organizations across the country to try to improve the delivery system. The gains are slower than either of us would wish, but there are gains to be made and they are building on those. This is the type of thing which native people are doing themselves and are doing exceedingly well.

REQUEST FOR OUTLINE OF INDUSTRIAL AND TRADE POLICIES TO MAKE CANADIAN PRODUCTS MORE COMPETITIVE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Yesterday the minister outlined to the House the activities that he and his department have been engaged in during the past year which have allowed the economy to drift into the most serious industrial and trade situation which this country has faced since the depression of the thirties. Will the minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the House what plans he has, if any, to introduce policies which will make our industrial products more competitive with those of foreign countries which are stealing our markets in Canada as well as the export market in increasing quantities every day and which is the cause for our unemployment being well over 7 per cent.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I invite the hon. member to come to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs this afternoon. My main estimates are there. I would very much look forward to discussing this important question with him.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as the minister knows the committee meetings, as far as he is concerned, are a loss because he takes up the ten minutes allowed by saying absolutely nothing. I would ask him this. In view of the fact that the program which he proudly outlined yesterday has been so weak and badly directed that it has allowed our economy to slip into the most serious situation we have faced in 40 years, does he not believe that it is time for him to either ship up—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Shape up. It is very simple, no matter which the minister would do, he would do it weakly and poorly. Is it not time that he either did the job as he is supposed to do or got out and let somebody else do it better?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

REQUEST PRIME MINISTER ATTEND COMMITTEE MEETING TO EXPLAIN ESTIMATES

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, given the new enthusiasm on the government side for attendance in committee, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister, if I can bring him from the back benches. My question concerns the consideration of estimates of the Privy Council office by the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, which has so far been refused the presence of the relevant deputy minister, Mr. Michael Pitfield. I wonder if the Prime Minister himself, as the responsible minister, is prepared to face that standing committee, to defend the estimates and explain the activities of the Privy Council office and the Prime Minister's office.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for wanting to see a little more of me. Let me say that I am in the House every day and am prepared to answer whatever questions are recognized as being in order. So far as the committee's proceedings are concerned, the Acting Prime Minister, the President of the Privy Council, will be there at the next meeting of the committee and I am sure he will handle himself with his usual ability.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that we are at last to have a responsible minister attending that committee. May I ask the Prime Minister whether the relevant deputy ministers, Mr. Robertson and Mr. Pitfield, will also be in attendance?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member may have been here the other day and heard the right hon. member for Prince Albert say that when he was Prime Minister of the country he certainly followed the tradition of never having the secretary of the cabinet appear before the parliamentary committee. I think he was dead right.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, is it the position of the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): —that the powers of the Privy Council office are now the same as they were ten years ago?

Oral Questions

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST THAT FEMALE CADETS BE PAID ON THE SAME BASIS AS MALES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the concern of the national cadet organizations of Canada, and as cadets will soon be leaving for summer camp, will the minister indicate what action has been taken to apply the rule contained in Bill C-16, namely, that females will be able to qualify for payment for their service on the same basis as males?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I believe on an earlier occasion the House leader indicated that Bill C-16 has been given high priority. I can say, further, that it is our intention to provide, through other means, pay and allowances for girl cadets when they attend camp, on the same basis as for boy cadets.

Mr. Marshall: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In case this does not happen, will the minister consider a reasonable suggestion and remove clause 21 from Bill C-16? If he were to bring the bill before the House it would pass within one hour and everybody would be happy.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF UNION OF NORTH AND SOUTH VIET NAM—REASON FOR EARLY RECOGNITION OF NEW REGIME IN SOUTH VIET NAM

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. When Canada made haste to recognize Saigon as the capital of the new régime, was the minister given some assurance that there would not be a union in the near future of North Viet Nam and South Viet Nam and that South Viet Nam would not be governed from Hanoi?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not admit the premise of the question, and the answer to the second part is, no.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, may I ask one supplementary question? In view of the answer to the second part of my question, am I to gather that the minister received no assurance whatsoever that such a union will not take place in the near future?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. I sought no such assurance; neither did I receive one.

Mr. Horner: Then, why all the haste in recognizing the provisional government?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, quite a number of other countries have already taken that action. It seemed to Canada that it was an appropriate time to recognize the reality of the situation and to put itself in a position to deal with concerns affecting Canadians and others in South Viet Nam.

[Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain).]

INCOME TAX

DECENTRALIZATION OF DATA PROCESSING—POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF OFFICE IN ATLANTIC REGION

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Now that the minister has announced his decision to decentralize his department's data processing work by establishing five regional centres outside Ottawa, will he inform the House when the Atlantic region office will be established and what will be the criteria for choosing a location in the Atlantic region?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the decentralization program, which has commenced in Winnipeg, will be phased in over the next three or four years. The criteria will depend on the number of tax returns filed with the Atlantic region, the availability of part-time and full-time workers, the availability of space and availability of communication links.

Mr. Hogan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the heavy concentration of provincial population and unemployment in the Sydney industrial area, would the minister meet with the minister responsible for DREE and with the Secretary of State for External Affairs before taking his decision?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly meet with my two colleagues, particularly the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who carries at the front of his mind and the top of his heart the affairs of Cape Breton.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF NEW POLICY

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister tell the House if the new policy, details of which were apparently either given or leaked to the press yesterday, will include the principle of more responsibility and authority to be vested in the minister for all modes of transportation, or will there again be some diffusion of his control? Is the minister himself to assume more responsibility in the Department of Transport?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to a story that was published in the Globe and Mail. Newspapermen get information from many sources; some of the information is right, some of it is wrong, so I do not think I should comment on this.

Mr. Murta: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say if the policy paper he is to bring down, and which we discussed in the past few days in our debates will include statements of obvious principles, or is a method for bringing the principles into a concrete and viable form also included in the policy statement? I ask this because so far a great deal of time has been spent on statements of the obvious.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, some, of course, think everything is obvious; for others, it is somewhat more complicated. Everybody cannot be a genius in this world.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No doubt, if we want to have a national policy, it should include some principles. But I do not think we should restrict our policy to statements of principle or to general policies that will have no bearing on the system as it exists now. Without doubt, while we are working on a philosophy or a policy, we are working on projects which will be related to this philosophy.

FINANCE

INQUIRY WHETHER THERE WILL BE A BUDGET BEFORE END OF JUNE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in order to reduce a little of the confusion about government policy, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he intended to indicate that there might not be a budget between now and the end of June when he said that in all probability there would be one. I ask this because of the firm statement the Minister of Finance made several times, to the effect that there would be, hopefully, a budget before the end of May?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. When I said in all probability, I merely indicated that we are all in the hands of God in this matter.

An hon. Member: So, there is a higher authority.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has finally found a higher authority than his own on which to blame things.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INFLATION—POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER MEETINGS SEEKING CONSENSUS ON RESTRAINT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask, who is giving the House correct information, the Acting Prime Minister, who said before the Prime Minister arrived that no decision has yet been made by his colleagues as to whether there will be future meetings on the subject of consensus, or the Prime Minister, who assured the House after he arrived that there would be future meetings?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, what I was answering a member of the NDP, I believe, relative to meetings with businessmen was that, according to my understanding of the meetings, they did not consider the matter closed and that although opinions were divided, we expect there will be further meetings with them.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, could the government House leader tell us what the business will be for the rest of this week and for next week? I sympathize with him in his attempts to arrange the time of the House efficiently in light of the indecisive approach taken by the Prime Minister to economic issues and in light of the discussion which has just gone on. Can he also tell us whether we shall be debating the budget in the first two weeks of June?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if there was as much unity on the other side of the House as there is on this side, we would have far less difficulty in arranging the program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: Today we shall proceed with Bill C-47. When that is concluded, I have in mind calling Bills C-24, C-58 and C-20. I should like to have some latitude for rearranging the order, but those are the bills which are next on the list.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ANDRE—PROCEEDINGS IN STANDING COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL RESOURCES AND PUBLIC WORKS—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) raised a question of privilege. Despite its intricacies, I think, after a day's reflection, that it still boils down to a suggestion that in some way the Chair ought to sit in appeal on decisions taken or procedures followed in a standing committee. I need only refer hon. members to the decision reached by my predecessor in December, 1973, which is appropriately reported in the Journals. He ruled, then, that no practice of the House exists under which the Chair sits in appeal of decisions taken in the standing committees.

The procedures for discussing points of order in a standing committee are well known to hon. members. I refer to the procedure of the steering committee there. The reports of the steering committee are considered by the committee and, in turn, so are appeals from the ruling of the chairman of the committee. The process of discussing procedure in committees on matters which are reported to the House by way of a motion for concurrence is also well known to hon. members.

In relation to estimates, the use of allotted days is provided for in Standing Orders. In addition, there is recourse to a substantive motion by an hon. member in the private members' hour and, finally, there is recourse to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization if it is felt that existing procedures are not satisfactory.

Unless steps are taken to change the existing practices which are well established and well known, and which, frankly, have good reasons behind them, I cannot in any way depart from the reasoning of my predecessor or the long established practice that this House will not entertain appeals in relation to the procedures of the standing committees.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I rise most reluctantly on a point of order to seek clarification of your ruling during the question just before I thought I was going to get an answer from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It is my belief, and if I am wrong I hope you will correct me, that out of frustration on this side of the House it is within our responsibility here to try, if necessary, to goad certain cabinet ministers, and in some cases the Prime Minister himself, into making some sort of sensible reply instead of the usual evasions.

I am not sure whether the question I directed to the Prime Minister today was ruled out of order by you, or whether you were under the impression the Prime Minister was not going to reply. It was my impression that he half rose in his seat and was ready to reply when you moved on to recognize another member.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) raises a proper question concerning my recognition of another member immediately following him at the time he asked a question. There were two difficulties. First, the hon. member put a question which seemed to me to have very argumentative connotations; that is to say, that the reason for holding an investigation had to do with political patronage or political donations. This will surely be recognized by all hon. members as having a clear argumentative connotation attached to it.

In any case, the question was not about to be answered: at least, that was my impression. For both reasons, then, I decided to move on to the recognition of another hon. member. Whether it was clearly for the one or the other reason, I can only console the hon. member by saying that the presence of two difficulties at the same time led me to my decision to go on to another hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill C-33, an act respecting the export from Canada of cultural property and the import into Canada of cultural property illegally exported from foreign states, with amendments, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 1,253, 1,463, 1,701, 1,751, 1,762, 1,768, 1,776, 1,837, 2,042, 2,055, 2,100, 2,140, 2,206, 2,313, 2,329 and 2,335.

If questions Nos. 1,200, 1,460, 1,685 and 1,743 could be made orders for returns these returns would be tabled immediately.

I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

REGIONAL RATES FOR GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Question No. 1,253—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What impact does the policy of regional rates for government employees have in terms of reducing the levels of regional disparity?

2. What is the attitude of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion on the issue of regional rates for government employees?

3. What would be the total annual cost of regional rate elimination for all government employees expressed as a percentage of the 1974-75 budget for the Department?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the Treasury Board Secretariat as follows: 1. There is no known method of accurately measuring the impact.

2. The policy regarding scales of pay and regional rate is decided by the government, and followed by the department.

3. Elimination of regional rates would cost the government an additional $79,300,000. (Salaries and benefit expenditures) Dree departmental program budget for 1974-75 is $513,033,000. Cost of $79,300,000 represents 15.5 per cent of $513,033,000. Source for DREE Budget: Canada Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975. (Blue Book of Estimates).

DEVELOPMENT OF DEEP WATER PORTS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Question No. 1,463—Mr. Howie:

Are there any plans to attempt to develop any deep-water ports in the Atlantic Provinces and, if so, which ports will be developed?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is concerned: An offer has been made to the provinces of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick for the development in each province of one deep water port at a site to be proposed by the province. Provincial authorities have this offer under consideration. In so far as the Ministry of Transport is concerned: Ever since the trend to deeper draft vessels, particularly in the bulk crude oil and refined petroleum products trades, became noticeable some ten years ago, the ministry has devoted considerable attention and research to the port requirements that might reasonably be expected to arise in eastern Canada as a result of this technological breakthrough. Private industry also has shown itself to be well aware of this challenge and thus there have been, during the last few years, several plans to attempt to develop deepwater oil ports, particularly in the Atlantic provinces. To date, the following deepwater oil terminals have been developed: Mispec Point (east of Saint John, N.B.), Point Tupper (Strait of Canso); and Come-By-Chance, Newfoundland. In addition to these existing facilities, new proposals are currently under consideration by various interested agencies at Lorneville (west of Saint John); Melford Point (Strait of Canso); and Come-By-Chance, Newfoundland. It is not possible to say definitely which projects will be implemented in the near future.

STORAGE FACILITIES

Question No. 1,701—Mr. Holmes:

1. Did the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board jointly announce a new $40 million storage programme as part of the new Feed Grains Policy on July 26, 1974 and, if so, how much of this $40 million has been allocated for storage facilities?

2. (a) What is the number of storage facilities (b) where are their locations (c) who are the owners (d) what are the sums of money allocated for each facility?

3. Has representation for funds been received from Southwestern Ontario and what percentage of the $40 million will be allocated to that area?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Canadian Wheat Board and Agriculture Canada as follow: 1. Yes. The details of a new program have not been fully developed. A part of the funding is to be used to improve storage facilities but the actual amount will depend on the needs for additional storage that are identified. No facilities have been funded under the program to date. The government has assumed the carrying costs of domestic feed grain reserve stocks up to a maximum of 10 million bushels to be located in Thunder Bay (and a small quantity at Halifax). The annual cost of this part of the program is estimated at $4.2 millions.

2. Not applicable.

3. Storage project proposals which have been received are confidential. Assistance which may be provided will be based on the merits of each application to local and national storage requirements.

RAILWAY ADVERTISING IN "TRAVEL AND LEISURE" MAGAZINE

Question No. 1,751—Mr. Herbert:

1. To the knowledge of the government, did Canadian Pacific hotels advertise by means of a coloured centrefold in the February issue of Travel and Leisure?

2. Does the magazine have a circulation in Canada?

3. Is the cost of such advertising a deductible expense before corporation taxes under existing legislation?

4. Did Canadian National also advertise in the same edition of the magazine?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Canadian National Railways and the Department of National Revenue as follows: 1 and 2. See Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, citation 171 dd.

3. Section 19 of the Income Tax Act provides that advertising costs are not allowable as deductible expenses before taxes if the advertisement is included in a non-Canadian publication and is directed primarily to a market in Canada. The C.P. hotel advertisement clearly is directed to the American market and thus the cost would be an admissible expense.

4. A 1/6 page black and white advertisement was placed in the February issue of Travel and Leisure Magazine.

PUBLIC SERVANTS ASSIGNED TO POSITIONS OTHER THAN IN CANADA

By department, other than the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Manpower and Immigration, External Affairs and National Defence for the month of April 1975, what is the budgeted number of public servants who would be assigned to positions other than in Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Agriculture Canada, 11; Communications, 1; Consumer and Corporate Affairs, 0; Energy, Mines and Resources, 0; Environment, 0; Finance, 0; Indian Affairs and Northern Development, 0; Insurance, 0; Justice, 0; Labour, 3; National Health and Welfare 32; National Revenue 20; Post Office 0; Prime Minister and Privy Council 0; Public Works, 3; Regional Economic Expansion, 0; Science and Technology, 0; Secretary of State, 6; Solicitor General, 0; Supply and Services, 7; Transport, 3; Treasury Board, 0; Urban Affairs, 0; Veterans Affairs, 2.

APPLICATIONS UNDER FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT, QUEBEC

Question No. 1,768—Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve):

1. How many loan applications were submitted by the Quebec farmers in 1974, under the Farm Improvement Loans Act?

2. What criteria does the Unemployment Insurance Commission use to establish that a person is a farmer?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Finance and Manpower and Immigration as follows: 1. Applications for loans under guaranteed loans plans are made directly to chartered banks and other designated lenders. Records are maintained centrally by the government only in respect of loans granted under the guarantee and no data is available on the number of applications submitted to lenders.

2. As a general rule, persons engaged in the growing of agricultural products or livestock are considered to be farmers for the purpose of the applicable unemployment insurance legislation. Some examples are: (a) the growing of grain, fruit or vegetables, (b) livestock farming or dairying, (c) operation of a chicken farm, (d) the raising of pigs. Self-employment as a farmer is not insurable employment under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Consequently, in order for a farmer to qualify for unemployment insurance benefit he must have been employed in insurable employment for a minimum of 8 weeks in the qualifying period, generally in the 52 weeks prior to filing his claim. If a farmer files a claim and fulfils this qualifying condition, his entitlement to benefit is then dependent on the extent of his farming activities. If a person is engaged in farming to a major extent, that is, where it is shown to be his principal means of livelihood, he generally fails to prove that he is unemployed under the Unemployment Insurance Act and Regulations, and therefore is not entitled to benefit. However, even if a person is engaged in farming as his principal means of livelihood, such a person may be entitled to benefit during the off-season (October 1 to March 31) if he proves that he does not work on his farm during the off-season or that the work he performs is so minor in extent that it would not prevent him from accepting full-time employment. Concerning a person employed in agriculture in a capacity other than self-employment as a farmer, such a person, on becoming unemployed, is entitled to unemployment insurance benefits under the same conditions as claimants generally. However, he is regarded as having worked a full working week and consequently is not entitled to any benefit during any week in which he works at least five days, and an aggregate of forty hours.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR SCHOOL AGE CHILDREN OF NEW IMMIGRANTS

Question No. 1,776—Mr. Reynolds:

1. With growing immigration affecting learning processes in the schools, particularly in British Columbia, is the government contemplating any financial assistance to those immigrants so that they may keep abreast of children already using the language of instruction?

2. Will the government consider increasing the assistance in those areas receiving large numbers of new immigrants into the school system who do not speak the English language?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Manpower and Immigration is concerned, the following is the reply: 1 and 2. The Department of Manpower and Immigration is aware that the number of children in primary and secondary schools whose first language is not English or French has increased. The Department of Manpower and Immigration funds various voluntary agencies who are involved in direct settlement assistance to newly arrived immigrants. Funding of these agencies is based on the known community needs and as such, where greater needs are identified by a voluntary agency, the department is prepared to consider additional support. However, it must be remembered that, since education is a matter of provincial jurisdiction, the provinces have the main responsibility for assisting school boards and students in this regard.

In so far as the Department of the Secretary of State is concerned: 1 and 2. The federal government has for many years had agreements with all provincial governments covering assistance for language instruction for adult immigrants, and agreements with all the provinces except British Columbia covering the costs of textbooks for such instruction. Informal enquiries have been received from some provinces as to whether these agreements could be reviewed and possibly extended. This matter is under study.

[Mr. Sharp.]

COST OF PREPARING REPLIES TO QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Question No. 1,837—Mr. Herbert:

What is the approximate average cost to prepare replies to questions on the Order Paper in each grouping (a) policy (b) statistical (c) concerning public service employees (d) requesting information about contracts (e) requesting information concerning ministerial staffs?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e). Information not available. We have undertaken an experiment on the cost of answering questions placed on the order paper (from questions No. 1,857 to 2,395 inclusive). The cost of answering these questions will be available at a later date.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS OFFICE

Question No. 2,042—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

In the last fiscal year, what was the cost of operation of the Parliamentary Returns Office of the Department of Agriculture?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): There is no Parliamentary Returns Office as such in the department.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE—PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS OFFICE

Question No. 2,055—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

In the last fiscal year, what was the cost of operation of the Parliamentary Returns Office of the Department of National Revenue?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): There is no Parliamentary Returns Office, as such, in this department. Parliamentary returns are handled as a part of the regular duties of the staff in the office of the deputy minister in each of the two components of the department. Therefore, it is not possible to isolate the cost of this activity from the others which comprise the total program of these offices.

TELECOMMUNICATION NETWORK IN ZAIRE

Question No. 2,100—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. On what date did CIDA award to Sintec the contract for construction of a telecommunication network in Zaire?

2. Was the contract awarded within the framework of public tenders?

3. What other corporations tendered for the contract and at what cost?

4. Who was responsible for making the decision concerning the contract?

5. Who were the signatories of the contract?

6. What researches, analyses or investigations were made in order to ascertain the skill of the corporation and its members before awarding them the contract?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. No contract was ever granted by CIDA to SINTEC Corporation for a telecommunications project in Zaire entered directly into a contract for a telecommunications network project—financed by a Canadian loan—with Cartier Engineering of Montreal, which set up a consortium for the purpose with two other companies Sintec Limited of Montreal, and Hoyles Niblock International of Vancouver.

2. Yes—the contract was awarded within the framework of normal proposals.

3. The three consortia of consultants who submitted proposals were as follows: Demers, Gordon, Baby Ltd. and SNC Ltd., both of Montreal associated with Intel Consultants Ltd. of Ottawa; Brunelle, Lambert and Associates Ltd. of Montreal associated with Lamarre, Valois International Ltd. of Montreal; Cartier Ltd., Montreal; Hoyles Niblock International, Vancouver Sintec Ltd., Montreal; The last group which included Sintec submitted the best proposal and was awarded the contract for $6 million.

4. The proposals were evaluated independently on behalf of the government of Zaire by the Department of Communications of Canada and a CIDA team which included a representative engineer from Zaire.

5. The signatories to the contract were the government of Zaire and Cartier Ltd. as Manager of the consortium.

6. All three members of the consortium had registered with CIDA and provided details, brochures, and curriculum vitae of their companies and personnel. Both Cartier Ltd. and Hoyles Niblock International had performed satisfactorily on previous contracts in CIDA's programs. Hoyles Niblock had also worked abroad commercially with very satisfactory results.

PERCENTAGE CHANGE IN NUMBER OF PIECES OF MAIL HANDLED BY POST OFFICE

Question No. 2,140—Mr. Herbert:

For the past ten years, what has been the annual percentage change in the number of pieces of mail handled by the Post Office Department?

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): The following percentage change has been based on originating mail volume data as published in the Postmaster General Annual Reports. Fiscal year 1964-65, 12 per cent; 1965-66, 5 per cent; 1966-67, 7 per cent; 1967-68, 2 per cent; 1968-69, 1 per cent; 1969-70, 3 per cent; 1970-71, 5 per cent; 1971-72, 4 per cent; 1972-73, 1 per cent; 1973-74, 7 per cent.

SEWAGE TREATMENT LOANS, 1973-74

Question No. 2,206—Mr. Marshall:

1. In regard to loans and grants for construction of sewage collection and treatment systems, what is the breakdown, by province, of the (a) 294 loans and the amount of $159,854,000 for 1974 (b) 309 loans and the amount of $170,670,000 for 1974?

2. In the Province of Newfoundland, by municipality, what is the breakdown of such amounts?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows:

$500 HOME-OWNER GRANT

Question No. 2,313—Mr. Halliday:

Of the first 280 applications for the federal grant of $500 to new home buyers that were received in the London Office of CMHC, how many (a) were approved (b) were rejected (c) are pending?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: Of the first 280 applications for the federal grant of $500 to new home buyers, received by the London office of CMHC, (a) 263 were approved, (b) 17 were rejected, and (c) none were pending.

APPROXIMATE COST OF COMPILING ANSWER TO QUESTIONS 317 AND 320

Question No. 2,329—Mr. Herbert:

1. What was the approximate cost to compile the answer to Question No. 317 and Question No. 320?

2. How many months were required, in each case, to prepare the answer?

3. How many man months of time were required to answer the questions?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): 1, 2 and 3. Information not available. We have undertaken an experiment on the cost of answering questions placed on the order paper (from questions Nos. 1,857 to 2,395 inclusive). The cost of answering these questions will be available at a later date.

OLYMPIC GAMES—INCREASED TRAFFIC THROUGH CUSTOMS SERVICES

Question No. 2,335—Mr. Schumacher:

1. What plans have been made, or are being made, to handle increased traffic through customs services in connection with the Olympic Games in 1976?

2. Will additional facilities be set up at international ports and, if so (a) what will they consist of (b) how many will there be (c) where will they be located (d) how many persons will man them in each case?

3. What is the projected cost of (a) additional facilities (b) additional manpower in each case?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): 1. Customs is working in close co-operation with the federal security co-ordinator (R.C.M. Police), Immigration officials, the Ministry of Transport, the Departments of Agriculture and Health and Welfare, and C.O.J.O. (The Organizing Committee for the 1976 Olympic Games), towards an overall plan to accommodate the anticipated heavy influx of visitors.

2. No additional physical facilities will be required as those at existing ports are sufficient to handle the anticipated traffic. Mirabel Airport will also be in operation to take care of additional traffic. However, there will be a requirement for additional manpower resources. (a) Not applicable; (b) Not applicable; (c) Not applicable; (d) Not applicable.

3. (a) Nil; (b) A total of $444,000.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

SASKATCHEWAN—CLOSURE OF RAILWAY STATIONS

Question No. 1,200—Mr. Korchinski:

In the Province of Saskatchewan (a) how many railway stations were closed by CN and CP Railroads which showed profits on their operations (b) how many in the same category are pending (c) what are the locations of each?

Return tabled.

PLANS TO PROMOTE AND MARKET AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS FROM ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Question No. 1,460—Mr. Howie:

1. Do any plans exist to establish a programme to promote and market agricultural products from the Atlantic Provinces and, if so, what is the estimated cost of this programme?

2. Are there any plans (a) to provide a special loan and grant programme to assist and encourage family farm operators to modernize and improve their farm operations (b) to improve existing credit programmes to assist young farmers to enter the business of farming (c) to increase the amount of farm loans to meet current needs?

Return tabled.

HERBERT BRUNE CONSTRUCTION LIMITED

Question No. 1,685—Mr. Cossitt:

Has any work been performed for the government since April 20, 1968 by Herbert Brune Construction Limited, 141-A Bentley Avenue, Ottawa and, if so (a) what is a full and detailed description of all work performed along with the amount of public money involved in each case (b) were tenders called by public advertisement in each case and (i) if not, for what reason (ii) if so, what were the names of those tendering and the amounts of tenders?

Return tabled.

CONTRACTS GIVEN BY DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION (1951) LIMITED

Question No. 1,743—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

From 1969-70 to the present, what was the complete amount of contracts given by Defence Construction (1951) Limited to corporations and companies which receive a single contract of at least $250,000?

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to draw attention to five questions on the order paper, which have been outstanding for some time, concerning construction of a swimming pool at 24 Sussex Drive. I refer in particular to question 1,233 which has been almost four months on the order paper and which in its various parts asks for details of construction, details of costs, names of donors and whether investigations, and so on, were conducted into the identity of the donors, and the purposes or motives for giving the donations. No answers have been forthcoming. I have raised this matter before, I think quite legitimately, and I have received no guarantee that this question will be answered. If anything, I have received exactly the opposite—flippancy and arrogance.

Although I realize that a minister is not obliged to answer a question, I think he has a moral duty to answer a legitimate question in this House that seeks legitimate information. I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is negligent in his duty to the Canadian people and to the Canadian parliament when he does not follow the example of President Ford of the United States who has announced that in building his swimming pool there will be—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a grievance about the answering of a question, he may raise it now; but surely comparison with examples in other governments is not apt at this time.

JUDGES ACT AND CERTAIN ACTS RELATED TO THE SUPREME COURTS OF NEWFOUNDLAND AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR INCREASED SALARIES AND ADDITIONAL JUDGES

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-47, to amend the Judges Act and certain other acts for related purposes and in respect of the reconstitution of the Supreme Courts of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before discussing the content of Bill C-47, an act to amend the Judges Act, I think it is appropriate to review the broader context within which its provisions must be considered. It is important that we keep constantly in view the role of our judiciary in our constitutional system and the duties, responsibilities and limitations upon individual judges. As a starting point, I would like to recall the words of Winston Churchill when he said:

> The essential aspects of democracy are the freedom of the individual within the framework of laws to order his life as he pleases, and the uniform enforcement of tribunals independent of the executive.

The significance of our judiciary in Canada was acknowledged from the start. A number of sections in the British North America Act provide specifically for the method of appointment of certain judges. Section 99 specifically recognizes the importance of the principle of the independence of the judiciary by providing for a retirement age of 75 and for tenure during good behaviour and removal only on address of both Houses.

Maybe it would be appropriate, to say a few words about this especially for the laymen, who are not very familiar with our judiciary. At the provincial level, the judges appointed and paid by the federal government are the county and district court judges as well as the judges for the superior courts, which include, in most provinces, a first instance division and an appellate division. The names of these courts vary for each province, but, in general, these are the three main categories.

Since Section 92.14 of the British North America Act has made the provinces responsible for "the Constitution, Maintenance, and Organization" of these courts, they are sometimes called provincial courts. Nevertheless, their judges are appointed by the Governor in Council and they are paid and reimbursed for their expenses according to the Judges Act to which they are also subjected. The judges of the territorial superior courts also come under this act, even if these courts are established by order.

Judges appointed by the federal government must therefore be distinguished from provincial magistrates or, as they are called in certain provinces, "provincial court judges". The latter judges are not only members of courts established by the provinces, but their appointment and status come under provincial laws and regulations. Therefore, they are not concerned by the federal Judges Act; the same is true of the territorial court judges, who are appointed by order.

However, in addition to the county or district court judges and judges of provincial and territorial superior courts, two other categories are also covered by the Judges Act. These are judges of the Federal Court and the Supreme Court of Canada. There are also "superior courts", created by the federal government, under Section 101 of the British North America Act.

[English]

When we talk about the judges who are appointed by us and who are subject to the provisions of the Judges Act, we are speaking only of approximately 500 judges throughout Canada. The magnitude of the trust and responsibility borne by these men and women is out of all proportion to their number.

In general terms, the judiciary maintains the rule of law by providing redress between citizens, but even more where authorities would seek arbitrarily to interfere with the lives of citizens. No matter what office an official of the state may hold, he or she is only entitled to act where, and only to the extent that, authority is specifically granted in or by virtue of laws which are directly passed by the duly elected representatives of our people, in parliament or in the legislatures or, in a few situations, which are recognized as well established custom. In other words, the judiciary is essential to the maintenance of the relatively certain, predictable and public rule of law, in contrast to some potentially capricious rule by the unlimited discretion of persons.

Our Canadian judiciary has served us well. We have been blessed with judges of integrity and dedication. Examples of corruption or even of indiscretion are few and far between. We have been particularly fortunate, however, because of the strength and dignity by which our judiciary has maintained its independence of the legislative and executive branches of government. We need only examine the experience of some other countries to realize the significance of maintaining a judiciary which can neither be bribed with riches nor intimidated by the offices of the state. It seems so often to be the case that the weakening of the judiciary is a large step on a short path to dictatorial forms of government.

The judiciary is of particular importance to us as legislators. It would do us little good conscientiously and strenuously to analyse and debate legislation being created for the benefit of our citizens if that legislation could be frustrated in its application. It is essential to our task that our judges be intelligent, industrious and experienced lawyers. They must not only be able to apply a law reasonably to achieve a result in a particular case, but they must also avoid losing sight of the significance of that result in similar and related situations in future.

The performance of judges is also of tremendous importance to the particular persons who appear before them. Judges hear cases, day after day, for years. Often these cases involve painstaking and boring details. Yet all judges must constantly bear in mind that for the individual litigant, his or her "day in court" will often be one of the most important days of his or her life. In particular cases, judges can act as catalysts to accelerate the machinery of justice so that litigants are not frustrated by delay. Judges can also, within limits, temper the strict letter of the law with compassion and common sense.

It is true that even with our increasingly crowded court lists today, only a very small proportion of our citizens will ever come before these 500 or so judges in our courtrooms. However, the performance of judges in particular cases has an impact far beyond the courtroom itself. A judicial decision will often result in thousands of lawyers advising tens of thousands of clients to order their affairs—sell their property, draw their wills, enter into agreements—in a particular way. The point is illustrated in a passage from an article written by the treasurer of the Law Society of Upper Canada, Mr. Stuart Thom, Q.C., and published in the December, 1974, issue of the Law Society of Upper Canada Gazette:

> The lawyer going about his mundane solicitor's daily round does not and cannot possibly see each phrase that he tosses off to his secretary or each clause that he scribbles out on the margin of a document after tiresome hours of negotiation in the context of a Supreme Court appeal. The lawyer must have some inner feeling, however, that what he has just said or done will meet the test of the judicial process, if it is ever exposed to it. In that sense, I say that everything a lawyer does is part of the judicial process in some manner.

The impact in this sense is very broad indeed. The ramifications of judicial decision-making can also be considered with reference to the nature of the issues which must be determined. There is an increasing number of complexity of cases generated through changes in our attitudes, economics and technology. Judicial decisions can profoundly affect society. One need only mention cases such as those affecting rights of our native population, matrimonial property, the rights of women, offshore rights and other constitutional questions involving the relationship between the Government of Canada and the provinces. In the resolution of these and other serious problems, the appointed judges must have the trust and confidence of the Canadian people to void the growth of the pressures of anarchy.

There is another important dimension of the influence of these judges beyond their courtrooms. This is related to their appellate and supervisory functions in relation to other courts and administrative tribunals. Many statutes contain provisions for appeals from provincially-appointed courts and from both federal and provincial administrative tribunals to courts consisting of these federally-appointed judges. Even where no appeal is expressly provided, there is a general supervisory jurisdiction which permits the quashing of the decisions of these bodies where they have acted without jurisdiction. This has been interpreted to include the denial of a fair hearing through bias or the non-compliance with the minimal procedures necessary to a fair hearing for the parties.

Thus, protections are available to the thousands who are directly affected by the myriad of federal and provincial administrative tribunals which daily determine the rights of our citizens. Once again, decisions in particular appeals and on particular applications will often affect the manner in which many of these diverse bodies will carry out their responsibilities. The existence of an able, conscientious and hard working judiciary is important for all of these reasons. It is also important in a general way if our citizens are to have confidence in our democratic institutions generally.

I view the appointment of judges to be one of the most important of my responsibilities as Minister of Justice. I believe that it is vital that our judicial positions be filled by the most qualified lawyers available for these important tasks. I have made special efforts to broaden my information base, as Minister of Justice, for locating and selecting the best qualified lawyers for judicial appointments. A special adviser was appointed almost two years ago to work in this area of gathering names of and information about prospective appointees. Broad consultations have occurred amongst representatives of bar associations and law societies, members of the Bench itself, prominent lawyers in government, legal aid organizations, lay persons and others.

I have not only sought information about the legal experience and ability of prospective appointees: in addition, I have been concerned about human qualities—qualities of sympathy, generosity, charity, an ability to listen, integrity and a willingness to work and desire to do a job well. Often, these qualities are demonstrated in a variety of ways: general reputation of a practitioner, public service through charitable or service organizations, service to the profession and political involvement at any level.

In my three years as Minister of Justice there have been in excess of 150 appointments under the Judges Act. This unusually high number is in part due to the expansion of a number of courts and in part attributable to the election of a number of judges for supernumerary status. I am delighted by the calibre of the lawyers who have accepted our call to the Bench during this period, sometimes at considerable personal sacrifice.

In the course of these three years I have also had the privilege of working with the judiciary committee of the Canadian Bar Association, whose present chairman is Mr. Marcel Cinq-Mars, Q.C., of Montreal. Following a practice established by our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he was justice minister, the names of persons under active consideration for judicial appointment are submitted to this committee for assessment as to qualifications for judicial appointment.

I should emphasize that the committee does not submit names, but comments on names which I submit to them. The committee is composed of lawyers from across Canada who, conscientiously and with little in the way of recognition or expressed gratitude, devote a considerable amount of time and effort to their task. In the end, of course, the responsibility for the quality of appointments must rest with the government, but the committee performs a valuable service and in my view has been of great assistance in maintaining in Canada a strong judiciary.

The Judges Act provides that a barrister or advocate must have at least ten years standing at the bar in order to be eligible for appointment. Judges are seldom appointed who have less then 15 years at the bar, and very often lawyers with 20, 25 or 30 years in practice are appointed. As a result, a lawyer is most often at the peak, or very much on the way to the peak of his or her career both in terms of effectiveness and earning capacity, at the time the judicial appointment is offered.

It is common for lawyers to take very substantial reductions in income by accepting appointments to the Bench. It is true that there are other attractions to the Bench. There is the aspect of security, which is a necessary incident to judicial independence, and a more regular, although in most cases not less arduous or demanding, work schedule. There must also be a certain attraction to finding that ones' colleagues, including both friends and foes, suddenly begin to treat him or her with respect and deference, at least in the courtroom.

However, there is also a tradition in the legal profession that when called upon to serve as a judge, a lawyer should not decline except for very good reasons. It has disappointed me on occasion since I have been Minister of Justice to encounter examples of lawyers with excellent qualifications for judicial appointment who were not prepared to let their names stand. While I would not like to see financial reward as the incentive to judicial appointment, lawyers should not be put in the position of having to sacrifice too much for themselves and their families in the way of a standard of living in order to give of their talents in a more public way as a member of the judiciary.

There are a number of specific factors related to income which should also be kept in mind. The Judges Act requires that judges devote themselves exclusively to their judicial duties, unlike other citizens who are permitted to supplement their incomes. Once appointed, a judge cannot easily return to the courtroom as a barrister, and in some provinces this is expressly prohibited. The recent final report of the CBA special committee on legal ethics also contains such a prohibition which is applicable to chambers' work and appearances before administrative boards and tribunals as well as court litigation. Since most judges are recruited from the ranks of barristers, a return to practice is usually effectively foreclosed.

I have considered it desirable, very often, to see younger judges appointed. The addition of vigorous, young lawyers to a court can often infuse newer ideas and approaches. However, this means that many of them will not have had the number of good earning years of a lawyer who is appointed much later in life. Finally, we must compete with the provinces for lawyers for appointment to the Bench.

It is a fact that in some provinces, persons appointed as magistrates or provincial court judges now receive salaries which are greater than those of country court judges by 25 per cent and more. In the past three years, the salaries of federally-appointed judges have fallen substantially behind those of persons in other comparable categories. This problem is compounded by the rapid increase in the cost of living experienced in recent times, and in the earnings of members of the legal profession from whose ranks new appointments of judges must be made.

Furthermore, the rate of annuities payable to widowed spouses of judges has remained fixed, since 1944, at two-ninths of salary, which by today's standards is below the norm of many, if not most, other such pensions. It is essential that both salaries and pensions be raised to levels which will attract to the Bench the best qualified members of the legal profession. While this does not mean that judicial salaries as well as retirement and death benefits should be fully competitive with the incomes that can be earned by the more successful members of the bar, it is important that they be substantial enough to attract adequate numbers of the very best class of practitioners. They must also be commensurate with the position of the judge in society, recognizing his or her importance as a member of one of the principal and key elements in our governmental system. Finally, they must be sufficient to ensure the judge's independence, providing him or her with a measure of real economic security.

The provisions with respect to annuities for the widowed spouses of judges and retired judges is of even greater importance to many judges than the salary provisions. At the present time, the Judges Act provides for a non-contributory annuity payable to a spouse upon the death of a judge of two-ninths of the salary of the judge at the time of death. If the judge was retired and in receipt of a pension at the time of death, the annuity is set at one-third of the judge's pension. This rate of annuity for a judge's spouse has remained unchanged for 30 years, with the result that it is now generally below the norm of the rate for most other pensions for surviving spouses, which is close to 50 per cent of the basic pension payable.

There are a number of sad examples of widows of judges who suffer considerable hardship because of the inadequacy of annuities which they receive. The provision to adjust the rate for spouses' annuities from two-ninths to one-third of salary, or from one-third to one-half of pension, applying equally to existing pensions, will provide some relief. At the same time, the non-contributory nature of these annuities has been considered and provisions for a small contribution from existing judges and a more substantial one from future appointees have now been introduced.

The question of what salary levels are required to meet these criteria is one that cannot be answered with scientific precision. The question is one of judgment more than of science. One might start with an estimate of the range of income of lawyers of a calibre generally sought for appointment to the Bench. If the lowest general level is reduced by $10,000 or $15,000, one would reach a minimum basic salary of roughly $50,000 for superior court judges as a starting point. Another approach, by which essentially the same result emerges, is to look first to the level of salary that ought to be paid to the chief justice of a superior court. There is solid historical precedent in Canada for fixing this salary as high as, or in the same general range as, the salaries currently being paid to the most senior deputy ministers in the federal public service. It is only in relatively recent years that the most senior deputy ministers have overtaken those of the chief justices. This approach would lead to a basic salary level of $55,000 for the chief justice of a superior court.

In fixing the salaries for other judges, we have taken into account the increasing role and responsibilities of chief justices and chief judges, as well as the increased jurisdiction of county and district court judges in most provinces. In employing the retroactive provisions, we have had in mind the postponement of the introduction of the bill last spring, which we originally intended to introduce, which postponement was occasioned by the election.

I should remind hon. members, as well, that when the last review was made of judges' salaries effective in 1971, the then minister of justice indicated his view that salaries of judges should be reviewed at least every three years. In that regard, the retroactive date is fixed at three years after the last salary increase.

Of course, it is possible to do a considerable amount of "creative" analysis with figures and percentages. When this bill was introduced, some newspapers reported that the salary increase for county and district court judges amounted to 72 per cent. This figure is inaccurate. The Toronto Globe and Mail, which used the 72 per cent figure in an editorial on December 20, 1974, and criticized the increases, pointed out in a subsequent editorial on February 3 that when additional facts are taken into account, the more accurate figure for these judges is 48.2 per cent over three years. In fact, the increase is spread over three years plus another three years since the last change. But even that percentage does not tell the entire story. For one thing, a limit has now been placed upon the remuneration which judges may receive from the provinces. In other words, it will no longer be possible for the provinces to adjust these salaries beyond the $3,000 limit proposed in the bill, as has been done in the recent past particularly with respect to county and district court judges.

Furthermore, the bill provides for the elimination of the extra remuneration which many county and district court judges now receive for providing specific extrajudicial services such as serving on police commissions. I might add that we have received representations to the effect that the latter provision should only come into effect at the time of the final salary increase, that is, on April 1, 1976. While the bill provides for the provision coming into effect immediately, I see the logic of that suggestion and will be discussing the question with members in the committee. Finally, it must be kept in mind that the salary provisions for county and district court judges represent not only a regular salary increase but also a readjustment in the level of salaries they should receive in relation to the other judges in Canada.

The civil jurisdiction of county and district court judges is concurrent with that of the superior trial courts in some provinces, and the county and district courts now probably do more criminal jury work than the superior courts in those provinces where they sit with juries. Some provinces are consolidating their county and district courts, and some have created the position of chief judge to assist in the allocation of judicial resources and in administration generally. We have made special efforts to attract men and women to these courts who are of equal calibre to those being appointed to the superior courts.

For all of these reasons, the narrowing of the salary differential between the county and district court judges and those of the superior courts is not only justified but is highly desirable. I might point out that in this very bill one province is moving in the direction of consolidation of these courts and is in the process of transferring judges from the county court to the superior court. This leads to a salary revision outside of any analysis in percentage terms. It is that kind of an adjustment of work, an adjustment in the capacity, as it were, of judges that must be taken into account in this regard.

My reference to the termination of some part of the extra earnings of county and district court judges in particular has real relevance to the large number of county and district court judges who have been receiving more than $3,000 in further remuneration from the province or for extra judicial duties. It is our view that the federal government ought to be the main source and, in the end, the only source of income for the judges who constitutionally are appointed by it, and this bill makes a move in that direction in limiting this amount of extra money. It really should be subtracted from the apparent increase we are giving this particular category of judges.

The bill before us provides, for the first time, for the payment of certain expenses incurred by judges. For example, it is often the case that a lawyer practising in one location will be appointed to another location hundreds of miles away. The bill now provides, for the first time, for the reimbursement of reasonable removal expenses. There is also provision for the payment of limited expenses incurred in judicial education and other judicial activities which do not involve the exercise of the judicial function as such. Chief justices and chief judges have a number of functions and obligations which they are required to perform in a representative role on behalf of their courts. A limited sum is also provided for expenses of this nature.

It will be surprising, perhaps, to hon. members that these forms of reimbursement were not included some time before this. At the present time, most of these expenses must be borne by the individual judge who has incurred them, or be reimbursed on the basis of an executive decision by the Minister of Justice. Such a situation has obviously undesirable implications.

Before leaving the subject of remuneration for judges, I would like to remind hon. members of the serious obligation imposed upon us by section 100 of the British North America Act. By virtue of this section, our constitution provides, in the interests of a judiciary independent of the executive, that "the salaries, allowances and pensions of the judges of the superior, district and county courts . . . shall be fixed and provided by the Parliament of Canada". It is, therefore, very much the responsibility of parliament to ensure that remuneration is adequate to maintain a judiciary of a competence and integrity which will continue to carry out its judicial role in a manner of complete independence from the executive.

Members of parliament also have a responsibility to ensure that the money of the people whom they represent is well spent. Bearing in mind the broad influence of our judiciary in Canadian society, as well as the services it renders to individual litigants, expenditures which will assist in maintaining a sensitive, intelligent, diligent judiciary of integrity will bear manifold ultimate returns.

Bill C-47 also authorizes salaries for a number of new judicial positions. In the course of committee action I propose to indicate to hon. members some additional positions which I have been requested to fill by various provinces and upon which we may be able to take action by appropriate recommendation and amendment during third reading of the bill. These provisions directly reflect steps taken by some provincial governments to expand the courts in order to cope with increased workloads. They also reflect the reorganization of court structures in some provinces. Prince Edward Island is reconstituting a court of appeal. Four additional positions on the Ontario court of appeal have enabled that court to carry out an internal reorganization. Alberta has now legislated to consolidate that province's district courts as a single district court of Alberta with one chief judge.

Bill C-47 contains additional provisions which will be of assistance to provinces with respect to the administration of justice and, particularly, the administration of the courts. The bill extends the supernumerary option to county and district court judges. It also creates an option for a chief justice to step down from that position after having served as such for ten years but to continue as a puisne justice of the same court. Enabling provincial legislation would be required for each of these options to become available in a particular province.

I am personally very pleased by the increased attention being paid by many of the provinces to the administration of the courts. We are anxious to assist and co-operate in every reasonable way. It is essential that our judicial system and our entire legal system operate in such a manner that the foremost goal is always service to the public for whom, after all, these systems have been created. It is with this foremost goal, of service to the people of Canada, in view that the government seeks approval in principle and reference of Bill C-47 to committee.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to thank the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) for the able way in which he explained the bill now before the House. I agree with him, of course, that the BNA Act sets out that parliament shall fix and provide salaries for federally-appointed judges. Canadian judges of all levels are federally-appointed except for magistrates, now called provincial judges. County court judges, superior court judges—who may be of the supreme court trial division, Queen's Bench, in some jurisdictions—judges of the courts of appeal, the appellate division of the supreme court in some provinces, which is the provincial appeal court, chief justices of the provinces who are the heads of the courts of appeal, judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, and the Chief Justice of Canada are all under the jurisdiction of the federal government which appoints them. Under our constitution, parliament must take the responsibility of fixing and providing their salaries.

I am not sure that it would not be possible for parliament to pass a statute whereby the fixing and providing of judges' salaries could be done by executive order in council. With parliament sitting 10 or 11 months of the year because of the heavy legislative load before it, this might be the answer. The matter could be reviewed and debated in the House. A one-day term could be inserted in the bill, so that if someone wanted to set out certain facts with reference to the increases, it could be done in that fashion.

From what I have read, it seems that not even the best constitutional minds would argue that it could not be done in that fashion. I would ask the Minister of Justice to consider this proposal because I believe that the long delay, through no fault of the minister or of the government, between the time of one increase and the next makes it look as if increases in judges' salaries are out of line with other salary increases.

We in our party believe that the 500 or so judges mentioned by the Minister should receive an increase. We believe that the matter should go to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and that any amendments to the amounts suggested in the bill should be made in the committee, as well as amendments with regard to retroactivity or the percentages of increases. I want to emphasize at this point that all too often it is mentioned that on second reading we debate the principle of a bill. Under the old rules we would be debating the principle of the increase, but the mechanics of it are debated in committee. If any hon. member believes that an increase is justified, whether it is 5 per cent or 40 per cent, then the bill should go to the committee where the exact amount would be debated, as I understand the procedure, and I think I know something about it. Any changes in the bill can be discussed at the committee level. Any motions moved here with regard to the bill would be merely to kill the bill entirely or to delay it.

As I said at the outset, we believe that an increase in the salaries of judges at all levels is justified and we believe that the bill should go to the committee for study. We believe that at the committee level, members of the Canadian Bar Association, and members of provincial bars if they are interested, should appear before the committee and give evidence on what they consider to be a fair and equitable increase in the salaries of judges.

Therefore, we believe that there should be no delay in sending this bill to the committee. However, it is our belief that the committee must seriously examine the bill. I will deal with that matter in some detail in a moment. As I have said, witnesses should be called before the committee, in particular representatives of the Canadian Bar Association, the group upon which the minister now relies to give him advice on appointments made to the judiciary. Therefore, let us approve the bill on second reading for study only, and hon. members can then make submissions and, if necessary, substantial amendments after the bill has been through committee stage.

I want to make very clear the three points I mentioned at the outset. Our party believes that judges should receive an increase in their salaries and that at this stage we should send the bill to the committee. We believe that the calibre of judges in all courts and at all levels is very high. It is true that our method of appointing judges is different from that of the United States. Once a judge is appointed, the subject cannot be debated in this House: the appointment is done at cabinet level. I believe that is a superior method because, as we know, in politics the question of personalities can come into debate. For example, in debate in Congress a judge is often destroyed before he rises to the proposition of responsibility. I think that over the years our method has worked well.

I believe I have said before that, like some other hon. members, I have appeared in all levels of courts in Canada. Therefore I can say, without reservations—although there are always a few exceptions—that the appointments made by the various governments of Canada over the years, in my experience as a member of the bar, have been excellent. I have been a member since 1944 of the bar of Saskatchewan; 1951, Alberta; and the calibre of judges we have appointed has been very high. They have distinguished themselves on the Bench and have kept the judiciary separate and apart from other institutions of our democratic process.

We believe that the judiciary in Canada must always maintain its independence, not only independence from political institutions but independence from any influence, conflict of interest or suggestion which might interfere in any way with a clear, honest and forthright judicial decision. That is why, in looking at judges' salaries, one should realize that in this regard they represent a unique profession: they must be independent and they must be economically secure; otherwise we would have problems, which we have not encountered in the past.

I know the minister will agree when I say we must stress the independence of judges. It guarantees security of the weak against the strong; it protects the individual against the community and the all-powerful state; it presents a shield against tyranny of power and arrogance and against the irresponsibility and irrationality of popular action, whether of opinion or of violence.

Often there are crimes committed in society where, once the facts get into the media—and I am not criticizing the media—there is an emotional and social stimulus and people are often convicted before they reach the court of justice where they are to be tried by a judge and jury. I will tell the House about the last experience I had in this regard. There were 13 men charged with murder. Some of them were younger than 21, but most of them were around 21 years of age. They went to trial in my city. They belonged to a motor-cycle gang. No one in society really likes motor-cycle gangs: they go about with loud motorcycles, chains and various other weapons, and make threats.

There were two motor-cycle gangs and they agreed to meet at a place called Little Rock, near Calgary. They got into a fight and their leader was killed. Thirteen of the Grim Reapers gang were charged with murder and all were found guilty by a judge and jury. The trial judge refused to separate the trials. One or two of the people who belonged to the motor-cycle gangs went out in a car that night and merely went into a house; they did not know the plan; they went along only for the ride—yet they were all found guilty of murder. I was not counsel at the trial, but it fell on me, as senior counsel, to argue the case in the Alberta Court of Appeal. The case went to the Supreme Court of Canada. Twelve of the 13 received a new trial. At the second trial, five were acquitted; the others were found guilty of manslaughter and sentenced to 2½ years' imprisonment.

Judges must realize the temper and the emotion of society in regard to such crimes, and when society is ready to do what has been done in the deep south at times. Every level of society is faced with the same emotional, psychological problems when these things happen, so we must have men who completely understand this kind of psychology. The independence of judges enables the voice of sanity to rise above the turbulence of passion. It has to be preserved inviolate.

But what does independence of judges imply? It can be nothing short of this: that the minister to whom such an authority is committed shall himself be the first to respect what has been entrusted to him, the administration of the rule of justice under law, including loyalty to its institutions. In other words, if a minister of justice committed a crime—something like the problems which were experienced in the United States—a judge must be so independent and so secure in his position that he is able to deal with the matter with the degree of independence that we expect of the judiciary.

Mr. Benjamin: He did commit a crime—operation LIFT.

Mr. Woolliams: The public acceptability of character for such a function is that which exhibits itself in action as being beyond influences which tend to taint its discharge with alien factors. Vital damage to the state would be the impairment of that independence. Its constitutional character is essential to the public acceptance of our mode of resolving conflicts. Judgments may be criticized; they may call for legislative amendment—but the underlying, basic assumption is the intellectual and moral integrity of the judicial officer in the execution of his office. Only under a regime of law can societies today be maintained in peace and freedom. Its administration must carry the respect and acceptance of the public as being of the character postulated.

I will deal with the longshoremen. I do not know all the facts and I am not going to get into that, but parliament passed a law and apparently the men did not go back to work. Once they saw that a judge had passed an injunction against their conduct and the fact of their breaking the law, they went back to work. I hope that is always true in this nation when we are dealing with so important a subject. I hope that will happen again in the province of Quebec. I hope it will happen all over Canada whenever we find that there is violation of the law. In my opinion, nothing justifies violation of the law. But that does not mean we cannot protest. It does not mean we cannot take action to change unjust laws. Some of my good friends might say that sometimes extreme methods have to be used to change unjust laws, but to break the law itself would lead to anarchy.

Impartiality must mark judgment to the extent possible to men and women. Our court system is the result of thousands of years' experience, and so far as it may be imperfect the answer is that man is imperfect. But it bears favourable comparison with any other system of mankind, and the preservation of the essential quality of freedom in its ministers from influences foreign to its processes, conscious or unconscious, is a supreme necessity. The governing fact in that condition is the acceptability of the mind so influenced, the confirmation of which exhibits a moral sense incompatible with the judicial essence. Nothing short of that would suffice.

I might repeat that we have that kind of judiciary in Canada and that the main reason judges must be paid sufficient money is not only to attract the best men and women from the legal profession to the Bench, but to assure them the kind of security necessary to perform to the highest degree their job of human excellence. When choosing a judge you must consider, above all, his character and his personality. In my opinion, judges should display patience, compassion, integrity, sincerity and, above all, gentleness. We need gentle lady judges and gentlemen judges, and I use "lady" and "gentleman" in the traditional sense. Of course, it helps if the appointee knows a little law and a little psychology.

When I began practising law, I knew a Liberal member lawyer who used to represent a Saskatchewan riding. I am referring to Mr. Justice McNiven who was a supporter of the Mackenzie King Liberal government before being appointed to the Bench. Others may have possessed more brilliant academic minds; that is not for me to say. I can say this about him, however: he was a gentleman, helpful to young lawyers and good to litigants. He left the impression with all who saw him preside over a court that litigants were given their full day in court. I suggest that his experience in parliament gave him greater insight into human nature than he would have gained merely from practising law. After all, if a judge understands human beings, understands human nature, one can be certain he will be fair. One can be certain that such a judge, when he charges a jury, will charge it fairly. As we know, judges sometimes tell the jury what they feel about a case. They are supposed to tell the jury the law. If the judge who charges the jury shows understanding, sympathy and tolerance, one may be sure the jury will do the right thing.

Let me now examine some of the recommendations in the bill. I have listened carefully to this debate, and I will be interested to hear what my friends of the NDP will say. Although in this second reading debate we are approving the increases in principle, that does not mean, necessarily, we approve all salaries set out in the schedule or that those salaries should not be examined in committee. On the other hand, we do not reject the idea of increases. I must sound almost like Mackenzie King.

Mr. Nowlan: Increases if necessary, but not necessarily increases.

Mr. Woolliams: We, in my party, do not engage in political hanky-panky. Some suggest that we cannot change the schedule; that if we do we shall kill the bill. I do not want to do that. On the other hand, I think we should examine it carefully. I disagree with some members of my party. Some people are shocked at this. They say, "But the people in your party do not agree." It has always been that way. It would be a dull party, a dull caucus if every member of it were to agree on everything all the time. What's more, I think the whip would faint.

Mr. Nowlan: So would the leader.

Mr. Woolliams: We must always be critical; that is what democracy is all about. In Germany, you either agreed with Hitler or you did not live. We are different. Naturally, lawyers see things in a different light. Those who are not lawyers may not share their viewpoint. That is why this bill must be referred to committee for further examination. We must consider this bill in light of the government's call for restraint: it is asking business and labour leaders to restrain their demands. Our economy is in a most sensitive period, and I hope the members of this House will not take advantage of the sensitivity of the times to turn this into a partisan, political debate.

I want to examine the schedules. The salary of the Chief Justice of Canada, that most important head of our judicial process, is to increase from $50,000 to $68,000. That represents an increase of 36 per cent. Remember, the Chief Justice carries out some of the functions of the Governor General. I think something should be said about the general rise in the cost of living. Remember, Mr. Speaker, that judges are not like union members who renegotiate contracts every two years or so. Their increases come less frequently. Since October, 1971, when the judges last were granted an increase, the cost of living has increased by 32.8 per cent. To be more accurate, the cost of living rose by that amount between September 1, 1971, and March 1, 1975.

I have dealt with the Chief Justice. Let me now deal with the other judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. Now they are paid $45,000. Their salary is to rise to $63,000, or by approximately 40 per cent. The Chief Justice and Associate Chief Justice of the Federal Court are paid $44,000. Their salary is to increase to $58,000, or by 32 per cent. Their salary is somewhat lower than that of supreme court judges, but this is a new court. I will say no more about it. The chief justices and associate chief justices of provincial and superior courts, and in this category one must include the chief justice of the appeal court and chief justice of the trial division, are presently paid $42,000. Their salary is to increase to $58,000, or by 38 per cent. I am referring to a table of figures which was kindly supplied to me by the department.

The other judges of provincial superior courts are presently paid $38,000. Their pay is to rise to $53,000, or by 38 per cent. The chief judges of county and district courts are paid $30,000. They will receive, once the bill is passed, $44,000, or an increase of 46 per cent. The salaries of other judges of county and district courts will rise from $28,000 to $40,000, or by 43 per cent. In the third phase, the salaries of chief judges of county and district courts will rise to $51,000, or by 70 per cent over-all; and the salaries of county and district court judges will rise to $46,000, or by 64 per cent over-all. I think the committee should look at these figures.

The Minister of Justice suggested today that in accordance with suggestions of bar associations—this has already happened in some provinces—the former differences in jurisdiction between county and superior courts are being phased out. As the responsibilities of the judges will be similar, I think it is fair to give them the same salaries. Unfortunately, such arguments are as full of holes as the watering can you use for sprinkling flowers. Again, this is an area the committee should examine. We must also remember that district court judges are now handling divorces which at one time were the sole prerogative of the supreme court division. They are hearing jury cases and all sorts of criminal cases. They are hearing cases involving larger sums of money than ever and we must consider whether they should be paid less than other judges.

There is to be another change in connection with surrogate court work and other cases coming before county courts. Certain provisions of the act are to be phased out. The federal government is to be responsible for certain financial aspects connected with surrogate courts. As we are dealing with salary increases, I think I ought to read one paragraph from "Proposals for the first year of consensus." It reads:

> The fourth element in the wages and salaries guidelines tries to introduce an element of equity. At the upper end of the scale, it is proposed that no group, no matter what the change in income over the last two years, should be allowed to get more than $2,400 increase in the first year. This represents 8 per cent, the target rate of price change in the first year, of a salary of $30,000. At the lower end, it is proposed that increases of $600 should be allowed in the first year regardless of the size of the increases received in the past two years. The $600 figure represents a 12 per cent increase for those earning $5,000 a year, about the minimum wage.

The committee must consider some of these things. Remember, the principle being applied to judges is the principle which was applied to members of parliament. The last salary increase took place in 1971, and it would not be fair to apply guidelines to judges which apply to some others. On the other hand, the public is entitled to an explanation from the government concerning these increases. After all, they are being asked to restrain their demands. This is a time of great sensitivity and, as I say, I hope debate on this bill will not degenerate to an exchange of partisan opinions. It is necessary to put some of these things on record so that judges, if they read the record of this debate, will understand the pressures at work behind the scenes.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

While we are on the subject of lawyers, may I read into the record some proposals concerning professional fees:

● (1610)

> It is proposed that increases in fees for professional services, such as the services of doctors, lawyers, accountants and consultants, should be governed by the same general principles as apply to other prices and incomes. Specifically, it is proposed that professional fees should only be increased by the amounts required to cover the increased costs of providing the services and to improve the net income of the self-employed professional person the same amount as would be available to the salaried professional person. Thus the $2,400 maximum increase would apply in the determination of professional fees. The technical questions which might arise in the application of these principles have not yet been fully explored. Provincial representatives have been requested to consider their application to professional fees falling within their areas of jurisdiction, and it is expected that this question will be considered further at the next meeting with provincial officials.

I do not know when that will be because, after today, I do not know whether they will meet or not. How do you control professional fees? A lawyer practising law may get up at six o'clock in the morning and work until midnight preparing his case. He may have another group working on mortgages and leases. This lawyer may earn $10,000 or $15,000 more, but he is not like those who have secure positions in the government. They check in at nine and when the bell goes at 4.30 there is a cloud of dust. That situation is entirely different from free enterprise.

I say to the government that there is no chance of their controlling professional fees. When I was practising law I sometimes worked all night. As I said to somebody, I work hard here, but when you are in a profession such as the law and you make your living from practising law—and I do not mean with the government or an oil company—and you have to pay your rent, the salaries of secretaries, and take some food home for the baby, you really have to hustle. I do not know whether the minister practised law. He is a Rhodes scholar and because of his great academic ability became a professor and dean of a university. I have one of his students in my office. I did have two. If this one is of the same high calibre as the other, he should be proud. I hope he reads this: I did not intend to say it.

I want to deal now with a very interesting viewpoint. There is one thing I like on television, the program "Viewpoint". I listened to a fellow talk about members' salaries. If all the facts presented to a court were like the facts presented on that show, it would be awful: there would have to be a new trial on the evidence. I listened to a fellow named Ben Marcus. He was a good performer. He looked right into the CBC camera. Whether he was reading from a prop or not, I do not know.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He is an Ottawa lawyer.

Mr. Woolliams: I want to thank the CBC for giving me a copy of the script. This show was televised from Toronto. He said:

> Tonight I am going to urge you to consider the absurd proposition that 400 salaried public servants are highly deserving of substantial pay increases. One group earns $33,000 per year and ought to earn $46,000. The other earns $41,000 and ought to earn $55,000.
> Only a small percentage of Canadians will have personal experience with our court system, and too few Canadians appreciate the protection they receive from the law and those who administer it on a day to day basis. The common concept of our courts comes from sensational and dramatic movies, television programs and novels whose relationship to reality is, to say the least, remote.

I give him 100 per cent marks for that. When I see programs where a fellow runs up and whispers to the judge, I become nauseated. If I tried that in a courtroom, I would be worse than nauseated. He went on to say:

Our county and superior court judges who are federally appointed are dedicated people who devote their lives to the adjudication of disputes arising between individuals, corporations and government.

He then said what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) and I say:

They judge with impartiality, without passion or prejudice on all of the possible matters of dispute both civil and criminal that arise in our complex society. They apply the law as passed by our legislators.

They do more than that. A great volume of law has never been passed by our legislatures or parliament. There is the common law which is really traditions which have been crystallized. There are many volumes of common law in our law libraries.

Mr. Mazankowski: The law of the jungle.

Mr. Woolliams: It may be the law of the jungle. I am not sure of that. Sometimes it is very difficult to know what is law. Mr. Marcus went on to say:

Well, then, what sort of treatment do these judges receive at the hands of the lawmakers and the Canadian public? What sort of justice is meted out to them? They have not had a pay increase in over four years.

That was true of members of parliament, but there was a different fellow on "Viewpoint".

We treat our street cleaners and garbage collectors better than that.

This is the line that got me:

Unlike members of parliament or senators, judges are prohibited from earning any extra income over and above their salaries.

That is correct. They are not to earn any extra income. In most cases, they do not.

They cannot retain active business interests; they cannot sit on the boards of directors of companies—

There may be some senators who do, but I do not know that many members of parliament sit on boards of directors.

—and they are prohibited from practising law if they should resign—

I might point out that that is not quite accurate. I know a lot of men who have quit the Bench. One who quit the Supreme Court of Canada is practising law. I do not think it is looked upon with great favour when they appear in court, but they may give advice to their firms.

—and unlike our parliamentarians, all of their salary is subject to tax—

I would say that all of our salary is subject to tax. There is an expense allowance, as in any other business. The problem is, it is not always equal because of the different regions from which we come. I will read one other section of this interview:

But what will happen if we do not pay judges more is this: fewer and fewer qualified people from the legal profession will be willing to take appointments to the Bench.

That is the point the Minister of Justice made.

The difference between what they could make in private practice and the salary of a judge is just too great.

I agree with that. However, I will also say this: I know the ability, before the bar, of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I forget his salary when he became prime minister. It could have been $25,000—no more. He could have been making $100,000 a year as a lawyer. In fact, he was offered a partnership in Toronto. I also know that junior partners in law firms in my city would not work for the salary we receive in this place. I know of high calibre men in top positions who have turned down judgeships. I will name two: there is Mr. Chambers, a very distinguished counsel. My leader would know Mr. Chambers because be comes from Nova Scotia.

Mr. Stanfield: He came from New Brunswick.

Mr. Woolliams: I knew he was from the maritimes. He was in the former R. B. Bennett's firm. He was offered the chief justiceship of our province by the Diefenbaker government, and he turned it down. He did not feel he could do it, with the family responsibilities he had at that time. I know another very distinguished man, Mr. J. J. Robinette, Q.C., of Toronto, who turned down an appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada. He has one of the best legal minds in Canada.

So we must analyse what the Minister of Justice says very carefully. The appropriate place to do this is in the committee, because we do want the best people on the Bench. There are some failures among those who practice law, as there are some failures in the medical profession and in business. But surely we do not want to pick up the failures at $25,000 a year and put them on the Bench interpreting the laws of Canada. That is the question we should ask ourselves when we are dealing with the judiciary. Let us make sure we get men of the best possible calibre. I emphasize this. It is something we must do at the committee level.

Mr. Marcus said what we should be doing right now is urging members of parliament, no matter what their political persuasion, to give immediate passage to this bill. I don't need to be sold on that; I agreed with it when I started. There was a call last year for an independent commission with authority to carry out a regular review of the judges. I will not quote any more from that interview except to review just one thing that I believe under the constitution: we pass an act and we assign that responsibility to the executive by order in council in the same way as many other things are done. We may want to add some checks and balances by referring the question for a one-day debate in the House to test public opinion.

Having made our position very clear, there are very few things left to say. I have a couple of things that might add something to the committee. One judge said—I hope nobody will ask me who it is—what he thought about these things:

It is certainly desirable that the differential between the county and district courts and the supreme court should be reduced. Hence, an increase in the district court salaries of a higher percentage is justified at this time. Another thing this concept will bring into being is elimination of what I think to be a bad practice, that of federally-appointed judges receiving additional salary from provincial or other sources.

As you know, there are no county court or district court judges in the province of Quebec. All of the federally-appointed judges are appointed to the supreme court. I know that in Ontario, and to an extent in other provinces, the district or county court judges have received considerable outside funds, in some instances exceeding $6,000. I am satisfied the Department of Justice is very wisely working toward the elimination of these outside emoluments.

I am sure the main reason the Department of Justice is thinking of making part of our increase retroactive is that there was somewhat of a gentlemen's understanding with John Turner that judicial salaries would be reviewed every four years, and making the increase partially retroactive to the spring of 1971 is in line with this concept. I don't know that the minister's understanding with us at the judicial council is generally known.

I think that is correct; I am so advised, and I remember discussing this with the former minister of justice and I think he would agree with it.

An hon. Member: The last page!

Mr. Woolliams: Well, it is an important matter and I have taken a little time on it. I see by the clock that I have been speaking for 30 minutes; maybe that is a little long, but it is an important subject.

An hon. Member: Keep going.

Mr. Woolliams: Against this, however, if judicial salaries compared to those of the legal profession are as low as they currently are, I would think it would become more and more difficult from simply an economic point of view to attract the best lawyers to the Bench. It will be a sad day for the administration of justice in Canada if it is generally regarded in the legal profession that anyone taking a judicial appointment must be doing so because he cannot make it in the profession. A judge said that to me. This could be the result if salaries remain as they are, with the cost of living rising as it is.

I want to deal for a moment with the limitation on provincial remuneration. This is from the working papers that I think the Minister of Justice was talking about. In connection with the proposed salary increases, it should be noted that this bill will authorize an amendment to section 38(2) of the Judges Act to limit the remuneration a judge may receive under provincial law to a maximum of $3,000 per year. I think that is a move in the right direction.

One last point that I have to make before concluding is this: the widows of judges, as the Minister of Justice said, have suffered over the years. I recall a man—imagine the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will remember him—Manley Edwards, who was a member of the Liberal Party here, a member of parliament who served in one or two parliaments and was appointed to the district court. I think the pension his wife received when he died was less than $200, and she had to go out and take various jobs in the city. I do not want to go into that; it was a personal thing. There are many of them getting a pension of $5,000 or less. What I am saying is that amendments to increase the amount that widows of judges get should be supported, because a judge, as the Minister of Justice said, is at the peak of his earning power when he is appointed to the Bench. I think that is a move in the right direction and I hope it applies now to judges' widows.

I know there are members of parliament who served in this House for 20 or 30 years and who left with about $250 in pension. When anything has been done in this House with reference to ourselves, I think of the men who have served here. I know one in particular; he not only served many years in the army but many years in parliament. Some of you may know who I am talking about—a very distinguished gentleman. He left this House with that kind of income. The man I defeated in Bow River had to get the farmers of the area to help him move his furniture when he left this institution. That is not good enough.

One last thought. I know the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) is going to deal with it, so I will only say this. I want the Minister of Justice to think about it. There is no reason in the world why the Minister of Justice and this government should not appoint the judge in Newfoundland. The minister says he doesn't know who to find. Well, I will tell the Minister of Justice to stop this hanky-panky nonsense. If he cannot find a Liberal, let him appoint a Conservative.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I say that with all sincerity.

An hon. Member: What's the difference?

Mr. Woolliams: An hon. member to my left says, "What's the difference?" On the Bench there is no difference. That's a good question; the best the hon. member has asked since coming to the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, a very intelligent question. But the big problem in Newfoundland and some other provinces—I believe Prince Edward Island operates like that; I forget now because I have not checked into it: I know New Brunswick does it—is that the trial division sits on appeals, so that if you are one judge short you cannot hear any appeals. That is not good enough. If we are going to get this bill through, some of the members, particular from Newfoundland, will be asking the minister to get cracking and make that appointment without further delay.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, it was my intention to begin my remarks by expressing agreement with some of the important statements made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), but I have decided instead to do that a little later on because I want at the outset to say that this is one of those occasions when, although I cannot agree with the position taken by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), I feel I must commend him on the speech he has made. I do so because I feel he has addressed himself to the issues which are involved in the bill before us. There are a number of important instances where, in addressing myself to the issues, I come down with a conclusion directly opposite to his. But even though we may disagree, I think it is good debate when we are talking about the same things.

May I now return to the Minister of Justice, and in this respect, of course, I am commenting on something said by him and also by the hon. member for Calgary North. I express my complete agreement with the view that the judiciary is a very important aspect of any democracy, certainly a very important aspect of Canadian democracy.

I want also to join with both of those who have spoken thus far in this debate in saying that we are well served by our judiciary. There have been some decisions made at various court levels with which I have disagreed. There are one or two that are current with which I may disagree. Likewise, there are times when I may disagree with the decisions of the Chair, but I still respect the Chair and all the occupants of it for their fairness and impartiality. The fact is, however, that an independent judiciary is something without which our democracy would not be secure. It is the place where the rights of individuals are protected. It is the place where decisions on the matters that affect individuals, or the principles that determine the whole nature of our society, are made. It is terribly important that we hold the highest respect for the judiciary and that we do everything we can to strengthen it.

I suppose there are members who are already saying to themselves, "How long is the member for Winnipeg North Centre going to talk that way before he tells us where he and his colleagues stand on this bill?" I just want to make it clear that what I have said by way of preamble is not just said for the purpose of being on the side of the angels so far as the judiciary is concerned, but because it is something about which we in this party and in our movement feel very strongly.

Even so, Madam Speaker, we think that some of the issues to which the hon. member for Calgary North addressed himself are serious and important issues, and we in this party have a view respecting those issues that differs radically from the views expressed by the Minister of Justice and by the hon. member for Calgary North.

We agree that one of the ways in which to provide for the independence of the judiciary is to make sure that individual judges are free from economic concern and anxiety. In other words, we agree that the salaries paid by Canada to her judges should be generous. I believe the hon. member for Calgary North would have a difficult time trying to get any court to reinterpret section 100 of the British North America Act to permit the salaries of judges to be established by the federal government through an order in council rather than by parliament itself. I think it is good that our constitution requires us to deal with the question of the salaries of judges here on the floor of the House of Commons rather than leaving it to the cabinet to be dealt with by order in council.

Even after saying quite clearly that we feel parliament must grapple with this responsibility, and that parliament must be generous so there will be dignity attached to being a judge and there will be freedom from anxiety and concern for our judges, we think there is such a thing as overdoing it. We look at the salary schedules provided in Bill C-47 and say quite frankly that we think the government is going too far. We say that, Madam Speaker, with particular conviction at this time in our economic history. The issue in this bill is awfully close to the issue that was before us in Bill C-44.

Mr. Gillies: No, it is different.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend from Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) says it is different. There is the difference in that I was opposed to any increases being provided under Bill C-44. I am prepared to support reasonable increases for judges, but I still think that we have to consider what the salary increases that this House is prepared to give to judges will do to the efforts being made to get our economy on the track.

In Bill C-44 we were dealing with the salaries or incomes of 264 members of this House and 102 members of the other place, a total of 366 individuals when the seats are all filled. I think that the action of parliament in providing for the boost that was contained in Bill C-44, even though it applied to only 366 persons, had a serious effect on the economy of this country. The proposal for that increase has been around since December, and I think some of the spiralling inflation that we are now experiencing has been triggered by what was done with respect to these 366 persons.

The Minister of Justice says that the number of judges in Canada is just over 500. That is even more than the total number of members of the House of Commons and the Senate. I submit that if we propose, in percentage terms or in absolute terms, massive increases in the incomes of another 500 persons because we owe them a particular respect, because we put them at the top of the ladder in terms of what is important in this country, this cannot but add to the inflationary effects that we have already fed to the economy by passing Bill C-44, even though some of us opposed that bill all the way.

I listened with particular interest to what was said by the hon. member for Calgary North. As I said earlier, I disagree with his conclusion, but I commend him on picking up and reading from the working paper distributed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) the exact restraint limits that are suggested in that working paper.

Everyone knows that a major issue now before the country is: what do we do about inflation? The government takes the view that somehow there must be restraint. The government view is that restraint should express itself in the precise terms quoted by the hon. member for Calgary North, namely, that no increase should be more than 12 per cent per year, or particularly in the case of higher salaried professionals and executives, more than $2,400 per year, whichever is the lesser. I suggest that for the government to be talking restraint proposals of that kind—a limit of 12 per cent or $2,400 per year—and then to break those proposals, pierce them if you will, for members of parliament and now for judges, and who knows next, just knocks the stuffing out of any possibility the government might have to sell its restraint program.

Mr. Woolliams: Madam Speaker, I have already pointed this out, but I would like the hon. member to be fair, and I think he will be when I make the point again. In this context we are dealing with a situation in respect of salary increases which are reviewable every two years. These judges, like members of parliament—and I do not want to mix the two together—have not had an increase for four years. So the situation is somewhat different. I am not saying the formula should be entirely different, but we are mixing apples and oranges.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I heard the hon. member say that in his speech once or twice, and he has said it again now exactly as he said it before. Of course, I was going to deal with it although I had planned to do so a little later. However, I do not mind shifting my speech a bit and dealing with it now. The hon. member makes the point that there have been no increases for our judges since 1971. The amending bill was passed in the fall of 1971 and it was made effective, I think, in July 1, 1971, so let us say it is four years.

If the guidelines of the Minister of Finance are to apply to those four years, even at $2,400 a year it amounts to only $9,600. Even if you apply that line, they would get only $9,600. There is no judge on the list whose increase is only $9,600: they are all more than that. Giving them full credit for the four years at the maximum figure suggested by the Minister of Finance, it would be—

Mr. Gillies: When was the last increase for judges?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In 1971. I would prefer to agree to an increase of just $2,400 a year starting now; that is enough. But I would be prepared to accept the government's guidelines, so that four years times $2,400 is $9,600, yet the increases that judges are going to get are $18,000, $16,000, $15,000, $22,000 and $18,000. Those are the amounts the judges are going to get, having waited four years, but that is greatly in excess of the restraint proposals set out by the Minister of Finance. I submit that the Minister of Finance might as well leave us.

Mr. Gillies: I could agree with that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Minister of Finance got an answer from the Canadian Labour Congress which was to the effect that labour would not buy his proposal unless he did certain other things. He got an answer yesterday from the business community which was to the effect that they did not like his proposal either. He got a pretty effective "No" from the opposition side of the House in a couple of votes that took place yesterday. Now, after all that, if he is prepared to be part of a government that is willing to forget all about these restraint proposals because the judges are a particular group, then the consensus or restraint program is over.

Mr. Benjamin: Everybody is in a particular group.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend, the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), has taken the very words out of my head which I was about to give out of my mouth. Judges are not the only people who are special persons in this Canada of ours. The people for whom the judges have to make decisions are also important. The pensioners, the workers, the mothers in the home, and the persons going into the supermarkets trying to get enough food for the money they have, are all important—they are all Canadians. They are told they must settle for an increase of not more than 12 per cent a year, or $2,400 a year, whichever is the lesser. But for ourselves in the House of Commons and for those persons over in the other place, the restraints do not apply. Now we are back again this week with another series of increases.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

When we were dealing with Bill C-44, the working papers had not leaked out. Now we have these working papers in public, and here is the government back again with these proposals which I suggest are so far beyond the guidelines in the working papers they just do not make sense at all and cannot be expected to be swallowed by anyone who tries to be reasonable or responsible.

I have already expressed my appreciation for the way in which the hon. member for Calgary North put his speech together, even if I disagree with it. I have to say again that the figures I have on the salaries vary slightly from his. He said he got a table from the Department of Justice. I did not do that, but I have taken the bill and the statute as it is and we seem to vary by about $3,000. I suspect that the salaries he has been given, both now and what they will be after the bill goes through, are about $3,000 higher than mine because he has included some representational allowances or some other allowances of that sort that they will get. The figures I have are along these lines: at the present time, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada is receiving $47,000 a year.

Mr. Woolliams: Madam Speaker, I rise on a small question of privilege. We are not engaged in any big argument. The hon. member is absolutely right, but to his figures should be added $3,000 because that is the amount payable for extrajudicial duties. The chart I read from has the exact figures which are the same as the hon. member's, to which $3,000 has been added except in the case of the Federal Court, and I think there it comes to $4,000.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is fine. That reconciles our figures, but I wanted to be clear that I am taking my figures from the act as it stands and the bill now before us. The chief justice will go from $47,000 to $65,000. That is an increase of $18,000, which in anybody's arithmetic is 38 per cent. The other judges of the Supreme Court of Canada will go from $42,000 to $60,000, which is an increase of $18,000, and that is 42 per cent.

Then the chief justice of the Federal Court and the chief justice of each of the provincial superior courts, the court of appeal and trial division, go from $39,000 to $55,000. In both cases the increase is $16,000, or 41 per cent. The other judges of the Federal Court, and likewise the other judges of the superior courts of the provinces, go from $35,000 to $50,000. That is an increase of $15,000, or 42 per cent.

Let us now look at the judges of the county or district courts, of whom there are a lot more. I appreciate the fact that in percentage terms they are to get more than those in the provincial superior courts, the Federal Court and the Supreme Court, but look at these figures: the judges of the county and district courts are now getting $19,000. The chief judges of those courts will go to $41,000. Somebody is going to say I am being unfair. I do not see how I can be, but that is an increase of $22,000, or 110 per cent.

In the case of the other judges of the county and district courts who are now getting $19,000, the same as the chief judges, they will go to something less than the chief judges, namely, $37,000. That is an increase of $18,000, or 94 per cent. Explain this away as you will, by saying there are some sources of income they will not be entitled to get, against which there are some new allowances that they have not been getting before, but the fact is that those are the kinds of increases this bill is providing—all the way from a low of 38 per cent to a high of 110 per cent.

In the case of county and district court judges, and it applies to them only and not to judges of the Supreme Court, the Federal Court or provincial superior courts, there is a further provision for another increase a year from now. The chief judges of the county and district courts, who are getting now an increase of 110 per cent, have built into this measure another 17 per cent increase, that is, another $7,000, in April 1976. The other judges of those courts will have another $6,000 added on to their $37,000, bringing them to $43,000 a year, and that is 16 per cent on top of their present 94 per cent.

I do not take back one word of what I said in my opening remarks about respect for judges and the importance of the judiciary, but I do not see how the Parliament of Canada can be talking about a restraint program of 12 per cent, or $2,400, as a maximum for Canadians and deal with a bill that provides increases as high as 110 per cent now, plus another 17 per cent a year from now, or 94 per cent now and another 16 per cent a year from now. The minister may tell me this is aimed at doing something we want to do, namely, narrow the gap and that it will provide a higher percentage for the lowest paid judges than for those at the top. That is a principle we support. But I discover at the present time the dollar gap between the lowest and the highest paid judge is $28,000, that is, between $19,000 and $47,000; and under the bill—when it is all said and done, the gap will still be $28,000: there is no change at all in the gap. There is a difference in percentage terms, but the highest paid judge in Canada will still be receiving $28,000 more than the lowest paid judge under federal legislation.

I do not think what I am saying contains any element of disrespect for judges or disrespect for their needs. They are Canadians as we are. They are living today in 1975 when there is an economic problem in this country. I think they, along with us, should be giving leadership to the people of this country, and it is not leadership to be making a case for very much more than we are prepared to give the ordinary people of this country.

Earlier I referred to the judiciary of this country as serving us well. My friends in the legal profession, and I refer not only to those in our party, tell me that the calibre of judges on the Bench today is particularly high. Some of them feel it is higher than it was. It has not been a problem to get good men or women on the Bench because of the salaries paid. I suggest there are other things involved besides salaries. There is the security of the job itself; there is the security of the pension provisions; there is the prestige and the satisfaction of knowing that one is part of a very important process in Canadian democracy. I think it is a bit of an insult to say that the only way we will get people to do that sort of thing is by paying these salaries that are so much more than is needed in order for them to keep up with the cost of living, and so much more than we are prepared to let others have.

I had occasion a few days ago, I believe it was when we were dealing with the estimates of Treasury Board, to make the point that I think, as do my colleagues, that a cost of living increase should be for that portion of one's income that one spends in order to meet the cost of living. This myth of a percentage across the board for the person receiving $5,000 and the same percentage for the person receiving $50,000 just does not wash. I do not think there is a case for giving those at the top level the same percentage we give to those at the lower levels, but in this case we are throwing the restraint proposals out the window and saying that while others are entitled to only 12 per cent or $2,400 a year, the judges are entitled after four years to 38 per cent, 41 per cent, 42 per cent or even higher.

As I say, if we turn this percentage into absolute dollars and take the figure of the Minister of Finance of $2,400 for four years, that is $9,600, and not one of those salary changes is anywhere near $9,600: they run at $15,000, $16,000 and $18,000. I think $15,000 is the lowest I have in front of me in my notes in respect of any of the increases; yet the Minister of Finance says it should not be more than $2,400 a year, which is $9,600 in four years.

I believe we are back to the philosophy some of us have, that we should not be building in Canada a society of an elite at the top and ordinary mortals down below. I do not take away from my readiness to provide judges with complete freedom from economic anxiety or economic concern, but I feel very strongly that we should treat them as part of the Canadian populace. I think they should be concerned about inflation and what is happening, and I think the restraints that some of us thought should apply to us as members of parliament and which the government proposes for others should apply to them.

It had been my hope to finish my speech before five o'clock, but I see I will have to take a few minutes this evening.

An hon. Member: That is nice to look forward to.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Can I be sure that my friends will all be back at eight o'clock?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Then I do not need to give notice of the amendment I will move tonight, because my friends will all be here.

Mr. Baldwin: Is it in order?

An hon. Member: Let's hear it now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, do you see the kind of friends I have? They say they will be here at eight o'clock, but when I suggest I have an amendment they are not so sure; they would like to hear it now. I shall read out the amendment, Mr. Speaker. This will also be a courtesy to you so that you can look it over during the dinner hour, and then I shall move it at the end of my remarks. May I say that it is a reasoned amendment.

Mr. Peters: And reasonable, too.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I point out, as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and I well know, that it is a little difficult to draft a reasoned amendment and get it past the rules. There has been only one reasoned amendment accepted so far in this parliament. It was one moved on February 6 by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). I might think a reasoned amendment should take some other form, but I am smart enough to know that if I want it to be in order, I should follow the form of the one that was in order. It appears at page 2977 of Hansard for Thursday, February 6. The amendment I shall move will follow that amendment and it will be in these terms:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out, and that the following be substituted therefore:

"this House declines to give second reading to Bill C-47 because it fails to limit the salary increases contained therein to the restraint limits proposed by the government, namely that executive and professional salaries should not be increased by more than 12 per cent or $2,400 per year, whichever is the lesser."

As I say, I shall move that amendment at the end of my speech tonight, but I am sending a copy to you now, Mr. Speaker, so that you can look it over during the dinner hour, so that hon. members opposite can decide that this is the time to vote for their government's restraint proposals, and so that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) can give it his best thought as well.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise)—Agriculture—Fertilizer—Justification of price increases; the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth)—Housing—Native housing program—Reason for reduction in number of starts—Ability of native people to afford mortgage interest rates; the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco)—Bankruptcy—Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada—Reason for permitting close alignment with office of Secretary of State.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions for the production of papers.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

CORRESPONDENCE WITH CBC PERTAINING TO PROGRAM "BAPTIZING"

The House resumed, from Thursday April 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dinsdale:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of all correspondence with CBC pertaining to the program "Baptizing", presented on the CBC TV network on Sunday evening, January 19, 1975.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. C. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I take this opportunity to commend the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) for his concern and interest in this very important matter, a matter which I believe all hon. members have at one time or another mentioned or about which they have expressed some concern. I am referring to the quality and standard of drama presentations by and through our national network, the CBC.

I can say that while the hon. member and I share a number of opinions on transportation and its importance in the outlying areas of this great country, his request at this time for the production by the CBC of all the correspondence received by the corporation pertaining to the drama production entitled "Baptizing" presented on the CBC TV network on Sunday, January 19, 1975, is one which, I am afraid, I do not support. I do not doubt for a moment the hon. member's sincerity in his approach to the subject, but I have serious doubts and reservations about the outcome were such a practice allowed at this time.

If there is one area of life today about which I am deeply concerned it is the individual freedom that we enjoy in this country and the protection of our freedom of speech, of thought, of action, of movement and of worship. I am deeply concerned that if this motion is adopted, it might prove to be an invasion of the privacy of the common citizen, an action that we might regret in the future.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that had the hon. member for Brandon-Souris been seeking the tabling of a summary of the opinions that have been expressed to the CBC by all of its viewers and contained in all the correspondence received by the corporation, then I would have had no hesitation in supporting him in that demand. However, tabling in the House of all correspondence received, without the permission of the people who originated that correspondence is, to my way of thinking, an invasion of their privacy which would tend to suppress the free flow of opinion between the citizens of Canada and the corporation.

I should like to raise, also, the question of whether such a move would indeed be advisable from the standpoint of the private broadcasters who are part of the national network as affiliates of the CBC. I know for a fact that in our own area in western Ontario—and I know this from first-hand knowledge—a great deal of communication takes place between the viewer and the network affiliates. In other words, private stations at the end of the CBC network provide the closest link between private citizens and the corporation.

I am sure that if members of the House were working in any of these establishments on programs of a varying nature, they would know by the telephone calls that are received, not only at the station but in numerous control rooms of the various affiliate stations, that the viewing public across Canada is taking this opportunity to let its views be known to the affiliate. It would seem to me that if we are going to take a serious look at the situation, in other words get all the facts as to what the people thought of the program in question, we would have to go right down to the affiliate stations and get the full story from them.

I believe, also, that the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal) made an extremely important observation, to be found at page 5177 of Hansard of April 24, 1975, when he pointed out the criteria to be applied for exemption from production of papers. He gave the following reasons: first, the papers are voluminous and, second, they would require inordinate length of time and cost to prepare. It seems to me that this reason alone is sufficient for Mr. Speaker to deny the request for correspondence to be placed before the House. Having worked in one of the network private affiliates, I can assure the House that literally volumes of correspondence are received at the private end of the corporate network on the subject of a controversial program such as the one we are discussing now.

However, my chief objection relates to the harmful effects that such action might have in the future. Where do we stop? I know that this motion is to apply to one instance only, but to my way of thinking it would be the thin edge of the wedge and once the precedent is set, the door can easily be opened not only in the case of the network but, I submit, in the case of private stations as well. I believe that this could get us into great difficulties. While I certainly do not condone immoral or indecent presentations no matter where they take place, I believe that the House has a responsibility to make sure that its views are made known to the corporation through the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts as well as right here in this chamber. I do not believe that its authority should necessarily extend into areas of private communications between the corporation and its individual viewers.

Let me illustrate, if I may. If I were investing money in a company—and that is what we are doing in support of the CBC when we invest money of the people of Canada in one of the largest companies in the world—and if I did not have adequate expertise to run it myself, I would hire the most expert people I could find and let them get on with the job. If I were not happy with the job they were doing, I would let them know about it, which is the case in this particular instance when the displeasure of many members of the House is expressed, and also at the meetings of the broadcasting committee when it is voiced forcefully. But I do not think I would place any restrictions on a company that I owned which would burden it with regulations and demands that would not have to be met by its competitors, which I feel is what this motion would do to the corporation because there is no way in which the House could demand that the CTV network or Global television produce correspondence from their viewers.

I would also like to point out that in this instance we are dealing with a matter which requires flexibility. In reality the quality of a program is a matter of opinion, a question of cultural taste and morality which is an individual personal matter. I am sure we can agree that it is almost impossible to find two people in agreement on a subject such as this. I am sure that a great number of negative opinions were expressed to the CBC on the subject of this particular program. I am equally sure that a great number of opinions were not expressed, whether they were positive opinions or negative opinions. I am sure that hon. members realize that possibly only one person in ten will take the time, pick up a pen and take the effort necessary to make his opinions known, whether it be to the CBC, Eaton's, Simpson's or any other corporate body.

Even if we did have all these communications tabled, we might or might not have a precise over-all view of what the national opinion would be on that particular program. As hon. members know, the CBC—and other members of this House have put forth supporting views—has said that it was the largest audience ever assembled for a program of that kind. It was also submitted to this House that the rating for the program ran about 70 per cent, or perhaps 50 per cent or better in its favour. We can all argue that that is what the CBC says, but the fact remains that those statistics are available and I do not see that even tabling all the correspondence would give us exactly what we are looking for.

I have a great deal of affection and admiration for our democratic representation formula. I honestly believe that the best outlook for public opinion in the world today is provided each day right here in the House of Commons by the representatives who sit in this green chamber from all parts of our nation. I am certain that the CBC has been made fully aware of the concern expressed by the people of Canada to us as their elected representives. To my way of thinking, the most effective letter any Canadian can write is not to the CBC, the CTV or any other corporate or business enterprise, but to Ottawa to his elected member.

I am sure that if the hon. member for Brandon-Souris would reflect for just a moment, he would find that it does not take much stretching of the imagination to believe that there could appear in this House in the future a motion which would request the tabling of all private members' correspondence, that which each of us receives every day from the citizens we represent. It is not inconceivable that such a thing could happen, and I would like to assure the hon. member that I would oppose such a motion then for the same reasons that I oppose this motion now. It would be then, as it is now, an intrusion into a person's privacy.

Mr. John Roberts (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I would not like you or the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) to think that during my remarks I would say anything disrespectful of him or attack his sincerity or conviction in bringing this matter before the House. He is one of its most distinguished members. All of us, on all sides, admire his enthusiasm, devotion and integrity. It was impossible not to sympathize with him as he recounted his distress at watching this program "Baptizing". It was obviously an anguishing, agonizing and almost traumatic experience for him. It was impossible not to sympathize. But I was puzzled. It seems to me that some fancy, smooth-talker from Sam Slick territory must have arrived in Brandon and sold a whole parcel of television sets which had no "off" button, because there should have been a handy remedy available for him to avoid this distressing experience. He could have placed his hands firmly on the arms of his chair, stood up, taken a few paces, pushed the button and turned the program off.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Who would turn the CBC off?

Mr. Roberts: The hon. member did not turn it off. He could have read a book or perhaps watched alternative programming. It conjures up a rather strange picture in one's mind to visualize the hon. member for Brandon-Souris turning on the set with that tingling anticipation he usually has when he is about to see a CBC program. He watches the program for a while and says to himself that he is not sure he will like it. Does he turn it off? No, he keeps on watching. He watches a little longer and concludes that he really does not like it. Does he get up and turn it off? No, he keeps on watching. He watches a little longer and thinks that it is very distressing and unpleasant and that he dislikes it intensely. Does he turn it off? No, he keeps watching. Finally, he thinks that the program he is watching is revolting and disgusting. He wonders what to do. Does he turn if off? No, he decides to complain to the House of Commons.

The remedy was in his hands. No one forced him, and no one forces people who feel as he does, to watch this kind of program. So what is he complaining about? He is not complaining that this program was imposed upon him. He wants to make sure that his values and standards are imposed upon other people. If one reads his remarks, this is his intention. He says that it is wrong to communicate this "distortion of the essential nature of human behaviour" to the Canadian public, which implies that he knows what is the essential nature of human behaviour, a subject which has been speculated upon without conclusion for well over 2,500 years. He knows what essential human nature is, and he doesn't think what he considers to be a distortion of it should be seen on television. He does not feel that what he calls the disintegration of society should be seen on television. One man's disintegration is another man's reformation, a renewal if you like. He does not think the program should include what he believes to be "blasphemy, obscenities, violence and situations at odds with traditional values of Canadian society."

I should not complain that a Conservative believes in protecting the traditional values of Canadian society, but I do suggest that not simply and only the traditional values of Canadian society should be expressed through television programming in this country. It is not a question of values the hon. member does not like being imposed on him; he is concerned with imposing a set of values upon others who may or may not share them. In the case of the particular program he is complaining about, it appears that from the letter and telephone response a very great majority of listeners felt differently about the program than he did.

I object to this kind of splendid assurance that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris or, for that matter me, or any member of this House, is competent to decide what values and moral standards the Canadian public should watch on television. Once we start down that slope, where do we stop? What are we to judge out of court? What sacred cow are we going to establish? Can we watch Elmer Gantry which some people may consider ridicules certain aspects of religion? Shall we rule out Mary, Queen of Scots because we do not like the portrayal of John Knox? Shall we rule out Tartuffe because we do not like attacks on sanctimony? Shall we rule out the Devils of Loudon because it holds the inquisition up to disrepute? Shall we rule out the Merchant of Venice because people do not like the characterization of Jews? Where do we stop once we decide that television programming in Canada should represent the views of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, or of me, or of any particular member in this House?

Mr. Baldwin: How about Reader's Digest and Time?

Mr. Roberts: The hon. member for Brandon-Souris stands for traditional values. I think most of us in this House stand for a tolerant and liberal society. There are not many members of this parliament who would want to act as censors for the arts in this country.

What of accountability to parliament? That was the question the hon. member said he was concerned with. There is an accountability for over-all direction of the programming of Radio Canada. I think the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) properly raised questions in relation to policy concerning advertising related to children's programs on radio. I feel that over-all concerns about CBC programming ought to be raised, but that is very different from the kind of nickel and dime involvement in specific details of programming which the hon. member for Brandon-Souris obviously favours. What should govern the basic principle behind programming policy is not, I suggest, just the taste of the mass, is not just the taste of the minority, is not the taste of the avant garde, and is certainly not the taste of the righteous. It seems to me that the CBC should attempt to present a variety of programming so that a variety of Canadians can find something on the CBC which is of interest to them.

The cost may be that once in a while a member of the House of Commons, or some of his friends, may be outraged at one or another program. On occasion even I may be outraged about a program. But there is a greater benefit in making sure that programming gives a choice to a large number of Canadians, whatever their disposition, so that most can find something which will interest, stimulate and entertain them.

The role of the CBC is exactly that characterized by the hon. member in a felicitous phrase. Its role is that of "chartered liberty". I point out that it was parliament which, in its wisdom, decided to establish the CBC not as a department completely under the responsibility of parliament but as a public corporation to some extent separated from the probings of parliament so that parliament would not delve into day to day details of programming and administration. It was thought—wisely, it seems to me—that a radio and television communications system should not be subject to the kind of influence or control which politicians might wish to bring to bear in the consideration of specific details. If we interfere in artistic policy, if we interfere in the details of program content, what is to stop our interfering with programs which present news, commentary or other aspects?

It is the House of Commons which decided that the CBC should have chartered liberty and that there are areas in which the House would not interfere. We were to keep our hands off the day to day administration of the corporation, the over-all direction of programming, but we could attempt to give advice and counsel. That principle is dangerously contravened by the kind of approach represented by the motion presented by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. He would attempt to delve into administrative details which surround the presentation of the specific program about which he is concerned. That is an attempt which this House should resist.

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fleming: I am glad hon. members opposite approve of brevity on my side of the House. Unfortunately, brevity of remarks on the other side is somewhat rare. To comment on this matter, this morning, as a member of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, I met at a general meeting the president of the CBC who appeared as a witness before the committee, and I took that opportunity to question him about this matter. I thought, since I wanted to participate in the present debate before the House, that he might shed some light on the matter.

I find, when dealing with complaints of constituents and other kinds of problems, that it is best sometimes to take some of the earlier letters, block out or erase names and addresses and forward these letters when answering later letters of inquiry. I asked the president of the CBC this morning just why is he not willing to provide the information asked for now. He insisted that the problem really boiled down to a matter of principle, that people who had written in and signed their letters, had written in complete confidence, and that they have the right and the privilege to have their correspondence kept confidential; further, you could only turn over those letters to members of parliament or make them public if you had the permission of the persons who had written in and criticized.

I asked if it would not be possible to block out the name and address and particulars of the person who sent the letter because some people are afraid of reprisals if their names are connected with criticisms of radio or television programs. Revealing the names of these people might hurt their ability to earn a living or might harm their well-being or particular situation in a community. This is quite possible. For instance, people employed by a large corporation might suffer if it became known that they are critical of certain aspects of programming. If a letter is read in the House of Commons, it becomes public. I wonder how my constituents would feel if I were to say to them, "Everything you write to me with your signature on it I will circulate publicly." So I do not scoff at Mr. Picard's position.

On the other hand, I think members of parliament have the right to know what kind of criticism is being levelled at the CBC on any particular program. The president of the CBC indicated this morning that he is entirely willing to present, in summary form, the different points made and how many times they were made. I think he would go so far as to give some idea of how many complaints come from each region. I think that would answer a major part of the demand made by the hon. member's motion.

I think we all respect the way in which the CBC ought to be dealt with. It is indirectly responsible to parliament. The fact remains that if, after each drama, after each presentation, we call the producer of the show before us, if we want to find out about every phone call, about every discussion, about what every person said to the cameraman, to the co-producer and to his friends, we shall be intimidating. That is the kind of intimidation we do not want if the state-owned facility is to remain independent in thinking and express itself. We have the power to legislate. If someone is not doing is job, that person can be replaced. If someone is not carrying out his responsibilities properly then we, since we control the CBC, can see to it that the person is replaced. We can make changes short of passing legislation.

That is all I want to say, except this: this morning the president of the CBC indicated that if the hon. member wants general information, wants to know how many criticisms of each type were levelled at the corporation, that information is available. It is the names of the individuals which the president wishes to withhold. The privilege of privacy is a privilege and right which all Canadians and members of this House ought to revere.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): I draw to the attention of hon. members that if the mover of the motion, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), speaks at this time, he will close the debate. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I think most of us have heard it said that all politicians have in them some thing of the ham actor. Certainly, as I listened to some contributions in this debate I concluded that in this House there is evidence of a great deal of frustrated dramatic artistry. It will be interesting to see, when the TV camera invades this chamber, how we shall be portrayed in glorious technicolour.

I am afraid the debate has digressed from the subject matter before the House. What precipitated the debate was the notice of motion asking that an order of the House do issue for all correspondence with the CBC pertaining to the program "Baptizing." We then heard learned dissertations on the subject of freedom. The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Roberts) embarked on this theme at some length this afternoon. Incidentally, I notice that the phrase "chartered libertine" which I used, was printed in Hansard as "chartered liberty". The actual phrase I used, and which should be corrected in the revised version of Hansard, is "chartered libertine". The definition of libertine is one who is licentious or allowed to do as he pleases.

While we are discussing the invasion of privacy, individual, personal rights and the tabling of correspondence, I suggest that one of the more popular types of program on radio, and this is being heard increasingly in Canada, is known as the open line program. Many open line programs depend almost exclusively on correspondence. The expressions of opinion on topics of the day are read over the air freely and openly. If we are going to get into the area of placing a special restriction on this sort of correspondence, it will severely restrict the operations of the electronic media, which for hour after hour, expose public opinion. I certainly would not expect the CBC to table letters marked personal and confidential. I think the argument put forward by several members is quite a spurious argument in this regard.

It has been suggested that I, as a free citizen, have a right to turn off the program. I must say that is exactly what I did. There had been a considerable amount of publicity preceding the presentation of the performances. I believe "Baptizing" was the first program in the series.

In light of the considerable publicity put out by the CBC, I waited with some anticipation for the first presentation. I am interested in good drama. Unfortunately, I was considerably disappointed and I turned it off. A group of young people came to me and suggested that I make a protest. I thought that was fascinating indeed. They described what had actually gone on.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Most of us in this House of Commons are middle aged. Recently, Frank Capra, a distinguished Hollywood producer, was interviewed by Vernon Scott. The interview was headed "Middle-aged get jollies from violence". I quote from this interview:

> Frank Capra, winner of three Oscars for nonviolent movies, said today it is middle-aged people who get their jollies from sex and violence, not young folk.

If we were really catering to the needs of young folk through the electronic media today, we would be programming at a far different level.

I notice Your Honour is about to flag me down. May I just make one more point. The CBC is funded by very generous amounts of money from the taxpayers of Canada. In many respects it does an outstanding job. However, I contend it is not the responsibility and function of the CBC to experiment at the taxpayers' expense with off-beat, off-Broadway types of productions you would see in the sleazy parts of New York and expose this sort of production, according to the statistics given to us, to three million people. That is certainly not a function of the CBC.

I hope the House will give its approval to the tabling of these letters so we can actually see how the people of Canada feel about these matters. I took this to the president of the CBC in a personal letter. He replied that he had received all these wonderful letters in support of the program. If that is true I would like to see how the evidence shapes up in the actual tabling of these letters.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Call in the members.

Mr. Speaker: The time allotted for private members' hour having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.06 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

JUDGES ACT AND CERTAIN ACTS RELATED TO THE SUPREME COURTS OF NEWFOUNDLAND AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR INCREASED SALARIES AND ADDITIONAL JUDGES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-47, to amend the Judges Act and certain other acts for related purposes and in respect of the reconstitution of the Supreme Courts of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is not often that I have to do this, but I find that I made an error—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —in my remarks this afternoon.

Mr. Stanfield: Incredible.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I appreciate the interjections but I am glad I am able to make the correction in the same Hansard in which I made the error. I also apologize for having made the error. In giving the amounts of the salaries that the various judges now receive I made a mistake with regard to the present salaries of the county court judges. When I checked back into the record I found that my eye had caught the wrong column for the county court judges. I said that their present salary is $19,000. Actually the present salary for the chief judge of a county or district court is $27,000, and the salary for the other judges in district and county courts is $25,000.

The result of this error is that I made another one. I said therefore that the salaries they would get under this bill would represent an increase of 110 per cent in the case of the chief of the county court judges and 94 per cent in the case of the others. I am really surprised that no one picked me up on those scandalous figures, but I am happy to correct them. The fact is that the chief judge of a county court would go from $27,000 to $41,000, which is an increase of $14,000, or 51 per cent. The other judges of the county or district courts would go from $25,000 to $37,000, an increase of $12,000, or 48 per cent. One result of this is that instead of the spread between the lowest and highest paid judge remaining as it was, I find that the spread has grown from $22,000 to $28,000

To summarize these figures then, in looking at the various groups of judges to which I referred this afternoon, the situation in respect of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, the Federal Court of Canada, the superior courts of the provinces, both appeal and trial divisions, and the county and district courts adds up to this:

their percentage increases are 38 per cent, 41 per cent, 42 per cent, 48 per cent and 51 per cent. In actual dollars their increases are $12,000, $14,000, $15,000, $16,000 and $18,000. In the case of the two sets of judges who get the highest percentage increases of 48 per cent and 51 per cent, there is built into the bill in one case another 16 per cent and in the other another 17 per cent increase in 1976.

The point of all this is that for all that I was prepared to agree about the respect we owe judges and the things we must do to make sure they are free from economic concern, I think this bill goes too far, and in particular I think it is an insult to the country as a whole for the government to be discussing wage restraints of 12 per cent per year, or $2,400, whichever is the lesser, and at the same time to provide these kinds of increases for the judges of the various courts of this country. I believe I was completely fair when I pointed out that I was not asking for an increase of only $2,400 because there has been no increase for the judges for four years, but even four years at $2,400 is $9,600 and yet the lowest increase in terms of dollars any of the judges would get would be $12,000, and it goes on up to $18,000. I submit that in light of the economic problems we face and the appeal being made to Canadians to get together in some kind of a program that will lick inflation, this is hardly an appropriate course to follow.

I hope I made it clear this afternoon that we regard very highly the judiciary of this country. We respect those who are on the Bench in the various courts of Canada, but we feel they should be part of the rest of us in trying to cope with our economic problems today, and that they, just as some of us felt we in this House should also not do, should not seek to go beyond the kinds of restraints being suggested by the federal government at this time.

I suspect that my 40 minutes must be just about over and I shall not try to develop any further arguments at this time. There are things in the bill on which I would like to have commented favourably. Let me pick out just one. If I read the bill correctly —having made a mistake this afternoon, I suppose I had better put in that qualification—I believe that some of the pension provisions for widows are being made retroactive, that there are cases of widows of judges who are now on pensions of a certain amount who will get an increase under the provisions of this bill. I see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) nodding his head vertically—

Mr. Rodriguez: I have also seen him nodding horizontally.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am glad to know I am correct in that. I just hope this is a precedent that will be copied in other legislation.

If I may speak of some who may be known to members of this House, there are widows of former members of parliament who have no pension at all because their husbands left the House before there was a widows' provision. I can also think of widows in other categories, such as widows of retired civil servants, and I hope that the principle of retroactive pension increases for certain widows will be carried forward into other legislation.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I gave you notice, Mr. Speaker, just before five o'clock, of an amendment that I wish to move. I indicated at that time that I copied an expert in this field, my friend and neighbour of only a seat or two away, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence).

Mr. Rodriguez: An expert?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is an expert in that he is the only member of this thirtieth parliament who has moved a reasoned amendment that has been accepted. I hope the House will treat this amendment with the seriousness with which we put it forward. We present it in the context of the economic problems facing Canada today.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin):

That all the words after the word "That" be struck out, and that the following be substituted therefor:

"this House declines to give second reading to Bill C-47 because it fails to limit the salary increases contained therein to the restraint limits proposed by the government, namely that executive and professional salaries should not be increased by more than 12 per cent or $2,400 per year, whichever is the lesser".

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Some mention has been made of the difficulty in putting forward reasoned amendments at the second reading stage. Are there any hon. members who would wish to assist the Chair before we come to a decision on this?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make two specific points about this. In the first place I would draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that this motion indicates that some restraint limits are proposed by the government. My understanding is that the government has not proposed any direct restrictions on salaries and wages. What the government has done is to make a proposal that is open to negotiation, and those negotiations are still going on. The second part of the argument based on that is that these increases are designed to cover a number of years, not just one year.

The second point I wish to make is that if one reads the amendment carefully I believe it can be interpreted as a direct negative against the whole principle of the bill, which is to provide increases for the members of the Canadian judicial system, increases which they have not had over a substantial span of years. Therefore if the hon. member wishes to make that point, it seems to me that the best way he can make it is for him and those who support that point of view to vote against the bill on second reading.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in replying to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Reid) may I refer first to one argument which he used, but which I think he would admit was in terms of substance rather than procedure. He argued that the increase being proposed for the judges is one that covers several years, not just one year. I asserted that in the substantial part of my speech, and pointed out that I was asking for a comparison to be made for four years at $2,400 and the amounts that are in the bill.

However, in terms of procedure I think that it is perhaps important that I read the amendment that was moved on February 6 by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) before I read it, may I point out that two days prior to that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) had moved an amendment which sought to express an opinion both ways. It said that the House was not opposed to the bill in its entirety but it did not want to vote for it because it did not have certain cuts in it. It was ruled out of order on the grounds that one could not have it both ways.

My friend, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, therefore came back on February 6, as recorded in Hansard at page 2977, and moved, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden):

That all the words after "That" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"This House declines to give second reading to Bill C-49 because it fails to provide for a further 5 per cent reduction in personal income tax in 1975 and subsequent taxation years despite unprecedented government revenues and the resulting overtaxation by the government."

I point out that that was a case of the House being asked to decline to proceed with the bill. In my amendment I propose precisely the same thing. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) suggests that I could achieve my object by voting against the bill on second reading. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham could have achieved his object by voting against the bill on second reading. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River suggests that there are no government proposals. Well, that is a debatable point, but I suggest that no exception was taken to the references made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham to unprecedented government revenues and resulting overtaxation by the government. The fact that the government did not agree that it is indulging in overtaxation was not advanced as a procedural argument.

When one puts this in the context of the citations on reasoned amendments, notably citation 382 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which most of us involved in procedural affairs know by heart, which speaks of a resolution declaratory of some principle opposed to a bill, one finds that this amendment states opposition to the bill—it does not ask for it both ways—and it gives reasons for that opposition, our reason being that it fails to limit the salary increases provided therein to a specific set of principles, namely, that the increases should not be more than 12 per cent a year or $2,400 a year, whichever is the lesser. Because my amendment is in accordance with citation 382, because it is in the same form as the only reasoned amendment that has been accepted in this parliament, I hope that it will also be accepted by Your Honour.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I should just like to draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that the very thing which is sought in the amendment could be attempted in the committee and that it is in fact a specific item in relation to a specific matter. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said that he did not even argue against the proposition or the principle that some increases for judges were required, and I would have said that that was the principle involved at this point. The bill includes many other issues and elements, and I take it again that the hon. member who has moved this amendment himself approves a good number of them. He said so in regard to some of them, if not in regard to all of them.

Since this matter could very specifically be dealt with in the committee, it really follows exactly along the lines which the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) discussed earlier in suggesting that he saw this exact distinction of favouring the principle of increases but not necessarily the specifics. It strikes me that we would be, in second reading, dealing clause by clause with every item if we allowed amendments of this sort, because clearly there could be amendments of this sort in regard to every single element and detail of every single clause, and that in itself should be good reason for falling back upon the long standing precedent that reasoned amendments are indeed very difficult to make.

Mr. Benjamin: As a non expert in this matter, Mr. Speaker, may I urge that you make your decision in terms of this being a reasoned amendment and not in terms of what I choose to believe are spurious points raised by my two colleagues on the other side of the House. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has gone to extra lengths and effort to meet decisions of the Chair in arriving at both the wording and content of a reasoned amendment, and it seems to me that is the area upon which Your Honour has to make a decision, and not any other area of the contents of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If there are no others who wish to make a contribution to this very interesting procedural point, I am afraid that I will have to give the matter some thought. I suppose it would be difficult to receive guidance from hon. members at this time as to whether this stage of this bill is likely to conclude this evening.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, it will.

Mr. Speaker: It is likely to conclude this evening, in which case it is certainly desirable, if not absolutely essential, that the period of reservation of the decision not be very long. In any case I would like some time to think about it. I will return to the chair perhaps right after the next speaker, in the hope that I can give a decision.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to enter into arguments regarding the principle of the bill. These arguments have been very clearly, concisely, and learnedly put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). There is a part of this bill which has obviously escaped the attention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and that deals with the provision of salaries which would provide for the appointment of judges for the newly created appellate courts of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. For that reason I do hope that Your Honour will take that matter into consideration before the ruling of the Chair is made.

On April 30 I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) a question—it can be found at page 5332 of Hansard—with respect to the vacancy in the Supreme Court of Newfoundland which was created by the death of a distinguished member of that court in October of last year. My question to the minister was when would that vacancy be filled, and of course the minister replied soon. He went on to explain the reason for the delay, and I quote from Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, part of the delay relates to the reorganization of the courts and the impact this might have upon appointments. However, as usual the search for well qualified persons to receive these appointments is a significant matter and not one taken lightly and adds to the over-all delay.

I understand, although I am not a member of the bar, that the judicial year begins in October and ends in June. Certainly that applies in my province. Consequently, this means that the vacancy in the Supreme Court of Newfoundland has now existed for a full year, certainly for a full judicial year, and probably for a full calendar year when we consider that whenever the minister does get around to making this appointment, it will take the newly appointed judge at least a month or two months to readjust his life in order to be able to accept the position on the Bench. That may not seem like a very serious matter on the surface, but it is a very serious matter, and that is why I feel constrained to intervene in this debate.

Indeed I feel it my solemn duty to intervene in this debate because the seriousness of this matter results from this vacancy. The Newfoundland supreme court, by virtue of the fact that there is no court of appeal, cannot hear appeals. There are only three members left of the four member court, and consequently they cannot hear appeals against the judgment of one of its members, and also, because of the vacancy the court is overworked, and judgments are delayed significantly. We consider that to be a very serious matter.

I understand, and this is a matter of public record, that the law society of Newfoundland has communicated its feelings on this matter to the minister, but now we are being asked to vote for a bill to create a new appellate court for the province of Newfoundland before an appointment is made to fill a vacancy which has existed in the presently constituted court for almost eight months. In this bill we are being asked to provide for salaries for the three new judges who comprise the appellate court while the vacancy in the trial court, which also serves now as the appellate court, still exists.

As one of the representatives of the province of Newfoundland in this House I deem it to be an insult to the prestige of the Law Society of Newfoundland for the Minister of Justice to suggest in this House that he is having difficulty finding a suitable person to fill that vacancy.

Mr. Stanfield: Shame, shame!

Mr. McGrath: I would like to hear the minister's definition of suitable.

Mr. Lang: The best.

Mr. McGrath: I listened very carefully when in his opening statement the minister said that he considers the appointment of judges to be his most important responsibility, and I agree that it is a tremendous responsibility. That is why I find it regrettable that the minister, by his failure to act in filling this vacancy, leaves himself open to the charge that the delay in filling this vacancy is because the minister has confined his choice to members of the bar who are well known supporters of the Liberal Party in Newfoundland.

Mr. Stanfield: Oh, shame!

Mr. McGrath: That, I submit, makes a total farce of this whole so-called consultative process, which the minister went to great pains to tell us about this afternoon.

I would ask the minister, and I will be repeating these questions when the bill gets to committee, has he within the interim of the past seven months or so sought the advice of the attorney general of the province of Newfoundland, the minister of justice of Newfoundland? Has the minister sought the advice of the Law Society of Newfoundland? Did he ask the benchers of the Law Society of Newfoundland to submit names? Did the minister seek the advice of the three remaining judges of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland? Did he ask them to submit names? Did the minister bother to consult with senior members of the bar of Newfoundland on an individual basis to get their advice and recommendations? Or did he, as I suspect and have already submitted, confine his consultations to the Liberal Party of Newfoundland? This is not the first time that has happened in the province.

This is not the first time the government has dragged its heels in filling a vacancy in Newfoundland. The last vacancy lasted for almost seven months. There was a seventh-month delay in filling the last vacancy which occurred when a judge retired. The delay was that long, even though the judge who retired gave the minister three month's notice of his intention to retire so that the minister would have ample time to find a replacement. That judge knew how difficult is the work of the judges, how overworked judges are, and how great is the case load of the court. Having consulted with distinguished members of the Newfoundland bar, I know that judges are overworked. They are so overworked that they hardly have time to research the law to write their judgments. This, of course, is intolerable. It is a situation which no member of the House representing a Newfoundland constituency should tolerate.

Where are the Newfoundland members who support the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang)? Where is the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson)? Surely he has a responsibility here. Where is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Rompkey)? What does he have to say about this? What do the other government supporters from Newfoundland have to say? How can they tolerate this situation? It is not as if they did not know about it. It has been referred to in editorials in St. John's daily papers. It has been referred to in news stories. It has been referred in correspondence between the minister and the Law Society of Newfoundland. This is a most serious situation, yet we are called on to support a bill which will create additional judgeships by virtue of creating extra salaries while this vacancy in Newfoundland is allowed to exist. I submit that this is unfair. The minister is being grossly unfair to Newfoundland.

Let me tell the House about one case I know of concerning the premier of the province. He launched a libel action against an individual and television station in the province. The case has gone to appeal on a point of law and the Premier of Newfoundland has been waiting since March, 1974, for a judgment. Of course, he will not obtain the judgment until the minister appoints a successor judge to fill the existing vacancy.

I am not a member of the bar, but I suggest to the minister that the administration of justice is the responsibility of all members of this House. I further say that justice delayed is justice denied, and justice is being denied to the people of Newfoundland because there are delays in the hearing of appeals and in the handing down of judgments.

I submit the minister has an obligation to tell at least the Newfoundland members of this House when he will fill this vacancy. I hope we will hear an undertaking from the minister before this bill is passed. I, for one, intend to press him for such an undertaking before we allow this bill to leave committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It seems that the House is ready for the question. Mr. Speaker, who is to consider the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who has not returned to the House.

Mr. Reid: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, perhaps since Mr. Speaker has not yet returned with his decision and the present debate seems to have concluded, we could hear the opening speech on the next item of business. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) is in the House. Perhaps if he has finished speaking and Mr. Speaker comes back, we could interrupt the proceedings, hear his decision, and conclude consideration of the present item of business.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, may I make a few comments on this bill which is to affect the reorganization of the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island. I understand that the proposal in this bill which applies to Prince Edward Island meets with the general approval of the law society and legal profession of my province. The arrangement contemplated will be an improvement because, as I understand it, it is an effort to spread the work load between judges of the provincial supreme court and judges of the county court. The net effect will be that the total number of judges in Prince Edward Island will stay the same, but they will all sit in one court, which is an improvement over the present arrangement.

At present there is a vacancy in Prince Edward Island. We need an additional judge. Although the existing vacancy is in the county court, I hope once this bill passes that the effect will be that the provincial supreme court will be immediately brought up to full strength and that we shall see no more vacancies left unfilled for a long time. I presume that the judges now sitting in the county court will be transferred to the newly constituted supreme court, but I have no assurance that that is the case. If it is, some of our judges will be placed in a higher position than they now occupy and, as well, they will feel the benefit of the increase in their general rates of pay.

I hope the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) will act promptly to fill the vacancy which exists in our county court, and which will exist in the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island once this bill passes.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak on this bill. However, having been here since 1972, I cannot help observing that there seems to be some difference in the way this parliament sets about determining wages. For example, I saw how this House settled the recent railroad strike. I saw the kind of settlement that was meted out to our working class people, so that our railroad workers would go back on the rails in what was called an essential service. I heard members on the government and on the Conservative sides say that parliament is not a bargaining group, that we do not bargain, do not negotiate, and that we have to get workers back to work, period. I saw the niggardly amounts handed out in order to get the workers back on the job. I saw how much was awarded when we legislated them back to the rails. I think we gave them something like 12 per cent, and we considered ourselves pretty generous in awarding them that much. We wanted them to go back to work in an essential service.

I have also seen how the members of parliament deal with their own wages. There was certainly nothing niggardly about the way they dealt with their own wages.

We again see this parliament setting a wage for an elitist group in the Canadian society. I should say to my friends that with the number of lawyers in this House there may be some kind of conflict of interest. They are setting the wages so that when they are defeated in the House, they can get appointed to the Bench. There seems to be a bit of featherbedding. When we deal with our own kind, we are pretty generous. There is suddenly no talk about restraint or wage freezes. During the last election the Conservatives ran around the country talking about wage freezes.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a question. One of the most intellectual governments of all time, and no doubt it is intellectual, allegedly anyway, is the government of British Columbia. I would like to ask the hon. member how much it increased salaries for the members of the legislature and for what we called magistrates and it now calls provincial judges? The provincial judges under the government of British Columbia are the highest paid in Canada. They make more money than some of the judges the hon. member is talking about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: I do not belong to the provincial legislature of British Columbia.

Mr. Lawrence: Too bad.

Mr. Rodriguez: I was elected to the Parliament of Canada. However, Dave Barrett, the premier of British Columiba, did not run around the country during his election campaign talking about wage freezes. The New Democratic Party did not talk about wage freezes in the last election. I heard the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) put the Conservative members in their place. Boy, did he ever!

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) is a pretty elitist lawyer. He represents one element in this country, the elitist establishment class. He is building a little nest egg for the future.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Rather than let hon. members engage in dialogue, we should stay on the track of the bill and carry it on to completion.

Mr. Rodriguez: When this House decides wages for its own, it throws restraint out the window. There is no talk about wage controls. One of the arguments put forward is that lawyers in private practice make $100,000 or $150,000 a year. That is only because they are skinning the public.

Mr. Benjamin: Nationalize them.

Mr. Rodriguez: It is only because they have been taking the Canadian public to the cleaners. I have seen the bills that have gone to the finance committee. They guarantee lawyers a job for the rest of their lives. This bill gives them a guaranteed annual income for their retirement years.

The wage proposals in this bill for judges are absolutely inflationary. When the trade unions ask for 16 per cent of 20 per cent, they are told their demands are inflationary. There is nothing more inflationary than the proposals in Bill C-47. It is a travesty on the system.

Hon. members should put their heads in the sand when they talk about wage restraints. Wage restraints start with the leaders, not the followers. It is about time we started restraining spending. The Tories are great ones to talk about restraining spending. When they talk about spending on themselves, or on those in their class, there is no restraint. However, when it comes to the workers on this Hill who do the most menial jobs, they receive poverty wages. I am opposed to this.

I will support the amendment presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It is a very reasonable proposal. It is certainly in line with the kind of role the government is trying to play with regard to the economic situation in this country. I appreciate having had the opportunity to make these remarks this evening.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has proposed an amendment which, as he said in his argument on the procedural point, must, in order to qualify as a reasoned amendment at this stage, add in opposition to the progress of the bill a declaration of some principle contrary to the provisions of the bill or to the principle of the bill.

[Mr. Lawrence.]

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made reference to a previous ruling by the Chair. I would refer him as well to a ruling quoted by the Chair on the same subject, both by the Speaker of the day and reported in the same volume of Votes and Proceedings, that he cited in referring to the ruling of the Deputy Speaker. There is an extensive discussion about the practice in the British parliament which has been taken on here of allowing at the second reading stage, on an amendment at second reading, a declaration to be added to the motion. It discusses the limits that should be put upon such a declaration.

That declaration must clearly have two conditions. First, it must be a declaration of principle. Second, it must be a declaration of principle opposed to the principle of the bill.

Since it would appear at first examination that talking in terms of a certain specific percentage or certain specific dollar increase for judges in a year would scarcely be regarded as a matter of principle, but rather what is a matter of degree, application, or extent of the increase which is contained in the bill, one would have to determine how that becomes a principle as opposed to a specific figure.

It is suggested in the argument that it has become a principle because it is enshrined in some guidelines or proposals put forward by the government. It is not for the Chair to question whether in fact such guidelines or proposals have indeed been put forward. Even if they had, would that make the figures change from being simply figures into being a principle or statement of principle? I rather think it would be most difficult to accept that proposition. I therefore have the greatest difficulty and reservation in finding that the figures of 12 per cent or $2,400 a year have changed from being simply figures, or degrees of increases, into becoming principle.

Second, even if I were to accept the fact, which I do not, that that was a statement of principle of some sort, I would have the greatest difficulty in finding that as being a principle which is totally opposed to the principle of the bill if I should accept, as I think I should, that the basic principle or the primary principle of the bill is that of increasing judges' salaries. In other words, aside entirely from the difficulty of accepting 12 per cent or $2,400 as a statement of principle as opposed to figures, what that says is that the principle of the bill is satisfactory if it were to go only to 12 per cent or $2,400, but the principle of the bill is not satisfactory if it goes beyond that figure.

I would have to find it is not a statement of opposition but of a principle if it is a principle opposed to the principle of the bill, but only opposing the bill conditionally or up to a certain point.

Accordingly, with the deepest of regret, I cannot enlarge or swell the ranks of the members who have had success in the acceptance, at least until this moment, of reasoned second reading amendments and I have to refect the amendment as not being procedurally acceptable.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

● (2050)

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour, please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed, please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Lang) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried. Accordingly, the bill stands referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Bill read the second time and referred to Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

SALARIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE SALARIES OF LIEUTENANT GOVERNORS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council) moved that Bill C-24, to amend the Salaries Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. Speaker: It is the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Filibuster.

Mr. Sharp: —the purpose of this bill is to recognize the continuing importance in our constitutional system of the functions discharged by lieutenant governors of the provinces by raising their salaries to a more appropriate level and at the same time to remove the differences that now prevail.

One of the legacies of history in connection with this ancient and honourable institution is that salaries were permitted to vary from province to province in accordance with such factors as population differences and the burdens of office arising therefrom.

In fact all provinces are equal in a constitutional sense and the functions of a lieutenant governor in one province are, for constitutional purposes, as important as those in any other province; the differences in burdens of office arising from such factors as variations in population should be recognized in other ways.

Lieutenant governors' salaries now range from a high of $20,000 in Ontario and Quebec to a low of $16,000 in Prince Edward Island.

This bill proposes that lieutenant governors' salaries in each of the ten provinces be fixed at $35,000, which appears, in the light of other responsible public functions and the salaries attached to them, to constitute reasonable remuneration, and at the same time applies the principle of uniformity to which I have already referred.

There are also federal grants and allowances provided annually in the estimates under the vote for the Governor General and lieutenant governors. For 1974-75, non-accountable allowances varying from $10,000 to $18,000 are provided for hospitality and travelling expenses within the provincial capital. There is also a fund for travelling by lieutenant governors outside the provincial capitals.

The argument for uniformity does not apply to the same degree to grants and non-accountable allowances. The salaries should be uniform because the salaries are paid in respect of the position, its functions, and the dignity of the office. The grants and allowances can reflect the differing conditions to be found in the various provinces.

Various kinds of support is also provided to lieutenant governors by the provinces. Some provinces provide a residence for the lieutenant governor; others pay the cost of rented accommodation. Lieutenant governors' staffs are provided through the provincial budgets.

While it is not my intention to engage in a dissertation on the constitution, hon. members will be aware that, within the limitations of the constitutional framework, lieutenant governors perform the same functions at the provincial level as the Governor General does at the federal level. The lieutenant governor is the Queen's representative in the province and possesses the same power with regard to provincial legislation as does the Governor General with respect to federal legislation.

In the table of precedence, lieutenant governors of the provinces rank immediately after the federal cabinet. There may be some who in a contemporary political sense might not regard this as a recommendation, but it indicates the importance of the office in our system, an importance that continues undiminished and which, in fact, the government by this bill is supporting by providing more adequate remuneration and widening the area of choice for future appointees.

Hon. members will have noted that another bill, Bill C-23 on the Order Paper, proposes a plan for superannuation of lieutenant governors which is another move in the same direction, making it possible for those of moderate means to accept appointment as lieutenant governor.

● (2140)

It is my hope and that of the government that parliament will give prompt approval to this legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, if I—

Mr. Stanfield: We are recognizing your seniority tonight.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If I seem stunned and speechless for the moment, it is because I am aware of the rule which provides that the first member of the opposition replying to a minister moving a government order is not limited to 40 minutes. Since no member of the official opposition chose to take the floor, that gives me unlimited time.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Stanfield: We felt you needed it.

Mr. Muir: God forbid, Stanley.

Mr. Benjamin: You fellows can all go home.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am waiting for an invitation to use unlimited time, which would give me 17 minutes tonight and then tomorrow morning, but the invitations do not seem to be as forthcoming as I thought, although there is one quiet voice from the other side.

There is no question but that we in this country like our system under which the head of the country and the head of the government in each province is a person above politics. We respect, not only because we are supposed to but from sincerity, the position of the Crown as represented by Her Majesty the Queen, and also the position of those who represent her as Governor General of Canada and as lieutenant governors of the provinces. We share in that respect, and we agree that the lieutenant governors as well as the Governor General should be provided with the means necessary to fulfill their functions with dignity and respect.

I think it can also be argued that the salaries these persons now receive—you will notice, Madam Speaker, that I did not say gentlemen because at least one of them is the distinguished lieutenant governor of Ontario—certainly do not seem excessive. The lieutenant governor of Quebec and the lieutenant governor of Ontario receive $20,000 per year as salary. The lieutenant governors of seven other provinces receive $18,000, and the lieutenant governor of the Province of Prince Edward Island receives $16,000.

Even as one who has been taking a pretty firm stand against increases in this time when we are supposed to be exercising restraint, I certainly could not argue against a modest increase in these salaries. Even so, it does seem to me that those who occupy these important positions should be regarded as Canadians like the rest of us and should be invited to share in the effort to exercise some restraint. When an increase from $20,000 to $35,000 for the lieutenant governors of two provinces is proposed, that is an increase of 75 per cent. I made one mistake this afternoon, but I am not making any mistakes tonight.

Mr. Baldwin: You've still got 15 minutes, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When an increase for seven lieutenant governors from $18,000 to $35,000 is proposed, that is an increase of 94 per cent. Not bad! In the case of Prince Edward Island, that delightful place we would all like to go to, the increase is from $16,000 to $35,000, an increase of 118 per cent.

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): That is where I would like to come from.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke), says that is where he would like to come from. Not many have come from there, but those are the facts. These are the percentages involved in this bill. Even though I am not going to move another amendment or divide the House on this bill, it seems to me that it is appropriate for these words to be said. Restraint has been preached all over the place. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has a paper, the paternity of which he sometimes admits but sometimes denies, which says that Canadians should not receive an increase of more than 12 per cent or $2,400.

Mr. Sharp: Per year, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Granted, but how many years is it since these people received a raise?

Mr. Sharp: It was in 1962 or 1963, 12 years ago.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is true that per year they are entitled to $2,400 but those now in office have been there only a few years, and there are other increases, both in this bill and in the other bill, for expenses, so that their positions are being improved, and all told I think it is a pretty good deal for these ten Canadians. I could wish that they would be making the appeal to be part of the Canadian community generally which is accepting the fact that restraints are necessary, but I have not heard any such appeal from any of these ten persons. So I suppose they want these increases, and apparently this House is prepared to go along.

I just wonder where all this ends. Hon. members raised their own pay substantially, we raised the pay of the Senators substantially, we increased the pay of the cabinet ministers and parliamentary secretaries, and we provided for 7 per cent compounded increases starting January, 1976.

Mr. Benjamin: It ends when we get to the poor and the pensioners.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This House gave the judges a pretty good deal in the bill that was passed a few moments ago. I suppose that before long there will probably be a report from a special committee about the salaries of deputy ministers, assistant deputy ministers and those who are receiving $40,000 and $50,000, making an appeal that they have to have something to meet the cost of living. In the meantime ordinary Canadians are being told they must get along on an increase of 12 per cent per year. Pensioners are being told that all they can receive is the actual cost of living, always in arrears.

This thing is out of joint, Madam Speaker. I welcome the fact that in the previous bill there are retroactive increases in pensions to widows of judges. I welcome the fact that in this bill there are some improvements in pensions. I hope before we recess at the end of June there will be some improvements for pensioners generally, and the particular appeal I make right now is to the government. I could make it to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), but he does not happen to be here tonight. The appeal is that with these improvements we are making for the retirement years of lieutenant governors and the retirement years of their survivors, if they leave any, we ought to do better for ordinary spouses between 60 and 65 and not just grant a pension under a means test.

We ought to realize that the age provisions in these bills about pensions are much more generous than the age provisions generally, and I would say that in the face of all this if the government brings in a bill amending the Old Age Security Act which provides pensions for spouses between 60 and 65 only where the other spouse is over 65 and only under a means test, that will be an insult.

I confess that it is difficult to make the kind of speech that my hon. friend from Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) would probably make if he were not in a committee which I understand will sit to all hours. We are talking about persons for whom we have particular respect because they represent the Crown, because they represent Canada and because they represent a form of government at the head of which is someone who is above partisan politics. But I still feel that it is a strange performance we have gone through in this House in 1975. Despite all the economic trouble we are in, despite all the preaching we hear about restraint, this House seems to find it easy to grant substantial increases in the pay of members of parliament, senators, cabinet ministers, judges and lieutenant governors. I hope that at some point we will start doing something substantial, something meaningful for ordinary Canadians.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I hope, too, that the country will start to do something about inflation. I sat in the House and listened to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—

Mr. Benjamin: All day.

Mr. Stanfield: All day, all year—talk about restraint, but I have yet to hear the hon. gentleman give much support to any comprehensive program of restraint which has been put forward. I find myself in the position of having to deal with particular situations—members of parliament are one, judges another, and lieutenants governor still another—which have resulted from cumulative inflationary pressures bringing about increases in the cost of living in the past several years. I agree that these are particular instances. There are lots of others with which we are not dealing. A great many people of modest circumstance have been robbed, robbed of their savings.

Mr. Benjamin: And you voted for more pay for well-off people.

Mr. Stanfield: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Benjamin: You just finished voting in support of an increase for people who are already well off.

Mr. Stanfield: I will agree to the judges bill going to committee for consideration.

Mr. Benjamin: That is a tough deal for those already getting $45,000. Big deal!

Mr. Stanfield: If the hon. gentleman wants to make a speech, he should make it.

Mr. Benjamin: I will be glad to.

Mr. Stanfield: As far as the bill for lieutenant governors is concerned, I am prepared to see it go to committee. There has not been an increase since 1963. Whether the sum of $35,000 should be contemplated is another matter, but I have no hesitation in supporting sending the bill to committee. By so doing I do not pretend for one moment that we are doing a systematic job, or bringing anything like comprehensive justice to the people of Canada. Frankly I do not see any sign of determination in this House or in the country for bringing about such justice. My hon. friends to my left speak about restraint. I should like to see them support some program of restraint and express to the House what it is. I fought hard for a program of restraint, and I am still prepared to do so.

All kinds of anomalies and injustices are increasing from day to day and from month to month because of what has been going on. The longer we have rates of inflation of 8 per cent, 10 per cent or 12 per cent a year, the more the injustice will increase and the greater will be the disparity between the relatively poor and the relatively well-to-do. If inflation continues, certainly the injustice which will be inflicted on society will increase. But we will not create justice for the relatively poor and hard pressed who are suffering from inflation by taking it out on the judges or the lieutenant governors. Let the committee determine what is appropriate. We can amend the bills when they come back, for that matter.

If we are going to attack inflation, let us attack inflation; let us not just make—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Careful!

Mr. Stanfield: —gestures in the House, as my hon. friends are doing.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, when I made a few interjections during the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) he invited me to say a few words. I said I would be glad to.

An hon. Member: By way of apology?

Mr. Benjamin: No, they are not by way of apology in any way, shape or form. I find it difficult to accept the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition about selecting or picking of judges, or selecting lieutenant governors. I remind the Leader of the Opposition, and all other members, that the ones we are selecting are already paid $19,000, $20,000, $35,000 or $45,000 a year. If we are going to have restraint it would seem to me that the people earning that kind of income should be the first ones to exercise it. They should be the ones we should select first for restraint. I do not intend to be party to raising the incomes of 100 people, 200 people, or even ten people, from $45,000 to $60,000 a year. I suggest that you do pick first on people in such categories—you start with them if you want to bring in restraint.

I do not think any of my colleagues in this House want, any more than I do, to face a $9,000, or $11,000 or $12,000 a year steelworker in Regina, or a $122 a month old age pensioner, and ask him to show restraint and not accept a larger increase than the government is suggesting, assuming he will be offered an increase. You cannot have it both ways, Madam Speaker. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is not going through some sort of empty exercise. He has voted for restraint a number of times, more often then I have, and more often, I suspect, than any other member. He has shown leadership and set an example.

Surely it is up to members of parliament, judges, lieutenant governors and others in a similar position to set the example and lead the way when the country is in economic difficulty. Surely that is the issue. This has nothing to do with taking it out on judges or lieutenant governors, or even members of parliament. Surely the process of restraint must start somewhere. If you are going to pick on anybody, if you want to limit anybody's income, you should pick on the people who can most afford it. Surely that is where the error of our ways lies. We made a mistake in bringing in Bill C-44, and we are making another one with Bill C-47.

You do not really expect the small businessman, the wage earner or the old age pensioner to pay very much attention to us, to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), or to anybody else in the months ahead when we run around talking about restraint and protecting and preserving our economy and our position, costs, and prices in the international market.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—FERTILIZER—JUSTIFICATION OF PRICE INCREASES

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the adjournment debate on the matter of inaction on the part of the government to provide a satisfactory answer, or even any explanation as to the drastically increased prices of fertilizer. My colleagues, the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) and the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis), over the past two weeks have raised questions on the subject, but no reasonable explanation has yet been given.

The minister, when addressing the Canadian Fertilizer Institute in Ottawa on March 6, 1975, took a hard line when levelling certain warnings in the direction of the industry and its activities.

When questioned in the House by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot the following day, March 7, the minister indicated that he would not be making a statement on the matter, but made some reference to the facts and figures prepared by the efficiency experts in the department. He also expressed concern about the future of food production if fertilizer were not cheaply available.

Fertilizer prices, in many cases, have doubled during the past two years. In many cases they have increased from 30 to 40 per cent from the spring of 1974 to the spring of 1975. Some examples for the record, Mr. Speaker, of commonly used varieties, f.o.b. the plant are 6-18-24 from $120 to $160, an increase of $40 a ton; 10-10-10 from $100 to $135, an increase of $35 a ton; 15-15-15 from $125 to $175, an increase of $50 a ton; ammonium nitrate from $142 to $185 a ton, an increase of $43, and anhydrous ammonia ranged around $260 a ton.

Why are there these drastic price increases, Mr. Speaker, particularly when shortages do not appear to be any problem? Dealers in my area indicate that supplies are quite adequate.

The minister stated on April 15, 1975, as reported at page 4810 of Hansard, and I quote:

> We have contacted all the provincial departments of agriculture and our surveys show, as they have in the past, that there will be adequate supplies. In some areas there may even be an oversupply of some varieties of fertilizer.

On March 20 I asked the minister, in view of the fact that the Canadian Fertilizer Institute would not issue a detailed report justifying the rapid increases in price, what action if any he intended to take. The minister indicated that some action had already been taken, that investigations were being conducted under the Combines Investigation Act.

The following day, March 21, the minister took the position that, in the absence of legislation to hold down or roll back prices, the government would use whatever legislation it presently had, and in co-operation with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would do what could be done. He said that "We are not at all happy with what they are doing."

I want to assure the minister that I am not happy with this situation, nor are the agricultural producers who purchase large volumes of fertilizer to obtain maximum crop yields. In view of other rising production costs, top yields are absolutely essential to meet expenses and to provide even a narrow margin of profit.

If current prices hold, or even worse, escalate, many producers will be forced to cut back and smaller yields will result. It is not only a serious domestic problem, but also an international one.

It is estimated that one billion people, or one quarter of the world's population, already depend on extra crop yields produced by the use of fertilizer for their food requirements. It is reasonable to suggest that the great majority of the extra two billion people to be fed in the next quarter century will depend on the use of this important product.

Most underdeveloped countries found it impossible to purchase their badly needed fertilizer requirements in the past. Thus it is obvious that their present and future difficulties are most serious.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, on May 12 I asked the minister in view of the fact that supplies seemed to be adequate, was he satisfied that price increases were justified. He replied to the effect that, according to his information, prices were decreasing. I rechecked with the largest supplier of fertilizer in my constituency, Mr. Speaker, only to find that the prices quoted earlier were still in effect. One other dealer indicated to me that an attempt was to be made to move out his entire inventory if possible and to reduce the price by a whopping 2 per cent. In view of the 30 to 40 per cent increases, I would hope that no one would express any degree of satisfaction about a decrease of 2 per cent.

The producers are concerned, Mr. Speaker. They have every reason to feel apprehensive and they are certainly entitled to an explanation. I trust that the hon. member, in his reply, will have some helpful and useful information. I trust he will offer some worthwhile explanation and not select isolated cases reflecting only marginal price increases or "small decreases on some rarely used varieties."

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Thank you, Madam Speaker. In respect to the question raised by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise), I wish to make one point first of all. Prior to the 1974 election the government introduced into the House of Commons an anti-profiteering bill which would have given it the legislative authority to take action in cases of unwarranted price increases. It is not this party which is responsible for the fact that we have no legislative authority to take the kind of action which the hon. member now seems to think is advisable.

As the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) stated when replying to the question of the hon. member for Elgin on Monday, there has been some decline in prices of some brands of fertilizer. In general, however, prices have not declined substantially and the minister is far from satisfied with the performance of the industry to date, particularly with regard to price differentials between east and west.

As you are no doubt aware, Madam Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture met representatives of the basic fertilizer manufacturers recently and warned them that they could find themselves over supplied as farmers—particularly in eastern Canada—were reluctant to pay the high prices being asked for fertilizer.

The Minister of Agriculture—indeed the whole government—is adamant that unwarranted profits by fertilizer manufacturers will not be tolerated. Legislation is being prepared by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to deal with unjustified price increases when such increases can be clearly identified. With regard to fertilizer, the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs are co-operating in an on-going investigation of the fertilizer industry.

It should be pointed out in fairness to the industry that fertilizer prices in Canada are still substantially below world prices. Recent information indicates that there is some build up of world supplies of fertilizers and this will no doubt have a depressing effect on prices.

Although the minister has not received the co-operation he had hoped for on prices, he is pleased that the industry kept its promise to ensure adequate supplies for Canadian agriculture. In the face of reluctance on the part of manufacturers of fertilizer and those in the manufacturing area to take seriously the warnings of the Minister of Agriculture, he is attempting to arrange a further meeting with representatives of the industry. This will take place very shortly. At that time we shall fully consider fertilizer pricing policy. The minister is optimistic that this meeting will provide tangible results, as several companies have indicated, since the minister's address to the Canadian Fertilizer Institute, a willingness to discuss this matter.

HOUSING—NATIVE HOUSING PROGRAM—REASON FOR REDUCTION IN NUMBER OF STARTS—ABILITY OF NATIVE PEOPLE TO AFFORD MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to pursue some questions I directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) today regarding native housing in this country. I hope the minister will take this opportunity to elaborate upon an article that appeared in the Toronto Star of May 14, 1975. The article referred to a confidential document prepared by the federal cabinet.

I have raised this topic in the House before, but once again I should like to put on record the drastic housing situation in this country, and more particularly in the Northwest Territories. As a matter of fact in a speech of mine on January 27, reported in Hansard at pages 2144 to 2146, I described the housing situation in the Northwest Territories as a disaster. There is some kind of program to ship up north prefab houses which are really inadequate, most of which can only be described as death traps and which indeed have been working in that fashion.

I referred in my speech of January 27 to the possibility of implementing a housing program in the Northwest Territories making use of local materials, such as logs, which would help many people there who have no jobs. It would also certainly help alleviate the housing problem. I have received some comments from across the country which were quite favourable to the idea, and I hope that the minister has also received some comments in this regard.

One of the main objects and purposes of a housing program should be—indeed, must be if it is to meet with any measure of success—to find some way of adequately sheltering all families and individuals. This is, indeed, a basic human need. I do not think we can afford to go on much longer without some good programs to alleviate the very bad housing conditions.

The price we are paying for this situation, both socially and with lives, is simply far too high, and the government should give it very high priority. I was pleased to see, according to the article in the Toronto Star of January 14, some points for which I think the government can take credit, such as an admission that the programs that have been tried have failed. In this event I should like to know what has happened to the money that was put into these programs. I think a lot of money was spent. I also hope the government has learned that it should consult the people more, particularly those people the programs are designed to help.

Another point for which I think the government can take some credit is that it is considering spending a realistic amount on the programs referred to in the article. I understand that the government is going to consult with the people the programs will serve.

Other questions I should like to ask the minister in regard to this document is whether it does in fact exist, will it be made public, what is going to happen to it, and does it include a program for the Northwest Territories? This is one area of Canada that is really in desperate need of housing. If the north is not included, then the people of the north are not going to be very happy. Any step to remove poverty in the smaller villages down the Mackenzie valley, in the eastern Arctic, and indeed in the smaller villages and reserves across the country would be a good move indeed.

The article also refers to mortgage rates that people would have to pay, and I think this is something that should receive serious consideration. There are large numbers of people who presently have poor housing and would be unable to pay a mortgage rate of even one per cent.

These are the points that I wanted to make, Madam Speaker. I wish the minister would elaborate a little more on the question I raised earlier today, as well as elaborate on the document referred to in this newspaper article.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Madam Speaker, I appreciate that the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) is referring to a document which is alleged to have been leaked from another department. I think he can appreciate, therefore, that it would be inappropriate for me to comment on an alleged leak of an alleged document.

Having said that, I think we are reflecting the very deep concern which the hon. member shares, and I can speak only on behalf of my own area of responsibility, that is, CMHC, which deals with Métis and non-status Indians living off reserves. The matter of non-status Indians and those on the reserves is, of course, quite a different thing. If I can respond in that context I shall be pleased to do so.

I am deeply disturbed to hear prefabs referred to as death traps. I am interested to hear about the interest in local materials such as logs. This is an avenue we are pursuing in the areas of my responsibility. I am rather embarrassed after all these years that we still have to stand and debate these things in the House of Commons of Canada. It is an indication that something is wrong somewhere.

We are trying to correct the situation. In my own ministry for 1975 we have an allocation of $5.7 million to assist associations and many non-status Indians in the field of housing. We have established a cadre within the corporation to train native people in skills, including administrative skills, in order that they will be able to take advantage of the program and to administer housing for themselves. This is still a tortuous process at times, and the need for coordination and for giving assistance to the native people to get them started, often under extremely difficult conditions, is highly appreciated.

In our own CMHC rural and native housing program we still have a target of some 50,000 new and rehabilitated homes in five years. This program is intended to improve housing conditions for a number of non-status Indians living off the reserves and for other residents of rural Canada as well. We expect that the majority of this will be for the native people.

Mr. Firth: What about the north?

Mr. Danson: These programs are available throughout the country, and I think that it especially affects the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. This is an area with which my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan) is concerned, and in which we are happily involved and support with our facilities. We also include those people in the north as well. They are Canadians and—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please.

BANKRUPTCY—SOCIETY FOR THE STUDY OF THE HERITAGE OF CANADA—REASON FOR PERMITTING CLOSE ALIGNMENT WITH OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, I do not know to whom I am addressing my remarks this evening, apart from the Chair. I should like to elaborate in respect of a Standing Order 43 motion to which I addressed myself this afternoon when I asked for a public inquiry into the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada. I asked why this apparent massive fraud by the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada was allowed to align itself with the Secretary of State's office in regard to grants, by the use of deceptive wording and stationery which would lead to the deception of all Canadians who were the victims of this slick material in that they would believe that what they were reading was in fact information provided by an agency of this government.

I asked why the Secretary of State's office was not doing any monitoring and, finally and most important, why the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) went to this society instead of the society going to the Secretary of State. I consider this highly irregular and highly unusual. It is certainly not the Secretary of State's function to go to a society such as this and suggest that they should go into business, with the department supplying bucks. That smacks to me of something very wrong.

Finally why did the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) reject a grant application for a massive sum of money to bail out this company from bankruptcy last fall and then, as recently as six weeks ago, indicate to the company that they were very seriously considering re-funding them when they were already in a state of insolvency? Not only that, but the Secretary of State knew their financial status at that time. He knew it last fall, and he knew it six weeks ago when they were ready to enter the bankruptcy procedure.

Now I ask, Madam Speaker, where is the protection for the young people who were shoved across Canada by this group? What about the students from Rossland, British Columbia, or the students from Halifax, or the students from Vancouver? What protection have these students, who put money in and never got it back? Who is responsible for this? What kind of a program, and what kind of a situation are being allowed to continue without an investigation?

It would be fine if it were just the office of the Secretary of State involved, but we have the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford) giving this society a tax certificate as a charitable organization. Where did that money go? The Minister of National Revenue handed out the certificates to 35 organizations and I bet he could not be sure of 60 per cent of them.

Why has the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan) indicated that they have not given $48,000 to the society? I suggest the minister should state where that $48,000 went. I suggest that probably it went to Alberta. It probably went to the Indians and was turned over to the society for its use and subsequent abuse.

Where has the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) been through all this charade that has been going on for three or four years? What about the complaints he has received? Has he ignored them?

Someone may think there is no need for a public inquiry because it is just a little thing, such as the department for which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) is responsible passing out free passes at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada so that these people can go across the continent and can fly to Europe 20 times a year, as was stated to me during the bankruptcy proceedings. It is not a matter of just one or two, but several of them. They do not go by economy class. Hell no; they have to go first class as often as they can.

Can you indicate to me, Madam Speaker, that there should not be a public inquiry when we wonder where the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was, what answer the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has in respect of the $48,000, what answer the Secretary of State has in respect of his actions, and what answer the Minister of National Revenue has? Do you think this is not a matter of importance to the people of Canada? If so, then I must disagree.

Finally, I say that the Secretary of State is responsible to Carleton University and to Ottawa University which were conned into $50,000 plus of expenses because they thought it was a government agency. If we take a look at the list of the Heritage Society and its advisory board we see that it reads like a Who's Who in Canada. What is going to be done about these fine names? I challenge the government to do something concrete and definite.

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I am especially honoured to be able to speak tonight since the hon. member mentioned at least five ministers. Unfortunately I do not have the answers that he is requesting.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) is presently looking into the questions asked in the House yesterday by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) and today by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) in relation to his department's contact with the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada. When the most recent information has been gathered these questions will be answered. As indicated in his response to the hon. member today, the Secretary of State has not obtained sufficient information to date, and will respond to him fully at the first opportunity.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.26 p.m.

PROPOSED INCREASE IN PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43. It is one which I believe is urgent, having in mind the desire for unity in this country and for good morale on the part of our people. In view of the fact we have been witnessing massive pay increases for members of parliament, senators, cabinet ministers, lieutenant governors, judges—there seems to be no restraint—I ask the House to be fair. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman):

That the government be asked to introduce forthwith a bill to increase the basic pension under the Old Age Security Act to $300 a month and to provide corresponding increases in veterans pensions and allowances and in all social benefits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Even with the leniency now allowed to proposed motions under Standing Order 43 according to the new format, I have to confess that the subject matter raised by the hon. member, although it is tied to certain legislation before the House, still relates to a matter of continuing concern rather than to a matter of pressing necessity. I do not think it should be put.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Are there citations which Your Honour could give to the House to support this ruling, in the light of other motions under Standing Order 43 which have been put to the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra.

AIRPORTS

SUGGESTED INQUIRY INTO LACK OF SECURITY CHECKS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In spite of questions raised by me in this House on April 15 and May 12 concerning the lack of protection accorded passengers by security procedures at Canadian airports, yet another illustration of this failure has occurred, namely, the passage through a security check at Toronto International Airport last night of hand baggage containing a high-powered rifle complete with ammunition.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies):

That the government order an immediate inquiry into the procedures followed in the attempted screening of passengers and their hand baggage prior to boarding aircraft in Canada, and into the reasoning which results in there being no security check whatever in many airports in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43; it cannot be put to the House in the absence of unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSAL THAT DEPARTMENT PURCHASE DE HAVILLAND DASH SEVEN AIRCRAFT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Having regard to the fact that an export market is obtainable for the de Havilland DASH 7 because of its abilities in sovereignty patrol, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That the Minister of National Defence immediately consider ordering these airplanes for our shoreline patrol thereby opening the market and providing capital and jobs for Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and unanimous consent is required before it can be put. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OUTLINING REASON FOR RECOGNITION OF NEW REGIME IN SOUTH VIET NAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I rise to propose a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It arises out of the provocative action on the part of the government in hastily extending diplomatic recognition to the Provisional Revolutionary Government of South Viet Nam, a move out of step with current attitudes in nations with which we conduct over 90 per cent of our trade, and coinciding with the news of the role played by North Viet Nam in the overthrow of the government of South Viet Nam—a truly reckless and unnecessary move in a period of mounting trade tensions and protectionist sentiments. I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

That the House request an immediate statement on motions setting out the motivation behind this unfortunate move and explaining whether the government plans to extend any assistance to this provisional government whose representatives come from Hanoi, not Saigon; and that there be full debate on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43. It cannot be presented in the absence of unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MINISTER'S VIEW OF SPENDING INCREASES OF GOVERNMENT—POSSIBILITY OF REVISION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance who seems to have been behaving yesterday as just one of the boys. He is reported as having said this: "I am the first to say that if we are going to have any success in getting labour and business to agree to voluntary restraints, we have to set a better example in Ottawa". Is it the view of the minister that the spending increases for the 1975-76 fiscal year are excessive and inappropriate? If so, as a member of the government and not as a visitor to the Welland Chamber of Commerce, is the minister going to do something about it?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, obviously governments at all levels will have to participate in any program to moderate increases.

Mr. Gillies: Including the federal?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Including the federal government. The federal government will have to exercise, in some respects an even tougher review of its spending priorities in the reconciliation of a good series of legitimate socially directed programs and legitimate infrastructure programs. These are good in themselves, but we have to orchestrate them within the ability of the economy to digest them.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I took it that the minister said that "we would have to set a better example". Therefore, I ask the minister whether under his interpretation, which I think is very favourable to him, he envisages a 15 per cent increase in expenditures this year as opposed to last year. That was worked out when he foresaw a growth of about 4 per cent in the economy. Now, he foresees no growth in the Canadian economy during the period in question. Is it his intention to revise his spending estimates accordingly?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is correct in his analysis of the growth figures, but of course the spending estimates also depend on the forecasts of inflation which were set forth at the time, and how those spending estimates have been affected by inflation. The government has been affected in its own costs by inflation, as has every other sector of the economy.

Mr. Stanfield: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I do not know whether the minister means to indicate that inflation is even worse than he anticipated when he presented his budget, but may I ask him whether, in order to save time for everybody and prevent a lot of confusion, in the case of future tours the minister will make it clear to the audience that he is addressing whether he is performing as a minister of the Crown or just as an interested outside observer of bloodshed around the cabinet table?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am performing as a minister of the Crown. If the hon. gentleman would like to go on tour and have this thing out in every chamber of commerce and union hall in the country, I would be glad to accompany him.

Mr. Nowlan: We were doing that a year ago.

INCREASE IN SPENDING ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE AS EXAMPLE FOR BUSINESS AND LABOUR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's statement yesterday, referred to by my leader, that the federal government's lack of spending restraints has set a poor example for business and labour, would the minister indicate whether the two year 40 per cent rise in his own department's administration spending has, in particular, set a poor example for labour and business?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, those were not my words. My words were more closely identified with the question put by the Leader of the Opposition.

POSSIBILITY OF PROCLAMATION OF PART II OF ACT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A further supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's statement that he would like to see more foreign investment in Canada, would he indicate whether, with this attitude in the Department of Finance, it is unlikely that the remainder of the Foreign Investment Review Act will be proclaimed in the immediate future?

Mr. Woolliams: Good question.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman has the support of his colleague from Calgary North, then we are in trouble.

Mr. Stanfield: You are in trouble anyway, John.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, what I said was that in light of the current account deficit project for this year of between $4 billion and $5 billion, obviously the climate for foreign investment in this country was more accessible.

THE BUDGET

DATE OF PRESENTATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, there being only nine sitting days left in May, I wonder if the minister could now tell the House the date of his budget? Does he still hope it will be in May, or does he now expect it to be in June?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to have further consultation with the Prime Minister, the House leader and my colleague and announce a date next week.

An hon. Member: It is in God's hands.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—MINISTER'S POSITION ON REASON FOR HIGH LEVEL

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to the statement the Minister of Finance made in Welland, that we cannot pull out of our unemployment situation in Canada unless the economy improves in other countries. Is the minister now returning to the old position he has been advocating over the years, that we cannot do very much in this country until there is improvement in the economies of other countries and, if so, is he returning to that position because he has failed to reach a consensus and has given up on the idea of bringing in a wage and price restraint program?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. What I said was that since a good deal of our unemployment can be traced to a falling off of exports, particularly because of the recessionary situation in the United States, Europe and Japan, our three largest areas for exports, that employment can only be regenerated as our exports are restored, and our exports can only be restored as those economies come back.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, how does the minister reconcile that position with his statement that we have high unemployment in Canada because of high wage settlements?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is not it at all, Mr. Speaker. What I said was that if current trends of rising unit costs of production continue at the present ratio with those in the United States then these cost trends would put us in a position where we are non-competitive, and that would have unemployment consequences. What the hon. gentleman is doing is trying to compare a statement of fact in respect of the present situation with a projection in the future as to what would happen if current trends continue.

INQUIRY AS TO STUDY OF COST TRENDS IN INDUSTRY

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, has the minister carried out studies which enabled him to substantiate the statement he has made in the House today about cost trends and, if he has, will he indicate to the House which industries are in danger of pricing themselves out of the market?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I would be prepared to go into more detail on an appropriate occasion, Mr. Speaker, yes.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED LIMITATION OF SALARY INCREASES TO TWELVE PER CENT

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance.

In the event that labour and business refuse his proposal to limit salary increases to 12 per cent, did the Minister of Finance consider the possibility, on the one hand, of reducing taxes in his coming budget to stimulate the national economy, and on the other hand, of levying a special tax on the portion of the increase exceeding the 12 per cent he is proposing now, such a tax acting as an offsetting factor of the increase which might be imposed to the Canadian economy by industry and labour?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the representations made by all hon. members, especially the most intelligent ones must always be taken into consideration.

OLYMPIC GAMES

SUGGESTED MEASURES BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO ENSURE SUCCESS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the uncertain situation surrounding the preparation of the 1976 Olympic Games in Montreal and in view of the fact that the very reputation of the whole country is at stake, would he tell the House whether he intends to take special action in order to ensure the success of this project?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to say previously that the federal government would be willing under the present circumstances to support the Quebec government should the latter need it; however, as I have indicated yesterday, we feel that the Quebec government is now taking the necessary steps to solve the matter and, for the time being, I have no other special measure to announce.

SOCIETY FOR STUDY OF HERITAGE OF CANADA

FUNDING OF SOCIETY BY DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Could the minister advise the House if the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada was approached by his department with an offer of funding or assistance of any kind?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will be giving a rather complete answer on Tuesday concerning the involvement of my department with the society. We did fund, I think, three senior citizen projects. The details of this I will provide the House on Tuesday.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister, in making his statement which I hope will be comprehensive, will include an answer to the specific question I asked which is whether his department approached the society with regard to an offer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of National Revenue who seems to have fled the scene. With your permission, perhaps I might file a caveat to ask it when he returns if I could be recognized then.

REASON DEPARTMENT CONTINUED TO DEAL WITH SOCIETY IN LIGHT OF WARNINGS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister if in the course of the statement he will give on Tuesday he intends to tell the House why his department continued to deal with the society when as long ago as December 1974 the Government of Ontario was warning its school boards that they ought not to deal with this organization in view of the precarious position in which it found itself. Will he be dealing with this in the course of his statement?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think such questions really anticipate what the minister has already said, that he will be making a statement on Tuesday, and in light of our new procedure which allows for questions after the statement, perhaps questions on this subject ought to be held until the minister makes his statement on Tuesday.

INFLATION—PERCENTAGE CAUSED BY WORLDWIDE FACTORS AS COMPARED TO DOMESTIC FACTORS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I wonder whether the minister could inform the House what percentage of inflation in this country is caused by the worldwide factors to which he just referred and what percentage does the feel is caused due to domestic factors to which his consensus program is aimed?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to be precise about that because of the factors involved. Underlying the hon. gentleman's question is the assumption that the inflationary situation is the same in 1975 as it was in 1973 and 1974. In 1973 and 1974 the fundamental thrust of inflation was a worldwide imbalance in supply and demand reflected in a doubling of commodity prices, an extreme rise in food prices, and a quadrupling of the structural price of oil. In 1975, beginning in the last quarter of 1974, the thrust now is on the cost-push side.

Mr. Gillies: It is precisely the same.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It is not precisely the same, Mr. Speaker. The remedy suggested by the hon. member for Don Valley, accepted by his leader in 1973-74, was the wrong remedy at the wrong time, recognizing the wrong factors.

INFLATION—REQUEST FOR OUTLINE OF MEASURES TO CURTAIL GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister has admitted that probably the largest single factor in increasing inflation in this country is out of control government expenditures at all levels, including the federal government, I wonder whether he could specifically indicate what steps he is taking to encourage other levels of government to restrain themselves, and also could he specifically outline now, or on a statement on motions if he prefers, what specific steps the federal government is taking to curtail its expenditures?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall saying what the hon. gentleman has incorporated in his preamble.

HOUSING

REASON FOR CANCELLATION OF MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Has the meeting scheduled for May 21 with the provincial ministers of housing been cancelled and, if so, why?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no meeting was scheduled. A date was discussed among several of the housing ministers and myself. It is unlikely that I will be able to make it on that date, but I am trying to arrange a date that would be satisfactory to all of us.

EFFECT OF POSTPONEMENT OF DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCIAL HOUSING MINISTERS ON DATE OF PRESENTATION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. Given that the Minister of Finance has stated that the whole range of federal initiatives in housing is being reviewed for the forthcoming budget, would the minister say if the postponement of discussions regarding housing with the provincial ministers of housing means a further delay in the presentation of the budget?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I have enough trouble scheduling meetings with my colleagues in the provinces without being concerned in every detail with how my own colleagues are able to achieve it.

An hon. Member: You don't count, Barney.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Am I to take it from the minister's reply that the proposals to the provincial governments regarding shelter, to which he referred in the House on Wednesday, are not to be part of the consensus talks or the budget proposals and that stimulation of the housing sector remains a very low priority with this government?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, Mr. Speaker, the hon. lady should not assume that.

GOVERNMENT VIEW OF PROGRESS IN LIMITING FOREIGN CONTROL OF ECONOMY—FUTURE INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO ACT

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that after two years of operation the Foreign Investment Review Act has reduced the proportion of foreign controlled business by only one per cent of the combined book value of all business, is the government satisfied that sufficient progress has been made in limiting foreign control of the Canadian economy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is only referring to one area in which the government is acting to increase domestic control of our economic environment, and I think he should consider the total picture before making an assessment.

Mr. Symes: In view of the statements made yesterday by the Minister of Finance in Welland that he would like to see more foreign investment in Canada, is it now government policy to downplay the aim and intent of the Foreign Investment Review Act?

Mr. Trudeau: I am not sure whether the minister was accurately quoted, but we have never said in this party that we were opposed to foreign investment. What we have said is that we want to make sure that it operates for the significant benefit of Canadians, and in this sense we continue to allow foreign investment in this country.

Mr. Symes: The Minister of Finance stated yesterday that the government is also reviewing all statutes and policies affecting foreign investment in Canada. Is this the reason that Part Two of the Foreign Investment Review Act dealing with new foreign business and foreign business expansion in unrelated fields has not yet been proclaimed as law?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker.

WORK STOPPAGES IN QUEBEC—POSSIBLE USE OF RCMP TO PROTECT CONSTRUCTION SITES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): My question was intended for the Solicitor General, but in his absence I will direct it to the Prime Minister. It may be somewhat supplementary to an earlier question, but I would like a precise answer, if possible. In view of the continuing work stoppages throughout Quebec construction sites because of the possibility that the province would put unions under trusteeship, is the government prepared, if requested by the government of Quebec, to authorize RCMP officers to go in to protect construction sites against violence which may occur because of the unrest in the labour movement in Quebec at present?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know of no requests having been made of the federal government to assist them. If the question is hypothetical, then obviously it does not have to be answered.

AIR CANADA

ALLEGED LOSS ON FLIGHTS BETWEEN MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND TORONTO—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION

Mr. A. C. Abbott (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In recent testimony Air Canada has stated that it lost $19 million last year on flights between Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal. Considering the high load factor on these routes, as evidenced by the consistent difficulty faced in obtaining seats between Ottawa and Toronto, can the minister ascertain whether the estimated loss is valid and, if so, what reasonable explanation has the airline to offer for what would appear to be, on the face of it, the most lucrative airline route in Canada?

● (1130)

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think that is part of the policy we will announce eventually.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Which year?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Hon. members still have a few days to laugh. It is good for their health.

We have to study the structure of air fares because there is no doubt that some short hauls are being subsidized by long hauls. We will have to revise all this to have a better equilibrium. Hon. members who always travel first class should know that they are subsidized by the economy class.

Mr. Nowlan: Only ministers travel first class.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I sometimes meet my hon. friends in first class, but as we have a pass, it is cheaper for Air Canada to have ministers in first class because this is where there are seats available.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REASON FOR DELAY OF DECISION ON INQUIRY INTO ACTIVITIES OF SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Labour. Now that the government has received two reports on SIU activities, one from the Department of Justice and one from the Department of Labour, and in light of the statement of the Minister of Labour earlier this week to the effect that a decision on an inquiry will be made this week, why is the decision on such an inquiry now apparently being postponed until at least next week, and when can we expect this decision to be made?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. gentleman to be patient for a few more days.

Mr. Schumacher: I will ask the parliamentary secretary what ministers are involved in this discussion and if consideration will be given to making these reports public at the time the decision on the inquiry is announced.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman will just have to await action by the government.

[Mr. Abbott.]

GRAIN

GOVERNMENT RECOMMENDATION AS TO PRODUCTION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice in charge of the Wheat Board a question. He recommended that production of grain be increased this year, yet quotas have been cut off in May of this year. There is still much grain piled up on the farms and in storage space because of the dilly-dallying of the government over the labour difficulties at the ports. Is the minister now going to bring in another LIFT program next year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that the hon. member for Calgary North recognizes that there is indeed grain in the country. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain does not seem to agree that either the statistics or the visible piles of grain are evidence of anything.

The quotas originally proposed for termination on May 16 in regard to the higher grades of wheat were in fact extended by the Canadian Wheat Board, so the open quota continues. There is generous space in most elevators, and farmers are delivering their grain to them. Our recommendation in regard to acreage was that a very significant increase in acreage and reduction in summer fallow should take place because of the relatively low world stocks of grain. Although there is still a fairly reasonable stock of Canadian grain. That continues to be our advice.

Mr. Woolliams: I would ask the minister to contact the wheat pools and the grain companies across this country to find out how much grain is stored in the elevators and on the farms at the present time. I ask seriously, is he going to reconsider his suggestion for more production in western Canada in light of the fact that one of the biggest crops of winter wheat is now beginning to be harvested in the United States?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker. The figures on farm stocks and on stocks in elevators are available in the best possible way. The elevator stocks are of course literally available in actual numbers of bushels, and I read the statistics every week. Statistics Canada calculations of farm stocks have been borne out in the past as accurate. The good crop which is being harvested in the United States is in a sense welcome news from a world point of view. It remains a fact, however, that the world stocks of grain are relatively low, and this means that it would be desirable to improve grain stocks. What we want now, of course, is some recognition from the rest of the world after the experience of lower stocks, that the rest of the world should appreciate our carrying stocks.

As long as we were carrying a large stock, there was no appreciation of that, and it may have been a necessary exercise to see those stocks go a little lower before the world began to see that it should pay us for carrying stocks rather than offering to pay us lower prices when we carry that security for the rest of the world.

REASON FOR ALLEGED CHANGE IN GOVERNMENT'S ATTITUDE TOWARDS PRICE AND WAGE CONTROLS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I would like to ask if the Minister of Finance, in his memorable speech yesterday, was stating government policy when he said, "at least now there is an intellectual argument for controls." If this is so, when did the new dawn break? This time a year ago was the Prime Minister, as the leader of a party in an election campaign, just intellectually dishonest or just plain economically stupid?

Mr. Speaker: There is a good deal of merit to the question, although one might have noticed a slight argumentative note at the end. The question basically seems relevant.

Mr. Nowlan: I will take some of the argumentative nature out of the question. I certainly would not want to argue with the Prime Minister on such a beautiful Friday on May 16, when just a year ago we were all arguing in another forum. Does the Prime Minister accept as government policy that, as the Minister of Finance said yesterday, "at least now there is an intellectual argument for controls," and if so when did this new dawn break?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know when the dawn will ever break over the hon. member's mind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps if he is given time he will understand that at different times in the economic cycle inflation can be either cost-push or influenced by external events over which controls would have had no effect.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I am not really worried about the dawn breaking over my head. After all, we have the Prime Minister and God to worry about us and to get us out of all these problems. But seriously, does the Prime Minister feel that there have been that many fundamental changes in the economic picture within the last year to make controls intellectually acceptable now, but not intellectually acceptable during the campaign?

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): When did Turner start speaking for the intellectuals?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, to observers there obviously is a difference, in that inflation is now more of a cost-push nature than it was when it was an international phenomenon caused by the high prices of energy and essentially caused by shortages of world commodities, so that there is a difference in the economic timing.

The second point is that there is also a difference between a thing which is intellectually acceptable and that which is politically and practically—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The House knows, because we have said it many times, that there has been at least for four or five years in the works of the government something called a contingency plan on price and wage controls. This had to be put together, to use the hon. member's words, from an intellectual point of view. The fact is that in the government's judgment neither last year nor this year have we decided to announce any such controls.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not going to discuss the intellectual aspect of this at this time.

● (1140)

Mr. Nowlan: Taking the first part of the Prime Minister's answer, Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman agree with me that admitting and assuming there have been some changes to the economic pattern, we are now confronted with the fact that there was no action, even though an election campaign was fought on the basis that increased productivity was the only solution, that those factors which have changed have been aggravated by the inactivity of the government which the Prime Minister leads?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was on his feet.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED RECOVERY BY TAXATION OF PORTION OF MEMBERS' PAY INCREASE—POSSIBLE TAXATION OF ALL WAGE INCREASES EXCEEDING TWELVE PER CENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Finance is also based on his speech in Welland.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): He was misquoted!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the minister's statement that the timing of the pay bill for members of parliament was lousy—I think that is a correct quotation—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Is he going to give back his pay cheque?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In his forthcoming budget proposals will the minister consider taxing back the portion of that increase that we should not now be receiving?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that I also said something that was not reported at the same time, namely, that the 33⅓ per cent increase, measured over the period since the last increase, was still lower than the rise in the cost of living in the same period and if prorated would be about 5½ per cent per year.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the minister is not prepared to go as far as I suggested would he give favourable consideration to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean to tax back from everyone any increase that exceeds 12 per cent or $2,400, whichever is the lesser?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I take that as a representation as I did from the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean.

AIRPORTS

SECURITY CHECKS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED INADEQUACY

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In light of today's CBC news report that a passenger boarding at Toronto International Airport passed through the security check with hand baggage containing a high powered rifle with ammunition, will the minister investigate what is happening to the moneys allocated by Parliament for security checks at airports, since it is obviously not providing the protection expected?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I read the news report like my hon. friend. I know one passenger boarded, I think, a Sabena plane in Brussels flying to Toronto. He was carrying a handbag containing a rifle and ammunition, and even a knife. He went through the security check without being stopped and it was the stewardess who, finding the bag was heavy, asked the passenger what it contained. He said it contained a rifle. Of course, that does not show that the system is good, but the security system in Toronto is under the responsibility of Air Canada. I know the corporation immediately suspended the person responsible for the negligence.

I hope this will not happen too often, but there will be no need to be shocked if it happens from time to time, because it happens all over the world. Some people even entered Germany, France or England with machine-guns. I regret it very much, but at all events Air Canada has taken the necessary steps to correct the situation.

[English]

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): I wonder what would have happened if the passenger had not admitted he had the gun.

An hon. Member: You would not have a question and we would all be happy.

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): On April 15, the minister said in the House that he would consider an investigation into the failure of x-ray machines to detect the presence of four razor-sharp knives in hand baggage at Vancouver and Toronto International Airports. Last Monday the minister said in the House that he would inquire into the situation at some airports, such as Prince George, British Columbia, where passengers were not required to submit to security checks. Would the minister report on his investigations or does he categorize these questions as "small and mean"?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to categorize them that way. I am told that they are making some alterations in the airport and this is the reason there is not yet a security check there. This is the reason given to me, and as soon as the alteration is completed the security system will be re-established.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED CANADIAN EFFORT TO HAVE NORTH AND SOUTH KOREA RESOLVE DIFFERENCES

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and arises from the fact that world tension now seems to be shifting to the divided Koreas. Would Canada lend its good offices and efforts to try to have representatives of North Korea and South Korea meet on some neutral ground, preferably some international forum, to attempt to resolve their differences? From personal experience, as head of a parliamentary delegation to South Korea a year ago, I can state that nothing useful will emerge from meetings in the demilitarized zone between them.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's interest in this subject, and I will certainly give his representations consideration.

BAIL REFORM ACT

INQUIRY AS TO COMMENTS OF PROVINCIAL ATTORNEYS-GENERAL ON STATISTICS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice who stated on February 4 that statistics on the operation of the Bail Reform Act have been provided to the provincial attorneys general so that they might be aware of the figures before they were made public. Has the minister received any comments from the attorneys general?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would draw the attention of the hon. member to the answer to exactly the same question the day before yesterday.

INCOME TAX

POSSIBILITY OF IMPROVING METHOD OF POLICING CHARITABLE ORGANIZATION RECEIVING TAX EXEMPT DONATIONS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. In light of what appears to be the very dubious nature of some of the actions of the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada, is the minister giving consideration to an improved method of policing charitable organizations, donations to which are tax exempt?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I indicated in the estimates committee that this was a matter of concern to me and that my officials and I have been working on it. There is liaison with officials of the Department of Finance on the subject.

GRAIN

PROTECTION TO PRODUCERS AGAINST ILLEGAL DEMURRAGE CHARGES

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In light of the fact that there are still ten labour contracts due that can affect the grain industry in the current year, does the government intend to give any special protection to farmers against illegal demurrage charges?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what the hon. member refers to when he mentions that ten contracts are due. The Wheat Board or other owners of grain who have demurrage claims made against them know fully what their rights are, and I doubt whether they would pay any illegal charges.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the statement made by the minister to the "Adventure in Citizenship" students on Wednesday night that the House of Commons should face the Ottawa River, could the minister inform the House whether he intends to alter the course of the Ottawa River or about face the parliament buildings?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Well, Mr. Speaker, Liberals can move mountains but I think it would be difficult to change the course of the river!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You are too modest.

TRANSPORT

AVAILABILITY OF NEW POLICY PROPOSALS TO MEMBERS—POSSIBILITY OF NEW PROPOSALS FOR AIR CANADA AND CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): A supplementary question for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that data and part of a policy paper being presently discussed by the cabinet has appeared in the press, can the minister tell the House if he will be able to make the policy proposals available to the House of Commons?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, we are going to follow the normal procedure. I am sure the hon. member understands that it has to go through cabinet before we can discuss it in the House.

Mr. Benjamin: I appreciate that it has to go through cabinet, but I thought we could get it from the minister rather than read it in the papers. I appreciate that I cannot expect the minister to divulge any proposals on new policy. Can the minister tell us whether or not the new policy proposals will contain any new directions concerning the operations of Canadian National Railways and Air Canada, particularly as CNR made record net operation profits, but the interest on the debt has eaten up an additional $30 million-odd over and above operating profits?

● (1150)

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, all I can say at the moment is that there will be many, many changes. Some of the matters that were referred to by the hon. gentleman are to be studied and analysed and recommendations are to be made about them.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON GOVERNMENT POSITION ON INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. With respect to the Prime Minister's statement to me in the House on Wednesday, that he would welcome my constructive suggestions on the formation of a Canadian position on international development, will the Prime Minister tell me how I can make such constructive suggestions when I am denied the material and views prepared by the CIDA team of experts on the ground that it would be premature to make public at this time the CIDA position papers. And will the Prime Minister take steps to provide members of parliament with the fullest information now being gathered by the government on the options for a comprehensive policy on international development?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that as soon as the department or the agency is ready to make these papers public, it will consider that. I encourage the hon. member in the meantime to do some thinking about the problem. I myself have not seen these papers but it has not prevented me from addressing myself to these questions in many discussions with my colleagues. I hope the hon. member will feel free in his party and caucus to raise such important questions. I think we should have some thinking on this subject on the other side of the House.

Oral Questions

ALLEGATION FOOD AID NOT REACHING THOSE IN NEED—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question? I am only one man and only so much information can be made available to me. I need the kind of support which the government has available for the formation of its own policies. In an effort to gather material for constructive suggestions, I asked the Prime Minister on May 8 if he was aware that 80 per cent of Canada's food aid is being sold to local peoples. The Prime Minister said he was not aware and undertook to find out if there was misinterpretation and misrepresentation in Canada's food aid. Could the Prime Minister now report to me on this subject?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have been made aware of the hon. member's question. It has been the practice, I think since about 1951, for governments which receive Canadian food aid to establish counterpart funds which are devoted to economic development purposes. Normally, the recipient countries of food aid distribute that food through their own distribution system to people most in need. In some cases they establish the price at cost or somewhat above cost in order to protect their own agricultural and distribution systems. It should be added, however, that in the case of multilateral assistance, and emergency assistance, no counterpart funds are established. But this practice, as I have discovered, has been systematically followed since the Colombo plan of 1951, and certainly is nothing new. It is intended, really, to protect the marketing and agricultural systems in the recipient country.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED PURCHASE OF DE HAVILLAND DASH SEVEN AIRCRAFT

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister actively considering purchasing the new de Havilland DASH 7 aircraft for sovereignty control over our oceans, and will he announce his intention to the House in the next few weeks?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the DASH 7 is one aircraft which we are considering, but it is only one of several.

AIR CANADA

ALLEGED SUBSIDIZATION OF EASTERN ROUTES BY THE WEST—REQUEST FOR DELAY IN RATE INCREASES UNTIL RATE STRUCTURE CHANGED

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Last Wednesday I asked the minister a question about the cross-subsidization of routes, inasmuch as the prairie routes are subsidizing the Air Canada Toronto-Ottawa-Montreal route. I think the minister misunderstood my question. May I now ask whether he is prepared to intercede with Air Canada, with a view to seeing whether the application for increased rates can be forestalled or postponed until this discrepancy in the rate structure can be solved.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Justice as the minister representing western interests?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Will the minister not intervene, on behalf of western Canada, in this grossly inequitable situation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have noted the hon. member's representation.

FISHERIES

LOBSTER—REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF DECISION OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE ON GEAR LOSSES AND POSSIBLE CHANGE IN FISHING SEASON

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State responsible for fisheries. What action has he taken to investigate the questionable decision of a federal-provincial committee concerning the declaration of certain zones and compensation for lobster gear losses last year? Also, in view of the time of year, will he advise the House if he has directed his officials to investigate doubts concerning the lobster season? If changes are to be made, is he aware of consensus on the part of fishermen?

Hon. Romeo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to review a decision made by a federal-provincial committee over one year ago. I am willing to see if we can make improvements in this matter, but I really must tell the hon. member that the decisions were made in the light of facts then known, and only after full consultation with the provincial government which was very much involved in this process. As I have indicated, I will try to be as flexible as I can, but I would not want to give those who have been refused false hope.

As to the matter of the lobster season, we are looking at the matter again. I had not received official requests from fishermen's organizations up to a couple of days ago, but I will look in the files again. We are always willing to change the regulations which we can change at the stroke of a pen to accommodate fishermen. The problem is to obtain consensus among all fishermen of the district.

TRADE

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL COMMODITY AGREEMENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question either to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Finance about the brief report we received from Iran when the Minister of Finance was there? I would not wish to suggest to the Minister of Finance that there has been any wrong reporting. According to press reports, he suggested in Iran that all raw materials moving in international commerce should be subject to international agreements, both from the point of view of buying and selling countries. I ask, is that the policy of the government of Canada? Is it the view of the government of Canada that wheat, copper and other commodities besides oil should be subject to international agreements? If so, is the government of Canada taking an active initiative to push that view in the world community?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government's position, generally speaking, is that we are in favour of international commodity agreements. Actually, we are members, I believe, of every international commodity agreement which exists. But we have always insisted that these agreements are only fair and workable if they represent the producer and the consumer. We have been invited on several occasions to join agreements on commodities which were merely producer agreements and we have until now hesitated to do so, for reasons I just indicated. We could, I suppose, in special cases consider other actions. But this is our general policy, and, in so far as the minister explained that, he was certainly explaining what has been government policy for some time.

FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

Second report of Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry—Mr. Béchard.

● (1200)

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I have given notice of a question of privilege which I should like to raise on Tuesday next with respect to Canadair Limited and vote L20 in the estimates of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce calling for the spending of $38.1 million to purchase that company. It is a company which, upon purchase by the federal government, will apparently have no worth and one which has incurred cumulative operating losses of $2.4 million in six years, in spite of having received $21.5 million in grants and $21 million in financing benefits from the federal government. If it is in order, Mr. Speaker, and with your consent, I should like to present my question of privilege more fully on Tuesday.

Mr. Speaker: I have never taken a position which would discourage the practice which the hon. member proposes to follow, that is, to give notice and thus afford other hon. members an opportunity to prepare themselves to participate in discussion. I think, however, that the hon. member ought to put forward at least a description of the nature of his question of privilege. He has mentioned the subject, but its nature has not been elucidated. I think it is in order to let the matter go until Tuesday next in order to allow other hon. members to contribute, but I wonder whether he will now indicate the nature of the question of privilege. We can hear argument on Tuesday.

Mr. Stevens: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I did not want to delay unduly the regular order of business of the House. The question of privilege centres on what took place in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs yesterday. A vote was called for on vote L20, at which time the Committee quorum was lost as a result of certain members on the government side vacating the room. Thus, the regular order of the committee's business could not be proceeded with. In consequence, I believe there will not be an opportunity properly to vote on and review this estimate, and on Tuesday I intend to seek your guidance as to what would be the correct approach for members of the House to take with respect to this unfortunate development.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It arises from a reply to a question of mine by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) earlier this morning concerning a meeting on May 21 to which I had referred. Since I would not wish the minister, perhaps unintentionally, to leave a wrong impression with the House, I thought he might wish to confirm, or otherwise, that a message did go out from his office today to the effect that the meeting had been postponed indefinitely.

Mr. Danson: Yes, indeed. A message did go out from my office this morning to the effect that the May 21 date was not a convenient one and that I would be in touch shortly suggesting further dates which might be suitable.

CONSUMER PACKAGING AND LABELLING ACT

MEASURE TO ENSURE PUBLIC CLEARLY UNDERSTANDS PRICE OF PRODUCTS FOR SALE

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-390, to amend the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to ensure that the public is able to clearly understand and see the price on the products they buy and to prevent the price being removed on items that come under the universal product code marking. The bill represents the concern of members of the Kitchener-Waterloo area branch of the Consumers Association of Canada that the removal of visible prices from items will lessen the consumer's price consciousness and that the universal product code should not be permitted to do that.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,206, 1,327, 1,740, 1,947, 1,959, 1,960, 1,969, 1,971 1,984, 2,024, 2,028, 2,043, 2,067, 2,148, 2,257, 2,285, 2,380, 2,381, 2,441 and 2,465.

If questions Nos. 613, 1,843, 2,274 and 2,345 could be made orders for return, these returns would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call starred questions Nos. 2,353 and 2,403?

I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

REVENUE FROM FINES COLLECTED IN COURTS IN BANFF AND JASPER

Question No. 1,206—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

1. In the last fiscal year, what was the total revenue from fines collected in courts in (a) Banff (b) Jasper?

2. In the last fiscal year, what was the (a) staff complement (b) total cost of maintenance of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police detachments in (i) Banff Townsite (ii) Banff National Park (iii) Jasper Townsite (iv) Jasper National Park?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Justice and the Solicitor General as follows: 1. The Department of the Attorney General of Alberta informed the Department of Justice that during the past fiscal year they collected (a) a total of $287,811 by court fines in Banff, and (b) there was no revenue from court fines in Jasper. The court at Jasper only became operational on October 1, 1974.

2. (a) (i) and (ii) 26; (iii) and (iv) 13; (b) (i) and (ii) $398,900; (iii) and (iv) $590,590 (includes construction cost of $379,781).

NOTE: There is only one detachment in each area. Each is responsible, under provincial contract, for the policing of both the park and the townsite in their respective areas.

OCEANS POLICY

Question No. 1,327—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What specific progress has been made towards Canada achieving "world-recognized excellence in operating on and below ice-covered waters", as enunciated July 12, 1973 in the "New Oceans Policy" statement by the Minister of State for Science and Technology?

[Mr. Saltsman.]

2. Does Canada have any Arctic capability sub-surface vessels capable of unassisted progress in a submerged state for periods of several days or more other than mini-subs and, if so, what are they and on what dates were they built?

3. Does Canada have any surface vessels capable of continuous progress through 7-foot ice and, if so, what are they and on what dates were they built?

4. Will Canada have this degree of excellence by July 12, 1978?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of State for Science and Technology): The following information was obtained in consultation with the Department of the Environment and the Ministry of Transport. 1. The declaration in the New Oceans Policy that Canada shall achieve world-recognized excellence in operating on and below ice-covered waters led to the establishment of an inter-departmental advisory committee concerned with development of the requisite operating capabilities. Extensive consultation by the committee with experts in industry and government has resulted in identification of a series of priorized and integrated ice excellence R&D program requirements which, it is anticipated, will be presented for consideration by Ministers in the near future.

2. Canada does not have any Arctic capability sub-surface vessels capable of unassisted progress in a submerged state for periods of several days or more.

3. Canada does not have any surface vessels capable of continuous progress through 7-foot ice.

4. MOT has awarded a contract for a study which will include the production of specifications and drawings for the construction of an ice breaker capable of continuous progress through 7-foot ice. A decision to build such a vessel has, however, not yet been made and it is thus improbable that a vessel of this type will be available by July 12, 1978.

NON-CANADIAN OWNERSHIP OF CANADIAN MAGAZINE SHARES

Question No. 1,740—Mr. Herbert:

1. To the knowledge of the government, how many Canadian magazines have more than 20 per cent but not more than 25 per cent of their voting shares owned by non-Canadians?

2. If during a fiscal year the sale of free shares results in a non-Canadian ownership in excess of 25 per cent is the tax deductibility right of advertisers affected?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Secretary of State and National Revenue as follows: 1. The information is not obtainable except by examination of specific taxpayers' records.

2. Yes.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Question No. 1,947—Mr. Reynolds:

1. To date and by province, what has been the cost of the Department of Supply and Services advertising campaign to promote and encourage small businesses to bid on federal contracts?

2. What results are evident in terms of the discovery of new markets where costs might be curtailed?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. The Advertising campaign has ended and the cost were identified as follows: British Columbia, $24,109.94; Alberta, $13,951.97; Saskatchewan, $5,447.53; Manitoba, $9,701.70; Ontario, $109,429.86; Quebec, $69,503.35; New Brunswick, $6,435.63; Nova Scotia, $9,572.41; Prince Edward Island, $2,836.14; Newfoundland, $2,801.78; Total $253,790.32.

2. One of the goals of the Department of Supply and Services advertising campaign was to ensure that every Canadian businessman across the country was aware of how to do business with the Department and to assure all taxpayers that it is not a privilege but their right to do business with the federal government. Some 20,000 copies of the brochure "How to Do Business with the Department of Supply and Services" were distributed. The advertisements drew approximately 7,000 responses. Some 800 firms provided positive information which resulted in additions or improvement to our lists of suppliers. Approximately 250 additional firms enquiring about specialized activities in government were referred to the responsible departments. No estimate of the financial benefit accruing from this broader understanding has been possible.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—SOURCE LIST OF RADIOSONDES

Question No. 1,959—Mr. Reynolds:

1. How many companies are listed on the Department of Supply and Services product supply list for the prospective procurement of radiosondes and what are their names?

2. Did the Department aid Sangamo Company Limited, Toronto, Ontario financially or otherwise in their initiative to market radiosondes?

3. Did the Department expect a return share in profits as a result of this endeavour to create another supplier?

4. Did the Department collect a returned revenue from such investment?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Seven companies. Aviation Electric Ltd., St-Laurent, P.Q.; Leeds and Northrup (Canada) Ltd., Rexdale, Ontario; Electrodesign Ltd., Montreal, P.Q.; Topping Electronics Ltd., Scarborough, Ontario; General Instrument of Canada Ltd., Toronto, Ontario; Conway Electronic Enterprises Ltd., Weston, Ontario; George Kelk Ltd., Don Mills, Ontario.

2. No.

3. Not applicable.

4. Not applicable.

WATER-CHILLER UNITS

Question No. 1,960—Mr. Reynolds:

1. What is the difference between water-chiller units as contracted from the Trane Company, Calgary, Alberta on August 15, 1974 and December 11, 1974?

2. What was the difference in cost per unit?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. The two procurements are separate parts of the heating/diagonal cooling system of the new Calgary Airport Project. The first covers two central water chillers required to chill a continuous supply of cooling water which is then distributed throughout the project for use in heat exchangers purchased under the second contract in question. The second contract is for a number of heat exchangers, each consiting of a blower and a liquid-to-air heat exchanger to transfer heat from hot water to the air in a local position, or to chill the air in that same position.

2. The water chillers were two in number at $63,338 per unit. The heat exchangers were thirty-one in total number of four models at unit prices of $35,206 (4), $22,846 (12), $15,507 (10) and $10,373 (5). These contracts were awarded on behalf of the Ministry of Transport.

CONTRACT AWARDED TO SPAR AEROSPACE PRODUCTS LTD—COST EVALUATION BREAKDOWN

What is the cost evaluation breakdown relating to the contract awarded July 9, 1974 to Spar Aerospace Products Ltd., Toronto, Ontario for a total value of $7,604,000?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): The contract concerns the acquisition of spare parts for the constant-speed accessory drive, overhauled for DND by Spar for a number of years. It was designed specifically for DND's Argus Aircraft by Sundstrand Aviation Corporation, Rockford, Illinois and this arrangement is not used on any other aircraft. This contract covers the first year of a two year acquisition program to provide maintenance spares sufficient for a period of four years commencing 1 April 1975 at an estimate cost of $14,560,000. The cost is based on unit prices established by Sundstrand and negociated downward to reflect the advantages available from volume manufacture. This bulk procurement program was initiated and negotiated with Spar to avoid the large cost escalation which began to be experienced under annual procurements. The contract was issued in July 1974 to authorize purchase of raw material required for this new provisioning program. Under DSS guidance, the agreement drawn up between Spar and Sundstrand provides for a quarter share of the manufacturing to be performed in Canada and limits the allowable cost escalation to 6 per cent annually over the program period.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—INFORMATION DISPLAY SYSTEMS

Question No. 1,971—Mr. Reynolds:

1. What are the distinguishable characteristics within two contracts awarded for information display systems to Leigh Instruments Ltd. and I.P. Sharp Associates, Ltd., Carleton Place, Ontario?

2. What is the difference in design and cost of the two systems?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Leigh Instruments Ltd.—Flight Information and Display System: This is a computer-based system, with multiple displays, for use in the new Montreal International Airport. It will provide the travelling public with information on flight arrivals and departures and baggage claim information; I.P. Sharp Associates Limited—Operational Information Display System: This is an Air Traffic Controller Operational Information Display System. Systems will be installed in Air Traffic Control Centres across Canada. The Controllers will be provided information on meteorological conditions and other data concerning the runway status.

2. The Flight Information and Display System consists of a central processing complex (computer), television type displays, electro-mechanical displays, operator controls, interactive terminals and various input devices, located throughout the passenger terminal. Cost: $1,416,-316. The Operational Information Display System will be a computer based system, capable of automatic retrieval of data from meteorological and miscellaneous status sensors providing information such as wind direction and speed, runway visual range, altimeter settings and weather sequences. Keyboard input stations will be available for entering information such as gate assigmnents, runway and field conditions, etc. The computer processing subsystem will supply suitably arranged display data to a number of television type screens. Cost: $1,873,830. These contracts were awarded on behalf of the Ministry of Transport.

CONTRACT AWARDED TO MALLORY BATTERY CO., MISSISSAUGA, FOR BATTERIES

Question No. 1,984—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Was a contract awarded to the Mallory Battery Co., Mississauga, Ontario for 29,000 BA 3386 batteries at a cost of $24.59 per battery?

2. Did the battery replace the BA 386 battery which cost between $2.80-$3.30 per unit?

3. Are there any other countries using the same type of battery for their walkie-talkie units?

4. To the knowledge of the government, did the US forces refuse to use this battery?

5. What is to be done with the large inventory of BA 386 batteries and accessory equipment?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Supply and Services and National Defence as follows: 1. Yes.

2. Yes, the BA3386 replaced the BA386 battery. However, prices tendered for the BA386 in mid-1974 ranged from $4.29 and $7.26. The BA3386 battery is an alkaline type battery which is impervious to changes in temperatures and has a shelf life of three years. The BA386 battery is made of zinc carbon and has a shelf life of one year. This battery can only be used in summer and requires temperature controlled warehousing. In winter, the BA398 battery is used. This battery is carried in a vest which is worn by the operator to keep the battery as warm as possible. Thus, the BA3386 battery replaces both the BA386 and BA398. In addition to being more reliable and outperforming the BA386 an estimated 7 to 1, the BA3386 offers a decided logistic advantage. Because of its greater shelf life and all-climate capability, only one battery is needed and less warehousing is required because the requirement is less. Warehousing may be general in nature instead of one requiring temperature control. The BA386 requires protection from heat during transportation to the theatre of operations.

3. Yes, two countries currently have the BA3386 undergoing field trials and at least three other countries have expressed interest.

4. No.

5. As of April 1, 1975 a total inventory of 4,019 BA386 batteries was held by Bases, Stations and Units to support daily requirements. This quantity represents approximately a six week supply based on last years consumption.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—CONTRACTING OUT

Question No. 2,024—Mr. Reynolds:

1. With respect to the Minister of Supply and Services' stated intentions as outlined November 15, 1974 through a departmental press release, will the Minister further describe the new dimensions of the proposed purchasing effort by the government to shift work out of government into the private sector?

2. How is the mobility between private and public sector employees to be encouraged?

3. What are the established guidelines proposed to disabilitate central purchasing authorities in favour of building purchasing wings at the local and regional levels?

4. What is to be the effort to help small businessmen through increased information and most of all through an equal opportunity to do business with the government?

5. What is the amount of money regional offices are allowed to allocate on contracts placed under the title of "single competitive purchases"?

6. What is the amount of entitlement on contracts described as "non-competitive purchases"?

7. Are there plans indicating the respective dollar amounts will be increased to enhance the independence of the regional office?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. In FY 1973-74 the Department of Supply and Services purchased, on behalf of the federal government, goods and services from the private sector totalling $1.6 billion. In the November 15, 1974, press release it was stated that the application of the make or buy policy in government would result in increased contractual activity with industry. In support of this statement several impressive DSS examples were cited. They were: the close-out of the departmental computer services bureau effecting $9 million (100 per cent) increase in awards to the private sector since 1970; an increase to 63 per cent in government printing requirements let to private concerns and the implementation of R&D buys from industry. The latter has resulted in awards of $33 million since January 1973. Though these examples tend to be the most impressive, the Department has sought to identify all areas where the application of the buy decision would be advantageous to government and industry. Hence, in such output services as Maintenance and Repair of federally-owned assets; security services especially guard contracting and the procurement of design and artwork, the level of awards to commercial organizations has been visibly increased and this trend is expected to be maintained into the future.

2. The Department of Supply and Services has sought to increase the mobility of private and public sector employees in several ways: (a) The Department supports the Public Service Commission program which provides for an executive interchange between industry, universities, and other governments, and the Federal Public Service. (b) An applicant inventory of qualified purchasing officers from industry is updated on a regular basis to enable DSS to recruit high-calibre employees at an officer level. (c) The Department conducts industry briefings thereby establishing a greater visibility to non-government employees of activities and programs sponsored by DSS.

3. (a) When a requisition originates in a region, the policy is to solicit bids in the region if there are enough suppliers in that region to insure competition. (b) With respect to Headquarters purchasing the policy is that when the final point of use for the product is in the Atlantic or Western provinces, purchases are made from suppliers in these regions provided that total PROC cost (Product, Resource, Operating and Contingent Cost) to the government cannot be reduced by using alternative Canadian sources. All national requirements including those for the National Capital Region are solicited from suppliers throughout Canada. (c) The Government's program for contracting out research and development work provides that contracts should be let so that the resulting industries will be established throughout the various regions of Canada.

4. The following practices of the Supply Administration are intended to assist firms in identifying and obtaining contracts or sub-contracts: The publication of a Weekly News Release of Business Opportunities of Unclassified Contracts over $10,000 and the public opening of tenders for requirements over $10,000 provide information to any interested parties on current contracts, some of which contain sub-contracting opportunities. Smaller firms whose government contracting potential is likely to be limited to the sub-contract level are referred to the purchasing branches of the Department to obtain information on current acquisitions. The Department is increasing its effort to inform potential prime contractors on the general requirements of government contracting procedures including their application to the sub-contract level. Referrals are made to customer departments of those firms who may handle specialized requirements. Liaison is maintained with DREE and ITC local representatives to keep them informed of anticipated acquisition programs. From time to time, conferences are conducted to inform prime and sub-contractors of our requirements (e.g. Operation Access, Electronics and Data Processing Conferences). The recent country-wide advertising campaign in newspapers and periodicals was another instrument to inform industry about the role of DSS, our policies and practices and how businessmen can become potential sources of supply for government requirements. Over 20,000 copies of our explanatory brochure "How to Do Business with the Department of Supply and Services" have been distributed. As a result, we have received many requests for copies of our Weekly Bulletin of Unclassified Contracts for more than $10,000 which we offered in the booklet as a useful tool in identifying sub-contract possibilities. The Supply Administration maintains a liaison with suppliers both at the prime and sub-contract levels by answering verbally or in writing, approximately 1,600 enquiries per month. These involve explanations of DSS purchasing policies, practices and procedures and outlining services which are available from DSS. Discussions are held with representatives of firms to ensure adequate listing of their capabilities so that they can do business with DSS to their fullest potential. Our Printing Products Branch has initiated a system whereby urgent requirements are posted on bulletin boards in all our Regional Offices. This permits more equitable opportunity for suppliers across Canada to compete for government printing business. The increased usage of Standing Offers permits suppliers of such items as automobiles, typewriters and pharmaceuticals to disseminate contracts to their outlets at the local level, thus enabling the small businessman to have greater participation in government procurement.

5. $100,000.

6. $50,000.

7. This is now under consideration.

CFB FOYMOUNT

Question No. 2,028—Mr. Reynolds:

1. What conditions were posed as part of the tender procedure for bids received concerning the disposal of CFB Foymount by CADC?

2. What general conditions apply for disposal of Crown-owned assets, particularly property, within invitations to tender?

3. Was the sale of CFB Foymount pursuant to such general conditions posed by CADC?

4. Were there any changes in the rules to bid after tenders were first requested?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): In so far as Crown Assets Disposal Corporation is concerned: 1 and 2. The Conditions of Sale are contained in the copy of the Offer for Sale of CFB Foymount tabled in answer to Question No. 2,025.

3. Yes.

4. No.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMUNICATIONS—PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS OFFICE

Question No. 2,043—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

In the last fiscal year, what was the cost of operation of the Parliamentary Returns Office of the Department of Communications?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): There is no Parliamentary Returns Office as such in the Department of Communications. Parliamentary returns are handled on a part time basis by the Administrative Assistant in the Office of the Deputy Minister, assisted by a secretary of that office.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS—PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS OFFICE

In the last fiscal year, what was the cost of operation of the Parliamentary Returns Office of the Department of Veterans Affairs?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): There is no Parliamentary Returns Office as such in the Department of Veterans Affairs. Parliamentary returns form part of the duties of the General Services Division.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT SPECIFICATIONS BOARD

Question No. 2,148—Mr. Reynolds:

1. (a) Is the Canadian Government Specifications Board efficient to the extent that they have a minimal backlog of requests for specifications (b) what central body is charged with the responsibility for screening such requests (c) approximately how many specifications are awaiting approval?

2. Is there a priority list of items that imperatively require specifications?

3. What is the cost of maintaining the specifications system?

4. Are the savings in purchasing cost offset by increases in the cost of maintaining the specifications system?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. (a) Yes; (b) Requests for specifications are investigated by the CGSB Secretariat in accordance with well defined procedures. (c) As of April 21, 1975, 20 CGSB standards are awaiting Board approval.

2. The work program which is developed annually represents the list of priority items.

3. The budgeted CGSB costs for fiscal year 1975-76 are approximately one million dollars.

4. Specifications are intended to achieve savings in terms of the total supply cost that includes purchase cost, resource cost, operating and contingency costs. Only those specification projects that appear to offer a favorable benefit-cost relationship are undertaken. This process is considered to provide adequate assurance that the total cost savings are significantly greater than the cost of maintaining the specifications system.

FOREIGN TEXTBOOKS IN FRENCH LANGUAGE

Question No. 2,257—Mr. Herbert:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,342, was consideration given to the percentage of foreign textbooks in the French language that are used at the elementary and secondary school levels?

2. Is the Department of the Secretary of State considering means of encouraging an increase of domestically produced textbooks?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): 1. No.

2. The Department of the Secretary of State is of the opinion that textbooks for use in Canadian schools should to a large extent be written by Canadians, and that the field of educational publishing should be occupied to a considerable extent by Canadian-owned publishing houses. To this end, the Department would like to see the provincial governments, which are responsible for matters pertaining to school curricula, treat Canadian publishing houses in a way which would allow them to develop their potential in this field.

PILGRIMAGE TO ITALY TO VISIT WAR CEMETERIES OF WAR DEAD

Question No. 2,285—Mr. Marshall:

What are the names and addresses of the 24 young men and women who have been selected from each province to participate in the pilgrimage to Italy to visit the cemeteries of war dead?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Wayne Payton, St. John's, Newfoundland; Jacqueline Ryan, St. John's, Newfoundland; Martin Morrison, Flat River, Prince Edward Island; Christine Shepherd, Cardigan, Prince Edward Island; Colleen Middleton, L'Ardoise, Nova Scotia; Anthony Olender, New Glasgow, Nova Scotia; Catherine Gillespie, Moncton, New Brunswick; John Kerrigan, Fredericton, New Brunswick; Gerald L'Archer, Québec, Quebec; Anthony Pollard, Montreal, Quebec; Rosslyn Whiteside, Montreal, Quebec; John Bennet, Port Colborne, Ontario; Denis Chartrand, Ottawa, Ontario; Candace Collins, Rexdale, Ontario; Helen Beattie, Winnipeg, Manitoba; Curtis Phillips, Winnipeg, Manitoba; Lois Barton, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan; Trevor Lowe, Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan; Marion Henry, Sundre, Alberta; Leonard Lay, Morrin, Alberta; Bryan Brimacombe, Oliver, British Columbia; Evelyn Whitfield, Burnaby, British Columbia; Hugh Charlie, Whitehorse, Yukon Territory; Mona Paquet, Whitehorse, Yukon Territory; Carol Villeneuve, Yellowknife, Northwest Territories; Heather Wishart, Inuvik, Northwest Territories.

*DELAY OF TENDERS IN MAIL

Question No. 2,353—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Did the Department of Supply and Services issue an order assuring that tender bids delayed in the mail will be included in the competition and, if so, on what date?

2. How many tenders have been delayed in the mail during the past five fiscal years?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The answer is as follows: 1. The Department of Supply and Services issued an information bulletin concerning delayed bids as an attachment to Invitations to Tender in June 1974. This bulletin stated that delayed bids mailed in Canada, at least 48 hours prior to the designated closing time and date or mailed outside Canada at least 96 hours prior to the designated closing time and date, would be considered if they were received by the Department prior to contract award.

2. No statistics concerning delayed tenders have been kept for this period.

CONTRACT FOR FIBREGLASS RESEARCH SHIP

Question No. 2,380—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Did the government recently award a contract for $280,000 for the construction of a fiberglass research ship?

2. Was the contract put to tender and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. A contract was awarded in the amount of $278,-849.92 for construction of a 40 foot, fibreglass, fishery research vessel, on behalf of the Department of the Environment.

2. Tenders were called in the west-coast region of Canada, where the vessel is to operate.

STEEL GILL NET FISHING BOATS

Question No. 2,381—Mr. McKinnon:

1. What bid price was accepted by the government for the construction of a number of steel gill-netting boats, 27'2" long, Department of Supply and Services file LC-A-2762-5-0003?

2. Was the lowest bid accepted and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. The second low bid in the total amount of $57,800 for the four boats was accepted.

2. Lowest bid was not accepted, as the company could not meet the technical requirements. The lowest tenderer subsequently withdrew his bid. This contract was placed on behalf of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

*NATIONAL DEFENCE—ORDERS AND BADGES

Question No. 2,403—Mr. Forrestall:

Will the Minister of National Defence give consideration to personally reviewing the orders that went to members of the Canadian Armed Forces to the effect, that members who were previously authorized to retain their pre-unification rank designation and who concurrently retained their pre-unification element/service badges are now to be required to wear badges representing the occupational classification while concurrently being permitted to retain their pre-unification rank designation and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answer is as follows: 1. Dress instructions issued on April 3, 1970, stated that the cap badge associated with the class of service to which officers and men are assigned, was to be worn when the badge became available.

2. Cap badges in general use at that time were authorized to continue to be worn during the intervening period.

3. During this intervening period that is from April, 1970 to the present time extensive discussions with personnel at all levels were held and, cap badges in some cases were designed, and in all cases were approved by all groups concerned.

4. There is every indication that servicemen and women wish to be identified with the particular type of military duty in which they are engaged, and that the new cap badges are being worn with pride.

CUSTOMS HIGHWAY SUFFERANCE WAREHOUSES

Question No. 2,414—Mr. Dick:

How many licenced sufferance warehouses were authorized to be in existence by the Department of National Revenue for each year (a) 1950 (b) 1960 (c) 1970 (d) 1971 (e) 1972 (f) 1973 (g) 1974?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): The following is the number of Customs Highway Sufferance Warehouses which were in existence during the years specified: (a) None. (b) 48. (c) 139. (d) 143. (e) 148. (f) 154. (g) 157.

PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYEES

Question No. 2,465—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

1. Does the government know the names of individuals who worked in the Office of the Prime Minister, in the Privy Council Office or as a Research Assistant, Special Assistant or Executive Assistant, in or for the office of any Minister or Minister of State from 1963 to the present?

2. What is the (a) name (b) position (c) job description of each of those individuals who are presently in the Public Service or employed by (i) Atomic Energy of Canada Limited (ii) the Bank of Canada (iii) the Canada Council (iv) the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (v) the Canadian Commercial Corporation (vi) the Canadian Dairy Commission (vii) the Canadian Film Development Corporation (viii) the Canadian International Development Agency (ix) the Canadian Radio-Television Commission (x) the Canadian Transport Commission (xi) the Canadian Wheat Board (xii) the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (xiii) the Office of the Chief Electoral Officer (xiv) the Defence Research Board (xv) the Economic Council of Canada (xvi) Eldorado Nuclear Limited (xvii) the Federal Court of Canada (xviii) the Food Prices Review Board (xix) the Foreign Investment Review Agency (xx) the Fresh Water Fish Marketing Corporation (xxi) Information Canada (xxii) the National Capital Commission (xxiii) the National Energy Board (xxiv) the National Farm Products Marketing Council (xxv) the National Film Board (xxvi) the National Gallery of Canada (xxvii) the National Harbours Board (xxviii) the National Research Council of Canada (xxix) the Representation Commissioner (xxx) the Science Council of Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): See reply to question number 782 answered on May 1, 1975.

Return tabled.

Salaries Act

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SALARIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE SALARIES OF LIEUTENANT GOVERNORS

The House resumed, from Thursday, May 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp that Bill C-24, to amend the Salaries Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Last night, Mr. Speaker, I began my remarks in response to an invitation by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) to take part in the debate.

An hon. Member: That was a mistake.

Mr. Benjamin: I was glad to accept the hon. gentleman's invitation. The interjections which I made in the speech by the Leader of the Opposition came after he had made some remarks about not picking on one or more groups, such as lieutenant governors, judges or members of parliament, and singling them out when it comes to restraint. I interjected then, and I repeat now, that it is a little difficult to feel any concern about increases for people who are getting $25,000, $35,000 or $45,000 a year.

It is even more difficult to accept or even listen to anyone attempting to justify percentage increases in incomes at those levels, increases which in real dollars reflect incomes for those categories far in excess of what is necessary or desirable. The same percentage increases for people with incomes less than $12,000 or $13,000 a year would be meaningful. I submit they are excessive and somewhat obscene for people earning between $25,000 and $50,000 a year.

The Leader of the Opposition said that he was getting a little tired of the talk of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) about restraint, and that he would like to see us support some program of restraint. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) and others of this party have put forward proposals on quite a few occasions during the last two years. The fact that some hon. members chose not to listen to them or reply to them cannot be blamed on us.

I remind the House, particularly the Leader of the Opposition, that we have been saying for quite some time that there has to be restraint. But we have submitted in the past, and we submit again, that the restraint has to start at the top, not at the bottom. It is obscene, or at least unseemly for members of parliament to sit in this place and propose increases for high income groups while urging low income earners and people on fixed incomes in Canada to show restraint.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) was complaining the other day that wages and salaries represent 70 per cent of total income in Canada so obviously, in his terms, this was a major sector of the economy to show restraint. But he conveniently omitted the fact that this 70 per cent includes high income earners such as executives, judges, senators and members of parliament, lieutenant governors, lawyers, doctors and other professionals, engineers, and so on, all of whom earn incomes ranging between $25,000 and $75,000 a year. This is the area where restraint must be exercised. As far as we are concerned, people earning $6,000, $8,000 or $10,000 per year are entitled to all the increases they can get, if for no other reason than to bring about a greater measure of equality in this society.

We have had recently statistics showing that a family of five people—husband, wife and three children—on an income of less than $15,000 a year in the city of Toronto is not going to make it. Such a family will not be able to meet the price of housing, food and other necessities of life if they live in a city like Toronto. Yet we have the gall—when I say "we", I should say the government and members of the official opposition—to suggest that people in such income categories and even lower should show restraint. They then try to plead, on behalf of themselves as members of parliament, on behalf of judges, and now on behalf of lieutenant governors, that increases ranging from 20 per cent to 90 per cent are justified. This is sheer nonsense.

When the Liberals and Tories talk about restraint for the poor, it reminds me of days of old when peasants were supposed to stand by the roadside and doff their caps and touch their forelocks as dukes, earls and lords rode by. Today they drive by in their Cadillacs and Lincoln Continentals on their way to open parliament, or to the courthouse, or even on their way to the House of Commons.

If the Minister of Finance, the government and the members of the official opposition think for one moment that ordinary, average Canadians will hold still or accept the pleadings and urgings of restraint while we pass Bill C-44, Bill C-47, Bill C-24, and Bill C-23 still to come, then they are kidding themselves. The public will not accept it because it is unfair. It is so basically unfair that one would think no member of this chamber would have the nerve to put forward legislation of this kind while asking the poor to show restraint.

I would have been more inclined to support a pay raise for parliamentarians had we first done something about increasing the old age pension. We were able to get the reluctant acceptance of the government to tie old age pensions to the cost of living, but the problem with this is that the percentage is based on too low a basic amount. This country can afford to double the basic old age pension right now. It would not be inflationary. The people on old age pensions and low incomes are not the ones who cause inflation. Not only are they not the ones who cause inflation, but they are the first victims of it.

People on salaries between $25,000 and $75,000 a year can look after themselves quite nicely, thank you. To grant them a 20 per cent, 30 per cent or 40 per cent increase is totally unjustified. I hear it pleaded on behalf of lieutenant governors that they have not had an increase for 12 years. Something which was conveniently not mentioned last night is the fact that none of them has been there 12 years. In fact, I do not think any lieutenant governor has held his appointment for more than five years. They serve a five-year term and, once in a while, a year or two extra.

In nearly all cases, if not in all cases, they are usually people of substantial means in their own right. They do not accept lieutenant governor appointments as a way of making a good living, and it would be an insult to any lieutenant governor even to suggest that. That is not why they accept the honour of such an appointment. Most of them, as I say, if not all, are already of substantial means and standing in the community.

The government is suggesting a 12 per cent increase, or $2,400, whichever is the lesser, per year in order to show restraint. If this is applied to lower income people, then I submit 12 per cent is too high for people of high income. A 6 per cent increase for judges, MPs and lieutenant governors, in real dollar terms, is as much or more than a 12 per cent increase would be for someone earning between $8,000 and $12,000, such as a steelworker in the city of Regina. Surely that apportionment is fair.

For many years I have objected—I am critical of the trade union movement in this regard as well—to the continual percentage increases, across the board, that have been made which mean that the spread between low incomes and high incomes becomes even wider. It is high time that the trade union movement started to bargain for their members in terms of cents per hour or dollars per week or per month, rather than in terms of percentage spread.

It seems to me it is even more incumbent upon parliament and the business community, when arranging the salaries and expenses, prerequisites and prerogatives of their executives, judges, lieutenant governors, members of parliament and senators—people already in the high income brackets—to say that if 12 per cent is enough for an $8,000 to $10,000 a year steelworker, then 4 per cent is more than enough for the vice-president of the steel company. But no, he will get the same increase as the low income earners in his own company. We are seeing increases that are in excess, in terms of total dollars, of what is seemly and fair compared to what the overwhelming number of Canadians have to live on.

We have been saying for some years that restraint has to come about in many forms. We have been pleading for a prices and incomes review board that has teeth and the backing of this parliament as well as the confidence of the people of this country. Then any increase in professional fees or prices of steel products or other major commodities would have to be submitted to the board and justified. Any increases they could not justify would not be allowed, and any increases in excess of what could be justified would be rolled back. We have to be fair: any modest increase that could be justified or proven necessary would be allowed.

I am sure that if the board had that kind of authority and the backing of this parliament, it would also have the confidence and the trust of the people of Canada. Instead of that, we have a board that has no power and no authority; it is limited to food prices only. The way the government set up this board ruined a good idea because the government went only part way.

We have been urging a fair tax system because the low and middle income people of this country are still paying a disproportionate share of the tax bill. In comparison with the high salaried people and corporations, the low and middle income people are still carrying the greatest portion of the tax load of this country. We have an unfair tax system. Surely this is an area in which we could show some restraint so that those who need should get, instead of those who have been getting it all.

We have been urging a two-price system in respect of many commodities. If a two-price system is logical and proper for wheat and oil, and we in this party think it is, it is equally logical and proper in respect of all other grains, lumber, steel products, chemicals, fertilizers, farm machinery and trucks. Instead of that, we are telling our low and middle income people to show restraint, and we are requiring them to pay phony international prices that bear no relationship whatsoever to the cost of producing the product and moving it to their homes.

Until about a year and a half ago we were paying unrealistically high prices for lumber products, not because it cost that much to produce the lumber in British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec, but because those were the prices industry could get on the international market. The Canadian consumer was stuck with the same international price. Why should we have a two-price system just for wheat and oil? If we want to reduce the demand for increased wages and salaries by many Canadians, we must do something about what it costs them to obtain a decent home. There must be a program of selective controls on basic industry. We must not only have a two-price system in respect of basic commodities but we must have selective controls, and I think again of steel and forest products.

The Liberals and Tories talk about the fight against inflation, but when they come out with proposals like those in bills C-44, C-47 and C-24, to me this is just talk and nothing else. When the economy gets really bad, the government will act, supported by the official opposition. When the government acts, it will act against the old age pensioners and others on low and fixed incomes. The government will tell them they are getting too greedy, they are too well off and they will get increases of more than 12 per cent or $2,400 a year. The government will pick on the overwhelming majority of people in this country; that is my prediction. This government talks about fighting inflation and showing restraint, but it is only talk and it only applies to people other than judges, members of parliament, senators and lieutenant governors: it does not apply to corporation executives or professional people.

I did not hear the Minister of Finance complain about the increases that have been taken in the past year and a half by the medical profession in the ten provinces. They have been increasing fees by 10 per cent, and 10 per cent on $70,000 for a doctor is a pretty nice increase. I should think that 3 per cent or 4 per cent would have been plenty. They have been taking successive increases of 5 per cent to 10 per cent, just the same as the lawyers, engineers, accountants and architects, all of whom got their increases without having to bargain. They never had to ask anyone's permission, yet all their incomes have been rising rapidly. They are all in the upper-middle or high income levels. No one has said a word about showing restraint in relation to those professionals. We did not hear a word in this regard from the Minister of Finance or from the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Let me remind hon. members of the increase in corporate profits, especially in 1974. In the last few months we have heard a lot of weeping and wailing about corporate profits falling. There has been a great gnashing of teeth in this regard, but let me suggest—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I have listened very attentively to the hon. member and I am wondering whether he is still speaking on Bill C-24. Perhaps he could limit his remarks to that bill.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, I am arguing that increases in incomes such as those proposed in Bill C-24, and as proposed in bills C-47 and C-44, are unjustified. The Minister of Finance and the Leader of the Opposition talked about restraint, but they did not show any restraint in respect of those bills. The Leader of the Opposition did not say a word about restraint in respect of Bill C-44. It seems to me that anything we do in the way of restraint should apply to Bill C-24, and should have applied to Bills, C-47 and C-44. It should also apply to Bill C-23 when it comes before the House. I could get up and make the same speech again on Bill C-23 if necessary, Madam Speaker.

How can members sit here and support the increases we are suggesting for lieutenant governors and what we did for judges, MPs and senators, and not do anything about the incomes of corporate executives, and corporate profits, while at the same time supporting restraint for all others? How can they do that and expect the public to believe them or have any confidence in them when they speak about restraints, particularly when they know at the outset that they are unfair. The people know that those who already have are the ones who get more and the ones who will not be affected by restraints, or at least they will be affected to a very minor extent by any government program of restraint and control. If the government does resort to mandatory controls, then those who already have been given more through bills C-44 and C-47, and will be given more by bills C-24 and C-23, will not be affected: they will already have their increases. The ones who have not received increases will be hit by these controls whether they are voluntary or mandatory.

The people on low and middle incomes are the ones who will be told not to ask for more or not to ask for too much. They are the ones who will be told to ask for just a little bit. The ones who are getting $10,000 to $12,000 a year, with a wife, three kids and mortgaged up to the eyeballs, will be told not to ask for more. This is intrinsically unfair, yet the Leader of the Opposition acquiesced supinely to bills C-44, C-47, and now C-24. I find this incomprehensible. I would suggest to the Leader of the Opposition that he read the remarks of a member of his own party, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I will say nothing more on that subject.

To show how callous the Minister of Finance is, the only defence he made in response to criticisms about these huge increases was that the timing was lousy. If that does not reflect real disregard for the people on pensions and low and fixed incomes in this country, I do not know what does. Not only was the timing lousy; the amounts were lousy. The increases for lieutenant governors in this bill are being justified to us on the basis that they have not had an increase for 12 years. It is said that if you work the increases out on a percentage basis over the 12-year period, they are reasonable. One could do that with an increase in the income of John D. Rockefeller or E. P. Taylor; you could say that because they have not had an increase for 12 years, 1 per cent would be justified—but 1 per cent of tens of millions of dollars is quite an increase.

Another point that is bandied about is the percentage increase. If the increase is 12 per cent of $35,000 or $55,000, that is a different ball game compared to an increase of 12 per cent of $10,000 or $12,000. It is suggested that an increase in salary to $35,000, $40,000 or $45,000 for judges is not too much because when you work it out on a percentage basis over a four or five-year period, it only comes to about 12 per cent per year and that is within the suggested restraint guidelines. They do not talk much about 12 per cent of what. It works out to an increase of $15,000 a year. That is as much, or more, than the majority of wage earners in this country earn in a whole year. That is how much the increase is for the first year.

I agree with the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the Leader of the Opposition and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) about the respect due to people who hold positions such as that of lieutenant governor or judge in our country. But I suggest those people are of such a calibre that they should be the first to say, if there is a sacrifice to be made, restraint to be shown and leadership to be given to all our population, they should be first in line, instead of asking the workers of Canada and pensioners to be first in line when it comes to exercising restraint. We should be saying to the corporate executives, the professionals and others that they, corporate profits and interests rates should be first in line in respect of restraint and controls. We should start at the top and work down. We should have a little more equality and decency in this society, instead of sitting here mouthing restraint and talking about fighting inflation which ends up as a fight against the poor.

We are dividing our people even more by helping those at the top and decreasing the opportunities of the low and middle income people to own decent homes. The whole attempts of the government to arrive at a program to fight inflation that would have the support and co-operation of the provinces, the municipalities and the public at large is shot full of holes by the succession of steps that have been taken in the past year. The four bills I have mentioned are just four of those steps. There is the constant rise in interest rates in respect of homes, the unconscionable program which instead of getting more houses built is getting fewer houses built, and the attack on the people who are unemployed as well as the failure to increase pensions.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member again, but I am afraid he is straying from the subject matter of the bill. May I remind the hon. member that Standing Order 35 states that no member may reflect upon any vote of the House except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded. The remarks of the hon. member in respect of Bill C-44 are not in order under this Standing Order.

Mr. Benjamin: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am referring not only to Bill C-44 but also Bill C-24, Bill C-47 and Bill C-23. I thought that Bill C-44 and these other bills were good examples of what we have in Bill C-24. They are four examples of the government's attempts to restrain and fight inflation not being worth the paper they are written on. I ask, Madam Speaker, what is the difference? One could refer at length to the income proposal for lieutenant governors, but I do not see much difference in that and what the percentages are from what was proposed for judges and MPs. I thought we should broaden it out a bit and be fair. There is also the case of moonlighting teachers and the salaries of professors. I think the kind of income university professors have been getting is disgraceful when they have been drawing up all kind of plans designed to help the poor. Bill C-24 is not deserving of passage, just as all the others.

I am saddened and disappointed by the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition and his casual way of passing this off, even though he was in favour of controlling prices and incomes in the past two or three years, as though it is something we do not need to worry about because one cannot just pick out lieutenant governors, and so on. I repeat, and I shall close with these comments, that we should not be increasing the salaries of those who are in the $25,000 to $75,000 income bracket, because surely this is where you start if you want to do something about inflation. Surely they are the kind of people who should be setting the example and leading the way.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the hon. member rising to ask a question?

Mr. Francis: I rise on a point of order, Madam Chairman. I should like to refer to section (1) of Standing Order 31 which says that unless otherwise provided in the Standing Orders, no member may speak for more than 40 minutes at a time in any debate. The hon. member has spoken for more than 40 minutes.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, I assumed that you knew what you were doing. I realized that my time was almost over.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The record shows that the hon. member has not passed the 40-minute limit.

Mr. Francis: Madam Speaker, the hon. member began his speech last night. I have watched carefully, and certainly by my count he has exceeded 40 minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The record shows that the hon. member is within the 40-minute limit. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin).

Mr. Benjamin: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I knew that you and the table were keeping an accurate record, and accuracy is not something for which the hon. member is noted. I shall repeat my final sentence, because obviously the hon. member was not listening when he interrupted me. I said that we should start at the top when we want restraint and want to fight inflation: we should start with MPs, senators, corporate executives, judges, lieutenant governors, and professional people. I submit that this kind of legislation flies in the face of that principle.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Madam Speaker, I sympathize with the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) because while the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) may not have used up his 40 minutes, from what he had to say one could easily think he had been speaking for hours and hours in terms of picayune, petty, partisan nonsense. Perhaps the fact that this should come from the mouth of such an intelligent member of the House—of course, the fact that he belongs to the party he does to some extent disavows my description of his being intelligent—could be ascribed to the fact that somewhere in the great prairies there is an election going on in the province of Saskatchewan, and the hon. member is looking far beyond Saskatchewan where his party is in serious trouble because it is a party which—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but whatever was ruled in respect of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre also applies to the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On a point of order, Madam Speaker, may I say that I have known the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) for some time, and I would think, as the hon. member for Mississauga (Mr. Abbott) said a few days ago, he was in the process of clearing his throat ready to make a speech.

● (1240)

Mr. Baldwin: Madam Speaker, I undertake not to depart further from the rules than did the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre. Having indulged in these few pleasantries to start with—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If those are pleasantries, what will you use for an attack?

Mr. Baldwin: I shall have some more pleasantries later; I am just getting started. Last night the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) took the same attitude as the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) with regard to the bill that had come up before, that the place to make any suggestions as to changes in the salaries fixed by the bill is the standing committee. The Leader of the Opposition said that we are in full accord with the principle of this bill and we think there should be some increase in the salaries, but that this is a matter for the committee to decide, not the House. The House can decide to be against this bill on the grounds that we are against the principle that there should be an increase in the salaries of lieutenant governors.

I think the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre went far astray in his description of what was said by the Leader of the Opposition last night, in the same way as he disclaimed, in the course of his speech, the extent of the demagoguery which has animated his party with regard to all these bills. In a very narrow sense, what the hon. member said may be correct but it has to be construed in an exceedingly narrow sense, if one has to examine this against the whole broad background of the national and international economic situation, what the hon. member is saying is just as demagogic as what was said by some of his colleagues on the other bills dealing with salaries of members of the House and salaries of judges.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: That demagoguery was found in several parts of this House; it was not necessarily all in the NDP.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Explain!

Mr. Baldwin: It is patent nonsense to argue that, for example—taking the lieutenant governors whose salaries are the subject of this bill—the last occasion on which we dealt with these salaries was 1963, because in the same way a number of years elapsed before members of parliament and members of the judiciary received an increase in their salaries. If anyone suggests to me that the time which elapsed was of such a length that there was ample opportunity for those who felt it their duty to set an example at the highest level, I say that an example was being set in this House with respect to the judiciary and lieutenant governors. But did that stop people from demanding, and receiving, a larger share of the economic pie than perhaps was justified—such segments of society as industry, business, international unions and other people? I will not go into a preview of the budget debate, but to listen to the arrant nonsense to which we have had to listen inside and outside the House is, to me, quite objectionable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I think we should look at the true picture. Indeed, people should try to set an example; but we have to go beyond that. What we are finding now—and it is true with regard to lieutenant governors, the judiciary and members of parliament—is that when many years ago this country and other countries set their course on a pattern of developing social assistance programs, with which I and other members of the House agreed, we failed to take into consideration the necessity of linking them to the capacity of the country to sustain and support them. For the last 10 or 12 years people have been demanding, and receiving, more than we have been able to produce in this nation through people in the agricultural sector, the labour sector, industry and individuals who by their ingenuity have created an economy of usefulness and value. As a result, we are facing a very serious situation with regard to inflation.

This is not the time to go into that matter, but I want to make it plain. To say, as my friends to the left have been saying and as we have heard through the media and in the country, that a small group of ten people, whose salaries obviously have been inadequate over the last 12 or 13 years, should now be the subject of attack such as was launched by members of the party to my left is, to me, completely inexcusable. It is not a situation which has contributed in any sense to the inflationary processes in this country, and I suggest that we have to look much deeper for the causes of this situation. The kind of demagoguery which we have heard from that party is simply nauseating.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: It should have no effect on the approach of hon. members to the bill that is before us.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to follow the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) in this debate. Although I know there are differences of opinion among members of the House about the devotion of some members from time to time, I do not think any person in the House would indicate anything but the highest regard for the involvement in all aspects of public life of the hon. member for Peace River.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): When we look back over the difficulties and vicissitudes of public life, not only of members of the House but of members of the judiciary and of lieutenant governors, and the restrictions on life in general, we should listen very carefully to the words of a person who has made great sacrifices in order to serve his country in this House. Having heard the member of the NDP who just resumed his seat—I do not wish to cast any reflections on him—I feel bound to say that I heard a speech by the resident hypocrite of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: I am glad you are trying to be nice.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I hope that when the time comes at the end of this month to collect the bounty that has been given to us and for which all of us are grateful—most of us, in any event—he will be at the front of the second line, that is, the line of those who will turn their money over to some worthy charity such as "Beans for Benjamin" or something like that.

● (1250)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think it is extremely important that we recognize a couple of facts about lieutenant governors. There are lieutenant governors in each of the provinces, and each province has treated its lieutenant governor a little differently in terms of the prerequisites of the office. Some lieutenant governors, for instance, are supplied with homes. However, I am advised that the NDP government of Saskatchewan in 1944 decided to do away with having a home for their lieutenant governor, through some mystical form of tokenism with regard to savings, and ever since the person who occupies that office has had to rent a suite in keeping with his position. The people of Saskatchewan and the successive governments of Saskatchewan have regretted that shortsighted tokenism. The government of that day, as I recollect my history, was led by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas).

I think we have to be careful when we consider the positions some men and women of this country are privileged to occupy. When I consider that, through neglect or otherwise, there has been no increase in the emoluments or the salaries of that office since 1962 or 1963, frankly I think that is scandalous. I hope the government House leader will not take this to heart, but I think there has been considerable neglect by the government, and it is neglect which cannot carry on forever.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I will when I have finished.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will that be this morning, or this afternoon?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I do not want to interrupt the hon. member's lunch hour; it is likely to be this afternoon. If the hon. member is taking that as an undertaking, and if he wants to go to the parliamentary restaurant and have his lunch now, he can do so and I will be available to answer the question this afternoon.

Mr. Benjamin: He doesn't go there.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If he wants to have soup and a sandwich in his office, he can do that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am staying right here.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What I am saying is that in Canada there are ten lieutenant governors, all of them men and women who distinguished themselves not just in professional callings but in service to the public long before they ever came to that office: that is why the prime minister of the day invited them to take the office. The people of Canada should be grateful to them, not just for their past service but for the fact that they accepted the office. When I think of the neglect over the last 12 years, I believe we should be doubly grateful to the men and women who have accepted the office under those circumstances.

It is very easy to take pot-shots at people in public life. Members of parliament are in the controversial field of active, open and overt politics and we have to expect these things from time to time. It does not make the criticism levelled at members of parliament less valid, but quite candidly I do not like members of the judiciary of this country, a judiciary which has a remarkable record in terms of the quality of the men and women who have accepted appointment to the Bench and have cut themselves off from their profession, to be the subject of some of the things that we heard today. I take great umbrage at the lieutenant governors of the provinces being subject to this kind of crass, low, political attack in this chamber. The representatives of Her Majesty the Queen in all the provinces are being attacked.

I will criticize the government for not bringing in legislation sooner and for not establishing a system by which there could be an annual review of these salaries, just as I criticize it for not doing the same for the judiciary, and certainly for members of parliament. If there are some hon. members of this House who can stand up and say this is wrong, perhaps it is within the rules of the House and within the rules of public debate on public matters but it is in the poorest taste, and I think the hon. member who will be the beneficiary of the "Beans for Benjamin" fund which is to be established will regret, on reflection after reading his speech, that he ever raised the matter in the way he did.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Having said that, I do not want to suggest that there are not groups in Canada who must have their wages, salaries and pensions adjusted. That is a problem we are faced with. That is the great challenge to the government. That is the challenge the government has not met, as the situation has deteriorated since 1963. When postal workers demand more money, when the GLT workers in the public service demand more money, when old age pensioners say that they are falling further and further behind, they are really saying that we have to take a new look at the redistribution of income in this country. With that I agree; but to use that as the platform to attack the Crown and those men and women who give something to this country I think is most unfair, and I am sorry that speech was made by the hon. member from Saskatchewan.

Madam Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, just before the luncheon adjournment I was talking about the question of the redistribution of income in Canada. I was speaking in the context of the remarks of members of the New Democratic Party with respect to where the thrust ought to be in terms of redistribution of income. I said there are no two ways about it: the great challenge facing Canadians and this government—and we have to judge whether it has been successful—is on the whole question of redistribution of income.

In this country there have been no national guidelines with respect to redistribution of income. Those who have been strong in the constituencies represented by my friends in the New Democratic Party have been able to chase a larger and larger piece of the economic pie: an economic pie which itself is not growing any larger. As a result, pressures are built into our economic system that are now laid on the doorstep of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). One of the groups that is not strong, one of the groups that is small, one of the groups that is performing a sound constitutional function within our system is the group of ten lieutenant governors who are the subject of this legislation. I think it is important that we give them the recognition the position warrants.

I should like, now, to turn to yesterday's debate on this subject, Madam Speaker. I do not often agree with the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), but he said something yesterday which I can endorse. At page 5853 of Hansard he said:

> Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to recognize the continuing importance in our constitutional system of the functions discharged by lieutenant governors of the provinces—

He added that there ought not to be, as a matter of principle—a principle that everyone in this House can support, I am sure—continuation of the practice of having a variation in the salaries and remuneration paid to lieutenant governors dependent upon the size of the province in which they have the honour to be the Queen's representative. I think it is extremely important that this be recognized. After all, the functions are the same, the constitutional duties are the same and the representation asked of the office is the same. I think it is high time this legislation was brought in to change a principle that I gather has been in force for a great many years.

We do not support this bill to reward the "fortunate ten" in Canada, nor to denigrate those who are not so fortunate through no fault of their own but perhaps because their circumstances are beyond their control. We support the bill because we earnestly believe that the principle set forth in the bill regarding the amounts is proper. We also believe that we can debate this matter until the cows come home and never settle on what is a proper amount. We support the bill and believe that it ought to go to committee where the whole question can be examined in depth. I think this is a position worth taking.

The President of the Privy Council said that in the table of precedence in Canada, lieutenant governors rank immediately after the federal cabinet. I have reservations about that. I have very high regard for lieutenant governors of the provinces, and I do not know whether they should be placed below the "salt". Even placed in that position of some disadvantage, however, the office is worthy of Canadians of the highest calibre who from time to time are asked to accept it.

I have always taken the view that the salaries and allowances paid to people in public office, whether in the political sphere, the judicial sphere or, as in this case, the vice-regal sphere, ought never to be the enticement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I hope the lone representative of the press gallery feels properly welcomed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I have said that I do not believe salaries and allowances ought to be the enticement into public life, but at the same time they ought not to be a deterrent to people wanting to continue in public life, on the one hand, or to good people wishing to enter public life, on the other hand. I have been shocked lately at the attitude of people who should know better with respect to this principle. This is a difficult balance to strike and I am sure in this legislation the government is attempting to find it. Whether they are successful will be for the committee and, ultimately, this House to decide. The government must strive for the balance, however, so that when the Prime Minister of this country asks a man or a woman to become the lieutenant governor of a province, he or she will neither be deterred nor attracted by the remuneration but will be attracted by the opportunity presented for further public service.

What do I mean when I speak of further public service? I mean this: I am satisfied that no prime minister, no matter which party he leads, would select for office any person who has not demonstrated throughout his lifetime the ability and desire to serve the public of Canada. We should remember something else: public life entails sacrifices. I am new to public life and, in personal terms, I do not know all the sacrifices. I know that some have been in public life much longer than I or many members of this House. It is important not to overlook the sacrifices and penalties of public life, even though those in public life are not conscripts to it.

We should make sure that the sacrifices involved do not deter entry into public life of those about whom we have talked in the last few days. Today we are discussing the lieutenant governors of provinces—a small group. Judges form a larger group, and members of parliament, given the turnover in membership of this House, an even larger group. These groups are important to Canada. We should not lose sight of this fact. It is important for us not to become cynical. It is important for the media of this country not to be cynical about our institutions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We must not deter good men and women from serving, because there is always a place in public life for those who want to serve. There is always a place for them at some level. As I say, today we are discussing those who hold the office of lieutenant governor of a province. We should not forget this. These days we see rhetoric in print, cynical newspaper reports and advertising the like of which I have never seen before. Such activities do nothing except denigrate those in public life in this country, denigrate this institution and, in some respects, come close to denigrating our courts. If we are not careful they can denigrate the office of the Queen's representatives in the provinces.

Lastly, I ask hon. members to remember that in the province the lieutenant governor performs the function of the Governor General of this country. His constitutional duties are similar to those of the Governor General. Speaking as a member of this House and as a Canadian, I want to entice good people to that office and not see such people deterred from seeking office because of extraneous considerations which have nothing to do with the office. I want people to seek that office for the sake of the duties of the office. I would like to be able to say that there is a reasonable hope of adequate recompense. That is really what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) meant last night when he said in the House that he supported this bill and wanted it to go to committee, where these questions can be discussed.

I am angry when I hear my friends of the NDP talking about restraint. The fact is that they have not given, and are not prepared to give, anything but lip service to any program of restraint in this country. What has happened in the past will demonstrate the truth of my assertions more eloquently than anything I can say. It is important for us to exercise restraint. It is important for us to do our best for the less fortunate. But let me say that the NDP has no monopoly on that concern. I do not want anyone to think that my party or the leader of my party has not been concerned for a long time about lack of restraint and what it has done to the less fortunate. Need I remind the House that an election was fought in 1974 partly on the issue of restraint? The death-bed conversion of the last eight months or so, this turn around in government thinking, shows how right my leader was in 1974.

We support this bill, Madam Speaker, because we believe in the office and believe that the restrictions of the office, the inability of the office-holder to engage in commercial or professional enterprise, ought to be considered. I hope we shall never again hear the kind of speech that was made just before the luncheon adjournment about the holders of this office. Let me say to the government House leader that all kinds of public salaries falling within federal jurisdiction ought to be reviewed regularly, so that never again will the situation arise, through negligence, forgetfulness or any other reason, in which the salaries of public servants, including those of lieutenant governors and people in a similar position, are overlooked. We must avoid doing anything which brings the institution as such into disrepute because of the actions of those who attack it in a misguided way.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, before lunch the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) said that he would accept a question of mine at the end of his speech. Will he now do so?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is prompted by a remark the hon. member made before one o'clock, to the effect that it is scandalous that these salaries have not been increased since 1962 or 1963. Does the hon. member not know that not one of our lieutenant governors was in office at that time; that seven of them have been in office for three years or less?

Mr. MacFarlane: I thought you were going to ask a question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am glad to see my hon. friend here on Friday afternoon.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He is always here.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As this increase is to be awarded to some who have given, so far, only three or four years of service, does the hon. member not feel that he was putting it a bit strongly when he said the delay is scandalous?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, with respect—I have great respect for my hon. friend who is my neighbour outside the House and my colleague in this House, although I do not always agree with his opinions—I feel that the office itself, and not the one who may be the incumbent from time to time, is really the subject of the debate on this bill. The point I was trying to make was that the salary should be the last consideration which should either entice prospective office-holders into public life or deter them from it. Salary should be the last thing on the mind of the prospective office-holder when the Prime Minister offers the appointment.

I must say I do not know any of the gentlemen involved—I do know the one lady lieutenant governor—but I would be surprised if one of the considerations which went through the minds of prospective lieutenant governors was not the question of salary and allowances, especially in view of the fact that the person appointed might have to give up any interests which would conceivably be in conflict with his office, which could mean giving up virtually everything in terms of a business or other profession. Even though others have accepted appointment since 1962 to this high office, this does not remove from the government the obligation to increase the salaries paid in a regular way having regard to conditions in society.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit one further question?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): I would remind the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that we are not in committee of the whole. However, perhaps the hon. member will allow a second question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In this instance the hon. member may well be agreeing with me. In view of his support of the principle of paying the same rate to lieutenant governors in all provinces, thus establishing a national rather than a regional rate, does he not believe that this strengthens our case for national rates to be paid in the public service generally?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I do not know whether the question can be regarded as anything other than frivolous.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is very serious.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member and I are among many in this chamber who are actively engaged, almost on a day to day basis, with issues affecting the public service. One of these is the question of national rates—the justice of such rates, or otherwise. I would not want to give an answer to this question other than the one I have given: I would have to examine the situation very carefully before I could answer specifically whether national rates would be applicable to the public service.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I rise on a point of order arising out of a reference by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) to the one member of the press Gallery who is present. My point of order is this: I hope the lone member will assess, in terms of quantity, the quality of the press gallery, as its members consistently try to assess the quality of this chamber in terms of quantity.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. That is not a valid point of order.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): One might even mention that they are still up in the subsidized restaurant.

An hon. Member: Obviously, there are no newspapers in Miramichi.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, if I may return the debate to a semi-serious tone, at least I would like to say one or two things about the bill before us. I am referring, of course, to the interruptions and not to the very excellent speech of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

I am very happy to speak on the measure before us and I have no reservation at all in commending the minister responsible, not only for the legislation but for the remarks which he made. They struck me as being very apropos, very sound constitutionally, and a serious prelude to a measure which is extremely important. I have no personal axe to grind—I am as likely to become a lieutenant governor as I am to become a senator.

Mr. McGrath: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: It is the impossible dream of my public career!

Mr. Basford: Which do you want?

Mr. Macquarrie: Yes the legislation before us is a source of personal satisfaction to me because ever since I came to this House I have been appalled by the inequity which existed as between provinces. During the years when the Progressive Conservative Party was in office in the country, I spent much time and effort pleading with the Hon. Donald Fleming to make adjustments. The rate in Prince Edward Island was $8,000, in Quebec and Ontario it was $10,000 and in all the other provinces it was $9,000. I could never find anyone who could explain to me why that situation should prevail. I commend the government for establishing, once and for all, that since the provinces are juridically equal and constitutionally equal—if, god knows, not economically equal—the very epitome of their constitution, the chief person there, the lieutenant governor, should reflect that in this particular matter. It is for this reason that I commend the government for recognizing this aspect. I think where the minister shows wisdom is in recognizing differences in expenditure. This is done through the expense allowances. It just happens that it is not always the lieutenant governor of the largest province or the most populous province who most dutifully fills that office or works hardest at it.

I remember that one of our journalists, who is not in the gallery at the present time, Charles Lynch, made quite a sensation in Prince Edward Island when he visited Government House and was reported to have found the wife of the lieutenant governor sewing up drapes in preparation for the royal visit. Some people were appalled by that, but I was not at all disturbed. She was the wife of a very distinguished soldier and scholar, she was the mother of very distinguished Canadians in the professions, in the arts, and if she sews as part of her devotion to her duties, it does not offend me at all.

I remember another governor of Prince Edward Island, the late Governor MacKay, who died only about a year ago, I think. There was a young lad of about 13 who had been sent by his teacher to find out all he could about Government House. He went to the Island Heritage and got the pamphlets there, but he thought he might investigate a little further. He had nerve enough to go up to the front door of Government House and was admitted by Lieutenant Governor MacKay who took him through the ancient and very beautiful building. The young fellow told his mother later that the lieutenant governor had told him many things which were not in the booklet. When he was through with the tour, he was taken to the kitchen where Mrs. MacKay gave him some milk and cookies. That is probably a more eloquent demonstration of the value of an office properly filled than the treatises of many learned political scientists.

I suggest that we must believe in this system; and those who know me in the House know that I am not an emotional monarchist but that I am a rational monarchist. I suppose this is what you would expect from one whose forefathers were defeated in 1745. We have lost a certain sense of emotion because our man was beaten there. If the system is to function, we must respect the office. I would assiduously avoid dragging the office of the lieutenant governor through any bric-a-brac about costs and salaries. I believe that my colleague who has just spoken is profoundly correct when he stated—and it is something which has concerned me throughout my life, especially in the last few years—that there is great danger in the tendency to play the political game, to denigrate not only the participants but the institutions.

I think in recent years, the press in this country, which I fear is not as strong or as perceptive or as sensitive as it should be, in getting after the politicians, who are fair game, may bring down the institution with them. We are inured to and expect criticism. There is a syndrome about the politician; we are supposed to be smooth and hypocritical. But when this is moved over to a denigration of the House of Commons or parliament itself, then we are in danger.

I do not care for this discussion about the occupants of a gubernatorial office belonging to a political party; that they are this or that. It is an office which we respect and one that is essential to our system. If we do not regard it with the proper respect and dignity and, I hope, affection, then we should change the system. We are talking about the most important person in each province, man or woman. It is the number one person occupying a post of honour that should not be restricted to the rich and well born. To do so would be disastrous. I have known people in my own province, the small province of Prince Edward Island, who have been fine, dedicated men who have exhausted a great deal of their personal finances in doing a proper job as lieutenant governor, and that should not be. That is wrong. Nor should the post be exclusive to those who may have gone in for earning, as R. B. Bennett used to say, a competence. There are, alas, a great many people in this country who are not rich, and I could be one of their best spokesmen, knowing a good deal about it.

Therefore, I commend this new recognition of equality, constitutionally and juridically, among the provinces. I hope this measure will not be mired down by sniping about who is more restrained than someone else. I think these ten people, no matter who they are, should have conferred upon them by this parliament a respect for their performance of a highly important duty.

The office of lieutenant governor has been often overlooked by our students and scholars in political science. I do not suppose I am the favoured colleague of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), but I was profoundly impressed by the quality of the people whom he appointed to the office of lieutenant governor. Over the years I happened to become acquainted with nearly all of them. They were adornments to the office. They were more than adornments; they were functioning in an office which they filled nobly.

One of these appointees—I do not know how widely this is known—had a little difficulty on a royal visit with one of the members of the royal family. In a fit of pique, I suppose, she declined to meet any more people and said she was not going to have any more people presented to her. This very distinguished and able lieutenant governor to this member of the royal family, using the proper tone of address but also showing the power of his own office, said, "I hope you will not force me to act in my role as Her Majesty's representative and command you to go to this presentation". He knew his office, and it is an important office. And this is an important bill. But, Madam Speaker, it is surely not, and should not be, a controversial one.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

INCOME TAX ACT

REMOVAL OF PROVISION ALLOWING DEDUCTION OF EXPENSES FOR ADVERTISING IN NON-CANADIAN PERIODICALS

The House resumed, from Thursday, May 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-58, to amend the Income Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, I hope I am not establishing a precedent by having made a speech yesterday and making another today, but I had planned on speaking on this measure for some time. I think the minister will know the position that I am going to take. According to the title of this bill, which is described as Bill C-58, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, it is a very innocuous little bill, but I get pretty worked up about this sort of thing. Of all the matters I inherited from my constituency, I have never had so much correspondence as on this matter. I have received over 263 letters about Readers' Digest and Time magazine.

Let me say at the outset that I am not speaking as one who is prejudiced against Time or Readers' Digest, particularly Time. I recall a cartoon by that great cartoonist, MacPherson, that appeared in the Toronto Star in which three people were putting various ingredients into Mr. Stanfield's salad. The cartoon was with reference to a meeting held in Saskatoon. I was not at the meeting and had no part in it, so I called up the editor of the Toronto Star and of Time. I do not know whether it is because of my physical make-up, but my wife always maintains that I do not cartoon very easily, and they had my name on my tie so there was no mistaking who I was. I cannot remember whether I was putting glass into the salad or something worse, but I hired some lawyers and received an apology both from the Toronto Star and Time. I think Time carried an article saying "Woolliams is innocent." I felt as though I had just been tried for murder and acquitted by a jury.

So after that introduction, Madam Speaker, I am certainly not speaking from any prejudice. However, I have always felt that Time gave a kind of capsule or pill version of the news and never really carried the news itself. They tend to editorialize the news. But this is not what I want to speak about this afternoon. I came here this afternoon because I am pretty concerned that by means of a tax measure we have brought censorship into this country.

An hon. Member: Oh, no!

Mr. Woolliams: My hon. friend says, "Oh, no". If this bill passes, the Readers' Digest and Time magazine will likely come off the news shelves in Canada. One of the most fundamental freedoms of all is surely freedom of speech. From freedom of speech flows democracy; and freedom of the press, of course, follows from that. It might be a good idea for my hon. friend who says, "Oh, no" to look at chapter 44 of the Revised Statutes of Canada and read section 2 of the Canadian Bill of Rights, which crystallizes the common law not only of the Commonwealth but particularly the law that we have inherited in statute form through our constitution from the British system. I maintain that if this act passes, it will permit not only this act but the act covering taxation in this field to allow a group of bureaucrats to determine what Canadians will be able to read.

● (1440)

I only know of few countries, even today, that have taken such drastic steps. One is the U.S.S.R. We have only to think of one of the great writers of today who was forced out of his homeland, Mr. Solzhenitsyn. Let me remind hon. members of what he said when he first escaped. He said that when you curtailed the press or tried to curtail freedom of speech, whether by taxation or otherwise, you turned back the pages of history of the country 700 or 800 years. Let me read from the Bill of Rights, which states:

> It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex, the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely,
> (a) the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law;
> (b) the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law;
> (c) freedom of religion;
> (d) freedom of speech;
> (e) freedom of assembly and association; and
> (f) freedom of the press.

This minister and this government are trying to bring about censorship in respect of what Canadians should read. For some unknown reason this government and members of other parties seem to think there is some great Canadian nationalism in the fact that you are anti-American.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I do not know whether the hon. member is applauding because he is anti-American or pro-Canadian. However, you can certainly be pro-Canadian without being anti-anything. But I wonder about the policies of this government which have recognized those countries which have been taken over by the communists in the last little while. Now this government wants to bring in censorship on what we should read.

Mr. Faulkner: Read the bill, Eldon.

Mr. Woolliams: I have read the bill, and I will let the chips fall where they may. I knew the minister would get upset, Madam Speaker, because the truth is apparent. Many and varied, indeed, are the ties that bind Canada and the United States together as virtually the last remaining bulwarks of freedom in this collectivistic world. We have a common heritage. Our ancestors came from the same part of the world. We have the same basic political make-up, although we have a different constitution and a parliamentary system, whereas they have a republican system. We have the same spiritual ideals and we have enjoyed 150 years of unbroken peace along the longest unfortified frontier in the world.

It seems to me the government is bringing in a bill of this nature because they think it will do something for Canadianism. After listening to members of the NDP, I have come to the conclusion that some of them enjoy being anti-American. I was born in Canada and my people came out here before the railway was completed out west. I am proud to be a Canadian and I am also proud I was born in western Canada where there are open spaces and where the people really know what freedom means as they look across the plains toward the mountains. This is what my friends want to take away.

The minister talks about Reader's Digest as being American, or an American periodical. Reader's Digest is not an American periodical; it is an international periodical. Those people who hate the United States because they think that will make them pro-Canadian should take a look at what is in the April edition of Reader's Digest. I do not intend to read the whole thing; I just want to give some titles.

An hon. Member: We hope not.

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member says he hopes I will not read the whole thing. Let me remind him that this is a very serious debate. I do not think we have said enough or have been strong enough about what is taking place. A lot of things have taken place since 1968, particularly when we think about the turn of events in respect of foreign policy in this country. Let us consider the first article in the April edition of Reader's Digest which is entitled "Man's First Home in Space". It is to be found at page 33. This article was not written especially for Reader's Digest but, rather, it came from National Geographic.

An hon. Member: That's a subversive group!

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, they are terrible. Then we have an article entitled "Killer Hurricane" which deals with hurricanes and their causes. It comes from a paper called The Americas. We then find an article entitled "The Wild, Free Life of Andy Russell". It is taken from Outdoor Canada, a Canadian magazine. We then have an article headed "Have a Good Cry". I don't know what that means, but that was written by a Canadian author for the Vancouver Sun.

Mr. Basford: You are not sticking up for the Vancouver Sun, surely.

Mr. Woolliams: I will stick up for any Canadian paper or article written by a Canadian, and I suggest that the people of Canada should have the right to read any kind of literature written by any writer or philosopher anywhere in the world. I think the only thing the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford) is hoping for is to roll in a few more dollars taken from the wage earners of this country. That is what his government has been doing.

An hon. Member: We need them.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, you need them, the way you spend money on studies and other such things in the extravagant way of this government.

Mr. Crouse: Yes, $70 million more in one year for the Department of National Revenue. No wonder you need it, the way you are wasting money.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I must remind hon. members that they should address the Chair and not members on the other side.

Mr. Crouse: That applies to the minister as well.

Mr. Woolliams: I appreciate that admonition, Madam Speaker, because I deserved it. Sometimes when you are dealing with such sensitive things as freedom of the press you tend to allow your emotions to take over from your brain power.

In looking at these articles we find one from the Vancouver Sun and another from the London Times. If you look at the February edition you will find articles from the Christian Science Monitor, the New York Times and the London Times, along with a number of Canadian articles. What this government is trying to do is put this periodical out of business. This government is frightened about what we might read and feels that if the background is American it might do something to us as Canadians. When I went to university, part of my political science study included the reading of Karl Marx and other writings on the political philosophy and background of communism. Did that make me a communist? I leave that question to you, Madam Speaker.

This government has taken over everything else, and now it wants to tell us what we should read. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) once said he wanted to keep the government out of the bedrooms of the nation. I suggest to you that the Prime Minister and his government should keep the government out of the libraries. To me this is a complete affront and an attack on the freedom of our minds, or freedom in every respect. Let me put on the record some of what the Russian philosopher to whom I have referred said when he left his country. He said he wanted the privilege of reading anything that is written. Mr. Solzhenitsyn then said:

> So let the reader who expects this book to be a political exposé slam its covers shut right now.

This was a man who was educated in a communist state, but he is capable of the most beautiful philosophy and English language. He wrote the following:

> If only it were all so simple! If only there were evil people somewhere insidiously committing evil deeds, and it were necessary only to separate them from the rest of us and destroy them. But the line dividing good and evil cuts through the heart of every human being. And who is willing to destroy a piece of his own heart?
> During the life of any heart this line keeps changing place: sometimes it is squeezed one way by exuberant evil and sometimes it shifts to allow enough space for good to flourish.

● (1450)

> One and the same human being is, at various ages, under various circumstances, a totally different human being. At times he is close to being a devil, at times to sainthood. But his name doesn't change, and to that name we ascribe the whole lot, good and evil.

That is literature from a man who was raised and educated in a communist state during the time of the revolution and the development of Bolshevism, communism and a dictatorship which is really the same thing as socialism in the world. This government would want to choose what we are able to read.

I want to remind Liberals today of another Liberal. I do not know where the Liberal Party has gone and where the Liberal thinkers are. Some years ago in this chamber—and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will recall it because one of his own members, Mr. Rose, left at that time to go to Poland—we heard from one great Liberal. Although it was not because of what was being done in the civil service or what one member of parliament did, people were being arrested for what they may have done and were kept in jail, not charged, interrogated and everything in respect of the scandal at that time in reference to the spy case. At that time, one great Liberal in the cabinet, Mr. Power, who was a minister during the war, stood up and said this:

Non-Canadian Publications

> As for me, brought up in an atmosphere wherein a framed photograph of Magna Carta was on almost every wall, accompanied with a warrant for the execution of Charles I, and steeped through my reading in the traditions of the martyrs of liberty and freedom, I cannot wish to turn back the pages of history seven hundred years and repeal Magna Carta. I cannot by my silence appear to approve even tacitly what I believe to have been a great mistake on the part of the government. If this is to be the funeral of liberalism I do not desire to be even an honorary pall-bearer at the funeral, and I do not wish by not taking part in this debate to give silent approval to the procedure which has taken place.

Where are the Liberals today? They say they are here. They are here in the Liberal Party, but the Liberal philosophy is gone because today they are turning back the pages of history 700 years to tell us what we will read and to go into our libraries and select the reading content in this country. With all the horror with which I have viewed this government, I never thought I would stand in this House of Commons and see censorship by taxation in this country. If that is not turning back the pages of history 700 years, nothing has ever equalled it in my time in this House and I question whether anything will ever equal it again.

I hope this bill dies on the order paper. My friends talk. They do not worry. They are the new Liberals. They are exactly like the Prime Minister said in his writings of 1963. I do not have the quotation before me but I can tell you what he said: he said that a Liberal is an opportunist today, he is a pragmatist and that the name of the game is power; power at any price or for anything. He said all he wanted was power. When he finally became a minister, at that moment the party changed from a Liberal Party to the kind of Trudeauism it has today, with a new foreign policy, selection of what one may read and taxation for pleasure. The attitude is that they are far more able to do it for the people than the people can do it for themselves.

An hon. Member: Read the bill.

Mr. Woolliams: My friend says, "Read the bill". Sometimes I wonder, if these people do read, whether they can think, because they follow blindly what I have just described. The Prime Minister wrote that article and described the philosophy of the party today. The reason they are sitting there is that they love power. When the Prime Minister wrote that article he was asked how the power is held, and he said that you give them a ministership, you give them a parliamentary secretaryship, you give them a senatorship and you give them a judgeship: he said that is how you do it—and that it how they are doing it.

My friend is not sitting quite where she should sit. But it is all right because I do not mind. I did not make the remark to which she alludes, but I am sure it applies to her as it does to me. We are all equal people. I said that I received approximately 200 letters.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The parliamentary secretary rises on a point of privilege.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Madam Speaker, although I do not agree with the hon. member in his premise, I was listening to him courteously and I should like to remind him of the remarks of my colleague from Vancouver-Kingsway who noted that Neanderthal thinking has no place in this chamber.

Mr. Woolliams: I am very glad the parliamentary secretary reminded me of that, because I never argue with the hon. lady to whom she referred who takes the same position on this bill I take. I am glad she brought her into this as evidence, because I have her letter here in which she says that every member of parliament should fight this for all their worth.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Madam Speaker, would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Does the hon. member consider and imply that all ethnic minorities, like all women, think alike and look alike as other minorities and ethnics and women?

Mr. Woolliams: I do not want to get into that, but I believe that the rules in respect of every person, be they female or male, in this chamber apply the same. I have always believed that. I might tell the distinguished lady member of parliament that I have probably defended more ladies at the bar than I have gentlemen, and I have done it with all the vigour at my command.

We are having a great afternoon. There is nothing like the truth to stir up my friends. They listen to certain speeches, with no comment; but when I speak there are questions and answers and the excitement becomes fairly emotional. I should like to read part of a letter I received on May 5. Incidentally, it is from a lady in Vancouver and at the end she has something to say which I believe contains a good point. She says:

> As Canadians we are becoming more aware of ourselves and, in our awareness, less self-conscious and more confident—in our institutions, our way of life—in our country!
> To erect a cultural wall around our various media will serve no useful purpose. Prohibition provides no solutions! Censorship will not work!
> Canadians are strong and mature enough to make their own decisions in the areas of culture and entertainment.
> This is a time for bold and positive legislation in a great many fields. The legislation you have proposed is parochial, unnecessarily restrictive, and not in the best interest of the country or the industry! Your purposes would be much better served by imaginative incentives to create more outlets for Canadian writers in existing publications, and more motivation for Canadian investors to seek opportunities in the publishing field.

In all the more than 200 letters I have received there is not one word of support for government censorship or for this bill. If ever I have had a duty, it is to stand here and fight with all the knowledge and ability at my command to see that we do not have a law in Canada in respect of censorship over what we may read.

● (1500)

Mr. Breau: Where do you see censorship? You can still buy Time.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, but the bill is not through. My hon. friend says that I can still buy Time. All we are doing today is buying time to get rid of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: Time magazine.

[Mrs. Campagnolo.]

Mr. Woolliams: But we have to find out why this happened. Why would a government like this take this position? I know they have great elements of anti-Americanism in their party. One day the Prime Minister said that we must have American capital. Now he says that he never said that. He said he would like much foreign capital but that he just wants to control it. He sure likes control.

I asked myself why this bill came into this House, and when I read an article about Time it finally came to me. The article says:

> 'If Time becomes 75 per cent Canadian-owned but provides four to six pages of Canadian news and then a window on the world through American-tinted glass, that won't be good enough'—Keith Davey

Keith Davey is a magic word in the Liberal party because he brought Mr. Pearson to power and gave the Liberals back their majority. He is the great brain behind the Liberal campaign, and this is the pay off to Mr. Davey, the Senator.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): At least we are not attending the old campground.

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member, whose constituency I forget, is one who makes more speeches from his seat than he makes on his feet. I will let the record decide for itself.

There is one other reason. I read a book once called "Renegade in Power" written by Peter Newman, the editor of Maclean's magazine, so with Keith Davey and the editor of Maclean's magazine I think that is the reason we opt for censorship and drive out Time and Reader's Digest from this country.

I am on the committee and on many other committees. I work when I am on a committee, and I will fight this with all the ability at my command. The government is guilty of implementing a bill of censorship. It is the worst form of taxation in the history of this country. It is a disgrace to the Liberal Party.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. If my hearing is correct, I believe the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) made a statement which is incorrect. I am sure it was inadvertent on his part and that he would be happy to correct it. He referred to Mr. Fred Rose, who was here many years ago, and identified him as a member of my party. That is not correct. Fred Rose was a member of the Communist Party. He got into this House by defeating David Lewis in Cartier in a by election in 1943. I would be grateful if the hon. member would make this correction.

Mr. Woolliams: I appreciate that that is probably correct. They were close together—and I am not saying close together in philosophy. Mr. Coldwell or Mr. Woodsworth was the leader at that time. I believe it was Mr. Coldwell, and you could not find a better Canadian. He happened to be my member of parliament for many years where I was raised. If I left the impression to which the hon. member referred, I certainly would want to correct that on the record.

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this debate to express some very serious reservations about the bill which is before us. I think it is a little unfortunate that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr.

Woolliams) made this a partisan issue because I don't believe it is a partisan issue. Indeed, there are a number of people on this side of the House who would like certain things changed in this bill. That is precisely why a bill is brought before the House, so that we can suggest changes and bring it into committee where we can put forward our amendments and perhaps make it more acceptable to the majority. That is what I intend to do, and I am sure there are a number of other members who have the same idea.

I have reservations about this bill simply because I feel there has not been sufficient effort made to establish guidelines to be followed for a publishing company to maintain its Canadian status. There seems to be an intransigence on the part of the minister to make any compromise on this, and on this point I do not understand the minister. Perhaps he is waiting for committee in order to do that, but I have the feeling that there is an intransigence there to any compromise, and I would like to suggest that we must make some compromise. If the object of the bill is indeed to deliver a death blow to organizations because of their American parenthood, as suggested by the previous speaker, that kind of motivation is nothing but anti-Americanism which is disguised behind a virtuous sentiment of Canadian nationalism, and I would deplore that.

In my view the central issue before us in this debate is to establish, once and for all, a set of guidelines for the magazine and periodical publishing industry in this country which meets the approval not only of the industry itself but of the advertisers, editors, graphic artists, and perhaps most important of all, the general public of Canada.

This is certainly no easy matter. The Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) said himself on May 8 that the government did not arrive at this decision to present this bill easily, and indeed it was a decision which was hard to make. In fact I rather suspect that probably a good number of ministers were not present when the decision was made. Moreover, this very subject has occupied the attention of more than one royal commission, particularly the Royal Commission on Periodicals under the leadership of Senator Gratton O'Leary. It provided one of the major areas of investigation for the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media under the chairmanship of Senator Keith Davey. At no time has anyone yet been able to provide the magazine advertising and publishing industries with conclusive guidance which legitimately protects all those who have a direct and indirect interest in the publication of magazines in Canada.

It is all very well to criticize and tear down, but what about establishing definite guidelines which people can follow? In the special report of the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media it was admitted that it was juggling unknowns. In discussing the options open to the Government of Canada, it rejected the idea that Reader's Digest—or Time, for that matter—should be "kicked out", as the report bluntly put it, because, and I quote from volume I, page 165:

> Singling out for expulsion two corporations that have done business in Canada for nearly three decades, and done it with flair and fairness and excellence, struck us as somehow inconsistent with the Canadian character. We were mindful, too, of the economic dislocation this could cause. Unemployment in the cause of socio-cultural development is a lot more palatable for its proponents than for the participants.

Nonetheless, the special committee proposed to go ahead, juggle the unknowns and recommend what is, in effect, the government's proposal in this bill as it stands, and that is to rescind section 19(2) of the Income Tax and prevent advertisers from deducting their advertising expenses in these two publications in computing their income for tax purposes.

The effect of this, as we all know, would be a severe restriction. As far as Reader's Digest can project, it would plunge its company into a calamitous loss position from which its magazine operations could not recover. Time is in a somewhat different position because it has no public equity in Canada, much less Canadian employment to consider, and is a magazine of news written by its international staff. It has options open to it which are not available to Reader's Digest. I feel that most of our colleagues are not too sympathetic to the position of Time, but many feel a great concern for Reader's Digest, which has bent over backwards, in my view, to be a good corporate citizen of Canada.

Furthermore, for Reader's Digest the upshot would be that the French Canadian edition would have to cease publication. As the company has pointed out, the French Canadian edition has been running at an average annual loss of $157,000 for the last ten years. So we have about 1.3 million Francophone readers who would be deprived of that edition.

Moreover, the Canadian edition of the Reader's Digest in English would be in severe jeopardy. It has been suggested that this edition should be replaced by one edited, published and printed in the United States. Surely it is the intention of this legislation to encourage publication of Canadian material for Canadian readers. What would be the point of making this company, which has been publishing in Canada in French and English since 1948, close its Canadian edition? What would be the loss to Canada?

Reader's Digest of Canada, as we have have already heard from the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), has a full editorial and production team of 80 people at work on its books and magazines—all Canadian citizens. The company in total employs some 460 Canadians directly and a further 1,000 Canadians indirectly among its suppliers. It gives work to Canadian freelance writers and gives them an opportunity to appear before a worldwide audience of some 105 million readers in 13 languages around the world. Its operations provide the Canadian Post Office with a revenue in excess of $3 million a year.

We should, at least, examine this company's record in Canada—attained before and since the 1965 legislation deemed the Canadian editions of Reader's Digest not to be non-Canadian—before we attempt to wipe it out. The magazine has been circulating in Canada since 1922. The English language Canadian edition was printed here in 1943. In 1948 it began investing in plant and equipment in Canada. It has steadily increased its Canadian contribution since that time.

With the encouragement of the government's 1966 guidelines for good corporate behaviour, the Reader's Digest

Association (Canada) Ltd. issued a substantial portion—some 32.6 per cent—of its share equity to Canadian stockholders in 1968. Its board of directors today is composed of six people, five of whom are Canadians of distinction and achievement. The board includes a former chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, a former president of the Canada Council, a former Bâtonnier of the Quebec Bar, and a company president who is the other member of the board and who has a distinguished record of public service in Canada. I submit that a corporation directed by men of such stature would not sit idly by if the company, whose Canadian shareholders they represent, began acting to the detriment of Canada's economy, Canada's purpose, and Canada's cultural identity.

Because Reader's Digest in Canada is run by Canadians and edited by Canadians, it includes a substantial amount of Canadian material. A large proportion of this material is read in 13 languages around the world. Consider that, through the Digest, the story of Ontario's Science Centre has been carried to some eight million to ten million people in Finnish, Portuguese, Spanish and Chinese; or that Dr. Philip Gold's work on cancer diagnosis in Montreal has been reported to nearly 100 million readers in 12 languages; or that an appreciation of Ralph Bunche of the United Nations by Lester Pearson, the story of Expo '67, and other such stories went through all editions of the Digest in 13 languages to a full readership of 105 million people.

This, I suggest, is an aspect of serving the Canadian purpose that has been overlooked in proposing Bill C-58 in its present form. There are scores of such examples. A conservative estimate of the cost of buying space for this coverage of Canadian affairs in the last two years would amount to some $38 million. Editorially, of course, the value is impossible to overestimate.

Equally important is the attention Canadian editions pay to Canadian affairs in both our official languages. Some 150 Canadian writers have produced material for the Digest editions in Canada since the 1965 legislation gave this publication continuing Canadian status. The publication has paid attention to Canadian affairs from coast to coast. It was written about Canadian agriculture, the beef industry, the rapeseed industry, the plight of the farmer, the honey industry. It has dealt with Canadian trade and international assistance.

An article about Japan's trade with Canada was of great help to the Quebec government in informing Japanese businessmen of the opportunities in Canada—because it was distributed in their language in their country. Digest editions in Canada publish almost as many Canadian articles as any domestic consumer magazine and, as the company states, when this shortly amounts to some 30 per cent of the total contents of the magazines, it will be the full equivalent. Its goal is to establish 30 per cent of the total content.

If I could believe that the legislation before the House would be of benefit to the Canadian magazine industry, or to magazine readers, I could see some merit in it. But I do not believe this to be so. As the Secretary of State says, the consumer magazine advertising industry is struggling in this country. But its competitors are not magazines—and certainly not United States magazines, since the customs tariff and section 19 of the act effectively cut off the outflow of advertising revenues to United States magazines in 1965. The real competition comes from the other mass media—newspapers, television and radio. Of the total $1.6 billion spent on advertising in 1974 consumer magazines received about 2.3 per cent, or $37 million. Newspapers received $458 million, or 28.6 per cent; television $225 million, or 14.1 per cent and radio $176.5 million, or 11 per cent.

The growth in newspaper revenues in one year alone exceeded the total revenue to consumer magazines in 1974. That is the measure of the competitive problem for magazines. And yet magazines are our journals of reflective thinking, our journals of record. I am in total agreement with the Secretary of State in his attempts to encourage their growth and responsibility. Yet I cannot help noting that to remove a large section of the magazine reading public—some six million Digest readers—from the reach of Canadian advertisers does the magazine industry a disservice. This is especially so when we learn that the expenditures diverted from Digest editions would go largely to Canadian newspapers, television, radio—and only a small proportion to Canadian paid circulation consumer magazines—which are profitable anyway.

It is of further concern to me that the effect of these restrictions would deprive Canadians of a monthly magazine, independently edited by Francophone Canadians for their readers, and by Anglophone Canadians for their readers. These publications regularly bring both a national and an international balance of worth-while articles and have done so for longer than most of us can remember. We cannot quarrel with the fact that readers of the Digest editions purchase their copies with the full knowledge of what the contents are because of a reputation that has been carefully fostered in 50 years of publication.

As the Secretary of State quite admirably said, it is not the intention of the government to interfere with the freedom of Canadians to choose what they wish to read. Nor, he said, was the government about to direct publishers of magazines, or of any other kind of publication, on how they should discharge their responsibility to serve the Canadian community and the Canadian purpose, culturally or in any other way. The entire House, indeed the entire country, would find it impossible to fault such a fundamental statement. Yet there is a danger in this legislation that its effect would be precisely that kind of interference.

Economic restriction is but the back door to the control of freedom of expression. It is a negative path to what the government, the House, and the people of this country want—identical rules for all so that legitimate competition, the free uninhibited choice of customers—whether readers or advertisers—holds sway in the marketplace. To this end I suggest that we set up the kind of guidelines, as I said when I began my remarks, which will meet with the general approval of all parties without restricting the freedoms to which we, as a nation, are dedicated.

I suggest, therefore, that the government and the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, consider adopting legislative guidelines which provide for no special cases but which, at the same time, do not discriminate retroactively against corporate immigrants that have discharged their responsibilities and served the Canadian purpose.

These guidelines, it seems to me, should include requirements that permit advertisers to deduct their expenses for the purchase of space in Canadian magazines that are not only printed and published in Canada, but which must have all their publishing functions in Canada. These would include the typesetting, printing, circulation management, customer and billing services, promotion and advertising functions. Moreover, they should have editorial autonomy in Canada for the selection and editing of material. Furthermore, the publishing company should be an association, proprietorship, or company registered or incorporated in Canada with a degree of Canadian ownership as already defined in the Income Tax Act, and whose use of material is confined only as is consistent with the international laws of copyright.

It would appear consistent with our national goals that the committee should consider a requirement that publications could be given minor ownership concessions if they publish in both our national languages.

These guidelines extend those already in the act which have to do solely with ownership, directorship, printing, editing and publishing. They ensure that all the economic benefits of the entire corporate operation accrue to Canada, to Canadian employees and Canadian talent, save only that minor portion of revenue that would go to a non-resident investor whose equity Canada was making use of. They would, at the same time, avoid this government getting involved in the highly dangerous area of editorial content and editorial policy. They would give the same rules to all and provide, once and for all, guidelines that would permit the Canadian magazine and periodical industry to work to the cultural, economic and social benefit of the citizens of this country. The minister so far has not proposed such guidelines. I intend to put before the committee a set of such guidelines, in the hope this House will pass judgment on them, so that we will not be unjust to anyone who has helped to build up Canada.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, it is a great thrill to speak in this jammed House this afternoon, with so many members hanging on our very words. This is the first time that I have seen more members of the press in the press gallery than members of the House in the House.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I draw to Your Honour's attention the fact that the press gallery is full. This is the first time in the history of our parliament that there are more members of the press in the press gallery than members of the House in the House of Commons, on a Friday afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I wish the parliamentary secretary would pay attention to our speeches. I just made that point. I wish he would not repeat it.

I am glad the minister is present. This afternoon I want to put a serious proposal to him, and hope he will respond when he closes debate on second reading. Meanwhile I compliment the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) who has just made what I judge to be a thoughtful and constructive speech. It is all the more important because he was previously the chairman of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts. I hope the minister will give the hon. member's points serious consideration.

The key vote of this bill will not be the vote on second reading; it will be the vote on third reading. I suggest, for that reason, that this bill presents many of us with some difficulties. For example, as the minister said in introducing this bill, the clause devoted to broadcasting near the end of the bill would prohibit tax deductions for Canadian advertisers advertising on American television stations, especially those stations which are close to the Canada-U.S. border. Actually some such stations have been established for the precise purpose of obtaining Canadian advertising revenue and directing advertising at Canadian audiences. That, surely, is not what the CRTC or, indeed, the Canadian people want. So, if we were to oppose this bill completely we should be opposing an enlightened provision which is aimed, obviously, at curtailing the violation of proper Canadian broadcasting policy.

I shall begin my remarks by suggesting that the broadcasting clause is a step forward.

It is interesting to note how quickly, relatively speaking, the government is moving to remove those sections of the act which allow Canadian advertisers to claim tax deductions with respect to broadcast advertising. One should note how quickly this is happening, and note the long period during which Time Canada and Reader's Digest have been unable to offer tax deductions to Canadian advertisers. What I am saying is this: it seems to me we are too far down the road with respect to Time and Reader's Digest to think about taking legislative action which will end the tax exemptions those two publications enjoy, and expect that such move will help the Canadian publishing industry. That is the point which worries me most.

As the hon. member for Cochrane suggested in the concluding part of his speech, by passing Bill C-58 we shall be, in effect, discriminating retroactively against corporate immigrants. I feel that this will affect the large readership which Time Canada and Reader's Digest have obtained. There are too many jobs at stake. The implications for our economy are too severe for us to take what I judge to be a simplistic action in an effort, ostensibly, to help the Canadian publishing industry.

I am not satisfied that a vote on second reading in support of the bill, even though the bill contains the broadcasting provision of which I approve, will lead to the enhancement of Canadian publications. I believe a positive policy is needed rather than restrictive legislation. If I could be convinced that the removal of the tax concession from Time and Reader's Digest would truly help the Canadian publishing industry I might be inclined to favour this bill. But it is my judgment that the measure will not help that vast array of educational, political, scientific and agricultural publications which are at the core of the Canadian publishing industry.

One must not think only of the big publications—Macleans, Saturday Night and Chatelaine. These magazines are undoubtedly important—as a matter of fact the restoration of Saturday Night is a positive step forward. But Saturday Night was restored at a time when this legislation was still on the order paper. Indeed the publisher and the editor have indicated that Bill C-58 is not really of such significance to them—that the survival of their paper is not really at stake in the debate on the passage of Bill C-58. In any case, I do not believe that the plan to establish a truly Canadian news magazine, which they say they want to produce, really depends on the passage of Bill C-58.

When I talk about a positive policy I should like to remind the minister that I do not speak as a Johnny-come-lately on this subject. I am not a neophyte in the publishing world. When I call for a positive policy as an alternative to the present terms of Bill C-58 what I am really doing is coming back to the government, in a different role as a member of parliament, to say the very things I came to Ottawa to say in 1968 when I was a member of the executive of the Canadian Church Press.

The Canadian Church Press is an association in Canada which embraces about 25 publications with a total circulation of well over one million. It is only one of many trade associations representing various publishing categories. Others are educational, scientific, or agricultural.

When we came to Ottawa in 1968 we came with a sense of alarm because at that time the postmaster general, Mr. Eric Kierans, was bringing before the House a bill to raise the postal rates. Mr. Kierans took the view that the Post Office should pay for itself and that second class mailing privileges, which publications such as those I have described had enjoyed, should be restricted in such a way as to decrease the Post Office deficit.

We came with a brief and we presented it to the postmaster general. I do not hold the minister responsible today for the actions of Mr. Kierans when he was postmaster general, but I want to assure him that when I talk about postal rates for Canadian publications these are much more instrumental to the survival and encouragement of Canadian publications than is this bill concerning Time and Reader's Digest. Thus, when I come to spell out the basis of a positive policy I want to assure the minister, with as much modesty as I can muster, that I know what I am talking about.

I was, during this period, the editor and manager of a religious publication which sought to fill a community and social need in western Canada. This publication received many international awards. I am not going to say it is in the class or category of Reader's Digest, but it was doing its bit to make this country stronger. When we came here in 1968 we ran up against a stone wall of cabinet thinking as exemplified by Mr. Kierans.

I want to read a couple of paragraphs from our submission because they are relevant today—even more so, because what we predicted in 1968 came to pass as a result of the unprecedented actions of the Liberal government of that day and the absence of a policy on publishing which recognized the effect of postal rates on publications. We said at that time:

> The Government of Canada has long recognized the role of the church press of Canada as an important educational medium, operating for the common good. Religious publications have enjoyed a preferential postal rate, ¼ cent per pound below that of general magazines, along with publications devoted to the sciences or agriculture.
> The church press represents a cause and not an economic investment. All of our publications operate either on the narrowest of margins financially, or at a deficit made up by the sponsoring church or religious organization. Most of the advertising appearing in our journals is from church-related organizations, although some of the magazines compete as vigorously as limited budgets permit for general advertising.
> As you may be aware, church publications do not enjoy news stand sales in Canada. Some of our member publications have investigated the possibility of putting their magazines on the news stands without success. Our publications are almost completely dependent, therefore, on the mail for distribution.

● (1540)

> There is grave concern, therefore, for the survival of some publications if increases in rates for second class mail are such that they put too heavy a strain on the publications' financial resources.

I have recounted that in order to indicate that at that time the government was not interested in merely retaining special rates for consumer publications to enable them to survive. If the government had done so at that time, that itself would have been a big step for Canadian publications which in 1968 were beginning to feel the ravages of inflation.

I remember very well putting forth our arguments to Mr. Kierans, who could see only the corporate approach to the Post Office—that of its paying its way. Immediately after that a bill went through the House of Commons and the government took away the preferential rate for specialized publications to which I have referred, and increased the rate for magazines of between one and a half cents and three cents a pound. The basic harm that was done was that the bill, which was then known as Bill C-116, raised the price per pound from three cents to five cents and, worst of all, instituted a minimum floor rate of two cents per piece.

That action alone put in jeopardy many specialized publications that were trying to make a contribution to Canada's life, and ended the lives of several. I recall that not so much from the negative point of view but to remind the minister that I remember only too well what happened. I ask him whether he now thinks that bringing in a bill to take away a tax concession granted to Time and Reader's Digest is the answer.

I suggest to the minister it is not, because the magazines and publications that I have been referring to do not depend on big consumer advertising for their survival. Indeed, if you pick up the major Canadian consumer magazines today they seem to do pretty well with Canadian advertising. But what these magazines are contending, along with the smaller publications, is that the postal rates are killing them, and so are postal service and late delivery.

Therefore, hand in hand with a positive policy toward Canadian publications would have to go some improvement in service for Canadian publications on the part of the Post Office, with the recognition that Canadian publications that are trying to make a contribution to Canadian life cannot and should not be expected to pay their way through the Post Office. The Post Office is a service to the Canadian people, and it should also be a service to the Canadian publishing industry.

The second step that is essential to the industry in any positive policy would be a better distribution system for Canadian publications. On any newsstand in Canada there is for all to see an overwhelming number of American publications. This is because 13 of the 14 distributors in Canada are American distributors and they are pushing their own publications, the big sellers in this country. They do so because there is a lot of money in them.

We are not going to remedy this situation by taking away tax concessions to Time and Reader's Digest. What is required is a distribution system that is backed by the government which would enable Canadian publications to have much more reasonable access to the market. We require a distribution system for Canadian publications that guarantees room for them on Canadian news stands that are now filled with American publications, along with improved postal delivery.

I have asked the minister to consider the points I have made respecting postal rates and a distribution system as practical steps that could be taken to help the Canadian publishing industry, because the minister said in introducing the bill that what we wanted was an increase in the size, number and saleability of Canadian magazines, with resulting large opportunities for Canadian writers and publishers. I am not out of sympathy with the minister's intention to improve the market for Canadian writers and publishers. There is a lot that can be said about the book industry, but I will not do so at the moment. It is also dominated by American books. I hope that the thoughtful remarks made by the minister in connection with a Canadian publishing policy for books will find implementation. However, for the moment I want to confine myself to magazine publishing, with specific reference to Time and Reader's Digest.

I cannot at this moment find in myself any recognition that this bill is going to accomplish the aims set out for Canadian publishing by the minister. I therefore want to make some specific suggestions to the minister and ask him to reply to them when he winds up this debate. I want to propose a spirit of compromise on the part of the government along the lines suggested by my hon. friend for Cochrane, namely, that there be some guidelines established which will take away this punitive aspect of the bill and at the same time make a contribution to a recognition that Canadian writers and publishers truly need some help in order to withstand the terrific inroads made by American competition.

We have to recognize that if Time Canada and Reader's Digest of Canada wer to close their offices, Canadian news stands would still be filled with American publications, including the American edition of Time and Reader's Digest. I have received, as have other hon. members, a lot of mail on this subject, and I think that many Canadians are under the misapprehension that if Reader's Digest of Canada were to close its doors they would not be able to get its publication. Such is far from the case. Reader's Digest would still be available. My point is that if we want to help the Canadian publishing industry we should produce a positive policy that will have as its keystone, as I suggested a few moments ago, better postal rates and a better distribution system.

Let me put this proposition to the minister. If this bill were to go to committee and we heard representations from the Canadian publishing industry and Time and Reader's Digest, I suggest that in an enlightened atmosphere it would be possible to produce a policy that would be in harmony with the interests of Time Canada and Reader's Digest of Canada as well as the interests of the Canadian publishing industry.

I suggest the route to that policy would be through the establishment of a five year plan which would lead to a graduated Canadian ownership of Time and Reader's Digest, so that at the end of the five years both Time and Reader's Digest would be 75 per cent Canadian owned. We now know that Reader's Digest is 32 per cent Canadian owned. Time Canada has given some indication that it is not unhappy at the prospect of becoming 75 per cent Canadian owned. Certainly I think this would be a step forward. That is the first of my three conditions in which I know the minister himself has shown interest. The first, I repeat, is 75 per cent Canadian ownership.

The second is that these publications must be licensed in Canada. It is not sufficient for them to be licensed in the United States. Although they would undoubtedly continue to operate out of their parent offices in the United States, nonetheless their licences should be established in Canada so they would truly be operated under Canadian corporate ownership.

The third section in this plan has to do with what the minister dwelled on in his introductory speech in which he said that these publications "cannot be substantially the same" as their parent magazines. What does "not substantially the same" mean? I suggest this is perhaps the most dangerous aspect of this bill because of the confusion it will mean for publications published in Canada being not substantially the same as the parent publications published in another country, specifically the United States.

Some members are afraid this will lead to censorship. Indeed, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford) suggested, if I read him correctly, that 80 per cent would have to be different. Any provision in respect of the content of a publication is extremely dangerous and, therefore I am unhappy with the minister's reference to a formula under which a publication enjoying the tax benefits under our law would not be substantially the same.

This is a question which needs to be examined very thoroughly in committee. I would be content to see the bill go to a committee were I to receive the assurance from the minister that he would support the idea of Time and Reader's Digest being subjected to a gradual 5-year plan for Canadian ownership, being licensed in Canada, and in that spirit an attempt being made to work out what would be the proper application of "not substantially the same". That would forever remove the possibility of the charge that the government is going to be involved in censorship.

It is because I am so worried about government control of what any publisher can write that I am apprehensive, and I say this on the basis of my own experience in the business, of any formula written into law under which a publication would be required to be "not substantially the same", with that requirement being put into the hands of some official or bureaucrat who would be empowered to make the decision of what an editor could or could not say.

I am not so concerned about what a publication says or contains. I am less concerned about that than I am about the question of ownership and the question of licensing in Canada. If you put all these things together you will see that what I am suggesting is that this would be a way out of the dilemma we are facing now in dealing with a bill that has some good sections, such as the broadcasting part, as well as other sections that worry me a good deal. I do not think the bill as it now stands will accomplish the aim I share with the minister of helping to strengthen Canadian publishing. I ask the minister to consider seriously my remarks, and when I read his speech in concluding this debate I will determine how I am going to vote.

Mr. Marke Raines (Burnaby-Seymour): Madam Speaker, I have heard a great many words bandied about which I do not understand in connection with this issue. For example, we have heard reference to the word censorship, the matter of government control, and punitive action on the part of the government. I would urge hon. members to come back to the basic matter at issue here, and that is Time and Reader's Digest.

As I see it, and apparently as the Cabinet sees it, what is involved here is a matter of special tax privilege and the withdrawal of this special tax privilege. This is the heart of the matter. I assume this matter will come before the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, of which I am a member. I wish to make it clear that I will listen to all the arguments of the spokesmen, and I am sure there will be many from Time and Reader's Digest. I will listen to their arguments very carefully.

So far as I have been able to determine, the matter still comes back to the special tax privileges which were granted 10 years ago, for what reason I am not sure. At any rate, the government in its wisdom has now decided to withdraw those special privileges.

Where does the matter of censorship arrive? I have no great interest in the content of Reader's Digest, Time, Playboy or Newsweek. Canadians will continue to buy them, and I am sure the companies will continue to publish and put them on the newsstands in this country. Time and Reader's Digest are two of the wealthiest magazines in the world, and their publishers will continue to publish whatever they wish in whatever country they wish, and that material will continue to come into Canada.

As to punitive action resulting from the withdrawal of these special privileges, how this can be construed as punitive action is beyond me. I think perhaps I missed part of the argument that linked this action in that way. There is no censorship in any way, shape or form, and I can see no punitive action. What the government is doing is withdrawing special tax privileges.

The publishers have said they would like to continue with these special tax privileges, and they have asked us what they must do. We have told them they must become Canadian magazines because only Canadians can enjoy these tax concessions which are designed to help the industry grow. If Time and Reader's Digest wish to change their content that is up to them. This too will be a matter for discussion at the committee.

It must be pointed out that the editorial comment in Time and Reader's Digest comes from their headquarters in the United States. That is well and good. I like to read U.S. material, and I am sure many hon. members here read Newsweek and various other periodicals. Why should Canadian taxpayers have to subsidize these companies? I submit that this is simply a matter of belling the cat.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You mean catting the bell.

Mr. Raines: If the hon. member has not read that little story perhaps he will in his basic French course.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

Mr. Reid: Madam Speaker, I think you will find there is an agreement to take Item No. 36 standing in the name of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) under private members' notices of motions.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is agreeable.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The ones ahead of it will retain their positions?

Mr. Reid: Yes, at the request of the government.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Not to mention the Official Opposition.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it agreed that the House will proceed to the consideration of private member's notice of motion No. 36 appearing in the name of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), and that all other notices of motions appearing ahead of No. 36 will be stood at the request of the government?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

WEST INDIES

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to consider the advisability of taking an initiative in seeking to promote closer relations with the former British possessions in the West Indies, such as the Turks and Caicos Islands, which have not yet attained independence, and further that if the residents of any of these islands so desire it, economic and political union of these islands with the Dominion of Canada be negotiated at an early date at the proper constitutional levels.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as this motion was called I heard my hon. friend from Fraser Valley East indicate that I had spoken already today in this House. I just have to tell him it is unfortunate that we do not have the American Constitution governing us and are not provided the protection against double jeopardy.

It is a pleasure to have the opportunity to discuss this matter. I have no ulterior thoughts concerning why my motion received such good priority, and I shall not dwell upon the fact that this is a sunny Friday before a long weekend and that I am now doing better than I did on the draw for motions. This is a subject which I know most members are aware has been close to my heart for a long time. I think this is perhaps the tenth time I have spoken on this subject matter, either on a motion in my name or in the name of some other member. The first time the motion became familiar to us was when it was moved by a distinguished parliamentarian who is now a distinguished member of the other House, Senator McIlraith.

Through the years my views on the general question have remained the same and my convictions have been strengthened, but from time to time there have been developments which have prompted me to give some additional focus to the general matter. Over the years since I have been proposing this measure, from one part of this geographic region has come a clear expression of interest in closer political ties between this country and that part of the Caribbean. Because that came to our attention I thought it would be well for the parliamentarians of Canada to demonstrate sufficient interest to be willing to set up some forum whereby the matter might be discussed. The motion of course does not make any claim in respect of recommendations concerning what should be done constitutionally but rather that the matter should be examined.

I have always believed that our Commonwealth Caribbean neighbours in many ways are the touchstone of the success of our external policy in terms of economics, in terms of aid, and indeed in terms of immigration because in many ways that is an aspect of our foreign policy. I believe if we cannot be successful in dealing with these our hemispheric neighbours, these our sister states of the Commonwealth, then we are failing and are likely to fail in the broader and more ambitious programs on worldwide basis.

I also have, as do most maritimers, a sentimental attachment to and sustained interest in this part of our hemisphere. The maritimers have known the people of the West Indies, of the Caribbean generally and, in what we used to refer to as the golden age of iron men and wooden ships, the exchanges of goods and people. From these ties have emerged a good feeling. I want to salute the Premier of Nova Scotia who I believe is making a special arrangement to invite a number of Caribbean parliamentarians to come to Nova Scotia in July this year. That is an excellent idea. They will see something of the second best part of the maritime provinces, and perhaps they will be able to come to the epitome of beauty and excellence, the province of Prince Edward Island, when they get to the Atlantic region. This is a part of the tradition. These are the ties. But more important than the romantic connection and the fondness we have for rum, and that is fairly important, is the realistic situation that the islands to which I refer in this motion are most interesting communities whose economic and political viability is most precarious.

I do not know if Canadians realize how many small but functioning and successful parliaments exist in these very small communities in the Caribbean area. We hear about the exciting things involving violence and occasional trouble with the banks and so on. But much more important is that down there there are miniature legislatures, emanations of the parliamentary system of which we are a member. They are carrying on and doing very very well. While the communities are tiny, their problems are vast.

I am always happy to find that the Caribbean people and their political leaders refer to Canada as their best friend. I do not know of any designation we should cherish more than to be well regarded by these people who look upon us as something of a big power. I remember when I was in the Turks and Caicos Islands with my colleague who is now the Chairman of CPA, one of the men there asked me what I thought of the whole West Indian area. I told him I had always been interested. I told him about the historic ties and I said also that because I come from by far the smallest province in Canada I probably have an emotional affinity for small communities, especially when they are islands.

He asked me how large Prince Edward Island is and I told him that it is 2,184 square miles, whereupon he said, "Gee, man, do you call that small?" So, in some areas even Prince Edward Island is something of an empire. However, I should like to see us concentrate our attention a little more on these areas.

I am not at all critical about the Caribbean CIDA program. I have no political axe to grind by pointing out that the aid program was started under the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I think we are doing very well, but I also think we can do more. I hear disturbing rumours that we are likely to wind down or get out of our CIDA program with Trinidad and Tobago, Barbados, and Jamaica. I am not sure I am pleased with that, because while I am concentrating on the smaller islands which have not reached sovereign status these sister communities which are sovereign states are very important to us also, and their success in their political and economic experiment is extremely important. I hope that if CIDA is planning to cut out on these large islands that there has been the fullest consultation and co-operation with the leaders of those islands, and that we will not be regarded as having pulled the plug prematurely, if I may as a former academician lapse into an unusual use of the vernacular.

I would like to see the matter looked at again because, in my opinion, one of the most useful studies of the relationship of Canada to the commonwealth Caribbean was undertaken by a parliamentary body which in some quarters occasionally is lambasted. I refer to the Senate of Canada. In 1970 that body set up a committee to study the matter. They looked carefully at the subject and brought in academics, economists, political leaders, industrialists and so on. This committee prepared a very good report. I think it deserves more care and attention, and could be profitably picked up again. One recommendation is the following:

● (1610)

The possibility of constitutional links between Canada and the countries of the Caribbean area should be re-appraised by the Canadian government. This prospect now seems remote, but the Canadian government should be prepared to discuss proposals for closer economic and political association between Canada and countries of the area.

While I am referring to the Senate recommendations I should mention one more which I think is very important, and which I endorse wholeheartedly. This is contained in the preamble, recommendation No. 5. It reads as follows:

The excellent and highly competitive rums of the Commonwealth Caribbean should receive as much assistance as possible in the Canadian market. The 1966 agreement to implement labelling regulations went into effect on July 1st, 1969, but does not appear to have led to any dramatic increase in imports. The committee recommends that the Canadian government re-assess the effectiveness of this measure and that the mutual advantages to Canada and the Caribbean countries concerned be discussed at the ministerial level with the respective Canadian provinces.

In other words we have to think not only of aid but of trade, and it is an old law of economics from those old days when the laws prevailed, and when inflation and unemployment were cyclical rather than simultaneous events, that we should trade best in things in which we have comparative advantage. That is why the Senate zeroed in on West Indian rum, which of course is the finest in the world.

I do not want anyone to accuse a gentle person like myself of harbouring imperialist ambitions. I remember raising this matter a few years ago, and somebody said that it was imperialism. I have no illusions of Canada sending down its aging destroyers and taking over these areas, nor do I suggest that we go down there with the big buck—which, by the way, is dwindling these days—and move in. My motion very carefully points out that if there is an interest, we should respond to it with friendship and brotherhood.

I do not suppose we will see the day when any part of the West Indies or the Commonwealth Caribbean will be an integral part of Canada politically, but if they should wish it, I would not be afraid of it. I would hate to be numbered among the ranks of the narrow minded who would say that because of the colour of the skin of most of their inhabitants we could not envisage a close relationship constitutionally and politically with those people. The essence is that it is their wish which must be considered. It is our posture and our policy consistently to be ready with the hand of friendship, to be ready with a practical attitude and with an attitude of goodwill in regard to immigration.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

When I was half as old as I am now, a mere stripling, I used to teach in some of the Atlantic college universities. Many of the students were from the Commonwealth Caribbean, and long before the days when it became popular to talk about the lack of prejudice, there was a total and complete fraternity among those students, and that has developed through the years. I had the great pleasure just two days ago of chatting with His Excellency the High Commissioner to Canada from the Bahamas, and he recalled that when I was a professor at Mount Allison, he was a student. Since that was a long time ago and I was very young, I did not pry too far as to how well he knew me or my activities, but in any case I did know that the Caribbean students were a very valued and highly regarded part of that campus and of every other campus in the Atlantic provinces.

So I again raise this matter. I ask the House to turn its attention to it. It is not exclusive of the larger islands which are sovereign states. It is not exclusive of the islands of the Caribbean which are not of the Commonwealth. I welcome most heartily the stepped up trade with Cuba and the opening of doors which have not been opened earlier, and one of the things I appreciated most about the government which I supported in 1962 was that, against very heavy pressure, Canada decided to retain and maintain its diplomatic and commercial ties with Cuba. There is no reason why we should not welcome the opening of doors with Haiti, which has a better and more amenable regime than before. These are the kinds of developments we should welcome.

I see no attitude except that of practical friendship between Canada and the people of the Commonwealth Caribbean. Because of the uniqueness of their problems and the great difficulty to retain their viability, I think that the islands mentioned here should be given consideration.

On the Turks and Caicos islands there are 6,000 people on 166 square miles. We do not even have a CIDA program for those islands. At least we could do that. I remember the director of the hospital and the community centre there saying that he had the British medical journals, but he would like to get Canadian ones. Through the good offices of the Overseas Book League, that now has been done. There is a need for teachers in the Turks and Caicos islands. The Ontario government was very helpful with school books, but much more can be done, and in view of their clear indication that Canada is a place of special interest to them, I would like us to respond with practical friendship, with an obvious interest, and with a clear, strong indication of good will.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, before dealing in a detailed way with the essential of the motion moved by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), I deem it important to reassert the Canadian government's interest in the Commonwealth West Indies. My hon. colleagues know that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had the opportunity, over the last weeks, to visit several countries of the West Indies, especially Trinidad and Tobago, Barbados and Guyana, immediately before the Prime Ministers' Conference which was held in Jamaica, from April 29th to May 6th last. The purpose of those visits was once again to point out our interest in our relations with the West Indies and the Commonwealth as a whole and with that area in particular.

During those visits to the Presidents of the three countries concerned, the Prime Minister discussed our bilateral and multilateral relations with the West Indies and had very serious discussions as to the future of all the West Indies, the eventual future of a federation of the Commonwealth West Indies and of all the islands concerned and also the future relations between Canada and the West Indies.

I believe the Prime Minister of Canada made it clear to the Prime Ministers of the three countries concerned that we wanted to deal with those countries as equals.

I suppose we have no intention of interfering as Canadians in West Indian Affairs, or of trying to impose on that area, or on a country in that area, even supposing we were provided with the opportunity to do so, the solutions which might seem proper to Canada, but which we are not sure it would be appropriate to impose on those countries.

The relationship we seek with the West Indies is based on the principle of equality and reciprocity. We do not seek hegemony or territorial expansion. It is quite the contrary, in view of the long-established relationships we have had with that area and of the real community of interests that binds us. I think that it is only within the frame of total equality of relationships that we can help them meet their aspirations within the spiralling economic expansion they are presently experiencing also and in view of their problems stemming from that expansion.

That is why Canada has provided a lot of assistance through bilateral programs, for example through organizations such as the Caribbean Development Bank and the West Indies Community, CARICOM.

I think that it is within that context of Canadian assistance through multilateral or bilateral programs that we must consider the motion introduced by the hon. member for Hillsborough who, for that matter, gave a very interesting account of the need for Canada to help those countries meeting their aspirations fully.

I suppose that in that part of this motion which deals with former British possessions in the West Indies which have not attained independence yet, one must include Commonwealth West Indies Islands which have not attained total independence yet. Indeed those islands which attained independence de facto, and those which have some domestic independence but are still attached to the British Crown must be distinguished insofar as external relations are concerned.

The territories still under British authority are the British Virgin Islands, the Cayman Islands, Turks, Caicos Islands and Montserrat. Furthermore, even though they are not part of the West Indies, Bermuda is still a British protectorate. On the other hand, we should not forget Belize, a Central American territory which is not autonomous. Last, there are the states associated to Great Britain and that I mentioned before: Antigua-Barbados; St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla; Dominica; Sainte-Lucie and Saint-Vincent which, although they enjoy a large autonomy in their internal affairs, have to deal through Great Britain for their exchange matters or external affairs. However, it is to be noted that autonomous states can without asking for Westminster's permission, proclaim themselves fully autonomous or constitute a Federation within the area.

To come back to the wording of the motion of the hon. member for Hillsborough, he wishes apparently that a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be established to study the opportunity of allowing the political and geographical union to Canada of Turks and Caicos Islands or any other island. It is probably appropriate that the motion does not prejudge of the nature of those closer relationships mentioned by the hon. member in his motion even though we can conclude from the rest of the motion and the mention of Turks and Caicos Islands that some form of economical and political union with Canada is contemplated.

The point I wish to underline is the following: the first part of the motion emphasises the fact that Canada should take the initiative in making proposals to those islands. Yes, in the second part of the motion it is asked that this House approve a political and economical union with any island of the Commonwealth West Indies which would request it. Were that motion to pass as it is presently, and were any West Indies island to request unification, Canada would have no other choice but to arrange a union agreement with that Island.

I wonder whether the hon. member really intends to deal in a hurry with such an important matter which might have serious consequences for the Canadian people and all the islands concerned.

Mr. Speaker, I think that Canada has reached the logical limits of its territorial development. Besides, when Newfoundland joined the Canadian Confederation in 1949, the historic dream expressed in section 146 of the BNA Act came true. The necessary amendments to that Act if other territories were to be added to the Canadian Confederation would not as such be a major problem. However, I think they would run counter to every philosophy in our constitution.

Another very important factor to be considered when new territories are to become part of a constituted political body is obviously that we might be accused of neo-colonialism.

The sun has set for quite a while on the splendors for the British empire, and in my opinion, it is a good thing. However, if Canada were to allow some islands, whether in the West Indies or elsewhere, to join the Canadian Confederation, I greatly fear that we would be accused by the world public opinion of trying to extend our hegemony to distant territories with which we have more or less important cultural and geographical relations.

Mr. Speaker, this is a very delicate matter on which I do not intend to dwell, but I do not think it is very timely for Canada to try and build its own colonial empire, directly or indirectly, at a time when the influence of all colonial states, Portugal, Spain, Great Britain, France and even the United States, over the various territories they had under their jurisdiction is dwindling away.

There is also the question of the possible reaction of the people of the Commonwealth Caribbean in that case. Mr. Speaker, in the last thirteen years, six countries in that area have become independent: the Bahamas, Barbados, Grenada, Guyana, Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago. As a matter of fact, those countries have come to play a very active part within the world community, were it only through their action in the United Nations and their collective action as the West Indies group, and they have definitely managed to draw the world's attention to their needs and their activities. They have developed their own methods and institutions, and work together towards a greater cooperation. I believe that the government of Canada has understood the aspirations of the West Indian people and that, by its development assistance program and by other means, it has tried to meet the objectives they have set for themselves.

While respecting absolutely the right of the West Indian people to determine their own political and economic institutions, Canada has strongly supported the efforts for cooperation in the West Indies. Certain aspects of our modern assistance program stem from our desire to meet the needs expressed by the now-defunct West Indies Federation, a regional unification project which failed in 1962. Since then, even though bilateral assistance has not been neglected, we have always been ready to enhance cooperation at a regional level when the West Indian countries deemed it beneficial.

Canada takes part in the activities of the Caribbean Development Bank in order to promote regional projects and it expects to reaffirm its collaboration with CARICOM, to help them to establish firmer regional institutions.

What would happen if Canada accepted within the Confederation the islands in this area which have not yet gained their independence? What would be the effect of such a union on the other West Indian Islands? These are so many questions which must be asked before the motion submitted by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) is resolved in the affirmative.

At first, I let the hon. members make speeches about the neo-colonialism feeling that we would certainly create within the various people of the world. Also, as Canadians, we would certainly have to ask ourselves very serious questions about our hidden or under underlying motives. On the other hand, we must continue to give assistance to the West Indian countries who need it the most. Indeed, I believe that is surely the best way to interfere within an area that is trying to set up its own institutions. I think that the other islands of the Caribbeans would not like us to impose our authority and political institutions upon two small islands such as the Turks and Caicos. Those islands would receive considerable sums of money to try and improve their standard of living and ensure development. Hotels would be built and all sorts of touristic activities would be developed, so that they would contrast with the neighbouring islands, which would disapprove of same 6,000 inhabitants of the Turks and Caicos living according to North American standards, while they themselves would still be at a lower level.

[Mr. Lachance.]

Tourism is very important, but I do not think that our minds, as Canadians, should be dominated by the pleasures we could indulge in, when bathing on the beaches of the Turks and Caicos. For, in summertime, we can do exactly the same on the fine beaches of Prince Edward Island, which are a real marvel and where I had the pleasure to go.

No, I do not think that, as true Canadians, we should take such superficial criteria as a basis to decide whether the Turks and Caicos are interesting territories for Canada to annex. I use a very strong word, I speak of the pure and simple annexation of a territory, which could not impose its conditions of acceptance within the Canadian confederation.

Tourism, as it is presently developed in the Caribbeans, had a considerable bearing on the economic development of those territories. I fear that a great part of the damages currently done in the Caribbeans are the result of tourism and of the almost wild development we have been witnessing in some islands. Let us take for example the case of Puerto Rico, where the central government has shamelessly developed tourism; we now can see on the local population the disastrous effects of that almost wild development which raised the standard of living of certain sectors of the population, which improved the island's economy, but left the people in a state of poverty that is still less bearable.

For all these considerations, I believe the motion moved by the hon. member for Hillsborough is unacceptable as it is. We should rather keep on extending as much credit as possible, through international development assistance, not only to the Commonwealth islands but to all Caribbean islands.

As a matter of fact, the aid extended by Canada during the last five years exceeded our 1962 commitments to the federation, to which I shall refer in a moment, because it now totals $200 million.

I believe that is the efficient way of helping local populations achieve their objectives. It lets them use the money wisely, according to their own development concepts, and does not impose upon them a development planning concept we are accustomed to but which does not necessarily fit their needs.

There is another way in which we can help local peoples develop, that is trade as such, which does not necessarily use the international development assistance channels. Our cooperation with the Caribbeans is no longer a matter of direct help only, because important trade ties were developed by Canadian industries. I know of many instances where Canadian companies, in cooperation with Caribbean businessmen, launched joint ventures that brought to the islands a transfer of knowledge and, above all, currency. And as everyone knows, currency is an important item in a country's development, because without it trade becomes much more difficult. Lack of currency prevents certain countries such as Bangladesh and other countries which are in the same serious needs, to build a firm basis for development.

So, our trade with some Caribbean islands has allowed some currency transfers which helped to improve the economy of those islands. I believe that is a very successful form of cooperation which is welcomed by the Caribbean authorities.

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude by showing once again the kind of very serious difficulties Canadians would have to justify such an annexation before the whole world, at this time where Canada is trying to yield a pretty good image in the area of external relations an image of leadership in the matter of international détente, and of each people's right to self-determinate, and to decide more or less by itself how it will organize its own development. I do not see how we as Canadians could explain to the international community that interference or annexation of those two islands and eventually other islands, because if a precedent is created for two islands why not more? I do not see how we could explain that situation to the world community which then will not support Canada and will surely consider us as neo-colonialists or something else. I, for one, would not be proud to go around the world an being said: What did you do with Turks and Caicos Islands? What business did you have to do over there? Why did you not give them financial assistance? Why did you not help them by allowing them to develop themselves instead of including them in Canadian federation?

Mr. Speaker, the time when one could take possession of non-contiguous territories, an effective way to determine what we call colonialism, even with the consent of its inhabitants, is gone once and for all. Canada is willing to help her friends, or some less developed countries, to get their share of social and economic justice. She will continue to pursue that goal with the tools she has and those she might conceive; but annexation is not one of those tools.

I want to repeat that I feel the motion is unacceptable. But one must not conclude that, given that fact, any assistance must cease.

The hon. member said that there is no assistance program for Turks and Caicos Islands. I will not dispute that. I do hope that such a program will be implemented very soon and that the 6,000 people in the Turks and Caicos Islands will benefit as much from the Canadian assistance as their neighbours, the Commonwealth islands and the West Indies in general. It is not the intent of Canada to renounce values advocated for 15 years—

● (1630)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. If he has unanimous consent, he may continue his remarks for a short time. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: . . . as I was saying, it is not our intent to renounce our values, and I do not believe Canada wishes to absorb neither of the islands of this area but, on the contrary, to assist them directly by providing more substantial funds.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in a very few words I should like to indicate that we are happy to support the motion which is before the House in the name of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie). As he and other hon. members of the House know, my colleague, the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman), has made a similar proposal in the form of a private member's public bill which has been before the House on two or three occasions.

When I suggest that the proposal in my colleague's bill and that in the hon. member's motion are similar, I have in mind that in neither case is there a proposal for an absolute and final settlement of the situation but, rather, that each hon. member is proposing machinery under which discussions might take place. It seems to me that discussions with our friends in the Caribbean area, to ascertain what kind of closer relations they might like to have with us, are desirable and ought to be set in motion in this House.

I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemount (Mr. Lachance) who indicated that he finds the motion of the hon. member for Hillsborough unacceptable. It seems to me that in order for the hon. member to reach that conclusion he had to read things into the motion which are not there.

My hon. friend from Hillsborough is not suggesting hegemony, annexation, neocolonialism or any other kind of colonialism. Rather, he is suggesting that there should be established arrangements under which discussions can take place. His proposal is that if those discussions were to lead to a statement of desire on the part of the people in some of the Caribbean islands for closer relations, whether economic or political, the whole question should be given consideration at the highest level. It is my view that it would be good for the people of that area, and good for us, if there were closer relations. I can even see the possibility of some of those islands being part of this country—of what province they would be a part might be an interesting question, but that is a detail which could be dealt with later on.

Mr. Whelan: Would they get four Senators, too?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am afraid the people of Turks and Caicos islands do not even have enough people for representation by one member of parliament let alone a Senator. I suppose they would have to be attached to a constituency on the mainland, like the Magdalen Islands. However, I did not want to get sidetracked on to that aspect, though things like this can happen a on a Friday afternoon. Rather, Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the hon. member for Hillsborough, as I commend my hon. friend from Waterloo-Cambridge, my friend and colleague across the way, and even my friend who has gone to the other place, Senator McIlraith, on proposing this idea. I hope our discussion today will lead to further consideration of this interesting proposal.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take very long. I wish to commend the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) on his excellent speech and for bringing forward this suggestion. I was a student at the University of British Columbia during the years when the confederation of all the formerly British islands of the West Indies was an important topic of discussion every time one encountered a student who came from that beautiful part of the world. They were living in exciting days; there was great promise there, and it has always been a matter of regret to me, as it has I am sure to other members of this chamber, that this dream was so rapidly destroyed shortly after it had been realized. In the event, it stands as an example to all democracies in the British tradition not to refer to referenda in attempts to stabilize situations. The federation split up and was destroyed.

There are still some parts left over, in a sense, and the hon. member for Hillsborough was referring to some of them. It is a temptation to a country such as ours to look south occasionally. I was here as a member of parliament in an earlier parliament when the sugar beet producers of Ontario and Alberta were seriously pressed and when they made repeated applications to the Liberal government of the day for a national sugar policy. Had such a policy been developed it would have done more for the Caribbean than anything we could have done in the way of aid or special programs or gifts. In addition, in recent years it could have saved us a considerable amount of currency when sugar prices went wild. But we had no national sugar policy and no long term agreements in effect. That was the time, too, when we might have acted with vigour and initiative to aid the islands of the Caribbean.

I believe the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemount (Mr. Lachance) was a bit hard on the proposal and on the remarks of the hon. member for Hillsborough. I do not really see any hint of annexation. There have been many periods in the development of this country and of the Commonwealth, formerly the British Empire, when areas of the world have asked to be attached to Canada or to the Empire because of advantages inherent in the form of government. Annexation is too harsh a word.

I have word of caution, however, to direct to the hon. member from Prince Edward Island. The proposal will be hard to sell in the west, particularly in British Columbia. I am sure a good many of my voters will see it as a plan to lure people from British Columbia to Toronto. One can imagine all manner of fly-by-night travel agencies being formed, charging a very low rate for trips to the Turks and Caicos Islands, and going bankrupt just when the 747 lands at the airport outside Toronto. Would-be tourists would then find themselves obliged to spend their hard-earned money in Toronto and substitute a holiday there for what they had planned.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A holiday?

Mr. Johnston: The alternative which I suggest to the hon. member for Hillsborough is that he find a comparable group of islands in the South Pacific. I am sure members from British Columbia will insist on a trade-off which will make it possible for them and their constituents on the Pacific coast to enjoy the summer sunshine, too, in the middle of winter. I do not know where he would find these islands as he looks south. I do not think Alcatraz would be available, and Easter Island is a little remote. It might be possible to work out some arrangement with the marvellously beautiful island of Fiji, but that would certainly be harder than developing an understanding with the Turks and Caicos islands. It is late, now, to ask for the return of San Juan, though if the hon. member could arrange that with our neighbour to the south I am sure we in British Columbia would all rejoice.

I hear someone mention Vancouver Island. Well, we are hoping that the federal government will eventually do something about transportation links to the mainland of British Columbia. There are dreams of a bridge. The time may come when the government in Ottawa—I do not think it will be a Liberal government—will appreciate the value of the islands off the Pacific coast of the nation. So, although I support the interesting proposal put forward this afternoon, I must warn the hon. member for Hillsborough of the difficulties we shall face in British Columbia, and suggest to him that a good many people might favour the transference of the islands which are being built either in the Arctic or in the northern seas to a latitude which would provide the same number of hours of sunshine as he envisages. Some such arrangement might satisfy those of us who live on the Pacific side of this great nation.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Before beginning what I have to say on the interesting motion before us, Mr. Speaker, I might tell the hon. member who has just finished speaking that should it prove impossible to transport one of those northern islands to the Pacific we might be able to transport him to one of those northern islands.

In his motion the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) touches upon a subject which has been of long standing interest to many Canadians and, I think I may safely say, especially to the residents of the Atlantic provinces. The trading links between Canada and the countries of the Commonwealth Caribbean are much older than Confederation itself and represent one of the earliest manifestations of Canadian commercial enterprise. Within the last century this relationship has developed and expanded to include substantial Canadian investment and, during the last 15 years, a high volume of Canadian development assistance. In fact, taken as a unit, the Commonwealth Caribbean has received the highest per capita level of Canadian aid of any region in the world.

There is also an intimacy of association based on the existence of many shared traditions, including the heritage of the British legal and parliamentary systems. Many Caribbean leaders have been educated in Canada, as the hon. member has said, and some are veterans of the Canadian Armed Forces. The long-standing friendship between the Commonwealth Caribbean and Canada has most recently been re-emphasized by the visit of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to Trinidad and Tobago, Barbados, and Guyana, before his attendance at the Commonwealth heads of government meeting in Jamaica.

Given the multiplicity of the ties between Canada and the Commonwealth Caribbean, it is not surprising that the possibility of some form of constitutional linkage has from time to time been suggested as a possible evolution of this relationship. About the time of the first world war, serious consideration was given to the concept of Canada's assuming Britain's responsibilities in several of the dependencies in what is now called the Commonwealth Caribbean. More recently there have been expressions of interest by various individuals within the Commonwealth Caribbean in the idea of some form of constitutional relationship with Canada. Nothing, however, has developed to the stage of a formal request for association, although a petition suggesting that association with Canada be explored went to the British government from the Turks and Caicos Islands in the winter of 1974.

As is well known, last winter much interest was attracted to the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman), in which he called attention to a proposed association between Canada and the Turks and Caicos Islands. Certainly the proposal was not without its attractions and, with a predictably effective assist from the Canadian winter, many of us were moved to ponder favourably the prospect of a salubrious winter climate within the boundaries of Canada. Why not, it was even suggested, establish a winter capital in this tropical paradise?

Mr. Johnston: We should move it to Victoria.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): You do not need another Pacific island there. Some unkind newspapermen were moved to suggest that any form of constitutional association was bound to demand the attention of parliamentary committees, which would most certainly require the attendance of members of this House to assess the climate of opinion within the territory itself. I have not heard any of them suggest they would want to accompany that committee.

However, like so many wonderful illusions, the prospect of this happy association could not withstand the hard light of critical analysis. In a statement tabled in April, 1974, by the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, the reasons for the Canadian government's position on the subject of a possible association between the Turks and Caicos and Canada were set out, and they are reasons which can be projected to include other countries of the Commonwealth Caribbean.

As hon. members may recall, it was pointed out that any association of this nature would inevitably produce a variety of complications. It was emphasized that the Canadian government attached high priority to ameliorating the disparity of wealth between the rich countries and poorer ones. However, the absorption of one small country into Canada, which in any event might be represented as an act of neo-colonialism, would not be in keeping with the pursuit of this objective. It was concluded, therefore, that there was no evidence that the association would be of greater mutual benefit than the already existing friendly relations between the Turks and Caicos and Canada; that Canada should not seek to alter its present boundaries; and that, in view of the foregoing, the Canadian government did not intend to pursue the question of a constitutional association with the Turks and Caicos Islands.

Among the problems created by the establishment of a constitutional association between Canada and the Turks and Caicos, or any other Commonwealth Caribbean state, would be the likelihood of pressures developing in other non-independent Commonwealth Caribbean countries for a similar arrangement. It is undoubtedly true that the small non-independent states of the Caribbean are confronted with something of a dilemma as to their future status.

I am sure hon. members will agree that it is for the Commonwealth Caribbean countries to work out their own destiny, and Canada's role must be confined to that of a good friend. If Canada were to establish a constitutional relationship with one of these countries it would inevitably mean that we would become drawn into Caribbean affairs and Caribbean politics in a manner which could prove to be an embarrassment. Inevitably the perspectives and interests of Canada with regard to a number of issues are not always the same as those of the Caribbean countries. Yet, if small Caribbean states were to join Canada, the capacity of their populations to influence Canadian policy would be small.

This might then mean that an initial enthusiasm for association with Canada would eventually give place to a sense of frustration and consequent alienation. Additional problems might also arise if a large number of Canadians chose to live in the territory, thus swamping the local population. For example, the entire population of the Turks and Caicos Islands is very small, so it would require that only a minuscule proportion of northern Canadians take up residence in the islands to overwhelm the local population completely. I submit that such a development would be most unfortunate and would almost certainly provoke a bitter local reaction when it was realized that the entire composition of their population had been changed through the movement of Canadians from continental Canada to their islands.

It would also seriously weaken the prospects for greater Caribbean unity if Canada were to appear to entertain seriously the prospect of detaching some of these countries from their Commonwealth Caribbean associations and integrating them into the Canadian system. May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order, please. It being five o'clock p.m. the time allotted for private members' business has now expired. Is the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton rising on a point of order?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I just wanted to say, Mr. Speaker, if I may, that it is nice to see you gracing the chair today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am only sorry that you have had to witness yet another example of talking out an opposition motion, but perhaps those are the breaks of the game. May I ask the acting House leader for the government to confirm that we will in fact be dealing with Bill C-58 on Tuesday?

Mr. Reid: That is correct. May I take this opportunity of saying that it has been a vintage day in the House of Commons on a Friday afternoon, the first time in the history of the Canadian parliament when there have been more members in the parliamentary press gallery than on the floor of the House. I am sure the lone CP reporter must have been delighted to have so much support with him this afternoon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, since everybody else seems to find something to say, may I wish you, sir, a happy week end.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Perhaps I can step out of character a bit and wish everybody else a happy week end. It being five o'clock p.m. this House accordingly stands adjourned until Tuesday next at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(3).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

SUGGESTED PARTICIPATION OF ORGANIZED LABOUR IN NEGOTIATION OF SALES CONTRACTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43. My motion concerns the sale and delivery of our grain to foreign customers. The foreign exchange earned by our grain sales abroad is vital to our economy at any time; these sales are especially vital when this country is running a present trade deficit which economists forecast can only worsen. Recent failures to meet our delivery commitments due to lawful strikes within Canada in grain delivery operations have seriously hurt our grain sales efforts; already foreign buyers have gone to rival producers. Not only has our whole economy been injured but our farmer-producers have had to pay millions of dollars in demurrage charges.

In a matter so important to all Canadians, we cannot afford labour-management confrontations where there are no winners, only losers. I suggest that organized labour must be made a party to our international grain sale negotiations. Therefore I propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the government immediately invite organized labour to participate as a party in contract negotiations for the sale of Canadian grain to foreign buyers, to the end that grain movement is guaranteed to meet delivery commitments to foreign purchasers despite any lawful strike.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion is proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 and cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

OLYMPIC GAMES

SUGGESTED FEDERAL ACTION TO END UNCERTAINTY OF GAMES BEING HELD IN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to move a motion under Standing Order 43. As there are no less than six federal departments already involved in the Olympic Games, and continuing problems threaten the very existence of the games in Canada, be they due to union blackmail or escalating deficits, and because of statements being made by members of the International Olympic Committee that the probability of the games moving to Mexico is in fact becoming a reality, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That in order to protect the government's involvement in the games and Canada's very own credibility, the government use its powers to involve itself directly in meetings with the IOC now being held in Lausanne, assess the over-all situation, and take direct action in bringing the existing uncertainty and chaos to an end.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion is proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 and cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNITED AIRCRAFT—SUGGESTED REIMBURSEMENT OF GRANTS IF WORK NOT RESUMED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that tomorrow, May 21, the QFL is to hold a study session in protest against the Quebec government's inaction with regard to the 20-month-old strike of United Aircraft workers that has been causing irreparable damage to the families of those workers, on the one hand, and to the Canadian economy, on the other hand, therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan):

That the House consider immediately what amounts have been paid to this company by different federal departments and what action should be taken to oblige that same company to reimburse the sums received within two weeks, if work has not resumed normally at the plants in Longueuil.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There being no unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

ENERGY

CONSERVATION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF AMOUNT OF SAVING AND DETAILS OF PROGRAM

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that on the hottest day in May the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources may not be thinking of energy conservation. On February 6, the minister said he could not give a specific goal for cutting back energy consumption because it would depend on the extent of co-operation from other departments. I should like to ask whether the minister is now in a position to say that the program he has planned will be sufficiently developed so that next winter he will be able to cut energy use by the one per cent which he proposes and hopes he can do?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I can be quite so specific at this point. Certainly, growth in the demand has moderated during the past winter, but the extent to which that was due either to higher prices or the impact of a milder winter we cannot yet be certain. My colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and myself will be meeting at the end of this week with industry for the purpose of further mobilizing industrial support behind the conservation program. As I mentioned to the hon. member privately, I hope to be able to inform him and the House in a relatively short interval about some estimate of the impact of the program to this date, and some directions in which we would like to go hereafter.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, in his statement the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said on February 6 that the goal of the program would be a number of government standards, regulations, incentives and investment programs. Were these what he was alluding to a moment ago in his reply, and will he be able to make these standards available to the public by next Monday?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Some of them, certainly, Mr. Speaker, particularly with regard to those of CMHC for insulation and other standards for home heating. I have impressed upon my colleague that for the benefit of the National Building Code it should be amended at an early date, and I would hope that the changes can be made available to the House. Given the timetable of that meeting with that particular group, which is a mixed government-private group, I am not certain we can achieve it within the time frame the hon. member is talking about, but that certainly would be one of our goals.

Mr. Gillies: Also at that time, Mr. Speaker, the minister suggested the major part of the conservation program in Canada would involve a series of tax measures. Without giving away any budgetary matters, could the minister indicate whether we can expect to find a series of tax proposals relating to energy conservation within the near future?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am restrained to await the Minister of Finance in that regard, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON RESEARCH ON ALTERNATIVE SOURCES—STANDARDS FOR BUILDING INSULATION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Science Council of Canada in its report yesterday entitled "Canada's Energy Opportunities" has recommended more intensive research and investment into renewable non-polluting energy resources as an important component in a national energy policy, and in view of the fact that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stated on February 10 that his department had completed an assessment of research work that had been done at the federal level with regard to alternative energy sources, is the minister now prepared to table that document on the subject?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. lady that sometime ago I indicated that as soon as the document was completed and translated it would be laid on the table of the House.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Further to the minister's comment with regard to insulation, Mr. Speaker, given that the new standards for insulation just released by CMHC do not meet the recommendations put forward by the joint energy industry task force or those recommended by the minister for conservation purposes, will the minister say why he and his colleagues were prepared to accept only half measures in this regard?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would not agree with the hon. lady's premise, Mr. Speaker.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF TAX DEDUCTIBILITY OF ADVERTISEMENT BY URBAN DEVELOPMENT INSTITUTE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's attempts to get a consensus from business, labour and governments for an incomes policy to deal with inflation based on restraining their demands, will the minister look at the type of advertisements appearing in newspapers such as the Toronto Globe and Mail sponsored by IAC and the Urban Development Institute which are simply pleading their special interests as investors to see whether such ads should be permitted to be tax deductible.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker; I will look into that.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

ALLEGED SUPPORT OF PREMIER BOURASSA BY PRIME MINISTER IN DEALING WITH CONSTRUCTION UNIONS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister has said that he backs the action the Premier of Quebec is taking following the publication of the Cliche report how does the Prime Minister, in giving his unqualified backing, justify Mr. Bourassa placing all the blame on Quebec construction unions going considerably farther than the report recommends while placing none of the blame or penalties on the members of the Quebec government and their civil servants who were seriously implicated by the report, and who remain unrestricted in their activities today and in the future?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is the latest example of the hon. member's non-sequiturs. All I said was that the Premier of Quebec was right in saying the social order had pre-eminence over holding the olympics. That is all I said. If the hon. member wants to discuss my ideas about other things, he can ask about them independently in respect of Quebec.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister has indicated he does not support all that Mr. Bourassa is doing in respect of this report, I should like to ask him if he would come clean with this House and tell this Parliament just what aspects of Mr. Bourassa's program he does not agree with.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

JAMAICA—GOVERNMENT VIEW OF ALLEGED STATEMENT BY HIGH COMMISSIONER CONCERNING TORONTO POLICE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the very despicable murder of a boy of Jamaican origin, Michael Habbib, who was brutally murdered in the city of Toronto following which the High Commissioner for Jamaica in Canada charged the Toronto police as being extremely racist, uncultured and inhuman and made this statement:

> I am extremely dissatisfied with the administration of justice when there are clashes between my people and the police.

These statements are totally out of keeping with the position of one who is High Commissioner for another country to our country, and I would ask the Prime Minister whether he has been in touch with the Government of Jamaica in connection with these most reprehensible words and what the attitude of that government is to the statements I have brought to his attention.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member brought to my attention a statement to which I was not listening, because he did not say the question was directed to me and I must apologize.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did.

Mr. Sharp: At the very end.

Mr. Trudeau: It was not until the very end that he mentioned my name. I will gladly read Hansard and see if I can supply an answer to the problem.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, apparently the Prime Minister was not listening. I referred to him at the very beginning and I always refer to him as "right honourable", a lesson he might learn about propriety in this House.

SOCIETY FOR STUDY OF THE HERITAGE OF CANADA

SUGGESTED REIMBURSEMENT OF STUDENTS DUPED BY THE SOCIETY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Since the minister's department funded the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada to the tune of several hundred thousand dollars, thus assisting it to take advantage of the many students who are presently owed money, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if he plans to make any funds available to reimburse or otherwise compensate those students who have been duped by the activities of an organization which apparently the government and the minister allowed to proceed with very little if any supervision or monitoring?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think before the hon. member draws conclusions of that type he might wait for the report I promised him which is ready but is being translated into French, and which I hope to have either later this afternoon or tomorrow. After he has had a chance to read that, he might want to raise a question.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF PROPER USE OF FUNDS FOR NATIVE STUDY PROGRAM UNDER AUSPICES OF SOCIETY FOR THE STUDY OF THE HERITAGE OF CANADA

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): I hope the minister will be able to deal with this particular aspect of the reimbursement of students who have been affected.

I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the native study program announced from Ottawa in a press release from the minister's department on January 15 of this year, apparently under the auspices of the now insolvent Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada, can the minister confirm that all the funds advanced pursuant to this program have been properly utilized, and, if not, where did these funds go, the minister, I am sure, being aware that the Stony Indians themselves cancelled their participation in this program some time ago?

Oral Questions

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the full details. As a matter of fact, I have asked for a report on the situation of the Stony Indians and I will have to come back with the information later.

POLICY OF DEPARTMENT IN AWARDING CONTRACTS—REASON FOR AWARDING CONTRACT FOR SURVEYING ON WEST COAST TO TORONTO COMPANY

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. Can he assure the House that it is the policy of his department to award contracts whenever possible to firms operating on a regular basis in the regions where the work is required?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Certainly, Mr. Speaker, whenever it is possible.

[English]

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister advise the House why the first extensive federal government contract in many years for surveying on the west coast was awarded to a Toronto survey firm, despite the fact that three British Columbia firms bid on the job, know the area, and have the expertise to do the work?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely, the hon. member must realize that that is not the kind of information the minister should have at his fingertips.

ENERGY

CONSERVATION PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO OBTAIN PUBLIC SUPPORT FOR PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. What are his plans to try to galvanize public support for a conservation program pertaining to energy as it seems to me that what has been done so far has not caused a ripple? Does the minister intend, for example, to give the Canadian people a detailed report on what the government itself is doing or has done to conserve energy within its own sphere, to turn out some of its lights, for example?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the hon. gentleman's conversion to conservation in the energy field.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would say, as I indicated to the hon. member for Don Valley, that we will be prepared to report on the programs to date and also on the measures taken. Indeed, we will be going ahead with further discussions with industry in this regard. I am glad to see opposition interest expressed in this.

Mr. Stanfield: Since the only thing the minister has done so far is to engage in a controversy with Le Jour, I should like to ask him whether he is going to outline to the House a program designed to get the Canadian people behind a conservation program which has become even more urgent with the pronouncements of the Shah of Iran, for example, that the world price of oil will probably be increased this fall. Can the minister give the House—not today but in the very near future—some outline of a program that will really elicit some support from the Canadian people and results from expenditures of some several hundreds of thousands of dollars in funds by the government of Canada?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): A great deal of support has been elicited for the program to date in way of response to the specific advertisements and in expressions to me and members of the government concerning the efforts made to date. With regard to the reference to a possible international price increase, and indeed international efforts on conservation, I hope to be able to report to the House on this kind of question after the international meeting on energy next week.

UNITED AIRCRAFT—SUGGESTED REIMBURSEMENT OF GRANTS IF WORK NOT RESUMED

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. Ministers of Regional Economic Expansion and of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I would like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Since the conflict at the United Aircraft is still continuing without any sign of hope for a solution, and since the QFL plans a general strike day for tomorrow, May 21, 1975, in order to force the Quebec government to solve that labour dispute, may I ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether he is prepared to assist in the settlement of that conflict by forcing the company, if necessary, to reimburse the subsidies it has been or will be granted, were the corporation to resume work in Longueuil?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I understood well, the hon. member's question was directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion or to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I take notice of it on their behalf, and I will see to it that an answer be given to the hon. member.

IMPRISONMENT OF CERTAIN UKRAINIAN WOMEN IN SOVIET UNION—POSSIBLE INCLUSION IN AMNESTY ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of representations made by the National Women's Council of the Ukrainian Canadian Committee in a recent letter to the Prime Minister concerning certain Ukrainian women imprisoned in the Soviet Union, and in view of the request of this council that the Canadian government make efforts to secure the release of these women, will the minister ascertain whether the announcement of amnesty, which came from Moscow over the weekend, included these particular persons? If not, will the minister pursue this matter on behalf of the Canadian people?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will make the necessary inquiries and pursue the matter further.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTION ALL MEAT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION BE INSPECTED BY FEDERAL DEPARTMENT

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that meat carcasses from diseased animals processed by Federal Packing Incorporated of Magog, Quebec and offered for sale to the general public as meat suitable for human consumption bore the provincial approved meat inspection stamp, would the minister confer with his cabinet colleagues to consider placing all meat inspection in Canada under the direct supervision of the federal health of animals branch of the Department of Agriculture to prevent any further such incidents from taking place?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this service is available to any provincial government which wants it, but it is not forced upon it.

Mr. Mitges: I realize this service is available, but in my opinion perhaps some direct action should be taken by the federal Department of Agriculture. Would the minister consider taking such action to prevent any further such incidents taking place?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we think that the sale of this meat is a deplorable thing. I have had discussions with my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and we will have further discussions, but it should be realized that this matter comes under provincial jurisdiction and that the province has the right to supervise that inspection if it so desires.

EGGS—POSSIBILITY OF CONTROLLING IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture, who seems to be enjoying a low profile these days, how he is reacting to the request of the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, which met in Ottawa last week, to have the border with the United States closed. Does he intend to meet this request, and if so, why?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as soon as it can be shown that the egg producers of Canada have their supply-management program in proper order—and they claim they do have but we are checking the facts on that at the present time—then we will inform our counterparts in the United States that we have a proper supply-management program which will take care of our needs, so they can expect that we would be asking for some control on imports into Canada.

CANADIAN EGG MARKETING AGENCY—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENFORCE QUOTAS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): What steps is the minister taking to ensure that CEMA is operating within the quotas it has set out for its member agencies, how it enforces these quotas and if interprovincial trade in eggs is now free.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): We are doing that very thing, checking the agreements to make sure they are fulfilled. These all have to be checked out to make sure that the proper procedure is being followed, because I am not going to become involved in anything which will not be a properly managed program for egg production and egg sales in Canada.

In view of the answer he gave, I should like to ask the minister who has responsibility for interprovincial trade if the provinces have jurisdiction over the stamping and inspection of meat travelling from one province to another?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, any meat that travels from one province to another is supposed to be federally inspected.

The Acting Prime Minister undertook to obtain an answer. I wonder if the minister has had a chance to read Hansard of that date and if he is able to give an answer to the question.

In light of the fact that the Houston, Texas police force has said that LEIU is involved in surveillance of citizens not involved in criminal activity and has collected gutter gossip and because of the participation of Canadian police forces including those of Montreal and Toronto, the OPP and the federal Department of Manpower and Immigration in LEIU, has the minister investigated the charges made against LEIU?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the RCMP does not belong to this organization and does not contribute or receive any information. As a result, I cannot say anything more about it. We have no information about that organization.

LAW ENFORCEMENT INTELLIGENCE UNIT—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF ACTIVITIES BY DEPARTMENT OF MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): May I put a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration? In light of the fact that his department does belong to LEIU, can the minister assure the House that the allegations of improper activities of LEIU by the Houston, Texas police department which were subsequently confirmed by the Atlanta, Georgia police department are being investigated?

SUGGESTION BY NOVA SCOTIA NO INCREASE IN FREIGHT RATES UNTIL NEW TRANSPORTATION POLICY ANNOUNCED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the development minister of Nova Scotia has said that further increases in freight rates must not be imposed until the Nova Scotia government has received, and the federal government has considered, a new national transportation policy, may I ask the minister if he agrees with his Liberal colleague in the Nova Scotia cabinet on this matter?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Unfortunately, I have not read the statement of the Nova Scotia minister, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member will send me a copy of what he said, then I can tell if it is the policy of the government.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to send the minister a copy of the statement. Will the minister agree that the Nova Scotia minister should be in a position to see clearly both the immediate and the longer-term impact that a further scheduled freight rate increase would have on investment and jobs in the province of Nova Scotia?

Could the right hon. gentleman or one of his ministers advise the House of any initiatives taken by Canada regarding a question posed by me some weeks ago regarding efforts to restore the sale of Canadian caught swordfish to United States markets?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for having notified my office of the question. I am informed that the United States still prohibits the import into all states of swordfish with mercury content in excess of .5 parts per million. That is the situation in the United States and that is the situation in Canada. There is no law against fishing the swordfish of course, providing the fishermen do not sell it to Canada or the United States if it has more than that percentage of mercury. As to whether that is necessary for the protection of the health of Canadians or Americans, I would, of course, defer to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I know of no expertise in my office that would contradict that.

OLYMPIC GAMES

SUGGESTED FEDERAL ACTION TO ENSURE GAMES TAKE PLACE IN CANADA

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I address my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Contrary to continuing government statements, I am certain that the Prime Minister is aware that his government is involved up to its neck in the floundering preparations for the Olympic Games. Because of that fact, and the very good possibility of the games being moved to another site, can the Prime Minister advise this House whether he is concerned with the problems being encountered by COJO, Montreal and Quebec. If so, why is he not prepared to take the initiative to get directly involved in assessing the overall situation, perhaps by meeting directly with IOC officials in order to protect the federal government's involvement thus far and perhaps arrive at some satisfactory alternative that Montreal is afraid to take?

● (1440)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, these questions seem to be quite hypothetical. As far as the government is concerned, we are confident that the olympics will take place in Canada next year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

PROPOSED REDEMPTION OF PERPETUAL BONDS AT PAR VALUE BY SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact the minister has stated that the perpetual bonds will be redeemed in 20 years, and in view of the fact many holders of these bonds are senior citizens who not only purchased the bonds in good faith but now find themselves in need of 100 per cent return on their investment due to the increasing cost of living, will the minister also keep the faith and permit the original purchasers of these bonds, when they reach the age of 65, to have the bonds redeemed at par value?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the difficulty there is to achieve an equitable way of redeeming the bonds without overly dislocating the market price to the prejudice of those who immediately prior sold their bonds. On the basis of the 20 year redemption, those bonds now carry an effective rate comparable to other bonds.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, my question was with regard to the original purchasers of the bonds who are now in a deplorable situation. Will the minister give consideration to that group of senior citizens who were the original purchasers of these bonds?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I will not exclude any representations, but I am not too optimistic about the hon. member's submission.

[Mr. Jelinek.]

STATUS OF WOMEN

REFUSAL OF AIR CANADA TO ACCEPT DESIGNATION "MS"—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his role as defender of women's rights. Will the minister get in touch with Air Canada with regard to their practice of insisting that only the designation "Miss" or "Mrs." be used? They will not accept "Ms." as a designation. Will the minister determine why?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to take the hon. member's recommendation as notice. I shall advise my hon. colleague the Minister of Transport and Air Canada; I am sure they will consider this matter seriously.

[English]

Mr. Saltsman: Can the minister indicate when he expects to complete this dialogue with the Minister of Transport and the Air Canada computer and report back to the House?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: As soon as possible, Mr. Speaker.

DATE OF BAYDA COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. What progress has been made by the Bayda commission which is studying labour problems in the west coast grain handling industry? When can we reasonably expect to see the final report?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, that question should be directed to the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Labour. What progress has been made by the Bayda commission which is studying the problems of labour unrest in the grain handling industry on the west coast, and when can we reasonably expect to see the final report?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, if my memory serves me right, Mr. Justice Bayda indicated he would have his report ready about mid-July. I will double check and get back to the hon. member.

TRANSPORT

INVITATION TO AIR CANADA AND CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS TO SUBSCRIBE FOR SHARES IN NEW BANK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware that Boyd, Stott and McDonald Limited of Montreal is proposing to incorporate a new bank to be known as the National Commercial Bank of Canada, that an application for such incorporation has been made to the other place and, more specifically, is the minister aware that shareholders of the Boyd firm who have been invited to subscribe for shares in the new bank include directly or indirectly Air Canada and the CNR?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the details. I will take the question as notice and give an answer tomorrow.

SUGGESTED INSTRUCTIONS TO AIR CANADA AND CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS NOT TO INVEST IN NON-RELATED VENTURES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Bearing in mind we almost go into the travel agency business without, presumably, government approval, will the minister indicate if he has given instructions to the management of such Crown corporations as Air Canada or CNR that in future they should not make further investments in new non-related ventures without government approval?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, surely I cannot give instructions to Air Canada, or any other Crown corporation, on things which they are authorized by law to do.

FINANCE

REASON FOR DELAY OF BILL C-7 CONCERNING INCORPORATION OF BANKS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In view of this pending bank incorporation and the move by the British Columbia provincial government to set up its own financial institution to be known as the B.C. Savings and Trust Corporation, will the minister indicate why Bill C-7, a bill providing for speedier incorporation of banks and the possible provincial participation in the share ownership of banks, has been left in limbo for so long in this parliament after having similarly been left in limbo in the last parliament, bearing in mind this bill received first reading in this parliament eight months ago and there has been no further action on it?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I suppose the issue is primarily a question of House time. I will consult with the leader of the House.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

SUGGESTION LIGHTS BE TURNED OFF TO CONSERVE ENERGY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. It is further to a question asked earlier with regard to energy conservation. There were recent advertisements in the press with regard to the Department of Public Works turning out lights in many buildings in Canada. We know that is not true, even in Ottawa. Has the minister taken steps to ensure that the lights in all public buildings in Canada are turned off after hours in order that the federal government will better conserve energy?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think I explained some considerable time ago that in the interests of economy and capital investment, a number of buildings which we occupy have master controls, but not individual controls. The result is that all the lights have to be on or all the lights have to be off. We are currently modifying this in order to have individual controls.

Mr. Ellis: When will the minister make a statement to the House on the progress being made on this work?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, such a statement can be prepared at any time. Perhaps the most appropriate occasion would be before the committee on the estimates.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGATION CIDA WITHHELD INFORMATION ON LOAN TO CUBA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since Mr. Gérin-Lajoie confirmed the fact that he wanted all financial details of the CIDA loan to Cuba to be suppressed and not made public in the press release, does the minister consider this attitude to be consistent with his avowed beliefs in open government and how many other examples are there where CIDA has deliberately withheld potentially embarrassing information?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for raising the question of Cuban financial assistance because there has been a good deal of misinformation floating around, either accidentally or otherwise. The facts are that in February I made a public announcement indicating the extent of financial assistance to Cuba. In February 1975, in a press release, I indicated the amount of the loan and the amount of the grant component. That is the only assistance available to Cuba that has been approved or that will be put into effect. Any other suggestions with regard to fictional or real documents refer to speculation and do not refer in any way to actual decisions or actual assistance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: In view of the fact that my questions 1,480 to 1,511 have been on the order paper since February 5, will the Secretary of State for External Affairs advise whether one or two of my questions could be answered in a week or is there something to hide?

● (1450)

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. The questions put down by the hon. member have been very much on my mind, but there has been a natural conflict between my desire for open government and my desire to curtail government expenditure; in this case, I believe that to answer all the hon. gentleman's questions fully would cost in excess of $10,000. Maybe a more selective approach on the part of the hon. member would relieve me of concern in that area and possibly provide him with the information he is seeking. I am suggesting he could tell me exactly what he wants without going over the whole waterfront.

Mr. Paproski: They are very simple questions, Mr. Speaker. All I would like to know is what criteria were used in awarding the contract and who was the low and high bidder. There must be a full file containing this information and if there is not, the government is incompetent.

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF SUBCOMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE CIDA

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since problems concerning CIDA appear to be cropping up ever more frequently, would the hon. gentleman be willing to support the establishment of a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence to look into the affairs of CIDA?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): That matter was dealt with in the standing committee itself. I am ready to deal in the committee or in the House with any questions relating to CIDA, though I hope they are based on sounder information than that which was put about with respect to the Cuban loan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CRIMINAL CODE

POSSIBLE AMENDMENT TO PREVENT THOSE UNABLE TO PAY FINES FROM GOING TO JAIL

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that a high percentage of those in our prisons are native Indians, many of whom are there simply because of their failure to pay fines, and since the hon. gentleman is bringing in changes to the Criminal Code, would he advise us whether among those proposed changes is a provision whereby those who do not have the money to pay fines will not be jailed because of their impecuniosity?

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): A proposal to make this particular change is not included in the amendments which are anticipated in the very near future. However, the whole subject is one which is receiving a good deal of consideration both within the government and within the law reform commission. I would anticipate some solution in the not too distant future.

Mr. Leggatt: Would the minister consult with his counterpart in British Columbia, where legislation has been in place for some time under the summary conviction act, with regard to the success of that legislation in reducing the number of Indians held in prison?

Mr. Lang: I am consulting very widely within a variety of jurisdictions, including certain other countries of the Commonwealth where interesting experiments are going on.

SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF DEPLOYMENT OF LIFEBOAT STATIONS IN NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR TWO STATIONS IN WESTERN PART OF PROVINCE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is intended for the Minister of Transport—it follows the announcement of the creation of four additional lifeboat stations in the maritimes. A look at the map will reveal a very wide gap in the spacing of these stations, indicating a lack of appreciation of the factors governing the spacing of the lifeboat bases, particularly in western Newfoundland. Would the minister reconsider the deployment of these bases and see that at least two are located in the western part of Newfoundland?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I have seen the map and it is true there is a gap. We are now reviewing our rescue policy and this will probably be one of the matters we shall look into.

NATIONAL PARKS

WOOD BUFFALO—POSSIBILITY OF OBTAINING OTHER LAND TO OFFSET PORTION REMOVED TO SATISFY NATIVE CLAIMS

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It concerns the removal of 42,000 acres from Wood Buffalo National Park in order to satisfy native claims under Treaty No. 8. Has the minister made any provision for obtaining other land suitable for national park purposes to offset this removal? Further, what is the policy of Parks Canada regarding the removal of land from national park status?

Mr. Speaker: The first part of the question deserves an answer but the second should not properly be asked during the question period.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Since the obligation to the Indian people for the treaty land antedated the creation of the park, we decided that this was an obligation we should honour. This was the decision taken by my predecessor and we are in the process of carrying it out. I would point out that the land in question represents only a minute fraction of the largest national park in Canada and that its removal from park status will not impair the value of the national park.

Mr. Elzinga: What guarantees, if any, have been negotiated to protect the park land surrounding the reserve areas?

Mr. Buchanan: The land is being excised. There are no guarantees. As far as the adjoining areas are concerned, they remain in the parks and are subject to the control which normally applies.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State I would direct my question to the Acting Secretary of State. What criteria were used to fund projects under the student community service program? Can the minister inform us why all applications from native people under Treaty 7, with the exception of one, were rejected?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That information should be sought in some other way.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ALLEGED POSSIBILITY OF DENIAL OF FUNDS IF LOCAL GOVERNMENT GUIDELINES NOT FOLLOWED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It concerns local government guidelines in connection with housing policy and education and the fear that if local Indian bands do not follow these guidelines their funds will be cut off. Will the minister tell us whether or not local bands will in fact be cut off from funds if they do not abide by these guidelines?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): These are guidelines which we have established for the operation of local government on the reserves; we feel they are reasonable guidelines having to do with normal administration, auditing and so on; we are asking the bands to agree to them and we expect they will be prepared to do so.

Mr. Malone: In view of the fact that according to a telegram I received this morning from the chief of the Samson band that there is to be a three-day conference concerning the guidelines in Edmonton on May 27, 28 and 29, would the minister allow some period of grace during which to hear representations from the Indian people who have some serious misgivings in connection with these regulations?

Mr. Buchanan: As far as these guidelines are concerned, I have already indicated to the Indian people that we are prepared to regard them as being of an interim nature; we would discuss them and review them after they have been in operation for a year. There are further guidelines which have not yet been proclaimed and we have stated we are prepared to hear any representations regarding them.

DATE OF PRESENTATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, a question to the Minister of Finance who, I think, undertook to tell the House this week when the budget will be brought down. After a beautiful weekend given to optimism and making decisions, is he in a position today to tell the House when he will be bringing down the budget?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I shall be able to announce the date this week, Mr. Speaker.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PRIVILEGE

MR. STEVENS—PROCEDURE FOLLOWED IN STANDING COMMITTEE—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I gave notice of a question of privilege which I proposed, with your consent, to raise today. The matter concerns the obstruction of the business of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs—business which was referred to that committee by this House for consideration and report. This obstruction was carried out on Thursday, May 15, by the newly elected chairman, the member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), certain other members of the government party who are members of the committee, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie), and the responsible officials of the office of the chief government whip.

● (1500)

During the course of the proceedings on the estimates of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, with a quorum present, I moved that vote L20, being a vote of $38.1 million for the purchase by the government of Canadair, be reduced to $1. The chairman improperly permitted the minister, who had no status in the committee except that of a witness, to speak to my motion. During this delay, members of the government party, who were in a minority, left the committee without pausing to speak to the motion. The chairman then ruled there was no quorum and refused to put the question. He did this by ruling that a member of the official opposition who was present was not a member of the committee inasmuch as neither he nor the committee clerk had been notified under Standing Order 65(4)(b).

If the Chairman had not been notified, as he alleged, Mr. Speaker, that was a deliberate failure for which the chief government whip is responsible. The appropriate change in membership had been effected by the responsible officials of the official opposition chief whip's office in plenty of time for the chief government whip's office to make the change. I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the government has a majority sufficiently large to supply members on committees at all times. Yet in this case they left one sole member on the committee, the hon. member for York Centre. There is no reason for these government members to be absent from their duties in committee and, if it please them, to outvote opposition members in committee under the rules. To fail in their duties as members but yet to obtain their way by trickery and obstruction markets them as devious, and the government to which they adhere as devious. I leave the conduct of the chairman and of the minister to their several consciences: I merely point out to the chairman that his conduct is not conducive to co-operation.

The result of this deviousness and obstruction of the business of the committee will probably be that vote L20 will not be considered; it will be deemed to have been passed and reported to the House. No consideration will have been given by the committee to the dubious expenditure of almost $40 million of public moneys for a questionable adventure. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that the same Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce circumvented the same committee in the last parliament with respect to a similar purchase.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member can confine himself to the events at hand.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am prepared to move, if you find my question of privilege is well founded:

That the subject matter of this question of privilege be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

If Your Honour decides that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization is more appropriate, I will so change my motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) rising in his place to speak to the question of privilege. While this might tend to lend some balance to the remarks which have been put forward by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), the fact of the matter is that both hon. members must realize that proceedings in a committee may be all of the things that have been described but they may have been otherwise motivated. However, surely it is not for the Chair to judge what the motivations were or whatever the actions were on the part of members of the committee as referred to by the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

The fact of the matter is that even if I accept all of the descriptions of the motivations involved and the results thereof, I am sure the hon. member is aware that even if the descriptions were correct in every case, with regard to which I am sure there must be dispute—otherwise the hon. member for York Centre would not be seeking to enter the question—none of the actions so described constitute a question of privilege.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Speaker, you have ruled that this is not a question of privilege, but since personnel in my office have been mentioned I think it is up to me to make sure that this is rectified, and with your permission I should like to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have ruled on the question of privilege without giving the hon. member for York Centre the chance to speak. Having ruled on it, I really feel that there should be no further comment.

Mrs. Appolloni: On the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I should like the record to show that the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) was present at that meeting and doing her duty.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISION TO INCREASE PENALTIES FOR IMPAIRED DRIVING

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-391, to amend the Criminal Code (impaired driving).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, the bill I propose will provide for more appropriate penalties for conviction on charges of impaired driving. Specifically, the bill provides for penalties of imprisonment from nine months to ten years where death results, and from six months to five years where injury results. The bill further provides for stiffer penalties even if death or injury does not result. These range from a fine of $50 to $500 for a first offence to imprisonment for three months to 12 months for a third offence. In addition, conviction on any of these charges would result in loss of licence to drive for up to three years.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

THURSDAY AND FRIDAY OF THIS WEEK ALLOTTED DAYS

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I should like to confirm that Thursday and Friday of this week be allotted days, pursuant to Standing Order 58.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 1,150, 1,822, 1,831, 2,054, 2,057, 2,058, 2,062, 2,142, 2,174, 2,201, 2,211, 2,295, 2,367, 2,388 and 2,413.

Mr. Speaker, if question No. 1,556 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call starred question No. 2,030?

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION—LEASES

Question No. 1,150—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

For the years 1972-73, 1973-74 and 1974-75, what leases were awarded by the National Capital Commission and, in each case, what was the (a) type of lease (b) description of property (c) terms of lease and length (d) names and addresses of lessees?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): For the years 1972-73, 1973-74 and 1974-75, the National Capital Commission has negotiated leases and lease renewal agreements numbering between 1,300 and 1,500 per annum. The types of leases based on the kinds of property involved were varied, as the following approximate percentages for each year indicate: Farm and Market Garden Use, 10 per cent; Residential Use, 58 per cent; Commercial Use, 14 per cent; Open land used for Municipal, Institutional, Recreational and Conservation Use, 18 per cent. A description of each property, the terms and length of each lease and a list of names and addresses of lessees would be of a voluminous character and require an inordinate cost to prepare. In addition, many of the leases are the private concern of the lessees and publication might be considered a breach of confidence. If there are any individual leases about which details are required, this information can be provided.

CANAC LINGUISTIC SERVICES OF MONTREAL

Question No. 1,822—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What has been the total cost since its inception of all aspects of CANAC Linguistic Services of Montreal?

2. How many employees to date (a) of Air Canada (b) of CNR have received language training from this school (c) how many have been instructed in (i) French (ii) English?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The Managements of Canadian National Railways and Air Canada advise as follows: 1. CN/AC Linguistic Services was established in June, 1973 to provide translation, terminology and language training services to Canadian National and Air Canada. The total cost of operations from June, 1973 to December, 1974, the period for which figures are readily available was $2,078,037.

2. (a) 1,415; (b) 1,018; (c) (i) 2,254, (ii) 179.

PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE STAFF

Question No. 1,831—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

As of February 28, 1975 (a) how many individuals were employed in the Privy Council Office (b) how many were raised in Westmount and/or went to McGill University and/or studied at Oxford University?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): (a) 315. (b) Westmount, 3; McGill University, 9; Oxford University, 4.

*CMHC—NAMES OF LAWYERS ACTING IN CONSTITUENCY OF WELLINGTON-GREY-DUFFERIN-WATERLOO

Question No. 2,030—Mr. Beatty:

1. Since October 30, 1972 (a) what are the names and addresses of lawyers who were given work by CMHC in the Constituency of Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (b) by year, how much was paid to each for work on behalf of (i) CMHC (ii) the government?

2. What are the names of lawyers currently on CMHC's approved list within the Constituency?

3. Since October 30, 1972, what were the names of people consulted in determining what lawyers in the Constituency would be given business by CMHC?

4. (a) Were government members consulted about the allocation of business within their constituencies (b) was the Member for the Constituency of Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo consulted about the allocation of business within the area and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in view of the length of the answer, may I be permitted to have it appear in Hansard as if it had been read?

Mr. Speaker: In view of the length of the question, is it agreed that the parliamentary secretary be permitted to file the question and it be appended to Hansard as if it had been read?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The answer referred to above follows:]

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: 1. For loans approved in 1973 and 1974 in the counties of Dufferin, Grey and Wellington, the following lawyers were retained by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for legal work in connection with CMHC direct loans: Fergus—Wilson, Jack and Reycraft, J. Cecil Wolfe; Guelph—A. Aiken, A. Braida, Frank O. Brewster, Grant A. Campbell, Stanley Flesher, John T. A. Gamble, Q.C., G. W. Goetz, W. C. Hamilton, J. W. Matthews, Brian M. McCann, P. J. Morris, C. L. McKinnon, Q.C., A. J. Moon, Frederick P. Moyer, Q.C., Ronald G. Sansom, David C. Smith, R. Paul G. Smith, A. Edward Thoms, J. E. Valeriote; Hamilton—J. F. Easterbrook,; Kitchener—James R. Breithaupt; Markdale—J. Arkle Dunlop, Q.C.; Orangeville—Miss Carol A. Allison; Owen Sound—McLeod A. Craig, Q.C.; Toronto—Hassard, Elliott. Legal fees with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation direct loans are paid by the borrowers, and CMHC, therefore, has no record of the amounts paid to these lawyers. The following lawyers were retained in 1973 and 1974 to handle actions where arrears on loans required legal action: Legal Actions: Fergus—Wilson, Jack and Reycraft; Guelph—C. L. McKinnon, Q.C., G. Hayes Murphy; Orangeville—H. Clark Adams, Q.C.; Owen Sound—Telford and Van Wyck. Where actions are settled prior to trial, the costs are paid by the borrower and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has no records of the amounts.

2, 3, and 4. The Minister of Justice, in accordance with the responsibilities imposed upon him by his position, recommends from time to time names of legal agents across Canada who are best able to perform the legal work that the Government of Canada or certain of its agencies may require to have done. All governments have observed the unchallanged principle that the choice of agents to act on behalf of the Minister rests with him, and that the criterion for appointment is one of competence. Advice on appointment of legal agents is taken from numerous sources including, at times, local bar societies. The final choice of legal agents is simply a matter of judgment, and there is no single set procedure for receiving recommendations. Present practice with respect to CMHC is that, with the approval of the Minister of Justice, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs from time to time provides CMHC with the names of legal agents who might be employed by CMHC in various municipalities throughout Canada.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS OFFICE

In the last fiscal year, what was the cost of operation of the Parliamentary Returns Office of the Department of National Defence?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): The Parliamentary Returns Office of the Department of National Defence operates as a subunit within the Directorate General of Information which is responsible for a wide range of information functions and duties. It is not possible to separate costs for Parliamentary Returns work from the overall operating cost of this directorate.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE—PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS OFFICE

In the last fiscal year, what was the cost of operation of the Parliamentary Returns Office of the Office of the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): There is no Parliamentary Returns Office as such in the Prime Minister's Office and the Privy Council Office. Parliamentary Returns are handled by the office of the Director of Administration, Privy Council Office.

PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE—PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS OFFICE

In the last fiscal year, what was the cost of operation of the Parliamentary Returns Office of the Privy Council Office?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): There is no Parliamentary Returns Office as such in the Prime Minister's Office and the Privy Council Office. Parliamentary Returns are handled by the office of the Director of Administration, Privy Council Office.

[Mr. Bané.]

DEPARTMENT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL—PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS OFFICE

Question No. 2,062—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

In the last fiscal year, what was the cost of operation of the Parliamentary Returns Office of the Department of the Solicitor General?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): The Parliamentary Returns Office is not a separate entity but operates as a unit within the Ministry Secretariat which reports to the Deputy Minister. It is not possible to separate costs for Parliamentary Returns work from the overall operating cost of the Secretariat. The foregoing reply is applicable also to those persons to whom the Heads of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Canadian Penitentiary Service and the National Parole Board have delegated responsibility in relation to Parliamentary Returns.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Question No. 2,142—Mr. Herbert:

1. Is it the intention of the government that the Post Office Department be financially self-supporting and (a) if so, by what date is it intended to reach that objective (b) if not, to what extent is it intended to subsidize the Department over the next few years?

2. Is it planned to subsidize specific sectors of the economy by low mail rates and, if so, what are the priorities and will the matter of Canadian or foreign ownership be a consideration?

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): 1. The Post Office Act under which the Post Office Department is managed contains no reference to financial self-sufficiency nor does current government policy call for this achievement. (a) Not applicable; (b) The funds required to meet anticipated expenses each year are voted by Parliament after consideration of departmental estimates. Major postage rates are also set by Statute. The extent by which expenditures may exceed revenues is, therefore, at the discretion of Parliament.

2. There is no specific policy to subsidize, by low mail rates, specific sectors of the economy. The excess of expenditures over revenues for the department is regarded as a necessary cost of providing postal service to all citizens rather than a subsidy to specific mailers. The effect of Canadian or foreign ownership on rates will be a matter for Parliament to decide.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE AND ROYAL ROADS MILITARY COLLEGE—BILINGUALISM

Question No. 2,174—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What are all the reasons that the government has designated the Royal Military College, Kingston, Ontario, bilingual?

2. What are all the reasons that the government has not yet designated Royal Roads Military College, Victoria, British Columbia, bilingual?

3. What are all the reasons that one college is being treated differently than the other to date?

4. What part has politics played in this situation?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): 1. The decision to extend instruction in both of the official languages at the Royal Military College is consistent with the implementation and development of Government policy on bilingualism.

2. At present Royal Roads Military College offers only the first two years of university training and students attend RMC for the final two years of the four-year course.

3. There is no difference in treatment, except for the timing of implementation of the programme of institutional bilingualism.

4. None.

DEPARTMENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT—EMPLOYMENT OF INDIANS AND INUITS

Question No. 2,201—Mr. Firth:

1. (a) How many Indians and Inuits are presently employed by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on a (i) casual basis (ii) contract basis (b) in which branches are they employed (c) what were the number of persons employed in (i) clerical (ii) executive (iii) administrative categories for the fiscal years 1970-71, 1971-72, 1972-73, 1973-74 and 1974-75?

2. What was the amount of money spent for training programmes operated by the Department for Indian bands (a) band management (b) housing (c) education (d) economic development for the fiscal years 1970-71, 1971-72, 1972-73, 1973-74 and 1974-75?

3. In determining the position of Director of the Operations Branch in the Department, was the National Indian Brotherhood involved and, if so (a) in what way (b) how many applications were received (c) how many applicants were interviewed for the position?

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to Ministry of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. (a) (i) 338. (ii) Figures for employment on a contract basis are not available. (b) Indian and Eskimo Affairs, 207; Northern Affairs, 13; Parks Canada, 111; Administration, 7. (c) Breakdown by categories is not available.

2. (a) Band management, (b) Housing, (c) Education, (d) Economic Development, 1970-71—figures are not available, 1971-72 (a) $353,220; (b) nil; (c) $64,189; (d) $1,950; 1972-73 (a) $213,135; (b) $7,115; (c) $68,603; (d) $17,033; 1973-74 (a) $246,796; (b) $15,865; (c) $195,821; (d) $38,481; 1974-75 (as at Dec. 1974) (a) $176,098; (b) $1,750; (c) $62,368; (d) $22,212.

3. No. (a) not applicable; (b) none; (c) none.

PRIME MINISTER'S RESIDENCE—SWIMMING POOL

Question No. 2,211—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the Prime Minister's statement in the House of Commons on March 26, 1975 to the effect that he did not know the names of those donating money for construction of a swimming pool at his Official Residence, what are the names and job designations of all persons in government service or employ who do know any or all of the names?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Appropriate officials in National Revenue.

CBC'S COVERAGE OF PRIME MINISTER'S TRIP TO CARIBBEAN

Question No. 2,295—Mr. Cossitt:

What is the name and job designation of the individual in CBC who decided how many and what personnel are to be assigned to cover the forthcoming visit to the Caribbean, including Jamaica, by the Prime Minister (a) what is the reason for 22 persons being selected (b) what are their names and job designations (c) what is the total amount budgeted for expenses of all those concerned (d) what is the cost of transportation for the group and what is a full description of the means of such transportation including the aircraft?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: As for the main question and parts (b) and (c), it has not been customary to require the CBC to supply such details of its internal management and administration. As for part (a), the persons selected were assigned in connection with the differing requirements for news and special program coverage of four networks in the respective languages of those networks. The networks are: the English television network, the English radio network, the French television network and French radio network of the CBC. (d) The group paid normal commercial rates for space in either the Prime Minister's aircraft or, in some cases, on scheduled commercial flights.

RESERVES OF CHARTERED BANKS

Question No. 2,367—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. What is the actual amount of the reserves of each chartered bank held by the Bank of Canada?

2. During the past five years, on what dates were the amounts changed and to what extent?

3. What were the profits gained by each chartered bank through such changes?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): 1. As stipulated by Section 72 of the Bank Act, chartered bank cash reserves may be maintained in the form of notes of, and deposits in Canadian currency with the Bank of Canada. Information is not published for each bank on the amounts of these two components separately; the combined total is shown below for the latest month available.

Notes of and deposits with Bank of Canada
(As at February 28, 1975)

Name of bank	Amount (thousands of dollars)
Bank of Montreal	667,412
The Bank of Nova Scotia	396,333
The Toronto-Dominion Bank	415,058
The Provincial Bank of Canada	105,785
Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce	678,620
The Royal Bank of Canada	789,728
Bank Canadian National	174,470
The Mercantile Bank of Canada	20,163
Bank of British Columbia	4,999
Unity Bank of Canada	6,674
Total	3,259,242

2. The chartered banks are required under the Bank Act to hold reserves against their Canadian-dollar deposit liabilities amounting to twelve per cent of those liabilities payable on demand and four per cent of those payable after notice. The amount of cash reserves actually held by each chartered bank changes daily, primarily in response to clearings of cheques among the banks themselves and the public's demand for Bank of Canada notes but also as a result of changes brought about by the Bank of Canada in total reserves.

3. Bank of Canada notes and chartered bank deposits with the Bank of Canada do not bear interest. The chartered banks therefore do not gain any revenue from their holdings of cash reserves.

TRADE UNIONS—SECURITY BRIEFINGS

Question No. 2,388—Mr. Rodriguez:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 973, were any briefings as described delivered to any trade unions and (a) if so, in what locations and on what dates (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): No. (a) Not applicable. (b) No requests for such briefings have been received by the Ministry of the Solicitor General from trade unions.

NUMBER OF PORTS OF ENTRY IN CANADA

Question No. 2,413—Mr. Dick:

What was the total number of ports of entry in existence in Canada and recognized by the Department of National Revenue for each year (a) 1900 (b) 1910 (c) 1920 (d) 1930 (e) 1940 (f) 1950 (g) 1960 (h) 1970 (i) 1971 (j) 1972 (k) 1973 (l) 1974?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): (a) 406; (b) 413; (c) 492; (d) 506; (e) 340; (f) 340; (g) 399; (h) 356; (i) 342; (j) 339; (k) 335; (l) 334.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

ALBERTA—ARCHITECTURAL AND ENGINEERING SERVICES

Question No. 1,556—Mr. Andre:

During each year 1972, 1973 and 1974, how much money was paid to Alberta firms for the purchase of architectural and engineering services?

Return tabled.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with regard to the answers given to questions on the order paper. With regard to Question No. 2,238, I feel the reply given does not do justice to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Since the question dealt with the publication of the debts of the provinces within Confederation on July 1st, 1867, and the figures were not given for the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, I should like the parliamentary secretary to give special attention to that question and complete the answer, if possible, at the first opportunity.

[English]

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, again I rise on a point of order regarding my questions 1,480 to 1,511 inclusive. Today, during the question period, the minister of external affairs said that these questions were going to cost $10,000 to lay on the table as orders for return. The last time I asked this question, which I think was two sessions ago, the parliamentary secretary to the House leader explained that it was going to cost $1 million to answer one question, and I found out after searching some files, particularly a computer file, that it cost only $256. The minister is now saying to the House that the answers to these questions will cost $10,000.

● (1510)

If the department does not have files to which they can refer for these particular contracts, especially a department that has $1 billion to work with, and therefore cannot come up with these figures, there is something wrong or the department is incompetent. We in this House should try to find out exactly what kind of a filing system the department has and just what we have to do to get these figures.

I am sorry the minister felt he should take the opportunity during the question period to stick it to me, if you will allow me that expression, but I really think he has to come up with an answer and I intend to keep pressing him for it.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to question No. 2,465 to which a response but not an answer was given the last day. The question sought to trace the number of executive assistants, special assistants and other exempt staff and employees of ministers who have been filtered in under the exempt staff provisions to the public service and various agencies. I had asked a similar, but longer question earlier specifying a much larger category of staff including secretaries, consultants, advisers and the like.

The response to the earlier question was that it would take too long to answer. While not accepting that, I nonetheless shortened my question considerably to only three categories of personnel appointments, namely, research assistants, special assistants and executive assistants. This involves a small number of people who would be easy to trace if the government wanted to reveal the degree to which it is putting these political appointees into the public service. The government does not want to do that, and for that reason it has not answered the question.

I raise the matter now as a point of order, to point out that the government is hiding from public view the degree to which it is filtering political appointees into the public service under the exempt staff provisions.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

GARRISON DIVERSION PROJECT—DAMAGE TO ENVIRONMENT THROUGH CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 26, to ask leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration. The specific and important matter is in respect of the damage which will be caused to the Canadian environment by the construction of the Garrison diversion project and the lack of positive action by the Canadian government to prevent such damage. There must be a debate so that the Canadian and United States governments become aware of these dangers and act promptly to prevent them. If my proposal is accepted, I will move the adjournment of the House, seconded by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale).

Perhaps I could give a brief explanation at this time. There is evidence that the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation is attempting to complete the Lonetree reservoir as quickly as possible regardless of protests and studies currently being conducted. This reservoir is the last connecting link between the Missouri River basin and the Red River drainage basin and is considered the point of no return for the project. It will be completed in a matter of months, the necessary funds having been authorized in March by President Ford.

The following agencies have acknowledged that Manitoba will be hurt by the Garrison project: the Canadian government, the Manitoba government, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, the U.S. State Department, the U.S. Congress, the Comptroller General and the Department of the Interior. The United States State Department, in a letter dated February 15, 1975, made public March 5, said that it believed continued negotiations on a diplomatic level between the United States and Canada would likely result in nothing more satisfactory than a stalemate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I feel that his explanation of the background of the circumstances up to this point is certainly adequate to enable me to make a ruling, particularly when coupled with the actual motion itself which is fairly clearly descriptive of the situation.

I have not the slightest hesitation in accepting the circumstances of the problem the hon. member has exposed in his motion and explanation as being of the utmost importance. I have some reservation about the timing, as it would appear that there will be considerable opposition within the United States to this last step described in the hon. member's remarks as the point of no return. There does seem, certainly, to be urgency about that last step taken in the United States in respect of the fate of environmental conditions in Manitoba.

The reason I am not accepting the application for an emergency debate at this time has nothing to do with the importance of the matter or its urgency, but relates, rather, to the other part of the Standing Order which refers to the opportunity of an hon. member for bringing a matter to the attention of the House in other ways. This matter has been raised several times during this session already by the hon. member and by others. The estimates of the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) have now been before the standing committee for some time, as have been and still are the estimates of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen).

The effect of the estimates of both these ministries, as well as perhaps others, being before the standing committee would provide, and continue to provide, the hon. member with an opportunity to question the minister in such a way as to pin him down very specifically on this problem. In light of that opportunity, coupled with the rather high percentage of allotted days which remain in the less than two months—about five weeks—prior to the summer recess, as well as other suggested means of bringing matters to the attention of the House, this would recommend itself to the Chair at this moment as being adequate means in the hands of the hon. member for disposing of this problem, or at least of requiring the minister to give a direct answer either before the standing committee or before the House.

I find, therefore, that while the problem is important and urgent, the hon. member ought to enjoy, within a reasonable time, an adequate opportunity of bringing this matter before the House in other ways, considering the timing of the problem and the opposition to it in the United States.

INCOME TAX ACT

REMOVAL OF PROVISION ALLOWING DEDUCTION OF EXPENSES FOR ADVERTISING IN NON-CANADIAN PERIODICALS

The House resumed, from Friday, May 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-58, to amend the Income Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Mr. Marke Raines (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to continue my speech in connection with Bill C-58, with amendments to section 19 of the Income Tax Act by deleting from its subsections (2) and (4). Foreign magazines, notably Time and Reader's Digest, can if they wish, and I am sure they will, continue to operate in this country, but Canadian advertisers will no longer be able to deduct the cost of their advertising when dealing with the Minister of National Revenue. I stress that because there seems to me to be a misconception across Canada that if this bill is given third reading, somehow Time and Reader's Digest will cease publication. That is simply not the case. This is simply the withdrawal of a special concession or special privilege, a privilege which perhaps should never have been granted as it was ten years ago.

There has been a great deal of response to this action on the part of the government, some of which has come from Reader's Digest. Its publishers have launched a campaign to persuade its subscribers to, shall I say, pressure Ottawa on their behalf and lobby members of parliament to block the tax act amendments announced by the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner).

In a plea to its subscribers, Reader's Digest has said "our fate is now in parliament's hands". That was stated on an enclosure to the Reader's Digest edition of March, 1975. Reader's Digest then outlines its contribution in the 32 years in which it has been distributed in Canada: it goes on to list these major contributions. Reader's Digest probably does have a good history of useful function in Canada, but I submit that is entirely aside from the point. The point is—which I must refer to once again—that this is a matter of special tax privilege and what we have done in the past with Reader's Digest and Time is not a mandatory blueprint for the future.

Our Income Tax Act states clearly that a magazine or newspaper must be 75 per cent Canadian controlled before advertisements placed in it can be considered deductible as a business expense. Reader's Digest and Time are not 75 per cent Canadian owned, yet for the past ten years they have been exempt from this provision. That is a special privilege. It seems to be manifestly unfair that two of the richest and most powerful magazines in the world should enjoy special tax privileges not granted any other major foreign magazine or newspaper.

Phasing out a privilege wherever it may exist should be one of the toughest challenges facing this or any other government. I am pleased that this government has taken decisive action in this case. Reader's Digest states that the effect will be calamitous. I believe, instead of threatening suicide as they are, Reader's Digest and Time magazine should set about the business of planning constructively for their survival without tax privileges; or are we to infer that these magazines are claiming the right to a perpetual privilege? Perhaps that is what happens when a privilege by any group, large enterprise, corporation or large magazine has been held for too long.

I submit that a period of ten years is too long and that the action of this government is overdue. Removal of this privilege from the Income Tax Act obviously is overdue. Some hon. members mentioned mail they have received on behalf of Reader's Digest and Time magazine, but to my knowledge no one has referred to the other side of the picture. A letter I have received from the Canadian Periodical Publisher's Association, whose members have a combined circulation of 1.3 million, states it would like to confirm that it supports Bill C-58. The letter also states:

> We firmly believe that with Time Canada and Reader's Digest competing with Canadian magazines on an equal basis, there will be exciting new work for more writers, designers, photographers, printers, typographers and others in the graphic arts across Canada.

They say that Canadian magazines will become bigger and better, sounder financially and more significant culturally. They also say there will be more magazines. I do not know whether there will or will not. I am sure that if Time ceases its Canadian edition we will still read its international edition. I am sure, if Reader's Digest ceases its Canadian publication, it will still be everywhere in Canada. I am not sure what will happen to our Canadian magazines. I suppose there will be more work for writers, but I do not think it matters. I hope they will thrive, but that is their problem. I hope that Reader's Digest and Time will continue to thrive, but that is their problem.

My problem, and I submit the problem of the government, the taxpayers, and our problem in representing the taxpayers, is to ensure that a special privilege is given to no one. That is my problem at this time, and I submit it should be the problem of all hon. members in this chamber. Maclean's magazine announces that it will begin publishing every second Monday commencing with the October 6, 1975, issue. Good for Maclean's; I hope it survives. But Maclean's is not my problem.

Much has been said in this debate: the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has gone so far as to quote from the Bill of Rights. I have carefully read Hansard and fail to see how reading from the Bill of Rights to substantiate the hon. member's argument is in any way linked to withdrawal of special privileges for some large corporations. I, too, should like to quote from the Bill of Rights as recorded in Hansard at page 5888. There is a reference to freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and association, and freedom of the press. By all means let us have freedom of the press. Let the publications flourish or go bankrupt. I submit that is not the basic problem. We will give the press freedom to make $1 million, as some syndicates have, and freedom to cease publication, as some have done.

But I stress, again, that there is a misconception across the land that Time and Reader's Digest are somehow being barred or censored from coming into Canada. They have not been, they are not now, nor will they be. It is a simple matter: we are stopping their welfare cheques; we are stopping the special privileges. Neither this government nor any other government, for that matter, has ever told Canadians what to read. This government is not telling anyone what to write. It is simply telling all magazines that in order to take advantage of the tax concession designed for Canadian magazines, they must be Canadian; and if Time or Reader's Digest or any other publications wish to conform to these suggestions, then that is their decision.

We are not telling them how to conform. We are not telling them what to publish or when to publish. What we are saying is that we are giving them special tax concessions which have been going on for ten years, and that ten years is long enough. I submit there is no cogent argument for continuing these tax concessions. I believe they should never have been granted in the first place. We will listen to more arguments when this matter goes before the broadcasting committee, of which I am a member, but I have yet to hear an argument for continuing special tax privileges to anyone.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege to rise this afternoon in a debate that is of considerable moment in the history of publishing in this country. It is momentus because it concerns something very dear to the hearts of our people—their nationalism and their national interest.

One feels that the minister, in presenting the bill and when preparing the speech which he delivered a week or so ago, was desirous of making the maximum impact by clothing his words with an authority which he may have felt might escape him. We do not know who was the speechwriter, but one could imagine that when considering an idea that would work, the adviser perhaps indicated that eons ago a great leader had used ten imperatives, and the minister jumped at the idea. Wanting to know where they could be obtained, he was told it would mean climbing a mountain. The minister's being skeptical concerning whether he should attempt that and whether he should take all that much time out of his busy schedule prompted the speechwriter to say that he did not know whether or not the public would go for ten imperatives, and the minister probably said, "Let us try eight." So that cleared away that difficulty.

One suspects that rather than climb the mountain, they climbed the CNR tower in Toronto and from that great height surveyed all the Canadian publishing empire that the minister and his advisers felt mattered, and the minister came down from the tower with the eight that were presented to the House in the debate on May 8. I do not wish to suggest for a moment that these eight are linked in any way with the original ten. I do not wish to suggest for a moment that they have the same force or commandment or that they will remain in the history of this nation as long as the others have remained in the history of the world. I think we could probably call them the eight no-no's of Canadian publishing, rather than refer to them as commandments. They make an interesting list. I shall not read them all but I wish to draw attention to three of them. The third one reads:

Third, we do not want the continuance of a situation wherein the world view of Canadian readers is being influenced by American periodicals the operations of which in Canada are facilitated by a tax deduction provision primarily intended to assist Canadian publications.

● (1530)

I would suggest that there is a difference between the world view and the universal view. The Reader's Digest application to its subscribers for support drew a remarkable response. In spite of the words of the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Raines) whom we have just heard, the response was remarkable. In the brief debate on this bill several hon. members have referred to the size of the response surpassing any similar, mailed correspondence in the history of this parliament.

In the fourth point made by the minister, he said:

Fourth, we do not want the continuance of a practice whereby the stories and articles reproduced in the French language Canadian edition of Reader's Digest are usually translated outside Canada.

If we look at the history of these events we find that Reader's Digest published its first edition at a time when there was not the same sensitivity to "la langue française vivante" that there is at present in this country. Surely that practice is one that can be easily altered by negotiation between the Department of the Secretary of State and the magazine. In his eighth point, the minister said:

Eighth, we do not want the continuance of a Canadianization progress record which, after thirty years, finds Time in Canada still owned and controlled entirely by Time Inc. in the United States and publishing perhaps 10 per cent Canadian content; and Reader's Digest only 30 per cent Canadian-owned and carrying in its English language edition about 25 per cent and, in its French language edition, about 15 per cent Canadian content.

I suggest that in the eighth point in his list the minister has gone a long way toward separating the two publications, although in all the announcements and pronouncements he and his department have made they have carefully twinned the two publications. Considering the facts presented in his own eight imperatives to Canadian publishers, one could have substituted "but" for "and" preceding "Reader's Digest" and omitted "only" altogether, because there is a considerable difference between zero and 30 per cent.

Again, I think that this could be a matter of negotiation between the magazine and the department of the minister in terms of increasing the Canadian ownership of the magazine and the editorial direction of the Canadian issue of Reader's Digest because surely the editorializing that goes on in that magazine is considerably different from that in Time magazine which by its very nature as a weekly news magazine is in a considerably different position to influence the world view of Canadians, if the minister feels that their world view is being so much influenced by that magazine.

I find that in the mailing that has come to me from my constituents they have separated the two magazines very sharply. It should be remembered that Time also appealed to its subscribers by way of an insert in the magazine and asked them also to write to their members of parliament. But there is a wide discrepancy between the number of constituents who took advantage of that opportunity with respect to Time compared to the many who wrote concerning Reader's Digest. They wrote their letters by hand with respect to Reader's Digest. They did not fill out a form and sign their name at the bottom; they sat down and wrote to me by hand. They wrote about Reader's Digest as one would about an old friend or a relative. They were not worried about its influence on their world view, but they were concerned about some of the universals in terms of conduct, morality and standards that they feel are important.

They gave a variety of reasons why they felt the Canadian issue of that magazine should continue to exist in Canada. One of the reasons, of course, was its Canadian content. A variety of people pointed to specific articles that they had read which they otherwise would not have had the opportunity to read, articles by Canadian authors, articles on Canada and articles that meant a great deal to them. They wrote about it being one of the few magazines left that is safe to leave lying around the house where young children can find it, because they believe it upholds a level of morality and virtue that is difficult to find being upheld in the periodicals that are being sent throughout the country at present. I suggest that the minister, who is so concerned about the state of Canadian and American publishing and who has made various statements saying he does not want to prevent anything from coming into this country, might do a survey of the newsstands, as some of my constituents have done, and look at the nature of a great deal of the material that is coming into the country in vast quantity.

I agree with the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour that Canadians would probably buy American editions of these two magazines, so there would be a net loss, not a net gain, to Canadian nationalism because we would lose the Canadian content, particularly in Reader's Digest. I know there are Canadians who are concerned about the nature and state of the material available on our newsstands, always at the lowest level where the smallest child can reach out. These stands are seldom supervised, and there is a real concern about that. The minister might address himself to that question when he is finished with the one with which he is dealing now. My constituents wrote to tell me that Reader's Digest fits into old hands; that is it is of a size that they like to hold; that they can read it comfortably; also, that it can be re-read. The measure of Reader's Digest is that there are not all that many publications that one can return to after a year or two and find them of continuing interest. But over and over again people referred to re-reading the magazine to which they have subscribed for up to 30 years.

As you may gather from my remarks, I have very little belief, personally, in Time magazine, and the pairing of the two magazines in the bill and in the pronouncements made by the minister caused me some difficulty. I suppose I am somewhat prejudiced against Time since the thirteenth year of my education when the teacher I had used to bring it to class and read verbatim from one end of the periodical to the other until the bell went. She swore by it. I was rather skeptical of it at that time and remember taking to class a clipping from a newspaper which said that Time magazine had a great bias. I presented it to the teacher who, not realizing the nature of the clipping and being very glad to have received an offering from a student, began to read it to the class, discovering, too late, that it was knocking the magazine that was so precious to her.

I have had many qualms about my rudeness to the teacher in years gone by, particularly since I became one myself, but I have never had that much doubt about my early judgment of Time magazine, and certainly least of all in 1963 when I bought an issue in Tokyo in the hectic weeks preceding the election of that year. On the cover of that international issue of Time I saw a picture of the then prime minister of this country, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), in a caricature so grotesque that although I was not then a member of the party that I represent now, I was shocked by it, disturbed that a magazine that was, in a sense, a guest in the house could intervene so dramatically and so drastically in the electoral process of this country.

I was struck by something of the same thought in the election just passed when the issue in the week just prior to the election, an influential week when every publication in this country endeavoured to exert the maximum influence on the Canadian electorate. A cover was produced, and I cannot believe that it was entirely by accident that on the cover the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) appeared on the ace of hearts and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) appeared on the ace of spades. I resented the inference then. They may have learned something since 1963, but to attempt to direct the voters of this country does not, to me, fit the nature of a publication that has been a guest in the house and has not moved through the years to alter its nature or to increase its Canadian ownership; and certainly its Canadian content has always been a token gesture in this land.

I am not concerned about the welfare of the Maclean-Hunter empire in this country. I have grave reservations about the editorial policies of Maclean's magazine. I have nothing but congratulations for Chatelaine and its editor, Doris Anderson, who is an inspiration to all the citizenry of Canada for the way she has livened up that magazine and addressed it to the issues of today. I think all Canadians can give credit to Doris Anderson for presenting the Murdoch case to this country, a shocking decision which lacked everything we consider basically just. Bringing it before the Canadian public was important and Chatelaine did important work in that regard.

With regard to Maclean's, and particularly the editorship of Mr. Newman, I have objected to its persistent attack on basic Canadian institutions, particularly the RCMP and the monarchy. Through a variety of subtle and sometimes brilliant covers and articles, this attack has gone on and has been refined by that magazine in a most extraordinary way, because some months after the attack the magazine will refer to its own attack as proof of the fact that the Canadian public is no longer concerned about these traditional institutions which have served us so well for so long. This is a kind of aid and assistance to the promoters of change for the sake of change in this country which I find reprehensible.

The question is often raised whether the bill will revive Canadian magazines. Saturday Night, one could say, has already been resurrected. The cover of the new issue says, "Reborn". I do not know whether that quite fits—I will return to it—but I was greatly heartened, on receiving my issue of this republishing of Saturday Night, to read in it these words:

> Driving into British Columbia's Okanagan Valley for the first time—especially in spring or summer—is like hearing for the first time the Andante cantabile from Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5. It's all so sweet and beautiful and the cynic inside can't quite believe it's real. The Okanagan runs for about a hundred miles, from Sicamous at the north end to Osoyoos on the Washington border. The Selkirk and Monashee ranges shelter it from the east, the North Cascades from the west.
> It's particularly astonishing when you drive from the east. For days, you've been travelling across the prairies, then through the Rockies. Spectacular skyscapes and landscapes, but a little overpowering after a while. Turn left from the Trans-Canada at Sicamous and suddenly things begin to resume human scale. Soon you spot an ancient weeping willow, not a very common tree this far north. Then, just south of Mara Lake, the valley opens out to reveal mile upon mile of orchards. Pears, apples, peaches, plums, cherries. Vineyards, too, claimed from the soil by decades of irrigation. Springtime must be fantastic.

Madam Speaker, this is a magazine which will survive if it can be so poetic about such a constituency as the one I serve and can write with that quality. I am sure that it's future is indeed secure. But that is not the only thing which gives me hope that it will survive, because as I looked through the articles I found that the magazine seems to be, if I may use the expression, on the right track. It carries an article by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche), and it is well worth reading. I must say the little joke of last Friday afternoon, when the gallery filled during the speech of that hon. member, was a good joke until the point where the visitors departed as quietly as they came. The speech being made at that moment by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona deserves their attention, and the joke would have been much better had they stayed, because their departure left it just a little sour, in the mind of this member at least.

One then sees that there is an article on the premier of the great province of Ontario. This is the feature article. This is, again, an indication of what is important in the land right now. One finds another article on a former member of this House, the great hockey star, Howie Meeker, who was briefly in parliament and sat as a member of this party. With an opening edition like that, there is hope for Saturday Night, because those who wrote to me are not cynical and they are the backbone of Canadian nationalism in this country.

What gives me the most hope for this magazine is one poem written by the Canadian poet, Miriam Waddington—and it rhymes! A magazine which devotes itself in the 1970s to a poem which dares to rhyme is one which has set itself on a path of courage. The poem, too, addresses itself to the people who wrote on behalf of Reader's Digest, and part of it reads:

> We never know what's apt to happen and although money isn't everything how will things be, where will they go, when we, our generation, win or lose, fed up with curbing hell at last drops all the reins and everything busts loose?

This is one of the concerns expressed by people who write to me because they look at a world where so much is busting loose and they wonder why the minister is concerned about taking the Canadian edition of Reader's Digest from them; they cannot understand it. Surely, for these people, the justification cannot be Canadian nationalism; and surely, for these people, if Canadian magazines would address themselves a little more to that large reading audience—and with the state of education in this land, it soon may be the only reading audience left—they will succeed, because those people want to see some indication of quality. They want to see some indication of virtue and some indication that the magazine could become, not an intrusion, not an insult as they look at the cover but one with which they would be glad to renew their acquaintance. I feel that the resurrection or rebirth of Saturday Night could perhaps more properly be called the return of the prodigal. Having rooted in the trough of sensationalism for too long until it lost its readership in this land, it has decided to return to a format which served it well for many years when it was a great magazine in Canada.

I am concerned, too, about the question of the 80 per cent different content. That matter has already been raised, and I do not wish to dwell on it. One can imagine a board being set up to determine the content. That would be a dangerous and difficult policy, and surely such an idea should be dropped. While it might be possible to establish a weekly news magazine that would qualify in terms of different content, (in spite of all the minister's brave words I suspect that would be interpreted as Canadian content very quickly) the law could be set down, but people would have to make the judgment. It might be possible to establish a Canadian weekly news magazine—I hope one is attempted in the near future—but I am afraid it would not be possible to establish a Canadian Digest.

A lot of government policies have led us to the present situation, Madam Speaker, and not just the question of tax privileges. Other members have spoken about postal rates, taxation and lack of government support; all reasons why the Canadian publishing industry is in its present state. As I look around the newsstands and read the magazines that come to me, I see a revival in Canadian publishing. If the minister's bill has done that, then I think the measures he has in mind for Reader's Digest are not necessary in order to revive Canadian publishing.

There are more negative aspects to this bill than positive aspects, Madam Speaker. I am particularly conscious of remarks made in the speech of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) on May 8. The hon. member has gained a reputation in this House for courage, clear thinking and an ability to express opinions not laid down by the government. He said, as reported at page 5611 of Hansard:

> Close to six million Canadians read and enjoy the Canadian edition of the Digest every month. Reader's Digest material is made available to, and much of it is used by other editions around the world. Some articles receive exposure to 100 million readers in 13 languages. Reader's Digest has made some 32 per cent of its common stock available to Canadians through a public issue, the only Digest company in the world to do so. Shareholders bought their stock with the understanding that the company's operations were not under any threat at the time the stock was issued. Reader's Digest had that assurance from the government.

I hope the government will think carefully about that aspect of the threat against the company. Of course, it is a government that has gone back on agreements before; it is a government that withdrew from the world's fair at Spokane after being the first in. There are other examples of how it does not instil confidence in the Canadian business world. I suggest that the action being contemplated here is as great a threat to nationalism and a sense of pride in one's country—in fact, a much greater threat—than the presence of Reader's Digest in this country could ever be.

Mr. John Roberts (St. Paul's): Madam Speaker, I had not intended to enter the debate at this time as I shall have an opportunity in committee to examine the question before the House in specific detail. I am moved to intervene, however, because after listening to some of the speeches, and reading others given at a time when I was not able to be in the House, I was concerned to find a deepening and perhaps studied obfuscation or drift in the view being presented by the official opposition. It seems to me that on this question, which is an important one, members opposite have an obligation to make clear where they stand. They have an obligation to level with the House of Commons, and an obligation to level with the people, on what they believe should be done in the relation to the special tax privileges Time and Reader's Digest now enjoy. Originally, the position of the opposition was clear, and it was strongly supportive of the government. Back on January 23, speaking for the official opposition, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) said as reported at page 2527 of Hansard:

> We believee that the move to eliminate the income tax advantage shared mainly by two magazines, Time and Reader's Digest, is a good one.

That is to say, the government's position is a good one—strong, straightforward, supportive. At page 2528 he said:

—that we would be in agreement with the thrust suggested by the Secretary of State in eliminating advertising that is now being put through foreign broadcast stations.

That is also straightforward and supportive of the government's position. He went on to say:

In summary, we are pleased that the government has at last acted, subject to what I have said, in the fashion indicated in the statement.

Clear, straightforward, simple, strong, obvious support for the government's position. There was no doubt then about where the opposition party stood. What happened by May 8 when the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) rose to take part in this debate in response to the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner)? Where was their straightforward, clear, supportive position then? Were the snows of January melted by the time the darling buds of May were in bloom? The hon. member for Fundy-Royal talked about almost everything but what was at issue. He talked about postal rates, about distribution of magazines, about government advertising; he hardly talked at all about the tax privileges held by Time and Reader's Digest.

There is a story about a Scottish philosopher, Madam Speaker. Every time an objection was raised to his philosophy or theories, he said, "That is indeed an important objection; we cannot overlook it. We must stare it full in the face and pass on." That is what the hon. member for Fundy-Royal did every time the question was raised of what we should do: he looked it straight in the face and passed on. On May 8, at page 5597 of Hansard, he said:

A tax policy should apply equally. Time and Reader's Digest could easily fulfil their obligations as Canadian citizens by broadening substantially, over an agreed span of time, their Canadian ownership.

There is nothing wrong with that. Then we got a splendid assertion of principle.

Perhaps application for citizenship could take the form of an increased sale of their shares to citizens of this country.

Perhaps? That is not nearly as clear and straightforward. Later, he said:

—it might be fair to ask that more of the decisions relative to their editorial content should be made in this country.

Might? That is not very strong. Then later:

My party and I are very nervous about this particular provision.

That is about the content rules. Madam Speaker, my hon. friend here says they are nervous about most things, and that is probably true. He continues:

I think that content rules, particularly as they have application to news magazines—

Does that mean Time and also Reader's Digest? Then he continued:

—are repellent to me and to this party.

Straightforward? Clear? Direct? Not at all. Ambiguous! If I could characterize that in a word which I hope is parliamentary, Madam Speaker, I would say those qualifications are "weasel" words—ambiguous—they provide an escape hatch for the hon. member to get out if he so desires. The resolution that had been there in January is now irresolution. In fact, I think one could describe the policy as presented, in so far as one could divine it from the speech of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, as secret; wrapped in a muddle; hidden in an enigma. I think we should know who is speaking for the opposition and what their position is on these fundamental tax questions. In the last few words of his speech, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal made one suggestion which I thought was uncharacteristic but he did not stress it for any length of time. As reported at page 5600 of Hansard, he said:

Then we are getting into an area that through the years has given tyrannical governments the power that free men have resisted through the ages.

There is a slight suggestion of sincere concern there. I would not mention it except that it was the theme picked up by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) in his contribution to the debate last Friday. He portrayed himself as a great champion of civil liberties: the Bill of Rights is framed on his wall and so is Magna Carta. This concern of his was not much in evidence in debate last Thursday. Last Thursday the hon. member was not on my side trying to resist the encroachment, the censorship, which the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) wished to place on the CBC. He was not speaking, that great champion of civil liberties, at that time. However, he did speak up last Friday on Time and Reader's Digest. He said:

● (1600)

—I am pretty concerned that by means of a tax measure we have brought censorship into this country.

That is not true. I will explain why in a few moments.

If this bill passes, the Reader's Digest and Time magazine will likely come off the news shelves in Canada.

That is not true, as my colleague from British Columbia indicated a few moments ago.

—it will permit not only this act but the act covering taxation in this field to allow a group of bureaucrats to determine what Canadians will be able to read.

That is not true. He said that when you curtailed the press or tried to curtail freedom of speech, whether by taxation or otherwise, you turned back the pages of history of the country 700 or 800 years. Then he said that this government wants to bring in censorship on what we should read. I was going to say that the whole of the speech of the hon. member for Calgary North was a red herring. It was such a large speech and such a large red herring that I think it might be fair to characterize it as a red whale. I say "a red whale" because the characteristics of whales are blubber and a tendency to spout.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: There is no board to be established under this legislation which will censor the material that will go into magazines, Canadian or foreign. The hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston) was concerned about the question of who is to assess what is Canadian content or what is not Canadian content. This is not what the legislation enjoins. The legislation will simply enjoin that a magazine, an issue appearing in Canada, be substantially different in content from that appearing somewhere outside of Canada. One would be able to make that comparison even if one did not read the articles. One could look at them and see whether they were the same articles which appeared in another magazine. One could total them up and make a percentage without applying any specific act of censorship whatsoever. These provisions do not exclude any specific material from appearing in any magazine whether Canadian or foreign. It is true they would encourage, within certain broad categories, the inclusion of material in magazines, but they would not censor out.

Perhaps to make the distinction clear, we could think of it in these terms. If I were to invite you out to dinner, Madam Speaker—which I would like to do some time—I do not think other members of the House would say that I am prejudiced against them by not allowing them to come out with us. On the other hand, if I said that under no circumstances would I ever invite you out to dinner, you might legitimately conclude that I had something against you, that I was censoring you out. The kind of provisions being brought forward in this legislation are inclusive. They are inviting Canadian magazines and other magazines that wish to be entitled to the tax provisions that apply to the Canadian magazines to include content in them which is substantially different from that which appears outside the country. However, there is no censorship.

One could attack this government, one could attack the Secretary of State, one could even attack these provisions ad infinitum and ad nauseam without being restricted by this legislation. This legislation will not lead to control of magazines in any way. For example, magazines now entering the country are not controlled. There will be no censorship of Time and Reader's Digest if they choose to come into this country as foreign magazines, no more than there is now censorship of Playboy, the Economist or Newsweek. They will not be censored if they choose to become Canadian magazines. They will not be censored in any way, just as Maclean's, Chatelaine, Homemaker's Digest, and so on, are not now censored. They will be in exactly the same position.

What this legislation does is make Time and Reader's Digest choose whether to be Canadian players in the periodical press game, or non-Canadian players. At the moment, there is a double inequity. These magazines have a favoured position in comparison with other foreign magazines coming into the country because they receive the same tax benefits as Canadian magazines. They have a special competitive advantage in relation to Canadian magazines because they are able to produce their product for a much larger market outside the country and write down their editorial costs. They can undersell. They can dump editorial material on the Canadian market. That is their advantage in comparison with Canadian magazines.

What this legislation does is make them choose. You cannot have it both ways. You cannot have a special position above and beyond that of foreign magazines, nor one above and beyond that of Canadian magazines. You have to decide which is your role, and play it effectively. If you want to compete against foreign magazines, do so without special tax privileges which they do not have. If you want to compete against Canadian magazines, do it without having the basic editorial material which enables you to write down your overhead, something which is not available to Canadian magazines. I cannot imagine why anyone would say that placing Time and Reader's Digest on an equal footing with other foreign magazines, or Canadian magazines, constitutes a form of censorship. It is an argument which staggers the imagination.

I wish to say a few words about the remarks made by my colleague, the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart), in his participation in the debate last Friday. I do not have a great deal to criticize in his speech. His speech was not partisan; it was moderate: it raised interesting questions which should be gone into in detail in the committee.

I do disagree with his analysis. I think the hon. member is overly fearful that these very profitable enterprises cannot move to meet the requirements of the legislation and still maintain their position in the Canadian market. He overemphasized their difficulties. He has not satisfactorily analysed their true economic situation and its effect on other periodicals in the Canadian publishing industry. On that we can go into detail in committee.

I was more concerned about newspaper reports of the hon. member's comments on Friday. It is often possible that one's remarks are misinterpreted in the press. I cannot go on anything other than what has been reported in the press. I think there are two great difficulties or inaccuracies in his remarks last Friday. In the press report it indicates he believes there is a great lack of resolution on the government side, splits within the government party, about whether or not we should proceed with this legislation.

My response to that, as one who knows the sentiments of the people on this side of the House as well as the hon. member for Cochrane is that that statement, if it is one he made, is simply not true. This is not a party which requires 100 per cent automatic coherent support for every measure which is brought forward. It is a large party with a variety of opinions in it. There are certainly divergences of opinion. It would not be surprising if, after the massive campaign of lobbying which has been mounted over the past few weeks, there were some members on this side of the House with doubts about this legislation. However, I know there is by far a majority of substantial agreement on this side of the House that we proceed with the measure. There are very few people who doubt its desirability and whether we should move forward to discuss this question and bring it to resolution.

I was particularly disturbed by the assertion that somehow the Secretary of State had "snuck in" this legislation to the House of Commons. It makes me wonder where the hon. member for Cochrane has been for the past ten years. This matter was raised by the O'Leary commission over 14 years ago, and the Davey commission. It has been discussed ad infinitum and ad nauseam in the press. It received overwhelming support at two conventions of the Liberal Party. It was discussed when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) was bringing in his budget last autumn. It was discussed again last January when the Secretary of State brought the legislation before the House of Commons. It has been discussed for the past two weeks. It has been a current, topical, running issue in this country for almost 15 years. To suggest that somehow the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) has introduced this measure through the back door is not worthy of the hon. member.

I cite these assertions from the newspaper accounts because I think there is some danger of misleading the management of the magazines as to the true situation. So far, Time and Reader's Digest have been unprepared to come forward to suggest how they might meet these legislative proposals. There has been no sign that they are prepared to meet the objectives which the Secretary of State has described. They appear to have an obdurate belief that this legislation will not be passed and that they will not be obliged to change their ways. It would be a great mistake if they were encouraged by the remarks of the hon. member for Cochrane to persist in the belief that they need not make any attempt to meet the criteria set out in this bill. It would be a tragic mistake for them if they believed they could simply wait for the withdrawal of this measure.

There is substantial resolution on this side of the House to push this matter to final settlement. That is what we shall be doing in the committee. Representatives of the magazines will be before us and I hope they will make a sincere effort, as I believe they can, to meet the objectives which the Secretary of State has set out. This, I am sure, is the mood on our side of the House, and I believe the magazines concerned will ignore that mood at their peril.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I rise on this occasion to reiterate our party's policy on this question as enunciated in the House on May 8 by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes). There is no need to spend a lot of time rehashing what has gone on in the past with regard to treatment of foreign publications vis-à-vis our Canadian culture, or explaining in detail—because it has been gone over and over—why these two magazines were given special treatment. We need only go back to the Senate committee in 1969. The government has been reluctant to accept fully the implications of what that Senate committee said, but in the bill now before us there is a much better recognition. The committee stated:

> It seems plain to us that if Time and Digest are allowed to maintain their present competitive advantage, it will become increasingly difficult for existing magazines to survive, and for new ones to be launched. But we are satisfied that the long-term prospects for the Canadian periodical industry—and probably the short-term as well—would be enhanced by removal of subsidized foreign competition.

We do not want to appear, on this side of the House, as being too nationalistic regarding the cultural infiltration which has occurred from the United States at all levels because of our geographical propinquity. That is part and parcel of our geography and history. But, surely, thinking members on both sides of the House are now prepared to say there are certain limits and that we do need certain controls which can be exercised through our economic policy to try and prevent them from completely swamping us. Some can argue there is not much we can do because U.S. influence is worldwide and affects countries besides Canada.

Surely, though, we are Canadian enough to recognize that the time has come, after over 100 years of existing as a nation, when we should at least be able to say to the owners of Time magazine and Reader's Digest, "The time has come for you to lose your special status within Canadian law." Whatever reason there may have been in the past for giving them special status—and I do not recognize there was any reason—if there was any reason then, the time is surely past.

It is not a question, as some have suggested privately, of whether you like Maclean's magazine or not. Personally, I do not like it. What I would like to see is the opportunity given to Canadian publishers to be able to get in on some of the advertising, so that the day may rapidly come when we shall not only have one national magazine but competitive periodicals at the national level which will regularly interpret Canada and the world through Canadian eyes. As I see it, Madam Speaker, neither Time nor Reader's Digest can claim that they are Canadian magazines with regard to ownership. Some people may say it is not important, but it is surely important when it comes to the question of editorial content where the principle of fairness and equity dictates that they be treated under the law as foreign publications—which they are; and nobody in the House can deny that.

As a person coming out of the academic community and as part of a relatively small group in Canada, I would much prefer, personally, Atlantic or Harper's or such types of magazine that have some depth in their writing and are not constantly repeating what the line is out of Washington, whether it is the foreign affairs department of the United States or the defence department, and so on. By and large, it is safe to say I think these two magazines, although there has recently been a change in the attitude of Time in this regard, have been largely spokesmen for American foreign policy and for the American way of life.

There is no reason why these two magazines should any longer be given special status by Canadian legislators with regard to their position in Canadian culture. Time for example has a mere five pages, on average, of Canadian news. This represents about 10 per cent of its content. Its editorial content, Madam Speaker, as is well known, resides in the United States in its parent company. Time Canada is wholly owned by Time Inc., of the United States and was one of the principal mouthpieces of the Republican party until the death of Mr. Luce. We have been absorbing much of that cultural flak into this country. No one would want to put a fence around them, but why give them special tax rates in order to do this just because they are Time and Reader's Digest?

I think Reader's Digest has been making a pitch, as we are all aware here, getting constituents to write letters on their behalf. I do not know for absolute certainty if they have been doing this, but my constituents have been writing to me and have been given the impression that they will no longer be able to buy Reader's Digest in Canada unless this legislation is defeated or withdrawn. It is absolutely false, and we all recognize this. As far as content is concerned, we all know that Reader's Digest has only 20 per cent to 25 per cent Canadian content in its English edition, and less than 15 per cent in its French edition.

Here, too, editorial control resides in the United States. Every article published in Reader's Digest—I defy anybody to contradict this—has to meet the approval of the editorial board in the United States. Only 32 per cent of the shares of Reader's Digest are open to Canadians for purchase. As for the ownership issue, suppose Reader's Digest and Time were to go public and issue shares in Canada. Even if something like 75 per cent of the ownership resided in Canada, to use the expression of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie when speaking for our party on this question, this would be just like "fudging the issue".

The key issue here is not who owns the actual publication, but who controls editorial policy and hence the content of these magazines. Let me repeat my own view on this occasion. While I have been engulfed by letters from my constituents asking me, on behalf of Reader's Digest, to take a different stand, I feel I am acting more in the interest of Canada by agreeing substantially with the content of Bill C-58. I hope most of us recognize that the special pleas made on Friday and today on behalf of two foreign publications are pleas that do not deserve special consideration from Canadians.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have just listened to a very interesting speech by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan), but I think he has fallen into the trap that the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) fell into in terms of drafting this legislation. I do not know whether it was ever presented to caucus; I do not know how things are done over on that side of the House. But as I say, I think the hon. member has fallen into exactly the same trap, which is to deal with Time and Reader's Digest, in terms of this piece of legislation, on an equal basis.

I am a subscriber to both these magazines. I am not so sure whether the hon. member who has just sat down is a subscriber to either, but I subscribe to both and in my judgment both magazines fill a different kind of requirement. On the one hand, Time is a contemporary news magazine. It is as old next week, in terms of its content, as the daily newspaper is as old and out of date the following day. This is not the case, Madam Speaker, with Reader's Digest, and perhaps one ought to consider the point made by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston) when he discussed the longevity of the articles in the magazine in terms of their interest and the fact that they can be picked up year after year and read. The thrust of the two magazines is different. The difficulty I see in the position taken by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond is that he is putting them in the same bag; and this may well be the difficulty in which the Secretary of State finds himself.

The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Roberts) spoke a few moments ago and said he was worried about the position taken by the official opposition. I am worrying about the position taken by the government on this matter. I have heard two very respected private members on the government side say that this is not a partisan issue, that what we are discussing here is the whole future of the Canadian periodical publishing industry. They said that given the importance of this question, why is the Secretary of State refusing to move? The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) said he was intransigent. The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) asked why he denies the statistics that are apparent, and why he fails to compromise?

If this matter is to be treated as a non-partisan issue, why does the minister take this position? If the whips were not on pretty hard and fast, why did the hon. member for St. Paul's come into the House as the messenger boy of the government to give a lecture to the hon. member for Cochrane and to tell him that his remarks, which were given as a member of the House, were not worthy of him?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. Is the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Roberts) rising to ask a question?

Mr. Roberts: Yes, Madam Speaker. Would the hon. member accept a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Would the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) accept a question at this point?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I will at the end of my speech, Madam Speaker; I would be very happy to do so then. If I may continue, I think it is extremely important to note that what those members were expressing were the reservations of many members of this House, because this difference of opinion is not surrounded by the parameters of party discipline; it is a deep and important question about which we are speaking.

I read the speech given by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), and I can be just as selective as the hon. member for St. Paul's. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal spoke on May 8 and put the position pretty carefully in terms of the taxation aspects of this matter. As reported at page 5597 of Hansard, the hon. member said:

> Although the minister made a most interesting speech, the amendments he proposes to the Income Tax Act as put forward in Bill C-58 in no way constitute a periodicals policy for Canada.

Pausing there for a moment, that is surely the first issue. What is this bill going to do to advance the periodical press in this country? In my respectful submission, it will do nothing. The hon. member continued:

> I think, personally, and I hope most will agree, that it is wrong of a tax policy to differentiate with respect to, say, Time and Reader's Digest as this leads to all sorts of amomalies and possibly unfairness. A tax policy should apply equally. Time and Reader's Digest could easily fulfil their obligations as Canadian citizens by broadening substantially—

These are the important words.

> —over an agreed span of time, their Canadian ownership.

In the next paragraph of his speech he outlined what he felt was one consideration among a number of considerations regarding a part of the debate dealing with the principles of this bill. So I do not see why the hon. member for St. Paul's is having the trouble he is having, unless his problem is not with the official opposition but with the hon. member for Vaudreuil and the hon. member for Cochrane, who are from his own caucus, and with the many other hon. members of his caucus who may want to speak in this debate. Indeed, I hope they do because it is an important debate. However they decide to vote, I hope they voice their feelings and reservations. I dare say there are many more members in the government caucus who, like the hon. member for Cochrane and the hon. member for Vaudreuil, are thinking about this issue in depth, even though the hon. member for St. Paul's is obviously not among them.

I want to deal with another point made by the hon. member for St. Paul's. He said that there is no board of censorship, and he is quite right. It may well be that the word "censorship" or the concept of "censorship" as it relates to the tax aspects of this bill is a harsh word to use. Perhaps it is too strong. But the Department of National Revenue, in terms of its power to make arbitrary decisions, subject of course to the appeal process, is indeed strong and it can have a profound effect on what will be printed and what will not be permitted in any magazine. This is the way tax policy is used, and in those terms let us not fool ourselves in this House: this bill represents an intrusion into the right of publication or the right to put on the printed page what a publisher might like. This happens and is the natural course of events.

Surely the government is not taking the position that when the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford) talked about 80 per cent content, he was talking through his hat. He was saying, when he said that, "This is how the government of the day is going to enforce its decision, acceptable or otherwise, and only the future will decide the results within Canada.

It should be clear from what I have said that I view these publications from a different point of view. Let me say at the outset that I think this is perhaps one of the most important pieces of legislation with which we have had to deal in this parliament. It goes a long way in affecting the rights of people who hitherto have been granted certain rights under the law and in terms of those rights have made certain commitments and undertaken certain obligations. Before parliament or anybody else tinkers with these things, for however good the purpose to our country, we must consider each case on its merits. I do not believe the minister has done that when he lumps the two publications together. As a result of lumping the two publications together, I think there could very well be a great injustice done in the one case and I hope to have some suggestions to make in respect of that matter as we continue this debate.

The purpose of the government is laudable. The government has said it wants to aid the Canadian publishing industry and it is concerned about the inundation of our newsstands by foreign publications.

Mr. Roberts: Aren't you?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, of course. That is what I said. If the hon. member had been awake and listening, I am sure he would have heard me say that I share those concerns. I think the government is attempting to begin some form of policy for the Canadian publishing industry, but this statute can by no means even be classed as a fair beginning to that policy. There are so many things to be done for the Canadian publishing industry, in terms of positive things, that I regret very much the minister has chosen, with all the fanfare of his speech at Trent University and his speech here in the House on May 8, to come forward with one negative proposal for an industry that is crying out for assistance from its government. I cannot think that the Secretary of State for Canada is so lacking in imagination. If he is, I cannot think that there are people in the public service of this country who are so lacking in imagination they feel they should attack this great problem of an emerging Canadian industry by using the negative, retributive forces of the tax laws in this way.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Because of the magnitude of the problem, there ought to be a willingness on the part of the minister to compromise in this situation. It is that spirit of compromise, and its importance in dealing with something I do not think is really partisan in the traditional sense, which caused the hon. member for Cochrane and the hon. member for Vaudreuil to say what was on their minds in respect of the matter. I commend them for that and I am rather proud to be associated with them, even though the hon. member for St. Paul's perhaps found their streak of independence somewhat not to his liking. Most members of the House would echo the many sentiments expressed by those two members of the Liberal Party.

Our duty is to examine each of these cases on its merits and examine the law on its merits. We ought to review the principles which should be considered in respect of the application of the law. If we find they are wanting, then the government and the Secretary of State should be prepared to move. For those who view the statements of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), when he was replying to a short statement in the House, as closing the debate on the consideration of this policy, I would ask them to read the statements again. He said very clearly that one of the important aspects that ought to be considered was the whole effect on Canadian employment and those who were dependent in one way or to some degree or another on the continuation of these publications.

The hon. member suggested we should consider the effect it might have on those people if these publications were not allowed to continue in their favoured position. He was concerned, as well, about the monopolistic effect this legislation could have in terms of the benefits it will confer on what has already been acknowledged to be a publishing giant in this country. He was concerned, and I think he said this by implication, very much about the effect, if any, this is going to have on the development of smaller periodicals as well as the development of opportunities for Canadian writers and craftsmen within those institutions.

We are not just legislating here for ourselves. We are going to be affecting these institutions in one way or another. In fact, we are going to be affecting the whole industry in Canada, I respectfully suggest. We must ask ourselves whether in terms of those who are participants now and in terms of those who look forward to careers as participants in the publishing industry, directly or indirectly, including artisans and suppliers, this legislation is reasonable as presently framed, particularly in terms of timing. I hope the Secretary of State is asking himself this question in view of the statements which have been made in the House today, coming as they do from all quarters.

There is one other matter the Secretary of State ought to remember. In terms of the effect or the prospective effect of this legislation, the Secretary of State or anybody else in this government should not fly in the face of public opinion. There has been a tremendous feeling generated about this piece of legislation in Canada, and I venture to suggest that not all of that feeling has been generated by an advertising campaign. As the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay has said, the subscribers of both Time and Reader's Digest were invited to write to their members of parliament. If I can judge by the weight of mail in respect of one, weighted as it was very heavily in favour of Reader's Digest, Reader's Digest does occupy a special position. I think we would have to recognize in this House that we just cannot fly in the face of the Canadian public.

The first question to be asked, I suppose, is whether this legislation will be of any assistance to the Canadian publishing industry as such. Other speakers have mentioned, and I reiterate this for the benefit of the minister, statements which have been produced as a result of some work done by an organization called Canadian Facts. The survey showed that in January of 1975, Canadian advertising executives indicated they felt that the Canadian publishing industry would not benefit substantially from the removal of the tax advantage for advertising in Time magazine and Reader's Digest. It is suggested that only 19 per cent of the revenue freed by this measure will go to the publishing industry in Canada. Of this 19 per cent, 58 per cent would go to Maclean-Hunter Publications, and as such Maclean-Hunter Publications would effectively control at least one half of the advertising revenue obtained by the magazine industry. It presently controls about 42 per cent of the total.

As I mentioned, I think the effect is that most magazines will derive a really insignificant benefit from the move proposed by the minister. This statement is made in the face of the assertion by the minister that smaller, special interest magazines constitute the real problem in the publishing industry. I am not suggesting there is anything sinister in this, but the survey by Canadian Facts indicated who the beneficiary would be. A moment ago an hon. member asked who backed that organization. I hope he will be able to produce other statistics in respect of this matter. I would be willing to listen to them. However, I think these are factors which we cannot ignore.

I wish to call attention to a letter signed by T. Peters which appeared in the Montreal Gazette some time ago. I believe he put the case very well in respect of Maclean-Hunter, one of the largest publishing houses in Canada, being possibly the only real beneficiary in this case. This is what he said:

> For instance what will happen to the magazine industry in Canada? First of all the present total circulation of Magazine Association of Canada magazines is approximately 5.6 million while the U.S. magazines (over 40,000 circulation) circulation in Canada number approximately 9,000 less. That's not much, but at least it's less. Eliminate Time and Reader's Digest, who belong to the MAC, and we'll end up with 3.6 million MAC magazines and 7.6 million U.S. publications on the market. These two publications of approximately two million circulation have through the years built up a faithful readership, and will keep supplying their subscribers with copies mailed from the States. So as you can see, the Canadian magazine industry will not expand but rather decrease in size. There will be two million more Canadians reading U.S. editorials and seeing U.S. advertising. And what effect will this imbalance have on advertising reach for Canadian companies?

In his next statement, I think he put the case as well as anyone could for those concerned about the Canadian magazine industry. He said:

> Canada needs a strong magazine industry to effectively compete with the other media. Without these two publications spending money to support the MAC, and nearly bankrolling all new research for the magazine industry itself, the outlook is gloomy.

I think this is a very sober comment on the long-term effect on the Canadian industry of this particular matter. I ask the minister whether the intention of the government is to make an award to the Canadian giant. Is that the real intention, or is it his intention, as he expressed it in his speech, to stimulate some of our new publications? I wish he would demonstrate to us how this will happen. I wish the minister could produce a study that would indicate how this would happen. Canadian Facts at least has produced something. Some people may have some doubt concerning the propriety of those figures. I am prepared to say I do not necessarily totally subscribe to them, but at least there is an attempt by someone in Canada to consider the effect of this legislation. I think the minister has a duty to consider these things.

The next matter with which I should like to deal is the restrictive aspect of the bill and the failure of the minister to deal with this matter in practical terms as it affects the two publications. I do not think any member of the House who has taken part in this debate so far would be prepared to argue that Time and Reader's Digest are on the same footing in terms of their impact on the Canadian public or, indeed, on the public of the world. The economic commitment and the economic contribution to Canada of Reader's Digest of Canada in relation to the contribution by Time is so much greater as to hardly need further explanation. There is the whole question of the business contribution to Canada, in the amount of $30 million. At least 90 per cent of every revenue dollar remains in Canada. The capital assets in Canada amount to $8 million.

Reader's Digest of Canada provides employment for 1,000 others aside from about 500 direct employees in Canada. It brings business to Canadian suppliers. It has made a substantial contribution to publishing technology in Canada. It has been printed in Canada since 1943 and published in both official languages. In terms of its stock, at least 32 per cent is made available to Canadians. As the hon. member for Cochrane carefully pointed out in detail, the very distinguished Canadians who are directors of the company, I am satisfied, would not let their names stand in respect of any fraud or any other kind of offence against the Canadian public. I think their presence is an indication of the real attempt this magazine has made to become a Canadian citizen in terms of the cultural contribution it has made to this country. I think it is a culture contribution which transcends Time by light years. They are different magazines. They have different purposes. The beat of Time is perhaps much wider than that of Reader's Digest and much more immediate. It is more of a reporting news magazine than anything else.

I mentioned the fact that Reader's Digest is edited independently in Canada in both English and French. I mentioned that there are some 80 Canadian editors and support staff and 80 additional Canadian freelance writers. There have been 140 writers published in the magazines since 1960. The worldwide publication of Reader's Digest, published in many different languages, provides an opportunity for Canadian writers to show their stuff to the world in other languages. It has a place not just in the hearts but in the minds of Canadians generally. I think we must remember this as we consider this piece of legislation, and consider also whether there has not been a fundamental error on the part of the government, perhaps not in principle in attempting to do away with the differentiation, but in so doing in putting these two publications in the same melting-pot and dealing with them in the same way.

The hon. member for Cochrane, who I would suggest was maligned just now by the hon. member for St. Paul's, put the issue thoughtfully in the speech he made in the House on May 16. He was speaking on what he felt was the central issue in this particular debate. I should like to quote from page 5891 of Hansard, where he is reported as follows:

> In my view the central issue before us in this debate is to establish, once and for all, a set of guidelines for the magazine and periodical publishing industry in this country which meets the approval not only of the industry itself but of the advertisers, editors, graphic artists, and perhaps most important of all, the general public of Canada.

Certainly we should be thinking positively in these terms and that is, I hope, the minister's thinking behind this legislation. However, as I re-read his speech, I am not so sure that is his thinking. I do not think that in the speech which he made in introducing the bill for second reading he came to grips with that kind of thing; but the hon. member for Cochrane has come to grips with this matter and I hope that before this debate is over others will indicate that that is their wish as well.

I said at the outset of this speech that I would indicate some things that I think should be done by the government. I am sure there will be an opportunity to deal with this matter a little later if and when this bill receives second reading, but there are important things that go beyond this single, negative retributive step. On the whole question of ownership and the statement made by the Minister of National Revenue that arbitrarily there shall be established a very high level of 80 per cent Canadian ownership, I want to say to members of the government—and I say it with great respect—that ownership is not a sufficient guarantee of Canadian content. Can you imagine that anything would be typically Canadian if it were owned by the Argus Corporation, or Power Corporation? Would that guarantee anything with respect to the Canadian content of magazines owned by these corporations? I say, with respect, that a content ruling should be established which would increase the percentage of Canadian content required by law over a specific period of time. This is something that is not new to Canada; we have the same type of Canadian content ruling from the CRTC.

I think that in dealing with the matter of content and ownership we should be fair and we should do it gradually because of the disruption that any sudden action can cause to these publications. I think that if we handle ourselves in this way, handle ourselves sensibly, we could avoid the immediate dislocation of Canadian employees and suppliers, as the present measure seems to indicate might be the case. I disagree with the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Raines) when he said that Reader's Digest was threatening suicide. That is not so at all; they are just saying that an express train with the Secretary of State at the controls is coming down the track; that perhaps it is out of control with respect to them, and they are warning people that it might hit them. There is quite a difference.

I think, also, that we could take a look at the distribution system of periodicals in Canada. Mr. Speaker, 13 of the 14 national magazine distribution firms in this country happen to be American owned. The government should consider assisting the organization of a national distribution company to ensure promotion and circulation of Canadian publications. Canadian magazines should be displayed and sold at federal installations and in Information Canada offices, thus promoting sales in a positive way. Public corporations such as Air Canada and others should be encouraged to provide a greater selection of Canadian publications. I see the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) in the House. Perhaps he could take a look at the postal rates that apply to magazines. The book purchase program of Canada Council could be expanded to include Canadian magazine subscriptions for public and school libraries.

The government should consider a grant system or a forgivable loan system with respect to the publishing industry in the area on which this legislation focuses. Canada Council would be a reasonable vehicle through which this matter could at least be considered, a vehicle for any system to be put into place. I think the government should consider purchasing a more substantial amount of advertising space in Canadian periodicals, although I would not want them to emulate the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) in his conservation program.

I have spoken about the question of postal rates and services, and while the Postmaster General is in the House I should like to suggest that he might consider the fact that 91 per cent of Canadian magazine sales are made through subscription, so an efficient and cheap postal service is of crucial importance to the well-being of magazines and periodicals in this country.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—External Affairs—Suggested Canadian effort to have North and South Korea resolve differences; the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—External Affairs—Garrison irrigation project in United States—Request for Canadian efforts to secure moratorium on construction.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, public bills, private bills, notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order No. 8, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). Shall the order stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The motion stands at the request of the government. Order No. 34, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). Shall the order stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The motion stands at the request of the government. This guarantees that it will retain its place.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that there is general agreement to taking the bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson), Bill C-203, an act to amend the Criminal Code (loan sharking).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): I thank the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Lefebvre) for that information.

CRIMINAL CODE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO INCLUDE LOAN SHARKING AS A CRIME

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore) moved that Bill C-203, to amend the Criminal Code (loan sharking), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am indeed pleased that finally Bill C-203, to amend the Criminal Code under the term loan sharking, should be before the House of Commons. What it means, in effect is that the Criminal Code would be amended by adding immediately after section 305 the following:

305.1 (1) Any person who, in respect of any loan directly or indirectly, charges, exacts or receives, or stipulates for the payment by the borrower of a sum of money as a result of the payment of which the whole of the cost of the loan of the borrower exceeds or would exceed twenty-four per cent of the amount advanced, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for ten years.

I point out that there is an error in the bill and that it should read "twenty-four per cent per annum", which may be considered rather low. However, I point this out so that if anyone in replying takes exception to the bill, it will be understood that it is meant to be 24 per cent per annum in so far as this bill is concerned.

If you permit, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote a few lines of Shylock's in "The Merchant of Venice", Act 1, Scene 3:

If you repay me not on such a day, in such a place, such sum or sums as are expressed in the condition, let the forfeit be nominated for an equal pound of your fair flesh. To be cut off and taken in what part of your body pleaseth me.

These lines, aside from demonstrating the timeless and universal quality of William Shakespeare's works, underline the fact that usury has existed for a great many years. However, in the past five or six years loan sharking has become an increasingly serious problem which must be faced. Government inquiries into organized crime, both in Canada and the United States, support this contention. Testimony from the Quebec Crime Commission hearings, and from United States commissions at both the state and federal level, have furnished abundant evidence.

It is estimated that loan sharking is the second largest source of revenue for organized crime. However, many feel it will or already has surpassed gambling as the number one source. On Montreal island alone it is estimated to be a $700 million business. This relatively recent but at the same time massive intrusion of organized crime into this field has given the problem an entirely new dimension.

The Encyclopaedia Britannica defines usury as the charging of interest in excess of that allowed by law for a loan of money or for the extension of the maturity of a debt. However, it is commonly used to define any credit situation where an unconscionable and exorbitant rate of interest is charged. For the purposes of this bill I define criminal usury as charging, taking, or receiving any money or other property as interest on a loan or forbearance of any money or other property at a rate exceeding 24 per cent per annum.

The harmful effects loan sharking has on society can no longer be limited to the financial bankruptcy of a few individuals, but are now a vital matter of concern because of economic and social effects on all elements of society. However, we should not minimize the financial ruin, physical hardships, emotional strain and sometimes suicide and murder suffered by individuals.

An example of this can be found in a front page story in the September 24, 1974, Montreal Star which tells about a woman who borrowed $300 from a Montreal loan shark and repaid, in weekly payments or fines, a total of $3,770 over a period of three years.

Indeed if we are to understand loan sharking, we must attempt to understand the victims of loan sharks. There are three identifiable classes of borrowers: first, the small businessman whose credit position is too poor to support a legitimate loan; second, the urban poor who, even if steadily employed, may be in desperate need of money; and third, heavy gamblers whose propensity for indebtedness is great, regardless of their business or background.

In addition it should be noted that organized crime often chooses victims whose abilities or contacts can be of use to the organization, such as bank employees and public officials.

Two basic characteristics of loan shark victims are an urgent need for money and the inability to obtain funds through normal lending channels, either because they do not have necessary capital or because the purpose of the loan is unacceptable. Another common characteristic of loan shark victims is that they very rarely complain about their plight to law enforcement authorities. The most obvious explanation is the fear of retribution, the threat of violence, implied or explicit, and when threats are not sufficient, the underworld has resorted to severe beatings and even murder.

However, there are other important reasons why victims seldom complain. The hearing into the impact of crime on small business in 1968, before the Senate Select Committee on Small Business, was told that it is generally agreed that most loan shark transactions are amicably conducted with both parties being satisfied. If this relationship remains unstrained, the authorities will never learn of the transaction from complaints. Also victims are sometimes sympathetic or involved in organized crime, and a victim is frequently forced into crime in order to meet payments. Thus he is in too deep to complain. This last point is directly related to the most serious effect of the involvement of organized crime in loan sharking, that is, the increase of criminal activity.

I will quote from Professor Henry Ruth of the University of Pennsylvania law school speaking before the U.S. Senate Committee on Small Business in May of 1968:

> The activity in each kind of crime bolsters the success in other criminal enterprises; organized crime uses loan-sharking in tandem with its gambling and other operations. In addition, the debor-victim becomes a pawn in furthering other criminal activity of the organization and in broadening the legitimate business base of organized crime's holdings.

It is to be appreciated that organized crime's rackets closely connected with loan sharking, besides gambling, are narcotics distribution, labour racketeering, and disposal of stolen goods. Profits from loan sharking finances these underworld practices, and also promotes other criminal activity. For example, as mentioned, victims are often forced to criminal means to meet demands for payment. It also provides a cruelly effective device for enabling the underworld to expand its interests in legitimate business.

The story in the Toronto Star dated April 14, 1973, concerning the testimony of a convicted racketeer to the Quebec police commission inquiry into organized crime dramatically underlines this point. The racketeer, describing loan sharking operations, said, and I quote:

> They will beat up a man for a few dollars. They choke businessmen to death with outrageous interest, then take away their firms.

He went on to tell about a Montreal businessman who lost a $40,000 men's clothing store because he owed a shark $1,200 and could not make the weekly payments. He also told about another man who lost his dry cleaning firm and became a $100 a week employee in the establishment while the shark negotiated its sale to a competitor. Lastly, it should be remembered that loan sharking provides an instrument which organized crime can use in the bribery and corruption of public officials.

[Mr. Robinson.]

In 1967 a United States House of Representatives republican task force on crime stated, and I quote:

> The victims of organized crime are the urban poor. A society concerned about poverty must be concerned about organized crime.

We find the urban poor are among the most vulnerable to loan sharking. The urban slums provide an excellent setting for the loan shark operator. A ready market exists because victims most often do not have access to legal lending sources. The poor can least afford it, and are most likely to be pushed to crime to meet payments. The crime rate in the urban slum environment is already too high without this further stimulus. Another factor is that too frequently in this environment the criminal element receives a certain respect, while law authorities lack the trust of the ghetto population.

● (1710)

While I have been concentrating primarily on organized crime in loan sharking operations, we must not forget that there are many supposedly respectable and legitimate businessmen who could be classified as loan sharks. They may not use the threat of violence to collect payments, but the interest rates they charge are criminal. Their victims are the poor, and the small marginal businessman lacking sufficient capital. When granted credit they must pay a premium for it. The poor have to rely on the most expensive source of credit. They are denied credit at lower rates not necessarily because they have a poor credit history but because they are simply less wealthy than other borrowers.

The chairman of the Welfare and Housing Committee of Metropolitan Toronto informed the Senate Committee on Poverty as follows:

> So many people are unable to comprehend what they are getting themselves into, first of all . . . when they buy a car or television set or anything on time. In this country, you know it is rather peculiar that if you go to the bank and you want to borrow money at a reasonable lending rate, if you can afford it, you can get it. If you cannot afford it, you go upstairs and get it from the finance company which borrowed it from the bank in the first place. Too many people get in debt because they do not understand economics.

It is this kind of situation which provides a steady source of customers for our "legitimate" loan sharks. In my view our present laws against loan sharks are inadequate.

Perhaps one of the most telling statements I have come across is from the 1965 State Temporary Commission of Investigation of the State of New York, which found:

> Startling as it may seem, the commission found, and all official witnesses agreed, that the absence of effective usury laws in this state was a significant factor in the underworld's move into loan sharking.

There can be little doubt that sentences for loan sharking offences are too light. Perhaps the best example for this can be found in an editorial in the Montreal Gazette of September 28, 1974, which said:

> One loan shark convicted of 84 counts was fined a total of $3,675, less than $44 a count. Yet he had $75,000 out on loan to 136 clients at rates starting at 25 per cent a month.

For some reason which is difficult to explain there is an attitude of indifference by local officials and the public toward loan sharking operations. As far back as 1951 the

Kefauver Commission investigating organized crime found:

> Whether out of ignorance or indolence is not clear, but some local authorities insisted, orally and in writing, that there was no organized crime in their jurisdictions, although the subsequent testimony proved them pathetically in error.

In Canada law enforcement agencies attempting to control loan sharking are severely restricted by our present legislation. The Small Loans Act does not cover loans greater than $1,500, nor does it cover vendor credit such as credit cards.

I know the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) intends to introduce legislation which will remedy some of the weakness which exists presently in regard to the Interest Act and the Small Loans Act, and I want to congratulate the minister for his initiatives in this direction. My bill is not intended as a total answer to the problem and associated problems of loan sharking. But perhaps it is a start and will provide a platform for discussion of these problems.

I know one of the main criticisms of my bill will be the ceiling on interest rates and the inherent difficulties. While I agree with some of these criticisms to a certain extent, I would just like to say in closing that I fear that the removal of all ceilings on interest rates may only result in the legalization of loan sharking rather than its elimination.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to extend the debate this afternoon. On this side of the House we feel that Bill C-203 introduced by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) is a good bill and should be allowed to go to committee without further debate. If hon. members opposite wish to debate this bill to the end and talk it out, that is fine, but on this side of the House we think it is an appropriate bill and should go to committee without further debate.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) for presenting Bill C-203 to the House this afternoon. It shows that he has a strong social concern, especially for the working poor and the poor in the large centres.

Any objection that I might express indirectly on behalf of my party would be that the bill does not go far enough. I think the hon. member has corrected the bill and has stated that the 24 per cent mentioned refers to 24 per cent annually. We all know that, besides being hit by loan sharks, the poor in the large urban centres and smaller areas like my own are also hit by high rents and inflation and these things as attacks against the poor are sometimes more difficult to get at, but also it is true that if rent controls were introduced across the nation it might be good for one part of the country and not for another. Surely, however, the federal and provincial governments in co-operation should mount an attack on slum landlords from one end of Canada to the other. I would put these people in the same category of contributing to poverty as the loan sharks.

While I commend the hon. member I should like to suggest that, rather than talking about 24 per cent interest and whether there is a ceiling on interest rates in regard to these special lenders—from an economic point of view the effect would be negligible—we should tackle the basic issue which is a moral one. The question is what this practice does to the poor and its contribution to organized crime in our society.

The hon. member has spoken eloquently and has presented evidence about the contribution of loan sharking to organized crime. I would suggest to him that a more realistic figure to give a legal lender an adequate return, while protecting the desperate borrower, would be 18 per cent per year rather than 24 per cent per year. He is right in saying that our present laws are inadequate. A guarantee of 18 per cent would put teeth in this legislation and would allow the provincial authorities, as well as the federal authorities, to undermine the relationships between loan sharking and keeping the urban poor poorer and the relationship between loan sharking and the growth of organized crime.

It is now accepted that credit unions have made an important contribution to our society. I would ask the hon. member to consider whether this is not an area in which we should ask the credit union movement to consider seriously giving a more favourable rate of interest to these desperate people. Perhaps something additional can be done for the poor of this country by this great voluntary organization. Credit unions started in Germany, and came to this country to make a remarkable contribution to our many communities, including towns in my own province. What the Caisse Populaire has done in Quebec is well known by hon. members on the other side of this House.

I want to state that I think the 24 per cent figure is unreasonably high. Considering the people we are dealing with, 18 per cent should be sufficient. The present rates encourage Shylocking, and something should be done about that.

● (1720)

The government is indirectly contributing to an attack on the poor while at the same time saying that through a possible guaranteed income it wants to help the working poor. This is one way it could help the poor, by putting some teeth into the legislation attacking loan sharking. At the same time it would do much in this country to help undermine the subtle, pervasive and complex influence of organized crime and its relationship to money lending in our economy.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like at the outset to congratulate the hon. member who introduced Bill C-203, an act to amend the Criminal Code by adding a few extremely important lines that read as follows:

> Is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for ten years . . .

I would write twenty years and even life imprisonment—

> any person who, in respect of any loan directly or indirectly, charges, exacts or receives, or stipulates for the payment by the borrower of a sum of money as a result of the payment of which the whole of the cost of the loan of the borrower exceeds or would exceed twenty-four percent of the amount advanced.

Loan Sharking

Mr. Speaker, I believe usury should not carry a percentage. Whenever a loan is granted, if it is the outcome of one's labour, it is only normal to get a compensation which we call interest. It is money earned through one's labour. It is normal to own something that can be rented to somebody else at a rate of interest, for a reasonable rent, and not at a rate that may impose excessive conditions on the borrower which would place him in trying circumstances. If someone is being abused in a modern society, in a well-structured and well-organized society, it is only normal that the state step in so as to prevent the exploitation of man by man.

And I believe that such is the objective of Bill C-203, but the hon. member could have gone much further. I should like to make a few remarks. I just said that if one lends something that belongs to one, it is normal to get a reasonable rent back, but if one creates something to be lent to somebody else, that is something entirely created under a privilege, such as it is presently done in this country at the banking institutions' level, as they have the privilege under the law to create money to lend it at absolutely unreasonable interest rates, because after all, it does not cost them anything. It is no more and no less than a permission, a right that is granted them through a legislation enacted by the Parliament of Canada, through a federal charter, the right to make banking operations which in a way empower them to create money in this country in order to get an interest from it. It is the result of a trade in something that did not exist before it was decided to grant a loan to a borrower or to the government under this legislation.

To show you how true that is Mr. Speaker, I have here an answer given in December 1974 to a question on the order paper. I had asked the following:

What was the total money in this country on January 1, 1972 and January 1, 1974? And in both cases the government answered that in 1 cent, 5 cent, 10 cent, 25 cent coins, in $1, $2, $5, $10, $50, $100 and $1,000 paper money, the total outstanding was $5,860,000,000 created by the Bank of Canada.

With question 1567 I asked, and I quote:

1. What was the average total of money in Canada on (a) January 1, 1972 . . . (d) January 1, 1975?

The answer is very clear and we have proof that indeed chartered banks have a privilege to create money instead of the government. And I think this is a very serious matter. That is why I am very happy that the hon. member introduced a bill to draw the attention of the House to an extremely important matter. And we shall see following my remarks why I feel this matter is very important. We are being swallowed in a financial situation to such an extent that there will be no way out if the same formula is maintained.

So, to the question I asked, what was the total of money, a specific answer was given. The answer is as follows:

● (1730)

There are various forms of money in Canada. These include currency (coins, Bank of Canada notes) and deposit claims on the chartered banks and on other institutions that offer deposit accounts to the public. The most commonly used definitions, which include currency and chartered bank deposits, are shown in the following table. Dates are for the last Wednesday in December because statistics for January 1 are not available. The table also shows the outstanding amounts of chartered bank credit in the form of Canadian dollar loans and mortgages.

So the proof exists under the act. We have the table. Chartered banks have the privilege to create, mint the credit of this country, make loans to borrowers, and the fact that they make a loan gives them authority to make a deposit on behalf of the borrower.

Automatically money is created that flows throughout the country in the form of figures. And the previous question: how much money is in circulation in the country? $5,860 million. The table shows once again: Total money supply: $5,860 million. But the total money supply in Canada as on January 1st was: $62,145 million.

Mr. Speaker, why the difference? We have just been told that the Bank of Canada has created $5,860 million, but we are told later that the Canadian money supply is $62,145 million. Then, this means that about $57 billion have been minted for lending purposes. This policy applies at the level of individuals, at the level of Canadian taxpayers, of individual borrowers, but it also applies to the Canadian government and to the provincial governments.

No later than last night, Mr. Speaker, I attended a town council meeting with about 50 Quebec taxpayers in my riding who must finance public works for a water and sewer system the cost of which will exceed $1.2 million, and those people have needs that they cannot afford to meet. Then, they shall have to borrow and pay that system three times its actual cost. I pointed out to them that under present financing methods, because of a disrupted monetary system, they shall have to pay three times the actual servicing cost.

The same situation exists, Mr. Speaker, in the field of rest homes construction. I have in my riding several of those organizations and I shall tell you, without mentioning any names, about a typical case dating back to March 1975.

A corporation decided to build a home at a cost of $433,267,000. Since it is to be paid in 50 years, the interest rate is moderate: 6 7/8 per cent. But it nevertheless means monthly payments of $4,232.16. 50 years mean 600 months. Therefore, those people will have to pay $1,815,000 in interest on a total loan of $723,700, which means that once again those people will have to pay the price of three homes to be allowed to live in one only. This does not include administration and servicing costs; how can they be expected to manage? That is called usury, and I think that is what the hon. member also wanted to get at.

Let us consider our own debt in Canada. There was an answer to that effect last week in the order paper. The Canadian debt on July 1, 1967 amounted to $79 million and to $55 billion on July 1, 1974. How much does that mean in interests in the 1975-76 estimates? My dear friends and colleagues in the House of Commons, let us together open the famous book of estimates and expenses. We find out that it is going to cost us 3 and a half billion dollars; one billion more than in the last estimates only to pay interests.

We could accept quite a few LIP projects to provide jobs to our unemployed. We would also accept quite a few Opportunities for Youth projects in the various constituencies of Canada to provide jobs to our students, a livelihood. The Minister of Manpower (Mr. Andras) keeps shilly-shallying and makes every effort to meet the requests of students and of members on behalf of students in the various constituencies of Canada. He cannot do more. But three and a half billion dollars to pay interest on money created out of nothing for private organizations to get Canadian taxpayers into debt, Mr. Speaker, that is usury.

This is why, times and times again, I suggest to Parliament that it should take the necessary steps. We, members of parliament, are here, sent by taxpayers, by Canadians, to exercise authority in this Parliament, the supreme authority in Canada.

There is nobody above it, and if we really wanted to exercise the authority given to us by the Constitution, we could legislate on monetary matters, on the financing of the public sector, so that the Bank of Canada should be allowed to keep a continuing record of figures, statistics, as well as the gross national product and the work of Canadians, and to issue new credits, as needs be, not at a 15 per cent rate of interest, but at a rate which would offset administrative costs only.

This is in the public sector, and a considerable amount of money would be saved, which would unclutter the money market. We should get rid of an important competitor, the Government of Canada. In a way, we are kind of competitors to private business on the lending market. It is not surprise that the rates of interest raise. It is no surprise that usury should gain ground and that we should accept the situation as if it were normal, while it is not, at least in my mind and in the mind of a former prime minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King. As I said before, he was right in saying that, when a country does not control its credit, its money, it is vain to speak of democracy, because then you are dependent on those who control the economic blood of the country.

All these agencies who make loans at exorbitant interests are in the hands of the chartered banks in Canada, those financial institutions which are called credit agencies. They are owned by the chartered banks in Canada. This is an indirect way of lending money at higher rates, without any record in their files, without their names being used.

I suggest we should support this legislation because at least it would be a first step towards bringing to account those organizations that live off the people, that take advantage of trying circumstances facing small taxpayers to extend credit at extravagant and unfair rates. For this reason, I wholeheartedly support Bill C-203.

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I would first commend the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) for introducing Bill C-203 on loan sharking, to amend the Criminal Code by adding a new provision regulating practices in this area.

Indeed, this is a very serious problem, especially since it was more or less underlying in the last few years. Then came revelations by the inquiry commission on organized crime, and those by the Cliche Commission, which showed not only that the problem was very serious, but that there was a pressing need to legislate in the field covered by this bill.

How can loan sharking be defined? This is very difficult in a free market economy as we have here in Canada. Courts of justice have defined it more or less vaguely and, on the other hand, the federal and provincial governments have legislated in this field to see what was the best way to establish the level of usurious rate. However, they were not able to do it.

This is because, according to market conditions, there may be a period in a year where a rate of 18 per cent would be considered usurious. On the other hand, in another segment of the market, in another economic activity, there could be an annual rate of 25 per cent, 26 per cent or 27 per cent which would not be considered as usurious but as perfectly normal by all the people concerned, including both the lenders and the customers.

But the government has realized that in what is called the small loans area, there had been flagrant abuses and that some effort had to be made in order to protect the consumers against these abuses, coming from contracts accompanied by credit, from contracts written and given out by finance companies and from the loan sharks, who lend at usurious rates.

Therefore, the governments legislated. First, in Quebec, for instance, there has been the Consumer's Protection Act which particularly refers to loans at usurious rates in section 21 and which determines this rate by regulation. Obviously, the rate is not determined in the act because if it were, at some times of the year, this rate would not be adequate in view of market conditions. Therefore, it was decided to set the exact usurious rates by regulation.

In Canada, there has been first of all the Interest Act, which tried to put some order in the matter. There has been the Pawnbroker's Act. But, mainly, there has been the Small Loans Act. This was aimed at putting some order in the whole area of loans under $1,500, made by individuals, by agencies, by companies, according to rules which were absolutely ferocious and most often disadvantageous for the consumer. Therefore, it was said: From now on, pawnbrokers must have a license to make loans under a certain amount, penalties are provided and they are liable to prosecution for fraud or for breaking the law.

However, the Small Loans Act appeared to be more or less easy to administer. Indeed, by setting figures and rates, some protection was given to a number of people, those likely to fall back on finance companies. But at the same time, another segment of the population was left completely helpless, at the mercy of sharks, and I refer particularly to those who do not have the advantage of a good financial background, those who do not have a good credit rating, as they say in those circles.

When they go to the bank, those people are told by the manager: Sorry, your funds are low. We have no money for you. Then, they apply to a finance company and when they are asked if they have property that could eventually be sold, they reply: No, we just have a TV set, a couch and one or two chairs. Those people go and see an individual and ask him: Could you lend me $50? They get this answer: No. sorry you have no security. That is the big thing: no security. So, those people who have no security to give to the lender—all the same, those lenders must protect themselves, they are not to be blamed for that—but those people with no security are at the mercy of those sharks from nightclubs and other such places who come and say: We have $50. for you. Here is $50. But there is a problem. Every week you will have to give me such an amount of money.

Usually, and curiously enough, the interest rate is reasonably low by our standards, maybe 24, 25, 25 per cent, sometimes 18 per cent, anyway, it is a reasonable rate. But things go wrong when you get to the penalties. For example, you have a $50 loan at 18 per cent which must be repaid, let us say, in five $10 weekly payments. You have to pay $10 every week. If one week you "forget" to pay $10, then you have to pay an extra $10, and the same the week after and the amount of your loan is not reduced for all that. By that time, you have rocketing interest rates. 100 per cent, 500 per cent, 1,000 per cent, even up to 3,000 per cent.

The result of the whole black market, if I may say so, of small loans is $800 millions. That is what has been revealed by the Cliche Commission, $800 millions in circulation and administered by more or less honourable people, illegal organizations of Montreal and the province of Quebec, $800 millions which are used to finance illegal activities. Well, we have $800 millions. What are we going to do? We introduce a bill to amend the Criminal Code in order to make shylocking activities indictable. With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that this is an appropriate way to meet the requirements of that problem.

Indeed, it is always dangerous to include new penal provisions in the Criminal Code, especially when a figure such as 24 per cent is part of the amendment. A 24 per cent rate of interest may be considered as loan sharking in certain circumstances, but not in other situations. Therefore, the important thing is not to say that a rate of 24 per cent is loan sharking, but to protect the consumer. I think the best way to protect the consumer is not to add penal provisions which, let's face facts, will not prevent loan sharking anyway.

What is important, I believe, is to extend the scope of the Small Loans Act, so that all licences be applied to all loans: credit loans, cash loans, large loans, so that the scope of this Act may be extended to all kinds of loans, whatever they may be and that it might be said: "from now on, you have a licence, you must have a contract written very clearly, without any fine print, and a contract where the real conditions of the loan are fully explained, so that the consumer knows what he is getting involved in."

When a consumer takes a loan of $50 at 18 per cent interest, with a penalty clause, he does not think of the penalty; he sees only the 18 per cent and says: It is quite easy, there is no problem. But if the penalty clause increases the interest rate to 50, 100 or 1000 per cent, the poor consumer who did not think it over finds himself in trouble. It is important to make all loan contracts subject to a rule instead of including in the Criminal Code a figure like 24 per cent. To me, it is not proper.

I would fancy a penalty clause to be drafted as follows and which would perhaps meet with what the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) has in mind: Whoever resorts to any kind of threats or assaults or to any other form of coercion to obtain a loan is guilty of a criminal offence. We then go into another aspect of loan sharking, a quite important one indeed.

In fact, if a $50 loan, for instance, is made and if the man who has been granted it is not paying back every week the money he owes, he brings down upon himself, or still worst upon the people dear to him, threats of a physical, intellectual or other nature.

And I think that this is the most serious aspect of loan sharking because the individual who has been granted the loan is not in a position to defend himself against sharks. He is squeezed in, he has no alternative, he must pay, he must find any way whatever to pay the loan back. A woman might have to prostitute herself, a man might have to steal. There is no alternative since otherwise the borrower's life is threatened. This is, I think, the most serious aspect of loan sharking and it is for this reason that we must pass legislation. I leave it up to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) to legislate so as to see to it that loan contracts are well explained to consumers in order that they may be completely protected.

Mr. Paproski: Shame, shame!

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend expressed his opinion and if he wanted to show his usual kindness, he would allow me to express mine in the few minutes which I have left.

The bill makes it an offence to grant loans at rates exceeding 24 per cent. Its drafting and place in the statutes raise a number of difficulties. First, the provision, which would come under the section of the Criminal Code on aggravated theft or extortion, does not make any reference to threats, accusations, acts of violence or assault prior to the acceptance of the loan.

What is the real social problem in that case? Is it as a result of threats against them or their families, blows or other doings already considered as offences under the Criminal Code, that some agree to pay excessive interest rates or is it on account of their social and economic situation or their limited ability to borrow that others cannot more readily and on better conditions get the money they urgently need from respectable institutions or organizations?

If, as indicated by the suggested place for this offence under the Criminal Code, it is the first idea to remember in this bill, it should be noted that

(a) open threats, made to force someone to accept a loan, are already offences under the Code,

(b) the bill will not solve the matter of "loan sharking", since assault, extortion, threats and so on, are already considered as criminal offences in the Code.

For lack of any form of extorsion as a condition for obtaining the loan or its reimbursement, this bill partakes really of the nature of a loan sharking interdiction. This bill may come up against the current Interest Act which provides that, except otherwise legally indicated, people may agree upon interest or discount rates. The abrogation of this principle, civil in nature, by a bill with penal connotations may seem an extreme step.

It is clear that these involve serious social and economic problems which may be solved only by more sophisticated means than the creation of still another offence, a step which may be too simplistic, general and vague. For instance, if the provisions governing loan sharking were reinstated, freedom to enter into pecuniary obligations would be limited by strict penal provisions, while it might be less limited by civil and statutory proposals which would take into account:

a) the needs and situation of the people seeking loans with high interest rates;

b) the situation of the credit market;

c) the use to which borrowed funds would be put.

Thirdly, this bill contains details which could contradict the intent of its mover.

The fact that the new section would not apply to money lenders under the Small Loans Act could have serious consequences. What is meant here is "any person other than a chartered bank who carries on the business of money-lending" ... Consequently, the proposed amendment to the Criminal Code cannot apply to anyone to whom the definition of money-lender, under the Small Loans Act, applies.

Essentially the bill seems to be intended to reinstate the crime of loan sharking but it cannot be reintegrated into the present federal legislation nor solve what problems it creates. Of course, other economic and penal concerns must be taken into account to understand the spirit in which the problem of loan sharking is envisaged in the bill.

To my mind, the best way to approach the problem of loan sharking would be to propose changes to the Interest Act and the Small Loans Act. I understand that the department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is working on legislation to that effect.

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in the short period of time I have left in this debate, I would like to umphasize that, in spite of all the measures put forward in this House, of legislation on small loans, on pawnbrokers, it must be noted that these measures did not have the designed effect and that loan sharks stay in business; it has even become a well established business in the province of Quebec. If we examine what has been revealed recently by the various commissions of inquiry in the province of Quebec, the victims of loan sharking are always the low-income people.

INCOME TAX ACT

REMOVAL OF PROVISION ALLOWING DEDUCTION OF EXPENSES FOR ADVERTISING IN NON-CANADIAN PERIODICALS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-58, to amend the Income Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, at the adjournment of the debate this afternoon I was attempting to indicate to the minister, and I hope to his colleagues on that side and also to other colleagues in the House, that the object at which I suppose all of us are aiming is so significant and so important that it ought not to be sought by a piece of legislation that is negative in approach to the problem and will really do nothing in terms of the development of the Canadian publishing industry.

What I tried to point out is that the intent of the government in this regard relates to a subject matter that is worthy of some considerably positive approach. I tried to emphasize before the adjournment break some indication of what the positive approaches might be.

I quoted from the comments of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) who discussed this matter. He used the term "guidelines" in the course of his speech. I wish to quote again from his speech because I felt it was a very thoughtful speech. As recorded at page 5893 of Hansard he said, directing it to his own colleagues:

> These guidelines extend those already in the act which have to do solely with ownership, directorship, printing, editing and publishing. They ensure that all the economic benefits of the entire corporate operation accrue to Canada, to Canadian employees and Canadian talent, save only that minor portion of revenue that would go to a non-resident investor whose equity Canada was making use of. They would, at the same time, avoid this government getting involved in the highly dangerous art of editorial content and editorial policy. They would give the same rules to all and provide, once and for all, guidelines that would permit the Canadian magazine and periodical industry to work to the cultural, economic and social benefit of the citizens of this country.

I think that is the purpose of each one of us in this House. I believe it is as neat a phrase to coin as one could find on this subject. Unfortunately, however, this is not the objective which this legislation will help us reach in a constructive way.

I ask the government's supporters who feel as strongly as I and many others do about this subject to come forward and speak in this debate. As I said earlier I do not consider this to be a partisan matter. I think the issues here are above partisan politics. I hope this debate and the spirit of it will somehow put under the industry the framework on which it can flourish. As a member of this House I am not satisfied that this, however well intentioned it may be, is that kind of legislation.

I hope before this debate is finished the government will reconsider its position with regard to this legislation and reconsider its stance in respect of it. I believe that if the government does this it will earn the respect of the Canadian people who are beginning to ask questions about the propriety of this legislation, having regard to the objective every Canadian should have, namely, that of a strong, viable Canadian publishing industry. I submit this to the government through you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has extended such a warm invitation to us on this side to participate that I think we ought to take advantage of his invitation. I agree with him of course that this is a matter which is very important for the well-being of Canadians. It is a matter which I do not think should be the subject of political partisanship, and I will pay him the tribute that I think his partisanship on the subject is more subtle and indeed more positive than that of his colleagues.

Bill C-58 is not a bill about Time and Reader's Digest. It is not a bill under which we are here to pass judgment on what we think are the merits of these two publications. I doubt if there are any more avid readers of Time magazine to be found anywhere than among the members of this House generally, and certainly among members on this side of the House. It is our weekly companion. If Reader's Digest is any less read, it can be only by a hair's breadth. These magazines are highly respected in Canada. They are thought well of by the people and by us.

This bill, however, is not a bill about Time and Reader's Digest. It is a bill about opportunity for Canadians. Actually it is a very simple bill. The contentious part of the bill is found in half a page, in two clauses. The effect of it really is merely to remove subsections (2) and (4) from section 19 of the Income Tax Act and restore in slightly different form subsection (1). This is so true that it was clearly realized by the opposition at the beginning. I am sorry I misplaced my next quote for a moment. You will have to bear with me while I dig out January's Hansard, Mr. Speaker. It is in Hansard of January 23.

The utter simplicity of this bill was clearly recognized at the time the initial statement was made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner), a statement which takes less than a page in Hansard, and in the statement of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), a really admirable reply in its brevity and in the position which it exposes—a comment which I would not always make about the statements of the hon. member for York-Simcoe. I am sorry he is not here tonight to receive my admiration. On page 2527 of Hansard of that day he is reported to have said:

> We believe that the move to eliminate the income tax advantage shared mainly by two magazines, Time and Reader's Digest, is a good one.

That is really the essence of his statement. The statement is simple, his response is simple, and he says that the government's position is a good one.

He raises only two caveats. He is concerned about a monopoly and he is also concerned about the future of the employees, but there is no mention of any worry about censorship, content, or anything of that kind, just two simple concerns which the official spokesman of the opposition had in mind at that time.

This was also well appreciated by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in a memorandum which he circulated to all members of the House on March 21, in the third paragraph of which he said:

> It is correct that the Progressive Conservative Party has indicated its support for the elimination of any special tax status in section 19, but I wish to make clear that this does not necessarily indicate approval by our party of the definition apparently being adopted by the government as to what publications qualify in terms of tax deductibility for advertisers.

That statement was aimed at an interpretation which at one time was thought to be the interpretation of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford), but was subsequently proved not to be so. Our good minister still has an open mind on the subject of what is the proper interpretation of the Income Tax Act. Given the fact that that interpretation is no longer current, the gist of the statement of the Leader of the Opposition is that the opposition had indicated its approval for the elimination of the special tax status in section 19—a very simple statement about a very simple action.

Indeed there is but a single point in this legislation. It has to do, to express it in terms of equity, with the inequity of two non-Canadian publications having a special status over other non-Canadian publications, and the inequity for Canadians of these two non-Canadian publications having the same status as Canadian publications or, as I would prefer to put it, in terms of opportunity for Canadians, the government proposal is to provide an inducement to Canadian business which will provide that kind of opportunity to Canadian writers and editors which has not previously existed.

Unfortunately, this simple proposal by the government has been overlaid by a number of confusions, ones which have been raised, I think not entirely accidentally, by members of this House on the other side. The first confusion is the demand for a total policy on periodicals. That is a proposal which we heard in the speeches of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) and the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche), to pick only two, but they were among the more embarrassing examples of this genre. This was really an attempt to deflect attention from the issue of the legislation.

The Secretary of State has clearly said that this bill is by no means an attempt to define a publications policy. May I quote what he said on May 8 as follows:

> The difficulties facing that industry have for some time been a matter of concern to my department and to me; for some months now we have been engaged, in co-operation with the industry, in the development of a plan of action aimed at finding solutions to certain of its problems. I regard the amendment proposed in this bill as an important element of that plan and one that is essential to its success.

He refers to it later as a stage in the development of a program of effective government assistance to Canadian periodicals. Only last week in the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, the Secretary of State tabled a document which indicates the federal government's response to the federal aspects of the Rohmer Royal Commission. In that are stated the government's policies with respect to such things as book purchase programs, fairs abroad, the Association for the Export of Canadian Books, the revision of the Copyright Act, the gathering of statistics, co-publishing with the private sector, aid to authors, aid to publishers, project grants program, translation grants program, special grants, aid to promotion and distribution, the National Library, and so on. All these involve the government in the expenditure of millions of dollars for the assistance of the publishing industry in Canada.

Yet opposition members are saying that this is not a complete statement on the publishing industry. Of course it is not, but it is not a statement which is made in a vacuum; it is a step in the process. Hon. members who have been in the House for some time know it is not always the case that the government comes forth with a complete program at one time. The whole tradition of the common law, one of the geniuses of the British system, has been the growth from step to step of policy. Once you see it in operation you are then able to build a better structure on it. It is within that tradition that my colleague, the Secretary of State, has been developing his program.

Another of the confusions which has been thrown over the simple point of this bill is the use of extreme rhetoric. I will quote but one example from the hon. member for Calgary North who, we must all admit, is occasionally guilty of this fault.

On page 5889 of Hansard he is reported as having stated:

> This government has taken over everything else, and now it wants to tell us what we should read . . . To me this is a complete affront and an attack on the freedom of our minds, or freedom in every respect.

Later he concludes his speech, as recorded at page 5890 of Hansard, by saying:

> The government is guilty of implementing a bill of censorship. It is the worst form of taxation in the history of this country. It is a disgrace to the Liberal party.

I do not know whether or not hon. members opposite this evening would care to defend that statement, but I must admit that when I see such extremes of speech my mind tends to go back to certain earlier incidents, and I recall that when the original legislation was introduced in 1965 the Winnipeg Free Press published an article of which it is probably not too proud in retrospect.

In June of 1965 the Free Press compared Walter Gordon to King George III "He taxed advertising", to Adolf Hitler "He jailed editors", to Joseph Stalin "He made the press a government mouthpiece", and to Fidel Castro "He exiled editors". It was maintained that censorship of advertising was the same as censorship of editorial news matter, for it interferes with the right of people to inform themselves of what products exist so that they might decide for themselves how to spend their money. This is based on the view that paid advertising has the same rights in our tradition of free speech as pure speech itself. That is not the Liberal view.

The hon. member for Calgary North—I am sorry that he is not here this evening to hear my comments on his speech—was calling for a philosophical redefinition of the Liberal Party. We know what we are about over here, and I propose to tell him tonight, through you, Mr. Speaker, what the position of the Liberal Party is on matters such as this. We welcome the occasion to do this, but it is not because we need the enlightenment.

To come to the fundamental question in this area as to the meaning of civil liberties, which is really what is at stake here, I think reputable authorities will agree that civil liberties in our society are best classified as rights which are at the same time negative and personal. They have these two characteristics. They are ones which are negative in scope. They say "thou shalt not," and at the same time they relate directly to the human person, not to all the activities of the human person but to those which relate most directly to the democratic process.

In fact we might put it this way: civil liberties are those rights which are most fundamentally necessary to the democratic process. If what was in question was an elimination of all advertising in our society or all advertising of a particular kind, there might indeed be a question of civil liberties raised, because one might contend that the elimination entirely of the right to advertise was an unreasonable restraint on liberty which went to the very heart of the question of human liberty in a democratic society.

But when what we are talking about is not that, but is the question of how we are to direct and to limit our advertising, it would be very hard for any impartial observer to understand how this bill could be said to be a detriment to our civil liberties or to be an attack on our fundamental freedoms, as the hon. member for Calgary North has suggested. We restrict advertising, for instance, with respect to liquor, and we limit advertising on television and radio. In fact under the original law in 1965 we put in this same limitation. We are merely applying it to other magazines in this case, three other publications—if there is a third one involved.

But there is nothing new here. This is not a new law. This is a slight extension of an existing law, and the hon. member for Calgary North does not appear to have appreciated the fact that we are already faced with the same situation, and that in our whole society people accept the fact that advertising may be limited and directed by the law in the interests of the public good.

When hon. members such as the hon. member for Calgary North raise a question about what it is to be Liberal, it reminds me of the time when President Eisenhower—I think it was in the 1952 election—said that it was his goal to be liberal in human affairs and conservative in economic matters, but as Adlai Stevenson retorted at the time, the problem with the Republicans was that what they thought was an economic matter, everyone else thought was a human matter. I suggest that the hon. member for Calgary North could well give some further thought to the kind of Liberal philosophy we have on this side.

It has also been claimed that there is retroactive discrimination here, and I object to both parts of that contention. The history of legislation in this area is worth discussing very briefly, because as far back as 1922 the Magazine Publishers' Association requested parliament to impose a protective tariff on foreign periodicals. In 1931 the Bennett government partially satisfied that request by imposing a duty on foreign magazines entering Canada, a duty calculated upon the degree of advertising content in these magazines. The duty proved to be somewhat effective in that 47 U.S. periodicals began printing in Canada for the Canadian market to avoid payment. I think that is a significant point.

I am not so happy with the next fact, but I am being honest with the House, so I will relate that in 1936 the King government decided to repeal the import duty within the content of a reciprocal U.S.-Canada trade agreement. In 1943 the first publication of the Canada editions of Time and Reader's Digest began. Then, because of the growing problem in the 1950's, the St. Laurent government decided in 1956 to impose a 20 per cent tax on advertising contained in the Canadian editions of 10 foreign periodicals as of January 1, 1957. For other reasons, as this House is well aware, the St. Laurent government was soon replaced by the Diefenbaker government, which rescinded that legislation, but then in turn appointed the Royal Commission on Publications in 1960, which reported in 1961. It was this commission, chaired by a Conservative, a member of the other House, one of the most esteemed members of the other House, Senator O'Leary, which made the recommendations which essentially we are now enacting.

However, in 1965 when the government of that day decided that the time had come to introduce legislation, it decided not to go as far as the O'Leary commission had recommended, and in the legislation passed at that time, Time and Reader's Digest were exempt. But this was a position which was not reached on the basis of principle.

I do not think anyone in Canada at that time believed that Time and Reader's Digest were granted a special exemption from the law because of principle. This was an exemption granted out of the weakness of Canada at that time vis-à-vis the United States with respect to certain very important positions we were taking with the United States. In fact it has been said that the automotive pact, which is of so much value to Canada, might not have come into being if Canada had not been prepared at that time to make this concession. The government at that time made the best decision it could in the context of that time, but this was not a decision which was made because it was the best decision. It was made because it was the best decision possible in the circumstances.

Obviously any company which relied on this was relying on it at its own risk. As so-called Canadian publications, Time and Reader's Digest were supposedly as well aware of Canadian political experience as any other Canadian companies. They could see the situation, and they knew that they were relying at risk. The compliance of Time with this legislation has been as minimal as possible. It could have decided to increase its Canadian coverage—and it did add a page—but still only 4 per cent to 10 per cent of the content of Time magazine is Canadian. It could have hired a few more Canadians, and indeed it did hire a few, but only a few. It could have sent Canadian correspondents to other parts of the world to report, but it decided not to. In short, Time magazine was living up to the judgment which Henry Luce himself made about it in his appearance before the O'Leary committee, that it was in no sense a Canadian publication. It was strictly and always an American publication.

The compliance of Reader's Digest with that legislation was much more wholehearted, and here I recognize that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) certainly had a point when he differentiated between the way Reader's Digest had established itself in Canada and the course Time has chosen to follow. Reader's Digest is 32 per cent Canadian in ownership, whereas Time is still wholly American owned, and it has, arguably, as much as 24 per cent or 25 per cent Canadian content. In addition to that it has followed the guidelines for non-Canadian corporations which were set down by the Hon. Mr. Winters at that period.

[Mr. MacGuigan.]

I think it can be genuinely said that Reader's Digest has been a good corporate citizen of Canada, and we commend it for that. We give it the same kind of commendation we would give to any Canadian citizen or corporation acting in full accordance with the law. Reader's Digest has received its reward. It has received a financial reward. The very fact that it has 1.5 million subscribers and has made them faithful, as we know from letters we have received, the very fact that it has this kind of support indicates it has received a commercial reward for its policy of Canadianism. But this is not to say that when the parliament of Canada decides, as I hope it will be deciding in the course of disposing of this bill, that the time has come to establish a new and more stringent policy, that the rules have to remain as they were.

We are not saying that Time or Reader's Digest do not have the right to comply with this legislation. Of course they have the right to comply with it. What we are doing is setting more stringent requirements for all publications which would call themselves Canadian. If they can comply, so much the better. Then they will be much more genuinely Canadian than they are now.

Another confusion that has been drawn over this bill, Mr. Speaker, is the notion of censorship or content control. This is entirely a misreading of the bill—a misunderstanding of what the bill is about. What we are concerned with here is not content control but copy control. It is analogous to dumping, in the manufacturing area.

Magazines such as Time and Reader's Digest which are subsidiaries of magazines in other countries have their editorial content largely provided by those countries. In the case of Reader's Digest it is claimed that the roughly 76 per cent of non-Canadian content is re-edited and typeset in Canada. I do not doubt that but that is certainly the least expensive part of the process. If this were not so, Reader's Digest would not be able to state in their briefs and submissions to us how hard they have tried to develop a pool of Canadian writers. If re-editing were the difficult and expensive part of the process I do not think they would make that kind of claim.

In addition it would appear from published reports that the licensing agreement Reader's Digest has with its parent requires out-of-country approval of the editorial content in the Canadian edition. I do not personally believe that this right to editorial control is actually exercised. From what I have seen I believe that not only are the Canadian editors and publishers admirable people but they generally try to make their publications as Canadian as their owners allow—and perhaps more Canadian than their owners wanted, as a result of previous legislation—but they have also stood up for their editorial independence. The fact remains, however, that the editorial agreement, or the licensing agreement, allows the American editors to control the magazine if they wish.

The penalty of the bill is not extinction for those magazines; the penalty is that they are forbidden to copy. If Time and Reader's Digest wish to comply, they may become genuinely Canadian. We would welcome this. They would become as Canadian as any other Canadian publication.

The situation is very much like that of a child in an examination who is copying from the student in front all through the test. The teacher who finds this child copying does not object to what he is writing. We are not objecting to the content of Time and Reader's Digest; what we are objecting to is the fact that it is being copied. The fact that the child is not exercising his own creativity, has not done the work himself, and has not borne the cost of preparing his own examination is what the teacher objects to, and that is exactly what we are objecting to through this legislation—the fact that these magazines are copies, almost carbon copies, of magazines which are essentially American. If these magazines cease to be copies, if they become genuinely Canadian, the problem will cease to exist.

I do not doubt that members of the opposition are troubled about this because they have apparently misunderstood the legislation before us. Section 19(5) (a) (F) of this legislation says that to get the tax advantage a periodical has to be:

not . . . substantially the same as the contents of an issue of a periodical . . . that was or were printed, edited or published outside Canada;

This means that it must not copy from one single foreign publication. If it is going to be an eclectic publication or a copier which copies from a whole series of foreigners, whether it be Reuters, Associated Press, or any other news agency, this is not forbidden by the legislation. In fact one might say that the legislation does not go far enough on this point. The fact is this legislation will be sufficient to handle the problem, we believe, as long as the whole thing is not copied from one single foreign publication. If they are prepared to choose their content from French or Italian publications, or even two or three different American publications, there is no problem. That is what the legislation says.

Mr. Stanfield: Oh, come on.

Mr. MacGuigan: The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) says, "Oh come on". It is right there in the legislation, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Do you agree with that, Ron?

Mr. MacGuigan: I am sure the Minister of National Revenue will give an accurate interpretation of what is written in the legislation.

As the Secretary of State has said, a magazine could be considered Canadian even if its contents were entirely written by foreigners living outside Canada provided those contents were not "substantially the same" as the contents of a single foreign magazine. That is all we are talking about, Mr. Speaker, whether Time and Reader's Digest are to copy their contents from a single foreign magazine. If they are prepared to meet the ownership requirements and if they are prepared not to copy from a single foreign magazine, not to allow their parent to dump their editorial content into Canada through a form of cutural dumping which should have no place in the publishing industry of Canada, and will have no place if this legislation is passed—if they are prepared to become as Canadian as their Canadian competitors, we will let them, and be pleased to have them continue.

The final confusion that I would refer to, Mr. Speaker, is the one raised by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) about the state of mind of the Liberal caucus. I want to state unequivocally—

Mr. Fairweather: Can't you wash your linen in your own caucus?

Mr. MacGuigan: —that this legislation has gone through the normal process in the Liberal caucus. It has followed exactly the same pattern as every other bill. I think the best indication of that will be found in the words of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), who was opposing the legislation. At page 5613 of Hansard he said:

. . . I shall abide by the majority wishes of this party which have been clearly expressed in caucus . . .

This was from a member of the caucus who does not agree with it, Mr. Speaker, but recognizes that the will of the party is expressed in caucus. He continued:

. . . and I shall vote to send this bill to committee.

I think that should dispose of those considerations that seem to have stirred up the opposition. Obviously when it has such confusion in its own ranks and is spreading confusion in the minds of the public, its easy strategy was to attack the government and try to exploit any imagined weakness it can find in government ranks.

I wish finally to speak of the positive purpose of the legislation. Up to this point, while I have been speaking about this indirectly, I have been speaking more particularly about the confusion drawn both by the publications involved and by the opposition across the consideration of this bill by the country.

Almost 50 per cent of the advertising revenues received by the 14 consumer magazines affiliated with the Magazine Association of Canada is received by these two magazines. That was something like $19 million in 1974. Even if we were to take the survey by Canadian Facts Incorporated as accurate—and we on this side are far from granting that because obviously it was commissioned by an interested party—that would mean that something like one-fifth of $19 million would have gone to Canadian consumer magazines other than Time and Reader's Digest last year.

The hon. member for Fundy-Royal will recall that he and I, and a number of other members, met with the publisher and editor of Saturday Night. They said that while they were not counting on the new legislation—because it was not yet passed—to sustain their magazine, as much 1 per cent or 2 per cent of the amount spent on advertising in Time magazine alone would make a clear difference for them between life and death. That is the kind of difference we are talking about when we are dealing with the survival of Canadian magazines. We are talking about smaller amounts of money, even percentages of the $19 million, that could make a difference between life and death for many Canadian magazines.

We on this side recognize that there will be some losses as a result of this legislation. If Time and Reader's Digest conform, the losses will be largely on their part in the adjustments which they will have to meet. If they decide not to conform and to cease publication, the losses will be in the form of unemployment for the people involved. It is not a large number, but we on this side of the House are very concerned about unemployment for anybody. If our hopes are fulfilled there will be a great deal more employment for a great many more Canadians than at the present time.

We also recognize that in a sense we are taking a chance. No one knows with absolute certainty what is going to happen. We had a royal commission and a Senate investigation into this problem. They both came to the same conclusion. They are the only two governmental studies that have been conducted. Both felt there should be encouragement for Canadian publications, with deductions for advertising in Canadian magazines alone and not for non-Canadian publications such as the ones in question. If any further proof is necessary, a book on cultural sovereignty was recently published by two professors from Columbia University and with no allegiance to Canadian nationalism they came to the conclusion that our cultural sovereignty demanded that we press forward with a more vigorous policy than we had before this bill was introduced.

I would conclude by bringing to the attention of hon. members the words of the O'Leary Commission as follow:

> A nation's domestic advertising expenditure should be devoted to the support of its own media of communications, and—a genuinely Canadian periodical press can only exist if it has access to a fair share of domestic advertising.

The same great Senator, a member of the Conservative party, also said:

> Only a truly Canadian printing press, one with the feel of Canada and directly responsible to Canada, can give us the critical analysis, the informed discourse and dialogue which are indispensable in a sovereign society.

As the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton said, this is not a partisan issue, or at least it should not be. It is an issue in which the Bennett government took action and the St. Laurent government took action. The Diefenbaker government appointed a royal commission. The great Senator Gratton O'Leary himself recommended we should pass this kind of legislation. It is true to the original impulses of the Conservative party in their response to the announcement by the Secretary of State earlier this year. It is in this spirit we hope this legislation will be proceeded with. We hope members opposite will be true to the historic commitment of their party and their own initial commitment to this legislation, and that they will join us in seeing it pressed through so that this new form of national policy in the cultural area becomes an important building stone for the Canada of the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. MacGuigan.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Before recognizing the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), I believe the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) wishes to put a question to the parliamentary secretary.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan).

Since I gather from what he has said that he establishes a clear distinction between Time and Reader's Digest, could the hon. member tell the House whether he would be willing to accept the status quo with regard to Reader's Digest and that the bill in its present form be applied rather to Time, considering that, if I understood him well, he established a marked difference between these two magazines.

[English]

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to say that emotionally I have a genuine rapport with the publishers and editors of Reader's Digest. I think they genuinely tried to be a Canadian company within the limits that were allowed by their owners in the United States. However, that is not a substitute for policy. I believe the public interest takes priority over any feelings which I may have about these people as good fellows. I believe that this step forward requires us to give the maximum assistance to Canadian publications. We must force them to become even more Canadian than they are at the present time.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I should like to ask the following—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. I would advise the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) that the time of the parliamentary secretary has now expired. This exchange can only continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the situation being extremely serious, I cannot deal lightly with matters of such importance to Canada and its neighbors to the south. Would the hon. member be willing to recommend or suggest to his colleagues of the cabinet that those matters be dealt with in two different pieces of legislation in order to allow all the hon. members to perceive clearly and draw a dividing line between the respective position and activities of the two magazines, in order to do justice to both according to their respective merits?

[English]

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, probably the shortest and clearest answer I can give to that question is that I am supporting the bill before us. It does not introduce a new principle. The principle was introduced in 1965. This is merely the logical extension of that principle which the government at that time was not able to give effect to, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak in this debate. It is amusing to listen to members on the government side trying to make an issue out of the grudging statement of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) at the time this legislation was introduced by the minister. The fact is that this legislation is much worse than was anticipated by the hon. member for York-Simcoe, other members, and even the minister. At the time the minister introduced this legislation he did not realize it was going to include newspapers in western Canada, newspapers that are fulfilling a function for Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Towers: The trouble with these ministers is that when they bring in legislation, they do not realize how bad it is. Once we begin to debate it, the faults are brought to their attention. At that time, however, they will not change their position.

It is interesting to watch the manoeuvring on the government side. This afternoon the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Roberts) tried to save face. On Friday the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) in a forthright manner honestly criticized this legislation. The hon. member for St. Paul's said there was no division and that they were a coherent party of resolution.

I am sure most members of parliament have received letters from all parts of the country concerning this bill. I have one letter here I should like to put on record:

● (2050)

Thank you for writing to advise me of your reaction to the announcement by the Honourable J. Hugh Faulkner, Secretary of State, that he intends to rescind Section 19(2) of the Income Tax Act and its effect on Reader's Digest.

I have been openly opposed to this step. It is discriminatory and unjust—a threat to the life of a first class landed (corporate) immigrant for more than 30 years. Not only has Reader's Digest provided jobs and writing opportunities to many Canadians within a small industry—magazine publishing—but more than any other magazine published in Canada, it has provided features and news (mature and well researched) each month from all parts of Canada, linking this country.

I will continue my fight against the proposed action when it comes before the House of Commons, and if it comes before the Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts Committee.

It goes on to say:

There has been an attempt by certain people—in some cases misinformed and in others, deliberate distortion—to convince the public that Reader's Digest is subsidized by the government. This is not so. It is simply a case of allowing free choice of advertisers in Canada by which to sell a product.

Obviously, if they are penalized because they want to advertise in the magazine of their choice, they will not necessarily turn to a news media; many could send it out of the country to Digest, U.S.A., or to newspapers, television, Maclean's and Chatelaine already overweight with advertising, as opposed to news and feature content.

I also feel that as citizens, we all have the right to choose the magazine we want to buy. I appreciate the fact that Reader's Digest provides Canadians not only with a good balance of national material, but with universal and international subjects.

I also prefer Time over Newsweek, U.S. News and World Report etc. for the same reason; Time provides a good, concise, objective record of international news along with well-written, depth, packed reports of Canadian interest.

Non-Canadian Publications

Personally, as a writer, I fear the action to eliminate a market for writers and allied industries, especially beginners in this field. If Reader's Digest closes out in Canada, this could eliminate jobs in Vancouver and Montreal, lose $5.2 million in salaries for 450 Canadian employees (including $700,000 in fringe benefits and $600,000 in profit sharing); $22 million in trade with Canadian suppliers; $1.6 million in taxes; $3 million in first class postage (not counting the magazine distribution itself). The company has $8 million invested in office, printing presses, and other capital equipment in Canada.

Unfortunately, a small pressure group under the guise of a "Committee for an Independent Canada", with vested interest in the publishing industry are using this to eliminate competition. Without such competition, and the quality this publication presents, certain magazine publishers will continue to sustain their mediocrity, if not deteriorate further. The Committee for an Independent Canada began with what seemed—on the surface—excellent objectives. However they are now distorted, more anti-American than nationalisitic. In either case, I think cultural nationalism in our present Global Village is foolish and immature in the last quarter of the 20th century.

I have opposed and will continue to oppose any attempt to end the life and public responsibility of Reader's Digest in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, that letter is signed "Simma Holt, M.P.—Vancouver-Kingsway".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Yea, Simma!

Mr. Towers: If the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) wants to be enlightened he does not have to look to the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams); he can turn around and look behind him and get the message. I just hope the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has an opportunity to express her views in this chamber.

Let us consider the following statements which have been made in this Chamber:

The government did not arrive at the decision to present this bill easily ... I rather suspect that a good number of ministers were not present when this decision was made ... there are an awful lot of people on our side of the House who do not go along with it ... the minister snuck it in.

These are not words of a news commentator; they are not the words of a representative of the Red Deer Advocate, of Reader's Digest, or the Time magazine, nor are they the words of legal counsel for these publications. They are not the words of an opposition member of parliament, but rather they are the words of an elected representative of the people of Canada on the government side of this House. I have to pay tribute to his fortitude in standing up to speak in a forthright manner, regardless of the consequences, especially when he sees a minister of the government make what he considers to be a mistake.

I hope other members on the government side will also get up off their hands to express their opposition, in spite of the fact that the minister said this bill is going through. In the light of what the member for Cochrane said, I wonder if there is unanimous support for this legislation within the cabinet.

I find it difficult to understand why we are debating legislation of this nature at a point in time when the economy of our country is in such dire straits. Why are we not dealing with legislation to solve some of our labour disputes; why are we not debating some of the many difficulties relating to our postal service which is confronted with disaster after disaster? This is cover-up legislation with which the majority of Canadians do not agree. Even those who do not express interest in the publications affected are not in favour of this type of restriction being placed on our economy as well as on freedom of opinion.

In view of these circumstances, we have to ask why the bill has been brought forward. The reason was certainly not because of pressure on the government by Canadians as a whole or we would not now be swamped with protests from across this country. In such a situation we can but look to some other source as being responsible for prodding the minister to formulate this bill, or question whether there is some benefit accruing to the minister or to the government. Either the minister or the government is suspect if this legislation is proceeded with now in its present form. I challenge the minister, or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to stand up and tell Canadians who is putting pressure on him or on the government to propose this distasteful measure.

Over the years the publishing firms affected have proven to be good corporate citizens; yet all of a sudden the government is telling them they are no longer wanted in Canada under existing regulations. England has been closely related to and good to Canada over the years, and will continue in the same way if we as Canadians treat her with courtesy. Are we to tell one of her citizens: "We do not like you any more; we do not want you here; please go home"? The same goes for the United States. I am as pro-Canadian as any member of parliament, but let me impress upon you Mr. Speaker that being pro-Canadian does not mean I am anti-British or anti-American; neither is it necessary for anyone else to be negative toward them.

We have heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) say time and time again in this House that we require foreign currency to keep our economy healthy. The minister has stated we will need between $4 billion and $5 billion this year to balance our payments deficit. Making loans of $500 million to Russia is not going to solve that problem. If ever I saw a back-paddling government, we have it in this thirtieth parliament. Why cannot the government take a positive approach?

Situations such as we now face with Reader's Digest, Time and the Red Deer Advocate are government-created. I mention the Advocate because it is the only daily newspaper involved. It is a good publication run by Canadians for the benefit of Canadians. Two million dollars have been spent by this company in Canada, much of it in the Red Deer area. Its facilities have been made available to neighbouring newspapers. The same facilities are required in the Fraser Valley. Why in the world the government wants to treat a good corporate citizen in this manner, I have no way of knowing. Why not spend time in this House trying to resolve some of the existing difficulties instead of concocting new ones?

Certainly it would be to our benefit to continue to be associated with these publishers in the future, as we have for many years. If the government wants to change the rules of the game for new ventures, fine and dandy, but why change the rules now for those who have established themselves as good corporate citizens? It could be likened to the immigration department telling an individual from another country who had not become naturalized but had lived here for years to go through some unnatural exercise every day of the week, and twice on Sunday, or to pick up his marbles and go home. If such an incident did occur, large numbers of people would be crying "discrimination" with a loud voice, but is this happening in this case? Not on your life, Mr. Speaker.

If we tell these people to pack their bags and go home, we have no guarantee that a Canadian publication will replace them. Many of us remember when Maclean's magazine was of much greater significance on the Canadian scene than it is today. At one point its articles were used in social studies classes, but in latter years it has lost that significance and impact on Canadian society. Some people seem to be of the opinion that there are special tax privileges granted to Reader's Digest and Time which are not available to Maclean's; but everyone should realize that the same rules apply to all three. I have never been one who believes that you can build up the weak by tearing down the strong. Let us, therefore, not be torn apart because of that fallacy.

While recognizing there could be magazines other than Maclean's that might come to the front, I use Maclean's merely as an example. In my opinion, the downfall of that magazine can be attributed to two factors; first, accelerated distribution costs by the federal government some years ago; and second, managerial decisions made by that magazine not to print articles and stories of interest to the average Canadian. Fortunately, Reader's Digest and Time survived in spite of these hurdles, and that is why today so many Canadians appreciate them and want us to ensure they will continue to be available to them as presently published.

I understand that both of these magazines will be available to Canadians regardless of the outcome of this bill, but we have to ask ourselves in what form? First of all there will be a loss of hundreds of jobs to Canadians, a decrease in the amount of Canadian content, and a loss of millions of dollars of revenue to our postal system. I would think that the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) would have something to say about that. In addition, subscription payments will go to the United States and remain there.

Another point we must not overlook is the fact that, due to sparsity of population in this country, there are facilities not yet available to us here, because of cost, which are available in the United States. I am referring to the quantity of printed material that comes to Sunday schools and churches in Canada. No doubt as Canada's population increases this will change and we will be able to supply our own requirements, but until then why cannot we enjoy the best of both worlds? Cannot the minister who is sponsoring this bill forsake his arrogant, uncompromising approach and at least lend an ear to the Canadian public? If he is not about to do that, I hope the members opposite rise up in rebellion and continue to debate this issue until, as the hon. member for Cochrane intimated, "The house leader will withdraw the bill and let it die on the order paper."

This issue is too important to be settled by partisan politics. The social wellbeing of Canadians is at stake here. Surely the minister is man enough to stand up in his place and admit that bringing in this legislation was a mistake, and withdraw it. If he did so he would certainly enhance himself in the eyes of the Canadian public. If he does not he deserves to suffer the consequences. He should be dropped from the cabinet. I would suggest to him that other ministers have lost their portfolios for less, and that if he remains adamant in his position on this bill he should receive his just dues.

I would hope that members opposite would accept their responsibilities as elected representatives of the people, disregard the party whip, and vote the way their electors requested on this issue. To express opposition to this bill, and then say they will vote for it on second reading, hoping it will be amended in committee, is nothing but hypocrisy and a farce. They will be reminded of their weak stand when some of the employees of Reader's Digest and Time, if they close out their operations here, are looking for jobs among the long line of unemployed.

No consideraton whatsoever has been given to those who wish to advertise in these magazines and deduct the advertising cost for income tax purposes. In view of all these circumstances I would hope that the Secretary of State would take a second look at what he is proposing for Canadians, and perhaps even at this late date change his mind.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the shame is not that this bill is being brought forward; the shame, in my opinion, is that this bill has taken so long to be brought forward. Before I became a member of parliament I remember reading, from government to government, how this issue had been brought up either in the Senate, in this House, or in committees, and how all parties agreed that in order to be just the law had to treat all periodicals in the same way. I remember reading the report of the O'Leary Commission. Hon. gentleman in the opposition had their opportunity in 1960 to do Canada a great service by making the law equal so that all periodicals were treated equally.

Having witnessed the debate on this issue going on for so many years, it is an honour to be part of the thirtieth parliament, the parliament that is finally going to pass legislation that has been asked for by the Canadian people for so long. On this basis it is an honour for a new member especially to support the bill, and I thank the minister for bringing the legislation forward. It is my sincere hope that the measure will receive speedy assent.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner), on behalf of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), several months ago tabled a notice of ways and means to amend the Income Tax Act by deleting section 19(2)(4) permitting certain foreign periodicals to be defined as Canadian publications for tax purposes. These exemptions have permitted advertisers in these non-Canadian publications to deduct the cost of their advertising, in the same way as advertisers in Canadian publications.

At that point, Mr. Speaker, the debate began, and I have followed it with a great deal of interest. Being a new member I sought guidance from those of more experience in this House. And what have I seen up to this point? Instead of discussing the amendments to section 19(2) and (4), I have heard hon. members discussing censorship, I have heard them discussing Hitler, I have heard them discussing Stalin. The only thing I have not heard them discussing is the actual bill.

Some hon. members might feel this is a harsh indictment of others who have spoken before me. I cannot in all seriousness believe that any member of the House regards this measure as anti-American, or that it is a bill that is attempting to censor what the Canadian public reads or does not read, because whether the legislation becomes effective on January 1, 1976, or does not become effective at all, the Canadian people will still have the right to choose which periodicals they will read. I say that for the simple reason that the bill does not intend to make a value decision as to what editorial comments people should or should not read, because it deals strictly with an inequality in the present tax law in that two foreign periodicals are given an exemption over other foreign periodicals.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), who spoke a few moments ago, did not answer the basic question, and that is that the legislation which has been in existence since 1965 has been unequal, unfair, and discriminatory. Those who have a legal background, which I do not, surely would not propose that this House enact legislation in the future that would be discriminatory in nature such as the legislation passed in 1965.

The very existence of this legislation is perhaps an indictment against my own party of that time. It was not a fair piece of legislation when Newsweek, and various other magazines which I think are equal in content to Time, were not given the same consideration as was given to Time. If hon. gentlemen were in the magazine business in the United States I think they would wonder about the sanity of a parliament that would pick out certain periodicals, give them special concessions, and then wait 11 years before making a change.

Surely our problem is not related to the fact that we are making a change but rather to the fact that it has taken us so long to realize that a change is required. Let us make the law equal for all foreign periodicals whether they are from France, Germany, England, the United States or elsewhere. The law, in order to be just, must not be discriminatory but must be the same for all parties involved.

The suggestion has been made by many hon. members, including the last speaker, the hon. member for Red Deer, that this legislation is somewhat anti-American. Why is it that in order to have a feeling for something Canadian we must put a label on it as being anti something else? Can we not have respect and pride in our own magazine industry and in our own news media without having to label this as being anti something else?

I think all of us in this House realize that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) recently stated that NORAD in Canada would soon come under the control of the Canadian forces. I know of no objecting voice in this House. No one stood up and said that western Canada should not have control of NORAD operations in Canada with headquarters in the western provinces. Not one member stood up and said this was anti-American, or that we are against the United States because we are for ourselves and think we should have control in certain areas. I suggest this same argument could be used in respect of NORAD.

Surely we are not against a particular country or a particular form of thought because we want to foster an industry in Canada. Surely magazines in Canada could truly reflect our national posture better than magazines from France, Germany, the United States, or any other country.

I do not think this minister's proposal has gone far enough in some respects. I see a similar situation occurring in our schools where the textbooks, whether they be on history or on literature, come in from the United States rather than being printed in Canada. Who can interpret Canadian history or Canadian social mores better than Canadians? Why do we have this inferiority complex which suggests that everything done in Canada is somehow second best?

It has been suggested that by making the law equal for all foreign periodicals we are trying to create a monopoly for Maclean-Hunter, or whoever it may be, or that there must be a diabolical scheme because we want to foster a Canadian industry. Why do we have to torture ourselves by suggesting that we must be doing something wrong when we are rejecting something from another country? Surely in the 1970's we have reached the point, as evidenced by this bill, that we can become a nation on our own and we do not have to rely on the thoughts and editorial comments of those in other countries. We have very intelligent people here in Canada.

I support this bill and I trust many of the members in this House will support it, contrary to what some speakers have suggested. I repeat, as my closing statement, that the shame is not that this legislation is being brought in, but that it took us so long to bring it here in the first place.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this bill as I would not want my silence on the issue to be construed as an acceptance of the terms of this legislation. With the exception of the debate we had a few years ago on capital punishment there is no other issue that I can recall that has so disturbed the people of my constituency. The flood of letters I have received would indicate the average Canadian citizen is opposed to Bill C-58, which seeks to amend the Income Tax Act aspect that relates to Time and Reader's Digest and in respect of advertising placed on United States stations directed to Canadian audiences.

Let us consider what this legislation proposes. According to the minister's statement in the House on January 23, 1975, sub-sections (2) and (4) of Section 19 of the Income Tax Act are to be deleted by amending legislation. The minister stated:

> The intent of Section 19, in the first place, was to support the Canadian magazine industry—then, as now, weakened by the virtual domination of the market by American publications. Instead of legislating against the entry of the American material, which would have been an interference with the free flow of information and ideas, the framers of Section 19 legislated an advantage, or incentive, for actual and potential Canadian magazines. However, the addition of sub-sections 2 and 4, now to be deleted, vitiated the intent of the section by exempting from its requirements the two main competing foreign magazines. The proposed amendment to the Income Tax Act will, as of January 1, 1976, restore to Section 19 the force and intent which its authors had in mind. I am confident that the enterprise and skill of the Canadian magazine industry will seize this opportunity. It is my hope and expectation that this decision of the government will result in the creation of a Canadian news magazine.

[Mr. Anderson.]

I have no special brief for Time or Reader's Digest. I have been a subscriber to both magazines for a period longer than I would care to admit in this House. I enjoy reading these magazines for they give me a thumbnail sketch of what is going on in the world; not just in Canada, but in Washington, Viet Nam, Tokyo, Hong Kong, Paris, London, or you name it. Generally speaking there will be an article of interest in these magazines on a worldwide scale.

I presume my literary tastes compare with the majority of my constituents and those of other Canadians, which obviously account for the popularity of these two magazines in Canada. In response to the minister's charges against these magazines, what has the Reader's Digest to say in its defence? To the charge that the Digest has special tax privileges the editors and the owners reply that this is just not so. They state in a special edition put out in May, 1975, certain facts about the Digest status in Canada. They state:

> The effect of Section 19(2) has been to put the Digest on exactly the same footing as other publications in Canada by allowing companies that advertise with us to deduct the cost of their advertising on the same basis as any other business expense when computing income taxes. The Digest pays corporate income tax at the same rate as other companies; it has no tax advantages that other magazines printed and published in Canada do not have.
> This provision of the Act was passed by Parliament ten years ago in recognition of the fact that certain publications—among them the Digest—had a prior history of corporate citizenship and publishing in Canada. Thus, if Section 19(2) is rescinded, it will not remove "special tax privileges" since they do not exist. Instead it will create special penalties which apply to no other Digest edition in the world.

● (2120)

> It will class the Canadian Digest with magazines which have never published in Canada, have no editorial or service staff in this country, make no attempt to select and edit their contents for the Canadian reader, and have made no investment in, nor commitment to, this country. In addition, it will, in effect, impose a penalty on Canadian advertisers who have found that the Digest is useful to them in their business.

The minister in addition has charged the Digest with what he calls editorial dumping. To that charge the owners of the magazine replied:

> This magazine, it is sometimes said, has unfair advantages over Canadian magazines because it has access to editorial material at nominal cost which is dumped in Canada. By definition, dumping is the importation and sale of a product, virtually unchanged, at a price lower than in the originating country—so enabling a firm to undercut local competition. But the Digest sells for the same basic price in Canada as in the United States, and for a higher price than either of its major competitors, Maclean's and Chatelaine. Its Canadian advertising rates are proportionately higher than in the U.S. and competitive with Canadian magazines (while having a smaller page size). Moreover, it is fully edited for Canada, with a different selection of material than that used in the U.S. edition.
> In fact, the Canadian Digest's method of paying for its foreign material is no different in principle from that of Canadian newspapers which subscribe to foreign and domestic news services at less than the cost required to produce the material.

I have sent many, although not all, of the letters I received from my constituents to the minister's office. I did not want to burden him with all the letters. The minister in his reply to me as of March 19, 1975, stated among other things:

I would like to emphasize that the key element in the Canadian character of a magazine, as set out in the law, is where the control resides over its editorial policies. If that control lies outside Canada, then, in view of the government, the magazine should not be considered Canadian and should not benefit from tax exemptions intended for the Canadian segment of the industry. In the case of Reader's Digest, there is a contract between the American owners and the 'foreign' (Canadian) publishers that says the 'editors' of the Canadian edition may make no change in the content without the written consent of the American owners, nor may it use any material not approved by those owners. They are instructed to uphold morality and ethics as defined by the American owners. If they fail to meet these 'standards', their license to produce the magazine can be revoked by the owners.

This is what the minister said, but in reply the Reader's Digest under the signature of Mr. Zimmerman states:

Even with majority ownership in Canada, the act (Section 19(5)(a)(ii) (E) and (F) would preclude us from publishing the Reader's Digest in Canada, even though it is entirely edited here and had 30 per cent Canadian content (equivalent, incidentally, in major Canadian articles to the content of both Chatelaine and Maclean's today).

The reason is that, to protect (a) our international copyrights for the material we publish, (b) the trademark "Reader's Digest", and (c) the rights of our authors to prevent pirating and plagiarism of their work, we publish under the protection of an international licence that covers all our 28 international editions in 13 languages. This protection would be denied to Reader's Digest in Canada under subsection (E). Under subsection (F) we would be precluded from publishing our normal international content from other Reader's Digest editions and, further, each time other editions published Canadian material prepared by us, we would be further entangled in the substantially-the-same clause. As you will see from consideration of the entire Section 19, the problem is a difficult one. We must consider the implications for similarity not only with the American edition, but also with all other editions of the Digest which are similar in size and format the world over. This problem is not shared by any other publication. Indeed, the act was written to preclude precisely what you are proposing. Rescinding 19(2) does not alter this condition.

I will soon be finished quoting, Mr. Speaker. The minister in the final paragraph of his letter went on to say:

If the two magazines wish to continue in business in Canada, they will be entirely welcome to do so on the same footing as any other foreign magazines. Even if they decide not to continue in business, their U.S. editions may, and doubtless will, continue to enter this country with complete freedom and no content regulations as do a great number of magazines published in the United States and elsewhere.

Well, what do the owners of the Digest say about that. This is what they say:

If the Canadian editions of the Digest are forced to close, readers will still be able to obtain the U.S. edition freely. This statement omits a number of factors of overriding significance to Canadian readers. For example, our French-Canadian readers—we have some 1.3 million of them—will lose . . .

They do not say "may". They say "will lose".

. . . an edition published since 1947 in Montreal, printed in their own language, edited by French-Canadians.

This puts the minister on a spot because in a speech he made in this House on May 8 he stated:

. . . we do not want the continuance of a practice whereby the stories and articles reproduced in the French language Canadian edition of Reader's Digest are usually translated outside Canada.

Somewhere, sometime, I hope the minister will clear up this little bit of misunderstanding because here he states one thing while the owners of the Digest state something entirely different:

. . . will lose an edition published since 1947 in Montreal, printed in their own language, edited by French-Canadians. For them, a subscription to the U.S. English-language edition is no real alternative. Nor is a subscription to the Digest editions produced in France, Belgium or Switzerland—all are European in emphasis and naturally do not reflect Canadian concerns.

Similarly, English-Canadian readers will lose . . .

Here I again repeat that they do not say "may". They say "will lose".

. . . a 27-year old edition which is fully edited by Canadians, contains a substantial core of material written by Canadian authors on Canadian subjects, and offers a selection of international articles chosen specifically for their appeal to a Canadian audience. Our own reader surveys demonstrate clearly that Canadian readers would be gravely disappointed if the Canadian editions ceased publishing and would find the U.S. edition a less than satisfactory substitute.

Then there is a short note at the bottom which says:

In 1974, 24 per cent of the material in the Canadian Digestor originated in Canada. Our target is to increase Canadian material to 30 per cent by 1976. This will mean that the number of major Canadian articles the Digest carries will approach that carried by leading Canadian magazines.

Let us think for a moment, Mr. Speaker, of the market this provides for Canadian writers. It is entirely one thing to write an article and have it published in Canada in Maclean's or Chatelaine but certainly once an article is accepted by Reader's Digest this gives the writer of that article an eminence he would not otherwise obtain. This is a factor which should be taken into consideration when considering legislation.

The part of this legislation which causes me the most concern—and I am not speaking now as a politician but as a Canadian—is its totalitarian aspect. Over half a million copies of Time are circulated in Canada, a very large circulation by any standard for a country like ours. These copies are printed in this country, although the largest by far of the editorial content I must admit originates at the Time office in the United States and around the world.

Time provides a window on the world which no Canadian publication can duplicate, and which unfortunately no Canadian publication may ever emulate. Certainly they have not to date. We need Time's type of journalism at least as much if not more than the type of thing Maclean's offers us. I subscribe to Maclean's magazine, I expect out of sheer patriotism. Obviously they do not know I am a paying subscriber because they send me a free copy every month, which costs money. One might wonder about the efficiency of Maclean's and their manner of keeping control over their list of subscribers. Certainly they could cut down on expenses because if copies are sent to all members of the House of Commons although this might increase its circulation it certainly also increases the cost substantially.

A monthly comparison of the content between Time and Maclean's, I submit, leaves much to be desired in respect of Maclean's. All anyone need do is read Time's account, for example, of the United States government's recent problems in Vietnam or in respect of the Watergate scandal and compare the coverage of these two major events with the coverage given by Maclean's. It is so easy to understand why so many of us reach for Maclean's when we wish to be informed about what is going on in the world.

The government's position is that Time, in order to qualify as a Canadian publication, would need, I believe the minister said, to be 75 per cent Canadian owned. For Time this would obviously mean ceasing to exist in Canada. The government would be totally remaking the magazine so that it would be impossible for it to continue in the form which makes it acceptable to us. This is a type of government censorship, which, I believe, we should view very seriously. We are already exposed to many extremist voices in this country, and what the government is doing by this legislation is making us more susceptible to them.

Rather than giving the privilege of easy access to publications with a worldwide viewpoint, this legislation is simply opening the door for a narrower kind of idealogical Canadian journalism which is already too common in this country. I am not opposed to Canadian publications or Canadian journalism, but what I would like to see is some kind of publications offering something worthwhile to Canadians, publications that can stand on their own two feet rather than continually leaning on the government.

One fact that is frequently overlooked is that Time and Reader's Digest have not had special advantages. They have competed in the Canadian marketplace like any other publication. The way this issue has been presented by the government, many Canadian people believe that advertisers in Time and Reader's Digest have had tax advantages which advertisers in Canadian publications did not have and this is simply not the case.

What is happening under this legislation is that both Time and Reader's Digest are being placed in a position of tremendous competitive disadvantage in the hope, as expressed by the government, that advertisers will decide to take their advertising out of these publications and place it in fully Canadian owned publications. This is, of course, a doubtful assumption, but it is exactly what the government is planning Canadians will do. The minister has stated this in his speech. In his list of what he wanted to have done, he said:

> Second, we want the diversion of a proportion of the advertising revenue now earned by Time and Reader's Digest to Canadian-owned consumer magazines.

How can you legislate culture? I wish the minister would answer that question. Some time ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that we should keep the government out of the bedrooms of this nation. I suggest that we should keep the minister out of the publication houses of this nation.

Mr. Faulkner: What about the bedrooms?

Mr. Crouse: I will leave him to decide that, Mr. Speaker. This type of manipulation of the press, I believe, we should view with the utmost seriousness. The free movement of the press should be one of our most cherished possessions and it should be jealously guarded and defended. Under this legislation Canadians in a very real sense are being deprived of the freedom of choice in a manner which is much more reminiscent to me of a totalitarian regime than of something that could happen in a truly open democracy.

[Mr. Crouse.]

Mr. Faulkner: This is not like me.

Mr. Crouse: The minister had not yet heard what I will say. I am only getting to the theme of this speech. The fact that the Canadian government would even entertain the thought of introducing this type of legislation is abhorrent, and it causes me a great deal of concern.

I cannot help but look for a deeper meaning behind this legislation aside from the reasons given by the Secretary of State. In fact it is this type of legislation that brings into question the government's entire external affairs policy. We seem to have set our ship of state on a direct course—whether or not the Liberals like this—of anti-Americanism, of which this legislation is only a very small part.

I say this for very serious reasons. I say this because of the views expressed by our Prime Minister when he gave a press conference in Moscow on May 20, 1971, when he stated:

> But from our own point of view, it is quite clear that we have a great deal to learn from the Soviet Union. It is one of the two super powers in the world today; one of the poles of influence, not only a military, but an economic, technological, cultural pole of great significance, and it is moreover, Canada's neighbour across the Arctic seas.

I suppose we do have a great deal to learn from the Soviet Union, but the strict controls and strong regulations laid down by Marxist Communism are not something that I wish to see imported into Canada.

Unless I have been misinformed, it is not possible under the Communist regime to travel freely, to criticize or publicly condemn the government, and freedom of speech as we know it simply does not exist. With all their weaknesses, the freedoms that I mentioned are the freedoms of democracy and we must be ever on guard if these freedoms which so many of us cherish are not to be taken away.

Later on in the same interview the Prime Minister, speaking about Canadian-U.S. relations, is reported as saying:

> Canada has increasingly found it important to diversify its channels of communication because of the overpowering presence of the United States of America, and that is reflected in a growing consciousness amongst Canadians of the danger to our national identity from a cultural, economic and perhaps even military point of view.

The question of the United States militarily dominating Canada is ridiculous in the extreme and one that, I submit as a Canadian, should never have been raised in Moscow. However, when I look at this legislation I cannot help but wonder whether the fine hand of the Prime Minister did not fashion this bill. In view of his belief that Canada has found it increasingly important to diversify its channels of communication, is the Prime Minister worried about the truth of the articles in Time and Reader's Digest? Is the Prime Minister worried about the cultural impact of Time and Reader's Digest on the people of Canada? Are he and his government worried about the truth? Are the lights now starting to go out in Canada? These are the questions Canadians are asking in their letters, and these are the questions which require an answer from this government.

Mr. Faulkner: Nonsense!

Mr. Crouse: Let the minister come to South Shore and tell my constituents that this is nonsense. Then he would get his answers from those people. This is not nonsense, this is truth, and the minister cannot face up to the truth.

These are the serious questions that I pose to the minister tonight. The likely outcome of what is proposed in this bill is that Time and Reader's Digest will, for all practical purposes, be legislated out of this country. By the use of economic levers Canadians will have been deprived of two means of freedom of choice in their reading material. In my opinion it will be most unfortunate and I agree with some of the Liberal members who have already spoken on this bill, Liberal members whom the minister would wish out of this House. Nevertheless, it is on this type of Liberal member that the future of Canada depends because they alone are the ones who can defeat the government, the worse one we have ever had. By the use of economic levers Canadians will have been deprived of these two periodicals which they thoroughly enjoy.

In my opinion it will be very unfortunate if the bill is approved by the House for, if it goes through the House, a further step will have been taken along the road of repressive action without in any way guaranteeing to Canadians a Canadian magazine industry with a strong economic viability. In my opinion the Canadian government's only concern should be that publications be willing to print and circulate their material from within Canada in order to enjoy the tax benefits under Canadian law. For all these reasons I hope the government will reconsider its actions, and I sincerely hope it will withdraw this bill.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, perhaps by now I should be accustomed to the failure of the government to respond to the temper of the times with legislation which reflects the current mood of the Canadian people. But even recognizing the collectivity opposite as a government of missed opportunities, both for itself and for Canada, I still marvel at the inadequacy of Bill C-58.

Given the chance to expect support from those of us who stand for a strong and positive Canadian nationalism, the government comes forward with a bill which is haphazard and incomplete. Given the opportunity to introduce measures which would provide solid underpinnings for the Canadian periodical publishing industry, the government opts for gestures, the effects of which we cannot even be sure will not ultimately be detrimental to this area of Canadian publishing.

There is no doubt that the direction in which the government intends this proposed legislation to take us is the right one and, in so far as that intent can be realized through the measures set out in Bill C-58, I personally feel that the government is to be commended. But there is considerable doubt as to whether the measures in the bill would create the conditions in which a Canadian magazine industry could flourish. Indeed the bill raises questions, among other things, about its implications for one of the fundamental institutions of a free society, freedom of the press. Its inadequately articulated reference to substantially Canadian content raises questions about the economic viability of any new Canadian enterprise which tries to enter the publishing field, and it raises a number of other questions which I will deal with in a moment.

But first I should like to make it clear that my concern about this bill arises not only out of my support of a positive Canadian nationalism. It arises as well out of my profound feeling that we have an opportunity today to forge new legislative instruments which will be as potent in welding this country together today as the CPR and the CBC were in meeting the demands of our peculiar geography in their day. At different periods in our history, Conservative governments of the times, imbued with vision and foresight, created the CPR and the CBC—two vastly different institutions with strangely similar objectives—to unite the various regions of this country.

Today national unity is once again a major concern of the Canadian people, national unity in the cultural sense as well as in the political and economic fields. Such a time is not the moment for half way measures such as Bill C-58 represents. It is instead a time for positive measures which will merit strong support from those of us concerned with Canadian nationalism, rather than acquiescence to that which must be accepted simply because it is better than nothing.

The history of the Canadian magazine industry is indeed a sad one. Of the 542 consumer magazines in existence since 1920, less than 200 presently survive. Commissions created by both Liberal and Conservative governments over the past 15 years have well documented the inability, from a business point of view, of Canadian enterprises to compete with foreign periodicals dumped on to the Canadian market.

It is certainly not for want of trying. Canadians started 250 new magazines in the 1960's, and less than half of them survived. There is a dearth of management talent in the Canadian periodical industry, but this is certainly not the main cause of the problems of the industry. Young, interested, and talented managerial personnel cannot be attracted to an industry which is barely able to survive. The terms of competition must be changed to give potential publishers in Canada a fair chance of turning a profit while fulfilling the needs of the country.

I fully concur with my colleague, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), that the government is without a publications policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): The hon. member has outlined much more far reaching proposals which cover distribution, postal rates, management training and a capital fund. I support my colleague's global plan for revitalising an essential industry which is the lifeblood of an independent and prosperous country.

Let us make no mistake about how vital the magazine industry is to our country. In a country as large as Canada newspapers can never be truly national in scope. Magazines can, and one needs only to look at other federal countries like Germany and Italy to see the vital role of national unification played by magazines.

I would like to return to the inadequacies of the policies of the government. The minister should not only assist the development of managerial talent in the publishing industry, but the government should begin by correcting its own lack of appreciation of the problems faced by Canadian publishers as an industry and as a business.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) has rightly used the word "dumping" to describe the distribution of the Canadian editions of Time and Reader's Digest. No more than 15 per cent of the articles in the French edition of Reader's Digest and 20 per cent in Time originates in Canada. Yet the government meets an industry-wide problem with one proposal only, namely, to put and end to one of the two special privileges allowed these foreign magazines. It is estimated that something over $3 million of advertising revenue presently going to these publications will be diverted to Canadian magazines. Yet I ask how about the second privilege Time and Reader's Digest receive, namely, millions of dollars in postal subsidies paid for by Canadian taxpayers? The minister has invited these magazines to send their American or international editions via the Canadian Post Office after December 31, 1975, at enormous expense to the Canadian public.

Last year the Canadian Post Office subsidized magazines and newspapers sent via the second class postal rate to the tune of over $50 million. The total circulation of U.S. magazines in Canada in 1974 was close to 200 million. The total circulation of Time was just over 29 million of that, and the whole Canadian magazine circulation was just a little more than the circulation of Time. It is a shocking fact, but American magazines must have received most of the $50 million postal subsidy paid for by Canadian taxpayers.

There are numerous Canadian magazines which do not receive the postal subsidies which go so generously to many foreign publications. In the legislation amending the rates in 1968, magazines published by Canadian associations lost their rights to second class postal rates. It was a drastic blow to many publications, as their postal rates at least tripled in price. For example, the United Church Observer was seriously affected. The Canadian Manufacturers Association was forced to suspend publication of Industrial Canada, and many others faced serious turmoil.

I do not want to go into the merits or demerits of postal subsidies to association publications, but I do believe that is an example of the government's fumbling and contradictory approach to our magazine industry, when it approaches it in such piecemeal fashion. Here we have Canadian magazines losing their subsidy and being forced to be mailed out at a cost at least three times that of foreign publications. These latter have the right to use up millions of dollars of the Canadian taxpayers' money. Does not the Post Office have enough problems without such lavish gifts of its money to foreign periodicals?

A clear case of the government's half measures and inability to view the magazine industry's problems in a global sense is evidenced by its concern which seems limited to periodicals which depend on advertising revenue. But many of the small circulation magazines in Canada depend on subscription fees and not on advertising revenue to cover their costs. It is they which are hardest hit by the government's willingness to give postal subsidies to foreign magazines merely printed in Canada.

The government will not be generating more revenues for them by this legislation, as it is for those dependent on advertising. I would say to the minister that unless the former system which gave small circulation magazines in Canada a preferential postal rate is re-established, as was suggested by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, these small magazines will be left to face the same postal rates as those allowed to foreign periodicals.

A recent example of this is a foreign magazine which entered the Canadian market this year to compete with Nature Canada. This latter periodical is a delight to all who receive it. Its circulation, after three years of existence, is over 20,000. Last year it doubled its paid circulation. Many Canadian naturalists and photographers have finally found an outlet for their talents. Many Canadian subscribers are having the pleasure of learning about our wildlife and outdoor wonders from coast to coast through this delightful magazine. Now an American magazine has entered the market; its editorial control remains abroad, and its Canadian content is minimal. Neither magazine receives much advertising. This current legislation will not affect their situation in the slightest. Yet the American magazine is dumping its foreign material at a lower unit cost while it receives the same second class postal rate as does Nature Canada.

What makes the government's position even more ludicrous is that to amend the situation covering the millions of dollars going to subsidize foreign magazines mailed in Canada requires no act of parliament. The Post Office Act as amended in 1968 defines a Canadian periodical as one which is typeset in Canada; one which is printed in Canada; one which is edited in Canada; one that is not published in Canada under licence from someone who produces or publishes a periodical outside of Canada, and finally, one the contents of which are not substantially the same as some or all of the contents of one or more issues of a periodical which is not first edited, printed, and published in Canada.

These are some of the terms according to the act which a magazine must meet to obtain the second class postal subsidy, yet the government in its regulations only requires that a periodical qualify under one of these five criteria, namely, that it be printed in Canada. Material typeset abroad, edited abroad, first published abroad, can be dumped on the Canadian market at the Canadian taxpayers' expense. I would urge the government to direct its attention to the disadvantages incurred by Canadian publications because of inequitable postal rates.

Another of the factors that contributes to my concern about whether this bill is anything more than a relatively hollow gesture in the direction of a solid Canadian magazine publishing industry is the minister's description of a Canadian publication as one in which the content was "not substantially the same" as that of a foreign publication.

Where, Mr. Speaker, is a Canadian news magazine—particularly a new and financially uncertain Canadian news magazine—supposed to get foreign news content that is "not substantially the same" as that carried in foreign publications? Presumably, from a Canadian news service is the answer. On occasion that may be possible, but for the most part how realistic is that assumption?

After all it is well known that the major Canadian wire service, the Canadian Press, maintains few correspondents abroad, and relies largely on United States and British news services, such as the Associated Press and Reuters, for its foreign news coverage. Frequently, perhaps most often, this material is rewritten by CP's own staffers, but the perceptions on which their stories are based still are not those of Canadians. Is it realistic, then, to apply the "not substantially the same" test in these circumstances? Is it not likely that Canadian news magazines, forced by economic realities to rely on Canadian news services for foreign coverage, will simply be providing foreign images of the world, couched in the Canadian idiom to meet some unrealistic content ruling?

One might ask what is wrong with Canadian news magazines running foreign perceptions of world affairs rewritten by Canadians? After all, Canadian news services cannot afford to maintain more than a few Canadian correspondents abroad.

If I were asked that question, Mr. Speaker, I would have to admit, sadly, that it is true that we are not likely to find large numbers of Canadian correspondents abroad. It is true that we will likely have to rely heavily in future, as we have in the past, on the perceptions of non-Canadians for our views of world affairs. That being the case, why invoke a Canadian content ruling that can most aptly be described as a sham?

I am just about finished, Mr. Speaker, but I would reiterate that I have some grave reservations about the efficacy of the measures in Bill C-58 in fostering a viable and truly Canadian periodical industry. As I have said, the intent of the bill is one that I feel deserves the support of anyone interested in the concept of an independent Canada. I suppose in supporting it one would be saying that it is better than nothing. But is supporting something that is better than nothing good enough in times that call for strong affirmations of Canada's faith in itself?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—SUGGESTED CANADIAN EFFORT TO HAVE NORTH AND SOUTH KOREA RESOLVE DIFFERENCES

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, probably in my lifetime here I shall never have an opportunity to make a more important speech than the one I propose to make now. It is also probable that I shall never be as pessimistic as I am about making this speech.

As a news man I followed events in Indochina from the days leading up to the fall of Dien Bien Phu years and years ago. I take no satisfaction in the rout of refugees along the trail out of Saigon any more than I took satisfaction a number of years ago in the bombing of Hanoi. I am really pessimistic about the situation, and regrettably I think that I share that pessimism with fellow members of parliament.

A year ago it was my privilege, occupying the position that Your Honour now occupies as a Deputy Speaker, to have been head of a parliamentary delegation to Seoul, South Korea. As a matter of fact we did not confine ourselves merely to that capital city. The delegation consisted of Mr. Harold Danforth of the Conservative party, the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr) of the Liberal party, Mr. Gleave of the New Democratic Party, and Mr. Tetrault of the Creditistes. We were aided and abetted by Mr. Jacques Vermette, then of the Deputy Speaker's office. He is now with Mr. Ian Imrie's branch in the Confederation Building. So well did he look after our affairs that the only piece of luggage that was lost, strayed, or mislaid for a moment was his own. Our own got through nicely everywhere we went.

What we saw in South Korea was rather fantastic. For example, we saw a shipyard capable of producing ships much larger than anything than can be produced in any Canadian shipyard. It was situated alongside rice paddies that had been in existence for thousands and thousands of years. We saw a very old part of Asia, a very new part of Asia, and a very interesting part of Asia.

We were treated royally by our parliamentary hosts from South Korea. For example, we had 30 minutes with the president. We met with opposition parties. At that time, which was a year ago, we had opportunities to sit down and discuss democracy in South Korea, whether there should be opposition parties and the like. I think that situation has probably altered itself within the last few weeks, particularly since the fall of the government in South Viet Nam.

It is probably only known to very few people in Canada that the president of North Korea antedates all other rulers, with the exception of Generalissimo Franco of Spain, in his tenure of office. He goes right back to the forties. With his relatives on the payroll and with his egotistical style of living, the president of North Korea makes the old family compact of ancient days in Ontario look rather humble and small indeed. This has to be a megalomaniac. Everybody in this chamber is familiar with megalomaniacs in the Canadian political scene, I am sure. This fellow is ten times anything that has occurred or is occurring in Canada.

The government of North Korea is not recognized by any government in the free world, if I may use that expression, with the exception of Australia. In turn, none of the communist countries recognizes the government of South Korea. We are caught in this dilemma. The North Korean government and the South Korean government regard each other rather viciously. Indeed they do. The incidents between them are a recurring part of the political scene in that part of the world.

I see my time is running out. However, I have to make these points if my speech is going to make any sense at all.

The Canadian delegation went to the demilitarized zone. If I had time I could tell you of a third world war that almost broke out of there about a year ago. It was kept out of the press. Thanks to the coolness of an American colonel, nothing really happened. However, there were many people in hospital. Soldiers from both sides flooded the demilitarized zone because of one particular incident.

I am afraid that the pressures of international communism or the pressures of the international cold war are going to turn themselves to Korea. Be that as it may, and without trying to relate blame in any way, shape or form, I simply suggest, as I did to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) the other day, that Canada try to play some role to get the two sides to sit down and talk over their differences. The only way I can see that this can be profitably and usefully done is to get them outside the Korean boot, the Korean peninsula.

There is no chance at all of resolving the differences of both North and South Korea if they are locked in some meeting in the demilitarized zone. It has to be tried in an international gathering. I know we do not recognize them and they do not recognize us. The Canadian position, as I understand it, is that Canada will not object to meeting with North Korea at some table at an international gathering. This being so we have a golden opportunity to take the initiative in trying to talk these two sides into resolving their differences.

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government shares the hon. member's concern over the recent rise in tension on the Korean peninsula. Indeed, it is the government's view that recent actions and pronouncements by North Korea, in particular a decidedly belligerent statement by North Korea's leader during a recent visit to Peking, represent a grave threat to the continued maintenance of international peace and security on the Korean peninsula. These developments are of course more alarming for having followed so closely the recent events in Viet Nam and Cambodia. In consequence, Canada has been discussing the Korean situation with like-minded friends. We appreciate, however, that there is very little Canada alone can do about the situation other than to continue to support efforts to achieve progress in the current dialogue between North and South Korea.

With respect to the hon. member's proposal that North and South Korea be brought together in an international forum, there already exists, in our view, no lack of forums in which the two sides can discuss their differences, including the North-South Co-ordinating Committee talks whose terms of reference provide for discussion of virtually all issues holding up unification between North and South Korea, the Red Cross talks aimed at re-uniting families separated by the division of the peninsula, the Military Armistice Commission talks to ensure the maintenance of the 1953 armistice agreement, and discussions of the Korean question at annual sessions of the United Nations General Assembly in New York. We recognize that there appears to have been little progress achieved to date in any of these four forums but some useful proposals have been tabled by both sides on outstanding questions separating them.

One major problem, however, is still North Korea's apparent unwillingness to accept that re-unification can take place only if each side is reassured about the peaceful intentions of the other, and only on terms which are acceptable to the peoples of both Koreas. Until an understanding on these issues is reached, we believe the process will be a slow one, and that talks between the two sides in any forum are likely to be inconclusive.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—GARRISON IRRIGATION PROJECT IN UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR CANADIAN EFFORTS TO SECURE MORATORIUM ON CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I rose to propose a motion under Standing Order 26 in order that there might be a full and open discussion of the Garrison diversion project. Although Mr. Speaker did not allow my motion he was very sympathetic and suggested I pursue it at another level. I am doing so this evening in the adjournment debate.

I am suggesting that the Canadian government contact the United States government and demand an immediate halt to the Garrison diversion project and stop turning Manitoba into a sewer or a toilet for this undertaking. I should like to point out that according to recent news reports, one dated May 17 of this year, the Ohio representative, Mr. Charles A. Vanik, stated that the Garrison project was environmental and economic madness. He added:

> The Bureau of Reclamation has tried to do everything in its power to push the Garrison project ahead. Nothing can hide the fact, however, that it is an environmental disaster.

He further stated that the United States House of Representatives should place a moratorium on the project, and I am asking the Canadian government to support this moratorium tonight. I hope the parliamentary secretary will give me an answer in this regard. We can no longer put this off and say there will have to be more studies and research, and then pass it on to the IJC. This is simply stalling. While that is being done, the bulldozers and construction equipment are at work daily in North Dakota completing the Garrison diversion project. I hope that the parliamentary secretary will give me some confirmation tonight that the government is going to take firm action to have this whole project stopped, since people in the United States are also asking that a moratorium be placed on the project.

Speldon Meyers, director of the Environmental Protection Agency federal activities, has stated in a letter that the study of a private group, the Institute of Ecology, had done a much better environmental assessment of the project than had the Bureau of Reclamation, and had "accurately pointed out many of the deficiencies". The Environmental Protection Agency agrees with this institute's concerns about the adverse effects of the project on Canada.

Richard Madson of the U.S. Audubon Society has stated that court action must be taken immediately if the project is to be stopped in time. During this interview on May 14, 1975, he further stated that the report of the International Joint Committee on the project would not be completed for a year's time, that the Lonetree reservoir would be completed and the project could not be stopped. Also, the commission cannot order the project stopped, only a court order can do that.

It is my understanding, Mr. Speaker, that the state of Minnesota is taking court action against the state of North Dakota to stop this project. I understand the state of South Dakota is also entering into litigation with the state of North Dakota.

If the Lonetree reservoir is to be completed, then this will be the point of no return and the project cannot be stopped. Manitoba will be turned into a sewer. This is why the project must be stopped. Unfortunately the premier of Manitoba is taking no decisive action. He is being commended by the North Dakota legislature because he is going to take no action at all to have the project stopped.

I should like to point out that the Manitoba Environmental Council has stated that the United States Bureau of Reclamation is trying to bring work on the Garrison diversion irrigation project to the point at which the project would be unstoppable, regardless of its effect upon Canada. Ken Arenson, chairman of the environmental group, said Monday that the recent acquisition of land for the project's Lonetree reservoir is an indication that the bureau intends to complete the original project plan in spite of the fact that all available data indicates such a plan would pollute Canadian waters in violation of the boundary waters treaty between the two nations.

James Petrik, chief of the planning division of the Bismarck office of the Bureau of Reclamation in North Dakota, said the bureau was proceeding along guidelines set by the interior department. I hope the parliamentary secretary is getting the message tonight showing why we must call for a moratorium to stop this project.

The recommendations of Project "Garri", which was funded by the federal government to investigate this Garrison diversion project, included this recommendation among others that I have not the time to read tonight, that "all legal questions be answered before construction of the Garrison diversion unit continues". As I say, this project was funded by federal government moneys and we cannot ignore that. Another recommendation was that all bills concerning environmental protection should be given special consideration in all levels of government.

The Deputy Minister of Mines, Resources and Environmental Management for Manitoba stated that Manitoba would not have any say in the matter if this project were passed on to the IJC to make a decision. That is why we have to make a decision tomorrow to make a protest against this project. Manitoba will be eliminated completely from any decision at all if this is placed in the hands of the IJC. This is clearly stated by the minister who has made some suggestion that it has been passed on to the IJC.

In addition, the Garrison project may jeopardize the quality of the waters of Lake Winnipeg. A top United States scientist warned that Canadian limnologists must study the effects the Garrison diversion project will have on Lake Winnipeg before irrigation from the project begins. That scientist was Dr. Dale Henegar, chief of fisheries for the North Dakota State Game and Fish Department. He said in an interview that the possibility exists that the water quality of Lake Winnipeg will be dramatically changed and the lake might become a second Lake Erie.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member as his allotted time has now expired.

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, the effects on Canada of the proposed Garrison project in North Dakota have been under active study by officials of the federal and Manitoba governments for some time, and have also been the subject of a number of exchanges by the governments of Canada and the United States.

Since 1969, by means of a series of diplomatic notes and meetings, the Canadian government has sought information on this proposal by the United States Bureau of Reclamation to irrigate up to 250,000 acres of land in the Souris and Red River basins with water from the Missouri. These efforts culminated in October, 1973, with the presentation of a note to the United States State Department in which the government of Canada expressed the view that the project as proposed would violate the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909.

In the note the Canadian government sought assurances that the United States would honour its obligations under the treaty to protect fully Canadian property and health from being adversely affected by transboundary pollution from the project. In February, 1974, the United States government gave assurances that the United States would honour its obligations under the treaty and pledged that no project construction potentially affecting waters flowing into Canada would be undertaken unless it were clear that these United States obligations under the treaty would be met.

Following on this exchange of notes, and a further exchange of technical studies undertaken by both sides on the potential effects on Canada of the Garrison project, Canadian and United States officials met in Ottawa on August 28, 1974, and again in Washington, D.C., on January 16, 1975, to discuss this subject. The Canadian position at these meetings was that the Garrison diversion unit, as currently envisaged, would have adverse effects on the Souris, Assiniboine and Red Rivers, and ultimately Lake Winnipeg, which would cause injury to health and property in Canada. The United States officials reiterated the assurances set forth in the United States' note of February 6, 1974.

Hon. members will recall that in the January, 1975, Canada-United States meeting in Washington Canada put forward the informal suggestion, on an ad referendum basis, that the issue be referred to the International Joint Commission for study and recommendations. Following further exploratory talks with the United States, and with the full concurrence of the Manitoba government, we are now discussing with the United States the possibility of a joint reference to the commission under Article IX of the Boundary Waters Treaty on the basis of a Canadian draft. If this proposal is to be pursued with the commission, it will have to be on the basis of language acceptable to both countries which, on the Canadian side, clearly recognizes that significant modifications are required to the project as now conceived. Any final decision by Canada on the question of an IJC reference will depend on a satisfactory outcome to our current discussions with the United States on the proposed text.

Mr. McKenzie: While you are talking the bulldozers are still working.

Mr. Breau: I can't do anything to stop them in the United States.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow.

SUGGESTED INTERVENTION BY MINISTER TO SETTLE STRIKE OF EMPLOYEES IN PARIS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity concerning Air Canada. Since this is the 29th day with no service from our national airline between Montreal and Paris, two of the most important cities in the world, because of the continuing strike in Paris of Air Canada's employees there, and since very soon, I believe this Sunday, Air Canada's Econair charter 747 service is supposed to leave Montreal for Paris, which will be highly unlikely under present circumstances, and since the passengers on this charter, because of special arrangements, will have great difficulty in having their fares refunded in full, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

That the Minister of Transport intervene directly to expedite an immediate satisfactory settlement thereby permitting this important air service to be resumed and creating more satisfactory labour-management relations in Air Canada, something which as the minister knows is sadly lacking at the present time.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 and cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED UNILATERAL DECLARATION OF 200 MILE ZONE FOR RESOURCE MANAGEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that Canada is about to embark on negotiations at ICNAF to reduce foreign fishing pressure off the east coast, and in view of the fact that the draft treaty developed at the Law of the Sea Conference provides for a 200-mile zone and United States legislation will shortly pass having a similar effect, and in view of the depressed state of Canada's fishing industry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan):

That this House now go on record as favouring an immediate unilateral declaration confirming Canada's right to a 200-mile economic zone or to the continental shelf, whichever is the greater.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 this motion cannot be proceeded with without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—SUGGESTED INCREASE OF FUNDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the great number of students who will be unemployed this coming summer, and that the Opportunities for Youth Program has been drastically curtailed this year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That the House consider immediately the problem affecting students and due to a lack of vision on the part of this government which did not see fit to provide for a larger budget which would be more in keeping with the needs of young people who ask for nothing more than to work and make themselves useful, while earning an income, a possibility through the Opportunities for Youth Programs which is offered to them. That the House should also consider the advisability of maintaining through additional grant projects apt to meet permanent social needs submitted within the framework of this program.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

HEALTH

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ASSURE MEAT SOLD IN QUEBEC IS FIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the Food and Drugs Act makes it unlawful for any person to sell an article of food that is unfit for human consumption, I should like to ask the minister whether he has satisfied himself that the meat which has been sold in the province of Quebec has been subjected to adequate inspection by some authority either provincial or federal to ensure that it has been fit for human consumption.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like, first of all, to note that, to our knowledge at the present time, there has been no case in which meat from federally inspected plants has been found unfit for human consumption. All the cases up to this time that have been found have been related to plants inspected under provincial authority.

So far as the application of the Food and Drugs Act is concerned, our intention is to let the present inquiry proceed before the commission on organized crime in Quebec so that we may have advice concerning the necessary steps to be taken with regard to prosecution under the Food and Drugs Act. I should like to assure the House and the Leader of the Opposition that all the necessary prosecutions will be instituted as soon as the evidence has become available. To institute proceedings at this particular time might impair the inquiry that is proceeding at the present time.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am not asking the minister about the institution of proceedings. I am asking him whether he has done anything to discharge his responsibility to see that meat being sold in the province of Quebec, whether provincially or federally, is fit for human consumption. I am sure the minister will agree with me that he does not answer that question when he says that all federally inspected meat so far has been found to be fit for human consumption. What has he done to discharge his responsibility under that section of the Food and Drugs Act?

Mr. Lalonde: The Leader of the Opposition will be happy to note that the present inquiry has been initiated following the investigations made by inspectors from my department.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Minister of National Health and Welfare would like to know I would be very much happier if he could tell me what, if anything, he has done to ensure that meat has been inspected and, perhaps more specifically, whether he has any brief comment to make on the fact that it is alleged that some 380 packing or slaughterhouses in the province of Quebec have not been subjected to any inspection at all. What has he to say about that?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I can speak only for the plants being inspected under federal jurisdiction; all meat processed in those plants under federal jurisdiction has been properly inspected by federal officials. I am afraid that is the only answer I can give the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker: One final supplementary by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: Is the minister suggesting that section 4 of the Food and Drugs Act which prohibits the sale of meat unfit for human consumption and section 22 which authorizes inspection by the minister's officials of any abattoir or any place where food is stored, are ultra vires?

Mr. Lalonde: The Leader of the Opposition is obviously asking me for a legal opinion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REASON FOR FAILURE TO PROSECUTE QUEBEC MERCHANTS SELLING MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of what the minister said, and in view of the fact that federal inspectors have discovered that a second packing house is involved in the Quebec tainted meat scandal besides Federal Packing Incorporated of Magog, Quebec, can the minister say why no charges have been laid despite the fact that 700 pounds of tainted meat have been seized from this plant by inspectors?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): For a very simple reason, Mr. Speaker: a full investigation must have been carried out before legal proceedings can be instituted under the Criminal Code or the Food Act.

[English]

PROPOSED COMPULSORY FEDERAL INSPECTION OF MEAT

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that evidently there is no compulsory provincial meat inspection carried out by the province of Quebec and that as of 1973, 380 abattoirs in that province had no government inspection of any kind, thus exposing the public to the ravages of disease and infection from consumption of diseased and tainted meat, will the Prime Minister now give serious consideration and undertake the necessary steps to make meat inspection compulsory throughout Canada and under the direct supervision of the health of animals branch of the Department of Agriculture? As a former employee, I have the highest regard for them and am sure they will do the job correctly without any problems whatsoever.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will take that as a representation and will look at it.

Oral Questions

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF CIRCULARS CONTAINING GUIDELINES FOR LOCAL GOVERNMENT UNTIL NATIVE LEADERS CONSULTED

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development concerning the recently implemented policy guideline circulars in Saskatchewan. In view of the fact that the concept of these circulars has been rejected by all elected Indian leaders, and in view of the fact that these circulars are in effect continuing the policy outlined in the 1969 white paper which was rejected by the government, is the minister prepared to rescind the use of these circulars until there has been some meaningful consultation and involvement with Indian leaders?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday in reply to another hon. member, there has been consultation on this matter. We feel that the guidelines respond in many ways to the requests of the native people who said they wanted to know what the rules were under which they have to deal with the program funding coming from this department. This is a specific request that has come to us from many bands, not provincial associations but bands across the country, and one to which we have endeavoured to respond. I have indicated that the guidelines have been regarded as being of an interim nature, and we will be prepared to re-examine them before the end of this fiscal year.

Mr. Firth: Mr. Speaker, the minister said last year that he would only deal with elected representatives of the Indian people. Why is he now creating another bureaucratic level of the district and local governments which will compete with the elected Indian leaders?

Mr. Buchanan: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I do not understand the intent of that statement. This is to be dealt with by the chiefs and the bands; and they are the ones who have the responsibility.

REFUSAL OF SASKATCHEWAN CHIEFS TO WORK WITH REGIONAL DIRECTOR JIM WRIGHT—REQUEST FOR REPLACEMENT

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): In view of the fact that 69 out of 69 Indian chiefs in Saskatchewan have indicated they are unwilling to work with the department's acting regional director, Jim Wright, would the minister consider replacing him with some one more acceptable to the Indian leaders in Saskatchewan?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Wright, as was indicated by the hon. member, is on an acting basis. We made it clear that when a permanent appointment is made, which we expect to be this summer, the Indian people will sit on the selection board, as is the normal practice.

SUGGESTED UNIFORMITY OF MEAT INSPECTION STAMPS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a question which is complementary to those asked by the Leader of the Opposition.

Has the minister had any meeting with his provincial counterparts or does he intend to have any in order to assure that the standards indicated by the stamps "Canada approved" or "Quebec approved" or "Ontario approved" be the same as regards the quality of meat sold for human consumption?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, standards and norms have been well recognized as far as Canada is concerned. As for the stamps affixed by the provinces, they are supposed to conform roughly to Canadian standards. The problem presently occurring in Quebec seems obviously related to the enforcement of the provincial regulations which does not seem to have been adequate.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. The minister just said that these standards are similar. Could he advise the House whether he will advocate, with his provincial counterparts, the same standards relating to the hygiene of slaughterhouses, to the transportation of livestock to slaughterhouses, in order that the standards be the same for federal and provincial governments?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, I am not ready to give the hon. member that assurance as regards the details of the regulations in the various provinces, which are different from the regulations enforced at the federal level. But nevertheless I want to point out to him that the present problem is not related to the regulations per se but to their enforcement which does not seem to have been adequate. As for the basic problem raised by the hon. member, it is of public interest and I will examine it more thoroughly.

[English]

REASON FOR FAILURE TO PROSECUTE QUEBEC MERCHANTS SELLING MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the minister. In his reply to the Leader of the Opposition the minister stated that the inquiry which has been launched by the government of Quebec was as a result of inspection carried out by his department under the Food and Drugs Act. If that is the case, perhaps the minister will explain to the House why he did not discharge his responsibility under the act and lay prosecutions under section 4 of the act.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As usual, the hon. member is apparently giving my reply a somewhat larger interpretation than what I actually said. I said that the investigation had been initiated following inquiries made by my departmental inspectors. From the very beginning of the investigation, however, it was ascertained that this was the sort of work which could be more properly carried out by police forces than by departmental officials, so that, right from the start, the proper police forces were invited to take charge of and carry out the investigation; and now their findings are about to be made public. The necessary legal proceedings will be instituted after all the necessary evidence has been gathered by this investigation.

[English]

REASON DISEASED MEAT SOLD IN QUEBEC IN LIGHT OF INCREASED NUMBER OF INSPECTORS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): In June of last year the Food Prices Review Board recommended additional inspection of meat in Canada to ensure that diseased and inferior meat is not being sold to the public, and again on October 25 of last year the minister in a statement in the House said that 30 additional technical and professional staff in the field will work exclusively on meat sampling across the country. If that has been done—and I assume these inspectors are still active—would the minister explain to the House how it is that 700,000 pounds of diseased meat can be sold to the public in the province of Quebec?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, obviously the excellent work that is being done by the inspectors has unveiled some quite inappropriate practices which come, I repeat, under the jurisdiction of the province concerned.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: That is no consolation to the people who ate that meat.

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO SETTING BACTERIA LEVELS IN MEAT

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare as well. In view of the fact that there have been some discussions with the provinces concerning the setting up of national standards for acceptable bacterial levels in meat, can the minister indicate whether it is still the intention of the federal government to set national standards for acceptable levels of bacteria in meat or whether the federal government is backing away from this concept?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the last part of the question is no.

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but my question was not one that could be answered yes or no. I asked the minister whether the government was backing away from the concept of setting up national levels. I should like him to answer that question. Secondly, I wonder whether—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington.

Mr. Lalonde: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

SARNIA—MONTREAL PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF FAIR TREATMENT FOR PERSON WHOSE LAND PURCHASED FOR RIGHT-OF-WAY

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question arises from complaints I have received from land owners along the right of way of the proposed Sarnia-Montreal pipeline regarding the arrogant and deceitful treatment and attitudes of the agents purchasing the right-of-way. My question will have to be directed to the Prime Minister because of the temporary absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. May I ask the right hon. gentleman, now that cabinet has approved the building of the Sarnia-Montreal pipeline, will it also assure the landowners, residents and farmers whose land the pipeline traverses that fair and honest treatment will be given them by the agencies purchasing the right-of-way for the project?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I understand that there is adequate provision in the report of the National Energy Board to cover that situation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGATION CIA AGENT EMILIO GARZA INFILTRATED COADY INSTITUTE AND CIDA—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister caused an investigation to be launched into allegations on the CTV news last evening that one Emilio Garza, a CIA agent, had infiltrated the Coady Institute at the minister's own university, thereby seriously compromising Canada's international aid posture? Will the minister inquire whether CIDA checked Mr. Garza's background before he was allowed to proceed to the Coady Institute?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have made inquiries, Mr. Speaker, but I have not received all the information I need in order to answer the question fully. The person in question was an instructor at the Coady Institute, employed by the institute itself as I understand it, and was also for a short period a member of a consulting team that went to Peru to examine the fisheries situation there. That CIDA contract lasted for 16 days I think and this person's attachment to CIDA was solely of that duration. With respect to the other part of the question, I have not yet received the information but I am seeking it.

POSSIBILITY OF A TREATY PROHIBITING OPERATION OF FOREIGN AGENTS IN CANADA WITHOUT PERMISSION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I would be allowed a supplementary question—final or whatever other adjective is used. Final sounds so final. Has Canada a treaty with other countries, including the United States, prohibiting such activity without specific permission of the host country, and if we have a treaty was permission requested from the government of Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, these are the points I am inquiring about. Obviously, there is an understanding, as I think I have stated earlier in the House with the authorities of the United States, that no such activities should take place in Canada without the express knowledge and permission of the Canadian government.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Athabasca seek to raise the question of privilege now?

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I can raise it now or whenever you like. I can do it now or at three o'clock, but I want to point out that at three o'clock the minister concerned may be gone.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member was seeking to ask a question of the minister. He asked whether the government had backed away from some sort of agreement with the provinces. The minister answered with a negative and the hon. member then said that the question could not be answered with a yes or no. It obviously could have been and was. Under the circumstances, I thought I had to go on to someone else. If the hon. member has further comments I think he should make them at three o'clock.

ALLEGATION MR. VIRGINIA GONZALES OPERATED AS CIA AGENT IN CANADA—REQUEST THAT HE TESTIFY BEFORE COMMITTEE

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It relates to a sworn affidavit by a Mr. Virginia Gonzales who states that he was a CIA agent and operated quite freely in Canada and that he had something to do with harassing a Mr. John Meyers of Vancouver. As this is contained in a sworn affidavit and as the Solicitor General stated to me in a letter that the government has no record of the man operating in Canada, will the minister be prepared to grant Gonzales immunity from prosecution in order that he can come to Canada and testify before a Commons committee, then perhaps we could find out how many CIA agents are operating in Canada?

● (1430)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

Mr. Reynolds: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs aware of this affidavit signed by Mr. Gonzales? If so, has the government protested to the United States the fact that Mr. Gonzales, according to a letter sent to me by the Solicitor General, is operating in Canada and wiretapping Canadian telephones without RCMP permission?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am not up to date on this case. I will check with my colleague, the Solicitor General about it and, if required, give my hon. friend further information.

STRIKE AT PRATT AND WHITNEY, MONTREAL—SUGGESTED NATIONALIZATION OF COMPANY IF SETTLEMENT PROPOSALS REFUSED

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of proposals made to the Quebec government for settling the Pratt and Whitney strike, which includes the provision that 1,000 of the striking workers should be rehired and the acceptance of those proposals by the Quebec government, will the federal government consider the possibility, if the company refuses to accept those proposals, of nationalizing the plant or turning over the work to another Canadian aircraft company?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question, in this form, is plainly hypothetical and relates to a matter under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Orlikow: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the strike has now gone on for so long and created so many problems, and as the company has refused to follow the practice of virtually every other company in Canada in dealing with its employees in accordance with the Rand formula for union security, I suggest that it is not at all unlikely that this company will do just what I suggested. I ask the Prime Minister, as I asked him several months ago when I got an affirmative reply, if the government would at least consider the possibility of nationalizing that company?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if you look at the question, you will see that the hon. member says, if the company does not do certain things, will the federal government do certain other things? This is plainly hypothetical.

[Mr. Reynolds.]

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN MEAT INSPECTION REGULATIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am returning to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I have been a great admirer of his knowledge of dietetics ever since he advised the House last fall that hamburger filled with manure is not detrimental to health, so long as it is properly cooked. That scared people all over the country. I wonder what change in the regulations has been made, because while manges de la merde—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I see nothing shameful in quoting the Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I was misquoted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was wondering whether there had been any change in the regulations, because the minister suggested that anybody who "manges la merde" has nothing to worry about, provided it is properly cooked. Has there been any change in the regulations since that tremendous announcement by the minister?

SUGGESTION EQUIPMENT OF NATO UNIT BE MODERNIZED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Keep it clean, George. Let's not have any dirty questions.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Between his search for consensus and a contractual link and when he goes to Europe to attend the NATO conference next week, does the Prime Minister intend to visit our forces at Lahr and inspect first-hand the obsolete equipment with which our greatly reduced force is compelled to try to carry out its contractual obligations under the NATO Alliance?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I inform the hon. member that I have visited Lahr several times, which is probably more than he can say.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I have been to Lahr four times.

Mr. Baldwin: And he does not have available the Jetstar, either.

Mr. Hees: And I went there on government business to inspect the forces as the opposition critic.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Quiet, you rabble.

My supplementary question is this, Mr. Speaker. As Canada is openly and strongly criticized by our NATO allies for trying to "do NATO on the cheap" and sending a man into battle—

Mr. Trudeau: What battle?

Mr. Hees: —in one of our obsolete tanks against the vastly superior equipment which the other side possesses, and as this comes pretty close to a sentence of death, I ask the Prime Minister if he intends, when he meets with his colleagues at the NATO conference, to advise them that at long last Canada intends to bring our equipment up to NATO standard?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do take note of the very serious question and I take it as a representation that the government should increase considerably its defence expenditure. I will bring that to the cabinet's attention, as a recommendation from the opposition side.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I am asking the government to carry out its responsibilities, responsibilities on which it started cutting back seven years ago when the Prime Minister took over.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that is my point. We did try to show some restraint in the size—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: What about your office? What about the tremendous expansion of expenditure in every other line of government business? The government's motto is: to hell with the armed forces, spend on everything else.

FISHERIES

SHIPBUILDING SUBSIDIES—DATE OF DECISION ON POSSIBLE EXTENSION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of State who is responsible for fisheries, of which I gave him notice. In view of the imminent closure of a number of wooden shipbuilding yards in Nova Scotia, especially along the south shore, has the minister and the government reached a decision on the question of providing immediate financial assistance to the industry in the form of shipbuilding subsidies, in order to provide employment for the shipbuilders and replace draggers and longliners for the fishermen?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I recognize that I had indicated to the hon. member that an answer would be forthcoming by the middle of May. Criteria were suggested to me last week; I did not feel they were responsive enough to meet local needs. I asked that they be looked at again. I am attending a meeting this afternoon and I hope to be in a position to have more to say about the matter this week.

AVAILABILITY OF MASON JAR LIDS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It follows the question I asked a few weeks ago. I realize the minister did not intend to mislead the House when answering. I feel that he was uninformed at the time. It also follows after a survey of groceries and supermarkets in the north Okanagan, undertaken last Friday, which indicated that no widemouth Mason jar lids are available there. Has the minister received any indication from his observers in B.C. or elsewhere as to when these important supplies can be expected.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have already replied in writing to the hon. member on this. I may remind him that one of the first reasons for such a shortage was a strike in a company manufacturing such products in British Columbia. I have therefore written to my provincial counterpart, the Minister of Consumer Affairs in that province, in order to draw her attention to this matter. I have also written to the Minister of Labour of British Columbia in order to ask him to hasten the settlement of the dispute.

HOCKEY—DIFFICULTY OF AMATEUR ASSOCIATION IN COLLECTING DUES FROM PROFESSIONAL TEAMS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is a well known fact that the minister has shown great interest—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Question.

Mr. Jelinek: You would not understand it if you heard it. Why do you not listen? It is a well known fact that the minister has shown great interest in catering to professional athletes in the past. Keeping that in mind, can the minister advise this House what steps, if any, he intends to take with regard to the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association problems in collecting their dues from professional teams for their right to draft amateur players? Also, does the minister intend as well to take steps to bring both the NHL and the World Hockey Association to the bargaining table for the purpose of negotiating a new Pro-Am agreement?

● (1440)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association has already instituted proceedings in order that its rights, under a former contract, be respected.

With regard to the signing of a new agreement, I have already met the leagues concerned once, and the interested parties gave me their verbal assurance that a contract would be signed. Now, it is particularly difficult to take part in negotiations when one is dealing with individuals who do not seem to live up to their word. I shall see what can be done. I have received a letter from the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association and will see if there is a possibility of resuming negotiations. But, once again, I must point out to the hon. member that, when one cannot rely on the promises made, it is quite difficult to conclude agreements.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LOCAL GOVERNMENT GUIDELINES—REQUEST FOR CONSULTATIONS WITH NATIVE PEOPLE AND CHIEFS IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I would like to get back to the question of circulars, directives, guidelines and so on which will affect our native people. In light of the fact the minister said extensive consultation has taken place with our native people and the president of the Union of Nova Scotia Indians, Mr. Alexander Denny, speaking on behalf of the band councils, native people and chiefs in the province of Nova Scotia stated that no consultation has taken place, will the minister be good enough to arrange this consultation to which he refers as soon as possible?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we feel that consultation has in fact taken place. As I indicated earlier, we are prepared to regard the guidelines currently in force as being interim in nature. With regard to the ones that have not yet been proclaimed, we have set a time frame for input by the native people. The government discussed the guidelines with the National Brotherhood over a period of 18 months. As well there were two national conferences for the Indians which were sponsored by the Department of Indian Affairs. There has, in fact, been consultation.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, the native people of Nova Scotia have always been most co-operative in dealing with the minister and his department. In light of the fact they feel the minister has quite a bit of merit in his guidelines and so on, will he arrange as soon as possible to have senior people from his department meet with the president and the band chiefs of that province?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to do that.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EXPORT OF CANDU REACTORS AND NUCLEAR MATERIAL—SUGGESTION SALE BE CONDITIONAL ON SIGNING SAFEGUARD AGREEMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is with regard to the report that some 20,000 tons of uranium oxide is to be exported to such countries as Italy, Britain, Spain, West Germany and Finland, subject to their signing a bilateral nuclear safeguard arrangement. I want to inquire of the minister whether any of those countries have yet signed this agreement. Also, would the minister be prepared to table a copy of that agreement so that members may have an opportunity to examine the nature of the safeguards which are being imposed?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to my recollection, no such agreement has been signed. However, I will check into the matter. I will also consider the possibility of tabling such agreements.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On December 20 last, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said that negotiations were going on for the export of CANDU reactors to Argentina, Iran, South Korea, Denmark, Rumania, Great Britain and Italy. Will the export of any of these CANDU reactors be contingent on signing this new bilateral safeguard agreement?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the sale of any of these particular reactors will be dependent upon the negotiations and acceptance of satisfactory bilateral safeguards. These safeguard provisions will be put together in the form of bilateral agreements.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources told the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works that from now on, all uranium, atomic technology and nuclear reactors would require the signing of the nuclear agreement to which I have referred, I wish to ask the minister if that is the situation and there will be no exports of uranium oxide, CANDU reactors or atomic technology unless the country concerned has signed the agreement which the minister's department is now drafting? Is that clear? Are there to be any loopholes? If there are to be any loopholes, what are they?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there will be any loopholes. The safeguards that were announced by my colleague in December will be implemented with respect to all these bilateral arrangements with other countries. The only point that I would like to check further is the form of these agreements. My understanding is that agreements will be required in each particular case.

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO ATHLETES PREPARING FOR OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is he indicating a personal interest and is his department working on investigating on behalf of our athletes who might participate in the olympics? These athletes may find themselves deferring education. The athletes may have financial and personal difficulties. Can they count on this government to give them special assistance as they prepare and work for the olympics and will this be followed up after the olympics?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, following a meeting with a certain number of athletes, I asked my department to make a careful investigation of all individual cases. That investigation is practically concluded. I am meeting with my officials this very afternoon on this subject and expect certain recommendations to be put to me. I hope I will be able to come to the help of those who are really in need.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR OFFICES AT CHAPAIS AND CHIBOUGAMAU

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of the fact that the population of Chibougamau-Chapais, now numbering 21,000 people, must travel over 200 miles in order to get to the nearest unemployment insurance office, in Alma, could the Minister tell us if steps will soon be taken for the establishment of a local office or of an information centre either in Chapais or in Chibougamau?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REASON FOR RESHOWING OF PROGRAM, "ENCOUNTER WITH CANCER"

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. In the minister's capacity as being responsible for the CBC, did he communicate to the proper executives of the CBC the concern of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Canadian Medical Association and the National Cancer Institute about the re-showing of the program which indicated that the drug laetrile may be a helpful cure for cancer?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated before, representations that I received from a variety of sources about that particular program were transmitted to the corporation. I also believe it is correct to say that the Minister of National Health and Welfare spoke directly to the president of the corporation.

Mr. Gillies: Can the Secretary of State advise the House the possible reason the executive of the CBC gave for showing the program in spite of all the indications from authorities that this program could do immense damage to people who may be suffering from cancer?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, It is not a new doctrine that the corporation is entirely responsible for decisions of programming. That is a principle that has been respected on both sides of the House ever since the corporation was set up. On its behalf, I should like to table a statement covering the reasons for showing the program the second time.

HOGS—REQUEST FOR CONSULTATION WITH PRODUCERS ON IMPORTS AND DIFFICULTY IN OBTAINING EXPORT PERMITS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the provincial hog marketing agencies of the three prairie provinces have asked the minister, through telegrams, letters and phone calls for some time now, for a rehearing at which they would like to discuss the importation of hogs into Canada, as well as the difficulty that they are experiencing in obtaining export permits from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, would the minister indicate whether he is planning to meet with representatives of these agencies, and will he be able to give them an indication of the government's position on the two issues I have mentioned?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I know some representations have been made. The deputy minister of agriculture recently made a tour of the western provinces and met with the deputy ministers of the provinces. I was in touch with him just before coming into the House today. I point out that we have not filled our quotas for the export of hogs to the United States at the present time. Indeed, there is a shortage of high quality pork products in Canada at the present time. I believe the price in Toronto yesterday was $64 a hundredweight.

Mr. Epp: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the question that I asked the minister, would he indicate whether he will meet with the representatives who have asked to meet him to discuss the difficulties that these agencies are experiencing?

Mr. Whelan: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

SOCIETY FOR THE STUDY OF THE HERITAGE OF CANADA

REASON FOR PAYMENT TO SOCIETY TO COMPENSATE FOR USE OF NAME "HERITAGE CANADA"

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Would the minister inform the House why his department found it necessary to pay approximately $80,000 to the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada so that his department could use the name "Heritage Canada", in view of the fact that his department awarded over half a million dollars in grants to this society, which surely should have been adequate recompense for the name?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I will have to look into that question, Mr. Speaker.

STATUS OF WOMEN

REASON FOR DELAY OF MEASURE TO PROVIDE EQUALITY OF STATUS FOR MALE AND FEMALE PERSONS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that this is International Women's Year and the minister has recently told the entire nation that the House now has before it a bill to provide equality of status for male and female persons, would the minister now tell the House when we will be able to debate this measure and perhaps institute it into law?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would have to refer that question to my colleague the House leader. I have been urging him to bring the legislation forward for second reading as soon as possible, and the President of the Privy Council said that he had this in mind, provided he could get agreement from the other House leaders. I will leave the matter to the House leader.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the House leader? Not only is this part of the session drawing to a close, but International Women's Year is half over. This legislation has been on the order paper since October 8, 1974, so when does the minister plan on bringing it forward for second reading so we can get with it?

[Mr. Whelan.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, we have had some difficulty in getting through our legislative program because the opposition—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: —has insisted on debating some issues at what I think has been an inordinate length. However, I am doing my very best, and with the co-operation of the hon. member's friends on the other side of the House we could bring the measure forward and deal with it quickly, I am sure. I just urge him to get his colleagues to co-operate in other respects.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SUGGESTION HILTON NEGOTIATING WITH CBC FOR SPACE IN CHATEAU LAURIER—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION AND REPORT

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that I should like to direct to the Minister of Transport. It deals with the possible takeover by Hilton of certain CN hotels. In view of the Minister's statement in the House on February 12, 1975, as reported at page 3154 of Hansard, that "There is no doubt in my mind that CN cannot make a deal with the hotels without the approbation of the Government of Canada", would the minister advise the House whether he is aware that the CBC, which leases space in the Chateau Laurier, has just concluded lease arrangements for future occupation in the Chateau Laurier, and that these negotiations were carried out between the CBC and Hilton, not the CBC and the Chateau?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that. These are normal negotiations that are taking place in all cases where Hilton has the responsibility of administering the hotel. I do not think the Chateau Laurier is one of Hilton's.

Mr. Rodriguez: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that Hilton Hotels is not responsible for the management of the Chateau Laurier, would the minister investigate the situation and report to the House?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I cannot investigate all of the hotels, but if it is of interest to the hon. member I will do it with pleasure.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NEW POLICY PROTECTS CROWSNEST PASS RATES

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Has he the complete agreement of the Minister of Justice regarding the new national transportation policy that he is going to bring down, and is the sanctity of the Crowsnest pass rates protected in that new transportation policy?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think we are still having some discussions regarding the general policy and the Minister of Justice has written me a letter commenting on the document. I will see what the cabinet is going to decide about that. As far as the Crowsnest pass rates are concerned, I have said, so many times in this House, what I think about them that I do not think I have to repeat myself.

Mr. Horner: A short supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can I assume from the minister's remarks—I have always had confidence in his view of the Crownest pass rates—that he is still fighting with the Minister of Justice, and that the Minister of Justice still wants to destroy those rates?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Minister of Justice wants to destroy anything. I think he is trying to protect the western farmers and I support him in his efforts.

MANPOWER

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION IN VIEW OF ALLEGED STATEMENTS BY VANCOUVER CO-ORDINATOR

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of charges of patronage in connection with the awarding of OFY grants levelled by a Vancouver alderman last week, and an admission by the program co-ordinator in Vancouver that they try to keep patronage to 12 per cent in British Columbia and to 25 per cent in Quebec, and in view of the fact that delay in cabinet approval of the program results in hasty decisions on applications and the awarding of funds only to people with the ability to find their way through the process, would the minister call for an immediate investigation into the OFY mess?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not know one comment that the hon. member made in his preamble to the question that has any validity whatsoever, and I see no reason for an investigation on that basis.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a brief question of privilege. With the greatest respect to Your Honour, I think that when a member is recognized for the purpose of asking a supplementary question, he should be given the courtesy of completing his question before another member is called upon.

Mr. Speaker: With due respect to the hon. member, his difficulty arose from the fact that he was attempting to say that the answer that had been given by the minister was not an answer. It was, therefore, difficult to recognize him to continue with a supplementary in those circumstances. I think that the hon. member is the author of his own misfortune.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PRIVILEGE

MR. KAPLAN—PROCEDURE FOLLOWED IN STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I have given you notice. Yesterday in Hansard, as reported at page 5915, column two, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) accused me of obstructing the work of the House finance committee, which I chair. He said:

> This obstruction was carried out on Thursday, May 15, by the newly elected chairman, the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan)—

The issue before me, Mr. Speaker, was whether there was a quorum to vote an estimate. I followed the Standing Order, pursuant to which there was no quorum present, and held that I could not put the question. This is the conduct which the hon. member characterizes as obstruction. The hon. member has accused me in committee of being biased, high-handed, autocratic and of twisting the rules.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1500)

Mr. Kaplan: I reject all these descriptions as unjustified and totally misrepresentative of my conduct, and offensive to me as a member of parliament. The quorum rule of our committee is clear, and it is in writing and I applied it. Anyone is entitled to disagree with the ruling of the Chair, but accusations of obstruction put my chairmanship in question, especially on my first day on the job. I would accept the apology in the House of the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kaplan: If you find this is a prima facie case of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin):

> That the question of my chairmanship ruling as to a quorum in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, as referred to by the hon. member for York-Simcoe in Hansard on May 20, 1975, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not know whether there are other members who want to contribute to this very interesting question of privilege, but I would propose to re-examine the words of the hon. member and the comments of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), who allegedly made the remarks initially, and give the matter some consideration before making a ruling.

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to rise on a point of order at this time, but I was not at all clear, from the answer given me at the close of the question period by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), whether he is in disagreement with a statement made by his officials in Vancouver concerning the OFY program. I understood him to say that he was not sure about the validity of my comments. Let me point out that I was merely asking the minister to conduct an investigation in order to find out if there is validity in them, and if they are valid then there is truly a mess.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not do this in a frivolous way, but I wonder whether Your Honour could investigate to see if there is a plot afoot by the government House leader to literally smoke us out by turning off the air-conditioning.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF FEDERAL INVESTIGATION OF SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like at this time to make a statement with regard to the SIU. With the indulgence of the House, I will try to be as brief as possible but the House will recognize that this has been an important area of discussion for some months.

I would like to advise the House that I have ordered a further investigation of the Seafarers' International Union under powers conferred on me in section 196 of part V of the Canada Labour Code. This further investigation results from new material which was turned over to me by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) on April 29.

It is important that this investigation be viewed in its proper perspective. This requires a full knowledge of the sequence of events that transpired at both the Ontario provincial and federal levels since April, 1974, when the Metropolitan Toronto Police and the Ontario Provincial Police launched an investigation into allegations affecting the Seafarers' International Union.

The investigation in Ontario last year continued for eight months without publicity. Then, on November 19, in the Ontario legislature, the MPP for High Park, Dr. Morton Shulman, made a speech in which he alleged that violence and intimidation were rampant within the SIU, that union elections were not being held in an open and democratic way, and that many other illegal and corrupt practices occurred within that union.

As soon as I saw the press reports of Dr. Shulman's speech, I requested that he turn over to me any information or evidence he might have to substantiate his charges, which I regarded as extremely serious. Reference to my response to the Shulman allegations was made in the Ontario legislature on November 22, 1974, by the Attorney General of Ontario, the Hon. Robert Welch, who said he had heard two news reports referring to my request for specific factual information from Dr. Shulman.

On the same day, November 22, criminal charges following from the eight months of police investigation into the SIU were finally laid. The Ontario authorities laid five charges, and all were related to one incident that took place in an SIU hall. Two of the charges were subsequently dropped. The remaining three charges were processed by the Ontario government under the Criminal Code, and required no federal government involvement.

When several days passed without a response from Dr. Shulman to my request for the information he claimed to have, I phoned the then Solicitor General of Ontario, the Hon. George Kerr. I asked him to provide me with any information in his possession that would support the demand he and other spokesmen of the provincial government were making for a federal royal commission or judicial inquiry into the activities of the SIU.

May I remind the House that under the constitution, as the province of Ontario is fully aware, any wrongdoing that involves violation of the Criminal Code must be handled by the government of the province in which the alleged crimes were committed. This is the only level of government that can legally take action in this kind of situation. If, however, any alleged misconduct by SIU officers was in the area of industrial relations, then, of course, it would probably come under the Canada Labour Code since the SIU operates and bargains in an industry that falls under federal jurisdiction.

It was by no means clear at that time whether the allegations and investigations covered both spheres of activity, or were confined solely to Criminal Code matters; and the Ontario authorities had been strangely unhelpful in providing clarification. I told Mr. Kerr that I would very much like to see the results of inquiries into the SIU by the police forces of Ontario as they might relate to labour-management relations, and asked him to forward this information to me as soon as possible.

I was not, however, given the kind of co-operation I had the right to expect if I was to be able to judge for myself whether any federal action was called for. The Ontario government, for reasons I can only speculate about, continued to withhold its findings from us.

Nevertheless, Mr. Kerr repeated his demands for a federal investigation into the SIU, even though he admitted he had no new information to offer as the basis for such an inquiry, nor had he forwarded to us the information he already had in his files. In a reply to opposition questions in the legislature on December 9, 1974, he stated:

> As far as new information is concerned, I believe what the hon. member for High Park has indicated in his remarks in this House and the information that the police have, all of which is available to the federal officials, is really the information in toto.

During this period, frequent charges and insinuations of a federal government cover-up of the SIU matter were made in the House of Commons and in the media. There was, in fact, no cover-up. We simply had no information on which to act, other than that pertaining to the alleged criminal acts, which came strictly under provincial responsibility.

Even on the criminal aspects, we had only the sketchiest of information, and a special express letter promised December 9 and relayed by telephone from Mr. Kerr's office on December 11 added very little more to enlighten us. It was not until early in January that we obtained access to files of the Ontario police, when an official of the Department of Justice was dispatched to Toronto to examine them.

When certain affidavits alleging hiring hall irregularities were turned over to me on December 12, my deputy minister, at my request, directed officials of my department to undertake their own separate investigation, with specific reference to abuses of the hiring hall system. A Department of Labour officer was assigned December 23 and his investigation commenced on January 2, 1975.

The outcome of the justice department investigation, as the Minister of Justice disclosed on April 29, was that no further inquiry by his department was necessary in view of the evidence obtained by his officials. If there was to be a federal inquiry, it would be initiated by the labour department under the terms of the Canada Labour Code, and it would relate to industrial relations matters alone.

I have given this chronology of events to make it clear that at no time was there any attempt by this government to cover up, or stall, or whitewash in respect of alleged SIU wrongdoing. We could not, constitutionally or morally, have acted any differently or any more promptly on this matter, given the lack of sufficient evidence and information on which an earlier federal inquiry into SIU activities was demanded.

● (1510)

The terms of reference for this investigation are as follows:

The investigation group will examine allegations and evidence concerning practices followed by officers or persons associated with the Seafarers' International Union and will carry out such investigatory activity as it deems necessary in order to:

(a) determine whether there exist now or have occurred violations of part V of the Canada Labour Code and what they are, so that appropriate legal action may be taken, and

(b) provide detailed information upon which can be based a realistic assessment of the adequacy of existing provisions of part V of the code for protecting both individual rights and the public interest.

The investigation will be carried out under the authority of the Minister of Labour pursuant to section 196 of part V of the Canada Labour Code. It will require, in the first instance, the full co-operation of police forces that have already investigated aspects of allegations concerning the SIU in making available information already in their possession. I might add that the RCMP also have indicated they are prepared to co-operate with officials of my department in carrying out the terms of reference and the investigation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Too little, too late.

SIU

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that I received a copy of this excuse for a statement at approximately 17 minutes to three. I would not accept an apology from the minister even if he were to give one. I think this type of waiting until the last minute to give a copy to opposition spokesmen who are to reply is a matter which we on this side have continually reminded the government about. We do not like it.

As I look at the minister's statement, it appears to be one of the cheapest shots I have ever heard in all my short life. It is extremely partisan. He went into what he described as the strange action of the government of Ontario. That is the phrase which really brought me to my feet, "the strange action of the Ontario government". In the midst of an election year, the minister chronologically outlines an event, blaming everyone except himself for his ineptitude. I am very shocked at the way in which the minister conducted himself. All those backbenchers can laugh. They laugh at anything whether it is serious or not. This is a serious matter.

What this statement does is indicate that the minister did not have any knowledge concerning what to do until April 29. It also passes the buck to the province of Ontario. Finally, it makes up an excuse for the minister's own inaction. Mr. Speaker, this entire scenario, involving even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who did not want us to become involved because it would appear as if we were acting in a totalitarian way, involving the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) who procrastinated to some degree, and involving the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), has been nothing but an unwarranted delay and a callous disregard for the rights of individuals in respect of alleged union mismanagement. Under no circumstances, particularly in this country in 1975, should Canadians live in fear. Does the minister care? Will the hon. member opposite keep still, because he might learn something? Section 196 states:

> The minister, upon application or of his own initiative may do such things as to him seem likely to maintain or secure industrial peace and to promote conditions favourable to the settlement of industrial disputes or differences.

Here we have a minister who goes around the country talking about consensus in terms of industrial peace, while a matter has been sitting on his lap for almost a year. He turned a deaf ear to the pleas from the province of Ontario, a deaf ear to the opposition and to the people of Canada. It seems to me that the Minister of Labour ignored the legitimate request made by the province calling for a judicial inquiry and conveniently forgot that the federal government had established a federal commission of inquiry on Great Lakes shipping in 1962. He ignored the fact that Mr. Justice T. J. Norris recommended that the SIU be placed under federal trusteeship and that the federal government, after great political pressure, attempted to extradite Banks from the United States. The following is the advice given by Mr. Justice Norris:

> All police forces, federal, provincial and municipal, should extend their efforts to the utmost in co-operation with each other—avoiding jurisdictional jealousies—to the end that there shall be certainty in the enforcement of the law and that respect for the law will be maintained.

This was completely ignored by the minister. It is therefore easy to conclude that the government during this entire matter attempted to shift, and still does, all responsibility to the province, conveniently forgetting that it had a role to play in this very serious matter. There have been allegations for some time describing an atmosphere of tyranny and fear within the organization, with the executives riding roughshod over the rank and file members. There are allegations of violence, voting irregularities and improper hiring hall activities, all of which should have been dealt with long before this.

Now the minister comes before us and says that he could not move prior to April 29. The minister says that that is not true. He can think what he wants. All I know is that his statement speaks for itself. I let the minister carry on with his comments, but he has rudely interrupted me. The minister might at least have the decency to sit there and take his lumps. It is necessary that we who are couched with responsibility determine who controls the waterfront and, indeed, who controls the union and to what extent, particularly when it is alleged that there may be offshore interference.

I believe the terms of reference of the minister leave much to be desired. They are very restrictive. I do not know what they mean. It is difficult to understand what they mean. I will give the minister some advice in terms of what I think he should have spelled out. All of these allegations which have attracted public attention, not only those concerned with individual criminal occurrences but also those which unquestionably relate to the general conduct of the union, have a direct effect upon the civil rights, freedom of choice and working conditions of the members, and accordingly one can readily conclude that all the allegations are actually symptomatic of gross mismanagement of the union's affairs. This is one reason the inquiry is needed.

As far back as December 10, 1974, the province of Ontario made known its views. The minister says no, but I know there is a lot of hanky-panky which takes place. When the minister tells me that the province of Ontario will not co-operate, I say shame on the minister. He is attempting to shaft the province of Ontario just because it is preparing for an election. If one reads that statement very closely, one will notice that three of the six pages are taken up in blaming the province of Ontario for inaction. Let me say me say this without prejudging the matter.

● (1520)

An hon. Member: Here come the judge!

Mr. Alexander: I do not particularly like that comment. I advise the hon. member to be careful in the future because I am liable to take it the wrong way. I will not this time. The hon. member gets my point. If he does not, see me later on.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: Without prejudging this matter, I believe that trade unions must not only be above suspicion but must seem to be above suspicion. Accordingly, any legitimate union should not be adverse to having its affairs scrutinized. As a matter of fact, I believe the president has suggested that he would welcome any inquiry. I hope he still stands by those words, even though I may be paraphrasing them. Without restricting the generality of any terms of reference—and I do not accept the type of terms of reference which the minister indicated to us today—I believe such reference should include the following allegations: violence, intimidation, other criminal occurrences, voting irregularities, blacklisting, all hiring hall activities, the matter of dues, misuse of union funds, power struggles within the union dating from at least 1971, and political impropriety.

I should like to say, in conclusion, that we in this party ask, indeed demand, that any recommendation stemming from the inquiry be acted upon as expeditiously as possible in order to ensure that if this union has not been democratized, it will be, and if there are charges to be laid, they will be laid.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, here is a case which has been in the headlines every day for almost a year. Finally, after all these months, we get a statement and a proposal from the minister which I consider be one of the most disappointing I have ever heard from any minister in the years in which I have been in parliament. After all these months the minister has laboured and produced a mouse. The minister proposes to do as little as possible, certainly as little as he is legally required to do. The only way he could do less than he proposes would be to do nothing at all.

The minister is critical of the Ontario provincial government. He claims that they should have co-operated with the federal government and he deplores their failure to do so. If it is true that they have refused to co-operate with him and to supply him with information which they have, then I deplore their failure to co-operate with him. But having said that, I have to say to the minister that the terms of reference which he is giving to the investigating body which he proposes to set up are far too narrow.

That body should have the power to investigate all the allegations which have been made. I will not list them all, but let me give a few of the allegations that have been made: there was political patronage; there were illegal political contributions made to important members of parliament, probably to cabinet ministers; there was, and is, violence on the docks; seamen had been beaten up; there is a lack of democracy in the SIU. If the minister really wanted to know something about the SIU past and present, he did not have to appoint a commission. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) was a part of the team of lawyers who acted in the inquiry, the Norris commission, and I am sure he could have filled in the government quite extensively about the misdeeds of the SIU in the not too distant past.

The minister says that on the basis of a statement made on April 29, 1975, by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang)—I quote from page 5 of the minister's statement—it was decided not to proceed with the request by the Ontario government for an inquiry into allegations involving the SIU. The Minister of Justice said the evidence he had received did not warrant an inquiry and the Minister of Labour would have to decide whether an inquiry was justified under the Canada Labour Code.

In view of the fact that one of the allegations is that present ministers of the Crown in this government received large contributions from the SIU, I for one am pretty skeptical about any opinions expressed by the Minister of Justice. I would like to know who made the decision that the request by the Ontario government for an inquiry involving the SIU should not be proceeded with. Was it the Minister of Justice himself, or was it made on the basis of advice from the law officers of the department? I think this is a very important question that must be answered.

The Minister of Labour wanted the material which the Ontario solicitor general had dealing with the facts and allegations about the supposed misdeeds of the SIU. I think that was a legitimate request for him to make. I think the members of this House have a right to have placed on the record, and to have tabled, the report by the Minister of Justice or the report to the Minister of Justice by his law officers advising against proceeding in the way suggested by the Ontario government. I think the minister and the government should take steps to table that kind of information.

We believe that the terms of reference for this proposed investigation are far too restrictive. I can only conclude by saying that it is not too late for the minister and the government to broaden the terms of reference of the body set up to inquire into the matter, members of which would be named entirely by the government, or possibly an inquiry carried out by a board appointed jointly by the federal government and the government of Ontario, if that could be arranged. The terms of reference should be so broadened as to make it possible for all the allegations to be looked into. We hope that members of the board will be appointed as quickly as possible, and that the inquiry will be conducted as expeditiously as possible so that the public can know what truth, if any, there is in the many allegations of misdeeds in the application of justice in this respect.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I must say that I have no congratulations to offer to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) because while the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) complained of not having received the minister's statement earlier, we did not receive it in French. I wanted to mention this because before listening to his statement, I went to meet the people in charge; I told the minister that I needed a copy of his statement in French because I wanted to read this document before making my comments. I was told: "Sorry." They did not have the time, they are sorry! If this were the first time that this has happened, I would have kept quiet, but it is not the first time that we have not received a copy in French of statements made in the House by ministers. The government should at least stop broadcasting throughout the country that the bilingualism policy will soon be implemented across the country, and it should start by establishing bilingualism in Parliament so that the French-speaking members can be on the same level as their English-speaking colleagues and that, by ministers statements can be made available in French. I hope that this time we shall be heard because it is always disagreeable to come back to these matters.

I listened to the minister when he made his statement and when, as always, he put the blame on another government. He did not act because the Ontario government did not give him all he needed. The Ontario government may have its failings, but I believe that the minister of Labour also has some failings of his own as concerns large unions. I do not know if the Seafarers International Union is also an American subsidiary like the QFL is in the province of Quebec. We always have to depend on the Americans to have unions and, often, they have very close collusions with the people in government, which brings about the conflicts that we are now seeing throughout Canada, as well as in Quebec and as concerns the QFL. So much so that we must wonder which is the most rotten, unions or governments.

Even though there are complaints against multinational corporations, even though it is said that multinational corporations must be fought, in my opinion, parties such as the New Democratic Party or other parties, should denounce those multinational unions, those unions which are imported and cannot be checked by the government because their head is too far away.

I hope that the enquiry that the minister has at long last decided to order will be thorough and that it will require that, in the future, our Canadian unions become Canadian and to cease being American. I hope so because the difficulty for Quebec as well as Canada is always the same, so much that the QFL's contributions are sent to Washington. The Canadian government will have to demand of those unions that they become Canadian unions so that it may have better control over them and detect the trouble makers within their membership.

[English]

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Where is the minister?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask the minister one or two questions. I related to him certain matters which I thought should be included in the terms of reference but not restricting the generality of the overall picture. I would like to have the assurance of the minister that the reference includes looking into alleged matters of violence, intimidation, other criminal occurrences, voting irregularities, blacklisting, all hiring hall activities, the question of dues, misuse of union funds, power struggles from within the union dated from at least 1971, and political impropriety. Do all those matters come within the terms of reference which the minister has just laid before this House by way of a statement?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I would say yes to that question on the basis that, first, we refer to violations of part V of the Canada Labour Code and, second, we are asking those people investigating, including the RCMP, to tell us that if the Labour Code is ineffective in dealing with many of these matters and if its provisions are not adequate, to investigate in any event and advise what should be done with respect to strengthening the code to provide for all these types of alleged misconduct.

Mr. Alexander: Could the minister advise when the inquiry will be instituted; and in this regard will there be one commissioner involved or will there be two as suggested by the act?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): There will be officials of the Department of Labour and Mr. M. C. Carson, industry specialist, conciliation and arbitration branch. In addition, the deputy minister and the assistant deputy minister, Mr. W. B. Kelly, will be available at all times to provide support and additional resources as may be required, and I might say also that officials of the justice department will be available to co-operate with the RCMP in carrying out this further investigation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: The minister's answer to that last question of mine amazes me, because I can only come to the conclusion that this will be a complete whitewash. Did the minister not consider the advisability of appointing one or two independent persons as did the Minister of Transport, I believe, who brought in a third party not associated with his department or with the Minister of Justice? I am not imputing—

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Oh, no.

Mr. Alexander: I think it is up to me at least to speak on behalf of the Canadian people. The minister has just said that there will be members of his own department investigating, when there has been a cry across this land that there has been slowness on the part of the minister. Did he consider the appointment of one or two independent persons who could do this job, thereby giving us on this side the opportunity of saying that the minister is certainly on the right track? At this time we do not think so. Did the minister consider this, and what was the reason he did not pursue the appointment of independent inquiry commissioners?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): First, the Minister of Justice indicated that he felt, on the basis of information he had received and non the basis of initiatives taken by the federal government to obtain that information—information which was never turned over to us from the province—that an inquiry of that nature was not warranted. So we acted on our own in order to determine whether something should be done. The Minister of Justice then referred it to me on April 29. I considered the information and came to the conclusion that there were allegations contained therein which would warrant an investigation into the whole industrial relations aspect of this entire affair under the Canada Labour Code. I might add that it was something asked for by the Ontario government some months ago, but they never forwarded any information to us to back it up. On the basis of information we received on April 29, I decided to take action.

In answer to the hon. member's question, I think, with all respect, he is casting aspersions on certain public servants in the labour department.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. Alexander.]

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): They are responsible to you; you can shut them up.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The hon. member for Hamilton West talked about my interrupting him. He gave me a lecture on the impropriety of interruption, and now he proceeds to do it himself.

Mr. Alexander: I am sorry, sir.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I think that the integrity of the officials of the Ministry of Labour is above reproach. If the hon. member was not imputing motives, I will accept that; but in case there should be any question with respect to the impartiality of the investigation to be conducted, the officials are merely to help and assist the RCMP if required—and surely no member of this House, particularly the hon. member for Hamilton West, I take it, is questioning the entirely independent approach and thoroughness of the RCMP.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of very brief questions for the minister. I gave certain information to the minister last December involving some individuals in Montreal—I think their names were Baldo, Diamond and McGuire—who were apparently associated with the SIU and had criminal records. I also made information available about a couple of Toronto private detectives, Max Chofosky and Terry O'Reilly, shadowing SIU members. None of this information was incorrect, as far as I know, or ever denied. I wonder whether the minister did any investigating into this and whether he proposes, as the parliamentary secretary indicated last December, to consider making changes implicit in the grievance procedure in part V of the Canada Labour Code so there would be quicker and better remedies available to SIU members if they wished to bring grievances to the attention of the authorities, including the minister.

● (1540)

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, to answer the latter part of the hon. member's question first, I would indicate to him that I have already become convinced, and indicated so in the House several months ago, that when we have the next group of amendments to the Canada Labour Code it will include, hopefully, amendments correcting the potential abuses—they are all too potential—in the hiring hall type of system. I have come to that conclusion independent of these actions being taken now. The tendency may or may not be to verify and emphasize that type of action. We committed ourselves to action in this sense, in any event.

In respect of the other question, I think it was the Minister of Justice who indicated, in answer to a question asked in the House, that he would have these allegations investigated. This is his function, not mine. I can only assume, on the basis of the investigation that was conducted by the Minister of Justice, that this was taken into account. This is a confidential report which was turned over to me, and now I feel that further investigation is required under the Canada Labour Code.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the minister for taking this step. I should like to ask him if, within the parameters of the investigation, he is going to look into the hiring hall practices which Mr. Justice Norris questioned in 1962 and which were also brought up in this House on numerous occasions since then. Is he going to take steps to see, as far as possible, that people with criminal records are dissociated from the labour movement?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, as far as the former question is concerned, yes, I have already answered that. There are abuses that must be corrected with respect to the hiring hall type of situation, without imputing anything with reference to this particular union at this time because it is under investigation. I am totally satisfied on that particular score.

As far as preventing anyone with a criminal record from assuming elected office in a union, that raises very serious questions. I should like to consult with my colleagues in the government; certainly with the Minister of Justice. It involves the whole question of pardon, of the nature of the criminal offence and whether we are prepared to say that anyone with a criminal record can no longer be elected to a position in a union irrespective of what the offence may be. If you just say "a criminal offence", that is a rule we do not even apply to members of parliament. If you want to apply the type of broad brush to the union movement that you are not prepared to apply in this House, I do not think civil libertarians in this House would find it an acceptable procedure.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. To complete the questioning, I propose to see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the hon. member for Bellechasse, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham and the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask two questions, but perhaps I will just indicate the first one and concentrate on the second.

My first question had to do with what the minister meant by an "investigation group", which is the term he used in his statement concerning the inquiry that is to be made. To save time, I will say that the answer the minister has now given was not very satisfactory. We had hoped it would be an independent inquiry. It hardly seems to meet that specification to have an inquiry conducted, under the direction of the minister, by persons in his own department. One wonders whether that investigation group would have the authority of an inquiry with the right to call witnesses, examine them under oath, and so on.

My second question has to do with the material that was turned over to the Minister of Labour by the Minister of Justice on April 29. In his statements, the minister made a great deal of the unwillingness of the Ontario government to turn certain material over to him. I hope he is not going to play the same game with us; I hope he is prepared to table in this House the material that was turned over to him by the Minister of Justice on April 29. The minister referred to it in the first paragraph of his statement. He referred to it again in what I believe was the fourteenth paragraph of his statement. There is also a reference to that material in an appendix that was added to the statement, although I do not think that was added to Hansard.

May I put it to the minister in the form of a question, although I think Your Honour can see the makings of a point of order. Is the minister now prepared to table the material that was turned over to him by the Minister of Justice on April 29, 1975, on the basis of which he made the decision to set up this investigation group?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, if I may deal with the first part of the hon. member's comments first, let me make it quite clear that the RCMP will be conducting the investigation. Inasmuch as it deals with labour relations matters, they may wish assistance from officials of the Department of Labour; if they do, that assistance is available. The Department of Labour does not have an investigatory unit of its own with respect to violations of the Labour Code. It may be argued now or at a subsequent time in this House that we should have such a unit, but we do not.

I may say that the RCMP has considerable reluctance to enter areas that involved criminality because they feel that is completely within the jurisdiction of the provinces, the Ontario Provincial Police, the Quebec Provincial Police and other provincial police forces. I do not argue with that. Having read the report of April 29, however, it was my feeling that inasmuch as there were areas that affected industrial relations, then that was sufficient basis on which the RCMP could be called in to assist in the investigations. That general thesis was accepted by the commissioner of the RCMP and so they will be conducting the investigation, with assistance.

As far as the other question is concerned, whether this report of April 29 would be made public, if that is not a collective decision of the government at this time, certainly it emanated from an official of the Department of Justice who was called in to undertake this particular function. I think perhaps it would be proper to seek advice on this question from the Minister of Justice. I am going to add that in terms of my own view, of which I suppose there will be some considerable criticism, having seen the report of April 29 I know that the allegations are based on hearsay, which many of these investigation reports of necessity are. They are not the basis for laying charges; they are allegations which may cause suspicions to be aroused, but are not the basis upon which there would be any proof of criminality sufficient to condemn anyone in our democratic society.

Surely that is not the type of report which, for security reasons and reasons of pure natural justice, should be made public. That reputations would be irretrievably damaged without any substance sufficient for proof in a court of law, seems to me to be the overriding prohibition against documents of this kind being made public.

It was on the basis of this type of report that I came to the conclusion that the present action was warranted. If further investigations of the nature I have suggested here are made—going into allegations of this kind and finding out in the process of investigation that there is substance to them—I think we can count on the independence and thoroughness of the RCMP to recommend that appropriate action be taken either alone or in conjunction with the police forces of the provinces. I hope that answers the hon. member's question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order at this time, in accordance with the citation which says that the sort of point of order I am raising should be raised when a reference is made to certain documents. Perhaps we will not need to argue this until a later occasion, as the minister or some other minister may agree to table the documents. It seems to me, however, that this is an instance when the documents ought to be put on the table of the House. I draw to Your Honour's attention citation 159 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. Please take note of paragraph (2) which says:

> A minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he is prepared to lay it upon the table. This restraint is similar to the rule of evidence in courts of law, which prevent counsel from citing documents which have not been produced in evidence. The principle is so reasonable that it has not been contested; and when the objection has been made in time, it has been generally acquiesced in.

The first sentence of paragraph (4) says:

> Official papers quoted during a debate should be laid on the table of the House.

At the end of paragraph (4) Beauchesne says:

> Mr. Speaker ruled: "That the point of order was well taken, and that the papers cited by the honourable members for Essex and Northumberland should be placed in the possession of the House".

I had paragraph (5) in mind when I raised my point of order. It reads:

> The point of order, that a member should lay on the table a document which he quotes, should be taken when reference is made to the document.

May I point out that the Minister of Labour has based his whole case on documents which were turned over to him on April 29, 1975, by the Minister of Justice. He did not stand up and say he had made his own decision. The whole case is based on material supplied to him by the Minister of Justice, as set out in paragraph 1 of his statement which says:

> This further investigation results from new material which was turned over to me by the Minister of Justice on April 29.

Likewise, in paragraph 14 the minister said:

> The outcome of the justice department investigation, as the Minister of Justice disclosed on April 29, was that no further inquiry by his department was necessary in view of the evidence obtained by his officials. If there was to be a federal inquiry, it would be initiated by the labour department under the terms of the Canada Labour Code, and it would relate to industrial relations matters alone.

There is an appendix, or chronology, attached to the statement. On the last page, paragraph 18 again refers to material that was turned over to the Minister of Labour by the Minister of Justice. How can we assess the meaning of the minister's decision which he says is based on certain material if we do not have that material? It may well be, from what the minister said a moment ago, that after he discusses this question with the Minister of Justice or other officials he will come forward in a few days and table the document. That being the case, I do not see the need to argue the point extensively now. I want to enter this caveat, as it were: it seems clear from the citation and from our practices that the minister, having cited, having referred to or having based his decision on material which was turned over to him by the Minister of Justice on April 29, 1975, should let us see that material. I submit we are entitled to have it tabled in the House.

[Mr. Munro (Hamilton East).]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My understanding of the citation is similar to that expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in his first argument. He referred to Beauchesne and argued that when a minister has quoted from a statement, he must table it. This is similar to the rule applying in a court of law. According to that rule, a document which is cited must be filed. That is not an equation; it is a similarity. In a court of law, the rule is that the document which has been cited must be filed by counsel who quoted from it. In the House of Commons, the rule is that when a minister quotes from a document, he must table it. But the minister has not quoted from a document, although he made extensive references to it.

Unless I can be persuaded otherwise, it seems to me that an application should be made when the Minister of Justice is in the House for the tabling of these documents. I bring forward this argument so that hon. members may be forewarned and prepared to argue the point more extensively if it is raised when the Minister of Justice is in the House. At this time I would not, on the basis of the present argument, compel the Minister of Labour to table the document because he has not quoted from it. However, I leave the matter open for argument for when the Minister of Justice is in the House. The document was offered by that minister. If the hon. member wishes to raise the point at another time when the Minister of Justice is in the House, it can be argued more fully at that time.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to extend this discussion on the inquiry which has been announced by the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro). However, I would like to ask him three very precise questions, and I am satisfied that he will give proper answers.

When an inquiry is launched, it is because there are hidden facts which the public and Parliament must be made aware of. This is the reason for an inquiry. Then, I should believe that we will have a real inquiry, a thorough study and not a superficial inquiry.

Will the investigators have all the necessary powers to order public servants, employees of Seafarers' Union and also federal government employees, to appear and to make sworn statements?

Will there be an in-depth study in order to find out where the control the Seafarers' Union really lies, and whether financial contributions have been made to the electoral fund of any political party over the last few years and which might have interfered with the freedom of some members of parliament?

Will the inquiry commissionners be allowed to call the Minister of Labour as a witness, and in the affirmative, will the minister agree to appear?

Those are the three questions to which I should like to get an answer, in order to satisfy a little the needs of parliamentarians and of the Canadian people as a whole.

[English]

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this would be an inquiry which the RCMP would conduct in the same way as it conducts any other investigation. It would use various techniques at the disposal of the police. This does not involve the police force, in the normal investigation of matters, with power to call witnesses and force testimony under oath. They apply other methods in conducting an investigation. This investigation, I repeat, is being conducted by the RCMP.

Mr. Stanfield: In depth?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, I believe it will be an in-depth inquiry. There are matters here of a doubtful nature. Allegations are being made, according to information I received on April 29, which I considered ought to be dealt with. There should be an effort made to asertain whether these are valid allegations. If they are, they may warrant further action. They may warrant criminal charges being laid; that is possible. The investigation does not preclude that possibility, if these matters are to be looked into. This does not preclude the possibility that this matter may warrant a full-depth inquiry of the nature some hon. members of the House are calling for.

Mr. Stanfield: And who decides that?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The government of the day decides these questions.

Mr. Stanfield: They are still secret.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The Leader of the Opposition must be aware of this. This does not mean that my colleague, the Minister of Justice, is not determined to look at the material available. But that is not the basis on which a full inquiry should be conducted. In this country we do not have an inquisitorial type of justice. We do not have the possibility of undertaking some kind of search unless there is something substantive on which to base the search. That is why the RCMP have been called in. It is on the basis of information they received. As far as I am concerned, it is to determine, especially in those areas that deal with the full industrial relations sector, whether there is enough substance to any of those allegations to warrant further action along the lines recommended. I already indicated that we made the further conclusion with regard to hiring practices.

● (1600)

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I thank the hon. Minister for his answer. I now have a short question for him. Has the RCMP been given a deadline for its inquiry and report to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang)?

[English]

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, there is no set period of time when this matter will be in the hands of the RCMP. I can only hope, as does the House, that the RCMP will conduct their investigation with dispatch.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I do not think we fulfil our responsibilities in this House by beating around the bush as we have done this afternoon. There are two large "why's" that come out of this weak, vacillating, mealy-mouthed statement of the minister this afternoon. They both relate back to him and the extremely partisan, political way that he has conducted himself in this House. They relate back to serious allegations about a cozy relationship between this and other ministers with this particular union.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. When I hear statements like that from the hon. member who just sat down, I just shudder at the thought that he could occupy the position of attorney general of the province of Ontario. Allegations of cozy relationships and innuendoes with regard to my personal character are totally unwarranted. If the hon. member had the instinct of any responsible parliamentarian, instead of indulging in this type of filth he would be fully aware that the RCMP were called in to investigate these allegations of cozy relationships and bribes alleged by Dr. Shulman. All the federal officials, including the cabinet ministers named, were thoroughly investigated by the RCMP. The RCMP exonerated those officials of the charges. This champion of parliamentary democracy ignores the exoneration completely and reiterates charges that have been proved false. I think that type of conduct is disgraceful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The fact of the matter is that the new provisions under which we are operating do not provide for any further speeches or statements on the other side. We are in a period where questions can be put to the minister. This is not the time for representations. If the hon. member has questions, I ask him to put them.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, they both relate back to the same thing, the whole question here of that relationship. It is an admitted relationship. Let me just put my two questions. First, the RCMP obviously needs no directive or mandate from this particular minister to investigate the SIU. There is no question about that whatsoever. If it is an RCMP investigation, I simply ask the minister, why is it not the Department of Justice; why is it the Department of Labour? That is my principal question.

If it is a police investigation, why is it not a normal investigation? Why is it not a full-fledged inquiry? The minister has just indicated we are not going to have that. Is this inquiry going to be open? Is it going to be judicial? Are there going to be subpoena powers? Will they have the powers of contempt provisions? This all goes back to the fact that these are going to be civil servants under this particular minister. My first question is, why is it not a Department of Justice investigation? Why is it not a judicial inquiry? Why could they not find a judge, another Cliche, to do a proper job instead of a whitewash?

Under all these circumstances, and with all these serious allegations, the one remaining main question that the minister has not answered today is, why the delay in doing this? Why did they not do it a long time ago? If the minister does not like these imputations and allegations, then obviously the question still arises: the best way of defeating that type of thing last November when the issue first came up would have been to appoint a full-fledged inquiry, not a weak-kneed, mealy-mouthed thing nine or ten months after the issue first arose.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I will answer the series of questions the hon. member has just raised. Again, the hon. member asks why we did not conduct a full-fledged inquiry back when these matters were first raised. When he was attorney general of a province, if somebody made some charges which he would not even be able to see and which he would not be able to determine whether there was any foundation to them, would he run into the provincial legislature and appoint an inquiry? He would probably be one of the most outstandingly incompetent and unjust provincial attorneys general we have ever known. That is completely ridiculous.

The fact is, and the hon. member knows it, that when a government takes the responsibility for setting up a full-fledged inquiry which is an inquisitorial type of procedure—and the hon. member is aware of that—then in terms of political morality you have to be satisfied there is sufficient substance to the allegations to warrant an inquiry. If the hon. member wants to be sincere in these charges, he ought to look to his colleagues in the province. I gave this chronology for a purpose. This is a factual statement of the province's behaviour in making facts available to us upon which we could base any judgment for an inquiry. While there were cabinet ministers of a provincial government insisting in the provincial House on a federal inquiry, and while there were charges by Dr. Shulman, we immediately asked for the information upon which they were justifying the conclusion that the federal government, (a) should become involved, and (b) should have an inquiry.

Mr. Lawrence: You are involved.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Just a minute. They are the ones who are saying this. They are the ones who have the facts at their disposal which led them to that conclusion. The OPP and the metropolitan police were involved for months investigating the SIU. It seems entirely reasonable for the federal government to say, "If you are making these charges and suggesting there should be a federal inquiry, turn over to us all the information you have so that we can be in a similar position to make some judgment as to whether that type of action is warranted."

Indeed, weeks went by and we did not get the information. In the chronology here, there was a letter—I think it was dated December 11—which stated we should have a federal inquiry. They did not turn over any material or any of the facts on which they based their conclusion that there should be a federal inquiry. All these charges were being made about a cover-up and suggestions that there should be a federal inquiry. They kept laying it on the federal government, but at the same time they did not turn over any material. That is a pretty nice ploy, but I do not have to respect it and I do not respect it.

If they want the federal government to have an inquiry and institute what should be, in a democracy, a unique procedure in terms of an inquisitorial type of justice, they should be prepared to say they do not want to conduct the inquiry, they think we should do it, and give us the information they have which they think justifies undertaking that type of action. That did not occur.

What did occur? Since we did not get the information, we decided that something had to be done and that we should try to find out ourselves. A federal labour official looked into the affidavits that were turned over to us by a member or members of the opposition. Justice sent an official down to Toronto to see the relevant people in the police forces, and it was at that time, having sent our own officials and after repeated requests for information which went unanswered, that we started to get some information ourselves.

Mr. Lawrence: The files were turned over?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, they were, over a course of weeks. If my memory serves me correctly, the final updated report was some time in April and it was turned over to me on April 29. It was on the information that the federal people obtained that we decided to conduct this present investigation. If it had not been for the information that the federal people obtained, in my opinion to this day we still would have no facts provided by any inquiry conducted in Ontario on which to base an investigation. If that history of the situation does not leave serious questions regarding proper conduct on the part of the province of Ontario, then I do not know what does.

My hon. friend for Hamilton West has criticized me. Some of us have been criticized for months while innuendoes and slurs of all kinds have been made in regard to this situation, and I think the hon. member is fully aware of them. While they were being made, we tried to get the information that they already had in their possession so we could form some conclusions. The only conclusion we could come to was that we had to get this information ourselves, and that is what we proceeded to do in the discharge of my responsibility.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, it is already very hot in the chamber, so I will try and cool it down. I do not want to get the minister too flustered. We do not want to lose him for another month, although I do not think we would miss very much. I should like to ask a couple of brief but specific questions based on the premise that the inquiry will include looking at the voting regulations. Perhaps before putting my questions the minister could assure the House that the inquiry will include voting irregularities.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think voting irregularities would be included under both (a) and (b) of the terms of reference. The RCMP have been authorized not only to conduct an investigation as to any possible offences under the Canada Labour Code, but also to suggest where they feel no adequate protection is given by the Canada Labour Code against abuses of the nature described in this House on numerous occasions, and how the code can be strengthened.

Mr. Jelinek: Then based on that reply, which I am happy was an affirmative reply, I should like to question the legality of the present ratification of the union contract as well as the election of the president of the union.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Any questions hon. members put to the minister at the moment must relate to his statement or the investigation, the terms of reference and related matters, and not go beyond that to the affairs of the union itself, which is a substantive matter. If the hon. member has other questions to put to the minister about his statement or the investigation, he should do so now.

Mr. Jelinek: In that case, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can rephrase my question and ask the minister, when the inquiry looks into the irregularities of the ratification and the presidency of the union, will it also look into the way these votes took place? I have a number of affidavits, and it is a known fact that many members of the union were forced to vote in different places. For example, I have an affidavit which states:

I voted for the union president in four different halls for the same vote and about 35 to 40 others in my groups did the same.

As far as ratification of the contract is concerned, a group in one area voted nearly 100 per cent against it, yet it was passed. When they questioned the result of the vote, the union president told them that "it was too damned bad—accept it or leave it". I could go on to give further examples, but the question is: Will this inquiry have the power to prove the illegality of these two different points that I touched on, the ratification of the contract and the presidency of the union, and perhaps retroactively deal with voting procedures at the time the votes were taken?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Intimidation practices as a technique in the operation of the union, voting irregularities and that sort of thing, in my view are included within these terms of reference.

Mr. Jelinek: May I put a final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker? The minister did not say whether the possibility exists of doing these things illegally so far as the presidency and the contract are concerned. Can the minister assure the House that the police report will be tabled in the House, as well as a general report from the Solicitor General; and if not, why not?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated what my view would be with respect to the tabling of documents or information obtained in the normal investigative procedures used by the police. For one thing, I think the police themselves would find such a step abhorrent because it would totally undermine their investigatory role. Not only that, but horrendous damage could be done to an individual whose name might be mentioned but who is never charged because there is no substance to the allegations.

Mr. Stanfield: The police report to you.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, they do. There are many lawyers among the opposition ranks. For example, I think the hon. member for Calgary North would be shocked at the proposal that reports resulting from investigations conducted by police forces should be tabled in the House. I cannot believe that any lawyer having an appreciation of civil liberties in this country would ever recommend such a step. In all the years I have been in the House, I cannot ever recall hearing anyone in the opposition recommend such a course.

Mr. Stanfield: That is why we have inquiries.

Mr. Jelinek: Would the minister answer as to the illegality of the situation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 1,115, 1,870, 1,881, 1,915, 1,974, 2,047, 2,051, 2,059, 2,064, 2,125, 2,179, 2,233, 2,296, 2,303, 2,332, 2,396, 2,433 and 2,435.

Mr. Speaker, if question No. 1,591 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call starred question No. 1,911?

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

"ILLUNGUAT" PROJECT

Question No. 1,115—Mr. Laprise:

Was the anthropology department of Laval University assigned the "Illunguat" project and, if so (a) was it completed (b) were the findings published (c) was a deadline set?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development as follows: The "Illunguat" project, which was to enable the Eskimos of New Québec to define and describe their housing requirements as demonstrated in a prototype house, was carried out by the Department of Anthropology of Laval University. This project was financed by a grant of $8,868, made under Part V, of the National Housing Act. The results of the project which has been completed, are in the form of plastic parts of a house and its furnishings, which may be arranged and rearranged as a prototype house depending upon the requirements of the inhabitant. An example of the project is available for viewing in the Quebec Regional Office of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Also, a complete set of the project is now available for use in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development Quebec Regional Office.

Order Paper Questions

CNR—ALCOHOL AND DRUG PROBLEMS OF EMPLOYEES

Question No. 1,870—Mr. Mazankowski:

For each year since 1968, how many employees of CNR have been under the influence of alcohol or drugs while subject to duty or on duty and, of these, how many have been (a) dismissed under Operating Rule "G" (b) reprimanded (c) dismissed, then reinstated because the appeal procedure found in favour of the employee?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: Statistics are available only in respect of employees (train and engine crews, yard crews, train dispatchers and telegraphers) subject to the Uniform Code of Operating Rules, of which Rule "G" is a part.

1970	9	0	2
1971	13	0	0
1972	14	2	6
1973	19	1	7
1974	32	3	8

PERSONNEL WHO SPEAK ARABIC

Question No. 1,881—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. How many personnel in (a) the Department of External Affairs (b) the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce (c) Canadian International Development Agency speak Arabic?

2. What efforts are being made to recruit personnel proficient in this language?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of Privy Council): 1 and 2. (a) There are presently six foreign service officers and one clerk who speak Arabic. In addition two officers are presently studying Arabic on a full-time basis each year prior to the annual examinations for the foreign service a recruitment exercise is conducted by all foreign service departments at Canadian universities. Department of External Affairs representatives on these recruitment tems encourage candidates with a facility in foreign languages to apply for the foreign service competition. Only candidates successful in this competition are offered employment as officers in the foreign service. Proficiency in any foreign language (including Arabic) does not guarantee the acceptance of any candidate applying to the foreign service. (b) Whenever it is considered necessary to recruit personnel speaking a specific language to augment the number already on staff, official recruitment procedures are followed. However, the department's continuing language training program assures a supply of persons trained in languages relevant to their duties abroad. In the next fiscal year four foreign service officers will begin training in the Arabic language. (c) Four employees speak Arabic. No efforts are presently being made to recruit personnel proficient in this language.

[Mr. Sharp.]

*CANADIAN OWNERSHIP OF CANADA'S NATURAL RESOURCE INDUSTRY

Question No. 1,911—Mr. Rynard:

1. Is it government policy to increase Canadian ownership of Canada's natural resource industry and, if so, in what way does Canada Development Corporation's declared plans for major additional investment in Canada through its marginal 30 per cent interest in Texas Gulf, whereby foreign equity in our resources will always increase at least twice as fast as Canada's own equity meet with this policy?

2. As opposed to direct investment should not this indirect sellout of Canada's natural resource industry by the Canada Development Corporation be examined by the Foreign Investment Review Board?

3. What assurance has the government that capital generated by the sale of Connaught facilities and real estate resources in Canada will not be siphoned off in Canada Development Corporation's investment programme?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Finance and Industry, Trade and Commerce as follows: 1. The government welcomes the propect of increased Canadian ownership of Canada's natural resources. The purchase by the Canada Development Corporation of 30 per cent of the shares of Texasgulf has helped to increase the Canadian ownership of that particular company which is one of the major developers of Canada's natural resources. This investment by the CDC will also indirectly increase Canada's equity in any future development undertaken by Texasgulf. Yes, it is government policy that Canadians should have greater participation in the ownership of Canada's natural resources. This is an objective which the government intends to pursue jointly with the provincial governments.

2. The proposed investment is not now reviewable under the Foreign Investment Review Act, and would not likely be reviewable following Second Proclamation of the Act.

3. Should certain Connaught facilities be sold it will be the responsibility of the Board of Directors of Connaught to decide how to use the proceeds of the sale. Furthermore, it is the CDC Board's responsibility to determine its investment program and the means to finance such program.

NEW BRUNSWICK—BREAKWATERS AND WHARFS

Question No. 1,915—Mr. Howie:

1. (a) What plans are underway to provide new breakwaters, wharfs and haulouts for New Brunswick fishermen (b) on what date will construction start (c) at what cost?

2. Are any new programmes to provide fishing vessel and gear improvement scheduled for this year or next?

3. Are there plans to implement an income stabilization plan for fishermen to ensure a reasonable average level of earnings?

4. Are there definite plans to ensure that Canadians have exclusive fishing rights within two hundred miles of Canadian shoreline?

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries): 1. (a) Plans are presently under way to provide two new breakwaters, seven new wharfs, and three haulouts at various locations in New Brunswick. (b) A work schedule for these projects is presently being developed by the Regional Small Craft Harbours Branch Office in Halifax, working in conjunction with the Department of Public Works. These projects are planned to be started and completed in the fiscal year 1975/76. (c) The cost of these projects is approximately $2,134,000. This amount does not include the maintenance and repair program.

2. A new vessel assistance program planned to include the modification and conversion of existing fishing vessels is currently being developed. There are no plans to provide assistance for gear improvement other than continuing research in this field.

3. The design of a program of income supplementation for needy fishermen, to replace the coverage for seasonal unemployment benefits provided by the Unemployment Insurance Commission, has been under study for some time. A number of options have been developed which, if acceptable for the clients, could be implemented as soon as an operational data base is fully in place. It is considered that the program selected must be integrated with programs being developed to rehabilitate the industry and trade based on the groundfish resources of the Atlantic coast.

4. Canada, at the United Nations Law of the Sea Conference, has been strongly advocating the concept of the economic zone, an area 188 miles wide beyond a 12 mile Territorial Sea, in which the coastal state would have sovereign rights over the exploitation and management of renewable and non-renewable resources as well as specified rights to control pollution and marine scientific research. With regard to fisheries jursidiction, Canada is also seeking rights over the resources of the continental shelf where the shelf extends beyond the limit of the economic zone and, in addition, is seeking protection for anadromous fish species, such as salmon, when they migrate beyond the economic zone of the state of origin.

COMMUNICATION TECHNOLOGY

Question No. 1,974—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Was a contract awarded to R.C.A. Ltd., Montreal, Quebec for experimental communication with the communication technology at a cost of $2,262,806?

2. What is the function of the procured experimental equipment?

3. What are expected benefits from such experimentation?

4. Does the Department of Supply and Services ever question the propriety of such contracts and contracts generally?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Supply and Services and Communications as follows: 1. A contract in that amount was awarded on October 2, 1974 to RCA Ltd. for existing electronic equipment, spares and data, modified in accordance with Department of Communications specifications, for use as part of the Remote User Experimental Terminals and Network Controls System of its Communications Technology Satellite.

2. The function of the equipment is to transmit signals to and receive signals from the Communications Technology Satellite (CTS). It forms part of the earth station complex required for the experimental use of the satellite.

3. The CTS Program is a joint Canadian/U.S.A. program involving the use of increased power in the satellite to permit the use of smaller, lower cost earth terminals. Canadian objectives are to assess the possible applications of such high power communications satellites, to develop and test the techniques and equipment required, and to develop the capability of Canadian industry to meet Canada's requirements for satellite communications systems in general.

4. The need for goods and services is established by the customer departments. The propriety of the price and other contract conditions is carefully examined, questioned and supported by officers of the department of Supply and Services prior to issuing contracts.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS OFFICE

Question No. 2,047—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

In the last fiscal year, what was the cost of operation of the Parliamentary Returns Office of the Department of External Affairs?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Department of External Affairs does not have a Parliamentary Returns Office identified as such. Parliamentary returns are among the duties of departmental officials regularly assigned to the Office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE—PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS OFFICE

Question No. 2,051—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

In the last fiscal year, what was the cost of operation of the Parliamentary Returns Office of the Department of Justice?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): There is no Parliamentary Returns Office as such in the Department of Justice. Parliamentary returns are handled by members of the Departmental Secretariat.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS—PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS OFFICE

Question No. 2,059—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

In the last fiscal year, what was the cost of operation of the Parliamentary Returns Office of the Department of Public Works?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Fiscal year 1974/75 operating costs for the Parliamentary Returns Office were as follows: Salaries (two man years) and related costs, $29,465.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS OFFICE

Question No. 2,064—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

In the last fiscal year, what was the cost of operation of the Parliamentary Returns Office of the Department of Transport?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Fiscal year 1974-75: $36,000.

Order Paper Questions

ECONOMISTS EMPLOYED BY VARIOUS GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

Question No. 2,125—Mr. Stevens:

1. As of March 31, 1975, how many economists were employed by the (a) Department of Energy, Mines and Resources (b) Department of the Environment (c) Department of Finance (d) Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (e) Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce (f) Department of Regional Economic Expansion (g) Department of National Health and Welfare (h) Office of the Prime Minister (i) Economic Council of Canada?

2. In each case, what would have been their aggregate salaries if all were employed for a full year?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): 1 and 2. (a) 82, $2,017,882; (b) 163, $3,794,613; (c) 176, $3,639,992; (d) 72, $1,525,597; (e) 78, $1,858,450; (f) 82, $1,997,662; (g) 169, $3,223,912; (h) 2, $51,000; (i) 38, $809,349. The above answer refers to employees in the Economics, Sociology and Statistics Occupation Group (ES) and does not necessarily mean that all are economists.

OFF-SHORE DRILLING REGULATIONS

Question No. 2,179—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

What are the current regulations for off-shore drilling in northern waters with regard to (a) construction specifications (b) safety precautions (c) pollution control generally?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Environment as follows: (a) and (b) The regulations governing the construction specifications and safety precautions for drilling in the onshore as well as in the offshore regions of Northern Canada are contained in the following pieces of legislation: (1) Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act; (2) Canada Oil and Gas Drilling and Production Regulations, and Drafting of Revision of item 2) is underway for replacement by Spring 1976 by: (i) "Canada Oil and Gas Drilling Regulations" (onshore and offshore) and (ii) "Canada Oil and Gas Production Regulations" (onshore and offshore). (c) The primary legislation under which the Government of Canada regulates and controls oil and gas activities is the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act. The Canada Oil and Gas Drilling and Production Regulations have been passed under the Act to provide the basic framework of rules for the safety and effectiveness of operations at a wellsite. The primary legislation in regard to "land" administration are the Public Lands Grants Act and the Territorial Lands Act. The Canada Oil and Gas Land Regulations, promulgated under these Acts, stipulate the terms under which the oil and gas rights are made available for development. Statutory authority in regard to offshore deposits is given to the regulations under the former Act. The following statutes and regulations are also pertinent to the problem of pollution control; the Fisheries Act and the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act. The Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Regulations promulgated under the Act provides interpretation of (i) the terms "industrial and domestic waste", (ii) where the statute applies, for example, the Act does not apply to the deposit of waste by a ship, and (iii) the quantity of waste which can be deposited. The Canada Shipping Act also provides pollution control legislation with regards to ships. Under the Act, the Oil Pollution Prevention Regulations could be used for the control of vessels used in the exploitation or exploration of offshore mineral resources. The Migratory Birds Convention Act Regulations also contain sections for the control of pollution.

NOTE: A drilling authority issued by the Conservation Engineer designated under Item (1) and (2) is required for each well to be drilled in the northern offshore. Interdepartmental committees are established respectively in Ottawa Headquarters and in regional offices in Whitehorse and Yellowknife to ensure satisfaction of all legislation requirements in respect of (a) construction specifications of drilling, (b) safety precautions, (c) pollution control, and others.

FEDERAL DRUG PROSECUTORS FOR GUELPH, LONDON AND WINDSOR

Question No. 2,233—Mr. Beatty:

1. (a) What are the names of the federal drug prosecutors for (i) Guelph (ii) London (iii) Windsor (b) how many cases were prosecuted by each on behalf of the government (c) at what cost to the taxpayer?

2. In each case (a) what groups or individuals were asked to submit lists of recommended lawyers prior to the appointments being made (b) for each individual or group consulted who were the other lawyers recommended?

3. What criteria were employed in selecting lawyers to prosecute drug cases on behalf of the government?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): In so far as the Department of Justice is concerned: 1. See table below:

2 and 3. See answer to question No. 1,952, tabled June 13, 1973, p. 4705.

1. (a)	(b) 1973–74	1974–75	(b) 1973–74	1974–75 (to April 8)
(i) Smith, D.C.	250	231	$20,137.95	$15,086.83
(ii) McCuaig, R.G.	12	14	5,530.48	7,004.67
MacKewn, C.F.	11	14	8,567.00	12,549.16
Pensa, C.M.V.	*303	*49	14,741.17	14,022.16
(iii) Geddes, H .B.	*777	*1,383	39,047,53	41,864.56

*Information concerning number of cases for Pensa and Geddes, who had submitted bulk accounts, obtained from Health and Welfare, whose records were in respect of calendar years. Therefore, the figures are for the calendar years 1973 and 1974 respectively.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

CBC COVERAGE OF PRIME MINISTER'S TRIPS SINCE 1968

Question No. 2,296—Mr. Cossitt:

On how many trips outside Canada made by the Prime Minister since April 20, 1968 has he been accompanied or covered in any way by CBC personnel and, in each case (a) what was the place visited and the date of the visit (b) how many personnel were involved in any way?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: CBC records have not been maintained in a manner which would enable the corporation to extract readily and without an inordinate amount of work, time and cost, information on coverage of the Prime Minister's trips outside Canada in the last seven years.

TRANSLATION OF RARE BOOKS INTO ENGLISH

Question No. 2,303—Mr. Brisco:

Is federal assistance available to aid in the cost of translation of rare books from German, Italian or any other language, to English?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): No.

MR. IGOR GOUZENKO

Question No. 2,332—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What are all the reasons that a government pension was not given to Mr. Igor Gouzenko from 1946 up to the time the government of the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker took such action in 1962?

2. Is the government aware (a) that because of the special circumstances under which he must live, Mr. Gouzenko cannot earn income from regular employment (b) that his present pension income is inadequate to maintain a decent standard of living and that as a result of this he is indebted to a bank in the amount of thirteen thousand dollars (c) that the normal cost of living addition made to his pension has only been applicable for the past several years and is insufficient?

3. Has the government given serious consideration recently to the words of the 1946 Report of the Royal Commission on the Gouzenko case: "In our opinion Gouzenko by what he has done, has rendered great public service to the people of this country and thereby has placed Canada in his debt"?

4. Will the government increase Mr. Gouzenko's pension by an adequate amount?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): 1. From 1946 to 1962 Mr. Gouzenko was looked after entirely by the Canadian Government. Since 1962 he has been the recipient of a monthly stipend.

2. (a) Originally Mr. Gouzenko did live under special circumstances and there was fear for his life; however the security requirement has greatly diminished and there is now no reason for Mr. Gouzenko not to seek employment. (b) Mr. Gouzenko's present pension income is approximately $1,050.00 per month, tax free, which was approved by Treasury Board and is considered adequate. (c) The normal cost of living increases have been granted during the past several years and are in line with the average industrial wage for the particular area of his residence.

3. The words of the 1946 Report of the Royal Commission were appropriate at the time and the Canadian Government has provided adequate reward for his services.

4. Mr. Gouzenko's pension is reviewed annually and will be reviewed again in 1975 bearing in mind the cost of living and the average industrial wage increases for his particular area of residence.

ST. LAWRENCE ISLANDS NATIONAL PARK—FEES CHARGED FOR BOATS

Question No. 2,396—Mr. Cossitt:

1. In regard to the announcement by Parks Canada that fees would be charged for boats making use of government islands in the St. Lawrence Islands National Parks, how many (a) persons will be involved in collecting such fees (b) extra personnel will be hired as a result of the necessity of collecting such fees (c) boats will be used in regard to such collections (d) additional boats will have to be purchased?

2. What is the estimated annual cost including wages, use of boats and any other factors in collecting such fees from persons using the islands and what is the estimated annual amount of fees that will be collected?

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. (a) Three for a total of 1.2 man-years. (b) Three. (c) Two. (d) Two.

2. Estimated costs, $14,550; Estimated amount of annual fees collected, $52,000.

CONTAINER TRAFFIC

Question No. 2,433—Mr. Forrestall:

For each year 1968 to 1974 inclusive, for the Ports of Halifax, Saint John, Quebec and Montreal, what was (a) the container traffic handled in terms of (i) tonnage (ii) total tonnage by percentage (b) the total tonnage carried or handled in container traffic?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows:

5. (a) How many employees, full and part-time, are in CIDA (b) what are their salaries (c) what were their expenses in 1974?

6. What were CIDA's expenditures in 1974 and how much of this was (a) operating expenses (b) actual monies to companies or organizations?

Return tabled.

● (1620)

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to rise on a point of order, but this is in respect of a question answered yesterday, No. 2,030, which I placed on the order paper earlier this year. The question asked for information in respect of the names of lawyers acting in the constituency of Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo on behalf of CMHC. The return I received was signed by the minister for housing, but in the record I see that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs took responsibility for it.

My concern is that we have been told repeatedly in the House of Commons that there is no way a minister can be compelled during the oral question period to give adequate answers to question. It has been generally accepted that if questions are placed on the order paper it is incumbent upon the minister answering the questions to give honest and complete answers and, to the best of their ability, to give straightforward answers.

I cannot think of any more blatant example than the case of question 2,030 of a minister on several instances simply not addressing himself to the question I asked and where the answer he gave was very clearly misleading. I asked about the lawyers who were on the approved list for my constituency. He answered in respect of three counties but did not deal with the regional municipality of Waterloo at all.

There was no answer at all to question No. 2 respecting the names of lawyers now on the approved list with CMHC in my area, and no explanation was tendered as to why the answer was not given. There was no answer at all to part 2 of the first question asked, as to how much these lawyers were paid for work on behalf of the federal government; and once again there was no explanation tendered as to why the answer was not given. There was no answer in respect of question 4(a), as to whether government members were consulted about the appointment of lawyers in their constituencies. In fact, as this House knows, a copy of a letter sent by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs to Liberal members of parliament, Liberal representatives and party workers of constituencies not held by government members has been made public and it shows there was input from those sources. The minister refused to answer that part of the question.

There was no answer in respect of question 4(b), as to whether there was an attempt to consult with me in respect of the appointment of lawyers to act on behalf of CMHC in my constituency; and if not, why not. Obviously, I could have answered that question. No attempt was made. I think it is fair that we should expect, when questions are placed on the order paper, to get frank and honest answers to them. It is very obvious in this case that the government might have been embarrassed by the answers if they were given, but I do not think embarrassment constitutes an excuse for not giving the House answers or for giving answers which can only be seen as misleading. I think the public of Canada and the members of this House are entitled to more frank behaviour on the part of ministers of the Crown.

CITIZENSHIP ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CONDITIONS AND PROVISIONS GOVERNING CITIZENSHIP

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State) moved that Bill C-20, respecting citizenship, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

He said: Mr. Speaker, last October 10, Bill C-20, an act respecting citizenship, was given first reading. Today, as I propose the second reading of this bill, I believe it would be helpful if my remarks were to place the question of citizenship in as fully developed a context as possible. Accordingly, I should like first to situate the proposed legislation within the Canadian context by looking at the history of naturalization and citizenship laws in this country, and then to examine some of the specific provisions of the proposed legislation.

In proposing the second reading of the Canadian Citizenship Act in 1946, my predecessor, the Hon. Paul Martin, stated the case for establishing a distinct Canadian citizenship. He declared in part, and I should like to quote from his remarks of that day:

> The bill arises from the fact of pride, common pride, in the achievements of our country, based upon the great exploits of our people... For the national unity of Canada and for the future and greatness of this country, it is felt to be of the utmost importance that all of us, new Canadians or old, have a consciousness of a common purpose and common interests as Canadians; that all of us be able to say with pride and say with meaning: "I am a Canadian citizen".

In framing the Citizenship Act of 1947, the government was rightly concerned with the principle of citizenship that would be so defined and with the implications of that definition for Canadian society. With the principle of Canadian citizenship firmly established, we now focus attention on the process of acquiring citizenship. For our part, Mr. Speaker, one of the prime factors in determining the nature of this new citizenship legislation has been the government's concern for those individuals who will be most directly affected by it, namely, the potential citizens of this country.

The landed immigrant who makes the momentous decision to apply for Canadian citizenship testifies to his commitment to this country. He states he desires to join Canadian society formally so that he can participate fully in the Canadian community. In expressing the wish to adopt a new nationality, the potential citizen must place his case before the citizenship authorities. It seems only fair to that individual that he have a precise idea of the basis on which his case will be judged. For this reason, in drafting Bill C-20 we have made every attempt to make the whole process of becoming a citizen clear and straightforward.

The fundamental change in the proposed legislation is that the grant, retention, resumption or renunciation of citizenship is no longer a discretionary act on the part of the minister. Rather, it is made a right upon compliance with certain specific statutory requirements. This does not mean that anyone who knocks on our doors automatically has the right to become a citizen. It does mean that to obtain Canadian citizenship, an individual will go through a clear and straightforward process and, upon the fulfilment of certain conditions applicable to all persons, citizenship shall follow.

In its definition of citizenship as a qualified right, Bill C-20 represents the latest progressive step in the history of naturalization and citizenship laws in Canada. I believe it would be useful to review these steps very briefly so that the proposed legislation can be seen in the proper perspective.

Even before 1867, the various colonies which later formed the Dominion of Canada enacted legislation regarding the naturalization of aliens. A year after confederation, parliament passed legislation providing for one uniform law of naturalization. In 1881, the Canadian parliament passed its own Naturalization Act based upon the Imperial Naturalization Act of 1870 enacted by the United Kingdom parliament. However, the lack of uniformity in laws relating to citizenship and naturalization in the British Empire continued to cause difficulties. The Imperial Conference of 1911 agreed upon a number of basic principles for new imperial naturalization legislation. Among these, two in particular should be noted: one, imperial nationality should be worldwide and uniform; and two, there should be a five-year qualifying period.

In 1914, the legislation embodying the principles agreed upon was enacted by the United Kingdom parliament and by the Canadian parliament and subsequently by the legislatures of the other dominions. In Canada, the citizenship or nationality laws were determined by three statutes: the Canadian Immigration Act of 1910, designed to meet the needs of immigration and deportation; the Naturalization Act of 1914, adopted in order to meet the needs of imperial nationality; and the Canadian Nationals Act of 1921, enacted to meet the needs of participation in the international community, the League of Nations particularly.

It is interesting to note that not everyone who was a Canadian national under the Canadian Nationals Act was a Canadian under the Canadian Immigration Act and nowhere was provision made for Canadian citizenship. In 1930, these anomalies were brought forward and a report on nationality problems in Canada was presented to the secretary of state. A bill to revise and consolidate the laws of naturalization and citizenship was introduced in 1931 but was withdrawn before third reading.

Finally, in 1946, the secretary of state, the Hon. Paul Martin, introduced a new bill to revise and consolidate naturalization and citizenship laws and to introduce Canadian citizenship instead of British subject status or Canadian nationality. Proclaimed on January 21, 1947, the Canadian Citizenship Act, with some amendments, remains to this day. A progressive piece of legislation in its time, the present, much amended Citizenship Act has become complex and unwieldy, in certain respects illogical or not fully equitable, and somewhat out of tune with the times.

Mr. Speaker, the new citizenship bill represents a comprehensive revision of current citizenship legislation. I believe that on close examination it will be found to be an equitable, logical and liberal piece of legislation, reflecting the principles on which Canadian society has been founded. Let us turn to some of the specific changes proposed in the bill.

One aspect of the new bill which has been greeted favourably on all sides is its equal treatment of men and women. A few years ago, the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women pointed out five very important ways in which the present Citizenship Act discriminates against women. No one would claim that those who first framed the legislation set out to be deliberately discriminatory. However, in these five instances the legislation either makes special concessions to what the consciousness of the time termed the "weaker sex" or simply complies with then current international practice. The new citizenship bill corrects such discrimination.

Under the present act, only one year of residence is required by the alien wife of a Canadian husband wishing to become a citizen herself. On the other hand, the alien husband of a Canadian wife has to fulfill the full five-year requirement. Under the new bill, the wife or husband of a Canadian citizen must fulfill the standard residency requirement before obtaining citizenship. Secondly, under the present act, in most cases, only the father may apply on behalf of a minor child to obtain his citizenship. Under the new bill, either parent may make such an application. A similar arrangement exists for adoptive parents.

In the next two areas, some groups have suggested to us that retroactive legislation should be implemented to correct the discrimination. When the 1947 act was proclaimed, it did not restore the Canadian citizenship of Canadian women who had married aliens before 1947 and thus lost British subject status or Canadian nationality. Also, the present act does not permit the child born abroad of a Canadian mother and alien father to acquire his mother's citizenship, unless the birth is out of wedlock. In the first instance, it has been suggested that women who lost Canadian nationality through marriage before 1947 be proclaimed citizens retroactively. In the second case, it is suggested the children born abroad to Canadian mothers and alien fathers be retroactively proclaimed citizens. In our opinion, a retroactive citizenship law has unknown consequences. It could be as derogatory of right in some cases as the original law.

Let us look at a few examples, Mr. Speaker. Let us suppose that a Canadian woman married an alien in 1945. Let us further suppose that she has been living abroad now for several years and that she has acquired or inherited land in her husband's country. It is very common for countries to have laws which forbid land ownership by non-citizens. It does not take much to imagine the consequences for that woman if she suddenly learned that, without reference to her wishes, she now had been made a Canadian citizen retroactively for all these years. While we have not made the new bill retroactive, I think that we have solved this difficulty fairly. The new bill specifies that any alienated married woman whose British subject status or Canadian nationality was not restored in 1947 may simply notify the secretary of state of her wish to acquire it. By her own decision, she may become a Canadian citizen as soon as she can establish her identity. We are giving to the women I have described the option of themselves setting in motion the process which will make them citizens if they so choose. The matter is in their hands.

In the other case I mentioned, that of the child born abroad, the new bill will permit derivation of citizenship from either parent. Here, too, we felt the suggestion of retroactivity posed many difficulties. Let us suppose the child is now 18 or 19. He has lived in a foreign country all his life, speaks the language of that country and is now, for example, a partner in his father's business. One can well imagine the legal ramifications for that individual if, through enactment of a law in his mother's country, he suddenly became an alien in his country of birth.

The new citizenship bill is also more equitable in the fact that children born abroad are now given rights to citizenship equal to those of children born in Canada. As I mentioned earlier, according to the proposed legislation, children who are born abroad will derive Canadian citizenship through either parent in or out of wedlock. Related requirements in the current legislation have also been corrected. Current legislation stipulates that citizenship can be lost unless the birth of a child outside Canada is registered within two years and the child becomes resident in Canada by age 24. The proposed legislation eliminates the registration requirement, thus making the right to citizenship indefeasible in the first generation born abroad.

As well, the new bill passes the rights to citizenship conditionally to the second generation. In effect, clause 7 of the new bill provides that such a person in the second generation can retain citizenship if by the age of 28—that is, ten years after majority—he or she makes application to obtain citizenship and either resides in Canada for at least one year preceding the date of application or establishes a substantial connection in Canada.

Another change to Canada's citizenship law which has met with favour is the provision that the age of application for citizenship be reduced from 21 to 18 years. At the time the law was framed, 21 was a logical age, reflecting the age of voting and the age of majority recognized in most law. However, a person may now vote at the age of 18 in Canada. It seems illogical that the person coming to Canada from abroad may not become a citizen until the age of 21. This inconsistency has been set right in the new bill.

Le me deal now, Mr. Speaker, with two points about British subjects—points about which some confusion may exist. Under the present act, a British subject wishing to become a Canadian citizen has a much simpler road to follow than does an ordinary alien. He is not questioned on his knowledge of the responsibilities and privileges of citizenship. He is not tested on his knowledge of the English or French language. No interview is conducted to determine his character. He does not appear before a judge to take the oath of allegiance unless he himself requests it. Normally, he simply takes the oath before an examiner at the time of application.

Since one of the main reasons for drafting a new citizenship bill is to give this country citizenship legislation that is firmly based on principles of fairness, the preferential treatment of one group of potential citizens over another is no longer acceptable. For this reason, the privileged status formerly granted to British subjects has not been maintained in the new bill. British subjects will now be treated like other applicants.

Another point with regard to British subjects is the removal from the new bill of the phrase which appears in the present act "a Canadian citizen is a British subject". There are those who think that the removal of this phrase will mean that Canadians travelling abroad will no longer have the protection of British legations. This is not the case, Mr. Speaker. Canadian citizens now receive the protection of the British legation where no Canadian mission exists because the Canadian government has made arrangements with the United Kingdom for such services to be provided to Canadian citizens. Such services in no way depend on the fact that Canadian citizens are termed British subjects under the present Citizenship Act.

The phrase "a Canadian citizen is a British subject" was, in reality, a transitional one. Before 1947, every resident of a country that was part of the British Empire, or latterly, of the British Commonwealth, was designated a British subject. The Citizenship Act of 1947 was the first law passed in any Commonwealth country to create a citizenship separate from that of British subject. The old phrase "British subject" was kept on, as I said, transitionally. Since then, distinct citizenship has been adopted by most Commonwealth countries, including the United Kingdom itself.

What we are proposing now is to add a phrase to our citizenship law which recognize today's realities. In the new bill we have recognized the status of "citizen of the Commonwealth". In so doing, we acknowledge the ties of friendship that exist between Canada and all members of the British Commonwealth, not all of whom can any longer be properly designated by the term British subject. Furthermore, in recognizing this status the bill provides that the special status accorded to British subjects in any other Canadian legislation shall henceforth be applicable to all persons who are citizens of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Speaker, let us now look briefly at several measures which make Bill C-20 a more liberal piece of legislation than the current Citizenship Act. One such provision will make it possible for Canadian citizens who have been residing abroad and have lost their citizenship in one way or another over time to resume Canadian citizenship with one year's residence after they have become landed in Canada. It did not seem fair that a person who had qualified as a Canadian citizen and had resided here for many years, and had for some reason lived abroad for a while, would have to go through a long process all over again on his return to Canada. Consequently, we have made a change. Such a person may normally resume his citizenship if he again becomes landed and resides here for one year.

A second measure which liberalizes the approach to citizenship is the removal of the requirement that an unsuccessful applicant must wait two years before a new application can be considered. A provision of the present act, that waiting period may well have had an intimidating effect on potential citizens and in certain cases it may even have created hardship. If a person is genuinely mistaken when he applies at a time when he presumes he has achieved qualification, let us say in knowledge or language proficiency, there is no justification for withholding a subsequent application for a minimum period of two years. Therefore, in the proposed legislation the restriction has been removed.

Another of these liberal provisions—

Mr. Stanfield: I don't like the word. It is not a very good presentation.

Mr. Faulkner: Liberal with a small "l". Another of these liberal provisions is the reduction in the waiting period from five years to three. Rather surprisingly, Mr. Speaker, this is a change which has caused some discussion. We have received some letters claiming that people cannot acquire a genuine understanding of this country in anything less than five years. We have received others claiming that all immigrants are automatically going to become citizens after three years. Of course, neither of these contentions is true. On the contrary, some immigrants may want to wait 25 or even 30 years before acquiring citizenship. But for the many immigrants who do want to apply for citizenship as soon as their residency requirement has been fulfilled, five years seems an inordinately long time to wait.

Looking at the minimum waiting period, we felt that it was arbitrary and unfair to penalize those who feel themselves ready to apply before a five-year term is up. After all, we live in a society where highly sophisticated systems of telecommunications not only put us instantaneously in touch with events across the country but link us to events in the far corners of the earth and even beyond. The fact that such a wealth of information is so readily available to every potential citizen is a cogent argument for the reduction of the waiting period.

Another change which is proposed in the bill is the removal of the requirement that an applicant be "of good character".

Mr. Stanfield: Is that a liberal provision?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, I am most anxious that this change should not lead to any misunderstanding. A great deal of thought has gone into the proposal and I would now like to outline our reasoning. I said a little earlier that the fundamental change in the bill is that citizenship is made a right upon compliance with certain specific statutory requirements. If the seemingly simple notion of good character were to be retained, therefore, it would have to be somehow rendered into a measurable requirement. But that exercise is not quite as simple as determining a person's age or requiring a look at a birth certificate or immigration landing date, or even verifying the applicant's knowledge of Canada or of one of its official languages. Even these latter two can be tested uniformly. Language and knowledge tests abound in schools and universities and can be used as models. But character is not so easy; it is more nebulous; more likely to be left to arbitrary appreciation.

We have examined the idea of leaving the task, as at present, to our citizenship judges and letting them determine whether an applicant is of "good character". The problem there is that the phrase itself is open to so vast a range of interpretation as to make it no more than a subjective evaluation on the part of the citizenship judge, and thus to render its application as a standard requirement open to serious controversy. I am sure that if I ask each hon. member individually and privately how he or she would define the term "good character", I will get as many answers as there are individuals in he House. While citizenship judges may have interpreted the phrase with responsibility and good sense, nevertheless the fact remains that the application of the requirement has necessarily been an arbitrary thing, especially with regard to any distinction between public and private behaviour.

Mr. Speaker, leaving aside our technical problems for the moment, I ask the House to consider why we should try to test character in such a manner. After all, what is citizenship? It is the act of participating in a political system. Participation in Canada's economic and social systems are granted by residency, by simply being here legally. Very roughly stated, Canadian citizenship enables one to do several things: to vote; to run for public office; to carry a Canadian passport; to exercise certain activities where citizenship is a statutory prerequisite. It also allows one to enjoy an almost indefinable sense of belonging to, contributing to and participating in Canada. The conferring of citizenship is an enabling gesture on the part of the government to lift all barriers which stand in the way of the full political participation of an individual.

● (1650)

Citizenship is not a reward for good behaviour. It is not a prize to be awarded only to the more meritorious. The native born do all the things I listed a moment ago without any test of character. I have reached the conclusion that the broad character requirement in the present act is indefinable, unrealistic and unfair. As practised in the past and in any known design, it punishes, sometimes wrongfully, human behaviour not punishable by law. For these reasons, in Bill C-20 we have turned to the law. Instead of the nebulous phrase "good character", we have set down specific criteria which can be invoked without fear of abuse.

Under the new bill, certain sections of the Criminal Code and the Narcotics Control Act will provide these necessary guidelines. About these guidelines there can be no dispute. After all, a person either has done certain things or he has not; he is certain things or he is not. The law deals with law-breakers, native and foreign-born. The removal of the words "good character" is an important step in the direction away from arbitrary discretion. It is a step which is totally in keeping with the basic change of the new citizenship bill which redefines citizenship as a qualified right where certain stated conditions are satisfied.

Under present Canadian law, citizenship is, as I said, a grant made at the discretion of the minister. I think this discretion has been fairly administered over the years. In principle, though, if not in practice, such an approval allows for the imposition of conditions which are not stated in law. It permits the possibility of arbitrary exercise of authority without public or legislative sanction. The new citizenship bill corrects this situation. In the new bill, however, section 18 of the proposed legislation does grant discretion to the governor in council to refuse to grant citizenship or resumption of citizenship, or to recognize the renunciation of citizenship if it would be prejudicial to the security of Canada or contrary to public order in Canada. This, I believe, provides adequate and proper exceptional intervention in extreme cases.

Mr. Stanfield: No possibility of arbitrariness there.

Mr. Faulkner: The new bill also gives the minister and the cabinet certain positive discretionary powers. This means that the minister and the cabinet can forgive certain qualifications—

An hon. Member: That's right.

Mr. Faulkner: I wish the hon. member would pay some attention. This also means that the minister and the cabinet can reward people for special services to Canada and can relieve cases of particular hardship. I believe the House will agree that these provisions are necessary for dealing fairly with cases which may call for a humanitarian or generous decision. I am sure, as this bill goes to committee for study—

Mr. Epp: Not if we can help it.

Mr. Faulkner: I hope that is not the official position of the official opposition, but an insensitive reaction.

An hon. Member: You will find out.

Mr. Faulkner: I hope that when it does go to committee for study, many groups and individuals will follow with interest the progress of this legislation and the commentary it will no doubt provoke. That Bill C-20 will receive such public commentary from a wide cross-section of the population is hardly surprising, for what we are discussing is an issue which touches every Canadian.

It is the hope of the government that in removing the many inconsistencies and barriers existing under current legislation, the new bill will encourage potential citizens to acquire Canadian citizenship. It is with this hope in mind that I invite hon. members to lend their support to the proposed citizenship legislation and so join with the government in reaching out to potential citizens of Canada to issue, on behalf of the Canadian community, a gentle invitation to citizenship.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, every once in a while the purpose of a bill causes us to stand back and look at ourselves as a people. As to what citizenship really means, people will of course have different perceptions because of their differing experiences in Canada. The other day there was a seminar on, of all subjects, the governability of democracy. An assessment made by some of those who participated was that part of the problem about democracy and the fact that the question would even be raised was that some of the essential components are missing; that is, what I call a sense of purpose, a public philosophy, and if I can add one of my own, a sense of what citizenship entails. Indeed it is, as the minister said, a matter of right, with qualifications, by the statute but of course there are also complementary privileges and responsibilities.

I suppose I have the same difficulty speaking on an issue like this as most Canadians. Up to now we have been somewhat uncomfortable about defining what we mean by patriotism. To me, citizenship is precious. It is something which must be nurtured, valued and never cheapened. I have been reflecting, as I look at this bill, on some of the service rendered to Canada by our colleague, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). Of course history will have many things to say about this, but for my part as a Progressive Conservative it seems that the contribution the right hon. gentleman made to parliament and to the democratic process was that he substantially broadened the base of the party of which I have the privilege of being part.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: He made this party, the party I am speaking for today in this debate, more representative. Therefore, the corollary is that he improved the democratic process and broadened our citizenship. I remember the days of the debate on the Bill of Rights. Those of us who were brought up in the common law experience heard it repeated many times by our legal brethren that of course there was no need for a statute to embody these rights; we had always enjoyed them. We who were used to the British tradition had always enjoyed them, and the legislative enactment was merely puffery or surplus. Of course, the right hon. gentleman and the government of the day knew that for many Canadians who were not brought up in this tradition it was vital to have a code of rights, something for them to look to. So I want to say, as we deal with the broad principle of this bill, that citizenship and the whole matter of how we respond to it, of course, has different perceptions and different meanings depending upon our backgrounds.

The minister was good enough to say that he could not stay for my speech because of another engagement, but I have several things to say about the bill. I think that citizenship and immigration are linked. Whether they are linked now by statute or not, they are in the minds of most Canadians. After all, not so very long ago citizenship and immigration were the responsibility of one minister. It seems to me an anomalous situation that we should be debating Bill C-20 its whole purpose being citizenship, at the very time a special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons is going across the country gathering information on what the public feels about our immigration policy.

I have spoken to many of my colleagues who have had the privilege of being on this committee and hearing some of the representations, and in most cases no differentiation is made between citizenship and immigration. I suggest that it is both insensitive and bordering on contempt for the special joint committee to be debating this bill at the very moment the committee makes its progress across the country.

● (1700)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: I added in my notes that both these adjectives are not a rare characteristic of this government.

There are a couple of other things that I want to say, Mr. Speaker. One is that I think the provisions for allowing time in Canada—if one is in Canada illegally—to count is not helpful or, to use the minister's adjective, not a good liberal principle, with a small "l". Secondly, I think some of the comments made when the bill was introduced many months ago, that the whole citizenship court process may be speeded up can, if not carefully watched by the minister and his department, cheapen the granting of that very right and could be in danger of making the whole process like that of a sausage factory. None of us wishes this, and I want to enter a very special caveat—that whatever should be the future of this bill, one result should not be a sort of night court routine proceedings where people run up, sign the book and go on their way. Citizenship is precious, and cannot, and should not, be cheapened. It should transfuse our country and renew our country; I am certain that citizenship has immeasurably strengthened our country.

The minister has mentioned the discretion that he will enjoy and that cabinet will enjoy. I say to him with great respect that this is going to result in endless trouble for him. I will not count myself out, if I should be here, as one of those members who would wish to put pressure on the minister to exercise discretion. I have watched many ministers of citizenship during my 13 years in this House, and I think that at times the pressure upon them must have been intolerable because of this discretion. As a somewhat old-fashioned lawyer member of parliament, I would rather have jurisprudence than discretion governing the grant of citizenship. I prefer jurisprudence and an appeal procedure to a rather loosely-drawn system of discretion.

Mr. Stanfield: Even liberal.

Mr. Fairweather: Even liberal, as my leader says. As I mentioned earlier, our views on citizenship will differ. Our search for it has taken many forms in our literature. By a curious paradox, one of the most eloquent searches is in a book by a Canadian, Frederick Philip Grove, who I believe used to be at the University of Brandon. He wrote a book called "In Search of America" at a time when nationalism was not as rampant as it is at the present time. He reminded us that we should not spend so much time searching for our country because, after all, it is all about us. It is really the sightless or those who do not have any perspective of this country and what citizenship means who spend so much time searching for Canada. That is just a little extra, Mr. Speaker. I suppose when I am teaching Canadian literature I can use Frederick Philip Grove and that example, but I wanted to share it with the House this afternoon.

Canada, of course, is not an exclusive London Club type of place. The words qualifying citizenship, in my humble opinion, be they ethnic, be they naturalized or not, any word that qualifies our feelings for our brothers and sisters who are citizens is demeaning. After all, this inheritance is shared. As John Kennedy said about America once, this is a land of immigrants. I had an opportunity to visit the north and learn of the settlement of the north by the movement of the Innuit people across the Bering Sea. The same applies, of course, to the Indian people. I realize that none of us can claim any special privileges about citizenship because all of us at one time or another came here from somewhere else.

An editorial which appeared in the Windsor Star on October 17, 1974, had two sentences which I think are valid and relevant to this debate. The editorial said:

> Being a Canadian has become much more a source of pride in the past few years, particularly by comparison with other countries. We are losing our national diffidence, and it is only proper that the formalities of citizenship keep pace with the intangibles of pride and confidence.

I like that, Mr. Speaker, and I want to relate it to my hope that the granting of citizenship by our courts will continue to be a dignified and very special occasion for both the judge granting the privilege and the new citizen receiving it. As a member of parliament, I have witnessed this many times in the past. An editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail on June 4, 1974, said:

> It takes courage to pull up stakes, move perhaps half way around the world, and make a fresh start in an unfamiliar country. It is a gutsy kind of person who is ready to take on the daily challenge of coping with a new language, new laws and new customs for the sake of a better life for his family and himself. For Canada immigration has been more than just a source of population, it has been a supplier of a very special kind of people, generously endowed with initiative, boldness, creativity and the capacity to respond to challenge.

I hope this House feels that the comment by the Globe and Mail is an appropriate one to make as we discuss what I suggested earlier was an interlocking of the whole issue of immigration and citizenship. They are inextricably bound. As I said earlier, it is too bad that the bill is put forward now. It has been on the order paper since last October and is brought up now at the very moment the special joint committee is travelling across the country.

The bill is not all bad, however; there are some pluses. I take particular satisfaction in the fact that at last our men and women are treated equally. Women who lost citizenship by marrying foreign nationals under pre-1947 law can now recover their citizenship automatically. Children born abroad can derive citizenship in or out of marriage. This, of course, was the subject of one of the many recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. If I can be modest, it has been the subject matter of a private member's bill which I introduced in the last parliament. I am glad the government has responded. I think the government could have responded with a simple and amended bill—this remark applies to several other clauses—by virtue of which this and other anomalies could have been cleared up long ago.

● (1710)

The minister said that the old discrimination as between British subjects and immigrants from outside the Commonwealth is to be erased. He has given us an interpretation of the three-year formula. Presumably the qualifying time for the British is to be increased, and the five-year qualifying period for others—I suggest that the unpleasant word "others" should not occur in our present consideration—is to be decreased. These disparate qualifications are to be merged in the three-year term.

Many of my colleagues have raised in caucus, if I may let you in on a big secret, and in public discussion the reduction from 21 to 18 of the age for individual applications for citizenship. I suggest that the government has been very laggardly indeed about introducing this obvious provision. The provinces have long since reduced the age of majority and the Canada Elections Act did so several years ago. I think it is important for mature, adult people to be given the opportunity to make individual applications. The government's long delay in coming to grips with this problem has meant that the careers of many young men and women have been inhibited. They have not been able to engage in some of the careers enunciated by the minister in his speech.

I make the point that we all were immigrants once. I think it pertinent to quote part of a monthly pamphlet put out by the Royal Bank of Canada. I quote from the one of November, 1973. It says in part:

> By becoming a Canadian citizen a person shows that he is no longer satisfied to be merely a guest in the house where he lives but that he has, in fact, become one of the family.
> In primitive times, when a person sought to live in another group than his own, ceremonial rites of adoption were necessary. These rites were supposed to make the incoming individual a blood member of the new group.
> Citizenship implies acceptance of a code of behaviour, but that is only the starting point. It also gives one a set of anticipations and expectations.

I, for one, hope that the anticipations and expectations of those who come to this country will always be generously met. I hope that is how those will feel who have come to Canada and wish to adopt this as their own country. Nothing in recent Canadian history has troubled me more than recent manifestations of evil, of racist statements scrawled by cowards on walls of buildings, usually at night because the perpetrators of such crimes are not brave enough to do it in daylight. This subject will be considered by the special committee. I, personally, hope that this whole aspect, this wound on the fabric of Canada, will not be allowed to fester and that our federal and provincial governments will meet it head on.

I wish to read another passage into the record. It is by John Stuart Mill. This quotation is also contained in the monthly letter of the Royal Bank, that most farsighted Nova Scotia bank which is Halifax-based. It reads in part:

> John Stuart Mill, philosopher and economist, wrote in his essay on liberty: "The only freedom which deserves the name is that of pursuing our own good in our own way, so long as we do not attempt to deprive others of theirs, or impede their efforts to obtain it."

I assume that we are anxious to help others obtain it, "it" being citizenship. The House is no doubt anxious to hear from my colleagues who will want to participate in this debate. We will support the bill going to committee. My colleagues wish to say some things about the bill during the present stage of debate. They will make other suggestions to improve the bill when it is before the committee. Mr. Speaker, we will support Bill C-20 moving to Committee.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker,—

An hon. Member: You are the only NDP member present.

Mr. Symes: I see how crowded the benches are for this afternoon's important debate. On behalf of the NDP, I welcome Bill C-20, the new citizenship bill, for it removes many of the inequities and anomalies in existing citizenship legislation. This bill changes the whole situation. Previously, citizenship was a privilege, granted at the discretion of the minister. By virtue of this bill, citizenship becomes a right, available after fulfilment of specified conditions.

We entertain serious reservations about clause 33 which deals with non-citizen ownership of land. We shall explore this matter further in committee and ask the minister to clarify the provision, as it may conflict with provincial government legislation which has been passed in an attempt to restrict foreign ownership of provincial land. I shall discuss this in greater detail later.

I should be lacking in manners if I did not mention and pay tribute to a number of hon. members of this House, especially of my party, who have proposed a series of private members' bills designed to improve the old citizenship legislation which came into force in 1947 and has been amended 61 times. I refer to Bill C-260, standing in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the aim of which is to allow a child born outside Canada the right to claim Canadian citizenship through the mother. I am happy to note that this idea has been incorporated in Bill C-20.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre also proposed another private member's bill, C-317, the aim of which is to give the alien husband of a Canadian wife the same privileges as are given to an alien wife in the application for Canadian citizenship. I am happy to note that the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) in Bill C-283, for reducing the minimum residence requirement from five to three years, has been adopted. The proposal put forward by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre in his private member's public bill, C-319, has not been totally incorporated in Bill C-20. I urge the minister to consider the purpose of the hon. member's bill. The explanatory note reads in part:

> The purpose of this bill is to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act to provide that persons residing in Canada by virtue of a minister's permit—

The reference there is to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

> —may have such time of residence counted for purposes of qualifying as time of permanent residence for purposes of the act.

● (1720)

I see in Bill C-20 that the only credit given for people in those circumstances would be that each day in Canada would count as a half day toward fulfilling the residence requirement. I think a full-day provision is quite logical because many of the people here under minister's permits are in Canada under special circumstances. I think that time should be counted for them. As I said, I am happy to see that the ideas behind private members' bills are being incorporated in this new citizenship bill.

The minister briefly pointed out some of the changes in the legislation, changes that many members on all sides of the House have been urging on the government to bring about a greater degree of fairness in the Citizenship Act. We now know, of course, that the period of residence requirement to obtain citizenship will be reduce from five years to three. The age of majority is now reduced from 21 years to 18, and men and women will be treated equally. All applicants for Canadian citizenship will be required to meet the three years' residence qualification without regard to any marital connection with a citizen. Children born abroad will now derive citizenship from either parent. Either parent will be able to apply for citizenship on behalf of a minor child. Women who lost their Canadian citizenship through marriage to an alien prior to 1947 will be able to recover it automatically upon notice to the minister.

Under the new act, British subjects will no longer be exempt from the requirement to be examined by a citizenship judge or to attend a ceremony to take the oath of allegiance. I think those are measures that are quite fair and long overdue, especially the points that end the discrimination against women. That would make a former colleague of mine, Mrs. Grace MacInnis, very happy. When she was a member of this House, year after year she vigorously urged that discrimination against women in the Citizenship Act be ended.

I am also happy to see that we now have recognized citizenship judges by this bill. There are presently 21 such judges in Canada. Also, the bill now incorporates the right of appeal for an applicant against any decision granted by a citizenship judge. In the past we had the problem of a citizenship judge denying citizenship and the applicant having no right of appeal. The concept of appeal is one that is of long-standing in our democracy and legal system. I am happy to see that it is now restored in the aspects of granting of citizenship.

In one sense, this is a motherhood bill. It is something that all members can agree on—the need to reform and update our Citizenship Act. There is very little to be critical about. However, there is one clause that does concern me. I mentioned this at the outset. I refer to clause 33 of the bill. It applies to property, non-Canadian ownership of Canadian property, especially Canadian land. We have a concern on the part of the provinces, especially Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and indeed my own province of Ontario, about the degree of foreign ownership of provincial land. Because the federal government has failed to take any real initiative in this area, the provinces, which under the constitution have authority to regulate property, have been taking initiatives and passing bills to restrict non-resident, non-Canadian ownership of land. However, when we look at clause 33 we find the following:

33(1) Real and personal property of every description may be taken, acquired, held and disposed of by a person who is not a Canadian citizen in the same manner in all respects as by a Canadian citizen; and a title to real and personal property of every description may be derived through, from or in succession to a person who is not a Canadian citizen in the same manner in all respects as through, from or in succession to a Canadian citizen.

The only change in clause 33 in the old act is to change the word "aliens" to "persons not citizens". I am commenting on this clause because it has come to my attention that there have been meetings between federal and provincial officials that were set up after the first ministers' conference to study foreign ownership of land in Canada. In a confidential report it was recommended that the provinces be given the power to deal with non-resident ownership of land. I understand that a number of provinces have written to the federal government requesting that they be given this power, and the federal government has indicated that it is not prepared to move on the problem.

We have in clause 33, the property and citizenship clause, the same intent as the old act, allowing non-citizens to hold land unless that land has been set aside for Canadian citizens only under the terms of an act of the federal parliament. It is on this matter that I want to get clarification from the minister in committee. If the provinces are going to be thwarted in their attempt to regain control of provincial lands from foreign owners or to curtail foreigners from buying up recreational beaches and other prime land, and we have this clause 33, it could lead to very interesting legal interpretations and court cases by non-residents challenging provincial law. There is much danger in this clause, if it is what I think. That is why I want clarification on it from the minister in committee. Other than clause 33 and some of the provisions about qualifications for time and what can be counted as time of residence in Canada in order to qualify for the three-year period for citizenship, we think the bill is basically sound and worthy of support.

It has often been said that a nation can be defined as a group of people who have done great things together in the past and intend to do great things together in the future. No small part of that sense of nationhood, that sense of identity, unity, co-operation and accomplishment is the sense of citizenship. Citizenship gives a person a sense of belonging and participation, especially in regard to the most fundamental democratic right, that of voting. It also gives citizens a sense of obligation—to do their best to promote the well-being of their fellow citizens and their country.

● (1730)

For far too long we have had an identity crisis in Canada. We are not quite sure what it is to say, "I am a Canadian." Indeed, in the past many of the forms we have had to fill out in various areas of life have labelled us as British subjects or have said that our national origin had to be something other than Canadian. As we move toward this new Citizenship Act and the new concept of citizenship that is within it, we will find that there will result a greater realization of Canadian identity.

[Mr. Symes.]

For anyone who wants to experience what it means to be a Canadian, they should visit a citizenship court and watch the ceremony whereby new Canadians are finally recognized as citizens. I cannot think of a more impressive and moving ceremony than watching people from all lands throughout the world who qualify as Canadians standing to take the oath of allegiance and receiving their certificate as full fledged citizens of Canada. It is a most impressive sight, one I have witnessed on many occasions, and I commend it to all native-born Canadians.

In conclusion, we welcome Bill C-20 for its reform aspects. Except for clause 33, we think it is a good bill and we will promote its speedy passage through this parliament.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I was highly interested by the minister's presentation, and the amendments proposed in Bill C-20. Amendments bringing the Act into line with this country's image are long overdue. The minister briefly outlined the history of our citizenship law, starting from the old Naturalization Act dating back to 1881. In 1914, Parliament passed the first Canadian Citizenship Act proper.

In 1946 came the new act as we now know it. It dropped the words "British Dominion". Although improved, the 1946 Canadian Citizenship Act was much more representative that the former one, although it still included a number of discrepancies that could no longer remain in 1975. The minister recognizes that privileges are no longer defendable, and we are most satisfied. From now on, Canadian citizenship will be a right for every one wishing to settle or remain in Canada. With the voting of this new Act, Canada will become more adult, more humane and more civilized.

What I was most interested in was the list the Minister gave us of amendments proposed in the bill. He said the bill introduces equality of treatment for women. I am convinced the Canadian people as a whole will thank the Minister for finally dropping such discrimination.

Mr. Speaker, it would be unworthy of the Canadian people if our immigration laws maintained different status for women.

As a second amendment, the Minister referred to the wife's residence where the husband is a Canadian citizen. The wife coming back to Canada would have only one year to wait before obtaining the right to citizenship.

The greatest change brought about by the Minister is with regard to minors, enabling the parent to speak on behalf of his or her minor child. This is quite logical. Equality of status having been declared between man and woman, it was quite normal for minors that they also have the same privilege, having reached the age of 18.

A few years ago, the minimum voting age was lowered to 18 and, in my opinion, this amendment is quite logical. It is quite normal to want to give the status of major to an 18-year-old child, whereas he was recognized as such only when older under former legislation.

With regard to children born in a foreign country, in order for them to become Canadian citizens, be they born in or out of wedlock, it will always be the parent who is tutor of the child who will be responsible for him and who may ask for him to become a citizen. The same would apply for a Canadian who would have lost his Canadian citizenship outside of Canada and who would come back to Canada.

I have had such cases in the past and came to realize that it is very difficult for a Canadian to regain his Canadian citizenship.

With these amendments and those which I have noted as the Minister spoke as well as those contained in the legislation, this bill is quite acceptable, at least as far as our party is concerned, as well as for all other parties in the House, since that bill was long overdue.

With regard to British subjects, I am happy that the minister should now tell us that the privileges they formerly enjoyed upon arriving in Canada will no longer exist. In the future, they will be treated like all other citizens coming from France, Portugal or elsewhere.

One thing worries me, however. A few years ago, when I sat on the immigration committee, I became aware of the fact that throughout those years, a British subject could live and do business in Canada.

I even knew some who had been in Canada for 20 or 25 years without ever having obtained the right to Canadian citizenship. I have not read the bill clause by clause, but I wonder whether that type of case will still exist, because I fail to understand why a British immigrant who came to Canada to settle down, to live permanently should, under the terms of the old legislation, be free to become a Canadian citizen or remain a British subject. I hope that clause in the new bill will do away with that old privilege.

Finally, I thank the minister once more for having introduced Bill C-20. I trust that when it comes up for study in committee if indicated, it will be amended to make it Canada's very own so that we can say: At long last, we have an act that corresponds to the Canadian spirit. I am confident that all Canadian citizens, present and future, will be happy to be governed by this new Canadian Citizenship Act.

[English]

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-20 has been on the order paper for a number of months, and in rising to speak on it now I should like to point out very clearly that it does contain some good points which I will mention briefly. However, as in any legislation which contains negative points, we should also put those forward. I think it is incumbent on members of the opposition to bring those points forward in order that the debate can range over all parts of the bill and everything the bill encompasses can be brought to the public awareness, particularly the implications of the legislation.

There are several positive points in the bill to which reference has been made by most speakers. This is another case of the government presenting an omnibus bill, this one on citizenship, in order to get around other less palatable positions, therefore advancing the argument the government has used before, that if we are against certain parts or clauses, we must be against the whole thing and we are either reactionary, antediluvian or anti-something else—all of which I, personally, cannot accept.

The bill does contain certain positive points; for instance, equal treatment to men and women. For example, if an alien wife or a husband of a Canadian citizen wants to gain citizenship, he or she will be subject to the same waiting time. A father or a mother can apply to have a child registered as a Canadian citizen; the derivation of citizenship can come from either parent. Also, the reduction in the eligibility age for citizenship from 21 to 18 is a positive step, to my mind. I believe this change should have been brought in long before we saw Bill 20.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It should have been brought in under the elections act.

Mr. Epp: That is right, it should have been changed in the elections act. That is the proper place; not the Citizenship Act. This is really doing it after the fact. Having stressed the positive points, I should like to point out a number of things in this bill which do not have my support. Perhaps this big "if" should be put in the middle of my speech because these negative aspects in this omnibus type bill clearly weaken the bill itself. First of all, we should consider the minister who has brought this bill before the House. In my opinion, this minister has a tremendous record of failure. We must also consider the attitude he brings to legislation and his work in the House, which I cannot accept.

Let us look at some of his responsibilities. He brought in the OFY program, which has turned out to be an absolute disaster. This program was taken from his responsibility and placed under the direction of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. What has happened with the CBC and the type of stuff that has been appearing on that network as a result of a so-called humanistic philosophy? In my opinion, the minister's attitude in this regard is simply eroding the principles on which our society is based, yet when you ask questions of the minister or his appointees in the CBC you do not get answers. We are faced with silence or this minister and his appointees say that with our freedom of speech in this democracy we should not discuss such things. I am all for freedom of expression, but when the government uses the taxpayers' money I think it should be responsible for the views it projects.

The minister has been criticized almost as much by members on his own side of the House as those on this side in respect of the Time and Readers' Digest issue. The minister likes to use the word liberal with a small "l", but let me suggest that we can use the word with a capital "L" in reference to those who are sticking the knife in his back.

What happened to the immigration resettlement program? Earlier it was under the direction of the Secretary of State. That program has also been taken away from this minister. I suggest that was because he was not doing a good job. Yesterday, at the Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, we asked the minister why this program had been put into his department and he replied very clearly that it was in a mess and something had to be done, so he had to take it over. That is the record of this minister of citizenship. Now he is trying to lecture us on all the wonderful things he is going to do.

It is my belief that the minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) together are putting parts of this bill before Canadian society as another step toward eroding some of the principles that are directly related to many of the people in this country. I say that for a number of reasons which I will bring out in due course.

Immigration and citizenship are tied closely together; you cannot divorce one from the other. The joint committee studying the green paper on immigration has already held hearings in Quebec. A number of witnesses at those hearings, when speaking on various parts of the green paper, stressed the regulations governing citizenship and suggested that immigration and citizenship were inextricably linked. We do not have to go back many years to find that citizenship and immigration were under one department. The best thing that could happen would be for this minister to lose his entire responsibility, with citizenship being brought back to a department along with immigration where it rightfully belongs.

The committee that is now studying immigration will be going to Sudbury tomorrow and British Columbia next week. This government has stated on many occasions it is interested in having a public debate on this paper. It says it wants the opinion of Canadians regarding immigration. We in the opposition accept this idea. We have all seen articles in the newspapers stating that the government has already enunciated certain policies very clearly and that the cabinet has made certain decisions. The minister has said to the committee that this is not the case. Knowing he is a gentleman, I accept his explanation.

Now we have a bill before us which affects a large part of the discussions that are to take place in a public debate. I simply cannot understand why at this stage the government would bring forward this legislation. As far back as February 13, as recorded at page 3187 of Hansard, I asked the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) whether they would hold off Bill C-20 until such time as the public debate on immigration was ended. There is a relatively short time period; by July 31 we are to bring in a report. That is approximately 2½ months from now.

What is the rush now? If the government is sincere in wanting an official debate, surely it could wait until July 31 when the committee, with members from all parties, comes in with a recommendation or report regarding citizenship requirements. Surely that is a legitimate request. Back on February 13 I asked that question of the President of the Privy Council and in his answer he said in part:

I think it would be very useful to have a discussion going on in the House at the same time as the debate is going on regarding immigration, because—and here I agree with the hon. member—they are closely related and I think it would help to offset any idea that our immigration policy is directed against any particular group.

I plead with the government that, after the initial debate in which we are now engaged in this House, they hold off on this bill and give it a six months' hoist until such time as it has the input of Canadians that has been asked for in the green paper. In the matter of the reduction from five years to three years, the minister made much about the fact that five years is arbitrary. It is. But so is three years arbitrary.

Let us look at the qualifications of other countries, because it is my concept that citizenship is a privilege that a sovereign country gives to an individual who has come to that country, just as it is in respect of immigrants who come to this country such as my people and other people who are so-called ethnics—I do not like that term, but I shall use it—who feel that Canada gives them a new home and therefore they want to make a contribution. They do make a contribution and are loyal citizens of Canada, but now they are asking what is happening to this country.

There are certain principles involved. Let us look at the facts in respect of other countries. The residency qualification in the United States is five years. In Britain it is five years. In France it is five years. Belgium has two types of residency requirement. The first is that one can obtain citizenship in three years if one has lived in Belgium before age 14, as a minor; but then it is six years after age 14. What rights does one have? This only gives one working and living privileges; that is all.

Then there is another qualification, that if you want full citizenship rights in Belgium you must have lived there for ten years and must be over age 25. One can then vote in Belgium. This is arbitrary, Mr. Speaker. What about West Germany? Citizenship there is determined by the province in which one resides, but the shortest period of time in which one can obtain citizenship is five years. In other cases the period can be as long as ten years. What about Switzerland? The period there is 12 years and the last six must be consecutive. What about Sweden? The law in Sweden states that the period is seven years but that one can apply after three or four years' residency and then the individual case is judged on its merits.

In Australia, the period is three years. In New Zealand, citizenship is at the discretion of the minister of internal affairs. All cases are judged on their merits. For non-British subjects generally the period is five years, and there is a preference for British subjects. When you get to places like Yugoslavia, the U.S.S.R. and some other iron curtain countries, you can apply for citizenship after you arrive in the country but to get there and obtain a visa is not very easy.

We must remember that Canada is a country which has welcomed immigrants. Last year there were 218,000. There is one country in Europe which already has a one-year residency requirement, The Netherlands; but if one checks the situation and looks at the number of immigrants into that country you find that there is hardly any immigration there. So I wonder at this point whether the question is academic. When the minister appears before this House and says that five years is arbitrary, I say that three years is every bit as arbitrary.

An hon. Member: What is the answer?

Mr. Epp: The answer is that citizenship is worth something and is a privilege that is bestowed on us by a sovereign country. Almost all of us in this country were immigrants at one time and had to go through a five-year period, and if you talk to many of these people they will tell you that they think the five-year period is not a hardship at all. They ask, why the change? They wonder whether it is simply a compromise in respect of the law concerning British subjects or what is the reason for the government changing the five-year period to three years.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED RESCINDING OF GUIDELINES ON HOUSING AND EDUCATION PENDING CONSULTATIONS WITH NATIVE REPRESENTATIVES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has recently implemented policy guideline circulars effective April 1, 1975 affecting Indian rights and obligations, in view of the fact that there is evidence that these circulars have been rejected by all elected Indian leaders, and since funding from the department will be cut off to bands not abiding by the guidelines causing substantial apprehension and concern amongst our native peoples, as well as in view of the minister's statement in the House of Commons on May 6, 1975 that if the guidelines create difficulties and problems his department is prepared to change them, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development immediately rescind the policy guideline circulars respecting housing and education and immediately convene meetings with elected chiefs and their representative bodies to obtain a consensus on mutually satisfactory guidelines to replace the present unsatisfactory guidelines.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This motion proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED RE-INSTITUTION OF AHOP FUNDING FOR EXISTING HOUSING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I also rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that banks and other financial institutions have raised the mortgage rate and limited the funds available for mortgages for existing housing, and in view of the fact that CMHC has cut out all funding for existing housing under the Assisted Home Ownership Plan thereby discriminating against moderate income home buyers who are now forced to obtain mortgages at 15 per cent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan):

That this House instruct the Minister of State for Urban Affairs to re-institute AHOP funding for existing housing.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

REFERENCE TO PHOTOGRAPH IN MAGAZINE "NOUS"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion arising from the centrefold photograph in the June issue of the magazine Nous showing the Prime Minister of Canada and Mrs. Trudeau under the heading "The best dressed couple of the year" in their prize-winning outfits which consist only and entirely of Canada's honoured maple leaf questionably replacing the traditional fig leaf.

I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Mackenzie):

That the House requests the Prime Minister to make an immediate statement as to whether this photographic venture is part of a new government policy of full disclosure and complete revelation that will eventually lead to the uncovering of many hidden things, hopefully including Mr. Michael Pitfield.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

HEALTH

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ASSURE PROPER INSPECTION OF MEAT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In view of the obvious responsibility which he has under the Food and Drugs Act, can the minister assure the House that the confusion which exists now in connection with meat inspection in Quebec will not appear in other provinces also, which would have very dangerous implications for the health of Canadians?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition undoubtedly knows, meat inspection is carried out, in some cases, by the Department of Agriculture of Canada, in the case of companies exporting meat outside one province. When the meat is sold exclusively within one province, the inspection is performed by provincial officials, except when the provincial authorities have delegated their responsibility to the federal authority, which is the federal Department of Agriculture. When inspections are done by the provincial authorities, it is of course their duty to enforce the regulations that have been adopted. As regards the responsibility of my department, the Food and Drugs Act contains very clear provisions on that subject, as there are in other acts, like the Criminal Code, for instance, provisions prohibiting certain practices. It is impossible to eliminate prohibited practices completely, but it is possible to make sure that when violations are uncovered immediate action will be taken by the Department of Justice and the Attorneys General of the provinces in order to enforce the law very firmly.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the fact that it has been known to the minister and his department for more than two years that in Quebec some 300 meat processing outlets were not receiving adequate inspection under either federal or provincial programs, can the minister tell us what steps he took during that period to strengthen surveillance of those facilities by his officers under the Food and Drug Act?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: I am afraid that the hon. Leader of the Opposition is ill-informed as regards the responsibilities of my department, of the federal Department of Agriculture and of the provincial Departments of Agriculture. In cases where companies operate within one province only, the responsibility, in the case of Quebec, for instance, rests clearly with the provincial authorities.

As Minister of National Health and Welfare, I am not the one who has the primary responsibility for meat inspection at the slaughterhouses. All I can do is intervene under the provisions of the Food and Drugs Act. My officials are empowered to intervene under the provisions of the Food and Drugs Act whenever there are indications that certain measures should be taken. As for the case in point, it was as a result of steps taken by officials of my department that a police inquiry was held in Quebec concerning certain apparently shady operations, and the results of this inquiry are now in the process of being submitted to the Commission of Inquiry into organized crime in Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: I take it from what the minister says that despite his knowledge that a large number of plants in the province of Quebec—quite apart from his knowledge of what may be going on in the rest of Canada—were not subjected to adequate inspection despite the Food and Drugs Act that makes it a crime to hold or to market food unfit for consumption, and despite the responsibilities of the minister in connection with that act and the powers given his inspectors under it, the minister did not feel any responsibility in terms of the health of the Canadian people to take any initiative whatsoever to see that in fact inspection did take place and the situation corrected in these 300 or so uninspected meat processing plants?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: I am quite interested by the political speech made by the hon. Leader of the Opposition, but I am not at all impressed with his allegations. Two years ago this inquiry was undertaken at the instigation of officials of my department and, at the time, they acted on the basis of hearsay only. There were no specific indications of criminal activities. But as soon as such serious indications did come up, we asked the police authorities concerned to intervene and to take whatever action was necessary; and we have now the results before us today. Furthermore, I feel that I have no apologies to make to the hon. Leader of the Opposition for the work done by my officials in this regard.

[English]

REASON FOR FAILURE TO PROSECUTE QUEBEC MERCHANTS SELLING MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. The RCMP knew back in 1969 that there was meat unfit for human consumption being sold on the market, and this matter was raised in the Quebec legislature as early as 1966 by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Why has the minister not carried out the responsibility which is his under the Food and Drugs Act and taken action under that act, because it takes precedence over any provincial legislation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I certainly was not Minister of National Health and Welfare in 1966, and I surely could find some assertions or allegations made in various places in 1953 and 1942 on this matter. We have to act as a department on the basis of somewhat serious information, and that is what has been done as early as 1973, where there were indications on which we could base our inquiry. It is hard for me to believe that the allegations made by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe were taken seriously in 1966, any more than some others he has made since then.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: I regret very much that the minister finds this subject so humorous. I can assure him that the people of Quebec find it less than funny.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: On October 24, as recorded at page 693 of Hansard, when the minister covered himself with less than glory the last time there was contaminated meat sold on the market, he gave this undertaking:

—in any case where there is precise proof that meat unfit for human consumption has been sold, proceedings will be instituted under the regulations.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McGrath: He went on to say:

It will involve not only cases reported by my department's inspectors but also any one which might be spotted by any organization or any person.

Why did the minister not take action under the Food and Drugs Act immediately upon this matter being uncovered in the province of Quebec?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: For an excellent reason, Mr. Speaker. It is quite simple, it is because the inquiry initiated by my officials did not provide enough information to enable them to take any legal action against anybody; there were only indications and it was at that time that we got in touch with police authorities to ask them to make a full investigation. When the inquiry now under way, since we are still at the inquiry stage, even though it is a commission of inquiry—when the inquiry is completed, if there is enough evidence to warrant legal action, my colleague, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Justice of the Province of Quebec will surely be advised of the facts and will take legal action as provided under the law.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the minister is playing constitutional footsie with the government of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN NUMBER OF MEAT INSPECTORS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): In view of the widespread use of this practice of selling contaminated and diseased meat to the public, what is the minister doing now, in accordance with his authority under the statute, to increase the inspection capability under the Food and Drugs Act and to lay charges immediately?

● (1420)

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As I indicated last fall, Mr. Speaker, we have increased the number of inspections under the Food and Drugs Act. My colleague, the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), has over 1,200 officials throughout Canada who inspect meat, and the provincial authorities have also several hundreds of inspectors. As to the proceedings to be instituted, as I indicated yesterday, may I refer my hon. colleague to Hansard which he should at least make a point to read. An investigation is under way, and we have decided to postpone legal action so as not to cause prejudice to the current investigation. We shall try to get all the facts and, as soon as they are known, the necessary action will be taken.

ENERGY

OIL—POSSIBILITY OF CONCURRENCE IN PRICE INCREASE SUGGESTED BY ALBERTA—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW PRICE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources concerns the announcement by provincial energy minister Donald Getty that the Alberta government has set the price for oil at $9 to $10 per barrel subject to negotiations regarding the time period during which this will be implemented. Can the minister tell the House if this is a unilateral decision by the government of Alberta or whether the federal government has concurred and the target price is to be $9 to $10 per barrel subject to negotiation regarding the time frame during which such a price will be put into effect?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can say there has been no agreement on a specific price with the government of Alberta either for this year or a specific target price in the future. I think it is fair to say there is common ground between the two governments as to moving to a further level of price for oil and natural gas over a period of time by a series of steps, but there has been no agreement either on a price to which we are to move or the level and the steps by which to move there.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question. In view of the fact that the present voluntary agreement of $6.50 per barrel for oil expires at the end of June, and in view of the fact that a great many business concerns and farmers will be interested in knowing what the price is going to be, is the minister now in a position to tell us what the price will be commencing July 1 and what price the government proposes to set? If he cannot tell us today how soon will he be able to announce the price following expiry of the present agreement?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have been guided by statements Premier Lougheed has made that he would see no necessity—I hope I quote him correctly—for a price increase on July 1 so long as there were significant discussions taking place on this particular question. I cannot confirm either that there will be an increase on July 1 or indeed on any specific date. We are seeking to achieve the support, not only of the producing provinces but if possible also of the consuming provinces, for an increase at this time and I hope we can achieve that without further delay but I cannot be specific as to when.

OIL—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO PRICE INCREASE GREATER THAN INCREASE IN COSTS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Minister of Finance is seeking to combat inflation by suggesting that prices should not be allowed to rise unless increased costs warrant an increase and in view of the fact that production costs have not risen materially with respect to oil, can the minister give the House an assurance that following expiry of the present voluntary agreement there will be no increase in the price of oil beyond the present $6.50 per barrel?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that assurance. The position taken in the producing areas is that there has been an increase in costs of production and exploration as a result of the general increases in price levels in Canada. We will be seeking to arrive at an agreement on price which we feel is fair both to producing provinces like Saskatchewan and to consuming provinces like Manitoba.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

In view of the fact that a number of borrowers have been unable to secure CMHC loans for the apparent reason that the Corporation has spent all its funds for the current year, could the Minister advise the House whether all the funds made available to CMHC for the current year have indeed been spent and, in the affirmative, whether he hopes he will be able to obtain additional funds from Treasury Board, so that this corporation may grant a greater number of loans and help start the building industry rolling again?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, some offices have used up allocations of CMHC, but I encourage the public to continue to pursue applications, as we are working with private lenders to bring in private money which is subsidized by the government. I am encouraging officers of CMHC to continue to accept applications, and we will work with private lenders to make sure that as many people are accommodated as possible.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I regret very much that the minister did not answer my question at all. It is all right to say that people may go on submitting applications, it is the easiest thing to do in the world. What is more difficult is to have one's application granted. That is what I want to know. Does the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation still have funds to answer borrowers' applications in the affirmative?

[English]

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer specifically. I can only say that no offices are out of money, and they can continue to receive applications. I cannot anticipate responses in other areas. Naturally, we are pursuing the situation and seeing that as many Canadians are looked after as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the utmost importance of the question, I would like to know whether Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is limited regarding the acceptance of secured loans, that is loans contracted with registered lending institutions, and whether the Corporation is subjected to a limit as regards the acceptance of those secured loans.

[English]

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, there is both direct lending and lending from private sources which we subsidize, so that both continue to be available.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. In view of the growing desire being expressed by the majority of postal workers across the country for a fair and equitable contract similar to the one concluded recently with the Letter Carriers Union of Canada, could the Postmaster General inform the House if the collective bargaining process with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers is proceeding on course?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, regretfully, no. I should like to be more optimistic but must be honest with the House. I intend to make a statement either in the House or outside tomorrow. There is no reason in the world why the members of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers should not obtain as good a contract as the letter carriers obtained. They, I believe, will ratify their contract this evening. If the negotiating team would sit down and bargain in good faith, instead of establishing as their priority the settling of local issues in Montreal, particularly the case of the 39 people who have been disciplined, matters would be helped. I have no intention of backing away from that matter, in return for a settlement.

ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIONS OF MEMBERS OF UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the problem the Postmaster General has outlined and in view of the damage to the Canadian economy, particularly to small businessmen, which is resulting from the so-called sporadic study sessions being encouraged by certain post office union officials—obviously this is not a study in pursuit of the Ph.D. degree meaning post haste delivery.

Mr. Fairweather: What's that?

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the evidence of violence within the CUPW, as indicated by the vandalism inflicted on the house of the national secretary treasurer recently, what action has the Postmaster General taken to deal with these illegal actions?

● (1430)

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, there are several illegal acts to which the hon. member has referred. First, I can understand the frustration of the members who have booked off sick in various regions of the country today because of the slowness of the bargaining procedures. If I, as an intimate friend of the labour movement, had any advice to them, it is to direct their attention to the bargaining team which is not bargaining in good faith rather than upset the economy of the particular regions by walking off the job and hurting innocent victims by what is really an internal problem which the union must learn to solve.

In so far as the damage and the vandalism done to the home of the secretary treasurer of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, this is unfortunate since he is a very responsible leader who has been associated with that union for seven or eight years. I do not pretend to know who is responsible, other than to say the pattern is very familiar since the same thing happened to five or six supervisors in the Montreal area. Possibly this union leader now understands the turmoil and anguish of the innocent supervisors who simply try to carry out their job and are subject to the same type of harassment. Again, it is the problem of the unions. The 95 per cent who are decent, law-abiding citizens will sooner or later have to stand up and be counted and rid their own house of the 5 per cent who have no place in the legitimate trade union in the first instance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CONSULTATION WITH QUEBEC MINISTER ON JURISDICTION ON CONSTRUCTION SITES

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour.

In order to enhance an orderly and real social climate in Quebec through concrete action, is the minister negotiating with his Quebec counterpart regarding jurisdiction on federal projects in Quebec, such as Mirabel, and is he ready to yield his jurisdiction in the matter? If so, under what conditions?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker. With reference to that particular problem, I am not in discussion with my colleague from Quebec. I am under the impression he feels that he and his colleagues in the Quebec government can handle the situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Labour.

Is the Minister ready to accept the proposal of an early meeting with Commissioners Cliche, Mulroney and Chevrette, in order to deal with this special matter of jurisdiction on federal projects in Quebec and with the Cliche report as a whole, so as to enable the federal government to get better guidance in seeking the socio-economic leadership which the country needs so much?

[English]

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as I feel that this is very largely, if not entirely, a matter within provincial jurisdiction, which I am sure the hon. member is fully aware of and sensitive to, I feel the initiative would have to come from the province of Quebec with regard to any involvement by the federal government in terms of assistance of any kind.

PUBLIC SERVICE

BREAKDOWN IN NEGOTIATIONS WITH SHIP REPAIR UNIT—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON PAYMENT OF PREVAILING RATES

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the President of the Treasury Board. Is the minister aware of the breakdown in negotiations between the negotiators in his department and the ship repair unit of the Dockyards Trades and Labour Council from Esquimalt on the west coast and Halifax on the east coast, which has been working on a settlement for four months now?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have no specific statement to make at this time. The procedures provided for settling those disputes are well known. If the parties cannot settle them through negotiations, they can choose between arbitration or conciliation.

[English]

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, the minister is obviously not aware that this process has already gone through the conciliation procedure. Since it had been government policy up to the present to offer prevailing rates to these tradesmen and since on this occasion the offer to the ship repair unit of 12 per cent and 8.6 per cent in a two year contract with no COLA clause falls well below the prevailing rates, has Treasury Board changed its policy in order to conform with the consensus formula developed by the Minister of Finance or for some other reason?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, as everybody knows, we do not negotiate in the House of Commons; we do so at the negotiation table.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

COMPLAINTS ABOUT SOCIAL SERVICES IN CALGARY—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON OFFER OF ALBERTA ASSOCIATION OF SOCIAL WORKERS TO CONDUCT INQUIRY

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development concerning complaints Indian people in Calgary have about his department's office in that city. A great many of the complaints these people have centre on the delivery of social services from the Calgary Indian Affairs office. The Alberta Association of Social Workers has offered to conduct an independent inquiry into these complaints, and I would like to know if the minister is willing to let the association go ahead with such an inquiry.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, that particular request is something I will have to consider. As the hon. member is aware, we have agreed to fund this group in Calgary, the Calgary Urban Treaty Alliance, on the condition that there be some assistance as well from the provincial government. We have made this offer to the CUTA group in Calgary.

POSSIBILITY OF MOVING CALGARY OFFICE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): A supplementary question. Has the minister reconsidered his department's decision to move the Calgary office away from the part of town where most of the Indian people live?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, again this is a matter I will have to look into.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

HUMAN RIGHTS

SUGGESTED PROVISION IN LEGISLATION PROHIBITING REFERENCE TO COUNTRY OF ORIGIN OF ALLEGED CRIMINALS

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that today's Globe and Mail article on the Quebec meat situation cited the country of origin of alleged criminals, will the minister assure the House that his proposed bill on human rights will attack this deplorable practice on the grounds that it is racism, divisive and totally irrelevant to the point in question?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take note of the hon. member's comment when looking at the final draft of the bill. Of course, the bill will have certain limitations having regard to the federal as against the provincial jurisdiction and certain other factors which are bound to have a bearing on the decision.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice. Does the minister agree that his colleague's question would be answered if the minister would introduce this bill that has been rolling around for several years?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I anticipate having that kind of an answer before very long.

AGRICULTURE

CANADIAN EGG MARKETING AGENCY—ALLEGATION CERTAIN PROVINCES REFUSE TO SIGN AGREEMENT WITH AGENCY—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON IMPOSITION OF CONTROLS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. It has been reported that the agreement announced in April to delegate more powers and responsibilities to the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency is deteriorating. What specific action is the minister taking to rectify the situation in light of reports that British Columbia, Alberta and Quebec refuse to sign the agreement giving the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency the powers the minister feels are needed in order to operate the plan? Also, Ontario has agreed to sign, but has attached some very strict conditions to that signing.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the report I have from the egg marketing boards within the provinces is that some of them have placed certain riders on the agreement. These riders or clauses they have added to the agreement are being studied and will be reported to me as soon as a final opinion is made as to how they affect the agreement. Some provinces have signed the agreement in its original form. I disagree with the hon. member that the agency is about to fall apart. If they have ever been closer to running a proper program, I do not know when it has been.

Mr. Murta: It has been stated by the Ontario section of the egg marketing board that Ontario will rescind their agreement and pull out by September 1 if some form of controls has not been introduced into the egg situation in Canada. Is the government moving in this direction? If so, in what respect is there a move towards having some kind of control over the egg situation?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we must remember first and foremost that this is a producer group trying to work together, working through their provincial marketing boards. They are working in conjunction with CEMA to try to develop an effective plan. I have no way of knowing whether some are trying to pull out. It is in their interests to make this plan work and if more of them pull out the less chance it has of succeeding.

● (1440)

SUGGESTION IMPORT CONTROLS OFFERED CONDITIONAL UPON SIGNING AGREEMENT WITH CANADIAN EGG MARKETING AGENCY

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Statements before previous CEMA hearings indicate that two of the minister's predecessors promised quick implementation of import controls as an inducement for provinces to join an egg marketing plan. Can the minister tell us whether it is now government policy to offer import controls on the condition that the CEMA agreement be signed and ratified first, and if so does he view this as a reversal of government policy and a contributing factor of opposition to the agreement by the majority of the provinces?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I am amazed that the hon. member, who I believe is familiar with the laws of the land, since he is a lawyer, should suggest that this was being held up as a carrot. He knows as well as I do that if the supply-management program is in order one does not get into difficulty with one's trading partners, and it is up to the producers to look after this themselves if they want to make the plan work.

NATIONAL FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING COUNCIL—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONSUMER REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): I am sorry if the minister misunderstood or chose to misinterpret my question. Before the CEMA inquiry, as well as later, he promised an announcement concerning the appointment of consumer representatives to the National Farm Products Marketing Council. Is the hon. gentleman now is a position to inform the House when such an announcement will be made?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, because I want to make sure that if we have a council it will have something to manage.

IMMIGRATION

NEED FOR FARM WORKERS IN NOVA SCOTIA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In his absence, I will direct it to the parliamentary secretary or to the acting minister. I believe the minister is a just man and that my difficulties with his department can be resolved. My question arises from the fact that farmers in central Nova Scotia, who have been able to employ up to 14 Dutch farm workers in the past two years, will, this year, have none. Would the hon. gentleman plough through the red tape to achieve justice?

ENERGY

PROPOSED ENRICHED URANIUM PLANT IN QUEBEC—PREFEASIBILITY STUDY BY SERU—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT'S POSITION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Would the hon. gentleman tell us whether he has received a copy of the recently completed "prefeasibility study" into an enriched uranium plant in the James Bay area which was conducted by SERU, and the James Bay Development Corporation?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not received a copy.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Given the implications of the study for the federal government which has control over the export of uranium and nuclear technology, does the minister intend to ask for a copy of this study and will he undertake to make a statement setting out the government's position regarding it, bearing in mind that enriched uranium cannot be utilized in Canada?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would certainly be very interested in seeing this study and if it provides a basis for a useful statement I will be glad to make one.

OIL—POSSIBLE PRICE INCREASE BY OPEC COUNTRIES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROTECT ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Does he now have definite information that it is the intention of the OPEC countries to further increase the world price of oil and, if so, what contingency plans has the government prepared in order to cope with such an eventuality in the light of the fact that the Atlantic provinces will be dependent on offshore oil producers for some time into the future?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As the hon. gentleman knows, the compensation program has, in the past, protected the Atlantic provinces from the effects of this kind of increase and it will continue to do so. There is to be a meeting of the international energy agency next week at which I will be present; there will be an opportunity to discuss the prospects of an increase at that time and the possible implications for member countries.

Mr. MacLean: Do I understand the minister as meaning that if the world price of oil is increased, government measures will be effective in preventing such an increase from affecting the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Consumers in the Atlantic provinces would be protected under the arrangement for a single price for all Canadians; they have been protected so far by this kind of subvention and it would continue to be applicable, ensuring protection from increases above the single price across Canada which might occur from time to time.

INDUSTRY

WHITBY TIRE COMPANY—LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the announcement by the Whitby Tire Company, purchased by Firestone from Dunlop a year ago—at which time they announced they intended to increase the work force by between 250 and 300 workers—that half the work force, some 290 workers, are to be laid off for an indefinite period? Has the minister's attention been drawn to this matter and, if so, what action has he taken?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): As hon. members know, I have just returned from a trip outside the country on trade business—this is the first time this matter has come to my attention. I will look into it.

ALLEGATION BY WHITBY TIRE COMPANY EMPLOYEES LAY-OFF CAUSED BY REDUCTION OF TARIFF ON IMPORTED TIRES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Might I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance and ask him whether, at the same time as his colleague is looking into this question, he will examine the claim of the union that the reason for the lay-offs is not the slowdown in production of automobiles but the reduction in the tariff from 17½ per cent to 12 per cent which has meant an increase in the importation of tires from the United States from 650,000 to almost 5.5 million in four years.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will look into that.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

POSSIBILITY OF PROGRAM RELATED TO ABUSE OF DRUGS FOR ALCOHOLICS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

A few months ago, the press indicated that the federal government had approved a program on drug abuse, such as drugs prescribed to alcoholics. Can the minister tell us whether such a program exists and to what extent it is being implemented?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): To my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, no such program exists. However, I should like to study the hon. member's question in detail to see if I did not miss part of it, but I doubt that such a specific program exists as mentioned in the hon. member's question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT ACTION WITH REGARD TO STATEMENT BY HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR JAMAICA CONCERNING TORONTO POLICE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, before I ask this question I should like to inquire of the President of the Privy Council, as leader of the House, whether the Prime Minister will be here before orders of the day are concluded, or whether he will be here today at all.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): The Prime Minister will be here for government orders. I cannot be sure whether he will be here before that time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This question arises out of a matter I brought before the House the day before yesterday in connection with the dastardly attack which was made on the administration of justice by the High Commissioner for Jamaica. If ever there was a racist statement, there was one when he stated: "I am extremely dissatisfied with the administration of justice when there are clashes between my people and the police". That statement is incapable of any other interpretation but that there is one law for people of one colour and a different law for those of another. That is not Canadian in any way and it is a statement which ought not to have been made.

I put this question the day before yesterday to the Prime Minister. He had not heard about this matter. No answer was given yesterday in the House. Imagine my surprise—not my surprise, really, because apparently it has become a way of life—when the subject was referred to in the press yesterday instead of being answered in the House. Possibly we could get an answer now from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is an issue of consequence and one which will cause a great deal of damage throughout the Caribbean to the reputation of Canada for respecting the equality of all, regardless of colour.

● (1450)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. gentleman has mentioned, I understand that the High Commissioner for Jamaica may have made an unfortunate allegation—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Worse than that.

Mr. MacEachen: —while he was in Toronto to attend the funeral of a 15 year old Jamaican boy who had been shot while crossing a shopping mall. The officers of my department have spoken to the High Commissioner about this incident and have assured him that the Toronto police force is a competent, humane and efficient body. I am sure the High Commissioner has understood what has been conveyed to him, and I am quite sure that he, as an experienced representative in this country, understood fully the reasons for which he was spoken to on this matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that answer is totally inadequate. Some official in External Affairs has spoken to the High Commissioner. He is an intelligent and an able man and that statement should be condemned by the minister and by the Prime Minister as something unworthy of anyone holding a diplomatic post here, particularly because it is one that, by reason of the country he represents, could not but have very difficult and strong reactions. Will the minister himself make it clear that this kind of thing is unjustified, instead of having some underling whisper to the High Commissioner?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: No answer?

Mr. MacEachen: It was a speech, not a question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister whether he will personally bring to the attention of the High Commissioner the totally unjustifiable nature of a statement like that which cannot but add fuel to the fires of difficulty between races which are bound to arise? I have every sympathy for that boy who was killed, and his parents, but that is no justification for the statement that our law in this country denies fairness, and it is also no justification for an attack on those who cannot defend themselves, namely, the chief and the members of the Toronto police force.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I still find it difficult to detect a question in that representation by the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Some more diffusion.

Mr. MacEachen: I can tell him that I have personally been in touch with the High Commissioner.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why didn't you tell us?

Mr. MacEachen: I was in touch with the High Commissioner on this general subject some days ago, and in respect of this particualr incident my officials have spoken to the High Commissioner.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why not the minister?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will reserve the right to choose my own language rather than use the usual inflammatory language used by the right hon. gentleman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, we now realize that with this minister nice, soft words are to be used always as was the case in respect of North Viet Nam and U.S. relations.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I was tempted to say that the use of the kind of expression the right hon. gentleman suggests is probably why Canadian foreign relations were in such tatters in the days after he was Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Canada's foreign relations are lower today than they ever were.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGATION ADVERTISING CONTRACT AWARDED TO FRIEND OF SOLICITOR GENERAL—GOVERNMENT ACTION ON RECOMMENDATIONS ADVERTISING CONTRACTS BE FREE OF PATRONAGE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I intended to direct my question to the Prime Minister because of his interest in the philosophy of purity in politics, but perhaps I should direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. I would ask, to use some of the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, about certain transgressions, perhaps, of other administrations. Does not the Acting Prime Minister, who is the President of the Privy Council and the government House leader, believe that Canada's national police force, the RCMP, stands higher and with more integrity and character than one to become just the personal fiefdom of the minister responsible for the RCMP? I refer specifically to the advertising contract awarded to a personal friend of the Solicitor General without tender, namely, a firm that was formed for that purpose? Can the Acting Prime Minister give any explanation of the reason the RCMP should be subjected to this type of petty patronage and not be beyond any taint of patronage?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I, of course, deny the implications in the question. The Solicitor General is one of the most sensitive ministers in this House with regard to the RCMP. He defends it and he understands his position in relation to it. However, I know that he would like to answer the question directly on Monday.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I will look forward to any answer from the Solicitor General, who I have said publicly is doing a very good job which makes it much more shocking that this type of patronage is going on. Since the Royal Commission on Government Organization in 1962, and that gets us back to the time when the House leader was Secretary of State for External Affairs, recommended that patronage should be kept out of the advertising business, which recommendation was repeated by the eminent survey of the Task Force on Government Information carried out by Tom Ford and other notables, in 1969. They both recommended that patronage should be kept out of advertising. Could the Acting Prime Minister, the government House leader, with his vast knowledge of government apparatus, tell this House now which one of the six recommendations of the task force report on advertising contracts has been implemented by this government?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I cannot recall specifically the six particular principles that are included in that report, but the hon. gentleman does know that it is very difficult to ask for tenders on advertising, and one must make a selection of advertising agencies. While I am quite sure that whatever government is in office tends to favour those who are friendly to it, nevertheless, I believe this government in its dealings with advertising agencies has received very good value for its money.

An hon. Member: And vice versa.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I am the first to appreciate political realities and that you help your friends sometimes ahead of those you do not know, but does the Acting Prime Minister not believe, or can he not say to this House that when it comes to the national police force, the RCMP, that body should be beyond any taint or suspicion of petty political patronage, and that in respect of any contract of any size the agency should be awarded the contract on a free and open tender basis?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it is very seldom I can answer with an unqualified yes to a question. In this case, yes, I believe that is so. The RCMP is and should be beyond any political taint.

Mr. Nowlan: Why wasn't there a tender then?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government House leader about the business for the rest of this week and next week. Can he advise the House at this time whether in addition to the eight opposition days next month he will be setting aside time for the budget debate?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the program I would put before the House is as follows. Today, of course, is one of the allotted days, and tomorrow is another. I hope the opposition House leader will give me some indication soon of the item he intends to call tomorrow, or whether there is to be a motion of any kind. Also, Tuesday and Wednesday of next week I would designate as allotted days.

On Monday I will ask the House to resume consideration of Bill C-58 in respect of Time and Reader's Digest. After the allotted days, on Thursday I should like to call the bill on the status of women, Bill C-16. If by any chance we dispose of any of those items during a day, I have in reserve Bill C-57, and Bill C-37 on ocean dumping.

● (1500)

Mr. Hees: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, on the question of House business. Since the Minister of Finance announced at the beginning of this week that he would be announcing the date of his budget by the end of the week, and since that time is almost upon us, has he that announcement now? Is it June 23, as announced in an Ottawa newspaper this afternoon?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is not the end of the week yet.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the government House leader in respect of House business? It has been indicated several times that a bill in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare to amend the Old Age Security Act would be presented and dealt with in time so that some of its provisions could be in effect by October. In view of the fact there is talk about the House recessing for the summer, and since that makes it necessary for this bill to be dealt with and passed by the end of June, could we have a firm assurance as to when we will see this legislation?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it has now been approved by cabinet and I intend putting it on the order paper immediately.

Mr. Horner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw to your attention and the attention of the House the fact that members of your staff acquitted themselves very admirably last evening in a ball game on the Hill, defeating the fourth estate in spite of the fact that they still have their winter uniforms and had to play under that handicap.

Mr. Speaker: In response to the latter part of the hon. member's point of order, may I say I have been waiting for some time for an opportunity to mention that one step I have taken rather unilaterally, and which I now report to hon. members, is that the constables who so very dutifully serve all of us in the House of Commons will, in a matter of very few days, be attired in appropriate summer uniforms.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I have a brief point of order. If the House is to consider today the expenses of the Prime Minister's office and the Privy Council office, and we have been unable to question Mr. Michael Pitfield either in committee or elsewhere, will the Prime Minister assure the House that he will stay here for the entire day to be available to answer questions on this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question was raised during the question period.

I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

DEPARTMENT OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS OFFICE

Question No. 2,060—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

In the last fiscal year, what was the cost of operation of the Parliamentary Returns Office of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The Parliamentary Returns Office is not a separate entity but operates as a unit within the Departmental Secretariat which reports to the Deputy Minister. It is not possible to separate the cost for Parliamentary Returns work from the overall operating costs of the Secretariat.

ARCTIC WATERS POLLUTION PREVENTION ACT

Question No. 2,200—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

With reference to the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act, as of March 15, 1975 (a) how many persons were employed as pollution prevention officers (b) where was each located or stationed (c) what was the (i) highest (ii) lowest salary paid to such officers?

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): (a) Six. However, it should be noted that there are no Pollution Prevention officers per se. The responsibilities have merely been added to the duties that these officials already have. Consequently, the designation did not involve the creation of any new or separate positions: (b) Four, Yellowknife, NorthWest Territories; two, Whitehorse, Yukon Territory. (c) (i) $29,500. (ii) $21,000.

AUDITOR GENERAL

Question No. 2,291—Mr. Gauthier (Roberval):

1. What is the Auditor General's annual salary?

2. In the Auditor General's Office, how many employees receive a salary (a) over $50,000 (b) from $45,000 to $50,000 (c) from $40,000 to $45,000 (d) from $35,000 to $40,000 (e) from $30,000 to $35,000 (f) from $25,000 to $30,000 (g) from $20,000 to $25,000 (h) from $15,000 to $20,000 (i) from $10,000 to $15,000 (j) under $10,000?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): 1. $40,000 to $45,000.

2. (a) nil, (b) nil, (c) 1, (d) 1, (e) 4, (f) 19, (g) 41, (h) 112, (i) 77, (j) 48.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

CHEMICAL DISPERSANTS

Question No. 2,178—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

1. As of March 15, 1975 (a) what chemical dispersants were in the possession of the (i) Department of the Environment (ii) Department of Transport (iii) any other government agency or department to combat oil spills in the Great Lakes or off the coasts of Canada (b) what was the quantity of each such dispersant?

2. In the case of each chemical dispersant possessed by the government to combat off-shore oil spills (a) in what location (b) under what specific conditions was each tested (c) what was the result of each such test?

3. In each case where a chemical dispersant possessed by the government to combat off-shore oil spills was not tested in actual sea or Great Lakes conditions, off-shore, what was the reason for not testing in actual conditions off-shore?

Return tabled.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to five questions standing in my name on the order paper since last September 30. They are the five questions that have stood longest on the order paper, namely, No. 28, No. 32, No. 62, No. 64 and No. 69. Several of these were on the order paper during the last parliament. Two of them, namely, No. 32 and No. 69, have been on the order paper now, without an answer, for approaching a year. They ask about the use of government aircraft by the Prime Minister. They are very simple questions, such as the amount of flying time, what aircraft were used to go to the Ontario annual meeting of the Liberal Party in Sudbury, and other basically simple things such as the cost per hour.

These questions have not been answered. I assume the reason is that the questions also carry with them a subquestion asking for the names of those on the passenger list of the aircraft. I think that to take a year to answer these questions is totally out of order. I believe the Prime Minister, certainly, with all the staff he has in his office which increases almost every day, should be prepared to guarantee to this House that someone will get down to business and answer the questions. If he has a staff of 400 or 500 people, I suggest they should do a day's work.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Before you give your ruling on a matter raised by the hon. member for York Centre yesterday as a question of privilege, I should like to make a suggestion for the consideration of the House. The motion by the hon. member for York Centre incorporates, by reference, the matter raised by myself as a question of privilege on Tuesday, May 20, which itself contained a motion, although the hon. member referred to only part of my complaint of the previous sitting.

You ruled, Mr. Speaker, that in line with the precedents you had no jurisdiction in the matter and that it should be settled in the committee in which it arose. Although the member for York Centre and I are in dispute, I agree with him that our complaints, antagonistic though they may be, are of such importance to the member for York Centre and myself, and to the procedure and proceedings of all committees of the House, that they should properly be referred to and settled by the committee that is the proper forum for hearing and settling grievances and complaints which arise in committees including the finance committee.

Not only is the committee to which I refer not a party to the dispute, but its findings and recommendations can achieve uniformity of procedure in committees. At the appropriate time in these proceedings, Mr. Speaker, with your instruction and the consent of the House I would be prepared to move that the subject matter of my complaint of Tuesday, May 20, and that of the hon. member for York Centre of Wednesday, May 21, and further procedural moves attempted today by government members on the committee, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privilege and Elections.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question of privilege that the hon. member for York-Simcoe has put forward, followed in turn by the second question of privilege by the hon. member for York Centre, raised very serious questions about the relationship between proceedings in the committee and the Chair and, furthermore, between the opportunity to review the proceedings in committee and in turn the suggestion that the proceedings of one standing committee be reviewed by another one. Also raised are questions about the propriety of the remarks by the hon. member for York-Simcoe concerning the conduct of the hon. member for York Centre.

All this has caused me considerable concern, and with the indulgence of the House I would propose to consider this matter until next Monday at 3 p.m., at which time I shall try to have a definitive ruling covering all the matters which have been raised.

Orders of the day.

[Mr. Cossitt.]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58

House in committee of supply to consider certain items of the estimates for the year ending March 31, 1976, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 58 (9)—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

PRIVY COUNCIL

Resolved that a sum not exceeding $18,484,200 be granted to Her Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1976 (less the amount voted in interim supply) as follows:

Vote 1—Privy Council—Program expenditures, including maintenance and operation of the Prime Minister's residence; the payment to each member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada who is a Minister without Portfolio or a Minister of State who does not preside over a Ministry of State of a salary of $7,500 per annum and pro rata for any period less than a year, the grants listed in the Estimates and contributions—$18,484,200

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, contrary to what my hon. friends opposite may think, I am rather pleased to take part this afternoon in the examination of my estimates. I have just been told that it is the first time in over 12 years that a prime minister is called upon to justify his estimates, and I am very glad to have this opportunity to make a few remarks and reply to the questions from the opposition.

I think the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was the last prime minister to be granted this favour, and I expect that there will be this afternoon a very interesting and important exchange of views.

The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) seems worried—

An hon. Member: He is not even here.

Mr. Trudeau: —which is understandable, because I am supposed to make a speech tonight in a riding next to his, and I am under the impression that he is afraid of the opportunity the people in this area will have to see what a real parliamentarian is, compared to the hon. member for Leeds—

The truth of the matter Mr. Chairman, is that, regretfully, I cannot stay here all day.

● (1510)

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: There will be other days.

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: I knew only yesterday that my presence here today was desired. I had for a long time accepted obligations, not only here in Ottawa, but also in other places in Ontario and Quebec. Unfortunately, I must keep up to these obligations.

The hon. member for Rivière-à-la-Paix is saying that there will be other days—

An hon. Member: Peace River!

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member for Rivière-à-la-Paix is saying that there will be other days; no doubt there will be some, and I hope the hon. member will have other opportunities to question me. However, I must say that as far as this series of estimates is concerned, it was a matter of being here today or never, because as the House is no doubt aware, there are some questions of international importance which must be discussed relating to the precarious state of the world economy as well as matters related to defense which compel me to be in Brussels next week for those discussions. I must also spend a few hours in Denmark to discuss the problems related to contractual ties and a few hours also for discussions in Luxembourg.

Unfortunately, and I apologize to the House, it was necessary for me to be here today, at least for some time. I can assure the hon. members opposite that the Acting Prime Minister, the House leader, will be present. The officials needed to provide information will be here too.

I also seize opportunity to thank my hon. friend, the House Leader, for having gone to bat for me on many instances, while he was responsible of two very important departments.

[English]

An hon. Member: Why don't you send him, and stick around yourself?

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat curious to know what exactly opposition members want to discuss today. I offered to let them launch the debate, thinking that would perhaps give me the opportunity of replying to some of their accusations before leaving later in the day, but they waived that privilege and asked me to open the debate, which I am pleased to do.

However I am a little bit in the dark as to the subjects that I should tackle. In any event, I shall at least touch on three or four, on some of the aspects of the Privy Council administration that seem to worry them. First, I shall deal with the presence of the Prime Minister in the House and in committees. Second, I shall discuss the matter of secrecy, since it seems to have concerned hon. members opposite a good deal. And third, I should like to talk about the expenditures, their size and, what I consider more important, the reason why such expenses appear in the estimates.

[English]

First, on the presence of the leader of the government in parliament, I repeat that when parliament asks one of its members to be present it is his duty to be present in so far as it is possible for him to make himself available, and I have done my utmost today to free as much time as possible in view of the very short notice I had, under these experimental rules, that I would be called upon to appear today. I think that traditionally parliament has been rather gracious in its use of the privilege of asking the Prime Minister to appear before it. As I was saying, the practice goes back more than a dozen years that the Prime Minister has had to appear before parliament with regard to his estimates. Certainly, that is the top priority and I am happy to be here to answer whatever questions I will have time to answer.

However, I want to remind the committee that I am in the House every day during the question period and I answer questions on the order paper. I have learned that since the beginning of this session some 7½ months ago, I have signed more than 100 replies to questions on the order paper; I have attempted to answer 524 oral questions in the House during the question period; and I have been here whenever questions or debates of national importance have arisen, when they have not conflicted with other important engagements, of which the House was always made aware.

The matter of my appearance before a standing committee is another matter. I am informed that it has never happened in modern times, certainly in more than a quarter of a century—I have not gone further back than that—that a prime minister has been forced to appear before a standing committee of parliament. Indeed, last year my colleague the hon. member for Sarnia, a member of my own party, asked me to appear before a standing committee and I answered him by letter, which was made public, in which I gave the reasons I did not want to break that long-standing tradition.

Certainly, members of parliament are absolutely justified in wanting to ask questions about spending in the PCO or the PMO. I have followed the practice of making available to the committee officials who could give all the facts, and indeed have given all the facts that have been asked of them. Parliamentarians, either the House leader or his excellent parliamentary secretary, have followed the practice of standing in for the Prime Minister. I repeat that this has been the practice throughout this modern period in parliament. As I said the other day, apart from being a traditionalist on this, I see no good reason to break that tradition, if only for the reason that answers can be given and have been given, apart—I repeat—from the very detailed answers that I give to written questions, a procedure whereby members of the House and the public can learn of every fine detail such as the price of every kitchen utensil or ashtray that was purchased for 24 Sussex Drive or for my office here.

Therefore, it cannot be a question of getting to know the facts: members can know the facts. If there is more that they want to know, the House leader will be here this afternoon, and so will officials, to answer questions and we will make sure that the questions that are asked by any member of the House will be properly answered. Questions of policy are obviously another matter, and it is quite clear that government officials should not be asked to answer policy questions. As long as we have a parliamentary system with responsible government, we on this side of the House will not permit officials to stand in for ministers just to satisfy the curiosity of some hon. members opposite, so far as I am able.

This matter deals with a question of factual information which the House would want to know as a result of my estimates. I would merely, now, deal briefly with the question of secrecy. This is perhaps not the time to speak at any length on that. I just want to remind the House that in an attempt to circumscribe the concern of the government about the need for certain working documents to be kept secret and not made public, a few years ago we established a series of guidelines. They were presented to this House under the title "Guidelines for Notices of Motions for Production of Papers", but they applied to the general question of secrecy. These guidelines were originally tabled by the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, who was then the House leader, on March 15, 1973—more than two years ago. They are appendix B to the debates of March 15, 1973.

Two weeks later, the guidelines were referred to the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, and I must say that no action was ever taken by that committee to come to grips with these guidelines, to show possibly how they could be improved and made compatible with as open a government as possible. But once again, in a system of parliamentary responsibility, the guidelines were tabled in this parliament in December and on the same day they were referred to the same joint committee. There have already been a few witnesses appear before that committee. I want to say that this government is anxiously awaiting the results of the report of that standing committee, because it is possible that it would be able to improve the guidelines without deterring from the very basic need of the parliamentary system, of having officials in the position where they can advise their ministers without the danger of that advice becoming completely public—a situation which experience has proved only results in the officials being extremely cautious and perhaps less than candid in tendering advice. We want the best possible advice from the officials, and in order to receive it they must be protected from public scrutiny of their every opinion.

The next point I would like to deal with—I realize I should not go into great detail here because the committee will want to have some time to ask questions—is the size of my estimates, the amount of spending generally by the Prime Minister and his office, and in the Privy Council. There would be two categories of questions under this heading. The first, I suppose, comes under the category of chandeliers and ashtrays.

An hon. Member: And swimming pools. Tell us about that.

Mr. Trudeau: And swimming pools. I do not think it is a matter of policy. It is perhaps a matter of debate and curiosity, but the facts are known. Judgments can be made. I will deal with it very briefly and I hope some time will be left for the most fundamental question, that of these expenditures and what functions they are intended to permit the operation of. I would not even bother if merely the hon. member for Leeds or perhaps the hon. member for Rocky Mountain were curious about this; but I was somewhat disappointed that the right hon. gentleman for Prince Albert made it the subject matter of a speech he made on April 30, after his long absence, when he returned to the House and naturally had many things to say. He used part of his speech to comment on what I call the "chandelier" category of spending. The right hon. member for Prince Albert was predicting what my salary will be in ten years at the present rate of inflation. I thank him for the confidence he has shown in me—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Trudeau: —and particularly for shedding some light on the opinion he holds of the present leader and future leaders of his party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, it is only a question of time, but I realize that time is running into May and running out on the Prime Minister. I do not want to cut him off under the 15-minute rule, but particularly since his time in the committee will be limited I hope he will be as brief as he can.

Mr. Trudeau: I thank the hon. member for drawing the time to my attention, but I did point out at the outset that I had offered to speak after a member of his party so that I would know exactly to what subject I was expected to address myself. They deferred and asked me to speak first, for which reason I am trying to cover a variety of subjects, and naturally that takes a bit more time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am sure it is just by accident that the Leader of the Opposition rose at the precise moment I was going to quote from the speech of the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I will go back to that and read from Hansard of April 30 at page 5344:

> Let me go back to the days when I was Prime Minister. We had to pay $5,000 a year rent for 24 Sussex Drive; that is to say, Mr. St. Laurent did, I did when I followed him, and Mr. Pearson did after me. This rental payment has been done away with.

I suggest that is a rather unfair comment. Perhaps he forgot, but the right hon. gentleman certainly knows that this rental payment was abolished by an act of the twenty-eighth parliament—two parliaments ago—in a bill which I introduced regarding the official residences, the Official Residences Act. I made sure that this abolition of rent would only be applicable in the next parliament; in other words, it was not applicable to me. I, like Mr. St. Laurent, Mr. Pearson and Mr. Diefenbaker, had to pay rent. It was only after the next election when the people chose, by a rather slim margin, the same prime minister that the new law took effect. The Leader of the Opposition, with his usual fairness, will recollect that that was the aspect of the bill.

He will also recollect that the same bill, which turned Stornoway into public property and the residence of Mr. Speaker, the farm, into public property, was made effective immediately because hon. members know that we had some concern about the previous arrangement whereby the leader of the opposition and Mr. Speaker were receiving benefits under the Crown, the NCC was working on their property, and so on. They could have been disqualified under the act of parliament.

Mr. Cossitt: What about the swimming pool?

Mr. Trudeau: We, not having the same kind of petty mind as the hon. member for Leeds, did not want to exploit that situation; that is why we made the act effective immediately in the case of Stornoway and the farm, and effective after the next election in the case of the residence of the prime minister. I find it unfortunate that the right hon. gentleman for Prince Albert found it convenient to forget that.

When I am talking of Stornoway I am interrupted by concern for the swimming pool. Let me remind the Committee that there is a pretty good parallel between the two situations. Stornoway was put at the disposal of the leader of the opposition by a private group of people whose names have never been made public. He occupied it without our ever suspecting him of having been influenced by the Mafia who might have given it to him. This thought never entered our minds, nor should it. I believe the gentlemen and ladies who put this house at the disposal of the leader of the opposition were acting out of a sense of public duty because they believed it was an honourable gesture. I am prepared to wager that probably people from many parties helped ensure this trust through which the property of Stornoway was put at the disposal of the leader of the opposition.

When the government took over the property of Stornoway, for the reasons I gave earlier nobody on this side wanted to know the names of the donors. We did not suspect the leader of the opposition, past, present or future, of having been influenced by private builders. This is exactly the situation with the swimming pool.

Mr. Horner: There is a complete difference.

Mr. Trudeau: There are various ways for the federal government to obtain properties which are for the benefit of the people of Canada and present and future holders, whether they be the leader of the opposition, the prime minister or the Speaker. This, it seemed to me, was a perfectly correct way, to have private donors whose names were known to no one—certainly not to myself—make a gift of property to the prime minister's residence just as they have with the residence of the leader of the official opposition, remaining the property of the government for all time. I think this is how various public properties are given into the hands of the government. It is the way the museum is often enriched. It is certain that this is a question of being damned whatever I do. Of course, had I drawn upon the public purse there would have been a great number of accusations.

On a lighter note, Mr. Chairman, I was absolutely certain, when I chose the course of accepting from anonymous donors the gift of a swimming pool, that there would be editorials saying that this was not the way to proceed and that the pool should have been paid for out of public funds. It is certain that in a situation like this one can never be right in the eyes of people who are determined to see evil in everything. It is worth repeating that the parallel between Stornoway and the swimming pool is identical, and neither the Leader of the Opposition nor I know, nor presumably will know, through whose generosity we benefit from these amenities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: Wasting a lot of time to say nothing.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, I know this is a waste of time and I regret that the concern of so many people on the other side has been with this very subject. They have forced me to address myself to this subject, precisely because even during the time I was speaking hon. members opposite asked questions about the swimming pool. Now that I have given them information, they are confounded and have found it a waste of time.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Peace River on a point of order.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the Prime Minister wants to be fair with the committee. He has indicated and we accept the fact, that he cannot be here all the time, much as we would love him to be and I am sure as he would be delighted to be. The reason no earlier notice was given is because of an incident which took place only on Tuesday night which we construed to be unparliamentary and despotic action. As a result, we felt it was necessary to ask the Prime Minister to appear in this House before the committee.

If he has to leave, I am sure the questions we will be asking him, including the Leader of the Opposition, will touch upon many of the subjects he is dealing with and he will have his opportunity to answer them. I think if he is sincere—and I hope he is—with regard to this being a suitable opportunity for questioning, he will provide the opportunity for the Leader of the Opposition and members of the other parties, in connection with his estimates and the right of the House of Commons on behalf of the people of Canada, to air grievances before supply is voted. This is the principle on which we are proceeding, and I trust the Prime Minister will arrange that those questions will be answered.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, I understand the concern of the hon. member, and he has stated well the dilemma in which I find myself. I would remind him, however, that the dilemma is not of my making. It is the members of his party who repeatedly have been asking these questions of me through written questions, who have been raising these questions in committee, who have been interjecting every time I stand to answer any question, who have been indicating their concern about the very subjects I am dealing with. I find it quite unreasonable for the hon. member to show his disappointment for the time I am taking to deal with the questions that his own party has brought up. I can see no other course but for me to follow my present disposition of dealing with some of these accusations, I repeat, made by the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, a former prime minister of this country and therefore—

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Leeds on a point of order.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that anyone in this House should sit and listen to the Prime Minister say he is taking up his time because we have exercised our right to ask questions on the order paper and orally in this House. I think it is time that we heard something sensible or that he sat down. He is using us as an excuse for not answering, and hiding things from the Canadian people—

The Chairman: Order, please. I want to bring it to the attention of the hon. member that he rose on a point of order and I am here to rule on it. I have to refer him to Standing Order 55 which indicates that there is no limitation of time on the presentation of the Prime Minister. If hon. members have made other agreements not within the knowledge of the chairman of the committee, there is no way I can rule other than to have the right hon. Prime Minister speak.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: As the chairman well knows, we have been operating on a 15-minute basis. There was discussion today about whether we wanted to speak first or whether the Prime Minister would speak first. We want the opportunity to have a discussion, not a monologue, Mr. Chairman. I leave it to the Prime Minister's personal judgment, but I would remind him that we have been operating on a 15-minute basis. He has taken about 35 minutes. In view of the fact that he cannot stay long—and I understand why he cannot—I would ask him to bear this in mind.

The Chairman: Order, please. I understand very well the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition. The 15-minute time limit which was agreed upon last week was for the two days' examination of the estimates of the Department of Transport. No agreement about today's proceeding has reached the chairman of the committee. At one time or another I expect the House leader will bring forward some proposal, but it was brought to my attention that the period until 4.30 would be preceded by a statement by the Prime Minister. Nobody mentioned that it would be limited as to time. It was to be followed by a question period. I am ready to accept any agreement that can be made within the committee or by hon. members, but I cannot impose rules that do not exist.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that these are not important questions. Unfortunately, the questions which have been raised consistently by hon. members opposite are those which make the headlines. Since we are on spending, I intend to take a few more minutes on this subject. That seems to be an unimportant part, but it seems to be the position of hon. members opposite.

● (1540)

In the very next phrase, the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert said, "Neither did we have any armoured dreadnoughts." I will not go into the explanation which has already been given by the Solicitor General to do with the armoured car which the RCMP put at my disposal, and at the Queen's disposal when she comes here. I just remember, when the right hon. gentleman suggests that possession of this car shows signs of paranoia on my part, that it was he who, at substantial public expense, had the bomb-shelter built at 24 Sussex Drive. Perhaps he was looking ahead to the time at the Chateau Laurier when his party would be kicking at him. The point is that he had that bomb-shelter built at substantial public expense. He had built a whole series of government facilities out at Carp in which to house himself and the government if any violence should overtake him. I think it was a bit petty of him to refer to the armoured car when he, himself, was a particularly visible case of paranoia.

In the same speech, the right hon. gentleman talked about Harrington Lake. I think that was another unfortunate reference, because I suppose he made the largest land grab when he was in office that was ever made by any private citizen of Canada. He did so when he decided that Harrington Lake and the buildings on it should be the country residence of the prime minister. I do not think anybody then sitting on my party's side of the House criticized that decision. He was adding thousands of acres of land for his private enjoyment. I think it was a justifiable gesture, one from which I personally have benefited. In the same way I hope the next prime minister will benefit from the swimming pool at 24 Sussex Drive. There is a difference: I do not intend to stock the swimming pool with fish, not even sharks, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: What about stocking it with the government's dirty laundry.

Mr. Trudeau: The right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert liked fishing and had Harrington Lake stocked at public expense with fish for his enjoyment.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Trudeau: That was a shameful incident. It is, I repeat, a petty point; unfortunately it was brought out in the speech of the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I am sure he will find other occasions to answer me, but the facts are as I have stated them, Mr. Chairman.

I now come to the more basic question to do with the size of the Prime Minister's office and of the Privy Council office. Here, again, I want to make two points. First, one must make sure facts are accurate. It is necessary, when looking at statistics, to compare things which are comparable. Second, I hope to show in my speech why the Prime Minister's office and the Privy Council office have grown to their present size.

Let us look at the Prime Minister's residence. In 1960-61, seven man-years were utilized. This was in the time of the right hon. member for Prince Albert. The figure remained the same for almost 15 years. Expenditures for 1974-75 were still for seven man-years. The cost, of course, had gone up considerably, from $26,000 to $84,000, which means that the same number of men and women who were hired at 24 Sussex Drive had had their salaries increased threefold in 15 years. I do not set salaries there, but I think it is important to keep in mind the number of man-years utilized at the prime minister's residence.

Comparisons as between the Prime Minister's office and the Privy Council office are much more difficult to make, for the simple reason that the two were not separated until the 1971-72 estimates. The number of man-years and costs allocated related to the combined offices, although they then performed a very different function and were covered by estimates of a very different quality. I will give some examples of what I mean; I cannot give them all.

Back in 1962-63, when the Conservatives still were clinging to power, the Prime Minister's office and Privy Council office were allocated 99 man-years at a cost of $611,000-odd. I have seen hon. members opposite and members of the media compare that figure with a figure, say, of some ten years later, of $1,400,000, more or less, which represents a twofold increase for the PMO and $8 million for the Privy Council office. But the difference is this: in these estimates, the Privy Council estimates cover $1,260,-000-odd for the Institute for Research on Public Policy, and $230,000-odd for the National Committee on Human Rights and Treaties, and so on. So you can look at each year's figures and see that quite a number of activities were brought under these estimates which previously had not been brought under the Prime Minister's office or the Privy Council office.

Actually, when I was working in one of the offices as a civil servant back in 1949, it was the custom of the PCO and the PMO to borrow civil servants, who remained on the budgets of other departments. Therefore, if people want to make a scientific analysis of this, they should ask for exact facts and compare similar things. I repeat, my office and the Privy Council office are always ready to make such facts available to those who want to make an honest comparison and not just hit the headlines.

Another example of escalation is that of the office of the leader of the opposition. It is important to note the change there. The office of the leader of the opposition on June 1, 1968, had allocated to it 13 positions. At present it has 27 positions, so that its size has more than doubled. To speak of salaries, in my case and over a longer period they have been multiplied, I believe, by a factor of three. The salaries paid for positions in the leader of the opposition's office went from $129,000-odd in 1968 to $517,000 in the present day, which is more than a fourfold increase. The same is true of the office of the leader of the New Democratic Party and of the leader of the Social Credit party. Expenditures for their offices have increased about fourfold.

Therefore, I do not think people should get too excited when I say that expenditures for my office have also increased for that period. I might say that the figures given do not include the budgets of party research bureaux. I remind the committee, with some immodesty, that it was my government in 1968 which innovated in this regard. We believed in the importance of the opposition having research staffs which would permit them to discharge their functions. Those functions are to do with the analysing of policy, of legislation and the asking of pertinent questions in the House.

Mr. Baldwin: There has not been much result from the spending of all that money.

Mr. Trudeau: I agree.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It doesn't seem to have helped the opposition.

Mr. Trudeau: The budget of the research bureau of the Progressive Conservative Party went from zero in 1968 to $250,000 in 1975, which represents an infinitely large increase. Even if we start in 1969, we get $125,000 in 1969 and $251,000 in 1971; that is slightly more than double. In the case of the New Democratic Party it has more than doubled. In the case of the Social Credit party it has not quite doubled.

● (1550)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I realize the Prime Minister is trying to save time, but twice now he has given the actual figures for the official opposition. In the case of the other two parties he just gives the ratio of the increase. He might give those figures as well.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Chairman. In the case of the office of the NDP leader, in January of 1970—and this is two years later than in the case of the official opposition—total salaries were $36,600. At present, not only have positions doubled but the salaries have increased to $147,900.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: In the case of the Social Credit party, in January of 1970 the figure was $28,600; at present it is $104,700.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: If I combine these two tables and put the salaries of the staff of the Leader of the Opposition with those of the official opposition research bureau, we go from a figure, in 1968, of $129,000 to a figure, in 1975, of $769,000.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: That is an increase of more than six times. It is worth while noting that this does not include the salaries of the assistants of the opposition House leader—who would probably need more but he is getting this at the present time—assistants to the former prime minister and assistants to the chief opposition whip. If you add these expenditures, you get into some sizeable amounts.

An hon. Member: Tell the truth.

Mr. Trudeau: I am sure each member of this House has his own views of what is the truth. What I am pointing out is that the hon. member for Leeds is making fraudulent use of statistics. I hope it is not intentional.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I have been accused by the Prime Minister of making "fraudulent" use, I believe that was his word, of statistics. I consider that to be told that anything I have done in this House is fraudulent is a reflection of my character, which I am not prepared to accept. The Prime Minister this afternoon is stretching things out, not answering legitimate questions from the opposition because he wants to use up time, and making remarks about the character of members of the opposition. That is an affront to this House. A lot of members of this House are getting mighty tired sitting here listening to a man—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: It is time he accounted to the Canadian people for the expenses of his office, and quickly.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, I now come to perhaps the only important part of my long statement. It is only a question of the substance of the costs. I believe there have been general phrases put in different ways, but the accusation seems to be that in some way I am subverting the parliamentary system and turning it into a presidential one. There is curiosity about the use I seem to be making of officials. At times we hear that the officials are wielding too much power and they should be summoned before the House. I recall members opposite urging the government to fire the former deputy minister of finance who was wielding too much power. However, when the same man resigned a few years later, members opposite expressed great concern that the man had been forced to leave by an intolerant government which was not giving him any power. I am not quite sure on what leg they will dance on this particular issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I will try to make some general statements on the changing role of the Privy Council office. That is the title of a publication by Mr. Gordon Robertson who was secretary to the cabinet until very recently. There is nothing secret about it. It was a paper presented to the twenty-third annual meeting of the Institute of Public Administrators, in Regina, on September 8, 1971.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I have consulted several more learned authorities on parliamentary procedure than myself on this subject.

An hon. Member: They are all more learned than you.

Mr. Cossitt: I have had it confirmed that the Prime Minister used unparliamentary language in referring to me and my questions in the House as fraudulent. I therefore ask that this remark by the Prime Minister be withdrawn. I think I am within my rights to ask Your Honour to so rule.

The Chairman: I must say I have also been concerned about the remark of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister accused the hon. member of making fraudulent use of statistics. I find it difficult to make a decision as to whether the remark of the Prime Minister really affects the character of the hon. member for Leeds. I have looked at references in Beauchene's to see whether I should ask the Prime Minister to at least modify his assertion. I feel this might be a borderline case, and possibly the Prime Minister could help the Chair and the committee and make a nuance in his assertion.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, I think I can help you. Perhaps the words were lost, but I am sure they will have been recorded by Hansard. I said the hon. member had made a fraudulent use of statistics, but I hoped not intentionally. I think that would cover the difficulty you are facing. I thought perhaps the hon. member—

[Translation]

Mr. Grafftey: How clever!

Mr. Trudeau: No, it is not very clever, I said it quite earnestly.

[Mr. Cossitt.]

[English]

I would think it unfortunate if the statistics were intentionally dishonoured in this way by anyone. It is my presumption that the hon. member is acting more out of ignorance than out of ill-will.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1600)

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be presumptuous enough to lecture the Prime Minister on his responsibilities in the House, but I do suggest he has some responsibility not to aggravate—

An hon. Member: Are you angry?

Mr. Stanfield: Yes, I am angry all right, but I will have an opportunity to speak in a while; I am sorry the Prime Minister will not be present to hear me, but he can read it all. On this point, though, I suggest the Prime Minister might be gracious enough to say that he did not intend to accuse the hon. member for Leeds of intentional fraudulent behaviour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition seems to suggest that I say words which are the very ones I used. It is for the hon. gentleman to decide whether his members are stupid or dishonest; that is not my task.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: The point which has been raised, Mr. Chairman, is a very simple issue. The word "fraudulent" has one connotation, and no matter what the Prime Minister might say to skirt around it, he did make that charge against the hon. member for Leeds. The word "fraudulent" has a meaning which we understand. Either the Prime Minister stays with it, and is thereby exposed to Your Honour's ruling, or he changes that word. That is the option open to him. I might just as easily talk about fraudulent conduct in attempting to avoid questions.

Mr. Trudeau: You often have.

Mr. Baldwin: That would be improper and I would not say it. I suggest to the right hon. gentleman he should take this opportunity to see that proceedings in this chamber are conducted on a reasonable plane, and one way to do this would be to change the word that has been used.

The Chairman: I want to be fair to the hon. member for Leeds. I quite understand the point which has been raised by the hon. member for Peace River and by the Leader of the Opposition, but I have to make a ruling on the basis of the Standing Order and the precedents which have been followed.

Citation 154 of Beauchesne's, paragraph (5), says it is not unparliamentary to say that a statement is untrue, but that it is unparliamentary to say it is untrue to the knowledge of the hon. member addressing the House.

From this I move to the explanation given by the Prime Minister. Although he stated that the hon. member for Leeds might have made a fraudulent use of the statistics, he added that he hoped this was not done of his own knowledge, or wilfully. To my mind, this meets the requirement of the citation to which I have referred. Unless hon. members wish to carry the matter further and cite further references for my guidance, I may say that right now I am satisfied with the explanation given by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Chairman, may I state briefly that so far I cannot see how one can be satisfied with the statement made by the Prime Minister in this regard.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Cossitt: He made the admission that he had used the word "fraudulently". He admits that but he adds, "However, I assume not intentionally". Mr. Chairman, "fraudulent" implies intent in every sense of the word; "fraudulent" implies crookedness; "fraudulent" implies dishonesty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: I used statistics which he himself had supplied from his own office. If those statistics are fraudulent, they are fraudulent because he supplied them.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member had a chance to make his case. His arguments were well supported by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Peace River. The Chair has made a decision. The only alternative at the hon. member's disposal is to appeal the ruling of the Chair.

An hon. Member: He might as well; it is a completely wasted afternoon.

Mr. Trudeau: I was coming to my point. I was saying that the changing role of the Privy Council office has been the subject of great interest and learned papers by more than one person. Mr. Robertson's paper is well worth reading and I would refer anyone who wishes to understand the increasing complexity of the Privy Council office to this particular publication.

For my part, I believe that the most basic issue which has been raised by these various questions on my estimates probably has to do with the whole system of parliamentary government and the collective responsibility. Here, I speak as one with some experience because not so long ago the government previous to this one was defeated in the House of Commons on a very basic issue. Certainly, we have learned from direct experience of the responsibility of the executive to the House of Commons.

Perhaps I do not have too many things in common with the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, but at least in this we have similar experience: we were both leaders of a government which suffered defeat in the House of Commons; confidence having been withdrawn, we had to go to a general election. Surely, this is the basic principle. Mine was worse, perhaps, in the sense that our government was the first in this country which had ever been defeated on a budget.

Mr. Baldwin: The country never had a worse budget.

Mr. Trudeau: The principle was the same, though, and no system under which this happens can be mistaken for a presidential system. Nor should we give way to the demands of the opposition to have officials appear before committees of parliament, because this would only be giving force and credence to the notion that it is the officials who make the policy and who are responsible for it, rather than members of the cabinet who, as a general rule, have to be elected by the people. So let me just indicate some ways in which changing times have called for an increase in the staff of my office.

Going back to 1968 when I became Prime Minister, I thought it was necessary to look at the functions of the Privy Council office and the function of the cabinet in the context of that particular time. Because of changing circumstances, not just in Canada but in other countries, government generally had entered a new phase of significantly larger involvement in the public sector. The demands on it for responding to the people were massive, but the decision-making process as it existed at that time had not kept pace with those demands in any meaningful way. If ministerial responsibility were to be meaningful, something had to be done.

After considerable and intense study with my colleagues and the officials who had to provide the support operation to the cabinet, we decided to change the system, to allow cabinet committees chaired by ministers to do the assessments and make the subsequent judgments which formerly had all been done in full cabinet. This would allow cabinet to focus on the final alternatives, knowing that the basic work and discussion had already taken place.

To change a system involving large numbers of people and ingrained methods is not easy and takes a bit of time, but there were valid reasons for trying. First, we wanted more decisions to be taken at the ministerial level. Second, we wanted to ensure that ministers had soundly researched alternatives from which to choose. Third, we wanted to aid ministers to make a conscious choice of priorities in the full knowledge of the real pressures which were being placed on their colleagues. Fourth, we wanted to extend dialogue between the ministers and officials, and not just officials from their own department. What we wanted was to let departmental concerns cross the borders of one department, with officials from other departments in these committees being subject to questions and participating in the discussions with ministers of other departments.

● (1610)

I have no hesitation in saying this approach has resulted in an increase in the staff of the Privy Council office, particularly in areas of planning and federal-provincial relations. It is not an abuse of growth, and in terms relative to the general annual growth in the public service it is around the norm. In fact, it has been of an order that no one could realistically suggest the Privy Council office, even combined with the Prime Minister's office, could be capable of controlling the government. I gave the figures a little earlier, Mr. Chairman.

[Translation]

I do not quite see why the Privy Council office is now being looked upon as something sinister by the hon. members of the opposition, at least by some of them. This seems rather strange to me since the operation and the role of the Privy Council have been made the subject-matter of studies or reports printed and distributed to the hon. members as well as to other citizens. Their authors, very distinguished men and free of any partisanship, never lose sight of the fact that in accordance with an old rule, even the highest officials must abstain from interfering with the orders or wishes of ministers. Such a rule has always prescribed that the Privy Council must be non-partisan in nature though it must be politically considerate of the government's intentions, whatever may be the government who is enjoying the confidence of the Canadian electors. The same applies in the case of any group of officers within any department.

Despite charges from the opposition, charges to which the Watergate traumatism might find some credit among the people, the government has tried to lessen the restraints imposed in the past.

Since the Cabinet was appointed eight years ago, great care has also been taken to ensure that officers do not interfere with the ministers' responsibilities. It must be admitted that the Privy Council office manages the government machinery, but its officers are not responsible for the decision making process, as some believe. They perform administrative and coordinating duties from one department to another but they do not define any policy.

[English]

There is another very fundamental point I would like to make; that is, there is a very basic difference between the services given to the Prime Minister by the Privy Council office and that offered by his own staff. All too often, critics, either deliberately or without knowledge, blur the distinctions between two quite different operations. At one point in time a number of persons from the civil service, as I said earlier, were seconded to the prime minister from various departments to serve his staff. From the beginning of my government I have had such persons identified clearly as my political staff and put on my budget.

The operations of the Privy Council office, like the rest of the public service of Canada, are not based on partisan politics. They are certainly sensitive to public issues but they are committed to serve a government elected by Canadians, and indeed are necessary to it.

In accordance with well established prerogatives of the prime minister, I have recently nominated a new secretary to the cabinet and clerk of the Privy Council. He has been in the public service for more than 16 years, two of them as deputy minister. It is a fact that when I first came to public office he was already an assistant secretary to the cabinet. It is a fact that he is young and that I have got to know him well since I came to Ottawa. I had met him a few times previous to that, when I believe he was working for one of the ministers in Mr. Diefenbaker's government; but I have really got to know him well since coming to Ottawa and seeing him acting as assistant secretary to the cabinet. I do not see cause to discriminate against him for either of those reasons. The simple fact that he is a highly skilled civil servant should suffice to overwhelm the arguments of either his youth or of his acquaintance with me.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

An hon. Member: Is he better than all the rest?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member asks if he is better than all the rest. Since I have been Prime Minister, I believe I have had occasion to change every deputy minister of every department, and I have had perhaps the pleasure and privilege of presiding over a change of generation in the civil service. I think it would be difficult to say whether he is better than all the others, because the deputy ministers who are serving in the federal civil service are very competent men and women and I would be hard pressed to know by what standards the hon. member asks the question about being better. Certainly, some are more fitted for one type of job than others. I repeat that, in the case of the secretary to the cabinet, he had been an assistant secretary to the cabinet and was obviously very competent in that aspect of his job.

Having dealt with the Privy Council office, I must now deal with my own staff in the Prime Minister's office. As a preface, let me remind the committee that the Privy Council office is totally non-partisan. Its employees are the same as any employees of the public service. My dealings with them seems to indicate to me that I am fortunate to have such knowledgeable advisers. Their assignment is to produce the expertise for any government which happens to gain power.

The Prime Minister's staff, on the other hand, is admittedly a different operation. Naturally, it is completely partisan and, I hope, intelligent. I fear it has been greatly misunderstood in terms of numbers and alleged power. Almost half of the staff for whom I have answered either in the House or in order paper questions deals exclusively with my correspondence. I am talking about, in a slow year, 112,000 letters. That is more than 300 letters a day; and I believe that, if not all of them, the overwhelming majority are dealt with and dealt with well. That is half the reason for the size of the Prime Minister's office. I believe that in the days of previous prime ministers, correspondence was considerably below that and the habit of communication between citizens and their prime minister had not developed to the same extent. I believe that all who work for me produce a service of which any prime minister would be proud. I would challenge any political leader in this country to produce a staff that would have the determination to be as objective and, quite frankly, as critical as mine.

Again, I do not want to belabour the point, but as the individual man-hours of my own staff have escalated in the past few years, the amount of assistance given to all opposition parties has also escalated, as I reminded the House a few minutes ago when I quoted the figures. If the opposition is perturbed about the Prime Minister's office, perhaps it can gain some comfort in looking at the escalation of its own budget and its own responsibilities.

[Translation]

I want to make sure that all members understand exactly what I mean. That is why I repeat that, in the administration area, which includes government decision-making centres, our objective is to ensure that the responsibility of decision making is totally discharged by the cabinet, with the support, in the House, of a well informed caucus, of which I am proud, Mr. Speaker.

However, once the study of the problems and the discussions are over, the ministers in Cabinet alone can discuss them and the responsible minister alone must make the final decision. Afterwards, in the House as in the country, each minister, in his area of responsibility, and the members of the caucus assume the collective responsibility of the decision, and are responsible for it to the population at election time. Such is the foundation of our system: the daily ministerial responsibility of making decisions before Parliament and the people. That is why, Mr. Chairman, I am in this House every day to explain and defend the decisions we make, and to answer the countless questions put to us by the opposition all year long.

I think that the system of ministerial responsibility is the best for the Canadian people. It prevents one group from assuming power and leaves it to those who were elected to exercise it. We have made considerable effort to improve and defend that system.

● (1620)

[English]

The opposition talk about the executive authority in our system being unknown or hidden away in the personage of non-elected officials. This is nonsense and they must know it. The executive in the Canadian system is, and has always been, the ministry and that ministry is present and accountable to parliament.

It is with perplexity and a degree of sadness that I see some members of the Conservative Party in this House try to establish an argument that our system and the United States presidential system are similar in decision-making processes. The two systems are so different. In the United States, the executive is the President and he is supported by ministers and officials of his own choosing. In Canada it is the ministry who are elected by their constituencies and collectively represent the executive. In the United States, the executive is not responsible to Congress; it is a parallel authority set up in a competitive checks and balances process. In Canada, the ministry is responsible to parliament and must defend itself there every day. As I have said, this government is in a position to be more sensitive to this than most, on the basis of the experience I quoted earlier.

As I understand it, some members of the Conservative Party seek to substantially alter our system of ministerial responsibility to parliament. Some do not appear to accept the responsibility of ministers to defend themselves in the House in the question period, on estimates or at committees of the House. Some Conservatives say that officials who are not elected and represent no one should be callable. It is one thing for officials to appear; but when they are speaking for themselves and not for the government, who is accountable? A minister, in this type of Conservative system, could say that the official's opinion is his own, not that of the minister. Our policy, Mr. Chairman, has been to improve and defend the system we have enjoyed in Canada for over 100 years and which has had a great role to play in preserving our democracy by making the elected member paramount in the decision-making process and accountable for his actions when he is a member of the ministry.

I do not know whether certain members of the opposition have grasped the essential lessons that have led to the confidence which Canadians have in their political process. But at the same time, I ask others to think very seriously about trying to introduce procedures which have no bearing on the Canadian parliamentary system. They may make fine political headlines, but I am not at all interested in the introduction of the process of a presidential form of government. I rather suspect that those who insist I am moving Canada in that direction are doing so for whatever political reason they feel will foster their own political motives.

Mr. Chairman, I think that is perhaps all I wish to say at this point.

An hon. Member: You have another five minutes.

Mr. Trudeau: I will give the further five minutes to the opposition. I will be pleased to answer whatever questions they may want to ask in that time.

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I can understand that the Prime Minister, of necessity, found it necessary to make a statement, and I also understand that he has to leave at 4.30. I have no quibble in respect of what he has done. I think he knows what I am saying. However, knowing his appreciation for justice, fair play and equity, and knowing that the agreement, as I understand it, was that the Prime Minister would make a statement and that questions could be asked as a result of that statement, I would ask the Prime Minister whether he would keep in mind the words I used, "justice, equity and fair play", for which he is so famous and reconsider the situation.

I understand that my House leader asked whether the Prime Minister would subject himself to questions at a later date. We understand that because of the pressures of his position he cannot be tied down and cannot give us a definite answer, but would he at least, in view of the statement and the agreement, agree that we are entitled to ask questions and that he will make himself available after discussion with the respective House leaders? Surely, Mr. Prime Minister, knowing how fair you can be, you will give us an answer right now.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, in the same spirit in which the hon. member asks the question, I will certainly stay another 35 minutes and deal with whatever questions can be asked in that time. I will explain to the people whom I am supposed to meet that I have been delayed for reasons of very great importance. I would assure the hon. member that after I have left, the House leader and the officials will be here to continue to answer questions that I may not have been able to field or perhaps did not have time to receive, and then perhaps at the end of the day the opposition can make a judgment concerning whether they have more questions to ask which only I and no one else can answer; and if that should be the case I will reconsider the suggestion made by the hon. member.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, on the same point of order, may I say we will have an opportunity to examine the Prime Minister on his estimates for less than half an hour. He tells us that we will have the views of the President of the Privy Council. I should like to say that when the President of the Privy Council appeared before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates he made the following statement:

I should explain that as President of the Privy Council I do not have responsibility for the Privy Council secretariat. I have a very small staff which attaches to me in my functions as President of the Privy Council which do not include the supervision of the Privy Council office—

In other words, the minister made it very clear when he appeared before the committee that he was there merely to satisfy our desire to have a minister for the estimates, when he in fact has no administrative responsibility whatsoever for these estimates.

Mr. Trudeau: I understand that, Mr. Chairman; but surely the essence of the question is, can the opposition get answers to the questions it wants to ask? So far I know of no questions which have been asked, of a pressing nature, which have not been answered. I repeat that if there are some questions which are so private and so secret that only I would know the answer to them, I will reconsider the request made by the hon. member for Hamilton West. However, I do not believe this is the case.

I believe the consideration of estimates is an occasion when the opposition wants to ask questions about spending figures. I am sure that should be the test. Whether it be myself, the leader of the House, the parliamentary secretary to the House leader or some other minister deputizing for me, the essence of the matter is, is the opposition getting the answers to which it is entitled? Beyond that, I repeat what I said at the outset of my speech: traditionally, parliament has been very indulgent in realizing that the prime minister has many executive functions, and that particularly under the temporary system of rules we have now adopted it is impossible to plan in advance, with any degree of certainty, whether or not a minister will be called.

I think the committee should understand that, and I repeat that it should base its judgment on the simple fact of whether or not the questions it is asking are being answered. The hon. member knows that I, myself, even if I were here until doomsday or for another ten years, as the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert seems to predict, will not know the answers in respect of some detailed estimate and I will ask my officials what particular set of figures corresponds to it. This is the practice of every minister of every government in appearing before this House. That is why I need the officials; the officials can help me, and certainly can help the House leader of our party.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I hope the Prime Minister will forgive me for making some comments before I ask him any questions, because I know that if I ask him questions he will take off in another half an hour.

I said a few moments ago, in response to some comment across the way, that I was angry. I was angry with myself. I felt I had been imprudent in so far as my colleagues are concerned, because when I was consulted this morning as to whether the Prime Minister should commence first with some remarks, or whether we wanted to speak first, I thought it was a matter of courtesy that when the Prime Minister comes into the House he should have the opportunity of leading off the discussion.

We had operated on the basis of 15-minute shots, so to speak, back and forth. I am sure the leader of the House, the President of the Privy Council, clearly understood this. I do not think it ever occurred to him—and I give him the benefit of the doubt—when he was talking to us that the Prime Minister would go on, not for 25 minutes but for virtually an hour and 25 minutes.

An hon. Member: Abuse of the agreement.

Mr. Stanfield: I felt I had let my side down by thinking I was dealing with gentlemen and suggesting that as a matter of courtesy, since the Prime Minister was coming to the House he should start off; but I realized a couple of minutes after he started that it would not have made any difference anyway, because regardless of whether he started off the discussion he would have chewed off the rest of the time anyway, as he came obviously prepared to do. Of course, we will have an opportunity in the evening to put some of these matters to a vote of confidence.

I want to say one or two things to the Prime Minister that I have not said before. He is here and this gives me an opportunity to do it. Others have dealt with the matter. The Prime Minister this afternoon has dealt with Stornoway and with the swimming pool. I want to say, with regard to the swimming pool and the comparison with the bomb-shelter, that I think the Prime Minister operates under two standards when he speaks about restraint. I say to him very bluntly across the floor of the House, although I have never felt it necessary to say this sort of thing to him before, that I do not think he can justify to the House, whether it be to members of this committee or to the people of Canada, the scale to which the swimming pool is being built, particularly in the condition in which this country finds itself now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Secondly, with respect to the swimming pool, I say to the Prime Minister—and I am even more serious about this point on which he touched himself—that he cannot justify the lack of disclosure of donors. He referred to the way in which Stornoway was acquired. To be frank about it—as I understand it, the NDP were not included but that is by the way—Stornoway is to be either for the leader of the Conservative Party or of the Liberal Party in opposition—the leader of the official opposition.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We will provide our own shack.

Mr. Stanfield: It is true that the names of donors was not disclosed, and it is true that that was an acceptable practice in those days. I am sure that those who made a donation never expected to receive any benefit from it. But I say quite bluntly—and I intended to say this before the Prime Minister raised the question today—that the procedure would not be satisfactory today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It would not be acceptable to the Canadian people, particularly in view of the requirements for disclosure with regard to election contributions. I say to the right hon. gentleman that generally we on this side of the House, and I suspect many hon. members on his side of the House, do not accept the fact that these contributions are being received from undisclosed sources. The Prime Minister should reverse himself. As I say, I think the swimming pool is of an unjustifiable scale, and I have never heard the Prime Minister attempt to justify it.

Mr. Trudeau: Could you explain why things have changed with respect to Stornoway?

Mr. Stanfield: Many things have changed since Stornoway with regard to contributions.

Mr. Trudeau: Tell us what.

Mr. Stanfield: The general attitude of the Canadian people toward contributions to political parties.

An hon. Member: The elections act.

An hon. Member: Dredging.

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister had an hour and 25 minutes in which to talk. I should like to make a point or two as bluntly and as fairly as I can to him. I say to him that the procedure followed with respect to Stornoway would not be acceptable today.

Mr. Trudeau: Because it applies to you, and this one to me.

Mr. Stanfield: There you go. I am not afraid to say what I have to say, Mr. Chairman. Unfortunately, that is the attitude of the Prime Minister of this country today. He applies two standards in terms of expenditures. I say to him in all bluntness—he can argue any way he likes—the procedure followed with respect to Stornoway would not be acceptable today, and certainly the procedure being followed by him or whoever is in charge of the swimming pool operation is not acceptable to this committee and to the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: As to the expenditures associated with the office of the leader of the opposition and with the research budget, I simply want to say this and nothing more relating to the establishment of positions or the expenditures relating to the office of leader of the opposition: that they were approved by Mr. Speaker. I know that the Prime Minister did not intend to apply any criticism of Mr. Speaker with regard to that.

Second, I would point out to him that in terms of anything approaching the fighting of political battles on even terms, the scale is heavily weighted in favour of the government, in spite of these changes. For example, any travelling by the staff of the leader of the opposition is not paid for by the government. The prime minister can take all his staff with him wherever he wants to go. Next, with regard to research, I appreciate the fact that the research budget exists, but there is no way in which the official opposition—let alone the NDP—can compete with the government on anything like even terms so far as research is concerned. The prime minister has his personal establishment and the whole civil service. I say, quite bluntly, all we can attempt to do with this kind of research budget is to meet parliamentary needs for which the grant was intended. In terms of day to day and week to week preparations, and in terms of any research in depth on economic matters such as is necessary in connection with budgets, tax reform and that sort of thing, for research we have to go outside and get help on a voluntary basis.

With regard to the dissatisfaction of the opposition with some of the practices being followed by the government, I simply wish to say that the opposition accepts that members of the civil service should not come before committees to answer questions relating to confidential matters or to policy. However, we assert that committees of the House have the right to question members of the civil service with regard to the manner in which they are spending, for example, funds voted by the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1640)

Mr. Stanfield: We contest the right of the Prime Minister, let alone the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, to say which of his officials may come before a committee if the committee wishes to question those officials. We contest the authority of a minister to decide which of his officials should come before the committee, although we willingly agree that officials ought not to be expected to answer questions relating to matters of confidentiality or policy.

One of the reasons we wanted this day was to put this point very clearly before the Prime Minister. I suggest to him it is nonsense to suggest that this is a departure from responsible government. Certainly the ministers are responsible to this House. Certainly the ministers and the cabinet collectively are responsible for policy and the development of policy; but equally, committees of this House are entitled to question people in the government service as to how moneys are being spent. That is a right we assert, will continue to assert and which in our judgment the members of the government have no right to deny.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I intend to stay within the 15 minute rule in an attempt to set an example in that respect. There is also an area of the government which does not seem to be answerable to committees at all, the area in which the Privy Council and the office of the Prime Minister operate. As the hon. member for St. John's East indicated, the President of the Privy Council appeared before a committee and said that he had no administrative responsibility for the Privy Council. I want to insist, again, that we are not asking that any official in the Privy Council office should come before a committee and discuss anything of a confidential nature, but it is very clear that no minister is able to go before a committee and discuss with any degree of competence or authority what is taking place.

Mr. Beatty: It is like Edgar Bergen leaving Charlie McCarthy behind to answer questions.

Mr. Stanfield: The House leader himself admitted that he did not have competence, that things did not come under his authority and that he would have to seek the answer from someone else and get it second-hand.

Mr. Sharp: That's right; just like the Prime Minister.

Mr. Stanfield: What possible reason is there for the committee not to hear from the officials rather than through some filtered version brought in, in his own inimitable way, by the government House leader?

Mr. Sharp: Because we are responsible, not the officials.

Mr. Stanfield: Ministers are responsible to the House for policy, and members of the opposition have a responsibility to the people of Canada to make inquiries relating to expenditures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: We are entitled to that information and I suggest that gobbledygook, talk about responsible government and distorting the concept and the principle of responsible government is no answer at all. This has become a large area of government operations. I am not suggesting that committees should be able to receive answers as to matters of policy within the office of the Prime Minister, but if a committee of the House wants to question the principal assistant to the Prime Minister on certain matters relating to administration and certain matters relating to expenditures, I do not know why there is anything improper about that and why that does not come within the terms of reference of parliament generally as to what is appropriate to inquire into.

Policy matters in the office of the Prime Minister are clearly no business of ours. I wish to make the point that ministers are exercising a prerogative of determining which of their officials may appear before committees regardless of the wishes of the committees, and the government on the whole is blocking off a large section of the government service, making it immune from questioning by government committees and attempting to justify this in terms of responsible government. I simply say that that is a complete distortion of responsible government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Before the Prime Minister made his long-winded speech which was clearly an abuse of the committee, I did not intend to say very much and I am not going to say anything more at this time. I am not going to interfere with the questioning or statements by my colleagues down the line here. But I hope that after the Prime Minister leaves the government House leader will give some justification for the failure to disclose contributions relating to the swimming pool, besides the precedent alleged in connection with Stornoway; that the government House leader will give some justification for the scope of the expenditure, and that he will agree that it is appropriate for committees to hear evidence, ask questions and receive answers from members of the public service provided that these are not in the area of confidentiality or policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Beatty.]

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, this should have been, and could have been, a very important debate. We should be debating how the democratic system of government works in an age as complex as the 1970s. Instead, we have dealt with what may be much more interesting to the gossip columnists in regard to how much the swimming pool costs and who paid for it, which is irrelevant to the running and effective operation of government in this day and age.

We backbenchers know the pressure of work for the Prime Minister, cabinet ministers, the Leader of the Opposition and other important government officials, and if it is felt that for the well-being of the Prime Minister a swimming pool or stocking fish at his summer home is needed, I do not think the people of Canada will object. I think they would be and are prepared to pay for these things directly, without having anonymous contributors paying for them. But to me, those are not the important questions. What is important is how the system is working. Do we have an open system? Does the public know what is going on? Does the public receive the facts on which it can come to intelligent conclusions about the important questions which have to be dealt with by government? That is what is important, and not only is it impossible for members of the opposition to receive the information they need but it is impossible for the general public to receive the basic information it requires.

It is not just the Privy Council office which has grown in size; every department of government has. I have discussed this on other occasions. The number of senior executive officers grew from 381 in 1968 to 895 in 1973, the last year for which I have figures. It may have been necessary to increase the size of the senior civil service by that number, but neither the Prime Minister nor any other minister has given an adequate explanation of why it was necessary. At the time that increase was taking place the government was hiring hundreds of consultants to do studies on separate questions. Tens of millions of dollars are paid out in fees, and what happens to the studies? They become the property of the government of Canada. The research they do and the conclusions they come to are locked away in files and are not available to members of parliament, to journalists or to the general public. How can the public decide on important questions in these circumstances?

● (1650)

A few days ago a senior journalist of the Globe and Mail wrote a long article about development in northern Canada. He related the continuous conflict between senior officials of Environment Canada who are concerned, as they should be, about the deterioration of the environment there as we begin to use the resources, and the economic development officials of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I do not know, neither does any other member of the House except perhaps the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, which side of the conflict holds the correct opinion. How can I know when the information on which each side comes to its conclusion is hidden from everybody?

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this is the question we should be discussing, rather than the question of who paid for the swimming pool or for stocking the lake at the summer home of the prime minister. Members of parliament on both sides of the House—that is, backbench members on the government side—do not have the same information as a serious journalist in the press gallery in Ottawa. I talked to one journalist today who told me that in the course of a year, without looking for it, he is offered the opportunity to interview at least 50 senior officials at the deputy minister or assistant deputy minister level to discuss for an hour or two the programs and policies of their departments. He can ask all the questions he wants and can use the detailed answers he gets, unless he attributes them to any particular official. Members of parliament do not have that right.

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the people of Canada elect us to come here to see that the government runs the country as it should. But I say, with regret, that members of parliament have less opportunity to get the information on which to base their decisions than any good journalist in the press gallery in Ottawa—and I say that is a disgrace.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: In his remarks, the Prime Minister said that we have open government. Mr. Chairman, every member of this parliament who sits on committees knows that is nonsense. At any committee dealing with the estimates of a department, which may meet perhaps ten times, the minister will appear once or twice and after that no more. If you ask an embarrassing question, the deputy minister will say—I go back to the kind of thing the Prime Minister was talking about, the so-called theory of responsible government—that the question is on a matter of policy which only the minister can answer.

Let us look at how decisions are made. There was the tax reform which we had after the Carter commission report. The business interests, the mining companies, the oil companies stood to lose a great deal if tax policies in regard to resource industries were changed. But when did they come before the government? Did they come to committee and get ten minutes for their presentation? No. They met, not just with the ministers but with deputy ministers and assistant deputy ministers. They made their representations where it counted. The Carter commission said a buck was a buck no matter where it came from, and it should be taxed accordingly.

Then there was a white paper which watered down the Carter Commission recommendations. Finally, there was the tax bill which had virtually nothing in it of what Mr. Carter suggested. That is an illustration of how government really operates in this country.

Let us look at tariffs. In the last few weeks a couple of constituents have written to me because a tariff has suddenly changed. I asked a question today which two ministers said they could not answer. There are large-scale lay-offs at a rubber plant in Whitby which the union says have occurred because there has been a sharp reduction—

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): There he goes, sneaking out.

Mr. Orlikow: —in tariffs and an increase of half a million to 3½ million tires per year coming in from the United States. Mr. Chairman, you can be sure the people interested in making cars and tires had their say with the senior officials in the Department of National Revenue long before members of parliament ever got to them.

Let us take the discussions going on between the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Labour, and I do not know who else, about the so-called consensus that is sought with business, industry and labour unions. Businessmen, manufacturers, retailers and labour leaders all know a hell of a lot more about what the Minister of Finance is trying to do than does any member of parliament. Talk about downgrading parliament! That is the way it is done.

Let us take another illustration of the way the real decisions are made; that is, federal-provincial relationships. I am not talking about just the two or three meetings, well publicized, which the ministers have every year. Almost every weekend when I am on my way home I meet some senior civil servant from Manitoba who is returning to Winnipeg. I am sure hon. members from other provinces find the same thing. These senior people have been meeting with their federal counterparts in Ottawa discussing in detail some joint or shared program for perhaps health or welfare or post-secondary education or anything else you can think of. By the time these questions come to parliament, the bill has been discussed, signed, sealed and delivered and we are faced with a fait accompli. If this is a democratic system, then I do now know what a democratic system is.

That is the way the real government of Canada is going more and more—to federal-provincial conferences. I am not saying the provinces should not be consulted. I am not saying that in our federal system, with a constitution which defines the responsibilities of federal and provincial jurisdictions, that does not have to take place; I am saying that when the Prime Minister talks about open, responsible government he is talking about some never-never land; he is not talking about Canada in 1975.

I can say to the Prime Minister and the government House leader that I have learned a great deal more about what the federal government is proposing to do in many fields by talking to the contacts I have in provincial governments, both elected and civil servants, than I have ever learned as a member of parliament. It is an accident that I know these people. Most members of parliament probably do not have access to such contacts. Nevertheless, that is the situation.

The basic question which we ought to be discussing today and are not discussing is whether we believe in open government. That has nothing to do with members of parliament being slighted or downgraded, which is the case now. We ought to address ourselves, as I said, to the question of open government. I submit that unless the government is open, our society cannot be considered as being truly democratic. Yes, we have all the trappings, all the façade of democracy. But the system is not run by the prime minister or cabinet ministers; increasingly, it is run by faceless bureaucrats. They make the hundreds and thousands of decisions which must be made every day, every week.

I know my time is limited; therefore let me make this point. I suggest that hon. members who are interested in this question should look at the recent issue of the London Sunday Times which has printed extensive excerpts from the diary of Richard Crossman, one of the most competent and knowledgeable leaders in two of the last three Labour governments of Great Britain. They will see what he says about the importance of senior civil servants; that it is they who can make or break a program. They can rewrite a speech. Not only can they rewrite speech, but they do. Sometimes the speech a minister makes does not support his own housing policy but supports the policy of the former government.

My point is not that we do not need senior civil servants, not that we do not need government intervention in the lives of Canadians. In this complex day and age it is increasingly important for the government to become involved. My point is that we ought to, and must, have control of the system. I say the system is out of control; that the increase in the number of bureaucrats or senior civil servants is not justified; that this government has not found a way to control such growth; and that the growth of the bureaucracy is continuing and accelerating. I say that members of parliament and the public have a right to know. Instead of adopting the sort of guidelines the Prime Minister spoke about and which were adopted a couple of years ago, which simply legitimize, so to speak, the government's policy of not making public important information, I say we should look closely at the Swedish system in which every document, every state paper, every study is made public immediately unless there are special reasons why this should not be done. Those are the kinds of questions we ought to have debated today. I am sorry to note that we have not even touched on them.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I regret that because of the excessive time taken by the Prime Minister in speaking, he is not now in the chamber to answer questions which I and other members on my side of the House wish to put to him. That, unfortunately, is a typical performance by the Prime Minister who talks so much about being in the House and being responsible to members of parliament who have questions to put to him. The only time he stays in the House to receive questions is during the question period when the rules and his own particular style of not answering protect him from questions, however effective, put by members on my side of the House.

The contemptuous display by the Prime Minister today is in violation—I say this with some anger because I was involved in the discussions that I thought set the ground rules for the discussion today—of the understanding that we on this side had when we agreed to extend to the Prime Minister the courtesy of leading off. We were given to understand that he would use that courtesy, make a short address outlining some of the functions of the office which reports only to him, and answer questions. His abusing that courtesy and speaking for three times as long as he stayed to answer questions in the House shows that he is a Prime Minister who holds this House and his responsibilities to it in very low regard.

Mr. Cullen: That is absolute nonsense, and you know it.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

An hon. Member: That was an American style filibuster.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): I want to make one quick reference to the question of responsible government which was dwelt upon by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister suggested that he and his colleagues in cabinet are responsible to the House of Commons because once, on a rare occasion, he was defeated on a budget motion and an election was called. But the fact remains, and it is clear to the Prime Minister and anybody else in the House who will admit it, that there is no kind of day to day control by members of the House over the government. In a majority position they are going to do what they like until there is an election.

Mr. Cullen: The government is always responsible.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): There is responsibility when elections occur, but that is responsibility to an electorate. I suggest that is a system which appears to have much more in common with the traditions of the United States presidential system than with the traditional system of responsible government which we have known.

I want to deal with some of the functions of those highly mysterious offices, the Prime Minister's office and the Privy Council office. It is noteworthy that the Prime Minister, who came here presumably to filibuster instead of to answer questions, did not even spend most of his filibuster dealing with the operation of the PCO and PMO. He spent most of his filibuster trying to answer the right hon. member for Prince Albert, even though the right hon. gentleman was not in the House, and others.

Mr. Boulanger: He was answering questions; you know that.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): He put his answers on record in the right hon. gentleman's absence. But I am interested in the organization of the Privy Council office. I regret to have to come back to the minister who holds no responsibility in this. We have discussed the matter previously in the standing committee. I have read the document written by Mr. Robertson. I have read whatever else has been published on the subject and written, however carefully, about the functions of that office. I certainly understand the importance and validity of change. As times change, as needs change there is a necessity for change in the way government responds.

I recognize the need for an office performing a coordinating function at the centre of government. It seems to me, and I put this to the acting prime minister, that as the system is now arranged the Privy Council office is designed to bring in everyone but parliament. Privy Council officers come from and go back to various line departments. Ministers sit on specialist cabinet committees, but parliament has to fight to get a minister to defend the estimates. Then we get a minister before the committee who starts off by saying, as my leader and other colleagues indicated earlier, that he does not have responsibility for the estimates we are considering.

We cannot bring before us the deputy minister who does have that responsibility, and we are able to get the responsible minister before us only by the extraordinary procedure of bringing on this sort of debate: he came before the committee and, in a filibuster, talked for about 1½ hours, then ran away after some lead-off remarks had been made by representatives on the opposition side. He ran away. So I say there seems to have been an attempt under the system in the past to bring in everyone but parliament. It is clear that the Privy Council office is no longer a secretariat. Mr. Robertson said, on page 18 of the English version of "The Changing Role of the Privy Council Office":

> As a department provides its ministers with analysis, advice and recommendations on the objectives of the department, so the Privy Council office gives the Prime Minister information, analysis and advice on the totality of policies.

So it is not just a secretariat; it is a department like others, but has considerably more power than other departments. Following the lines and the logic of Mr. Robertson, it should be subject to regular review in the same way as other departments. I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister, if he has been briefed by Mr. Pitfield or whoever briefs him, how he proposes to have that kind of review on a regular basis without having to resort to this extraordinary situation where the Prime Minister comes in for a monologue and flees. How does he propose to have parliament review what is going on in the Privy Council office with at least the same regularity and scrutiny as is done with the Post Office?

● (1710)

I would like to serve notice of my understanding. I am very careful about this. We had an understanding that the speech by the Prime Minister would be short and that I had 15 minutes in which to place questions and receive answers. Is that correct? If not, I will list some questions.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member is seeking the advice of the Chair. The hon. member has 20 minutes. We are not operating under any special order, but the Standing Orders. I refer the hon. member to Standing Order 55(3) which allows him 20 minutes.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): I wonder if it would be agreeable to the committee to follow the same procedure as when the Department of Transport estimates were before the House, which allowed each member 15 minutes. I must say I was under the impression that was the case. Is that agreeable to the committee? I see heads nodding. My understanding is I will have 15 minutes, and by sitting down now to hear the acting prime minister respond I am not prevented from carrying on.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I certainly have no objection to reverting to the kinds of procedures that were agreed to when the Minister of Transport was before the committee. As I understood those rules, there were various alternatives. An hon. member can take 15 minutes and make a speech without expecting any reply. He can make a shorter speech and have the minister reply for the rest of the 15 minutes. He could use the 15 minutes for a question and answer period, with the minister's reply being part of the 15 minutes. I am certainly prepared to go along with that.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): I hope the Acting Prime Minister will not follow in the shadow too closely of the man he is replacing and will answer briefly so I will have a chance for one or two more questions.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It has been suggested by the hon. member for Rocky Mountain that the rules that were applied when the Minister of Transport was before the committee be adopted for the remainder of the sitting of this committee. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, as I understood the question put by the hon. member for Rocky Mountain, it was, what procedure should there be for a regular review of the operations of the Privy Council office? I thought that was what we were engaged upon today, and were engaged upon when the estimates were before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. I have some difficulty because for the most part in our discussions so far there have been general statements and not specific questions. If the hon. member has some specific questions he would like to put to me, I have some officials in front of me who are members of the staff of the Privy Council office and they can assist me in answering.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I thought I was putting a specific question. At least for members on this side of the House this arrangement is completely unsatisfactory because in the standing committee we cannot get the responsible minister, since that is the Prime Minister. When we take the extraordinary step of coming into the House of Commons, we have a situation where the Prime Minister talks for a long time and then leaves. I think what is going on in the Privy Council and in the Prime Minister's office, according to the testimony of Mr. Gordon Robertson and others, is sufficiently important that it should be subject to at least the kind of regular review as the estimates of the Post Office.

Let me ask the acting prime minister this: As his parliamentary secretary at least will be aware, I proposed, and it came up for debate on December 9, a private member's resolution in the following language:

> That, in the opinion of this House, a committee should be selected to consider the powers, prerogatives and privileges attaching to the office of Prime Minister and to report what safeguards are desirable or necessary to secure the constitutional principles of the sovereignty of parliament and the supremacy of the law.

I would be quite happy to extend that to include the Privy Council office. In light of the problem that is certainly seen from the point of view of the opposition, if there is in fact a system of responsible government, there should be some concern for the point of view of the opposition. Will the Acting Prime Minister consider establishing that kind of committee, or taking some other steps to ensure there is provision whereby parliament can regularly deal with a responsible minister on policy questions relating to the Privy Council offices without having to resort to the extraordinary procedures we have had in this case?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I do not think these are extraordinary procedures. I know the hon. member has not been in the House very long. Perhaps I might review how the estimates of the Privy Council and the Prime Minister's office were handled in the past. When we had the old rules in the Pearson administration, the estimates were handled by my predecessors in office, the presidents of the privy council.

Mr. Lamontagne, now Senator Lamontagne, handled them in December, 1963. Mr. McIlraith handled them in April, 1964. Mr. Favreau handled them in February, 1966, and in June, 1966. In 1967, it was the president of the treasury board who handled the estimates. Therefore, there is nothing extraordinary about this procedure. Indeed, I sometimes wonder why the issue is being raised now when it was not raised in 1968 when my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, was president of the privy council and handled the estimates.

Mr. Stanfield: We knew there was no use asking him anything.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): I take it from that recitation of past history that the acting prime minister does not intend to change this situation where we cannot get a minister before the committee and we cannot get a deputy minister before the committee. When the Prime Minister shows up, he talks for most of his time, usually irrelevantly, and then leaves. Is that the only kind of supervision the House of Commons is going to have, what the Acting Prime Minister delights in calling a responsible system, over the estimates and activities of a group which by definition co-ordinates the policy of the Government of Canada? Am I correct in understanding there is to be no change in that situation of secrecy and impossibility of direct access?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I am still waiting for the questions. I have been sitting here patiently and I have listened to arguments that we are not responsible. I am sitting here prepared to take the responsibility. I would like to have the questions put to me.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): My only response is that I am waiting for an answer to a question I have put three times in quite specific terms. My impression is that the answer is there will be no change in the hiding away of the Privy Council and the Prime Minister's office relevant to questions about policy, and there will be no change in the situation where no responsible minister appears. I wish to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the Privy Council office is now preparing any proposals on parliamentary reform. Where are those proposals? What are they? What kinds of reform do they anticipate? What is the procedure to bring them to this House of Commons before they come here in the form of a bill, or is that being left entirely to a group of civil servants who operate some distance from this House whose rules will be effected, without any ready access by this House to them?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should remind the hon. member that as President of the Privy Council and chairman of the House committee on procedure and organization, in so far as the rules of the House are concerned I do have some responsibility which I plan to discharge. I have received excellent advice from parliament, the hon. member for Peace River, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and my parliamentary secretary—very experienced men. I doubt very much whether officials of the Privy Council office have as much experience as we have, and certainly none of us would want them to bring in the reform of parliament.

It is true that from time to time I do consult with some of the people who have some responsibility to me, for example the secretary of the committee on legislation and House planning, which is one of the committees I happen to chair in the cabinet. I ask his advice. He is an experienced man who has been around for a long time. He is a distinguished lawyer and I find his advice extremely helpful. But I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that as President of the Privy Council I take responsibility in matters concerning the reform of parliament.

● (1720)

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his time has expired. Before calling upon the hon. member for St. Paul's, I should like to announce the subjects of the adjournment debate this evening: the hon. member for Vancouver South—Supply and Services; the hon. member for Northwest Territories—Indian Affairs; the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte—Transport.

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, I have been somewhat puzzled by the debate so far, and a little disappointed.

An hon. Member: My heart bleeds for you.

Mr. Roberts: Hon. members on the other side are often disappointing, and I am disappointed with their performance today. I am disappointed because I have been reading some of the articles which have been published by the hon. member for Rocky Mountain. I believe, like him, that there are important questions which should be discussed in some detail concerning the role of the Prime Minister's office and of the Privy Council office. It is important that the House should understand the function of these offices in the governmental process and their relation to this House.

I was surprised, therefore, when the hon. member went off on a tangent. He complained, for example, that the Prime Minister was only here for an hour every day for questioning. Only an hour! If one goes to Great Britain one finds that the members of the British House are extraordinarily pleased when the prime minister comes into the chamber to answer questions twice a week for about 15 minutes. If one talks to U.S. congressmen or senators, as I had the pleasure of doing a few weeks ago, one finds they are astonished that the leader of the government should come into the House of Commons for an hour a day to respond to questions of which he has been given no notice. They find this difficult to believe. When they see it in operation they are even inclined to think that it is a show staged for their benefit. Nowhere in the world has a legislature more opportunity to question a leader of government than is the case here in Canada.

I was surprised, again, when the hon. member complained about the length of the Prime Minister's statement today. If the Prime Minister had come in with a statement lasting five minutes, or ten minutes, the very same member would be complaining that the Prime Minister had not taken the trouble to prepare a serious speech for the benefit of the committee. If he had made a short speech, members opposite would have complained he had not taken sufficient time to explain the situation.

An hon. Member: You are pettyfogging now.

Mr. Roberts: The hon. member says I am pettyfogging. He is being merely petty.

There remains the question, why has there been an expansion in the role of the Prime Minister's office and an increase in the number of its staff? The same question applies to the Privy Council office. The answer is the same as the one which explains the growth which has taken place in the office of the Leader of the Opposition. The same answer accounts for the growth of, for instance, the office of the Premier of Ontario. It applies to virtually every government in the past ten years.

There are two reasons for the growth which has taken place. The first is the pressure of detail in government, and the second is the pressure of time. How are contemporary governments to deal effectively with the mass of detail which demands their attention and the pressures on time when proposing legislation, when proposing expenditure, when proposing budgetary policy, in societies as complex as those of today? Again, how are governments to find the amount of time required, including time for consultation with opposition parties, between ministries, with government members, with outside interests? How can the executive be organized effectively in such a way as to allocate correctly the time available for necessary discussion before coming to a decision? These are the factors which in our system lead to the necessity of providing help—

An hon. Member: I think Parkinson understood the process better than you do.

Mr. Roberts: If the hon. member wants to refer to Parkinson, it is interesting that there should have been a faster rate of expansion in the staff of the Leader of the Opposition than there has been in that of the Prime Minister. Perhaps he needs a lot more help, for reasons which I think are obvious to members of the House.

There is a need for assistance. There is a need for a fusion of political and governmental responsibility at cabinet level, and at the level of the Prime Minister. We may not like this. We may feel it would be preferable to adopt the American system. But in a parliamentary system, this is where the fusion takes place, the fusion of government and political authority.

We have two instruments to assist the cabinet. One is basically political though not particularly partisan—the Prime Minister's office. It is not simply a service provided for the Prime Minister, but it is intended to assist the cabinet in its political function. The other is the Privy Council office, where expansion has also taken place, to assist the cabinet in the performance of its governmental functions.

I had hoped that the hon. member for Rocky Mountain would discuss today his theory that this expansion is leading to the presidentalization of Canadian politics. In my view, the arguments he has presented in an effort to substantiate this point, in newspapers and elsewhere, misconstrue the fundamental nature of the system which has been established. The basic difference between the operations of the PMO and the PCO and a presidential office is this—that those of the PMO and PCO are essentially staff functions; they are not executive functions but an advisory role undertaken in relation to the cabinet. To repeat, the PMO and the PCO are not executive arms.

Why is their advisory role necessary? Members may recall the words of President Kennedy when he was trying to explain how he became involved in the Bay of Pigs operation. He said: I should have learned long ago that I ought not to rely only on the experts. Any leader of government who relies upon advice from only one source will inevitably end up in trouble. The function of the PCO and PMO is to provide alternative sources of advice. The Privy Council office provides views alternative to those furnished to the cabinet through the ordinary departmental mechanism of the civil service. The Prime Minister's office provides the Prime Minister and the cabinet with a source of advice in relation to political issues alternative to that provided by the House, by caucus and by other means. The objective is to ensure that the range of options open to the cabinet is as wide as possible.

The hon. member for Rocky Mountain asked why parliament is not involved in this privy council activity. The answer is that there is a distinction between the executive and parliament—between the government and parliament.

Parliament is not an executive arm. It is, if you like, the inquest of the nation. It has a right to assess what the government has done; it assesses a budget before passing on it; it assesses legislation before passing on it; it assesses expenditure—rather badly, I think—before passing on it. Parliament is, I repeat, the inquest of the nation, it is the forum for grievances and it is the method of judging the performance of the government—but it is not the government itself. That is why there is not an integral participation by members of parliament, or of parliament, in the Prime Ministerial office or the Privy Council office. They are part of the organs and structure of government. They play an advisory role in decision taking. Parliament plays its role not in decision making, but in scrutinizing and control.

● (1730)

What does that imply, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North asked for the necessity, or the difficulty, of establishing open government in Canada?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It closes the door.

Mr. Roberts: I suggest to the hon. member that it does not close the door. He might find it interesting to have a look at a book by George Reedy, President Johnson's press secretary, called "The Twilight of a Presidency". Mr. Reedy discusses the problems that are inherent—

An hon. Member: That is exactly what we mean.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It not only closes the door, it locks it.

Mr. Roberts: If hon. gentlemen will contain their impatience for a moment I will make the point better than they ever could, and then answer the point as they never could.

Reedy points out that there are difficulties in establishing any institutional set of information arrangements around a president. These arrangements have a tendency to become themselves clogged channels, and hold the president off from the necessary range of information that he needs to come to effective decision making in relation to the problems that are before him. There is a danger, in other words, given the pressures of time and the pressure of detail—there is a danger of isolating the executive office from the political context.

Fortunately in a parliamentary system we have arranged methods of communication which side step that difficulty—which avoid a political isolation of decision making. They are relatively simple but they are extraordinarily important to the operation of a parliamentary system. The first is one which the hon. member for Rocky Mountain touched upon, and that is the question period.

Unlike an American president, the Canadian Prime Minister every day in parliament comes down to the House to listen to questions, to answer questions, to be here for an hour to respond to points which are made, without notice, by members of the opposition. Even if he wanted to it would be impossible for him to insulate himself from the currents of opinion, welcome or unwelcome, which are presented to him in the Commons.

Secondly, he has each day of each week—

Mr. Lefebvre: It would not be so bad if they were at least good questions.

Mr. Roberts: Well, it is very difficult to get good questions from the opposition, but I think we should be charitable and admit that once in a while they come up with one.

The opportunity is there—and the impossibility of insulating himself from public opinion, and the impossibility of insulating himself from contact with the opposition arguments, force a Prime Minister, unlike the presidential system, to come down and open himself to the attack of the opposition on the floor of the House every day that parliament is sitting.

The second device we have, which is very important to a parliamentary system, is that of the caucus meeting. Every week, once a week, for between two and three hours the Prime Minister must open himself up to the confidential but very effective scrutiny, comments, criticism, advice and exhortations of party members. He is plunged into the middle of a team process, a political team process which makes him necessarily sensitive to the currents of opinion in the country.

An hon. Member: That would be alright if you had a good team.

Mr. Roberts: Well, the Canadian electorate at the last election decided we had a much better team than that team which sits over there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: The third aspect, which is of enormous importance, is the very institution of Cabinet government. It says that the Prime Minister cannot rely simply upon those throughout the nation he would wish to appoint to be his servants as the executive. He allies himself with a group of politicians, with their interests, with their careers, and with their political sensitivity. He is the leader, the first minister of the party, but he is not a dictator in Cabinet. He operates basically in a consensus forum, and he must carry with him that group of politicians with whom he is associated.

It is simply not possible for a Canadian Prime Minister to isolate himself from the currents of political opinion, as so unfortunately has been seen to have happened in the United States under the presidential system.

I would argue that the growth of the Prime Ministerial office and the Privy Council office, to which members of the opposition have objected, is not in conflict with the responsibilities of the Prime Minister in the House of Commons, but indeed enhances the latter. For the blunt fact of the matter is that one man, a Prime Minister, or even a group of men in Cabinet, are not going to be able to control sufficiently a mass of civil servants with the complexity of the problems with which Cabinet must deal, and in the detail with which those civil servants must deal with them, unless they have advisory help.

It is the Prime Minister and the Cabinet, not civil servants, who must come down to the House of Commons and persuade members in the House. They count upon the support of the House of Commons, but in turn they are the agents of the House of Commons, agents who control civil servants.

You can, if you wish, deprive them of staff and support, deprive them of the people who give them assistance, and deprive them of the advisory expertise and knowledge they require to dominate the civil service and make sure the civil service follows political direction. What you will have done is not increase the responsiblity of the government to the opposition, what you will have done is create irresponsible government. It will be irresponsible because you will have placed civil servants beyond the effective control of the Cabinet and, therefore, beyond the effective control of the House of Commons itself.

If you really believe in the responsibility of government and administration to political leadership, and if you believe in the responsibility of the Cabinet and the Prime Minister to the House of Commons, and thus to the people, then give the Prime Minister and give the Cabinet the kind of staff they need to make that responsibility effective in dealing with the civil service structure. If you deprive them of staff, assistance, and the expertise they need, you will cut them off at the knees; you will indeed make them weaker in dealing with the administration of the government, but you will not have enhanced the power of the House of Commons to control the destiny of this country.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, the President of the Privy Council in a reply to the hon. member for Rocky Mountain tried to make a case for the fact that his presence here today in connection with the passage of these estimates is merely following the accepted practice of the House. He raised the question as to why this matter is even now being raised as an issue.

It is an issue because the question involves accountability, as put forward by the Leader of the Opposition, and the right of parliament through its committees to hold government departments and public servants accountable for expenditures of public funds.

Why then do we depart from the procedure that has been followed in connection with the estimates of the Privy Council office and the Prime Minister's office? It is because of the growth in size and power of the office of the Prime Minister since the present incumbent was sworn into office.

The Prime Minister has talked about a presidential system. I submit that we are being denied the right, in the context of a new rule of the Prime Minister's office and the office of the Clerk of the Privy Council, to examine the spending estimates of what is in fact now a fully fledged department of government. In being so denied, the government has set up, ipso facto, parallel power. We have arrived in fact at almost the point where we have a presidential system in this country.

We have seen the role of Cabinet ministers being diminished concomitant with the increase in the power of the office of the Prime Minister and the office of the Clerk of the Privy Council. At the same time we now have growth, in importance and in frequency, of the federal-provincial conferences of ministers—meetings of first ministers. All of these things erode parliament and the power of parliament to hold the government accountable. The government denies us the right to examine in committee the estimates of this new department of government, which was so described by the former Clerk of the Privy Council when he said, or referred to it as a department which provides its minister with analyses, advice and recommendations on the objectives of the department. So the Privy Council does give the Prime Minister information, analyses and advice on the totality of policy, and it has clearly emerged as a department of government.

● (1740)

That brings us to the question of why we are following this procedure today. Before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee of this House, we were denied the right to examine the Clerk of the Privy Council. We were denied the right to examine a man who is in effect, deputy minister of a department. We have the evidence of the President of the Privy Council who appeared before the committee and admitted that he had no administrative responsibility for these estimates. So we have taken the only route open to us, that of taking an opposition day for the purpose of bringing these estimates to the House and for the purpose of giving some credence to the argument put forward by the President of the Privy Council that, to say the least, it is unusual for a Prime Minister to be called before a parliamentary committee. So we arranged to have his estimates brought before the Committee of the Whole House.

In doing so we did it on the understanding that the Prime Minister would be in the House not only to explain the substantial increase in his spending estimates, and not only to explain the change in the role of the office of the Prime Minister and the office of the Privy Council but also to answer questions in relation thereto.

What happened? We had the Prime Minister here for less than two hours. A good part of that time, an hour and 25 minutes, was taken up by the Prime Minister himself even though there was a clear understanding that we would be operating under the same procedure that applied to the estimates of the Department of Transport which were before the House last week. That was the understanding to which we agreed. As my leader said, we allowed the Prime Minister to lead off because the estimates are his and it is only right that he should defend his estimates, and also in recognition of the importance of the office of the Prime Minister, not realizing for a moment that he would come before the House, use up his time, and take off for parts unknown.

The Prime Minister should have been in the House for the continuation of this debate. He could have delegated the President of the Privy Council to represent him wherever it is he must be tonight, or he could have delegated the parliamentary secretary to the President of the Privy Council, because there is nothing as important as the function of this parliament in that every minister, whether or not it be the Prime Minister, must be accountable to parliament for the spending of estimates.

It is rather interesting that one can trace the growth in the expenditures and power of the office of the Prime Minister to the new rules adopted by the House when parliament in 1968 gave up the right to withhold supply, when we gave up committee of supply and our traditional rights under the British parliamentary practice. At that moment we lost control of the public purse, and at that moment we had the growth begin in the size and expenditures of the Prime Minister's office and the office of the Privy Council.

Then following that we had the regional desks. What happened to them? We know what happened to the roster system whereby ministers were denied the opportunity to go to the House daily to be accountable during the question period. We also had the economic advisory committee or the finance advisory committee that was set up with ultimate and parallel power to that of the Department of Finance. All these things concern us. This is the reason why we wanted to have the Prime Minister in the House today.

We do not want to talk about chandeliers and ash trays but rather the real gut issue, which is the fact that the Prime Minister and his office now wield power while accountable to no one. Under the present system the Prime Minister has power and authority and is accountable to no one. Clearly we have the emergence in Canada of a separation of the executive from the parliamentary system. We now have the Prime Minister's office wielding power at federal-provincial conferences. We have the emergence of the federal-provincial secretariat. Hardly a month goes by when there is not a federal-provincial conference of some kind, and of course we have the annual conferences of first ministers. All of this is in keeping with the emergence of the Prime Minister's office and the fact that the office is no longer accountable to parliament.

Mr. Reid: No longer?

Mr. McGrath: No longer accountable to parliament. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary will explain why the Prime Minister is not in the House today to answer questions on his estimates?

Mr. Reid: Mr. Chairman, I think the short answer to that is that the government told the House of Commons a year ago—

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary will have ample time to speak on his estimates and perhaps he will explain to us how it is that the estimates of the Prime Minister's office have increased over 40 times in the past ten years. Perhaps he can also explain to us the growing practice of the government to hire outside consultants, a practice which has even found its way into the office of the Prime Minister and the office of the President of the Privy Council. There is an item in the estimates of $1 billion this year for consultants.

I should like to ask the President of the Privy Council a question concerning security. We are now told by the former President of the Treasury Board, the present Minister of Public Works, that every department of the government now has within its estimates funds dealing with security. Perhaps he will explain the role and function of the officer for security planning, and what kind of budget he has.

He might tell us what the relationship is between this function and the communications branch, for example, of the Department of National Defence. Perhaps he will explain the relationship of this security planning officer to the RCMP. To whom does he report? Exactly what are his functions vis-à-vis these other security services I have mentioned. Also at the same time the President of the Privy Council might tell the committee exactly how much of the funds within the estimates are allocated for security purposes about which this House has no knowledge.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should begin by giving a rather general description of the functions of the Privy Council office and quote from the document that has been referred to with such admiration by various spokesmen for the other party, that is, the paper on the changing role of the Privy Council by Gordon Robertson, who at that time was Secretary to the Cabinet. He said some interesting things about the role of the office of the Privy Council which refer to security as well as to other matters, and I will deal with that after I have dealt with the general principles.

Mr. Robertson at page 19 of this paper said this:

> The Privy Council Office operates no programs and administers no projects except those which are related to its own housekeeping. Administration and action are with the departments. It is the minister who is responsible and his department that acts. The Privy Council Office remains aware and is frequently informed or consulted, but enters the game only if inter-agency operation is required where a 'neutral' can provide a co-ordinating service or where there is a requirement for counsel and assistance that can only be provided by those with a general view.

Mr. Clark: Quote from page 15.

Mr. Sharp: Yes, I could quote some others, but this is sufficient to illustrate the role of the Privy Council within the government. In the case of security that is its function. It is a co-ordinating function. It provides a secretariat to the cabinet committee, and when necessary it takes a co-ordinating role in seeing that the various activities in this field are co-ordinated, and of course if the matter gets to the cabinet committee it acts in the secretariat capacity. It never takes the lead. It is a co-ordinator, just as are other members of the staff of the Privy Council office.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, the President of the Privy Council has just described virtually to the letter the function and the role of the co-ordinating security planning committee of the Department of the Solicitor General. How can he explain the duplication?

● (1750)

Mr. Sharp: Quite simply, because there are various departments that play a role in security, the Department of the Solicitor General, the RCMP, the Department of National Defence, and various other departments. The hon. member must remember that all departments have a security function with respect to their own papers and to their internal security. That applies to the Privy Council Office as well as to all departments.

Mr. McGrath: The President of the Privy Council has told the committee that the security division of the Privy Council Office is primarily a co-ordinating function relating to all departments of the government. This has been the explanation given to the House by the Solicitor General of the role of the security planning group within that department. Now we find we have two co-ordinating security planning groups. Perhaps the President of the Privy Council will answer the part of my question dealing with the cost of the so called security co-ordinating planning division within the Privy Council Office.

Mr. Sharp: I repeat what I have said, that the Department of the Solicitor General has the responsibility for the co-ordination of security in so far as police are concerned; it does not have responsibility for the security of the Department of National Defence or of the Department of External Affairs. These are very special problems. There are occasions when it is necessary to co-ordinate all the security activities of the government, which is the function of both the committee and of the supporting staff of the Privy Council Office.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I would now like to deal with another phase of the responsibilities of the PCO and PMO, particularly as they affect parliament. I am speaking now of the role and the emergence of the federal-provincial conference as an intricate, permanent structure in our governmental system which was never provided for in the constitution. I will say that it is to the credit of the President of the Privy Council that he has expressed concern over the erosion of the power of parliament vis-à-vis the estimates of the government, but I would like to ask him if he can tell the committee whether there are any plans to involve parliament in the federal-provincial process which has now become a separate and alternate function of government. If so, perhaps he will tell us who is responsible for the liaison between the functions of these federal-provincial conferences and parliament, and how far parliament will be involved in that aspect.

Mr. Sharp: When the estimates of the Privy Council Office were before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates there was some discussion of the role of one of the functionaries within the Privy Council Office, namely, the secretary responsible for the organization of federal-provincial conferences. At that time it was explained that he had nothing to do with the policy side, that he was concerned with the physical arrangements, with the calling of the meetings in response to decisions made by the various provincial and federal ministers, for the secretariat, for the translation facilities, and for hospitality. There is, however, as the House is well aware, a secretary now, Mr. Gordon Robertson, who has assumed a new function of secretary for federal-provincial relations. This illustrates how important this aspect of the work of the government has become.

In so far as the control of parliament is concerned, it is exercised over these activities just it is exercised over activities that do not involve agreements between the provinces and the federal government. Perhaps I could illustrate one way in which parliament controls, that is, through the approval of legislation. For example, on the Order Paper there is a bill which will alter the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act. That bill will come before parliament, and the financial arrangements between the provinces and the federal goverment will be discussed in parliament and approved before we can enter into an agreement to amend the agreement which underpins the revenues of those provinces that have less than the national average income.

There are agreements such as the informal arrangement that has been made regarding the price of oil. These matters were debated in the House when we had a discussion on the Petroleum Administration Act. There are agreements relating to health and welfare. They are concretized, I might say, in the various expenditures to pay part of the cost of hospitalization or medicare. These are approved by parliament when the estimates of the department which enable the Minister of National Health and Welfare to carry out these undertakings are approved by parliament.

So it seems to me that parliament does exercise the same control over federal provincial arrangements as it exercises over any other activity of the federal government, whether such activity results in an agreement with a foreign country or with a province, or whether it is something that is undertaken unilaterally by the federal government itself. I do agree with the hon. member that these arrangements are of growing importance.

There is no doubt that there has been a considerable revolution in the last generation in the relations between federal and provincial governments. I can look back in my career to a time when arrangements with respect to the finances of the provinces being supported by Ottawa were undertaken in relation to the emergency of the war. These have been transformed into extremely large expenditures by the federal government to underpin the revenue of those provinces which happen to have less than the national average income. I do submit, however, that I do not think any additional scrutiny is requred. When I look at the federal-provincial arrangements that are made it seems to me that all of them have been made pursuant to the approval by parliament either of the expenditures or of the underlying legislation.

Mr. McGrath: Before you call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I want to point out that the minister did not answer a very important part of my question in which I asked how many departments have hidden within their estimates votes dealing with security. Perhaps later on when we resume the session he might be inclined to identify these departments.

The Deputy Chairman: May I remind the hon. member for St. John's East that the time allotted to him has expired.

It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m. this evening.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The Committee resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Chairman, since 3.15 p.m. this afternoon, we are going through a so-called allotted day. As it is its right, the opposition has decided to discuss the estimates of the Prime Minister's office and the Privy Council office. Had little Alice been here today she might have thought she was back in wonderland where things seem to be what they are not, where grotesque borders on ridiculous, where reality hides behind myths, which are in turn passed for realities when realities are passed for myths.

The purpose of this allotted day is to discuss the estimates of the Prime Minister's office and the Privy Council office for this year. Listening to the learned opposition spokesmen, we find that they have in turns shouted very loudly to say that they have a basic right to ask detailed questions in order to apply a tight control on public expenditures. But this having been said, what are the fundamental questions which may be put? François Villon used to say, in his old refrain:

But where are the snows of yesteryear?

One might wonder, this debate having started as it did: But where are the questions of yesteryear? Yes, there is a clamor that the privilege of putting questions is being repressed. But the fact remains that all questions must be put if the opposition so wishes. But when it comes to putting specific questions our Don Quixotes opposite seem to transform themselves into whispering "dons". We have heard much rhetoric but few pertinent questions.

The hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) surpassed himself when he said the Opposition exercises no control over the daily activities of the government in this House. That would constitute a terrible if not terrifying admission of weakness on the part of the Opposition. I suspect, however, that the hon. member's words went beyond his thoughts. In fact, the situation is entirely different. The Opposition knows to what extent it can delay implementation of a government legislative program through dilatory tactics. One need only look at the facts: For how long has the Opposition delayed the creation establishment of a national petroleum corporation? For how long will it continue to do so before the committee of the House considering this bill? We do not know. For how long will the Opposition continue to block the passage of the antitrust act, to prevent conglomerate exploitation of Canada's consumer markets? When I hear the Opposition say things like that, I really think I am in wonderland, where white means black and no means yes.

Mr. Chairman, the basic error of the Opposition is to consider that they are Parliament. This is a false equation. Parliament is all of us, on both sides of the House. And when an act is passed by a majority of members of Parliament, that means the Canadian people in its wisdom wanted it to be so.

De Tocqueville said in his famous book Democracy in America:

> Governments must govern.

And it is precisely what the population of this country expects. Of course, the Opposition must be strong, intelligent, efficient, and play its role fully. However, it is time for modernization in this honourable chamber, so that governments, whatever their political stripe, might present legislative programs which would really meet the wishes of the people, and have them accepted. I fully endorse the idea that debates should be limited, that once the Opposition has had the opportunity to express its views, the matter should be settled democratically, without delay, by a vote. I always wonder what is the use of hearing 30, 40 or even 50 speeches on practically the same subject. The parliamentary system in England has made much progress in that respect. Why should we refuse to avail ourselves of as modern a parliamentary system as the English have? Some seem to consider it an honour to make the House of Commons as little efficient as possible.

The hon. member for Rocky Mountain asked a question to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp). He asked in particular whether the Privy Council Office was preparing draft reforms of the parliamentary system. The form of the question seems to imply that were it so, such work would be fatal and condemnable. For my part, I deeply wish many people, both inside and outside the government, were interested in the matter. I would be particularly disappointed if the matter of parliamentary reform were one the Prime Minister did not care about. However, the Opposition seems to say that it would be disappointed to know that such is the case.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) launched a serious attack, a so-called serious attack, against the Prime Minister's Office. He believes that the Prime Minister's Office is used for the setting up of a parallel power structure which would turn the parliamentary system into a presidential system. The prime minister himself dealt with that question in the House earlier today. It is enough to know that the prime minister was here this afternoon, that he was willing to answer questions during more than half an hour, even though no question has been addressed to him, to conclude the contrary.

One is not a good observer . . .

Mr. McGrath: The Prime Minister did not give us the chance to ask any question!

Mr. Alexander: He did not answer any question, he left the House!

[Mr. Fox.]

Mr. Fox: The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) is saying that the prime minister did not answer questions at that time, and he is right because the members of his party refused in a way to ask him any question during that period.

● (2010)

[English]

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I dislike interrupting a very dull speech but I think for the record it should be noted that what I indicated is that the Prime Minister did not stay around to answer questions. He took an hour and a half to give another dull speech and then departed on the pretence of having to go some place—I think he really had to go some place but it was a planned effort on his part to see to it that no questions were asked of the government House leader.

Mr. Stanfield: With the connivance of the government House leader. His credibility is zero.

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Chairman, of course the hon. member failed to note certain facts, for example, that it was at the request of the Opposition that the prime minister proceeded that way, and he could have been here to answer the questions and, indeed, he was here during half an hour. But there is no need to continue the discussion on that matter because in my opinion the facts are clearly on the record and particularly in today's Hansard.

Mr. Chairman, to return to what I said before that interruption which might not be irrelevant but surely is not relevant, the hon. member for St. John's East stated that he believed that the Prime Minister's Office was used to set up a parallel powers structure which would turn the parliamentary system into a presidential system.

But one does not have to be a very keen observer to note that the main feature of the Trudeau government has been to set up machinery and structures which would allow the men elected by the people to govern for a period of four years, to really control the huge federal bureaucracy instead of being controlled by the system.

When one considers objectively the cabinet committee system described by the Clerk of the Privy Council which the hon. member for Rocky Mountain referred to this afternoon, when one considers the funds made available to all federal parties for research purposes, when one considers the funds made available to members in order to help them do a better job, one can only conclude that there is a real effort to ensure that members of parliament, and that includes the government, can fulfill their task better.

Listening to the opposition, one rather has the impression that they seek a weakening of the Canadian executive. Would that really be in the interest of this country? For my part, I do not I think so. We need a strong executive to face the problems of contemporary society. And I think there is no incompatibility at that level. In our system, it is a challenge to be met so as to have both a strong executive and a House of Commons that can still fulfill its task.

The hon. member for Saint John's East also talked about the roster system.

Here again I must differ in opinion with the hon. member. Sometimes I wonder what is the point in having all federal ministers in the House every afternoon of the week when several are never asked any question during the oral question period.

We certainly wish to have a Cabinet composed of ministers able to assume their duties. We should once more rationalize our procedures at that level and make sure that when those ministers will be in this House we shall have questions to ask them. As I said, we certainly have some lessons to learn from the question periods in the British legislature. Every member of the Procedure and organization committee who visited Westminster in January could realize that the questions asked were becoming more and more relevant and knowledgeable as during an oral question period, the questions were put only to one or two ministers. And in fact, the system seemed to function very well there even though their population is much larger than ours and obviously their problems are quantitatively if not qualitatively more numerous than ours.

This afternoon we also discussed the federal-provincial relations and in that respect, I think that the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) raised a very important point in our system. And this is one of the reasons why I am so pleased to see in the estimates that the government tries to improve the whole situation concerning the federal-provincial relations. For some parties in this House, those relations consists only of presenting in this House the views of the provinces. Some do not stop asking the government why it does not agree to the view of such or such provincial minister. And eventually we forget the role of Canada's Parliament, the role of the national parties, we forget that national interest must override local interest.

This is why I am so pleased to see that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) give so much importance to the whole area of federal-provincial relations particularly by appointing a senior official who is held in high respect by everyone in our country to take charge of the Secretariat for federal-provincial relationship of the Private Council Office.

Mr. Chairman, this more or less sums up what I wanted to say tonight. I would like to conclude by asking the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) a question relating to one of the items of the estimates of the Privy Council Office and to the management, or rather to the funds which were made available to the Public Research Institute established by the government during the last Parliament.

Hon. members will remember that this organization was set up following studies undertaken at the request of the government and carried out by a man who later became the adviser of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), and it is definitely an organization from which a lot is expected. I wonder whether the President of the Privy Council could tell us when we can expect that institute to really start its operations and start issuing the kind of reports and work which are expected from it, and which the government had in mind when they accepted the implementation of the Ritchie report.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I understand the question relates to the Institute for Research on Public Policy. This institute had as its first director Mr. Ritchie, who is now in the office of the Leader of the Opposition. It is getting under way now. It has recruited some staff and its headquarters are in Montreal. It is hoped it will get under way with some project in the field of research and public policy in the next few months. I should perhaps remind the House that the institute now has fairly large sums of money at its disposal as a result of contributions from various companies, and also from the governments of Ontario and Quebec. It has had a total fund available from non-federal sources of $1,245,000. The government has undertaken to match the contributions that are made over the next seven years up to a total of $10 million.

I think the short answer is that this institution, which we think will make a useful contribution in advice to all of us in parliament, including the government, will shortly be producing some papers and some studies.

Mr. Baldwin: I understand that Mr. Ritchie did not have a strong enough stomach to stay that close to the Privy Council office.

● (2020)

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, briefly because of the time constraint due to the Prime Minister's penchant for filibustering his own estimates I wish to direct questions about the office and duties of the Prime Minister's principal secretary to the government House leader. I remind him that the office is powerful and prestigous. One of the predecessors of the principal secretary—I mean the present Minister of National Health and Welfare—said on page 27 of a lengthy paper he presented on September 8, 1971, entitled, "The Changing Role of the Prime Minister's Office":

> The principal secretary is the Prime Minister's chief of staff and main personal political adviser... he provides the Prime Minister with advice on a variety of policy matters and fulfils any assignment that the Prime Minister decides to give him.

He went on to say:

> ... with the approval of the Prime Minister, he may attend any cabinet committee meeting.

That approval, I suggest, gives him a unique opportunity to gain access to confidential and important information, and gives him powers and prerogatives equal to and sometimes greater than those enjoyed by cabinet ministers.

I wish to ask the Acting Prime Minister some questions. If he cannot answer tonight, perhaps he will take them as notice and answer another time. First I wish to ask a question concerning the guidelines concerning conflict of interest as set out by the Prime Minister, I believe on December 18, 1973.

What attempts did the Prime Minister make to ascertain whether Mr. Austin met the criteria set out in the statement of guidelines for public servants who are order in council appointees? Was any investigation carried out by the Prime Minister or anyone on his behalf? If so, by whom was this done? Also, did the Prime Minister cause his principal secretary to take an oath under the Oaths of Allegiance Act, or any other statute or regulation, which would require the principal secretary to cease any solicitor-client relationship which might exist by virtue of his outside legal practice?

As I said a moment ago, it appears that Mr. Austin has access to most delicate information which, if he were to carry on any sort of solicitor-client relationship, as he ostensibly must have done when practising law, could involve or appear to involve him in a conflict of interest. I am not suggesting that it does, but I should be happy to hear some elucidation of this point.

Also, did the Prime Minister require his principal secretary to cease absolutely any outside business activity related to the practice of law or otherwise, and devote his full-time duties to the Prime Minister's office? Those duties should be extensive.

I interject at this point, because it is topical, a reference taken from the Montreal Gazette of today's date. Mr. George Radwanski, a noted columnist, has written an article under the headline, "PM painfully vague on questions vital to Canada."

I ask the Acting Prime Minister to take as notice and answer now or later, the question raised by Mr. Radwanski about the Prime Minister's vagueness: can he assure us that the PMO and PCO have been doing the type of job in providing policy input which would justify the extreme expense of these offices to the taxpayers of Canada? Although I wish to ask three or four other questions, perhaps the Acting Prime Minister can answer the questions I have already asked.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, some aspects of the hon. member's questions I cannot answer tonight. I will certainly see that they are brought to the Prime Minister's attention, because only the Prime Minister may be in a position to answer some of them. I remind the hon. member that Mr. Austin had been a deputy minister. He took all necessary oaths. He made all arrangements about conflict of interest that are required of deputy ministers. It is my understanding that this, of course, continued when he became the principal secretary to the Prime Minister. I cannot answer some of the other questions unless I converse with the Prime Minister, but I will take them as notice. May I suggest to the hon. gentleman, who already has some questions on the Order Paper with respect to Mr. Austin, that the questions he has asked are the kinds of questions which also should be put on the Order Paper.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, perhaps because of my own lack of careful preparation, I have been experiencing difficulty getting some of these questions put on the Order Paper. I will have to be more circumspect. I hope that the questions I have asked, placed on the Order Paper, and others I intend to put on the Order Paper in future will be answered promptly, and I hope the hon. gentleman will expedite the answers also to the questions I have raised tonight.

May I ask the Acting Prime Minister some more questions? Will he take up with the Prime Minister the question as to whether the Prime Minister is aware of some correspondence emanating from the Prime Minister's office. That correspondence contains the telephone number and address of the Prime Minister's office, and the name "J. Austin Q.C," appearing as a letterhead. There is, for example, a letter dealing with Hearne Coppermine Explorations Limited and related matters, involving a dispute with the Department of National Revenue. If the Prime Minister is aware of this, does he feel that Mr. Austin has been following the proper course of action? Has he given sanction for his principal secretary to act as his own tax counsel and lend the prestige of the Prime Minister's office to this sort of activity?

I ask this because, as the letter appears to indicate, there is a substantial dispute involving the Department of National Revenue, and Mr. Austin appears to give the Prime Minister's telephone number and his office address, which indicates that Mr. Austin is in a very special position indeed, in dealing with any dispute with the Department of National Revenue, the sort of position in which many other taxpayers of Canada would like to be.

I do not want to be too hard on Mr. Austin. In view of Mr. Austin's obviously high opinion of himself, as reflected in his public statement that he received his Q.C. for merit as a lawyer, and in view of the glowing report attributed to the Prime Minister by Mr. Austin in an article in the Financial Times of Canada dated May 20, 1974, to the effect that the Prime Minister, "had a high opinion of my judgment and enjoyed the work that I had done with him in the energy situation," can the Acting Prime Minister assure the committee unequivocally, either now or in future, that the Prime Minister is completely satisfied that the principal secretary falls squarely within the guidelines which he and the late Prime Minister Pearson set out for public servants, and that the secretary enjoys the same confidence and esteem in the Prime Minister's mind as be obviously does in his own?

It would be better if he were to make that profession regarding confidence and esteem of his own volition instead of having Mr. Austin do it on his behalf. It would reassure us and the people of Canada to be told that the secretary, who enjoys extraordinary prerogatives, is completely and utterly devoted to his public duties, that he does not have any outside interests, and that he is not continuing to practise law or do anything which would detract from his substantial responsibilities as the Prime Minister's principal secretary.

Talking about the Prime Minister's painful vagueness on questions vital to Canada, Mr. Radwanski, in the Montreal Gazette article previously alluded to, said:

> In short, the government has given the impression of regarding consensus on any issue as something that exists or doesn't exist, rather than something to be actively created and shaped.

In view of the observations of that knowledgeable columnist I hope the Acting Prime Minister can assure us that men like Mr. Austin, who enjoy extraordinary prerogatives, remuneration, and prestige, are making an active contribution which will justify the type of responsibility they have been given.

● (2030)

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I have now received information which I am sure will satisfy my hon. friend. I am assured that Mr. Austin is subject to exactly the same conflict of interest guidelines as ministers, and has fully complied with them. These require us to be completely free of conflict of interest. The same guidelines apply to Mr. Austin and he has complied with them. On the other question the hon. member has put, I am not quite sure whether it is in order to ask questions that are already on the Order Paper. However, this question about the correspondence paper and about the telephone will be answered in due course.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I have one final question, if I have the time. Is Mr. Austin the individual or one of the individuals who drafted, assisted in drafting, or otherwise participated in the creation of the government guidelines to be observed by public servants concerning the conflict of interest situation? Did he have any input? Did he make any contribution toward the formulation of those guidelines?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I am sure quite a number of people were consulted. I do not know whether Mr. Austin was one of them. However, I can assure the hon. member that it was the ministers who worked on this problem for many hours over many days in an attempt to work out conflict of interest guidelines for themselves. They also participated in the preparation of the green paper which is now before the standing committee and which, I understand, is receiving a good deal more support now than before, when it was not understood.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, I was intrigued earlier to hear the assertions by the government spokesman that it is unfair for us on this side to refer to the mutations which are taking place at the level of the Privy Council office and the Prime Minister's office and to refer to the evolution of a presidential system in Canada. Frankly I find myself somewhat in support of the government's position.

One need only look at the relevant differences between what is happening in Canada today and what is happening in the United States to recognize that the two situations are not comparable. In fact in the United States the position of the president vis-à-vis congress is substantially different from that of the present position of the Prime Minister of Canada vis-à-vis the House of Commons.

In the House of Commons we do not have any of the checks and balances written into the American constitution. In the United States the congress has the right and responsibility to confirm the appointment of officials chosen for high government positions. In Canada the government refuses to permit appointees to appear before committees before they go on the payroll. We had a case recently where we wished to interview the proposed vice-president of the CBC who, in time, will become president. The government refused. There was the invocation of executive privilege, or something similar to that. There was a refusal to allow the Clerk of the Privy Council to appear before the committee. That is one distinction between the Canadian and American system.

There is a difference in budgeting. Everyone who watches the United States knows that congress vetoes the budget proposed by President Ford. In Canada, when it comes time to stand up and be counted, the Liberal majority puts down any attempt to substantially modify the budget proposed by the executive. The same applies to the legislative program of the government. In the United States the president's legislative program is subject to change by congress. Such is not the case in Canada. Time after time when it comes down to the crunch, the Liberal majority will stand up and support, however disagreeable it may be, whatever it is the government had proposed.

I cannot cite any higher or better authority with regard to the attitude of the Liberal government concerning the role of parliament than that which was written by an obscure Quebec writer in February, 1963, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, who said:

> I would have to point out in the strongest terms the autocracy of the Liberal structure and the cowardice of its members.

Such is certainly the case when it comes to the legislative program of this government.

We have seen the difference between the United States and Canada with regard to legislative oversight in security and intelligence gathering institutions in the two countries. In the United States at the present time there are three different commissions or committees looking into the subject of intelligence gathering and security in the United States. In Canada we have discovered that the government deliberately presented to parliament estimates in which security items are hidden and which are misleading when people look at them to try to determine the substance of the items. To date the government has refused to let us know what items in the estimates are honest items and what items are not.

Then, of course, there is the behaviour of the Prime Minister today. One after another members opposite have gotten up to talk about how the Prime Minister has a responsibility to answer questions in this House. We saw a pretty good example today of the Prime Minister's contempt for parliament.

The Liberal members told us about the need for the Prime Minister to be here for question period. The Prime Minister was not here for the question period. He was busy writing speech notes which would take an hour and a half of House time which would have been available for parliament to scrutinize his estimates. He then proceeded to read his monologue into the record. He then took off, refusing to allow parliament to scrutinize his estimates.

The differences between the two systems are quite acute. What concerns me is that the position of the member of parliament in Canada, with this arrogant and overwhelming majority that there is at the present time, is considerably less than the position of a congressman in the United States. As a consequence the rights of the Canadian people are less than those of their counterparts in the United States.

I wish to ask a number of short questions of the minister. Perhaps it will be possible for the minister to give short answers as well. First, is the minister prepared to make available to members of the House of Commons a list of those items which do not have security items hidden within them so that we know which estimates are honest estimates and we will know on which ones, when we are voting on a non-security item, we are also voting money for security items?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, when the estimates of the Privy Council office were before the miscellaneous estimates committee this question was raised. I had a little discussion with some of the opposition members on that committee. I undertook to raise this question with my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, who had previously offered to give some material on a confidential basis. The response I received from the minister was that he would like to talk to me further about it. I undertook to the committee, and I again undertake, to try to work out some procedure whereby the information can be given without revealing any secrets which would harm the national security. However, I can give one assurance—

Mr. Baldwin: Here he is.

Mr. Sharp: The minister is now coming in. However, may I say there is nothing in the estimates we are now considering that is hidden in any way which relates to matters of security.

Mr. Beatty: Perhaps the minister can explain what is the budget for this year in terms of the cost of two groups within the Privy Council office. The first one is the assistant secretary to the cabinet for security and intelligence for his group. What are the details of the budget? Also, what are the details of the budget earmarked for the assistant secretary to the cabinet for emergency planning?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, in the office of the secretary who is concerned with the cabinet committee on security and intelligence, there are four bodies.

An hon. Member: Bodies?

Mr. Sharp: Four officials. That is the extent of the expenditure.

Mr. Beatty: The minister says there is nothing hidden in the Privy Council estimates. How much money is allowed for this fiscal year for those two groups? If he gave an honest answer to the committee, he can certainly answer the amount of money allocated for those two groups.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, perhaps we could go on to some other questions and this will be worked out. There is nothing secret about it. It means having to get their up-to-date salaries and working out for the hon. member how much that amounts to in total.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister what are the responsibilities of the assistant secretary to the cabinet for security and intelligence and the assistant secretary to the cabinet for emergency planning with respect to monitoring—and I am choosing my words very carefully—either directly or indirectly the peacetime activity of groups or individuals the government feels could become involved in future civil disorder? As background, I would bring to the attention of the minister the fact that following the FLQ crisis Lieutenant-General Dare was asked to prepare a study on the enhancement of crisis handling capability within the federal government structure, which recommended setting up part of this machinery. One of the responsibilities was to anticipate possible civil disorder and make contingency plans accordingly. I wonder if I might have the answer now.

[Mr. Sharp.]

● (2040)

Mr. Sharp: There are no such activities within the Privy Council office. There is nobody who acts in a capacity such as outlined by the hon. member.

Mr. Beatty: Has the hon. gentleman read the report which was prepared, and is he aware of the section in it which suggests it would be valuable to set up procedures whereby social disturbances in Canada can be anticipated? One of the statements in the report reads as follows:

> In Canada, the systematic use of indicators is not being fully exploited, nor is there much evidence to suggest that indicators are being employed systematically in other countries. On the other hand, at least some of the relevant factors are considered informally in the process of ongoing social research and analysis.
> A survey of current research on the prediction of social conflict using quantitative methods revealed that none of the methods studied could as yet produce reliable predictions. However, it is considered a promising area of research and it is concluded that studies should be pursued within the Canadian context.

What has been done in respect of this recommendation?

Mr. Sharp: I wish to assure the hon. member that this is not one of the functions of the Privy Council office. My understanding is that this is a responsibility specifically assigned to the Solicitor General.

Mr. Beatty: With respect to the transfer of activities of the CBNRC to the Department of National Defence, what is the nature of the activities of CBNRC? Is the information gained related essentially to defence matters, or is it related primarily to the Department of External Affairs and the responsibility of the Solicitor General with respect to security?

Mr. Sharp: There are some questions which I believe it would be inadvisable to discuss in open session, and security is one of them. I have spoken to my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, who is seated beside me and he agrees it might be advisable to give certain information to some members of the House who could treat the matter in confidence so that it would be clear that the government is not engaging in nefarious activities or anything of that kind. But I hesitate to discuss security matters in committee of the whole.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, this matter was first raised fully two months ago and an undertaking was given at that time. Mr. Speaker suggested we might leave the matter until we returned after the Easter recess to see what had developed. Why has the government not consulted with the various House leaders in the course of the last few months in an effort to provide for a parliamentary oversight of security and intelligence organizations in Canada? Why was the minister personally one of those who refused to give unanimous consent to a motion under Standing Order 43 proposed by my hon. friend from Rocky Mountain and seconded by myself, which would have made provision for parliamentary oversight?

I have a further question to ask. It relates to whether the Prime Minister or the Minister of State for Science and Technology was giving correct information to the House of January 10, 1974. The Prime Minister was asked about the existence of a four-party intelligence treaty between the United States, Britain, France and Australia. Hansard reported him as saying:

If the hon. member is referring to the specific treaty called UKUSA, the answer is that we are not party to such a treaty.

On March 24, in the committee on miscellaneous estimates, I asked the Minister of State for Science and Technology the following question—the committee report reads as follows:

Is there to the best of your knowledge, Mr. Minister, an agreement referred to as the UK-USA agreement which would affect the activities of the CBNRC.

MR. DRURY: There is an agreement, a security agreement, involving a number of countries including Canada and the U.S.A., but it is not a bilateral agreement solely.

MR. BEATTY: Would it include the United Kingdom as well? Is that what the U.K. in UK-USA is from?

MR. DRURY: You are correct.

And now I should like to ask the hon. gentleman this question: does Canada participate in an agreement with other countries with respect to the former CBNRC, which has been referred to as the UK-USA treaty? I am asking whether we are party to such an agreement.

Mr. Sharp: This is a matter which does not refer to the activities of the Privy Council office. Perhaps it is a question which could be addressed to a minister who does have some responsibility. I did not come prepared, and I have no officials here who would have this information.

Mr. Beatty: I would remind the minister that it was the Prime Minister who was asked the question respecting UK-USA and who gave an answer. Was it the Prime Minister or the Minister of Science and Technology who gave the correct answer? I hardly need point out to the Acting Prime Minister that ultimately as far as national defence is concerned the buck stops at the desk of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Sharp: I must agree that the Prime Minister does bear general responsibility as the head of the government. Nevertheless we are now dealing with the estimates of the Privy Council office, and the hon. member's question does not relate to his responsibilities as being in charge of that office. If the hon. member is addressing a question to me as Acting Prime Minister, as one who for the time being is head of the government, that is a different matter. I have to take the question as notice. I am advised by my colleague who sits beside me that both answers given are correct—that they are not mutually inconsistent. There is perhaps some confusion in the mind of the hon. member. But the question here is one which might well be put on the Order Paper and answered fully and accurately, and not on the spur of the moment during an occasion such as this.

Mr. Beatty: May I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he or the Prime Minister would be prepared to make available a list of figures showing in percentage terms the growth or decline, on an annual basis, of Canada's security budget since the Prime Minister took office? I am not asking that the figures be disclosed.

Mr. Sharp: I will take that request as notice. I think I would need a somewhat better definition of security. After all there are officials concerned with security in each of the departments—they look after the security of their documents, of their personnel and so on. If the hon. member can give me a clear definition of the information he is seeking to obtain I would be happy to try to get it for him.

May I take this opportunity to answer a question which was asked a little earlier as to the costs of certain activities in the Privy Council office. The cost for this year in respect of officers in the security and intelligence secretariat is $135,000, and for the emergency planning secretariat the cost is $91,000.

● (2050)

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, I am grateful for the opportunity tonight of taking a few moments of the committee's time during this debate. Like many others I was greatly impressed by the Prime Minister's contribution this afternoon. Day after day we sit in this House and listen to the inane submissions of hon. members such as those of the hon. member for Leeds, with his persistent questioning of the facilities of the Prime Minister's residence.

The Prime Minister came to the House today and openly, at a justifiable length of time, gave a resumé of the facilities placed at his disposal by the taxpayers, along with some of the improvements he has been making, many of them as a result of the generosity of Canadians who are anxious to honour him and future Prime Ministers with the gift of a swimming pool.

An hon. Member: They want to join him in the pool.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Abbott: We hear some loud interjections, Mr. Chairman, but on balance I think everyone on this side agrees that seldom has Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition put up a more lame response than we heard this afternoon after the Prime Minister sat down.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Abbott: The Prime Minister was accused earlier of not daring to come to the House and submit himself to questioning, and that he did not dare answer any of the questions. After he had made a fulsome speech, one that almost everyone was interested in hearing, he listened to the leaders of the opposition parties, as per his undertaking, and then left the House only to have the hon. member for Rocky Mountain say he had fled the Chamber. Anyone who knows the Prime Minister will know that it would take a better man than the hon. member for Rocky Mountain to make him flee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Abbott: It is important to recognize that the Prime Minister gave a resumé of the areas that were necessary in order that he could deal with several comments by the hon. member for Leeds. Unfortunately he felt compelled to give that resumé, partly because of that hon. member's persistent interventions, but mainly and quite rightly in order to deal with that famous speech of not so long ago by the right hon. member for Prince Albert in which he took grave exception to some of the expenditures made on behalf of the Prime Minister's residence.

The Prime Minister was able during his speech to give both an appropriate explanation for some of the points raised, and an accurate response. He reminded the right hon. gentleman, though he was not here, of some of the alleged extravagances that could more appropriately be laid at that right hon. gentleman's door. He referred specifically to the acquisition of a number of acres of land for his personal recreation, the stocking of lakes, and the building of a bunker in the backyard of 24 Sussex Street, all of which were creations of that right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert.

I realize, of course, that hon. members opposite were more concerned with those aspects of the speech of the right hon. member for Prince Albert that dealt somewhat savagely with their own leader. In any event the Prime Minister came to the House with a response in areas that were of minor relevance as compared to the heavy burden he carries. We would all agree that the Prime Minister gave a very adequate, dignified, and appropriate response. I was gratified when the hon. member for Winnipeg North stated he felt like most Canadians, that this convenience of amenities for our Prime Minister and the Leader of the Official Opposition were entirely appropriate and in keeping with the dignity and size of this country. I join in that sentiment.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not want to be put in the same category as the Prime Minister in terms of facilities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, I think the Prime Minister submitted more adequate and factual evidence to show that the extravagances of the Leader of the Opposition's office were somewhat greater in proportion than those of the Prime Minister's office or the office of the Privy Council.

Mr. Andre: Wrong.

Mr. Abbott: "Wrong", says the hon. member for Calgary Centre, who was not in the House.

Mr. Andre: Yes I was, and your figures are wrong.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: At least we presented good figures.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, I hear the interjections of, I suspect, the hon. member for Rocky Mountain. When I think of that hon. member I am reminded of the time I lived in Calgary and the chinook breezes of hot air that blow in from the coast through the Rocky Mountains to warm Calgarians, and I often feel we have a transplant of that in this House here.

Mr. Baldwin: How many years did you spend in Calgary?

Mr. Abbott: There are some facts about the Prime Minister's workload that should be pointed out to those who are so ready to criticize him for having a large, active, and hardworking staff. One must realize that the Prime Minister receives some 115,000 letters a year, or approximately 100 a day.

Mr. Alexander: He should, and we know why.

An hon. Member: And he reads them all, too.

Mr. Abbott: He reads a lot of them. One must remember that, almost unique among democratic leaders in the world, he sits in this House daily and is asked, to this date, in this session over 500 oral questions, most of them from my limited experience of very marginal value.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Your experience is limited, you were right the first time.

Mr. Abbott: If I have had one experience in this House—

An hon. Member: We have heard this speech before.

Mr. Abbott: You may have heard it before and you are going to hear it again. The series of repetitious and inane speeches that come from members on the opposite side come in large part from the hon. member for Rocky Mountain. Notwithstanding the fact that the expenses of the Prime Minister are proportionately less than those of the Leader of the Opposition, he carries a heavy burden acting as head of the government party, head of the executive, and leader of the parliamentary party. I do not think any member of this House would begrudge the Prime Minister an adequate staff to carry out this heavy workload.

An hon. Member: He is not carrying it out, and that's the point.

Mr. Abbott: Those of us who have served even for a limited time in this House realize the heavy burden carried by the Prime Minister of this country. I would say in fairness that the Leader of the Opposition also carries a heavy burden, but the largest part of his burden comes from carrying those hon. members who sit behind him. The fact is that his party has been graced by a substantial sum of money for research purposes. Like most of my colleagues I was stupefied by this sum of money for research, particularly when I related it to the kind of ill-informed questions directed from across the aisle. I hope and expect in the future that the Leader of the Opposition will recognize the largeness of this sum and see that some of the product of this research is conveyed to hon. members opposite in order that their questions might have some relevance or some content in the future.

I should like to say one or two words about the problems which relate to the consideration of these estimates, and I am thinking of the rules of parliament and parliament's effectiveness. I think many Canadians feel there is a need for improvement in the performance of this House. I think many of the rules which some hon. members have been travelling abroad to learn about should be introduced at an early stage.

It is true to say that many departments of government today are loathe to submit needed legislative reforms because of the delays that would result at the hands of members of parliament and parliament itself. I do not think that this is necessarily the result of a lack of will, either on the part of parliament or individual members, to improve the performance of the House. However, I believe there is an essential need to prove to Canadians that parliament is a relevant and dynamic body which, if it does not pass laws like a sausage machine, which it is not supposed to do, at least gives valued consideration of the judgments made by the government, and in due course passes into law or rejects all relevant items.

I think a pretty good example of the problem faced can be demonstrated by the work being performed now in the Committee on National Resources and Public Works. Those of us who are on that committee have been subjected to a wearisome filibuster that is in main caused by a haranguing opposition of the committee. It is a deliberate attempt to prevent parliament from dealing with the issue. After having spent some eight sessions on clause 2 of Bill C-32, it was a matter of great surprise and chagrin to hear one of the members of the committee, I believe the hon. member for York-Simcoe, whine to the committee that we were unable to deal with the estimates of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources because of the constant preoccupation with the Petro-Can bill.

We have not yet passed clause 2 of this bill. Every conceivable attempt at an intervention has been made. Every shade of doubt possessed by hon. members opposite on this committee has been expressed. Despite the recognition of that fact they have persisted in taking up the time of this committee by a filibuster which is doing nothing for the people of Canada, and particularly the people of western Canada who are waiting for this legislation and the establishment of a national petroleum company. The fact is that it is this kind of display of shabby cynicism on the part of opposition members on these committees which creates a doubt in the minds of the Canadian people about the validity and viability of the parliamentary institution.

Rather than spend time chastising the Prime Minister for taking an hour to explain his estimates, and rather than whine about the fact that committees are not able to study the estimates, I suggest that hon. members opposite look into their own hearts and see whether many of the defects they see in the parliamentary process today are caused by their own obstinancy and their own unwillingness to recognize that we have a job to do, and that it will not be answered by the kind of performance we have had today, yesterday, and the day before on the Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

So, Mr. Chairman, I will simply say again that I urge the Leader of the Opposition to release some of the data which his highly priced research staff is grinding out, and to spread it among his colleagues so that we may receive a more enlightened performance from them in days to come.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I first want to take the committee into my confidence and advise it that I have tabled with the Chair, and have given to my hon. friend the government House leader, and my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, notice of an amendment which would have the effect of precipitating a vote at the expiration of the allotted time.

We are asking that the Privy Council estimates, Vote 1 in the amount of $18,484,200, be reduced to $17,600,000. That represents in round figures the equivalent of an increase of 12 per cent over the same estimates for 1974-75. I hope the significance of that will not have escaped members on the government side because it gives them a chance to put into practice the voluntary restraint of 12 per cent that the Minister of Finance has been talking about.

Without in any way derogating from the capacity and ability of many members of the Privy Council staff, if the confusion, the mess and the problems we see coming out of the Prime Minister's office and the Privy Council office today are an indication of the result of the huge expenditures made, we think it would be a great thing for this country if the estimates were reduced by this amount.

It is not without significance that the people the government has put up so far to debate this matter, with one exception, the hon. member for Mississauga, are hon. members who have been spawned out of the civil service at one time or another. I refer to the government House leader, the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes, the hon. member for St. Paul's, and one other. Oh yes! How could I have forgotten the Prime Minister? The Prime Minister admitted he had played around the periphery of the public service. He was there just long enough to have gained some of their ingrown defects but not their virtues. The defence put up has been a professional defence by government professionals. I detect a trace, on the part of the government House leader, of a desire to escape from the coils of the civil service which encased him for so long and, if God gives him enough years and if he lectures enough times in this House, he might yet become a reasonably adequate parliamentarian.

Before I get on to asking some questions, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that much was made by the Prime Minister, during the time he graciously vouchsafed to give us, about the amount of research staff provided to the opposition parties, and I include other opposition parties. However, the Prime Minister conveniently forgot to say that the Liberal caucus receives a grant of $260,000, and that the departmental expenditures, including the Prime Minister's staff, for salaries and wages total $3.6 billion. That is what those people over there get.

I say through you Mr. Chairman, to the members of the committee, that that is what they get for doing the kind of work they should be doing in connection with their duties in this House of Commons and elsewhere. Yet the Prime Minister comes in here and whines and whimpers about the amount of money being allowed the opposition parties for research staff. I must say that at first I was a little concerned about the way in which the Prime Minister conducted himself today, after having what I thought was an understanding that he would make a reasonably short statement such as to permit adequate questioning in this House on his estimates. The Prime Minister deliberately took a long time, and showed his contempt for members of this House and parliament. He spoke for an hour and 25 minutes. He did this deliberately so that we would not have an opportunity to question him.

Mr. Stanfield: It was almost fraudulent.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I think this shows the kind of man the Prime Minister is. Clothed in the imperial purple he has condescended to come down and talk to hon. members, not to answer questions. No one is allowed to question him; he is above that. I know hon. members will say he comes to the House for 40 or 50 minutes and answers questions, but no 10 per cent of the questions asked are answered honestly and in a straightforward way. That is how he conducts himself in response to these questions.

● (2110)

The second point I want to make is that significantly the Prime Minister started off his speech this afternoon by saying he would not get into the petty details of the candelabra, the ashtrays, and all these things. Yet he spent most of the time on the defensive with regard to these matters. It is the Prime Minister who opened up the attack on the swimming pool today, and it is the Prime Minister who spoke about the speech made by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. This shows he is very sensitive and very much on the defensive with regard to these issues. I suggest to members of the committee that when they come to read the speech of the right hon. gentleman tomorrow, they will find that it shows a guilty conscience, and that is the reason he made that speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: My leader asked the President of the Privy Council a question with regard to examining witnesses. I would like to repeat that question and have it answered straightforwardly and squarely. Is it the view of the government, is it the view of the Acting Prime Minister, does he support the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in their position that civil servants are not competent and cannot be compelled to be witnesses, that unless they receive permission from their ministers they cannot appear before a committee, and that if they do appear before a committee with the consent of the responsible minister they can only answer such questions as the minister or the Prime Minister allows them? That is an issue of the very important jurisdiction of parliament. Here is parliament, the highest court of this land. We rank above all other courts. The right to summon witnesses, the right to question those witnesses, is paramount to the exercise of our jurisdiction.

Does the government take the position that we can summon ordinary citizens, we can call people off the streets, we can call presidents of unions and presidents of corporations, but civil servants are sacred and cannot be summoned unless with the consent of the minister? That is a question that I put to the minister in the hope that he can reply to it later.

My second question regards the matter of secrecy. I hesitate to say this, but it must be said that in many ways this House has become the House of lies.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, there are a lot of "oh's" on the other side. I am not saying they are deliberate lies but a distortion and an exaggeration of facts, a suppression of the truth so that private members, not only members of the opposition but members on the government side, have lost the capacity to challenge the government on issues of the day, to question government members and receive honest, sincere and complete answers.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: The Prime Minister, the President of the Privy Council and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources talk about responsible government. They have a distorted idea of responsible government. Responsible government to me, to my colleagues, and to most members of the House I think, means a government that is answerable to parliament, to the people. It does not mean that if a government is elected and happens to have a majority, as this government does, it is answerable to nobody. I suggest that if that is the kind of rule, then we might as well wrap this House up and forget about it between elections because it is meaningless, useless.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I am the first to recognize that we cannot expect the government to answer questions about everything. I have admitted that in the House, and in the committee which is seized of the private member's public bill which I have put forward and which also deals with the question of guidelines. There are areas of confidentiality dealing with security, with criminal investigations, and with matters on which information is given to the government, such as under the Income Tax Act, which should not be made publicly available. I am the first to accept that. But what do we have today?

We have a set of guidelines which are all embracing. I challenge the government to point out any loophole whereby it would be possible for a question to be asked and for the government not to find security in hiding behind those guidelines. They are wide and comprehensive enough so that the government can say it does not need to answer the questions because of this or that particular guideline. Not only that, but who sets the standard, the yardstick?

What is the criterion as to whether or not a question comes within those guidelines? It is for the government to say, and it has used this over and over again. It says, "In our opinion this question contravenes the guidelines which we set, and therefore we will not answer it". That is not good enough. As I say, I have a private member's public bill which is before the Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments Committee where we are dealing with these guidelines.

I should like to put the following questions to the President of the Privy Council. Have the Prime Minister and the government laid down instructions that under no circumstances will members of the Privy Council office or the Prime Minister's office be allowed to have access to members of the press and have interviews or answer questions?

Second, given the statements some years ago by the Prime Minister and the present Minister of Finance, then minister of justice, as to freedom of information, will the government say that it is not categorically opposed to and will give favourable consideration to the introduction of a bill which will define with some degree of accuracy what information can be given and what information is to be forbidden? That is the only way in which there can be a satisfactory conclusion to this issue.

Third, does the government intend to be the sole arbiter of what the public, parliament and the press can be trusted with in the line of facts, or will it leave that to legislation which this House will pass?

Will the government House leader answer the first question I raised, whether it is the categorical assertion of the government that civil servants can be forbidden the right to appear before a parliamentary committee at the whim and discretion of a cabinet minister or of the Prime Minister?

The Deputy Chairman: Just before recognizing the President of the Privy Council I wish to draw to the attention of members of the committee that the rules that we have adopted for this committee call for a summing up by the minister and by a spokesman for the opposition. I wish to seek the guidance of the committee as to whether this part of the rules which was adopted earlier is to be waived, or whether the committee wishes to abide by it?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, on the particular question you have asked let me say that in view of the fact that the Prime Minister made a statement at the opening, which was not provided when we had the Minister of Transport before us, I would certainly not ask for the right to sum up at the end, but I would like to answer the questions that have been put to me.

Mr. Baldwin: May I say I agree with the President of the Privy Council, but for another reason. The day we were dealing with the transport estimates we made an interim House order regarding the length of speeches which were to be in units of 15 minutes. Another issue was the right to sum up. When today my friend, the hon. member for Rocky Mountain, dealt with this he left completely out of the proposal the question of summing up. That was not intended and is not part of the arrangements made, and I think the President of the Privy Council confirms that.

● (2120)

The Deputy Chairman: For earlier proceedings these were the rules adopted. Is it agreed that this part of the rules be waived?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I will attempt to deal briefly with some of the questions put by the hon. House leader of the official opposition. First I would like to say a word about the speech given by the Prime Minister at the outset today. Listening to him I felt that this was finally an opportunity for the Prime Minister to deal with the issues which had been raised on so many occasions across the floor of the House by the hon. member for Leeds and the hon. member for Rocky Mountain, and to which the Prime Minister never had a previous opportunity to reply.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: I thought he used the time to excellent advantage, and if there were complaints about it I suggest to hon. members opposite that if they are interested in the office of the Prime Minister, and not in the trivia of the chandeliers and ashtrays, they should not ask so many bloody questions about them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Who raised it first?

Mr. Stanfield: Your credibility is zero.

An hon. Member: That speech was a direct contradiction to the understanding, and you know it.

Mr. Sharp: When there are trivia in questions I think it does the opposition good to see how much time they wasted and how much time the Prime Minister had to waste today in answering these silly questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If that is your attitude, you've had it.

Mr. Stanfield: You are through.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We've played games with you long enough.

Mr. Clark: Does your word mean anything?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: The question of officials is a major one which certainly is worth a little consideration. There are different ways of looking at this question. We on the government side feel that the ministers have responsibility both for policy generally and for the administration of affairs. Therefore in asking officials to come before committees for cross-examination, the question arises as to who is responsible. Is it the official, or is it the minister? We have taken the view, and it has certainly been pressed upon us, that when officials do things or do not do things, it is the minister who takes responsibility, not the officials. It is possible to separate these matters, but if officials can be brought before the House and cross-examined, of course one must relieve the minister of the responsibility for their actions.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Tommyrot.

Mr. Sharp: Members of the opposition must make up their minds which way they want the argument to run. Do they want ministers to be responsible for administration and policy, or do they want to relieve us of part of the administrative responsibility? This is the argument going on in the United Kingdom today.

Mr. Baldwin: Charles I lost his head over that.

Mr. Muir: You are going to lose yours, Mitch.

An hon. Member: To the Senate, Mitch.

Mr. Sharp: There is a separate question which has been raised by the House leader of the official opposition, and that relates to the summoning of officials. I have never in my experience seen a committee which did summon an official to appear before it, and that does raise a question whether, if a minister objected and the committee then required his attendance, that would raise issues with which I am not quite sure how to deal.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Madam Chairman, I was chairman of a committee back in 1962 which summoned the then secretary of the Privy Council to appear before it.

Mr. Sharp: If the minister did not object to the official appearing, that is perfectly all right.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: The only question which arises is whether a committee may summon an official contrary to the wishes of his minister who is taking responsibility for his actions, and in these circumstances, since I have never seen a situation like this, I treat it as a hypothetical question. I remember on one occasion one of my predecessors in office, Jack Pickersgill, saying when that question was put to him, "I think the minister would have to resign." Perhaps that is the answer, but at any rate it does illustrate the point—

Mr. Baldwin: It's worth considering.

Mr. Sharp:—that it is the responsibility of the ministry for administration as well as for policy.

In regard to the first of the questions put by the hon. member for Peace River, perhaps I could read from a memorandum to the Privy Council staff on press interviews. This was the procedure to be followed:

> "Press Interviews" here mean the type of interview at which the employee is identified personally, in the same sense that an article signed by him or a public statement would identify him. No member of the PMO-PCO will give such interviews on matters relating to their work, unless with the specific authority of the Clerk of the Privy Council and Secretary to the Cabinet and/or the Principal Secretary to the Prime Minister.

Those are the instructions, and I think they are wise because I think civil servants should be anonymous and should act within the authority of the government, and since the ministers take responsibility they must be able to guide them in their relations with the press.

As to the questions about secrecy and information, the hon. member for Peace River and I have had some exchanges on this subject. In general I think we are both trying to move in the same direction. He has given me credit for believing that it is important to this parliament in order to discharge its responsibility to have as much information as possible. That is the principle this government is following.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: The hon. member for Peace River has put his finger on the difficult question of how to determine when the government is giving all the information which can safely be given. I have examined that question, and my hon. friend has, too. I am not quite sure that we came to the same conclusion. My difficulty arises in trying to place upon somebody else, a judge or some "irresponsible" person—and I put that word in quotes—who does not have to be responsible for the consequences of the action—how do you place a responsibility on an irresponsible person for the consequences of the revelation of information which the government considers should be treated confidentially?

That question is very difficult to answer.

Mr. Baldwin: You give judges the right to try people for their lives and to try cases involving millions of dollars.

Mr. Sharp: I suggest that is a different question. The question for a government is what kind of information can be safely revealed without hurting innocent people or damaging national security? We have to take responsibility for the consequences. I do not see how we can pass that responsibility on to an irresponsible person.

An hon. Member: Are members of parliament irresponsible?

Mr. Sharp: I hope we are working in the same direction in trying to give as much information as possible to parliament.

Mr. Horner: Madam Chairman, this has been an interesting debate. I regret that I had to leave the House at 3.30 to go into a committee, but it is an interesting debate because one gets a concept of how members view their work, and how they view the Prime Minister and whether he is God or whether he is answerable to this House.

At three o'clock this afternoon the Prime Minister came to the House to make his speech. He appeared to be a petulant, spoiled boy after having done some dirty tricks, coming to his mother, speaking in quiet tones with his hands quietly clasped in front of him, as he pleaded with his mother that he had really done no wrong, he had not really meant to hurt anyone, to do any dirty tricks, to throw sand at some little girl, or do something like that. That is the way it appeared to me, just a petulant, spoiled little boy appearing before his mother hoping he would not be scolded too harshly.

He did not feel that he should be answerable in any way for this place. In fact in the time that I stayed to listen to him he deliberately tried to distort some of the figures furnished by the research offices of this party and his own party as to the amount allowed for expenditure on parliament.

It is interesting to listen to government back benchers discuss their concept of parliament. When the Prime Minister set up the regional desks there was a great rumbling from the back benchers of the Liberal Party. They complained that the regional desks were usurping their role in parliament and if they wanted to find out something they had to consult the regional desks because they could not find anything out from the departments. They have got over that, and now accept their role as trained seals.

There was not a member of the NDP in the House all evening until just now when the member for Winnipeg South Centre came in. It is nice to see that the defenders of democracy and the sanctity of this place grace it with one member—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Madam Chairman, I was not sure which one should rise first, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre or myself. I am the member for Winnipeg North Centre who happens to have been in the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs arguing about pensions.

Mr. Horner: Madam Chairman, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was in the House. That party has led people to believe that it is the protector of democracy and protects the sanctity of this House, but it has only put up one speaker in this debate and its attendance has been poor.

In his speech this afternoon the Prime Minister went to great lengths to point out that in the past 12 years no other prime minister has had to do what he had to do today and that he thought a prime minister should not be called to task for his expenditures. It is well known throughout the country, Madam Chairman, that this Prime Minister is the greatest traveller we have ever had—

Mr. Coates: Since Marco Polo!

Mr. Horner: But he had the gall to complain that his expenditures were going to be examined. He complained about the speech of the right hon. member for Prince Albert about his expenditures. Some 15 years ago when the right hon. member for Prince Albert was prime minister he took a trip around the world. He took his brother and his wife on the trip, but he paid his brother's expenses. That was thoroughly examined by the House of Commons at the time, however, as it was felt to be the sin of all sins for the prime minister to travel around the world and the sin of all sins to take his brother along.

The present Prime Minister would go to the moon if he thought there was somebody there he could talk to, or if he could do a little skiing. There are plastic skis now and you can ski on sand, so perhaps he could ski on the moon and do as well as in some of his world travels. According to some of the writers who were on the two week junket to Europe, the Prime Minister spent 20 hours talking to people and the rest of the time skiing. It is well known that the Prime Minister has enjoyed the role of world traveller—

Mr. Blais: On a point of order, Madam Chairman, having been with the Prime Minister on that trip I would tell the hon. member for Crowfoot that if he wants to accompany the Prime Minister on the next trip I will attempt to arrange it so that he will see there are more than 20 hours—

Mr. Horner: I would be glad to accompany the Prime Minister but I am not very good at scuba diving although I am in pretty good physical shape, and it is a long time since I did any skiing.

An hon. Member: You could ride an elephant.

Mr. Horner: If the Prime Minister wants to try other occupations which can be just as much fun, that is fine. I have taken up golf since coming to Ottawa and I would gladly go on a trip with him with that in mind. If he wanted to go into the game of calf roping that ranchers play I would gladly go on a trip and show him how it is done, but I suggest that he should be a little careful there. He might not be in good enough shape to do that.

I want to speak now about parliament, Madam Chairman. The hon. member for Mississauga gave his ideas of what parliament should be doing when he spoke earlier. He said that parliament should not grind out legislation, but he felt we should pass it a lot quicker than we are doing at present. It is well known that parliament has been working on legislation. The hon. member spoke about Petro-Can. Bill C-32 was submitted to the House. The next thing was that the minister announced he had 24 amendments, and before we finished with the bill he added I do not know how many more. The hon. member took some part in the debate on Bill C-2 and I do not know how many batches of amendments the minister glued into that bill. It would be a sin if parliament were to pass legislation without examining it, especially if the government has not even drafted it carefully.

This afternoon in the Standing Committee on Agriculture we passed a bill—after the department and the minister had introduced three or four amendments to it. That was the minister saying, "This is what I meant to say; we should put this amendment in". The opposition felt the amendments were improvements to the bill. We quite often assist in bringing forward amendments; this is our role and our duty, and is not foreign to parliament.

There has been a great deal of talk about the waste of time in this House. Parliament is not here to grind out legislation, Madam Chairman; the function of parliament is to exchange ideas and develop thought. How much time has this House wasted on the economy of the country? Very, very little. Most of the legislation on the Order Paper does not deal with the economy. The Minister of Finance has appeared on nearly every platform across Canada telling the people that we are in dire straits; he is worried about the balance of payments problem, about inflation, and is trying to reach some kind of consensus. Why has parliament not dealt with this matter in past months?

The government has not been concerned with the economic well-being of the country although it has been concerned with nearly everything else. The Prime Minister views Canada as some kind of a stopping off place where he can check in once in a while before flying off to some other spot in the world. That is the way he views Canada. He is not worried about the economy of Canada and never has been; he is worried about some of the social concepts in Canada.

The Montreal Gazette ran a full page article a couple of days ago on an interview with the Prime Minister. He was reported as saying "Let's get away from the mechanics of running the country". He does not even want to worry about the mechanics of running the country, Madam Chairman. He has the printing presses printing money.

The amendment moved by the hon. member for Peace River is exactly on point. Let us lower the expenditures of the Prime Minister's office to an increase of only 12 per cent over last year. That would be an example to all governments in Canada.

● (2140)

Total government expenditures in Canada increased by 48 per cent this year, as compared with last year. It is small wonder there is inflation, given that kind of government expenditure. To me, neither the government nor parliament have been concerned enough about the economy. If it were the business of the opposition to initiate legislation, we should have talked much more in this House about the economy of the country. But our role is not that of initiating legislation. That is the government's role. We try to change legislation, improve it, or interpret it in such a way that the legislation will meet conditions existing in the country.

The government is busy setting up all sorts of little authorities or bodies which are to be active inside or outside parliament. For example Bill C-2 is to set up another commission, Bill C-32 another board, and Bill C-50 another council. In addition the government now has appointed four Whips. Recently the fourth Whip was appointed in the government party. I noted an announcement in a western Canadian newspaper saying that the hon. member for Assiniboia is now the fourth Whip. To me that would be a degrading position. I would not bother writing home and telling my constituents I rank as number four.

This afternoon in committee, the hon. member for Mississauga moved a motion which he was good enough to refer to the steering committee. He proposed that a member should be allowed to speak once, for ten minutes only in committee.

An hon. Member: A good idea.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: If that is the concept of responsible government—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You have one more minute to kill, Jack.

Mr. Horner: And I don't need any help from you. If that is the concept of responsible government, it is pretty shady. Surely that is not the concept we have adhered to in the past 100 years. Why, it would not be worth a member's while to walk into a committee if he could speak only ten minutes. He could not even earn his pay in ten minutes. How can you examine legislation in such a short time?

The Prime Minister spoke about the research bureau of the Conservative Party and suggested he is worried about the quality of questions. I wonder what the government party does with its $260,000 in research funds? In committee all I hear government members say is, "Pass it, agreed, shall clause 1 carry, shall clause 2 carry, pass it."

The Chairman: Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 9(a) of Standing Order 58, to interrupt these proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the proceedings.

[Mr. Horner.]

The hon. member for Peace River gave notice of his intention to propose an amendment to Vote 1 of the Privy Council estimates. His time expired before he could formally propose his amendment to the committee. Therefore, in accordance with Standing Order 58, subsection 9(b), it is my duty at this time forthwith to put the amendment to the committee. Accordingly, the hon. member for Peace River moves:

That Vote 1 of the Privy Council estimates be reduced from $18,484,200 to $17,600,000.

The question is on the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Baldwin) negatived: Yeas, 71; nays, 91.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Shall Privy Council—Vote 1 carry?

Mr. Baldwin: On division.

Privy Council—Vote 1 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall I report the resolution?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution reported and concurred in, on division.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT—SUGGESTION AMENDING BILL INCLUDE PROVISION FOR SINGLE PERSONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, thanks to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), we now have a short grievance period before us. When I staked out a claim the last time to raise a grievance the next time around, so to speak, I did not realize that the basis for raising a grievance would occur this very day. I say to the government House leader that I will not use all of the time available, in the hope that I may be given a favourable reply. This afternoon, when we were—

● (2150)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Maybe we should proceed in the same way as the last time, which was by consent, to make sure the requirements are met. There has been no real change in our procedure. Although this grievance procedure was accepted the last time, it was by unanimous consent. I think we should pursue this approach until a decision is made by the House to modify the Standing Orders. Is it agreed that we proceed with the grievance procedure as we did the last time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, to those who are trying to say no, may I remind them that if they tried to call it ten o'clock, some of us might say no. Some business has to be done during these ten minutes, so it might as well be my grievance.

This afternoon when we were dealing with the future business of the House I asked the government House leader how soon we could look for the bill to amend the Old Age Security Act, which has been promised for some time. The government House leader replied, I think using the word "immediately". I took it the bill would be tabled today or tomorrow.

The government House leader has since sent word to me that the bill has not been finally drafted and, therefore, it will be a few days before it is presented. I am not complaining about that. In fact I welcome the fact that there are those few days. I hope that in those few days the government will consider a point some of us have made a number of times.

I understand that the proposed bill is to include what was promised in the Speech from the Throne, namely, a pension under the Old Age Security Act for a person between the ages of 60 and 65, if that person is the spouse of a person who is already 65 or over and hence receiving the pension, the whole arrangement to be subject to an income test. However, it is quite clear from what has been indicated to us thus far that the only persons between 60 and 65 who will be able to get a pension under this proposed amendment are those who are spouses.

I plead once again the case of single persons, spinsters or bachelors. Likewise, I plead the case of widows and widowers. To offer to pay a pension to persons between 60 and 65 who happen to have a spouse, but not to pay that pension to a person in that same age bracket who does not have a spouse is a case of unfair discrimination. It will lead to endless trouble and difficulty. There will be women or men of a certain age getting a pension. Others of the same age who are out of the labour market and who are in need will not get it.

My grievance is that thus far the government does not appear to have paid attention to our pleas in this connection. I urgently plead with the government. I am glad to see the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) here at this time. He is back from the same committee I was attending earlier. I plead that, between now and the filing of that bill, it be made a pension at age 60 for all those out of the labour market, not just for those few who happen to be spouses of pensioners.

I hope, too, that the question of an income test will be reconsidered. In other words, in the two or three days that are yet to elapse before the bill is introduced, I hope it will be improved along the lines that some of us have been arguing for a long time.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member once more returns to a theme he has already dealt with a number of times previously. This government went to the electorate a year ago and made commitments to the electorate. One of these commitments is specific: we will help spouses in cases where both pensioners would be forced to live on one pension. We said we would solve the problem; we were committed in the Speech from the throne to introduce a bill effective October 1st 1975. That bill will be introduced during the coming days and I hope, with the cooperation of this House, that it will be in force on October 1st 1975.

I repeat that we have a commitment to the electorate. This government was reelected, it honors its commitment to the electorate, and the bill to be introduced will meet that commitment.

As regards "the few" referred to by the hon. member, may I remind him that they number approximately 83,000 in Canada. May I state once more that with this legislation, we wish to help couples where one of the spouses is over 65 and both have to live on one pension. The aim is not to solve the problems of widows or single people. That is another problem altogether. I said previously it should be solved through an overall guaranteed income program, and not through pension plan extensions. Because the problem of widows aged 60 to 65, although serious, is no more so generally than that of widows aged 55 to 60. The latter also need help.

As regards allegations of discrimination referred to by the hon. member, this argument is only intended to confuse matters and repeat the hon. member's old stories on this issue. Many people over 65 who do not receive, for various reasons, and particularly for reasons of residency, neither the old age security pension nor the guaranteed income supplement. There are now people over 65 who do not receive the old age pension. Therefore, when this bill is passed, there will be people between 60 and 65 who will not receive the special benefits provided for spouses. This bill aims at solving a specific, serious and grave problem which, as I said earlier, affects over 80,000 Canadian citizens; but we do not pretend to be able to solve all the problems at once. Other problems mentioned by the hon. member will be solved generally through a guaranteed income program.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the bill which will be introduced in the House will be in accordance with the commitment of this government, and this government will continue to meet its commitments to the voters.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—POLICY OF DEPARTMENT IN AWARDING CONTRACTS—REASON FOR AWARDING CONTRACT FOR SURVEYING ON WEST COAST TO TORONTO COMPANY

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday of this week, as recorded at page 5908 of Hansard I addressed a question to the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) with respect to a contract for survey work on the west coast of British Columbia.

After the question had been asked—and the minister obviously had no knowledge of the particular contract I had in mind—I notified the minister of the contract number. Tonight, for the purposes of the House I can say the contract concerns a second order triangulation trilateration survey over the Queen Charlotte Islands, west coast of B.C., south to the northern end of Vancouver Island. As far as I know this is the first contract for a survey of this type which has been awarded by the federal government in 30 years.

Adjournment Debate

Three British Columbia firms operating out of Vancouver bid for the contract. They were McElhanney and Associates, David H. Burnett and Associates, and Underhill and Underhill. All bid on this contract. For some reason which astounded people in British Columbia the contract was given to the Toronto firm of Marshall Macklin Monaghan.

One of the prerequisites of doing this type of work successfully is an intimate knowledge of the coastal area in which the survey is to be made. All the British Columbia firms I have mentioned have been working actively in British Columbia and in this area for nearly a quarter of a century. Underhill and Underhill were established in British Columbia in 1913. It is almost impossible to believe that a firm operating out of Toronto would have the appropriate knowledge and intimate understanding of the weather, the tides, and the topography of the area concerned to be able to take on this sizeable job and do it better than firms well established in the province and operating in the area.

On Tuesday I asked the minister:

Is it the policy of the department to award contracts whenever possible to firms operating on a regular basis in the regions where the work is required?

His reply was as follows:

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, whenever it is possible.

The decision in this case seems to have flown in the teeth of the department's own policy. Then again, there are disturbing factors surrounding the contract and the bidding. As I understand it, the three B.C. firms came in at approximately the same cost. I know that one of them bid $277,000. The Toronto firm, strangely enough, came in at $161,418. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, having agreed to accept that bid, then increased the value of the contract to $200,000 because that was the size of its budget appropriation for this contract.

There are serious questions to be asked. The first is: how many other eastern firms bid on this contract, if any? Second, why was bidding open nationally rather than regionally? Third, why did the department raise the ante to its limit of $200,000, thus in effect giving the Toronto firm the difference between its bid and the budget available to the department? Another question is: did the bid from the eastern firm include the cost of a ship or ships necessary for the job? There is no reason to believe that the Vancouver firms were turned down because they do not support the government party.

In a letter from a representative of Underhill and Underhill to a minister of the Crown—this is from someone who has been a strong supporter of the Liberal party for many years—the following words appear:

We are unable to understand why the federal government has awarded this contract to an Ontario firm and not utilized one of the three firms that have had survey experience in the area in question, and a direct knowledge of the weather and coastal conditions.

Something is seriously wrong here. There is no excuse for giving this contract to a firm 3,000 miles away, one which does not understand the difficulties and which seemed to come in with a bid which is incredibly low before the government itself, to make sure they had enough funds to do the job, added nearly $40,000 to the contract price. If they came in with a bid of $161,000 they should be held to that because that is what they said they could do the job for, and to have the government give this firm another nearly $40,000 is just cause for worry. I could quote further from the letter that they have not taken into account the fact that they may not have as many good days as possible. To me this is really an extraordinary thing, and I hope the parliamentary secretary will answer that question.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed to give my answer I wonder if I could obtain permission to have inserted in Hansard as though they were read, the bids by six companies, subdivided into area A, area A and B, and area A, B and C.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): This can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. Fraser: Of course, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Reid: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is referring to Contract No. 05GR.23244-5-4213 which resulted from a request by the Department of Supply and Services for proposals from various possible suppliers. The request for proposals clearly stated that the proposals would be evaluated on three factors; that is the proposal itself, the firm's relevant experience, and the cost estimate. It further noted that the project authority in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources wished to have as much of the survey work done as possible within existing financial restrictions. There were 14 firms invited, and six proposals were received.

It is at this point that I would like to have the table inserted, Madam Speaker.

[Editor's Note: The table above referred to is as follows:]

	Area A	Area A & B	Area A, B & C
Marshall, Macklin Monaghan Ltd. Don Mills, Ontario	91,641.00	130,615.00	161,418.00
Burnett Resource Surveys Ltd. Burnaby, B.C.	178,120.00	258,950.00	307,944.00
Canadian Engineering Survey Co. Ltd. Edmonton, Alta.	111,350.00	187,059.00	328,931.00
J.A. Smith & Associates Calgary, Alta.	224,765.70	320,388.90	388,630.50

	Area A	Area A & B	Area A, B & C
McElhanney Surveying & Engineering Ltd. Vancouver, B.C.	91,205.00	324,031.00	352,556.00
Underhill & Underhill Vancouver, B.C.	143,169.00	221,164.05	273,698.00

For the benefit of hon. members I will read the figures out for the six firms for area A, B and C: Marshall, Macklin Monaghan Ltd., $161,418; Burnett Resources Surveys Ltd.,—

Mr. Fraser: Where is that firm?

Mr. Reid: The first was Don Mills, Ontario, and the second is Burnett Resource Surveys Ltd., Burnaby, B.C., $307,944; Canadian Engineering Survey Co. Ltd., Edmonton, Alberta, $328,931; J. A. Smith & Associates, Calgary, Alberta, $388,630.50; McElhanney Surveying & Engineering Ltd., Vancouver, B.C., $352,556; and Underhill & Underhill, Vancouver, B.C., $273,698.

Each proposal was evaluated by a team of officers from the Departments of Energy, Mines and Resources and Supply and Services, using a weighted point rating system. The proposal selected was considered technically acceptable, and was also the lowest in cost.

While it was clearly indicated that submissions were to be based on ideal weather conditions, the Crown recognized that it would have to absorb the downtime costs associated with poor weather conditions. This contingency has been set at $38,582 to raise the value of the contract to the maximum financial limitations provided for the project by the customer department, which will have an on-site project inspector.

With regard to the purchasing policy of the Department of Supply and Services, it should be stated at this time that when the final point of use for a product is in the western or in the Atlantic provinces, purchases will be made from suppliers in those regions provided that—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Reid: Perhaps there might be consent to my finishing the sentence.

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, I would ask hon. members to agree, as this is an important matter to the west coast.

Mr. Reid: May I just go back and start it again. Purchases will be made from suppliers in these regions provided that total PROC cost, that is product, resource, operating and contingent cost to the government cannot be reduced by using alternative Canadian sources.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF CIRCULARS CONTAINING GUIDELINES FOR LOCAL GOVERNMENT UNTIL NATIVE LEADERS CONSULTED

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Madam Speaker, I am sorry to note that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan) is not here this evening during the time I intend to pursue a question of policy of his department which is of extreme importance to all native people in Canada.

I have asked for this time to address the House and to put some further questions to the ministry, but in this case I suppose it will be to whomever it is that is representing this department. I do so because I feel that by implementing the program circulars the minister's department is taking a giant step backwards in its relationship with Indian people. Because of the time limitation I will only be able to touch on a very few of the questions that arise from the implementation of these circulars. I say this so that you, Madam Speaker, and the other members of this House will understand that, when I limit my remarks to those circulars dealing with local government, I am not sanctioning the rest.

The circulars dealing with local government are labelled D-1 to D-5. As the minister indicated in the House yesterday, they outline accounting practices which the bands must use as part of their administration of public money. The circulars add a few new terms to the language of Indian self-government, and they are "local government authority" and "district councils". These two terms are defined in such a way as to include traditional band councils, but they also allow for the creation of other units separate from the councils.

Local government authorities are to be incorporated as legal entities for the purpose of signing contracts and entering into agreements. Band councils, as they are now, do not have this legal status, and it would require a great deal of change in the law for them to acquire it. This has frightening implications for the Indian people and for their elected representatives, the chiefs and band councils, on the reserves and in the villages in the north.

The first step is to have the local governmental authorities incorporated. The next step is to transfer or delegate the traditional power of the chiefs and councils to the local government authority. The minister has a number of tools at his disposal which he can use to make sure the councils transfer their duties to other administrative units. By withholding all program dollars until the chiefs accept the circulars, the minister is now using one of the most effective of those tools. Some call it financial coercion; others call it extortion.

Once the chiefs and band councils are out of the way the minister will have a new level of bureaucracy which will be that much easier to deal with because there will be no need to go through the niceties of elections. He will have taken control of programs and will have brought them closer to the inner circle of his department, thus making it easier to accomplish what appears to be the main goal of this arm of his department, administer the hell out of the Indians.

With some regret I will now leave the topic of the ultimate effects of these circulars. I say "regret" because there is much more that could be said about the issue of consulting the Indian people in respect of the implementation of these circulars. Yesterday in the House the minister told us:

> ... there has been consultation on this matter. We feel that the guidelines responded in many ways to the requests of the native people who said they wanted to know what the rules were under which they have to deal with program funding coming from this department.

I would like to know the minister's definition of the word "consultation". Did it take the form of one of his regional directors walking down the street, meeting an Indian, and saying, "Hi, how's the wife?" By the way there will be some new rules next week". I would also like to know what the minister meant when he said "we". It could not have included the elected representatives of the Indian people. They do not feel that the guidelines respond in many ways to the requests of the native people.

I should like to quote a portion of a telex dated April 16 sent to the minister. It states:

> The Prince Albert District Chiefs consider the development of circulars D-1 through D-5 as completely unacceptable.

This was signed by seven chiefs of the Prince Albert District and one other man who was acting as the chief's representative. Were these people consulted? I doubt very much that they were. From the chiefs of the Saskatoon district comes this resolution:

> Whereas the circular's intent is to enact policies of the white paper policy of 1969 and therefore a serious approach to revise the Indian Act, to abrogate treaty responsibility and to disregard the constitutional responsibility of the federal government for Indians and Indian lands.
> Be it resolved that the circulars will not be implemented in the Saskatoon district, and that the Department of Indian Affairs provide program dollars to the bands according to the needs of the bands.

Again I seriously doubt that the eight chiefs who signed this resolution were consulted.

I have a number of other remarks I would like to make, but at this time I would simply like to ask one question. It is an important question. Will the minister put the program circulars in the garbage where they belong, and give the Indian leaders a chance to propose an accounting system which is acceptable not only to the department but to the Indian people?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan) has asked me to acknowledge that the reaction from provincial and national Indian leaders to our local government guidelines for Indian bands and Innuit settlements has been, to say the least, surprising.

Fears have been expressed that through these guidelines, the minister's department has devised a way to enable it to weaken the authority of Indian chiefs and councillors, amend the Indian Act without consultation, or resurrect the 1969 white paper. These allegations are totally erroneous. Band autonomy and integrity are held to be inviolate by the department. At the same time, however, the department must be satisfied that local band government is carried out on the basis of general acceptable business management principles.

In 1965 the department introduced the contributions to the bands funding program which enabled band councils to operate specific programs. Currently more than 500 of the 567 bands across Canada are administering various programs, and over $100 million will go directly to band councils this year to administer programs for their members—programs such as housing, education, social services, etc.

Because of the positive response of bands and the expanding nature of the program, a departmental task force was formed in late 1972 to chart the course for the future. Councils, associations, conferences and individuals submitted briefs and position papers. Most, if not all, of the general recommendations of the Indian people were accepted. In other words, the task force report made the objectives clear—all programs that could be managed at the local level should be. The department's obligations, on the other hand, required its involvement to ensure adequate levels of service and the guarantee of appropriate levels of funds.

The task force's recommendations also made clear that there must be general guidelines or regulations for band operations for the benefit of both chiefs and councils and departmental staff. We are therefore now at the stage of introducing guidelines and regulations.

The basic principles of the guidelines underlying local government are what is important. For example, circular D-1 guideline is mostly of a financial nature and provides for the accounting of funds. It also suggests procedures which should be set up by band councils to ensure that band members know when their band councils are taking responsibility for community programs. It makes it very clear that band chiefs and councils are responsible for planning, estimating, and negotiating for the total funds of their community. Circular D-2, for example, permits bands to form district councils for the delivery of programs. Such district councils, however, are only formed as the result of bands agreeing to combine their funds and resources. It is totally voluntary and there is not influence or pressure whatsoever for bands to form district councils.

In summary then I must reiterate that the several allegations made that the guidelines undermine or subjugate the Indian Act, that they take away the authority of the chiefs and councils, that they represent an attempt to revive the 1969 white paper, are totally erroneous. In fact the opposite is true, they provide for local government of Indian and Innuit communities by their chiefs and councillors.

TRANSPORT—TRANSFERENCE OF FISHING WHARVES TO FISHERIES MINISTRY—REASON FISHERMEN CHARGED WHARFAGE FEES

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, on May 14 I raised the subject of wharfage fees charged to fishermen in my constituency, a subject which has been raised on several occasions earlier in the House and to which no satisfactory answer has been given.

The initial problem arose because of the fact that there was no minister of fisheries, all harbours were under the authority of the Department of Transport, and there was very little knowledge of the basic operation of a fishing port vested in any of the individuals in that department.

It was agreed some time ago that the ports which fishermen used would be transferred to the Department of the Environment. At that time there was some complaint that the fishermen were being charged wharfage fees at the wharves on a rather discriminatory basis. Perhaps the reason for the discrimination may be found, first, in the fashion in which the wharfingers are appointed, which is by political appointment, and second, in the fashion in which they are paid.

I should like to quote from Hansard of May 23, 1973, at page 4008, which gives the scale of pay received by wharfingers:

Wharfingers receive annual remuneration for their services on a commission or percentage basis. They are paid a portion of the wharfage tolls and dues collected for the use of the wharf at the following rates: 100 per cent of the first $100 collected; 90 per cent of the next $300 collected; 50 per cent of the next $300 collected; 25 per cent of the next $1,800 collected; 15 per cent of the next $13,500 collected and 5 per cent of any remainder.

It becomes very obvious that there is an element of incentive for a wharfinger to collect up to a point and up to a point only, but this would seem to lead to the fact that the charges laid by the fishermen are that some boats are charged wharfage at a particular wharf while others are not. It seems to be on a rather selective basis. It seems that when the ports were transferred to the Minister of State (Fisheries) (Mr. LeBlanc) this matter would be taken into proper consideration and the habit would stop, but only last week I was called by fishermen who said that their boats were now impounded, that customs and immigration were ordered by some official in Ottawa not to grant permission for these boats to make calls at American ports. It so happens that their livelihood depends upon their calls to the American ports. These fishermen have been rather obstinate about this charge because it is not charged to all, or charged equally to any.

This is not the first time this subject has been raised. It was raised on April 5, 1973, when a group of fishermen made calls on the minister and on his officials in Ottawa. They were invited to appear before the committee of the environment. The subject of wharfage was mentioned there, and the fishermen presented themselves through their president, Mr. Savage who said:

While you are on the subject of breakwaters, the subject of wharfage should be mentioned. They have put a wharfage tax on us which was picked up, I understand, from the west coast and they took from that something they thought they should force on us without considering what it would amount to in our particular area, but it is there and you have to have it and you have to live with it.

The complaint is not so much that there is a wharfage charge but that it is charged in a discriminatory fashion. There are certain areas of the coast of Canada where fishermen have never heard of wharfage charges. There are other areas where a fisherman cannot dock without a wharfage charge. The inconsistency is not fair to the fishermen of either area.

The transfer of these harbours has been a long and tortuous subject. For instance the subject was first brought up in February of 1973 when the then parliamentary secretary said that it was going to happen right away, that there had been 2,163 harbours recommended for transfer to the Department of the Environment. The matter was later raised by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), and when he asked the question on July 24, 1973, he was told there would be an answer given next week. "There will be an answer next week," said the then parliamentary secretary to the minister of the environment, "as to when they will be transferred." A statement came out stating that they had been transferred on August 1, 1973. That was quite a long week.

The matter of wharfage is still not settled. It is still not being checked on an over-all basis. It is still being checked on a discriminatory and selective basis, and fishermen are now denied their livelihoods by virtue of the fact that they cannot pass freely on waters which they have fished for years.

I have a list of harbours which have been transferred in the province of New Brunswick, which includes Carleton-Charlotte, my constituency. Among those which have remained—and I say remained in the hands of the Department of Transport—are several harbours here, one of which is used as a fishermen's harbour. It also contains a ferry wharf which is perhaps properly now in the hands of MOT, but the fishermen's wharf is still under the MOT and also subject to wharfage, according to the list.

My plea is that the word of the then minister of the environment, that this matter would be resolved, should be kept by this government. He is now no longer in the House, but he spoke to those fishermen who visited here and said if he could possibly arrange matters it would be waived, and a new policy would later be announced and be brought into effect. When does that new policy come? When will the collection of wharfage be waived? When will they let the fishermen go free?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the Minister of State (Fisheries) (Mr. LeBlanc) has asked me to reply and to indicate his appreciation to the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) for his concern. Wharfage fees are being assessed and applied as required by law under the Government Harbours and Piers Act in respect to wharves administered by both the Department of Transport and the Minister of State for Fisheries in those locations where wharfingers are appointed.

The former minister of fisheries, recognizing the deficiencies of the current legislation to cope adequately with the many problems faced by the fishermen, received approval to prepare new legislation which would provide for improved harbour services and a more equitable fee structure.

Extensive discussions have been held during the past year in all regions across the country to obtain the views of fishermen and provincial governments and other interested parties. As a result the proposed legislation is now in an advanced stage of drafting and should be available shortly for introduction to the House. The new legislation will afford the Minister of State in charge of Fisheries the necessary authority for the development of fishing harbours and the introduction of modern management procedures. The act will also cater nationally and regionally for the long term planning of harbour facilities required to support adequately our commercial fishing industry in the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

THE BUDGET

ALLEGED REFERENCE TO CONTENTS BY PRIME MINISTER PRIOR TO PRESENTATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to request the unanimous consent of the House for the proposal of a motion concerning the budget. The urgency concerns the statement alleged to have been made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on his provincial election trip through southern Ontario last night. In this statement, which could involve a serious breach of parliamentary ethics, he is reported by Canadian Press to have given some details of the contents of the budget by saying that the forthcoming federal budget will bring higher taxes to restrain the economy. Thereby he scooped the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner):

That this House call upon the Minister of Finance to introduce his budget at once, to prevent further leaks of the contents of that budget.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST THAT PENSION BE GRANTED PERSONS BETWEEN 55 AND 65 YEARS OF AGE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) having very clearly stated in the House last night that the bill he will shortly introduce on the old age security pension will concern only spouses aged between 60 and 65, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That in the opinion of the House the needs of other groups, widowers, widows, single and others between 55 and 65 years of age should be taken into consideration without delay and the Minister of National Health and Welfare requested to bring forward immediately a bill providing income security for those groups whose situation is truly difficult.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, it requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There being no unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

POST OFFICE

PROPOSED IMMEDIATE RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House to present a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of growing urgency. My motion concerns the work stoppages in the Post Office that are spreading across Canada, creating havoc in communications and causing economic chaos. In view of the contradictory statements being made with respect to the present state of collective bargaining for a new contract with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the government and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers get to the bargaining table immediately, to work out a fair and equitable contract that will include adequate safeguards for the postal workers, including the impact of technological change, so that Canadians might be assured the high quality of postal service that has been denied them for the past eight years.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, the minister agreed.

HEALTH

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ASSURE MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION NOT SOLD BY QUEBEC MERCHANTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for that not so artful dodger, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, about his responsibilities under the Food and Drugs Act, a federal statute which makes no reference to provincial inspectors or even to federal inspectors, but which requires the Minister of National Health and Welfare to ensure that food not fit for human consumption is not peddled to Canadians. Since the minister freely admitted yesterday that his department was aware of the problems with regard to meat inspection in the province of Quebec at least two years ago, I ask the minister pointedly not what he has done in terms of discussions, but what he has done to draw this problem to the attention of the government of the province of Quebec and to the attention of his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, so that these very evident shortcomings in the meat inspection system in that province could be corrected?

● (1110)

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As I have already indicated, as soon as rumours started going round some two years ago, the inspectors of my department started to look into them in order to check whether there was any truth to them; upon finding concrete evidence that there was, they immediately asked the appropriate police force to make the necessary inquiry. The Quebec government was advised of the matter at that time, since the Quebec police force as well as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were involved in the police inquiry of which we see the results today.

[English]

GOVERNMENT ACTION IN PROVINCES OTHER THAN QUEBEC TO ASSURE MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION NOT SOLD

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I will ask the minister another question with respect to his responsibilities under this act. What action has he taken with regard to canvassing the situation in other provinces? Having been well aware of the situation in the province of Quebec, what action has he taken with respect to other provinces to ensure that the kind of laxity and confusion which has been indicated in Quebec does not exist elsewhere in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As I have just indicated, with regard to the situation in Quebec, none of the packing plants implicated are inspected by the federal Department of Agriculture. At the present time, there are no indications that packing plants in other provinces under the jurisdiction of the federal government are involved in practices similar to those discovered in Quebec. However, should any come to light, my officials will look into the matter immediately and take whatever steps are necessary. Still, I must remind the Leader of the Opposition that a number of those packing plants are inspected by representatives of the federal Department of Agriculture. Other are inspected by provincial inspectors; in still other cases, some provinces have delegated to federal inspectors of the Department of Agriculture the responsibility of checking operations of packing plants, within their respective jurisdictions.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Now that we are aware of the shocking situation in the province of Quebec, I will give the minister one further chance to tell this House whether he has conducted any survey with regard to the quality of inspection in the other provinces and whether he has done anything at all—not to pass off excuses or red herrings about federal inspection—to discharge his responsibility. Is he in a position to tell this House that meat is in fact being adequately inspected in the other provinces today?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: I have already answered that question, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. Leader of the Opposition put his first one.

[English]

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROTECT QUEBEC CONSUMERS FROM MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made yesterday by the Quebec minister of agriculture that the Minister of National Health and Welfare was shirking his responsibility and not discharging his statutory responsibilities to the people of Quebec, what is the minister now doing in light of the daily revelations in Quebec, the latest of which indicated that prepared meats are made from contaminated or diseased beef? What is the minister doing now to put at ease the minds of consumers in the province of Quebec that meat has been properly inspected to protect them?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I still believe that the best proof that steps have been taken is the investigation going on right now in Montreal. And, as the hon. member knows, the packing plants concerned have had their permit withdrawn by the Quebec government. As for the statement of the Quebec minister of agriculture, I am not aware of it. I shall look into what he may have said but it has nothing to do with the facts which everybody can check. Institutions being investigated at the present time fall under the Quebec government's jurisdiction.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question. The inquiry taking place in Quebec is a provincial inquiry. The minister cannot come to the House and tell us that he has no jurisdiction because clearly under the Food and Drugs Act he has complete jurisdiction over all packing houses. I ask the minister, in discharging that responsibility, if he will do as much now as he did last fall when Canadians were faced with the prospect of eating contaminated hamburger. Will he give the House some assurance that an effort is being made to muster all the inspection capabilities he has, to send inspectors into the province of Quebec and discharge his own responsibilities and lay charges where they are warranted?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. member's suggestion does not deserve to be retained for the simple reason that, as I mentioned before, it is because of the work carried out by my inspectors in the province of Quebec and the current investigation that results have been obtained. The time to send investigators into the field has been long gone: the job was done over the past two years with the co-operation of the police force concerned and some of my departmental inspectors.

[English]

REASON FOR FAILURE TO PROSECUTE QUEBEC MERCHANTS SELLING MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A final supplementary. If the minister now tells the House that the present revelations are as a result of the work done by his department perhaps he can explain to the House why he has not laid charges himself under the Food and Drugs Act.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this is probably the third time the hon. member has asked this question. The reply is quite clear and simple: before instituting proceedings, we must collect the necessary evidence if we do not want to see our petition get thrown out of court. This is exactly what we have been doing for the past few months and the case is before the board of inquiry. I have personally contacted the chairman of this board. He fully agrees that we should let the investigation continue so as to bring out all the facts, before instituting legal procedures, which might otherwise cause prejudice to the current investigation.

FINANCE

DEFICIT IN BALANCE OF PAYMENTS ON TIRES FROM UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance along the lines of questions I put to him yesterday about the layoffs at the Firestone Rubber plant in Whitby and whether this could be attributed to the reduction in tariffs by the Canadian government. I should like to ask the minister now if he is aware that the deficit from the balance of trade for the sale and purchase of tires in the United States which has been running in the neighbourhood of $25 million a year last year jumped to $155 million and for the first two months of this year was $24 million. In other words, if the trend continues we will have a deficit in the balance of payments of more than $150 million. What inquiries are being made and what does the minister and his colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce propose to do about this very serious situation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the hon. member's questions yesterday I asked that the facts be brought to me. Because of the additional aspects brought forward by the hon. member this morning I will have further consultations with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and in view of the fact that the lay-off of almost 300 people at Whitby is not the only lay-off in the industry as there will be more in other cities in Ontario resulting in close to 2,000 people being laid off, will the minister discuss this matter with his colleague if he has not already done so? Also, what discussions are being held, if any, with representatives of the rubber industry about the problems of our worsening trade with the United States in tires and tubes?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I understand there have been discussions with the industry but I should like to bring the whole matter up to date and get in touch with the hon. member.

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO ASSURE CANADA'S SHARE OF NORTH AMERICAN TIRE MARKET

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Would the minister discuss with his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the necessity, let alone the desirability, of meeting with representatives of the industry to attempt to get some assurance from them that new investment in Canada over the next few years will be at least proportional to our share of purchasing on the North American market because, as I have indicated, in recent years there has been a very sharp decrease in our share and a worsening in the situation of the whole industry and of workers?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): On that aspect as well, my recollection is that certain representatives of the unions concerned have been in touch with our people.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY ON QUALITY OF IMPORTED BUTTER

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The minister says that he has held an inquiry regarding the meat market and it is still going on. Has the minister considered setting up an inquiry regarding the processing and packing of imported butter to protect the consumer against the sale of adulterated butter, to know if the consumer eats really pure butter at 50 per cent or 100 per cent?

Oral Questions

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that this question should be directed to my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It is no doubt a matter of fraudulent publicity. I suggest the question be put to the minister when he will be in the House.

THE BUDGET

DATE OF PRESENTATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As it is now over 40 days since the minister announced he would likely bring down the budget before the end of May and now that the minister's efforts to achieve consensus among labour and business have subsided, can the minister tell the House whether he has been successful in achieving consensus among the Prime Minister, his party House leader and himself as to when the budget will be presented?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, without accepting the tone of the preamble to the question asked by the hon. gentleman, I have to report to the House that because of the recent calling of the summit meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization at Brussels, the Prime Minister must be out of the country from May 27 to 31. Thus, he will not be available for the necessary consultations on the final decisions for an early budget as we had hoped. Shortly after his return from the NATO meeting, I myself am required to be in Paris to chair the special sessions of the interim committee of the International Monetary Fund. That committee has been assigned the responsibility for international monetary development in world trading and monetary patterns which are very important to Canada, especially following the oil crisis last year.

In the circumstances I now intend, after my return and after a period of intensive final preparation—

Mr. Baldwin: And prayer.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —to present the budget to the House a month from today on Monday evening, June 23.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER DISCUSSIONS TO ACHIEVE CONSENSUS ON RESTRAINT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): In view of the uncertainty concerning the status of the consensus discussions shown by conflicting statements by the Prime Minister and the Acting Prime Minister today, would the minister indicate if the government plans to hold further consensus talks between now and June 23, will the minister be in charge of the discussions and, more specifically, will he indicate to the House if the government will take a definitive position on guidelines on or prior to June 23?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): It is my understanding that further technical meetings have been held. I gave a full report on the consensus process in the House in response to a motion put by the parliamentary leader of the NDP and that was debated last week.

MINISTER'S VIEW OF INCREASED TAXATION AS A BUDGETARY OPTION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): In our slowing economy with its rising unemployment as reflected in UIC payments now being predicted by the C. D. Howe Institute and the Financial Times as being $3.3 billion to $3.5 billion this year compared with $2 billion last year, would the minister indicate whether the Prime Minister made a premature comment when he said that taxes would be rising in the budget in that rising taxes would mean a restrictive budget? In truth, is that a responsible option at the present time for the minister?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the Prime Minister's comment.

SUGGESTION PRIME MINISTER NOT MAKE STATEMENTS ON ECONOMIC MATTERS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. It is a request. Will the Acting Prime Minister convey to the Prime Minister the view of this party that he confine himself for the rest of his tour to things with which he is familiar, such as swimming pools and chandeliers, and leave the serious issues of the economy to the Minister of Finance who, for all his defects, still has the constitutional responsibility?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the House leader of the official opposition that all the expertise on swimming pools and chandeliers is on the other side of the House.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ALLEGATION ONTARIO UNHELPFUL REGARDING CHARGES AGAINST SEAFARERS INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister. Can he advise whether the Minister of Labour's comments on Wednesday that "Ontario authorities were strangely unhelpful" regarding allegations concerning the SIU were made with the full approval of the government or whether, in view of the specific denial issued yesterday by the acting solicitor general for the government of Ontario, will the Acting Prime Minister take this opportunity to clarify the unfortunate impression created by the Minister of Labour's remarks on Wednesday?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no correction to make to the statement made by the Minister of Labour. The situation was canvassed many times in cabinet. What the Minister of Labour said was fully justified.

Mr. Fraser: Yesterday the Hon. John Clement said in a statement, and I quote:

> All the information provided in this House by the hon. member from High Park on November 19 was forwarded to senior federal officials on December 10. Information related to charges made under the Criminal Code is in the public domain and has been freely available to federal authorities since last May.

In view of that statement, how can the government say today that the province of Ontario did not co-operate with the federal government? Can the Acting Prime Minister give us an explanation in view of that specific denial yesterday?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, this question was raised on many occasions. The Minister of Labour and the Minister of Justice sought information that would justify the kind of inquiry the government of Ontario had been demanding. The information we received came very reluctantly. It was not very full. As a result, we had to wait to make our decision to see what the basis was for the charges that were being made. I am sure the hon. member would agree that in matters like this, one must proceed on the basis of having as much information as possible. I support what the Minister of Labour said, namely that the information was scanty and it was slow in coming. I think the Minister of Labour was fully justified in the statement he made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENTS TO SUPPORT ALLEGATION ONTARIO UNHELPFUL REGARDING CHARGES AGAINST SEAFARERS INTERNATIONAL UNION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Will the Acting Prime Minister undertake today to give to this House details and minutes of the requests, communications and exchanges by telephone calls or otherwise between the federal government and the government of the province of Ontario to justify the allegations made by the Minister of Labour on Wednesday and reiterated by the Acting Prime Minister in this House today?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government authorized the Minister of Labour to make an investigation. This investigation will go forward. Whether it would be advisable under these circumstances to comply with this request, I am not quite sure. At any rate, I can assure the hon. member that the information provided by Ontario was of the kind that had been described by the Minister of Labour. I am very happy that now at last an inquiry is under way.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

REQUEST FOR NAMES OF DONORS OF SWIMMING POOL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, a moment ago the Acting Prime Minister referred to swimming pools. I would ask him this. The Prime Minister stated he had no knowledge as to the donors—and unfortunately I was not in the House yesterday afternoon—but a few days ago it was stated that the Department of National Revenue had this information. I ask him whether on Monday he would produce the names of these so-called philanthropists who made the contribution totalling $200,000 for a swimming pool in the Prime Minister's home yard and who, before they made the contribution, sought and secured the consent of the Department of National Revenue that whatever they contributed could be deducted from their income taxes. In other words, the people of Canada would pay for the pool? Since the Prime Minister has told the House that he does not have this information but that the Department of National Revenue has it, can this information be made available so that the sham endeavoured to be perpetrated on the Canadian people that the pool is a gift when, in fact, it will be paid for ultimately by the Canadian people may be exposed?

● (1130)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The right hon. member knows very well that one of the kinds of information which is not made available at any time concerns the tax returns of any individual. This applies when gifts are made to the Crown. Many gifts are made to the Crown; many people were ready to make contributions, for instance, to the residence of the Leader of the Official Opposition. Those details were not revealed at the time. No one raised questions of this niggling kind about the generosity of Canadians who wanted to contribute to our parliamentary system by providing a house for the Leader of the Opposition, and I am surprised that the right hon. gentleman should now be so concerned about a matter in which he showed so little interest some time ago.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Subterfuge answers like that get one nowhere. The people of Canada have a right to know who these individuals are so that they will be able to see, whether, later on, some of them are appointed senators.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Or get more dredging contracts.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST SEVENTEEN NURSES BE RETURNED TO WORK AT OTTAWA MEDICAL CENTRE OR ISSUED SEPARATION CERTIFICATES

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to put a question to the Minister of National Defence, but in his absence I will direct it to the President of the Treasury Board. Can the minister inform the House when the 17 nurses locked out for the last two weeks by the National Defence Medical Centre will be returned to work or, alternatively, when separation certificates will be issued to enable these nurses to qualify for unemployment insurance?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I made an inquiry. All nurses who were permanent employees have been rehired. Some of them were temporary employees. As there is not so much work at this time, they were dismissed. As to their dismissal certificate, I asked that it be issued bearing the date of the day on which the government dismissed them.

ENERGY

REQUEST THAT CERTAIN CONDITIONS BE ATTACHED TO GOVERNMENT'S PURCHASE OF HEAVY WATER PLANT AT PORT HAWKESBURY

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister concerning the decision to purchase the heavy water plant in Nova Scotia. In view of the fact that Canadian General Electric contracted to provide Atomic Energy of Canada with something in the neighbourhood of 4,000 tons of heavy water over a 12½-year period, and in view of the fact that in the five years of operation CGE has reportedly only supplied one-quarter of this amount, has the shortfall been considered in arriving at the purchase price of CGE's Port Hawkesbury plant?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I should explain that both the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce are attending a meeting at the present time having to do with the conservation of energy; they regret they cannot be here in the House today. I will pass on this inquiry to the minister concerned who will reply when he returns.

Mr. Symes: Thank you. I should like the Acting Prime Minister to pass on, also, the following supplementary. In view of the fact that this heavy water plant operated by private industry has never produced at capacity due to technical difficulties—over the first four years it reportedly operated at less than 50 per cent capacity—and in view of the fact that the purchase deal between AECL and CGE includes $5 million for technical renovation paid by AECL, can the minister assure us that payment of the full purchase price of approximately $93 million is contingent upon the plant operating at full capacity?

Mr. Sharp: I will pass on that question also.

[Mr. Francis.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT PROTESTED RESUMPTION OF NUCLEAR TESTING BY FRANCE

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Has the government, formally or informally, protested to France about the resumption of nuclear testing?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The Canadian government has made its views known to France on a number of occasions. We protested very strongly against tests in the atmosphere. As a member of the non-proliferation treaty, we have urged France to join with us in trying to control the spread of nuclear weapons and to co-operate with other members. So far, France has decided not to be a member. We are, of course, glad that tests in the atmosphere have been ended, but we regret it should be considered necessary to go on testing in any environment.

Mr. Gillies: Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not understand my question. I will repeat it. Has Canada protested, either formally or informally, now, to the government of France, with regard to its planned resumption of nuclear testing?

Mr. Sharp: I would doubt it, but I could make inquiries. The attitude of the government of Canada is so well known to France that it is not necessary for us to reiterate our position each time tests are underway. We also objected to testing in the United States, the Soviet Union and China.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to those directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs by the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unless the questions are of extreme urgency I am reluctant to allow them, bearing in mind that the hon. lady is one of the initiators of the opposition motion today under which this whole subject will be discussed. Unless there are very valid reasons, I would prefer to defer questions on that topic in the interest of other hon. members present.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

CREATION OF JOBS IN AEROSPACE INDUSTRY IN WINNIPEG—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. The Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence both made promises prior to the July 8 election that 800 aerospace jobs would be created in Winnipeg. Can the minister announce when new contracts will be announced so as to create these jobs?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, we have already announced some contracts and I hope that I shall soon be able to announce a new contract with a company from Winnipeg. I must say that as far as aeronautics are concerned the Winnipeg area is privileged in comparison with the other parts of Canada.

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: As the CAE plant in Winnipeg is laying off its employees—there is now only a skeleton staff left—will any of these new contracts be allotted to that plant?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I must say that Transair, for instance, hired many employees and will continue to do so during the coming year. Bristol Aerospace engaged more workers than last year and, I repeat again, the general aeronautical situation in Winnipeg is much more advantageous than in any other region of Canada.

MANPOWER

UNEMPLOYMENT IN THE ATLANTIC PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO COUNTERACT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In the light of the ever increasing unemployment rate in the Atlantic provinces, is the minister in a position today to announce what special efforts are being made, or what new programs may be implemented, to deal with this serious situation?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am not in a position today to announce a program of the nature referred to by the hon. member. Obviously, these matters are under serious and constant review. When a decision is made it will be announced in the House.

Mr. Muir: Having in mind the tragic unemployment rate on Cape Breton Island where it is ranging at the moment between 15 and 20 per cent, has the minister made special representations to the Minister of Finance regarding this serious question so that possibly after June 23 something may be done?

● (1140)

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I could elaborate on my previous answer, except to reiterate that these matters are under very serious consideration, reflecting our concern for them.

AIR TRANSPORT

FARE INCREASES—POSSIBLE IMPLEMENTATION PRIOR TO DECISION BY CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION—SUGGESTED DISALLOWANCE BY MINISTER

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. May I ask the minister whether the air fare increases will go into effect on Monday regardless whether or not a decision has been handed down at that time by the Canadian Transport Commission?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have no reason to believe they are not going to be implemented.

Mr. Murta: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which relates to an article in the Montreal Gazette this morning which said an increase would be brought down regardless whether or not a decision has been made at that time. Since the minister has the power, with cabinet approval, under section 64(1) of the National Transportation Act to suspend or disallow the increases, why is he not taking steps to do so? If he is taking steps to do so, would he report to the House?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I think I have already mentioned to the House what steps I have taken, in my discussions with the airlines, in order to protect those who are located in the extreme parts of this country. Outside of that, the hon. member has only to look at the financial situation of the airlines to see there is only one way to improve the situation, and that is to increase fares.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—SUGGESTED INCREASE IN NUMBER OF PROGRAMS ACCEPTED

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, since unemployment increases at an alarming rate, especially in the province of Quebec and in my area, may I ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration whether he plans to authorize in the immediate future the extension of LIP projects now under way and, secondly, to accept a certain number of others which have been presented and are extremely valuable, in order to reduce unemployment effects in Quebec with the assistance of private enterprise?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is very similar to the previous question asked by another hon. member a few minutes ago. I would have to say that it would be raising false hopes for sponsors of LIP projects to expect an extension past the period for which their contract calls. Any other measures that might be decided upon, as I indicated earlier, will be announced in the House in due course.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance.

A moment ago, the Minister of Finance informed the House that he will bring down his budget on June 23, that is 30 days from today. I should like to ask him whether he will consider in the meantime the fact that unemployment has become an excessively serious problem and that considerable funds will be earmarked for the Department of Manpower and Immigration to implement many valuable local initiatives programs, because we don't want any other.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and I are keeping in rather close consultation.

POST OFFICE

SUGGESTION UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS BE PUT UNDER TRUSTEESHIP

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Postmaster General, if he can give me his attention for a few moments.

Yesterday the postal system was disrupted again in Quebec and especially in Montreal by a new sudden illness of the employees in that area. Could the Postmaster General inform the House of the state of health of these employees, particularly in Montreal, and does he intend to request a royal commission of inquiry, perhaps medical, or to place the union under the trusteeship of a responsible person, in order to put an end to the troubles we have known in the province of Quebec, particularly as regards the postal system?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that the workers are suffering from what they call the "Mackasey flu". I do not know whether it is of very short duration or a prolonged illness. We do not want anyone back on the job who is ill; we may have to provide adequate medical facilities in order to make certain that they are not back on the job unless in excellent health. In the meantime, I think we must show a little patience and understanding of the frustration of these workers, who have been without any visible sign of a collective agreement for six months because their union negotiators have been preoccupied with the problem in Montreal, rather than with what should be preoccupying them, which is obtaining a collective agreement, as suggested by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE INSPECTION PERSONNEL IN QUEBEC AS RESPONSIBLE AS THOSE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It has been my experience that the government has every right to be very proud of the federal government inspection services and staff that it provides in the province of British Columbia. From recent events it is very evident that a wide variance exists in the quality and integrity of this service across Canada. Can the minister assure the House that the federal government inspection personnel and services in Quebec are as responsible and have as much integrity as those in British Columbia?

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I can give that complete and total assurance to the hon. member.

COMPENSATION TO TRUCKERS FOR LOSSES RESULTING FROM FREIGHT RATE FREEZE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport which arises out of the request by the truckers for payment of compensation as a result of losses suffered due to the freight rate freeze. Has the minister met with the trucking industry, has an agreement been reached as to the amount of compensation to be paid, and has the submission yet received cabinet approval?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we did not, of course, have the same commitment to the trucking industry as we had to the railways, but I think there is a case to be made there. I received the submission of the trucking association and I also received a certain number of claims and letters from them—I do not know how many, but I think 30 or 35. I intend to bring the matter to the attention of the cabinet and try to resolve it.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since these negotiations and discussions have been taking place for quite some time, can the minister indicate to the House when a formal announcement may be made and cabinet approval granted?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's guess is as good as mine, but as far as the Minister of Transport is concerned, it is going to go before cabinet very rapidly.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON ACTION TAKEN FOLLOWING DISCOVERY OF CONTAMINATED HAMBURG

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health and is supplementary to that asked by my leader. In view of reports several weeks ago that hamburger sold in this country contained unacceptable amounts of contamination, bacterial contamination and otherwise, would the minister indicate what follow up studies have been made, whether a report has been presented to him and he has taken any action as a result of such report?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I made a statement in the House on that matter several months ago, following which additional personnel had been appointed for that purpose. That personnel has carried out its work throughout the country, and in each identified case where a violation of the Food and Drugs Act is found, proceedings are instituted according to the usual procedure.

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister would assure the House that Canadians are indeed getting hamburger that is up to standard and no longer the contaminated material that was previously sold?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, quite obviously, it is impossible for me to give such assurance concerning each and every establishment throughout the country. All I can say is that every available inspector within my department is at work and makes regular inquiries into this field and that every time some offense is discovered, prosecutions take place or action is taken to correct the situation.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED CONSIDERATION OF REFUNDABLE TAX ON WAGES AND PROFITS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In preparation for his budget is the minister considering, instead of the mandatory controls he seems to feel may be necessary, a form of refundable tax on wages and profits that are above certain guidelines similar to that used during the Second World War.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the hon. gentleman's point of view.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED CANADIAN SUPPORT FOR TEN-YEAR BAN ON KILLING OF WHALES

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. It concerns the meeting of the International Whaling Commission scheduled for London in June. Since the present selective moratorium on whale killing to which Canada is a party, and which Canada supports, has the effect of only shifting the location of the kill and the species to be killed, and still drives whales toward extinction, will Canada at London press for a moratorium which will honour the unanimous agreement of the Stockholm Conference, of which Canada was also a party, for a ten-year ban on all whaling.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for the suggestion. It is a serious one and I will see that it is conveyed to the minister.

Is the Acting Prime Minister prepared to announce the appointment of a judge to fill a vacancy on the Supreme Court of the Province of Newfoundland.

AIR CANADA

ISSUANCE OF FREE PASSES TO TRAVEL AGENCY REPRESENTATIVES—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT APPROVAL

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the directors and staff of the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada admitted in bankruptcy testimony that they travelled across Canada and to Europe both first class and economy on free passes issued by Air Canada, would the minister inform the House if the issuance of free passes to travel agencies and others is a general practice of Air Canada endorsed by the minister?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a general practice of all airlines to give passes to travel agencies. I know that some passes have been given. I regret that the hon. member for Hamilton West is not here, because I think he was one of the officials of Heritage Canada and he might tell us how he travelled.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, without accepting the remarks of the Minister of Transport with regard to the hon. member for Hamilton West which I consider to be a low blow, I should like to ask the minister if he has some indication of the cost to the taxpayers of all these free passes.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely that information should be sought in another way.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ISSUANCE OF CANADIAN CONTENT GUIDELINES FOR CONSTRUCTION OF PLANTS AND PIPELINES IN NORTHERN TERRITORIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact that the Canadian government has a policy of Canadian content in respect of the construction of pipelines within Canada, has the government issued any Canadian content guidelines in connection with the plant construction and engineering services along these pipelines in the territories.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Not that I am aware of, Mr. Speaker, but it is certainly something very pertinent. As the hon. member for Calgary Centre knows, we have been discussing this situation vis-à-vis Canadian participation in the department and with the oil companies involved. I feel very strongly that the prime control should be Canadian, maximizing Canadian content.

ALLEGATION CALGARY FIRM GAVE CONTRACT TO NON-CANADIAN ENGINEERS—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, would the minister inquire into the truth or otherwise of the report that a contract was given in the last two weeks to a firm in Calgary which turned the work over to non-Canadian engineers in view of the very high quality of Canadian engineering in this field.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I will be very happy to look into that. I am not aware of any Calgary company receiving such a contract.

About a dozen days ago the Quebec Justice Minister announced that he would recommend to the federal government and to the responsible authorities annulment of a pardon already granted Mr. Desjardins, a well known personality in Quebec construction circles. Could the minister tell us if the government or the minister in charge has received such an official request and, secondly, if such is the case, could he tell us what will be the attitude taken by the government or if a decision has already been made with regard to the request from the Quebec Minister of Justice?

INQUIRY AS TO INSTRUCTIONS TO KEEP MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION OFF MARKET IN QUEBEC PENDING INVESTIGATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a further question about this very shocking incident where apparently putrid meat continued to move on to the market in Quebec some two years after the minister's inspectors were aware of this. In view of the power of the inspectors of the minister to seize and hold from the market meat that is unfit for human consumption, what instructions did the minister give his inspectors to keep this meat off the market while the investigation was going on.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it was an extremely complex inquiry, once again, which involved criminal elements as well as following up and conducting the inquiry once the first indications being identified were referred to the police. Therefore, the police forces conducted the inquiry until they were able to get sufficient evidence for the Inquiry Commission on Organized Crime to proceed.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN QUEBEC AND FEDERAL GOVERNMENT CONCERNING MEAT INSPECTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, that is pure evasion. I should like to ask the minister whether he would consult with the government of Quebec and seek permission of the government of Quebec to table in the House any communication between himself or the leader of the Government of Canada and a minister or the Prime Minister of the province of Quebec on the subject of the inspection of meat in that province during the last two years.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know, there were no written exchanges of that kind.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to refer to a question I asked during the course of the question period. On May 9, 1975, I asked the President of the Treasury Board certain very specific questions. He said that he had the answer to those questions in a letter he delivered to me. I will publicly release the contents of the letter, but I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is a distortion of the whole purpose of the estimates and the whole purpose of the question period. The President of the Treasury Board should be ashamed of himself for not dealing fairly with this House. This is what he said—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member realizes that the quality of any answer given by any minister at any time is not a subject for debate at this time.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The quality is like that of the meat in Quebec.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to the question of privilege which is now before you. I appreciate that you propose to rule on the matter next Monday. In view of the way in which the hon. member for York-Simcoe attempted yesterday to join his question of privilege—which you have ruled invalid—with my own, I want to make it clear that I am not making any complaint about anything that took place outside this chamber, in committee, either as to the conduct of the hon. member in committee or the procedure of the committee. The question that I raised relates entirely to the language of the hon. member in this House.

● (1200)

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is in response to the question of privilege raised recently by the hon. member for York Centre. I just want to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that I received a copy of the letter which the hon. member sent to you and in my opinion he appears to be reversing the position that he had taken earlier in his question of privilege. Today I felt that he confirmed that reversal, and I would draw Your Honour's attention to the actual request that he made in his initial question of privilege, which was that the ruling be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections and that nothing be done concerning language in this House, as the hon. member has indicated today.

Mr. Speaker: I propose to consider all elements of the question raised by hon. members and will make a decision at three o'clock on Monday afternoon.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Charles Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,983, 2,032, 2,121, 2,153, 2,158, 2,268, 2,360 and 2,377.

Mr. Speaker, if question No. 1,116 and starred question No.1,910 could be made orders for return, these returns would be tabled immediately.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

CONSULTING SERVICES

Question No. 1,983—Mr. Reynolds:

Was a contract awarded by the Department of Supply and Services in September 1973 to Systems Approach Ltd., Ottawa, Ontario for consulting services at Ottawa and, if so (a) for what purpose (b) were tenders requested on this contract?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Yes. (a) This contract was placed on behalf of the Department of National Defence to develop an analytical model which would indicate the absolute and time-dependent effects of various Forces-development decisions in relation to future DND budgetary requirements. (b) Tenders were not called for this requirement. DND requested the services of this specific contractor due to the time constraint and because he was the only known contractor possessing the combined capabilities needed to minimize technical and financial risk. This required experience with military problems and a composite knowledge of input-output analysis, computerized information systems and economics related to this subject.

TROPICAL PLANTS IN GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS

Question No. 2,032—Mr. Masniuk:

1. (a) How much money is allocated annually for the installation and maintenance of tropical plants in all government buildings in the City of Ottawa (b) what is the breakdown for each department (i) yearly (ii) monthly, if this is not simply a twelve month average?

2. What is (a) the length of the contracts (b) how often and when are they normally tendered?

3. Who is eligible to tender for (a) new installations (b) maintenance contracts for existing installations?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): 1. (a) There is no annual allocation of money specifically for this purpose. However, in the fiscal year 1974-75 the Department of Public Works expended $222,621 for the purchase and maintenance of plants in government buildings in the city of Ottawa. (b) (i) The breakdown of expenditures by the department for the fiscal year 1974-75 is as follows: Defence Research Board, $798; Department of Public Works, $1,546; Energy, Mines & Resources, $42,959; External Affairs, $655; Finance & Treasury Board, $300; Industry, Trade & Commerce, $375; Department of Insurance, $3,600; Ministry of Transport, $11,919; National Health & Welfare, $60; National Research Council, $8,555; National Revenue, $45,994; House of Commons, $755; Privy Council, $1,280; Public Service Commission, $12,369; Secretary of State, $15; Science & Technology, $613; Solicitor General, $14,899; Statistics Canada, $71,570; Supply & Services, $3,159; Royal Canadian Mounted Police, $1,200; Total $222,-621. (ii) Not applicable.

2. (a) Contracts for plant maintenance vary from one month to several years in length. (b) Maintenance contracts are tendered on an "as required basis".

3. (a) New installations of more than $100 are purchased through the Department of Supply & Services. Installations up to $100 are acquired through local purchase order. (b) Maintenance contracts in excess of $5,000 are publicly advertised and everyone is eligible to tender. Contracts under $5,000 are awarded subsequent to invited tenders from firms judged to be capable of performing the work involved.

UIC—PROSECUTIONS UNDER REGULATION 146 OF UIC REGULATIONS

Question No. 2,121—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

1. In the Province of Quebec, how many employers were prosecuted under Clause 146 of the Unemployment Insurance Regulations in (a) 1973 (b) 1974?

2. How many of such prosecutions were successful?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Insofar as the Unemployment Insurance Commission is concerned: 1. (a) in 1973, one prosecution; (b) in 1974, seven prosecutions; Total: eight prosecutions.

2. In the eight (8) cases, the accused employers were found guilty and fined as follows: one was fined, $25.00; one was fined, $50.00; two were fined $100.00 each; two were fined $300.00 each; two were fined $500.00 each; Total: $1,875.00.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—PHYSICIANS DECISION

Question No. 2,153—Mr. Gauthier (Roberval):

Can a physician's decision be overruled by an officer of UIC and, if so, as of what date?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes. However, the decision is appealable to a board of referees and in certain cases to an umpire who is a judge of the Federal Court.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—CLAIMANT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Question No. 2,158—Mr. Gauthier (Roberval):

1. Has UIC discontinued the Claimants Assistance Programme as provided for in section 106 of the Act and, if so (a) on what date (b) for what reason?

2. Has the Claimants Assistance Programme been replaced by the Special Interview Programme and, if so, on what date?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. No. (a) Not applicable. (b) Not applicable.

2. No.

SPRUCE BUDWORM SPRAYING—NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 2,268—Mr. Howie:

1. What areas of New Brunswick will be sprayed to prevent spruce budworm damage this year?

2. On what date will spraying take place and with what chemicals?

3. How much money will the government contribute to such spraying in New Brunswick?

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): 1. Under the authority of the government of New Brunswick, approximately 6.5 million acres of fir-spruce forests mainly in central and northern New Brunswick will be sprayed in 1975 to prevent budworm damage.

2. The bulk of the spraying will be done in late May or early June depending on host tree development and weather. Materials to be used include Fenitrothion, Phosphamidon, Matacil and Dylox which have all been registered for use in Canada in 1975.

3. No funds for pest control assistance were included in the 1975-76 estimates. Future federal assistance to the provinces is now under review.

CRTC HIRING PRACTICES

Question No. 2,360—Mr. Brisco:

Since the Official Languages Act came into force on August 1, 1972 (a) how many Anglophones have been hired by CRTC and, how many (i) were fluently bilingual (ii) underwent French-language training (iii) completed French-language training (iv) passed the French-language test (b) how many Francophones have been hired by CRTC and, how many (i) were fluently bilingual (ii) underwent English-language training (iii) underwent English-language testing (iv) passed English-language training?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): In so far as the Canadian Radio-Television Commission is concerned: (a) Anglophones, 56; (i) Bilingual Anglophones, 12; (ii) Language training, 19; (iii) Completed language training, 6; (iv) Passed test, 6; (b) Francophones, 72; (i) Bilingual Francophones, 59; (ii) Language training, 2; (iii) Completed language training, 2; (iv) Passed test, 2.

HIGH TENSION ELECTRICAL LINES

Question No. 2,377—Mr. Herbert:

1. Have there been any discussions between officials of the Department of Transport and Hydro-Quebec or the Government of Quebec concerning the locations at which the high tension electrical lines to export power to New York State will cross the Ottawa and St. Lawrence Rivers?

2. Have any decisions or agreements been made?

3. Is this matter of concern to the Minister of Transport?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. Discussions have been held with Hydro-Quebec relating to high tension electrical lines crossing the Ottawa River below Carillon and the St. Lawrence River above Beauharnois.

2. No.

3. All overhead power transmission lines are of concern to the Ministry of Transport from the point of view of clearance above water level for the protection of navigation.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

DREE GRANTS

Question No. 1,116—Mr. Laprise:

1. Since the establishment of DREE, what were the amounts granted by province each year for the creation of new jobs (a) for Canadian businesses (b) for foreign businesses?

2. For each amount, how much was allocated to the (a) timber industry (b) lumber industry (c) pulp and paper industry?

Return tabled.

COST OF NATIONAL AND PROVINCIAL MEDICARE 1973 AND 1974

Question No. 1,910—Mr. Rynard:

1. For the years 1973 and 1974, how much was spent on (a) national and provincial medicare (b) hospital care?

2. By province, what is the (a) total health care costs for (i) acute (ii) mental (iii) chronic (b) number of chronic care units and what is the cost per bed?

3. What is the contribution per bed by the government (a) in active treatment hospitals (b) for chronic care units?

Return tabled.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order which again stems from the reply by the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding my questions on the order paper Nos. 1,480 to 1,511 inclusive. The minister said in reply:

—I believe that to answer all the hon. gentleman's questions fully would cost in excess of $10,000. Maybe a more selective approach on the part of the hon. member would relieve me of concern in that area and possibly provide him with the information he is seeking.

I would suggest, through you, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. member would like to send over the files I would be able to pick out the information and I am sure it would not cost $10,000.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REVERSE DECLINE IN RESIDENTIAL CONSTRUCTION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands) moved:

That this House urges the government to take strong and immediate action to reverse the decline in residential construction so that Canadians again can have access to decent housing at prices they can afford.

She said: Mr. Speaker, today we have a debate in this chamber because we are experiencing at present a crisis in the residential construction industry. For the past year the health of this vital sector of our economy has deteriorated from warning symptoms to an acute illness. It has deteriorated because of the government's failure to recognize the severity of the problem in the housing sector and its failure to take any effective action. There should be no crisis today, but the government ignored the warnings, disregarded the facts and misjudged the economic situation in this country.

I could quote the words, promises and intentions with regard to housing made by the government over the past 15 months, but that exercise would be as fruitless as the measures they have taken to deal with the crisis. Let me assure the minister, who last fall stated that the "situation is a problem rather than a crisis", that the crisis has now escalated to emergency proportions. The housing situation today in Canada is critical. Without strong and effective action by the federal government it can only worsen in the months ahead to the point where we will be facing a genuine housing crisis in the full sense of the term.

In effect, we have two major housing problems today. We have a supply problem. At the current rate of activity we simply are not going to build enough new housing units in Canada this year even to meet our minimal requirements in terms of new family formations. We also have a serious cost problem, particularly in regard to mortgage interest rates. At current cost, many Canadians simply cannot afford to purchase a home of their own; many others are forced to spend a disproportionate amount of their disposable incomes on housing in order to meet these high costs.

A word or two on the supply issue. Even with some improvement during the month, new housing starts in April were running at an annual rate of about 180,000. The minister himself has admitted over and over again that we need at least 210,000 starts as a minimum objective. We on this side of the House believe that a target of 250,000 starts is not an unrealistic objective for a government which really cares about housing and is prepared to give it some priority.

● (1210)

This sharp reduction in residential housing activity is bad enough in itself for Canadians seeking to enter the housing market and who now face the propect of being unable to acquire a new house at the currently inflated prices, but it has even broader economic implications. Employment in the construction industry is down about 20 per cent from a year ago, and we all know that slack in the residential construction industry has a very real rippling effect on other sectors of the economy, including suppliers of household furnishings and building materials. Indeed, it should be obvious even to the government that housing is one area where we can consider expansionary programs without the threat of setting off new inflationary pressures.

There is plenty of slack in this industry now, and it could be taken up without adding to inflation. It should be taken up as one answer to our growing unemployment problem, and to meet the basic housing needs of the Canadian people. But as things now stand, lack of any government leadership to stimulate the Canadian housing industry is going to have an adverse effect on inflation in this country. I would remind the minister of that very forcibly because he is well aware, I am sure, that real estate experts are already telling us that without an immediate improvement in new housing construction we are in for a new round of housing price escalation before the end of this year. I am told that in some markets, at least, unless conditions improve housing prices will rise by at least 15 per cent within a year. That is hardly a pleasant prospect for a country in which housing prices are already far too high for many thousands of its citizens.

Housing prices will in fact have a double impact on inflation. Not only will the price of housing increase but more pressure will be put on wage and salary earners to demand even higher increases to meet escalating costs for this largest single item in the family budget. So there is a double impact on inflation. Surely, on these grounds alone, putting aside whether he even cares about the housing needs of the Canadian people, one might think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) would show more interest and more concern in dealing with this problem than he has to date.

The other major housing problem of the day is the sheer cost of it. Costs have continued to rise in most of the component areas of housing: land, servicing and construction. But unquestionably the major factor in pricing housing beyond the reach of so many Canadians is the high cost of mortgage financing. Indeed, no element in the present situation is more disturbing than the fact that mortgage interest rates, rather than falling are actually on the upswing again. After a drop to about 10¼ per cent they have risen to 11 per cent and beyond, and there are now predictions that rates may well go to 11½ per cent or 12 per cent before the end of the year.

The effect of such increases, of course, is to add significantly to the monthly carrying costs faced by a home purchaser to the point where many Canadians simply cannot entertain the possibility of buying a home even if they are prepared to devote 30 per cent or more of their income to shelter costs. That is the tragic situation which exists at this particular time.

In a very real sense, then, these rising mortgage rates mean that Canadians, in their housing budgets, are being asked to bear the financial brunt of the international balance of payments difficulties now facing the government. With the prospect of a current account deficit as high as $5 billion this year, the government is forced to maintain interest rates at a very high level in order to attract short-term flows of foreign capital. Whether that is the proper policy from a balance of payments point of view is one question, but there is no question that this high interest rate policy is a disaster as far as Canadian housing needs are concerned.

As I have already noted, high mortgage rates are preventing many Canadians from buying homes. One has only to talk to builders to know that mortgage rates are probably the single most important factor in deterring new residential construction in this country. Builders simply are reluctant to put new housing stock on the market as long as prospective buyers will have to face interest rates as high as 11 per cent or more; and, I might add, as long as we have a government in Ottawa in which the building industry, along with so many other Canadians, has no faith with regard to getting inflation under control.

Given the fundamental importance of housing to Canadians and to the Canadian economy, and given the magnitude of the problems now facing the country, it is certainly an understatement of the first order to describe this government's response to the housing crisis as inadequate. Indeed, with this government it is not even a case of recognizing the urgency of the problem, but of initiating the wrong response. As far as the housing crisis is concerned, this government simply has made no response.

We have discussed on many previous occasions the inadequacy of the CMHC capital budget. The year to year increase in it has been barely sufficient to offset the costs of inflation, yet the remainder of the federal spending program—we only have to look at it—continues to grow by leaps and bounds. So much for housing as a priority concern with this Minister of Finance and this government. We only have to look at the expenditures on housing compared with other sectors to know that it has a very low priority indeed.

In recent days we have seen yet another indication of the little importance which the government attaches to the whole question of housing. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) had invited the provincial housing ministers to Ottawa on Wednesday of this week to discuss further housing initiatives, in advance—one presumes—of a new budget. He even asked them to bring along revised spending forecasts for their provincial housing budgets. At the last minute, with no real explanation, the minister cancelled the meeting. Why? Was the Minister of State for Urban Affairs slapped down again by his colleague the Minister of Finance? Has housing been shunted to the back burner again, in terms of the priorities of this government? If that is the case, then perhaps we have reached the point where we are entitled to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whether it is not time he appointed a minister of urban affairs with a bit more influence on his colleagues.

Mr. Stanfield: With a little more respect for him.

Miss MacDonald: The minister might tell us, when he responds in this debate, whether he has rescheduled a date for the meeting with provincial cabinet ministers, as he undertook to do in the telegram to them of last Friday when he said:

—I expect to be in a better position to suggest an alternate date towards the end of next week—

That means this week, and today is the last business day of this week.

—appreciating both the value and the urgency of this discussion to all concerned.

● (1220)

To date he has not done that. One wonders about the value and urgency which he attaches to it. The only other explanation I can suggest is that the minister really does not care what the provinces think about housing. Perhaps he has succumbed completely to the viewpoint of his chief adviser, the "know it all" president of CMHC who, clearly, would like the provinces and, one assumes, the municipalities too, to go away and let him run the whole show. We already have seen evidence of that attitude in the capital budget, with 60 per cent of the over-all allocation reserved to two programs, AHOP and Limited Dividend, in which the federal government deals directly with the marketplace without any requirement to consult other levels of government. Where it can, the federal government completely ignores dealing with the provincial and municipal governments in a field as sensitive as housing.

If that is his new philosophy, then I say to the minister that he is on a dangerous course—indeed, a disastrous one in so far as the housing needs of the Canadian people are concerned. It is not an issue of constitutional supremacy; it is a sheer question of what will work to produce houses for Canadians. I have no hesitation in saying that even a man of Mr. Teron's self-confidence simply is not going to be able to run roughshod over the needs and wishes of our other two levels of government. It may feed his ego to try it, but it will be at the cost of housing for Canadians.

A new "we know best" strategy is not what we need at this point to get residential construction back on the rails in this country. What we do need is a major, concerted effort by all levels of government to deal with the two basic housing problems now facing our country. We need effective policies to stimulate housing supply, to get more units built and to get them built as quickly as possible, and we need better policies to ease the impact of a national high interest rate policy on the housing market.

In so far as housing supply is concerned, one area where the federal government can and should increase its support is in bringing more serviced land onto the market. A shortage of serviced land has been a chronic problem of the Canadian housing industry, particularly in the major urban areas. I realize that CMHC now has a municipal infrastructure program, but even the minister, I am sure, would be forced to admit that it does not begin to meet the need in this area. Indeed, I understand that the government of Ontario alone could use another $100 million this year to bring onto the market land which is ready for servicing and development if funding were available.

I would suggest, too, that the current Assisted Home Ownership Program, including the new elements about which the minister boasted so glowingly last fall, simply is not doing the job. Certainly, it is not producing anywhere near the flow of private funds into the mortgage market which the minister so confidently predicted it would earlier this year. I believe there are a number of reasons why it is not doing the job. I understand, for example, that without an adequate secondary mortgage market, and we come back again to the inexplicable delay by the government in getting its own vehicle into operation in this area, and there has been no explanation for this delay, after a year and a half, by either the minister in charge of housing or the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Stanfield: It is an insult to parliament.

Miss MacDonald: He is waiting for more defeated Liberal candidates. Without such a secondary mortgage market, some institutions simply will not accept the 35-year amortization which the minister and his officials insist on under the current AHOP program. But beyond that, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that a large part of the problem with AHOP is that it is stifled by bureaucratic red tape. The minister and his officials just cannot seem to resist the temptation to set as many rules and regulations as they can dream up, so we have artificial income limits established on top of unrealistic maximum house prices.

I am not suggesting that the program should not have any limits, but I am saying that a simple guideline in terms of the maximum amount of a mortgage to be supported by this kind of interest subsidy would have done the job in a way that would not discourage so many Canadians from even trying to participate in it.

A third kind of initiative the government could take, and one we have advocated for many months, is to allow at least some part of the cost of mortgage interest as a deductible expense for income tax purposes. Our party during the last campaign advocated that such costs above 8 per cent—which used to be an average mortgage rate until inflation broke loose under this government—be deductible up to a maximum of $1,000. A program like that would not be overly expensive but it would be extremely helpful to Canadians trying to carry the very high costs of home ownership in today's economy. It would have considerable symbolic value, too, Mr. Speaker, as an indication that the government and the Minister of Finance at least rate home ownership as important in individual investment terms as speculating on the stock market.

Mr. Speaker, there are areas where the government can take effective action to help meet the housing needs of the Canadian people. Programs can be undertaken in this area without adding new inflationary pressures to our economy but which will have significant benefits in terms of stimulating employment and economic recovery. What is missing from this government is the will to act and a degree of concern which gives housing a reasonable place in the government's scale of national priorities. The tragedy is that in many respects it is already too late to achieve the maximum potential impact for 1975. We are already too far into the building season to get as many new units up and completed as would have been the case if the government had responded weeks and even months ago as we on this side of the House urged them to do.

Today we learned that the budget has been delayed until June 23. In view of this delay, and in view of the fact that the peak of the construction season will be over by the end of June, I ask the minister if he is prepared to bring in immediately the contingency housing plan that was referred to earlier this month so that there will not be a further delay in the construction of much needed housing. But with this government, Mr. Speaker, one is forced to accept the fact that the best one can hope to achieve, really, is too little and too late. So I urge the minister to at least give the Canadian people that much, to at least take action now so that, in the words of our motion, the people of Canada again can have access—as they deserve to have access—to decent housing at prices they can afford.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Houses before swimming pools; that's what I say.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) began her speech by saying that we are facing a housing crisis. I think she is right. However, it is a sign of how deeply the public, and particularly the media, feel about this problem that in the press gallery at the moment there is only one journalist.

At the beginning of this year the minister announced that it was the government's intention to build in the neighbourhood of 210,000 housing units in 1975. At the end of March, no doubt to the consternation and disappointment of the minister, we were building houses at the annual rate of 144,000 units. There was some improvement in April, but we were only building at the rate of 180,000 new homes a year, which is a far cry from the 210,000 units the minister predicted would be built, and much lower than the number of houses we need. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands wants to see 250,000 new homes built. I think that figure is too low.

The minister prides himself on his proposals to encourage starts for rental housing. He is providing $200 million in subsidies. They can produce 10,000 units at the outside, a mere drop in the bucket. The response of developers, to say the least, has been unenthusiastic because grants are too low to support rental projects even with the federal subsidy. Many people are predicting 180,000 housing starts for this year, compared with 220,000 in 1974 and 268,000 in 1973.

The interest rate on NHA mortgages now is 11.25 per cent. The rate on conventional mortgages is somewhat higher, 11.5 per cent. Mr. Peter Carter, of the Royal Bank said at the end of April that interest rates were probably at their low point. Heavy demand for corporate and government financing both in Canada and in the United States will keep interest rates high. Not only are interest rates high; the supply of mortgage funds is tight. A recent survey by the Mortgage Insurance Company of Canada found the supply of money for NHA and conventional mortgages limited. Lenders are restricting loans to prime real estate and scrutinizing applicants carefully to make sure they can afford the high monthly payments.

I do not have time to discuss how large one's income should be if one is to qualify for a mortgage. The minister has done nothing to bring down interest rates. Actually, his AHOP program helps to keep rates up by subsidizing the monthly payments of borrowers. His new, private AHOP program stipulates that a family shall obtain a mortgage from a conventional lender. The mortgage will then be subsidized, but the catch is obtaining mortgage funds when they are in short supply.

The minister has misconceived what is happening in the housing field and what is needed. He has placed unwarranted faith in the housing industry, being under the illusion it can meet the housing needs of the people of Canada. The result is that we are not building enough houses for people who need them. Another result has been the rapid increase in house prices. The average price of a house sold through multiple listing increased by only 9.2 per cent in the first quarter of 1975. High interest rates and shortage of mortgages have had a dampening effect on house prices. Even so, the cost of the average house is still more than the average Canadian family can afford.

A comparison of house prices in the first quarter of 1975 compared with prices in the same period of 1974 is shocking. In Ontario, the average price of a house in 1974 was $46,000—odd. One year later the price had jumped to over $48,800. In British Columbia, the average house cost $37,600 in 1974, and $49,632 in the first quarter of 1975. In Alberta, the average price jumped from $35,013 in 1974 to $42,972 in 1975. In Manitoba, the average price jumped from $24,369 in 1974 to $31,097 in 1975. In Quebec, house prices jumped from $30,381 in 1974 to $32,095 in 1975. You can see what has happened while the minister has been fiddling with his plans. Not one of them amounts to more than a patch on the hull of a sinking ship.

The total emphasis of this minister—indeed, of all ministers who have been responsible for housing in the last 20 years—has been to increase the number of housing starts. But no one has asked about the quality of the housing we are building. So far as I know, neither the minister, the department nor Central Mortgage and Housing have investigated the quality of the housing we are building. For example, do we know how many young people, newly married couples, and poor people are getting houses, or how many rich people are buying houses? If the minister, the department or Central Mortgage and Housing have done such studies, I can only say they must be kept in a very deep freeze.

British Columbia has implemented rent controls, and Ontario is talking about them. Here we are, having built houses at record rates for 20 years, and we have to talk about rent controls. Why? I suggest the reason is that we have not built for people in the lower and middle income groups, for those who really need houses, but for those who are already well housed and want to improve their housing. We have encouraged the well-to-do to improve their standards and not done much for people in the low and middle income brackets. Central Mortgage and Housing have sponsored innumerable design competitions for individual, single-family detached houses. It has awarded innumerable prizes for good design. But how many prizes have been awarded for the design of multiple-family housing units, or housing units for mixed socio-economic groups? According to a reliable source, Central Mortgage and Housing has sponsored only one such competition. If I am wrong, I hope the minister will correct me and tell me where such studies can be found.

In an earlier speech I spoke about housing in Germany and Scandinavia. Last week I was in Israel. I know the minister has been there too. I was in the old city of Jerusalem where, as the minister knows, houses are built from stone locally available. One can see many amazing things in Israel. Possibly the most amazing thing I saw was a housing development in the heart of old Jerusalem, overlooking the Wailing Wall and the Blue Mosque. It was a tremendous project. It consisted of one storey, multiple-housing units. There were courtyards between and around the housing units to provide fresh air in that hot climate. I have not seen that in any city in this country. Israel lives under a constant threat of war. It devotes more than 50 per cent of its national budget to defence purposes, but it does things for housing which put a wealthy country like Canada to shame.

I want to raise one more question. This housing crisis will not last only for 1975. You cannot build good, sensible housing accommodation by following the stop, start and go policies which Canadian governments have followed for so many years with regard to housing. The number of houses built in Canada is not determined by the needs of the Canadian people but by what the government feels is the economic situation. That is how the decision is made as to how many houses will be built. We have all the physical materials needed to build houses, we have all the necessary manpower and some of the best builders in the world. I saw housing in Israel which, if it was not designed by Mr. Safdie who designed Habitat, was certainly designed by some of his students. We have all we need to build good houses. We do not build them because the decision as to how many houses will be built each year is made once a year for the coming year, not on the basis of need but on the basis of other facts. The most efficient industry in the world could not operate at maximum capacity under those circumstances.

What we need is long-range planning in the field of housing. We need a commitment from this government for three to five years ahead. As the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands said so eloquently, this government should sit down with the provinces and the municipalities and say, "This is what we can afford for 1975, 1976, 1977, 1978, and so on. How much land will we need? How much servicing will be required? How much money will be needed? What kind of housing should we build? How much of that housing should be devoted to middle income people and how much should be devoted to low income people?"

That is the kind of planning which needs to be done. I am not talking about a utopian situation or some socialist never-never land. That is the kind of planning being done in not just the Scandinavian countries but in every country in western Europe. It is being done in Germany, which has a social democratic government. It is also being done in Belgium, Holland and France which has not had a socialist government since a few years after World War II. As I said, that is the kind of planning being done in Israel. However, such planning is not being done on the North American continent, neither in the United States nor Canada.

There is much to be admired in the United States, such as their energy, drive and technical know-how. However, if there is one place we should not take a lesson from, and one place we should not use as an example on how to meet our housing needs, it is the United States. Their free enterprise has not only gone wild; it has gone mad. No country with such resources has done as poor a job in the field of housing as the United States.

We ought to be putting our planners, architects, engineers and builders to work now on plans for the future. They should not just be planning the building of 200,000, 225,000, 250,000 or even the unimaginable 300,000 units a year, because if those housing units are built for people with adequate housing we will not only have failed but will have perverted the whole purpose of a housing policy for Canada.

I will conclude as I have on several other occasions. We are apparently going to have a summer break. During the summer months, I ask the minister to give serious consideration to rethinking what we have been doing. He should visit some of the countries I have mentioned to see what is being done there. If he will go to those countries with an open mind and look at what they have done, I am sure he will scrap a great deal, if not all, of what he and his predecessors have been doing. He will bring forward programs which will at least begin to meet the needs of people in every city of this country. There are still people in this country living on incomes of $3,000, $4,000, $5,000, $6,000 a year. They cannot afford to buy or to rent adequate accommodation even if they avail themselves of every one of the programs the minister has proposed up until today. I hope the minister will think seriously about these problems and that when we return this fall we will see a real change in the government's direction and policy with regard to housing.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the House deals today with a very serious matter, namely housing for Canadian people. The supplies of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson), as well as the implementation of all housing acts the minister is responsible for, deserve objective examination by members of parliament.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe that partisan considerations with respect to the representation of constituencies in Parliament interfere with the implementation of those housing acts. However, when I consider how slowly some agreements were reached with provinces, especially between the province of Quebec and the federal government, I am satisfied that there have been squabbles, not economic ones, but political squabbles which have been prejudicial to the interests of municipalities in our provinces, and especially in Quebec, and also to the interests of taxpayers who expected to benefit from certain national acts passed by Parliament to benefit not only taxpayers living in some municipality or other but also municipalities themselves.

Mr. Speaker, it is very well to consider the passing of excellent housing legislation by the Parliament of Canada, but we should also get the means of implementing those acts so that they can fully benefit municipalities and taxpayers.

May I draw the attention of the minister to a matter of particular concern in Quebec and especially in the constituency I represent, namely Bellechasse, the matter of implementation of the housing act and the Neighbourhood Improvement Program.

Mr. Speaker, I remember taking a very active part in the discussions on Bill C-133 and cooperating, I believe, most sincerely with the minister to have that bill passed so that it would benefit Canadian families and also that municipalities with insufficient incomes to implement a Neighbourhood Improvement Program would benefit from a legislation which in my opinion is, and was at the time, extremely positive, so that all families in a municipality or a neighbourhood enjoy equal opportunities and services as compared to the residents of another municipality or another neighbourhood. In September 1974, the present minister of State for Urban Affairs succeeded in signing with the Quebec authorities an agreement clearly stipulating that such and such municipality may take advantage of the provisions of Bill C-133, and this agreement refers to the municipalities of Montreal, Quebec, Saint-Hubert, Laprairie, Donacona, Farnham, Saint-Georges, Saint-Hyacinthe, Saint-Jean, Solomon, Montreal a second time, as far as Carmel Park is concerned, Quebec City, with regard to a second pocket in Saint-Sauveur, Montreal North, Lachute, Jonquière and Longueuil. But I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, at not finding the name of Montmagny on that list.

And it was precisely in order to enable the town of Montmagny to develop a neighbourhood called "quartier sud" that I worked especially in order to provide the residents of that district with the public utilities they need and which exist in other neighbourhoods.

The agreement provided also—and I agree—that the neighbourhood should be first designated and then approved by the province at the request of the municipality. This means that any municipality can apply to the Quebec Housing Corporation or to the Minister of Municipal Affairs. If the government of that province recognizes that the district designated by the municipality falls within Bill C-133 with regard to the neighbourhood improvement program, it is only then that the federal government can step in through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and grant subsidies directly to the municipality and to the taxpayers living in the designated neighbourhood.

I hope that during this discussion, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs will be able to tell us what procedure must be followed by the municipalities that wish to benefit from this legislation.

Last week, the mayor of Montmagny was here in Ottawa. He met with the officials of various departments and was well received. The problems he submitted to the various departments were fully looked into. However, he was given information he did not have on the procedure to be followed by municipalities, whether rural or urban, in order to benefit from this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

The Acting Speaker: Order please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): Where are the official opposition members?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I just heard a government member ask: Where are opposition members.

Mr. Boulanger: Members of the official opposition!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Yes, he specifies the official opposition! Well, Mr. Speaker, it is understandable that people are late on a Friday when the heat is stifling and the humidity high and there is not air conditioning everywhere as in the House. I think that despite . . .

An hon. Member: We should perhaps have a swimming pool built in the House.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Someone says that it might be necessary to build a swimming pool inside Parliament. It think it would be somewhat audacious. We might start by using the pool of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), because it is very big. There would be room for several members at a time.

An hon. Member: He will certainly invite us.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): This being said, Mr. Speaker, I should like to return very seriously to the subject we were dealing with earlier this morning, but more specifically with the ratepayers within a number of municipalities and also with the municipalities which are responsible for their own housing.

Well, I have before me a well-prepared document, dated in April of this year, which may prove very useful to municipal administrators who want to avail themselves of some benefits available from federal sources, but in conjunction with the provinces. Although this is a very well-prepared document, it would be necessary—

An hon. Member: Who prepared it?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I have just been asked who prepared it. I do not know.

An hon. Member: Civil servants.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Our employees are certainly very well paid anyway, so they ought to be able to do a good job once in a while.

So, when it is well done, we are happy to say so, Mr. Speaker, and I want to add this: that document should be made available to all municipal administrators. As far as I am concerned, I have tried to get a number of copies to allow municipal administrators to have a look at it and submit in due course requests regarding those acts.

Here is what we can read on page 20 of the program:

An hon. Member: Which page?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Page 20.

An hon. Member: We haven't got it!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): You haven't got it? That is very regrettable, you are behind the times, because you are supposed to have it in the House today when the estimates of the Department of Urban Affairs are discussed.

The federal government, through the Neighbourhood Improvement Program of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, helps municipalities and local residents to keep up and improve the essential urban neighbourhoods threatened with decay and destruction.

Such dilapidated districts can be found in various areas across Canada where services are lacking and should be improved. It is to improve this situation that Parliament voted this legislation.

Districts for which assistance is intended must be mostly residential . . .

It is one of the major conditions.

. . . and not occupied primarily . . .

An hon. Member: That is all well and good.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): You make your speech later on and we will listen to you.

Some hon. Members: Order!

MR. LAMBERT (BELLECHASSE): . . . by low income people . . .

An hon. Member: You read well.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): You, sir, the member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme)—

. . . in these places

An hon. Member: You are out of order. One must say "the hon. member for Saint-Denis".

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): The hon. member for Saint-Denis likes to be respected. I hope he will respect others by setting the example.

In those cases, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will finance half the cost of certain types of improvements, and one-fourth of the others. Subsidies are provided for helping to select the neighbourhoods, draw up plans, purchase the land intended for housing, social and recreation facilities, improve municipal facilities and other types of improvements. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will also loan the municipality up to 75 per cent of its share of the cost of the project.

The Neighbourhood Improvement Program is subject to a federal-provincial agreement whereby municipalities are chosen in those provinces which are eligible for assistance. The municipality suggests the neighbourhoods it would like improved. In every case, the local residents must participate in the planning and execution of the project.

Mr. Speaker, this introduction to the document I have just quoted partly is excellent provided the criteria, the standards required are applied uniformly across Canada and, as far as I am concerned, across Quebec.

We should not proceed in such a way that we give the impression there is discrimination, that some advantages are given to a municipality and refused to another.

I would like to ask the minister to look closely at the applications made to him, at the areas which are accepted by the province, in particular by the province of Quebec, so that other municipalities can have the same advantages by requiring the same conditions and the same criteria. At present, and I hope it is a wrong impression, we can see why one municipality has not been accepted, while another has been, and those are two similar municipalities. Now, I understand one can find differences in studying the records, and those differences must be known to the public, so as not to give way to erroneous judgments which could lead one to think there is patronage in any given place. Such situations must absolutely be avoided.

Now, there is another aspect of the housing problem which is contained in an act, and is still implemented in cooperation with the provinces. I agree that we should try to reach an agreement for the solution of family and low income people housing problem.

Quite recently, more exactly on April 28, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs issued a list of localities which will be eligible for benefits under that federal-provincial agreement to build 38 projects, 1,435 low-income housing units in the province of Quebec, in cooperation with the Quebec Housing Corporation.

Mr. Speaker, I would like once again to request that more information be given to the public on that subject. The matter is more delicate in Quebec than in other provinces, because people are more "touchy" there, given the particular situation, and a certain feeling, I would not say of independence, but of separation, because for my part I make between independence and separation a clear distinction, which I consider necessary. Everybody seeks independence, seeks the power to be self-sufficient, to decide for him or herself. The same holds true for associations, for municipalities and for provinces, and it should be true also for our country Canada: we must be able to decide for ourselves. The best way to make a final choice, is to have the financial means to decide and carry out the decisions made.

As I consider the lengthy list of municipalities that were accepted, I note that an amount of $30 million was involved. But there are also municipalities in my constituency where the minister has proven generous and I am grateful to him.

An hon. Member: There was no patronage.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Yes, I am convinced there was no patronage. One thing is sure, had there been any such patronage, I would have had the courage to say so. But I am a person who readily admits matters that are carried out objectively, and I am pleased to say so.

I would simply wish to point out to the minister that something is really unacceptable to the population as a whole, because these loans were granted at an interest of 10⅜ per cent over a 50-year period. Mr. Speaker, I should like to suggest to the minister that all possible efforts be made so as to permit such grants to be made to these organizations, be they at the municipal or cooperative level, but that such loans be granted at a lower interest rate because if it is calculated quite objectively and with impartiality, we will see that on a 50-year period $400,000 and $500,000 loans at 10⅜ per cent will compel these corporations, these organizations to pay $1,500,000 in interest, thus trebling the construction cost, not taking into account maintenance, requisites, normal expenses to be made to keep such houses in good condition. Then no wonder, Mr. Speaker, that with such excessive rates of interest, low income people are in a difficult position even though they might receive two old age pensions. Directors cannot perform miracles. They have to ask more so as to be able to give as much as they are asked. I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are standing and that you want to interrupt me. I thank you. I still would have a lot to say but I want to give other members the opportunity to talk.

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to respond in the debate on the motion introduced by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) which directs itself to the provision of decent housing for Canadians at prices they can afford. So our objectives remain precisely the same and our programs support those objectives. Indeed, the total thrust of the housing program of the government is to provide decent housing at a price Canadians can afford.

We have come through a cycle when there was a lot of housing, when housing starts were at record levels but at prices people could not afford. They assumed the obligations in an inflationary period, but at last, my goodness, people have said that they have been paying too much and will not pay any more. They say that when interest rates rise too much, they will not pay those rates. The government has responded to that very positive reaction of people, which is essential if we are to deal with the inflationary spiral and the continuing escalation of need that we have been getting away with for so long.

The suggestion that the government is neither concerned nor aware is not dealing with the facts. As hon. members know, housing is a high priority with this government. The new legislation that was capable of bringing $1 billion of private sector money into the mortgage market was held up day after day and week after week by opposition members in the committee.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Danson: I pleaded with the members of the committee to deal with the subject, not to get away from it and not to duck out from under it. I said I would sit 24 hours a day, seven days a week, all weekend if necessary, to deal with this legislation. That has been a cause of the delay which is unfortunate indeed, because in the meantime there has been a change in the money market which, as my hon. friend knows, has affected the flow of money into the mortgage market. But, again, our programs are directed at bringing those funds out, supplying more funds and subsidizing those rates so that Canadians can afford houses that are needed for people in the moderate and low-income groups especially, because they must have priority.

The fact that these programs are working so well seems to annoy some members of the opposition. I was quite surprised to receive some recent figures which indicate how well these programs are being received by the building industry and the lending institutions. The insured lendings in April were encouraging construction at a rate of over 4,000 units. If you translate this into an annual rate, it indicates an annual rate of some 60,000 units. In the same jargon, last year it was only 25,000 units. That does not really translate itself into the direct start figures we are talking about, but it does indicate that people in the industry recognize the value of NHA programs under CMHC and are not only prepared, but anxious to become qualified and to become insured under NHA legislation.

The remarkable success of AHOP, I know, is something which really gets under the skin of the opposition.

An hon. Member: There is too much red tape.

Mr. Danson: As of May 15, under the Assisted Home Ownership Program we committed $216 million for low-cost loans to families to enable them to buy their own homes. Another $84 million was being processed at that time, as of May 15. This means that we are very close to having committed our entire AHOP budget of $350 million. If that suggests red tape, I really do not know what we could have loaned out if there was not red tape.

The suggestion is that there are unrealistic regulations on income, on standards and on housing prices; unrealistic in the sense that the building industry said before that it could not build houses at these prices. They referred to the average, as did the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), given by the real estate board in respect of the cost of houses. We are building for the average. A lot of builders were stuck with those so-called average prices. They said they could not build at those lower prices for the low income groups. What happened? Last year, when the program was started by my predecessor with $300 million and a further $150 million, or a total of $450 million, they found they could build for those income ranges, at those price ranges, although previously they never thought they could. The success this year is showing how great the reception is in that area.

● (1420)

Consider our accelerated rental program or the limited dividend program. I know that perhaps they are awkward for the rich developers in Alberta who want to build luxury housing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Don't play games with a serious subject.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Mr. Danson: Our priority is the workingman, the average income man.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: We offered $200 million at 8 per cent interest to builders who would create modest rental accommodation in agreement with CMHC, but people said, "No, that implies rent control; we don't want to go into those rental agreements". When we offered $200 million there was enough response for us to offer a further $200 million. There are proposals which are presently under review and which meet good standards of housing at rents people can afford.

In addition, private lenders are being urged into that area. Programs are set up under which 25 per cent of the units are to be made available to municipalities and provinces for low-income housing for people who even at those subsidized rates do not have sufficient income to pay for their shelter. In the past we have dealt with this under our public housing programs. They have been good programs. I admit that we made some mistakes, and we have learned from those mistakes. Less than a year ago when I first took on this portfolio, I was making speeches to municipalities and telling them, "You are showing the wrong attitude. You do not want public housing projects in your municipalities". I still question their motives in that respect and I think their concerns were rather narrow. Also, it was a reaction to programs from which we were learning and which were not the best, such as huge public housing projects in municipalities.

What we are attempting to do now is integrate people into the mainstream of society so that they are not isolated in public housing projects where social tensions and social stigmas exist, especially for children who grow up with a broader view of life when they can see their part in the total society and are not segmented in a welfare group.

I suggest we have made excellent progress. In our other programs for non-profit, co-operative housing we have committed another $28 million. All the housing funds under the direct control of CMHC will be committed before September of this year. We do not want to parcel it off bit by bit, but, rather, get it out there quickly. That is what we have been doing; we have been speeding up our rate of commitments month by month. I ask the provinces to get the money and spend it on building housing for people who need them and cannot afford them. Until April 10 we were committing funds at an average of $4 million a day. In the next month the rate increased to more than $6.5 million a day, and it is now at the rate of almost $10 million a day.

If that suggests slowness, lack of priorities or red tape, then something is wrong somewhere. To me it suggests a government that is concerned and a corporation that is doing its job under a president who knows more about building housing and developments in this country than anybody else; a man to whom we should be grateful because he has given up a career to come into the public service and serve his country; a man who cannot stand here in parliament to defend himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: He is a man of great dedication and talent who is known to us all and of whom we are all proud.

Mr. Paproski: But he does not build houses for single families.

Mr. Danson: We are building relatively many more than just about any other country. The hon. member for Winnipeg North suggested I should go to Europe to see what they are doing there. I have been to Europe, and I am impressed. What they have done is great. But they look at us with envy. They look at the quality of our housing and our communities, and when they compare them with theirs they envy us indeed. I think we have a great deal to learn from some of their systems of land assembly and some of their systems for decentralizing population, but I am convinced more than ever that Canada takes second place to none in the quality and quantity of its housing. I do not take much pride in the fact that there are still pockets of terribly bad housing and poverty. This we cannot tolerate and I know the government is doing all in its power to overcome it.

So far as housing for senior citizens is concerned, we have built more housing for senior citizens in the life of this government than in all of our history. This indicates a priority and a commitment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: The matter of land assembly and sewage treatment was mentioned. It is a good point. We have committed $1 million a year to this program. Incidentally, we have yet to turn down a single application for sewage treatment plants in all of Canada. I hope this record can continue. I suggest that those provinces which buy up tracts of land without any wish to develop them in the foreseeable future, and then cry because they do not have money to service the land on which they will not build houses anyway, had better get their priorities straightened out. They should assemble sufficient land to be able to service it and bring it into the stream. The same provinces at a time such as this seem to have the money for doing those politically attractive things that governments are inclined to do in an election period. I do not think they should be spending that money in other ways and wanting us to tax people, giving them the money which they will spend perhaps just as loosely.

In that respect, some $300 million were allotted for provincially-initiated programs in 1975, including public housing, but less than $38 million of that has been taken up. What I am saying is that almost half the year has gone, yet they have used up less than 30 per cent of their allocation. This is not quite that simple. There are reasons for it. I agree with the hon. member who suggested that there is a need for forward planning. We are doing forward planning, and so is CMHC. Also, we are engaging in more liaison with the provinces, in more conversations—not confrontations, not great big shows before television cameras, but the type of consultations that we have on a regular basis with the provinces and conversations that I have with housing ministers.

We were trying to get together on Monday, as the hon. member suggested, because we could not meet on May 21 for reasons which one may speculate about; but it was not totally convenient for everyone, anyway. I will be in touch with the hon. member in the first days of the week, although my staff was in touch with his office to try to evolve a date satisfactory to all of us. In the meantime, I saw the minister of housing for Newfoundland this week and I will see the minister of housing for Alberta on Monday. Within a week or so I will be seeing the housing ministers of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia. So there is a constant contact. This is the sort of thing that is important. I am referring to one-to-one discussion so as to really understand the problems and try to set down our priorities so that we can do the type of forward planning which the hon. member for Winnipeg North suggested is essential, with which I agree.

It is not easy under our budgetary system, but surely we must be able to plan sufficiently far in advance so that within certain parameters we can develop the same sort of priorities. I do not want to talk to those who will simply say, "Give us some money and we will do what we think is best". If they think that is best, they should have the courage to tax for it. They should also have the courage and honesty to admit that the programs we have in place are working.

As a result of these consultations, we took some $70 million from other funds to turn over to the provinces, funds from programs such as AHOP and the accelerated rental program. We are waiting for that money to be used. I telephone and plead with those ministers to use the funds in constructive programs. At the same time, we are running out of funds for AHOP and limited dividend housing. Here we made a mistake. We succumbed to those provincial housing ministers. For our future discussions, I think they recognize this. They admire the success of these programs and I think they will co-operate even further because we have learned much. Some of them are doing the job now and are working extremely well with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and I. We are in close consultation. He is certainly aware of the problem. He gives it very high priority and understands its importance, not only socially but also in the economy. He understands the urgency of the situation. So that our contact is close and warm and I am sure we will see results which will even warm the cockles of the hearts of the opposition.

Miss MacDonald: We will pray for you.

Mr. Danson: The hon. member for Winnipeg North spoke about interest rates. They are certainly disturbing to us also. That is the reason so much of our funding is going into the subsidization of rates for low-income families. I am not a great believer of subsidies in themselves, but it is best to be honest and to say what they are, and not give them some other name. They are taxpayers' dollars and they are being used constructively. The hon. member for Winnipeg North suggests that we are maintaining an artificially high rate and that under the AHOP program we are giving the money to the lender. The money goes to the purchaser of the home directly, in monthly payments. We try to maintain our loan rates close to the market, but at the low end because that is the only realistic way to look at it. It is no more an international commodity than capital and it flows in spite of borders. The world interest rate affects our interest rates.

There are, of course, many other factors. It is not a simple subject to debate, but we have put limits on the rates at which we will insure, because we are saying that above those rates people cannot take advantage of many of these programs and they will not receive the benefit of insured loans or insurance under the National Housing Act from CMHC if they are charged rates above what we think are fair market rates under existing conditions. Sometimes this changes rather frequently. Sometimes it changes by region, and with decentralization of CMHC regional managers of each province have considerable discretion to use judgment, which they use wisely, in determining the situation in their local markets.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North suggested that someone other than the private builder is going to build the houses. I am sure he spoke of this in regard to other countries. I have visited many other countries where the governments build houses. I do not think that is what Canadians want. I think there are better ways of doing it. We set the parameters; we set high standards; we do good planning. We have a long way to go on all those things, but we are doing much better than many other countries. They have to deliver according to those standards, at those price levels, and those income groups are the ones who have to do it. I fear the day when the government gets into building houses in this country. Because I fear it, I give tremendous emphasis to the area of third sector housing, the type of housing under our non-profit and co-operative housing programs. This is not government, it is not private sector developers, but it is people in groups or it can be other levels of government.

We are very much encouraged not only by the municipalities establishing non-profit housing units but also church groups, service groups and trade union groups who together have done an excellent job in establishing non-profit or co-operative corporations which we subsidize 100 per cent—or at least we lend at 100 per cent at low rates of interest.

Mr. Stanfield: At least you are honest.

Mr. Danson: I caught myself being dishonest. It was only a slip of the tongue, but I am associated with people who tell the truth, so I corrected myself very quickly. It is 100 per cent lending, 10 per cent forgiveness and up to $10,000 in start-up grants to help them get their corporations organized. In addition to that, we will give assistance and guidance, and in areas of very high land cost where the 10 per cent may not be enough to really help them, the federal government through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will purchase the land and lease it back to them at a nominal rent so that the rents will be at a level people can afford.

Through my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), the Department of Veterans Affairs is granted a further 10 per cent forgiveness in that sense to encourage veterans' groups. I think this is a very special thing. I do not know of any other nation in the world which has taken veterans through another generation where instead of the needs of the young, vigorous veteran with his war bride charging home from the battles and out the frontiers to raise crops and babies, they are all a little tired now and their needs are changing. This is directed more to the needs of veterans today, and I think Legion branches and other veterans' groups across the country have extremely good programs of which to take advantage and under which to build housing designed for the needs of veterans today. This is in addition to assistance under AHOP.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North also expressed his concern about quality as opposed to quantity. I do not know that we oppose either. They are just separate elements in the whole housing equation. I share his interest and concern. This is, of course, the reason for our neighbourhood improvement program, for our residential rehabilitation program, and also for a great deal of study which is going into this whole area not only in third sector housing but in community development, new communities and inner-core development which is so terribly important in the hon. member's home city of Winnipeg and where we are working on a trilevel basis in an attempt to improve these elements. But there is still a great deal more we have to know. Statistics Canada is now engaged in a very comprehensive housing survey for CMHC, information from which will be coming on stream very soon and it will tell us much about the present housing needs, housing standards and future housing needs of Canadians.

Further to that, we have our demonstration and development programs which are designed to deal with settlement patterns in small communities, as I mentioned, in the inner city and in satellite communities. It is involved in technological innovation, the autonomous servicing of units, the recycling of waste, sewage and garbage—

Mr. Stanfield: Meat?

Mr. Danson: —in construction techniques and productivity, alternatives to housing, mixed uses of housing, new forms of housing and greater flexibility of planning and designing.

An hon. Member: And swimming pools?

Mr. Danson: With regard to design, my hon. friend referred to the competitions sponsored by CMHC in housing design. I do not have the precise answer at my finger tips relating to those which deal with low-income and multi-family housing, but the point is not only well made but is one which the corporation and I have been discussing. We saw excellent designs which won awards, but not enough directed at the area of housing into which we are putting our greatest concentration. The corporation recognizes that because it is involved in demonstration projects taking place right here in Ottawa to develop new standards, better quality housing and low cost housing.

One thing I did see on the trip to Europe was a kind of special allocation for families buying housing which was quite adequate. It was not up to our standards, but it was a standard I think most young families would be happy with if they could afford it. I think it is important to aim for something quite livable and affordable so that people can get a start in the housing market, whether it is ownership or rental. From there, I think we must consider what has been done in some of the countries to which my hon. friend referred, which I visited with officials of the corporation and the ministry, and develop their ideas also so that they meet our particular standards.

● (1440)

In some cases they had the right amount of space, but were built for different climatic conditions. In other cases they settled for density and a height that we would not find acceptable. In other countries there was housing which I think would be totally unacceptable to Canadians even though the planning aspects were good and the housing might have been a big improvement over what the people of those countries enjoy today. I do not think we should try to emulate that in this country, however. Nevertheless, there was that concern. We are addressing ourselves to the problem, and shall continue to do so. As the hon. member suggested, I would not mind spending the summer visiting those other countries to see their programs. I will see what my priorities are.

Mr. Stanfield: He asked you to spend the summer thinking about it.

Mr. Danson: The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) suggests I spend the summer thinking. That is not a bad idea. One of the most frustrating parts of this business is wondering if one's ideas get to the public. They might be looking around this House today at the empty seats, wondering where the members are. At least we know that these men and women are working, that they are out in the country and at committees. We do not have a chance to refresh ourselves and see the work we are doing, in perspective. Sometimes we react too much to the urgent, rather than the important, so any opportunity to get away and look at things in perspective is valuable. I accept that and I will try to do it this summer. As it happens, I think best in my boat with a fishing rod in my hand, rather than travelling around the country. If I can get a few days of that, I will come back refreshed and vigorous to do the other work.

The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) raised a number of interesting points. I never cease to be amazed at his knowledge and interest in regard to housing. Indeed, sometimes it puts me to shame. I am not sure of the precise circumstances regarding the Neighbourhood Improvement Program for Montmagny, but I shall look into it. He also spoke about the problem of identifying these programs and getting sufficient information on them. He suggests that in Quebec things are of a different nature than in other parts of the country.

I think it is important in all parts of the country that these programs are recognized and the people know what the federal government is doing. This applies as much in western Canada where they are not blessed with as many Liberals as Quebec. It is not a matter of partisan politics in Quebec but it is a matter of something that everyone in this House is concerned about. We are concerned about the unity of this country, not only in constitutional terms but—I hate to use the word "spiritual" terms, but we are concerned that there is an understanding that the federal system is working.

It is certain that the work we do here is extremely important. Although we may argue about programs and the way they are implemented, I think we are all committed to all parts of this country. It is important that Canadians know and understand where their tax dollars are being spent, by whom and in what manner. As far as I am concerned, it is fundamental in this area of federal-provincial relations.

As I said before, I do not think we should be called members of parliament. We should be called trustees. We are elected, we collect taxes, spend the money and go back to the people at election time to give an account of the trusteeship. It is very easy for other levels of government to say they do not want to be bothered with the taxing job but just with spending the funds. I realize there are areas of co-operation, but it is not as simple as the problems of getting together and saying, "You do the taxing and we will do the spending". The parliamentary system as we know it would fail. As the hon. member for Bellechasse said, it is important that these programs be clearly articulated so that not only members of parliament know about them but that constituents also know. I commend the hon. member for Bellechasse for his concern. I am going to go into this rather thoroughly to make sure the information program is enhanced and that the corporation is enthusiastic about it as well.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I should like to ask one short question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This can only be done with unanimous consent because the time of the minister has expired. Is there consent to allow a question by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister could tell us whether the meeting between himself and the provincial housing ministers which was not held on May 21 has been rescheduled? If not, is it his intention that it will be held before the budget?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I hope so, but I do not decide this unilaterally; I discuss it with my colleagues. I shall be seeing most of the housing ministers separately. I want to speak to them personally within a period of a few hours to determine this. They might find, because of our meetings in the next few weeks, that we can resolve our problems. The provincial ministers now understand, as I am beginning to understand, that it is almost better to sit down one by one and deal with each province, than have all the other ministers sitting around the table listening to problems that are different from their own.

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, one of the agonizing chores of a member of the opposition is to watch the government mismanage the country. One that is equally agonizing and almost worse is to listen to the type of explanation we have had from the minister about what is happening to housing in this country. Does the minister not know that there is a real housing crisis in this country? He has the gall to stand here this afternoon, when the vacancy rate in Toronto is less than 1 per cent for apartments, and housing starts in the country for the first three months of the year are the lowest since 1946, and make the speech he made this afternoon. How can he do that? He made a catalogue of those programs, and still we have the most disgraceful housing problem that we have ever seen in this country.

I do not get upset easily, but I am truly upset this afternoon. It is as if the minister did not know what is happening in housing. We are in a terrible mess with economic problems, as everybody knows, but does the minister not also know that housing starts are down by 100,000 from what we thought they would be? Does he not know that people are leaving Toronto because rents are increasing so rapidly? Does he not know what is happening to people in the country because no housing is being built for them? The minister has the nerve to stand up this afternoon and recite this catalogue of programs when nothing is happening. Let us be empirical about it. He can talk about these programs as long as he wants, but nothing is happening. Housing starts are down.

Mr. Danson: Ten million dollars a year!

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I find that answer so distressing and so incredible. Does the minister not know what is happening to housing starts in this country? What is the good of talking about $10 million a year, or this or that or the other program? The programs are not working. Look at the evidence. The Houses are not there. Housing starts are not in evidence.

● (1450)

The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) said he hopes the minister goes to Europe. I understand the minister hopes to go fishing. I wish he would stay here and help us get some houses built in this country. We have a more serious problem in housing than we have had at any time since the early days of the Second World War. Yet here we are, postponing meetings, fooling around and wondering when the budget is going to come down, talking about AHOP, and this and that and the other program, when the entire premise on which the housing policy is based is wrong. That Canada, with all its land resources and all its building material resources, should face a situation in which the number of housing starts in the first three months of 1975 was smaller than at any time since 1946, is incomprehensible. There is something desperately wrong, and that is why the minister's approach, of giving a catalogue of programs, is totally unacceptable.

Clearly, the premise on which we are basing our housing policy is totally wrong. Housing in this country has traditionally been used by the government as an anti-cyclical instrument. When the business cycle declines, we build houses. Interest rates fall, demand goes up, and starts increase. When the business cycle is on the upswing, interest rates rise, demand falls and we do not build houses. However, now the traditional pattern of the business cycle is not present. Because of poor economic policies we are now in a situation in which there is increasing inflation and rising unemployment at the same time. We can no longer see the same pattern that was evident between 1945 and 1970. Inflation should be lessening because unemployment is rising, but that is not happening.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Gillies: The hon. member can make his own speech. It is time we looked at our housing policies and stopped pretending they are working. The fact is that poor operation of our economy has created an economic structure in this country in which we have high unemployment and high inflation at the same time. Consequently, housing programs in this country cannot be initiated on the same basis that was used 20 years ago. It will not work. So using outdated, ineffectual programs makes no sense.

An hon. Member: They are not ineffectual.

Mr. Gillies: They are totally ineffectual.

An hon. Member: Is $450 million totally ineffectual?

Mr. Gillies: It is all very well to talk about $450 million. The fact is, the government's programs do not build houses. Housing starts are off by 100,000 units.

An hon. Member: What's a few houses?

Mr. Gillies: The hon. member asks, "What's a few houses?" It is all right for members representing rural areas to say that. But how can you say that when you live in a city, when you represent urban people? Young people have always thought in Canada that they will have the opportunity to own their own home. Apparently that is not now the case. The point is, you cannot kid yourselves. The Quebec government kidded itself for a long time about its labour difficulties. You can kid yourself about a lot of things: the day of reckoning comes, and the day of reckoning in housing is here. All you have to do is look at the evidence. We shall never solve our housing difficulties with the sort of approach the minister demonstrated this afternoon. His approach is based on a view of the economy which is no longer valid.

I disagree entirely with the hon. member for Winnipeg North who said we need more government programs. The truth is that the more government programs there are, the fewer houses are built. We have so much government involvement in this area that the industry is not working effectively. As things now stand, there is little hope that conditions will improve.

What the minister said this afternoon disappointed me greatly. I thought this was a lovely Friday afternoon until I heard his speech. I came here thinking we would be finding some solutions to this problem, that we would find a way out. You cannot embark on the type of programs the minister talked about, in the general economic climate of this country. It cannot be done.

If you want housing to be built in this country, and I know this is a complicated and difficult problem, you must find some way to encourage the flow of mortgage funds into the market at rates people can afford, so that they can service the debt. People have to have houses. Canadians must be given the opportunity to buy homes of their own. They cannot do it at current prices and current mortgage rates, and you cannot bring prices down until you control inflation. You must find some way to bring mortgage rates down.

An hon. Member: What's your solution?

Mr. Gillies: I came here this afternoon to hear the answers to housing problems. But what do we find? Not only do we not hear the answers, but we note that the minister does not even recognize the problems; does not see that the premises underlying the economy have changed. Still he has the gall to ask the opposition, "What should we do"? For heaven's sake, I thought the government was elected to show leadership in this country. We are witnessing the biggest decline in housing starts in 20 years.

A few years ago the Economic Council of Canada said in its annual report that Canada needs 250,000 housing units per year in order to keep up with the family formation. This year we are going to build 165,000 units. This will be the worst year in recent history. The minister has a total obligation to the people of this country to reverse this situation. I suggest that he and his departmental officials should reconsider their approach to the field of housing.

We may need to institute a program under which a certain proportion of savings deposited in savings institutions is put into the mortgage market. I have never understood why the government did not establish long ago a central mortgage bank. We may need to establish building societies or savings and loan associations which will invest their moneys in mortgages. We may need to subsidize interest rates. One may not like such programs, but we may need them. We may need to reconsider our tax structure and provide some sort of exemption on moneys lent for mortgages in order to encourage more mortgage money into the mortgage market.

As the minister knows, people cannot compete for mortgage funds, not because they are not willing to pay the rates but because they cannot qualify for the loans. We must bring mortgage interest rates down. We cannot ask individual Canadians to compete for mortgages in times of inflation, when the policy of the government has been to keep interest rates high. You cannot expect people to compete in the housing market in those circumstances. They cannot. They cannot compete with General Motors for investment funds. The government must realize this and provide people with some sort of protection in the market, if it believes that houses should be built in this country. That is the only way it can be done.

The government must bring down the cost of home ownership. Why not provide tax relief on mortgage interest rates over 8 per cent?

● (1500)

Why have taxes? Why not be allowed to deduct your real property taxes in the calculation of your federal income tax in order to make home ownership easier? Why not be able to get these sorts of things going that will really go after the fundamental problem, namely, the cost of mortgage money?

The only way housing prices are going to fall is by increasing the supply. Somehow we have to get the supply higher than the demand. Prices will then start to drop. People will once again be able to afford housing.

I totally refuse to accept the proposition that in a country like Canada the average young family can never hope to have a home of their own. That is wrong. They ought to be able to buy a home of their own. They could in this country up until the past four or five years. If people were willing to save and borrow some money, they could get a home of their own. Today they cannot.

I have spoken before about the uncertainty that people are feeling at the present time. Why wouldn't they? The value system they have known is being destroyed. It was a fundamental principle in this country that if you wanted to work hard, you could get a house. Ask those in the urban communities today, those under 30 in the middle income group, if they have any hope of acquiring a house. They do not, and they know it. They are distressed about the situation. They should not have to be in such a predicament.

For the minister even to suggest that we have any sort of success in housing today is a total misunderstanding of what the Canadian people feel. It is a total misunderstanding of the facts. I just cannot understand how he could stand up and make a speech like he made this afternoon. The people of this country want more than that.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) asked when the minister is going to get the provincial ministers together. You have to do a great deal more than that. You will have to be in Ottawa within the next two or three weeks with the ministers from the various provinces and the leading lenders and builders in this country. You should all get together in a room and not come out until you have solved some of the problems. You cannot expect the Canadian people to put up with this sort of situation.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but he must remember that he is to address the Chair and not the minister.

Mr. Gillies: I apologize, Madam Speaker, but I am very exercised about this particular matter. I thought Your Honour was rising to say I was running out of time.

An hon. Member: Out of ideas.

Mr. Gillies: I am not running out of ideas. I have put forth the fundamental reason this afternoon why housing programs are failing. It is because they are predicated and planned to operate in an economic situation where you have a trade-off between inflation and employment, a trade-off which we do not have any more. For that reason the present approaches will not work.

I again suggest, as I did a few moments ago, that the minister should not be thinking of going to Europe or anywhere else. He should stay in Ottawa, have the provincial ministers here as well as the municipal leaders, and the lenders and builders to turn this situation around so that the people of Canada once again may have housing.

[Translation]

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Madam Speaker, first I would like to thank the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), even if she has left the House, for her motion this afternoon because she gives us the opportunity as Canadians to examine for a few hours one of the issues which, for the past few months, has been a concern not only of federal politicians, municipal officials and provincial politicians, but also of all the taxpayers, whatever their means and their interest is in housing.

Indeed, Madam Speaker, I was amazed to note the emphasis placed by the hon. members for Kingston and the Islands and Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) on new housing starts.

Like the hon. member for Don Valley, Madam Speaker, I live in an urban constituency where unfortunately the proportion of owners is very low. In fact, 90 per cent of the people in the federal constituency of Maisonneuve-Rosemont live in rented accommodations. Moreover, 10 per cent of the owners live outside this constituency so that the housing problem in this area is completely different from the described by the previous speakers. The average income of the residents, Madam Speaker, is around $7,000 to $8,000 a year. It is therefore very obvious that some Canadians, whatever the interest rates, whatever the grants given by the government for the purchase of a home, cannot consider owning their own home.

However, Madam Speaker, we must not think that every Canadian citizen wants to have his own home. When people want to live in the core of cities, when people want to live in a high-density urban centre, it is obvious that the land cannot be divided so that every citizen can have his own home.

This is why, Madam Speaker, I was rather amazed to note during the first part of this debate that the emphasis was placed essentially on the purchase of a new property instead of on the renovation and restoration of existing homes.

Like the hon. members who have preceded me, Madam Speaker, I have tried to determine what factors may have influenced that decrease in the number of housing starts. Of course, interest rates would seem to be one of the main reasons for the reluctance of builders to start new housing development programs. But one must also realize, Madam Speaker, that interest rates are not the only factor.

Indeed, we must not either reach the conclusion that construction investment funds have suddenly and completely disappeared. For instance, I noticed that in September of 1974, in metropolitan Montreal alone, over $5 billion were spent on construction. Of those $5 billion, only $138 million were invested in housing projects. Where did those other billions and millions go, if they were not invested in the construction of family dwellings? They went into the construction of office buildings, to the tune of $200 million, into the construction of hospitals, nursing homes, and shopping centres, to that of $300 million, and into the construction of major road construction projects, highways, plants and manufactures for still another $400 million.

We realize, Madam Speaker, that under present economic circumstances, investors and promoters have lost interest in housing and turned instead to concentrate their efforts in the field of commercial and institutional building. That is one factor the hon. members who spoke before me did not bring out.

To my mind, it is one of those factors which must be taken into account if we really want to see the construction industry as it really is because, Madam Speaker, housing is not an abstract idea. Housing is based on the construction industry which is a very lucrative industry; and it is profits the investors, the promoters are concerned with at this time. So I believe more attention should be given to that first factor.

● (1510)

The second factor I want to emphasize this afternoon is the advent of a new form of participation in urban life by tenants and owners. Formely, people used to buy a house and live isolated and individually in their family home. Nowadays it is entirely different. Owners as well as tenants associations have been established, and they make, and rightly so, claims and requests of all kinds which are often justified but which investors and promoters obviously view as one of the new factors to be considered when they decide to invest large amounts in housing. They face complaints and claims that they must meet, and a number of those promoters would rather invest in commercial or institutional building where those factors of participation by the people do not exist.

One must also consider another factor, Madam Speaker, and that is rent control. Formerly, investors could depend on free enterprise on the housing market. They did not have to concern themselves with complaints or with government interference in setting rents. Nowadays, an investor or a promoter who invests millions in projects must also consider that in a few years, in five or ten years, the municipal or provincial government may decide to freeze rents which would decrease his profits, whereas in other fields, as I said a while ago, in shopping centres for instance, there is no such fear.

Those are so many factors which cropped up again in the building industry and must be considered when the number of housing starts shows a decrease. It is utopian to believe that a mere increase or decrease in the rates of interest will immediately bring about the spectacular result of 100 housing starts. I do not think, Madam Speaker, that the situation can be cleared up when emphasis is put only on that one factor.

There is also another element, Madam Speaker, and I am surprised the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) who is an economist did not mention it—and that is productivity. The construction industry in certain areas of this country—and I am thinking of the province of Quebec in particular—has registered a considerable drop in productivity in the past year. Indeed, the latest reports released by the Quebec Minister of Industry and Commerce show that productivity in the construction industry dropped by 45 per cent.

You know of course, Madam Speaker, that this past week the Quebec National Assembly passed two special pieces of legislation—Bill 29 and Bill 30. The purpose of those two bills is to restore order in the construction industry. Madam Speaker, nobody in the province of Quebec is glad about construction unions being put under trusteeship. I think, Madam Speaker, that when a situation arises where a municipality, a union must be put under trusteeship, it is because the situation is serious enough. And such a step necessarily has the effect of limiting freedom. I think, Madam Speaker, there is not a member in this House who subscribes to a social system where the possibility must be considered that eventually all of our institutions would successively be placed under trusteeship.

I read in the New York Times last week that the city of New York was soon to go bankrupt and that eventually it would be placed under trusteeship by the U.S. Government.

I am not glad, Madam Speaker, that municipalities in this country should be placed under trusteeship. When a population can no longer face their representatives, when construction union members can no longer face their representatives, they are in the same situation as when the residents of a city are forced to ask their provincial government to put their municipal administration under trusteeship. Any trusteeship, Madam Speaker, amounts to a restriction of liberties, and I do not think that this government or opposition parties include massive trusteeship as a major item in their election programs.

Madam Speaker, I think the construction industry in Quebec in recent years went through an extremely difficult period. One only has to review various projects financed by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to see that every month one of those projects went bankrupt either because a contractor gave up his project or because after a few months of work certain elements in the construction showed considerable defects.

I need not mention here these projects: they are well known of most hon. members. But why can tenants and owners no longer trust developers and contractors? Why have we reached, all of a sudden a point where developers no longer want to get involved with the construction industry? It has become an explosive sector, where it is not possible to foresee any more how long it will be before projects and buildings are likely to fall apart, so that prospective buyers can no longer consider them a safe investment.

I feel that one of the key factors of the 100,000 housing starts which, as was clamoured a while ago, are dangerously lacking in this country would be the cleaning up of the building industry. I insisted on the reduced productivity of the building industry in Quebec. I am not deceiving myself, I am not implying that in Vancouver, Toronto, Halifax or St. John, the housing industry is experiencing high productivity rates. The construction industry in Canada is now in a disastrous situation. I believe our responsibility as a government must be shared both with provincial authorities and developers themselves. I am amazed that opposition members, on this opposition day, did not see fit to draw the government's attention to that factor.

I can assure the House that at least all Quebec members, when in these last weeks they met with representatives of the building industry, of CHMC and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson), were extremely concerned with the situation. They are concerned because the freedom of trade unions is one of the basic rights in this country, and personally I consider it much more important than the purchase of a house. Buying a house is buying physical materials. The freedom of trade unions is the climate in which the work is done. I think that housing starts are a priority, but first trade unions must be given back their freedom. As I said, I am amazed that hon. members opposite neglected to mention that fact.

It should be stated clearly over the next few hours, that productivity in the construction industry has declined, that some building trade unions are now under trusteeship, and that someone must be responsible for restoring stability in the building industry. It is not only a question of dollars, as the hon. member for Don Valley would have us believe. Housing starts are not automatic.

Housing starts are not vending machines where one only has to deposit 10 or 15 cents to get a chocolate bar or a cup of coffee. Housing starts occur in the context of a social climate within a society. And it is in such a context that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs met with the mayor of Montreal in March to review one of the most, and possibly the most important program in the urban areas of the country. This program is designed to preserve the present housing stock. It is all very well to start building new houses for families earning $7,000 to $8,000 per year. It's utopian to think that all Canadians will one day be able to purchase a house of their own. This is an aim supported by members of the government as well as of the opposition. But it is not the only one: our other aim in the field of housing must be in the social field, namely to preserve existing housing units.

When I stroll in Toronto, Vancouver or Montreal and see all those abandoned houses, I am surprised that it does not create a scandal. It is scandalous to think that all the money invested in infrastructure, sewers, water system, schools and hospitals in those areas are now used at less than 50 or 60 per cent capacity because half the district is progressively being abandoned and houses are empty.

A dynamic policy, Madam Speaker, is a policy aimed primarily at the conservation of the housing stock. And when the mayor of Montreal and the Minister of State for Urban affairs saw fit to increase to 50 per cent the cost of rehabilitating a housing unit, they had this purpose in mind, the social aspect of the housing policy that must be given priority at this time. When Canadians hesitate to reinvest in the housing industry, we must first protect those who are more subject to market fluctuations, who cannot reinvest, who have dependants live on a fixed income.

● (1520)

Madam Speaker, those are the aspects of the debate I would have expected to be discussed today by members of the opposition. I am not saying that others will not point them out when they take part in the debate later on; on the contrary, I hope they will do so. It is one of the essential factors, as I said a moment ago. But to have the country believe that suddenly 100,000 housing units can be started merely by lowering the interest rate is nothing but eyewash, because at least half the urban lands are already built up, and the concern we must show to preserve the social fabric of these cities is another factor, another objective that we must keep in mind.

[Mr. Joyal.]

I do not believe that generally speaking, Canadians all dream of living in the suburbs. We all know the inconveniences of suburbia as well as its advantages. As a government, we must give the people a choice. We must allow every Canadian to choose adequate housing within his means. That is the true objective. It is not only to have housing starts.

Madam Speaker, in the time remaining before we adjourn, we must raise more questions about those aspects of the operation of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Why, for instance, does the Corporation not have a program to compensate tenants and owners against bankruptcy and shady promoters? Why do we not have an insurance scheme that would force developers, builders, tenants, owners and the government to protect themselves against the bankruptcy of those building swindlers? That is a positive thought, Madam Speaker.

Why for instance should we not review within the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation our warranty procedure, the inquiries made when a developer applies for a loan? Why should we not review those procedures? That is where lies the real failure. It is not by thinking of reducing the interest rate that all of a sudden the building industry will stabilize itself, promoters will become honest and all Canadians will live in single-family suburban homes. We should not centre our attention on that single aspect. I think there are sufficient elements in this debate for our discussion this afternoon to bear fruit.

Madam Speaker, as I said before, I live in and represent a constituency in which 90 per cent of the citizens are tenants and 70 per cent live in houses build 50 or 60 years ago. What can I tell them when I go back there and meet them? "The government has a housing start program to help you buy $32,000 homes". Madam Speaker, that is not good enough. That is not what they expect of me. What they want me to tell them is that I can prove that there is a form of assistance available to maintain their housing and their urban environment and keep them from deteriorating. That is what they want. They do not want to think that eventually the situation will improve so easily that everybody can move to the suburbs.

When I visit the suburbs of Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver, I do not believe, Madam Speaker, that the aim of a social policy is basically to have everybody live in the suburbs. Opposition members suggested that the minister visit some European cities where new programs may have been implemented. Madam Speaker, one should visit the Paris or London suburbs to realize how little people wish to live in large urban centres where individualism, demythologization and loss of identity are the primary reasons or symptoms of those who move to those suburbs.

If we are to draw positive conclusions from this debate, I think those are the factors we should dwell upon. I do not think the housing situation has reached the point where it is a topic to be raised every second or third month. Instead, I would prefer that opposition members consider all the programs which come under the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs and analyze them. They are not perfect. I for one, Madam Speaker, could criticize at length any of those programs. One only has to look at them, to see how they actually work, and finally make suggestions to the minister. He is always available, always willing to meet with his colleagues and urge them to act. I was really shocked when I heard the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands say that the Prime Minister should pick a Minister of State for Urban Affairs with more influence on his colleagues. What a laugh, Madam Speaker! Since the Ministry of Urban Affairs was created, the present minister is probably one of those most aware of the social aspects I mentioned earlier. And this is true, regardless of the succeeding Liberal ministers who were Ministers of State for Urban Affairs. I do not wish to pass judgment on their administration. The factors I underlined a while ago were unknown generally at that time to both sides of the House. But now that the facts are laid down on the table, that they are being discussed, I suggest that it will take a man like the minister to assure Canadians that the social aspect of housing, the stability within the building industry, and union freedom within the building industry, are so many objectives of the government policy.

Madam Speaker, hon. members who will rise after me this afternoon will hopefully deal with these factors, and I am always at their as well as the minister's disposal to help improve these programs. Such is our function as parliamentarians. It consists really in reviewing those programs, Madam Speaker, and not only use them as smoke screens.

It is quite easy to set 265,000 housing units as a target, with the present total of 165,000, it means a total deficit of 100,000 housing units. One need not be a great economist to figure that out, Madam Speaker, as did the hon. member for Don Valley.

As for me, I am an economist, and it was not the main mathematical operation I effected to analyze the building industry. It is a complex industry, an industry that benefits or suffers from all the trends of the economy.

I am not any happier, Madam Speaker, when the policy of the government merely consists in regulating the economic machine by injecting more money into the building industry.

As I said previously, government reports have shown this to be true. The Dennis-Fisch report, Madam Speaker, clearly demonstrated that the government's objective must be 40,000 housing starts for people with low or moderate incomes. That is one of the objectives, Madam Speaker, and it cannot readily be achieved by mathematical operations.

I hope, Madam Speaker, that in the next minutes, other members will also be able to insist on such aspects and show the government where the failures really lie, where interventions are really needed, and not simply state in a general way that 100,000 more housing units are needed.

[English]

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Madam Speaker, rising to take part in this debate today I am reminded of the numerous warnings that my leader and other members of this party have given to the government over the last two years concerning the problem that is facing Canada in the housing field. Specific warnings were given to the government to the effect that if strong actions were not taken to stimulate activity in the housing field, there would be a serious decline in housing starts and a further increase in the already skyrocketing cost of accommodation, as well as a deepening of the crisis situation which we find ourselves involved in throughout the country today.

All of our warnings apparently were ignored, our suggestions were laughed at and shouted down, and the government continued on its way denying that any crisis existed, hiding its head in the proverbial sand with respect to the possibility of a decline in housing starts. On many occasions the minister said, "We care", and then said, "Look at what we are doing". This was characteristic of his address to the House this afternoon. He cited the various programs his department is engaged in—AHOP, RHOP and so on. But in spite of the minister's optimism and his pride in all the various programs that have been enunciated, housing starts are still declining.

I should like to refer to a news release from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation dated April 8, 1975, which reads, in part:

> Housing starts during March were at a seasonally-adjusted rate of 138,000 for all areas of Canada, according to preliminary figures. Actual starts during the month in urban areas were 6,165, a decline of 54 per cent from the 13,291 recorded for the same month a year ago. Urban starts in the first quarter of 1975 totalled 18,271, a decline of 49 per cent from the 35,826 in the first quarter of 1974.

I should like to make a few remarks about the housing situation, not from the viewpoint of the housing itself—though I realize that this is reaching a crisis point—but from the point of view of the impact that it has on the related industries in my own province of British Columbia.

● (1530)

At the outset let me say that the situation in the province is critical. Part of the reason is that British Columbia has the highest population growth in Canada. If you couple this with the drastic decline in housing starts over the last year you can see the impact this has on the residents of British Columbia. In 1974, for example, the population rose to 2.4 million people, a gain of 3.5 per cent over one year earlier. This represents more than twice the average increase for Canada as a whole. It was the highest percentage gain since 1967 and the largest absolute increase during the past decade. When we look at the situation from that point of view we can see just how seriously the economy of British Columbia and, on a wider sphere, the economy of Canada, are affected by the situation existing in the housing field today.

With the great influx of residents to British Columbia from all parts of Canada and the decline in housing starts I am sure it is evident to all what a tremendous pressure there is on the housing industry in respect of the current situation in British Columbia where we have a nil vacancy rate with an ever-increasing population demand.

As an indication of how important the forest, logging and lumber industries are to British Columbia let me put a few facts on the record. British Columbia contains less than 2 per cent of the country's forest area but, at the same, it supplies about 25 per cent of the wood cut in Canada. Forest industries accounted for approximately 20 per cent, or one-fifth of all Canadian exports in 1972. In the Canadian output in the logging sector about 47 per cent of the total production comes from British Columbia.

British Columbia accounts for most of the soft wood plywood made in Canada. Let me relate a few of these facts to the declining housing starts to show the impact the housing crisis has on this very important industry. I should like to refer to the B.C. Summary of Economic Activity 1974.

B.C.'s forest industry experienced a serious decline in the lumber component during 1974 after having enjoyed three successive years of expanding markets and good prices. Demand instability for wood products began in the first quarter of 1974 and price reductions became evident near the end of the second quarter. The reduced demand for lumber and plywood necessitated some cutbacks and lay-offs in the wood products sector during the last quarter. What was the reason given for the drastic decline in the lumber component in 1974? The major reason given is the decline in housing starts.

The summary goes on to say:

> It is anticipated that no significant improvement in market conditions can be expected until mid 1975 even if dramatic measures are taken immediately to get housing construction back on an upward trend.

I should like to draw attention to the serious and drastic situation that will develop in view of the fact that there is a continuing decline in housing starts in Canada. The quantity of lumber scaled in British Columbia declined in 1974 by 21 per cent from the previous year, again due to the weakened housing market.

I could go on to deal with the various aspects of the lumber industry in British Columbia, to point out in an additional manner the way in which the drastic housing situation is affecting this province, but because of the shortage of time and because other members wish to speak I will delete some of the issues and shorten some of the others I had intended to cover rather fully.

British Columbia is a province that has been able to manage its forest products to provide employment for its citizens through the extraction sector as well as the related manufacturing and processing sector. But this industry which, as I have tried to point out, is so vital to British Columbia is also very dependent on the residential construction industry in Canada. The past year has been an extremely difficult one because of the inept policies followed by the federal government.

I do not know how many times I have heard the minister and other members of the government state that Canadians are well housed. This has been said on a number of occasions. I believe it would take more than the flowery words of the minister in charge of housing, or of any of his supporters on the other side of the House, to convince us that that is the case, because wherever one travels in this country one finds serious housing situations that are developing and which have developed not only in one category but across the board.

I believe it is time the government paid attention to this matter, and instead of doing so much talking took some action, because no matter how many statements are made and how many programs are in effect this does not mean that the problem is being effectively tackled. There is a vast difference between intentions and actual performance. I am sure we have all heard the statement that the road to hell is paved with good intentions, and not only the road to hell but the road to some far more desirable objectives is paved with good intentions. I do not question the intentions of the minister or his desire to meet the needs in the housing field, but I do question, as do other members of our party, the actual performance of the minister in carrying to fruition the plan he has announced so many times in this House.

I see that time is rapidly passing by. I should like to point out some of the obstacles in the way of an adequate and effective program to achieve the goal of decent housing at reasonable cost for Canadians. I shall cover these rather quickly. I think we start with the fundamental problem of inflation.

Throughout the budget debates over the past several years the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) indicated time and time again that the major thrust of his budgets was to combat two problems, unemployment and inflation. But we find that the more often he emphasizes this the less progress is made in meeting the challenge and the need to solve the inflationary problem. I believe the government has reached the point at which it has just given up on this proposition.

Despite the fact that during the past few months the government has been carrying on consensus discussions it has not been able to record one single shred of evidence to indicate it is being successful in its consensus program in order to meet the problem of inflation. So I say I believe the government has given up. Perhaps that is one reason for the delay in bringing in the budget as has been announced. The reason given is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will be away. How much longer is Canada to be last on the list of priorities? So many times when there has been a debate in this House on a very important issue the Prime Minister has had to be away when he should have been in this House presenting propositions, meeting the challenges of the opposition, and answering questions.

Instead of being here the Prime Minister opts for something else. During the last several months, and over two or three years this pattern I have mentioned has been emerging. I believe it is time that the Prime Minister and other ministers got down to the business of administering their particular departments in a way that will not only give them direction but also indicate to the people of the country that they are actually doing something worthwhile for the benefit of the nation.

The second obstacle is the high and increasing interest rates. It is not necessary for me to go into this because it has been discussed quite fully in the debate thus far. I would point out, however, that in spite of the fact that there has been so much emphasis on interest rates continuing to rise, the government has taken absolutely no steps to ensure that people will be able to obtain mortgage money in order to build their own homes. There is no tax relief insofar as this is concerned.

Suggestions have been made concerning how the interest rate above a certain percentage should be tax deductible. But the government has consistently refused to accept the proposition. I believe that this is one area in which a real contribution could be made on behalf of those who are earnestly endeavouring to secure adequate housing.

● (1540)

There is no relief in the area of taxation. The minister laughed at the idea of bureaucratic red tape, but I suggest that bureaucratic red tape at various levels of government and in various agencies has discouraged both developers and individual prospective homeowners. There are restrictions upon restrictions, regulations are compounded until the procedures appear so complicated and are so time consuming that many say it is not worth it and give up in disgust and despair.

The cost and shortage of available land in British Columbia is making it impossible to construct housing. It is hard for citizens to secure adequate accommodation either through purchase or rent to house themselves and their families.

There are restrictions on federal programs. I want to read into the record a section from a letter I received. I spoke about the minister's statement that red tape does not cause any problem. Let me read from a letter which I received regarding an application that was made, in which it is stated that not only were these people discouraged from proceeding with that type of development, but subsequently they were denied approval by CMHC although the municipality was favourable and receptive to the overall development.

The minister can be overwhelmed by the exuberance of his verbosity, but that will not solve the problem nor will it meet this particular situation where the restrictions and the red tape surrounding the operations of CMHC and other programs are such that people are getting tired, and are giving up because of the confusion that is caused and the time that is consumed in trying to get programs through. I could go into all the details of some of the restrictions, but I will not because they have been described at other times.

The ceiling on available mortgages is too low on a regional basis, and in some cases the divisions between the regions are so arbitrary as to be—I was going to say stupid but I have been told I should not use that word—ridiculous. They are completely out of line. I believe CMHC should look at this matter and ensure that the ceilings are adequate to meet the needs of the areas. For instance, a young couple were trying to build their house in Winnipeg. I believe that the ceiling at that time was raised a little to about $33,000. A lot was being leased from an organization and CMHC insisted on placing a value on that lot of $15,000 and then expecting the couple to go ahead and build a house under the ceiling of $33,000. I say that this is true all across the country.

Another difficulty is that CMHC insists on a fixed rate rather than a floating rate. There is another letter which I received from which I would like to read. It is stated in it that trust companies and banks are experiencing difficulty in getting insured loans through CMHC because of the fact that they do not accept a floating take out rate; they want a firm rate.

These are all restrictions that are hindering the realization of the objective of having suitable housing for all the citizens of Canada. To cap it all, the minister says that he has been pouring money into this program. It seems that he has been pouring that money without limit, according to him. Yet the fact remains that developers and individuals are finding it absolutely impossible to get money today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Patterson: I did state that I would not charge the minister with lack of sympathy or sympathetic consideration, but I certainly question the statements he has made. Most of what he said is just talk, and there is not too much effective action in dealing with the serious problems facing Canada.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Madam Speaker, there is a story that goes around about a number of multi-national students who were asked to write an essay on the general theme of an elephant. The British students decided to write about the elephant in its role as a vehicle of transportation in the British Empire. The French students decided to write about the elephant and its sex life. The students from the United States decided to write about the elephant and its market value. But when it came to the Canadian student, he entitled his essay "The elephant—is it a matter of federal, provincial or municipal responsibility?" I suggest that perhaps the same thing could well apply to housing.

I notice the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) in speaking to her motion referred in particular to access to decent housing at prices that Canadian people can afford today. The hon. member knows better than I do that a large part of the cost of housing is in the price of serviced land. In speaking about Ontario I will refer in particular to Toronto because it is the city I know best. The average price of a fully serviced single family lot in Toronto is $20,211. What are we going to do about that? When we ask our provincial government, we find that on May 15, 1975, Bill 125 was finally passed. That is a bill dealing with land speculation. It was made retroactive to April 9, 1974.

We all know the political hue of the Ontario government which has projected a revenue of $25 million, but so far it has only received less than $1 million. I wonder what happened. On checking, we found that there is something known as ministerial discretion. The minister in Ontario is very anxious not to "create hardship," and therefore he uses his discretion in pointing out who is a land speculator. What is the definition of a land speculator?

We find also that his department accepts affidavits as to the worth of land. It is terribly touching and heart warming to find the Conservatives so sweet and trusting. They have no knowledge of the exact value of the land; they accept affidavits.

We then go on to the purchase of land by the provincial government. That in itself is a very good thing; I am not knocking it, but I believe the provincial government of Ontario is irresponsible in its purchase of land for housing.

In south Milton, just outside Toronto, three corporations—Cedar Heights Construction Limited, Lorring Developments and Bonny Don Corporation—all having the same president, purchased seven parcels of land from farmers in February of 1975, and one month later sold them to the provincial government for a profit of approximately $1 million. Of course we do not call that speculation, Madam Speaker! I am not sure what we do call it.

The biggest single threat to the acquisition of land in Ontario is the actions of the provincial government in this regard. As I said, we do not object to the acquisition of land but rather to the way in which the provincial government goes about it. It could possibly be the biggest land speculator going, and perhaps that is why it refuses to define the word "speculation" in the land speculation bill. I will give another example. Cedar Heights purchased one parcel of land for $379,095 and sold it to the provincial government for $579,095. That is a profit of $200,000. Are we talking about conscience, speculation, or what?

● (1550)

Then we come to the municipal level. In my riding there are people who are exceptionally handy. They can do wonders in the renovation and repair of houses. I believe that because of the high price of serviced lots we at the federal level should give some tax incentive for this kind of thing. Not only would it help people improve their present housing, especially the elderly, if they could afford to improve their housing, it would in many cases avoid their being shunted into senior citizens homes where they do not want to go anyway.

I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) will consider that in his coming budget. Not only would it help housing but it would also help housing related industries. However, I find that in my own borough of York money from the home renewal program which was given to the borough about five months ago has not yet been used. Why not? It could be that I come from a borough where officials are almost paranoiac about two families living in one building, but in my riding it is the culture of the people to want to live together. I am not talking about overcrowding; I am talking about adding one extra room to a house so that another part of a family could fit in. Instead, we have something similar to paranoia.

We have officials who, not unlike McCarthy looking for communists, are looking for an extra kitchen, an extra bathroom or an extra bedroom. I agree with my leader. I think the state and the borough should keep out of the bedrooms of citizens. However, because of that, people in my riding are being refused money on the grounds that instead of asking for loans to repair their dwellings, they want to install extra bathrooms and build additions.

What is wrong with an extra bathroom or building an addition which could house another part of the family? My borough will not allow that.

I have listened to many speakers from the opposition today. Frankly, I welcome criticism when it is constructive, but having listened to some of the comments today, I must admit that many of the speakers sound a little bit like sour music critics who are themselves really only frustrated tenors.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, this is indeed an important debate because we are dealing with the problem of housing in Canada, which is a crisis. It is a crisis which can be laid directly on the doorstep of the Liberal government. We have housing programs built on crumbling foundations, and supervised by a minister whose blueprint for aiding low and middle income Canadians is totally inadequate.

I would like very briefly to outline the nature of this crisis and to make some constructive proposals to combat this growing problem. The first thing we must recognize—and I think the government has not taken it seriously—is the escalation of housing costs. I will give but a few examples. In Toronto in 1972 the average house cost $31,357. In 1974 that same house sold for $46,210, or a 50 per cent increase in two years. That kind of escalation cannot be tolerated by a government if it is serious about the housing needs of Canadians. Yet we see the price of houses today continuing to rise. In 1975 the average price of a house in the province of Ontario is $48,836, a price beyond the capability of most Ontarians to afford. So the first aspect of the housing crisis is that costs are just out of all proportion.

The second aspect of the housing crisis is the escalation in mortgage rates. It was not so long ago that mortgage rates in this country were fixed at 6 per cent. Then the government removed the upper limit and allowed the mortgage rate to float. It soon rose to 8 per cent, 9 per cent and 10 per cent. Today under the National Housing Act there is a rate of 11¼ per cent, and on the conventional market, from banks and other financial institutions, a rate of 11½ per cent.

Constituents in my riding of Sault Ste. Marie have come to me complaining that they cannot obtain conventional mortgage rates, and that they are so desperate for accommodation that they have been forced to go to other institutions, such as loan companies, and are paying mortgage rates as high as 15 per cent. In our society that is totally criminal. We now find also that the mortgage money supply is becoming tighter and tighter. It is being restricted by the private lending institutions to new houses. For existing houses, which most average income Canadians can afford, mortgage money is practically non existent. So the second aspect of this problem of housing is the mortgage rate escalation.

The third aspect of this crisis is the rising cost of materials and land. Lumber costs rose last year by 45 per cent, electrical supplies by some 30 per cent, and I could go on down the list and tell how costs have increased dramatically. Land costs are now outrageous. In my constituency serviced lots selling for $4,000 or $6,000 only a few years ago now cost an average of $10,000. In the city of Toronto the cost is as high as $20,000. Labour costs have gone up as well, but certainly not in proportion to building costs or land costs. It is interesting to remind ourselves that construction workers in the housing industry receive only two thirds of the average wage of construction workers as a whole, especially those building commercial buildings.

The fourth aspect of the crisis today is the decline in housing starts. To the end of March of this year the projected annual rate of new housing starts in Canada is only 144,400. That is the lowest level since 1970. The minister has set a target of 210,000 units for this year. There is no way he will be able to achieve that goal under existing policies. Indeed I have heard from officials in

[Mrs. Appolloni.]

CMHC—and they will have to remain unnamed—that the ministry is seriously considering revising that target, admitting a failure and dropping it to the rate of 186,000 units for the year. If that happens it will be a total admission by this minister that his policy is a failure.

● (1600)

There is also a decline in the departmental budget of the minister in real dollar value because of the rising inflation rate. Those are the components, the characteristics of the housing crisis today. This means that a majority of Canadians can no longer afford to buy a house even with the programs the minister is so fond of reciting when questioned or in debate. Even with those programs the majority of Canadians have been shut out from any hope of owning a house at a reasonable cost.

To qualify for assistance under the Assisted Home Ownership Plan a person has to be earning a salary of $18,000 a year in Toronto, $19,000 in Vancouver, $15,000 in Halifax. To buy a house in Sault Ste. Marie a person would need to earn $14,000 a year, but the average income in my constituency is only $10,000. To get AHOP assistance in Sault Ste. Marie under existing tight money and high housing costs one would need to earn $10,000 a year.

When 80 per cent of families in Ontario have incomes below $15,000 a year and 60 per cent of families have incomes below $11,000 a year, then we can see that the minister's pet, the AHOP program, is beyond the reach of the majority of people living in Ontario with the existing housing crisis and mortgage rates. When the average wage in Canada is $9,000 a year, who can hope to own a house?

The government says that an income earner is not supposed to pay more than 25 per cent of salary for accommodation, that is, to enable that income earner to afford the other necessities of life for himself and his family. In the province of Ontario there are 560,000 people paying over half their income for housing. That is outrageous, unjustifiable, and totally unnecessary if the government—

Mr. Watson: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie would not want to leave on the record a statement which is incorrect. He indicated that families in the Sault Ste. Marie area earning up to $14,000 a year and in the Toronto area up to $19,000 a year would not be eligible for the AHOP program. The situation is precisely the reverse of what the hon. member stated. Families earning up to those figures are eligible.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. This is a point for debate. The hon. member may deal with the point if he speaks later on.

Mr. Symes: I am glad the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) brought that up. When he looks at Hansard he will find that I said under the existing situation in Toronto and Sault Ste. Marie. Granted, they can qualify under the AHOP program that has come up with funding for existing housing. In my constituency they would need to be able to find a new house for under $30,000. The average income being what it is, and AHOP being designed to help people with incomes from $9,000 to $12,500, the bulk of them cannot afford it. They would have to be earning over $10,000 a year to find any housing in the Sault under existing circumstances today. Certainly they qualify, but the circumstances prevent them from taking advantage of the program. So we have a situation that on paper the government program says people can qualify, but the realities of supply and price make it impossible for the majority of Canadians to buy a house.

What is the reaction of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson)? In a speech delivered to a real estate seminar in Toronto he said:

> Central Mortgage and Housing designed its programs to give more Canadians, particularly those at low and middle incomes, access to good, affordable accommodation.

That is a very fine sounding system, but in reality CMHC policies are just not working. The minister likes to boast of the success of AHOP, but let us examine the workings of that program.

The minister says the program has a budget of $350 million. As I mentioned a few moments ago, that budget is for new homes only. They have cut out of the budget all funds for the purchase of existing housing. In some cases, of course, existing housing is less expensive than new housing. That is the housing low income Canadians depend on, but it has been cut out of the budget because of the minister's desire to put all the funds he can into building new homes so that he can meet his goal of 210,000 units.

AHOP was primarily for people in the $6,000 or $7,000 or up to $12,000 income bracket, but because of the existing housing situation it is mostly people earning between $10,000 and $12,500 who end up qualifying. Where can you get a new house for $30,000 today? If you earn $8,000, under the AHOP program you can only afford a house that does not cost more than $20,000. Where can anyone get a house at that price today? AHOP has frozen out the majority of Canadians who earn less than $10,000 a year.

The minister's program is not the great success he likes to make out it is. The minister has done nothing to bring down interest rates either. He has subsidized private lenders but has not attacked the usurious interest rates of 11 per cent and higher that we have today.

For example, for a house that costs $44,900 having a 10 per cent down payment and mortgaged at 11½ per cent over 30 years—that is a $40,000 mortgage—taking into account the interest rate and the principal, the individual ends up paying $139,680 for that $44,900 house. That is just shameful and disgraceful in our society. Yet the minister sits back and allows the interest rate to escalate.

The New Democratic Party says that the government should instruct banks to issue mortgages at 6 per cent for low income families. Bankers should be required by law to set funds aside at the interest rate—they can easily afford it. When we look at their holdings we find that the mortgage holdings of banks represent only 8 per cent of their total assets. In 1973, the last year I have figures for, the banks paid an average interest rate of only 4.7 per cent on all deposits. Under this scheme of 6 per cent mortgages, banks would still be able to make a profit.

If we had 6 per cent mortgages there would be a significant saving for those who need it most. Comparing a 6 per cent mortgage to an 11 per cent mortgage on a $35,000 house, there would be a saving of $1,356 a year. I contend it is outrageous that on a $35,000 house, with an 11 per cent mortgage, the principal amounts to only $17 a month but the interest is $320 a month!

The Liberals have failed totally to address themselves to the problem of interest rates. They will not confront their friends in the financial institutions because bankers and financiers in this country are sacrosanct as far as Liberals are concerned.

● (1610)

We of the New Democratic Party believe, unlike the Liberals, that owning a house is not a privilege but a social right. Nothing is as important for family upbringing as decent accommodation. Decent housing is a social right, just like education and medical services. To make that concept a reality we would do the following, and we urge the minister to consider these points seriously.

First, we should reduce mortgage interest rates and compel financial institutions to give priority to residential housing in their lending policies, and free more funds for the housing market. In addition, we would compel them to set aside a certain percentage of assets for mortgage moneys to be lent at 6 per cent to low income people. I am gratified to note that the NDP government of British Columbia has moved in that direction by setting up its own provincial bank which will lend mortgage moneys at 6 per cent to low income people.

Second, in order to get more housing units built, we would double the housing budget, even if that means deficit financing. Housing represents an important social need, and we must build more houses. Certainly by encouraging house building we will stimulate the construction industry, one of the most job intensive in the country. Our target would not be 210,000 units, but 400,000.

Third, we must involve the government directly in house construction. As the private sector is not building enough houses, especially public housing, because it is more profitable to build individual units, the government must become involved directly in housebuilding. Governments have become involved in this way in several European countries.

Fourth, we must bring land costs down. Government funds for land assembly must be increased. We must do more of the sort of thing the Manitoba government has done in land banking. For example, in Winnipeg one can buy fully serviced government assembled lots for $7,000; lots in the private sector sell for $14,000.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, having listened to this debate all afternoon I suggest that all Liberal members who spoke, with one exception, did not make serious contributions on this important motion and serious subject facing the country. I include the minister. The minister recited a catalogue of frivolous programs which have not worked, as demonstrated by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), and others. That is a reflection on the Liberal members who spoke, among whom I include the minister.

Only the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemount (Mr. Joyal) made a spirited and sincere speech about the problems and ferment in the construction industry. I think that was the gist of his remarks. I ask the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemount what has contributed to this ferment? I suggest the main contributor has been the government, or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) whom he supports. The government which he supports has fuddled and duddled and fiddled, not dealt with inflation, led us blindly into economic chaos, and all the while has tried to assure us that everything in the country is all right. The situation has deteriorated to the point at which, finally, the Minister of Finance has admitted that we face an economic crisis. The mounting crisis this country faces, and the instability and fear it generates, is responsible in part for union unrest and the ferment of which the hon. member spoke. I think the hon. member knows that, too.

Canada is in economic difficulties. As the hon. member for Don Valley said, the housing programs of the government are built on an economic foundation and an economic premise of a bygone age. It is important to bear in mind one statistic: as of April, 1975, housing starts are down by 42 per cent, compared with starts in the same period last year. There is no indication that the Eaton's catalogue of programs which the minister cited will turn the situation round, and therein lies the tragedy.

It is also tragic to note that, faced with the present serious situation, we heard a minister who is tired. I do not know why he is tired.

An hon. Member: From fishing.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I suspect he is tired from wrestling with others in the cabinet who do not share his perhaps well-intentioned views for dealing with this serious problem.

Others have spoken about their areas of Canada; I want to speak about mine, the national capital. I suppose that compared with other areas of Canada the national capital is prosperous. But, make no mistake, we face problems as well. Mayor Greenberg is reported by the Ottawa Journal of May 6, 1975, in an article headlined "Grim housing shortage predicted for Ottawa", to have said that there would be a severe shortage of housing for rent, not only in Ottawa but in the region as well. On the same day the Ottawa Citizen printed an article headlined "Rental lack foreseen in region." The article said in part:

> The slowdown in housing construction is Canada-wide. In Ottawa during the first four months of this year, permits were issued for only 361 housing units, compared to 2,835 during the same period last year.

Remember, this is not a large city. I think Mayor Greenberg was being conservative in his assessment of the gravity of the crisis. But you need not talk to Mayor Greenberg or any other elected official to learn how grave is the crisis in housing. You will learn how bad conditions are if you read my mail. People write and telephone me all the time, and complain to me about their inability to obtain housing. In Grenville-Carleton many people are forced to live in highrise buildings because other housing accommodation is not available for them.

Young people cannot afford to borrow money. Although their salaries have increased each year in dollar terms, they do not earn enough to qualify for a mortgage loan. They cannot afford houses. Consequently they are trapped in these highrise buildings. I agree that some people prefer to live in highrise buildings. That is their privilege. I am not speaking about them. I am speaking about the people who are trapped in these buildings, who want a home but cannot afford one.

What is happening in our area? The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) is fighting with the regional government of this area over where development is to take place. The state of affairs in the national capital is dreadful, but the minister is arguing, fighting and threatening the regional municipality. He wants to get his own way with land use planning. I am the last to deny that the federal government does not have a unique responsibility in the national capital area. But that does not mean that the minister should force the National Capital Commission to do as he wishes, or that the federal government should ignore the wishes of the locally elected municipal government. If I may say so, because this area is the centre of gravity of the federal government, the minister has an even greater responsibility for solving the housing needs of Ottawa than he has, perhaps, for any other area.

While we are arguing as to whether the development in Carlsbad Springs ought to go ahead, or the development in the southwest quadrant of the national capital area, there are people sitting waiting for houses. There are thousands and thousands of potential units in the southwest quadrant of this city.

What does the minister have in answer to the regional municipality that wants to develop there in terms of its own official plan? He takes the cheap course and says the regional municipality is on the side of the bad guys, the developers. That is hardly consistent with what I regard to be the position of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs in terms of development of the national capital area. While this fight is going on, people are waiting for houses.

Some people seem to forget—and there are a couple of things the hon. member for Mississauga (Mr. Abbott) did not know, let alone forget—is that the land in the Carlsbad Springs area was purchased by the Ontario government as a land bank program, not for immediate development but for a program for a period of 20 years. The official plan of the regional municipality says it is to be for future development, yet the Minister of State for Urban Affairs wants to build homes as a Leda Clay monument in Gloucester township, and he wants to build them today. That flies in the face of the wishes of the local people.

There have been a lot of expressions of disrespect toward the minister because of the position he has taken. Rather than continuing this argument, he should sit down and consult in a meaningful way with the local regional officials. It might be a refreshing experience for him.

What is the result of all this? The result is that thousands of lots lie in a state of nature in the southwest quadrant of the city. The housing statistics set by Mayor Greenberg and others in the national capital area are going to get worse. Young people and others are going to be trapped against their will in high-rise apartments and townhouses for longer periods than they ought to be. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs and his department are not serving the national capital area well. That is the result of this interesting jurisdictional dispute.

While these people wait for some action, interest rates rise, housing starts fall, mortgage moneys continue to be scarce, and the cost of construction continues to rise. In the meantime I suppose we are going to hear the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin) announce for the fifth time the beginning of the park in LeBreton Flats. Every once in a while when there is nothing to say, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre trots out another announcement that LeBreton Flats will go ahead.

I do not know why the minister takes this position. I do not know why he feels the only way he can accomplish anything is to carry out an end run around the provinces and municipalities. Surely the local officials have something to say. No federal officer ought to trade compromise and consultation for the questionable tool of confrontation. However, that is what is happening. As a result, housing development is slowing down.

The federal government is saying in the local area, "Play ball or we will not let you use our land for development." That quote has been attributed to the federal government. The minister says, "Play ball or we won't pay the one third cost of servicing as we have done in every other instance." If that is an example of reasonable consultation, I guess I have not seen one before.

One of the arguments that seem to affect this area is the questionable quality of the land. A report was issued a few days ago by De Leuw Cather. I have to admit that the De Leuw Cather report does not say the Carlsbad Springs area is a swamp. However, it does not give it a complete bill of health.

If the De Leuw Cather report says anything, it is that if you can develop in another area then go ahead and do it, because it will be very costly to develop in this area. It will be costly to service the area and to put in foundations. Housing costs will be above the ordinary. There will be some difficulty with regard to providing services within the area. There will be some difficulty in so far as the timing is concerned.

The chairman of the regional municipality put it the best way possible. I quote from an article in the May 16 edition of the Ottawa Citizen:

> "All I can say is that this is the worst soil in the area," Mr. Coolican said in an interview. "If you are going to find out how you can build on the land, you don't have to do it as a priority.

For some reason unknown to me and so far unexplained, the minister has taken this piece of land, generally regarded by people in the area as one of the worst, if not the worst piece of land, and decided it will be developed immediately in place of available serviced land in the southwest quadrant of the national capital area.

If the minister is making any mistake, it is that he has his role mixed up. The federal government is not the prime developer of land. It ought not to attempt to avoid its responsibility to consult with the provinces and municipalities. If it has any responsibility at all, it is to provide the financing to the provinces and, through them, to the municipal governments in order to allow those governments to make local decisions as to what direction development ought to follow in the particular community. There are different problems in different parts of Canada.

What are the arguments we hear from time to time with regard to this development of Carlsbad Springs, which someone has called "Fullerton's folly"? It is said we might better develop there because useful farmland would be taken up in the southwest quadrant of the city. Let me say something about that. The fact is that very little, if not all, of that useful farmland is not being farmed. It is now in the hands of developers and is in the process of being developed. They are now ready to go. Even if it were available for agriculture, the cost of farming on that high priced land would make it impossible for young farmers to afford.

There is a potential there which the government seems to ignore. I really believe there are some positive things that can be done. Some of them were mentioned by the hon. member for Don Valley. I think his speech should be commended to all. I hope that members opposite who are truly concerned about the principal urban problem in Canada and a very important rural problem listened very closely, and will read again the speech of the hon. member for Don Valley.

We can utilize the new town concept and the concept of developing around existing towns. We have the rail network in this area, and I suspect in other areas, to provide interurban transit. All of these things can be done, but I suspect they will not be done if the only imaginative proposal put before this House is a continuation of a program of spend, spend, spend. The result of that spending in terms of housing for Canadians indicates that that need is not being met. This is the tragedy of this government and this minister.

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I want to enter this debate very briefly and make just a few comments. The first is to mention the fact that I represent a constituency that has perhaps had the fastest rate of growth in urban development in all of Canada, and may be one of the fastest developing communities in all of North America. It is the location of the first satellite city in Canada—Bramalea. Since I have been here I have not heard many members rise to commend developers. But I think that today we should make an exception. I certainly want to commend the Bramalea Consolidated Development Corporation.

● (1630)

I was in the House back in February I guess, when a debate on housing took place, and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) took this company to task somewhat severely in connection with its foreign ownership and its involvement in the building and development industry in Canada as the company was then owned almost completely by outside interests. As the member representing the area in question, I should like to draw attention to the fact that, this week, the transfer has been completed to make it a wholly-owned and operated Canadian company. This move has drawn praise from both the government of Ontario and the government of Canada, and I wish to be on record as commending them for having taken this step.

In the course of her statement the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) said that the basic problem was that the government did not have a minister responsible for housing who was able to exercise any real influence in the Cabinet. I want her and other hon. members to know that all those of us who support the government feel very strongly about the present minister; we support him wholeheartedly, and feel we are fortunate to have a minister who reacts so well and so courageously to the ideas presented to him.

The speaker for the New Democratic Party put forward the suggestion that it would be good policy to introduce a broadly-based scheme of rent control. Many people in the constituency I represent were faced with large rent increases last year, amounting to 25 to 30 per cent. It would be natural to suppose that their reaction might be to favour rent controls, at least to some extent. I wish to oppose this idea as strongly as I can. I believe the experience in Britain, in British Columbia, and elsewhere where it has been tried, has proved it to be altogether unproductive. The only answer to high rents is competition in the market place, and I do not think there is anything which could drive competition out faster than the imposition of rent controls. Rent controls are not the answer.

Mr. Gillies: You are opposing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), I see.

Mr. Milne: Many speakers touched on the subject of land banking. This is a matter which has been talked about for many years, during which little has been done. I hope the provinces take up the federal government's program seriously and really get involved. It should be appreciated, though, that there is no immediate payoff. The payoff does not come until 15 or 20 years into the future. Still, if we do not make a start now, what is the situation in the future likely to be?

One of the groups involved in house construction is made up of builders of small and medium size. Many, if not most of them, have been forced out of business in the last few years by the high cost of land; they cannot afford to carry sufficient land on their inventories to build 30 or 40, maybe 100, new houses. As a result home-building is being left to the very large developers. If the provinces do not become seriously involved in the land bank program so that builders of moderate size may have land available to them on which to build, a large group of valuable people will disappear from the building field.

Many speakers have addressed themselves to the issue of the supply of housing and the seriousness of the shortage. Is it really a question of the supply of housing or of cost? If one looks at the housing market at the present time I think it becomes clear that there is a fairly large inventory of houses which are vacant and up for sale. This would indicate that supply is not really the overriding problem but that it it is the cost of housing which really concerns people at the present time.

Mr. Gillies: Altogether wrong!

Mr. Milne: Look around and see the amount of housing that is available. Ours is such a large country that it is ironic the price of land should be such an important factor in housing costs. I am disturbed we should be building smaller and smaller houses, cutting corners wherever we can in order to accommodate the high cost of land. This is another reason why I strongly urge governments across Canada to become seriously involved in land banking as a solution for the future.

I was disturbed by the speech made by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies).

Mr. Gillies: You did not understand it.

Mr. Milne: I understood it quite well; I could not follow the logic or, rather, it was the illogic of the speech which puzzled me. I thought it was unfair for him to take such an aggressive attitude toward the minister as though all the housing problems in Canada were his fault and all blame rested on his shoulders.

Mr. Gillies: Most of them are.

Mr. Milne: Most of the remarks the hon. member was making would have been more valid had the Mayor of Toronto and the Premier of Ontario been here representing the whole composite area. In fact we are bound to establish this type of dialogue between the three levels of government if plans in the housing field are to meet with complete success. For example, how will you resolve a problem when there is four times—

Mr. Gillies: You do not understand the issue.

Mr. Milne: I am not referring to the hon. member at the present time. As I was saying, growth in our larger cities is running at about four times the average rate as people move into the cities to take advantage of job opportunities. One finds the municipal areas trying to pursue a no-growth type of policy, with bylaws which support that approach.

What is happening is that the core areas in the large metropolitan areas are trying to enforce what amounts to a zero growth policy. This channels growth into surburban communities around the periphery of the major centres. Such areas, as I know, since I come from one, are under tremendous pressure, and the municipalities concerned face a real problem. At one time everyone thought that the more houses which were built in an area the better off residents were from the point of view of the municipal tax structure. This appears to be no longer the case. It is necessary nowadays, to make sound judgments as to the cost of this growth.

A number of hon. members have referred to the inroads upon productive agricultural land made by urban expansion. Our attitude toward this issue appears to me to be somewhat illogical. For instance, the Minister makes an announcement concerning a major housing development within the next three years, and at the same time a good deal of concern is expressed about the need to preserve good agricultural land. I think it is very unfair to propose a program under which agricultural land around metropolitan areas will be rapidly depleted while at the same time denying farmers the benefit of their annuities, or the majority of those annuities, for the sake of the rest of society. If the authorities really value agricultural land, then the location of the services is of vital importance. If we want to continue extending services to good agricultural land it is very unfair to say that the farmers should bear the cost.

● (1640)

One of the things that really astound me, in terms of how some of the provinces are handling the situation, is the scarcity of serviced land in some of the northern towns and villages. It seems to be far more scarce than in areas surrounding our big cities. Employees who have been transferred to small towns and municipalities in northern Ontario have had to buy a very old house and remove it and build a new one just in order to get a serviced lot. This has nothing to do with the argument about preserving good agricultural land because there is none in that area. Somewhere along the line the decision must be made whether to allow development in that kind of area, and if it is, then let us get on with it.

My information is that there are probably close to 100,000 building lots across Canada which have received municipal approval but approval is being held up at the provincial level. This is why I cannot accept the argument of the hon. member for Don Valley that the problem rests entirely with the minister, because that is not the case.

I should also like strongly to support one of the points made by the minister to the effect that we must be very careful about who does the spending and who does the taxing. I thought he made that point very well. If the government were to continue, as the hon. member for Don Valley would have it, to fund the housing market across Canada and let somebody else do the spending, then I think this would be a very bad precedent. I often wonder, when I hear this sort of argument, whether we would not do better to become even more involved than we are in design, financing, and research into some of the infrastructure required, and leave the funding of the programs to the provinces which have the basic responsibility in the housing field.

Let me give an example. It is not really fair of me to comment on this situation because it is not in this jurisdiction, but let us say that in a major housing development within a very short period of time it is brought to people's attention that the municipality can no longer handle garbage removal. The whole question of disposal of waste, garbage and so on, is one to which we must address ourselves. I would not be opposed to the federal government concentrating upon this role, rather than adopt the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Don Valley that we supply the money and have very little say in terms of how it is spent.

Some years ago it was thought that the magical answer to the housing problem would be the introduction of modular housing. The pay-off in Europe and in Great Britain has been tremendous, and a number of municipalities in the Toronto area have tried it. However, I am not aware that this is a particularly active proposition at the present time, and I wonder whether they approached it in the right way.

We have one of the most efficient construction industries in Canada, certainly around our large cities, so far as the building of multiple dwellings is concerned. It was almost self-evident that modular housing would not be able to compete with this kind of efficiency. But what is of interest to me is that in terms of construction costs the service modules built around the kitchen are a very good modular approach, and I think would have a tremendous pay-off if they were put together and marketed as a modular component.

I realize other speakers wish to take part in this debate before the hour of adjournment, Madam Speaker, so may I say in conclusion that the most frustrating thing to any person who is struggling to buy a house today is the amount of politics to be found in the housing industry. Until the municipalities, provinces, and the federal government get away from the media and publicity, and seriously address themselves to how to handle the no-growth situation, along with the pressures and trends established over a long period of time toward mass movement to urban development, and until we spread employment opportunities to smaller areas, there is simply no good reason to service land in such communities.

As others have said, this is a Friday afternoon and this is an interesting way to spend it. The hon. member for Don Valley has made a great oration, but I do not see how that sort of thing is going to solve the housing problems in Canada. What we need is co-operation between the three levels of government to get this job done.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) rising to ask a question?

Mr. Gillies: Yes, Madam Speaker. Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Milne: Certainly.

Mr. Gillies: I wonder whether the hon. member from Bramalea has talked to some major developers in the Bramalea area about what their principal problem is in building housing at the present time.

Mr. Milne: As a matter of fact, I have. I think they would indicate to the hon. member, if he asked them the same question—

Mr. Gillies: I did, yesterday.

Mr. Milne: Yes, I understand that. I think he would learn from them that the private sector is not advancing sufficient housing funds.

Mr. Gillies: That is exactly right.

Mr. Milne: Hon. members opposite are the strongest proponents of the private sector, so they should tell some of their corporate friends that if they feel any social responsibility for housing they should be making more money available.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Madam Speaker, in the few minutes I have left I am pleased to be able to make some contribution. I commend my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), for a very excellent motion and for her presentation which covered the housing crisis pretty thoroughly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: Others of my colleagues covered the waterfront, as it were. The area I want to explore for a few moments has to do with the new veterans' housing program which is now closely aligned with the responsibilities of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) in collaboration with the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). This new program went into effect on May 1, and while I admit that they have struck on two programs that could fulfil the needs of many veterans, they missed a most vital and important item which would provide relief for veterans who have homes of their own but are living on fixed incomes or allowances.

First let me deal with the two sections of the act that will provide veterans with a bit of extra relief. I refer to the AHOP program whereby veterans will not have to face the restriction that they must have children to qualify, not that this is any great show of consideration when we take account of the age of the veterans to whom this measure applies. In addition, the veterans will be able to qualify for annual assistance of $600 on the purchase of an existing home. I hope the minister will soon consider reintroducing this proposal for all Canadians, as well as removing the restriction on the first time home buyer that he must have one or more children to qualify.

In this regard, even though the Minister of Veterans Affairs—whom I was hoping would be here this afternoon—has publicized the program in the newspapers and it will soon appear in the newsletters and periodicals of the veterans' organizations, I appeal to the minister to set up better communications to make every veteran aware of the program. It is well known to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, as well as to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, that many veterans were not aware of the deadline set by parliament in 1963 for certification under the Veterans' Land Act. As a result they were denied the opportunity of taking advantage of the act after that date. I therefore appeal to both ministers to ensure, through every avenue available to them—certainly there are sufficient public relations staff in government departments today—that every veteran is made aware of the new program.

Another observation I want to make has to do with the section under the non-profit housing provisions whereby organizations may apply for a little extra relief under the start-up funds and 10 per cent assistance on capital costs. Again I wish to remind both ministers that in the design of such buildings it is important that standards be set to ensure easy mobility of the handicapped, the disabled, and the aged. I also hope that the Minister of Veterans Affairs will provide, in consultation with the veterans' organizations across the country, leadership in the provision of non-profit housing of every type needed for all veterans.

● (1650)

A most glaring oversight exists in the consideration the ministers have given to the provision of a housing program. I refer to the vital and important need of thousands of veterans who own their own homes who, because of limited income, are not able to carry out the necessary repairs to maintain those homes. For some reason or other both ministers who must be aware of this need did not include a rehabilitation factor similar to that existing under the Neighbourhood Program and the Rural Native Housing Program. The minister might give me the argument that veterans now can qualify under these two sections. I point out this inequity, however, because in order to qualify under the present terms of the act veterans must reside in one of the designated areas, and this is the responsibility of the province.

If the veterans happen to live outside the designated areas they would be denied the opportunity to qualify for the forgivable loans that are available. I submit that this is wrong. As most members are aware, under the Residential Rehabilitation Program citizens earning an income of $6,000 or less can qualify for loans of up to $5,000 to bring their homes up to a better standard. Of that amount 50 per cent may be forgiven. Indeed in a case where the need is only $2,500 it may all be forgiven.

In order to satisfy veterans who fall within this category the easy solution would be that they be permitted to apply directly to CMHC for such loans and grants regardless of their places of residence. They should be able to do this under the criteria concerning standards laid down by the particular province. I suggest that the Minister of Veterans Affairs might consider being a little more generous in providing in his departmental funds for forgiveness loans that would be a little more generous, and in increasing the forgiveness loans from $2,500 to say $4,000. The Minister of Veterans Affairs well realizes the need for such a program because he has an example of the need in the study made by the Newfoundland and Labrador Command of the Canadian Legion which indicates that there are vast numbers of homes owned by veterans which are in need of repairs, while the veterans or the widows who exist on allowances or pensions find difficulty in living a reasonable life, let alone having the necessary funds to keep their homes in reasonable repair.

I suggest also that a survey to obtain the necessary information should be initiated by the ministers in every province of Canada. There is another alternative whereby the $600 annual grant could be used to offset the cost of repairs. I am sure some means could be found to work out a system under the AHOP program in this regard. Another alternative would be for the government, through the ministers, to expand the present home improvement loans which exist under the National Housing Act if there are any constitutional problems which exist. All that would be necessary would be to include under that program the same forgiveness factors which exist under the residential rehabilitation program.

Since I always try to be optimistic and give credit rather than criticize, I wish to say I believe I have already made some progress along the lines mentioned. When both ministers attended the committee proceedings they indicated their willingness to consider a program such as I suggest. On Wednesday past I presented a motion before the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs which asked the committee to request that the minister consider additions to the veterans housing program which would include a provision that veterans, irrespective of their province of residence, might apply directly to CMHC and the Veterans' Land Act administration for rehabilitation loans containing forgiveness factors, similar to those which presently exist under the Neighbourhood Improvement Program and the Rural and Native Housing Program. I was very pleased that the motion was unanimously accepted. This indicates that all members of all parties recognize there is merit in the suggestion. I commend all members of the committee for their co-operation.

I now appeal to both ministers, who themselves are distinguished war veterans and who recently have been recognized in this parliament for their service—the minister responsible for Housing who was commended for his concern for people, and the Minister of Veterans Affairs who was referred to as the perfect minister—to look at these suggestions I made on behalf of my party and explore every avenue by which they might make a further contribution in meeting the needs of all our veterans across the country, and particularly those who fall within the category of most need.

The Leader of my party does not mind my making these suggestions and helping the minister devise plans to answer the problem of providing housing for our citizens. I shall continue to help, and I hope that both ministers will listen to me and implement these improvements in the same way the Minister of Veterans Affairs has accepted other realistic proposals put forth by my party in respect of the veterans charter in relation to allowances and pensions. While I do not mind throwing around a few bouquets to the other side I find I must take serious issue with a statement made in this House a week or so ago by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). At that time he was asked to give examples of how the government practises restraint in spending. The one example he gave was the restraint that would come about as a result of the phasing out of the Veterans' Land Act. I take strong issue with this statement because nothing is farther from the truth or closer to a term which may not be uttered in this House.

I wish to repeat the words I used in my question of privilege, which was ruled out of order. I said that these words were a slight to the veteran and that if this were the only example of restraint the Prime Minister could find to support the action of the government, God help Canada.

In order to prove my point, which I proved in the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, that it will not cost the people of Canada one penny to maintain the Veterans' Land Act administration, let us look at some figures. In 1973-74 the operating expenditures for the Veterans' Land Act administration were $11,879,014. In 1974 the expenditures were $12 million, the year when we forced the extension of the act, but at the same time over 3,000 new veterans were served. I shall give more details on that later.

The estimated expenditure figures for 1975-76 show an increase of only $101,125 to $12,705,548, and $71,000 of the $101,125 is made up of contributions to employee benefit plans. As a result of the extension for one year of the Veterans' Land Act 5,561 loans for new establishments were approved compared to a figure of 3,175 for the previous year. In addition there were 2,558 loans to veterans already settled. As a result of the extension to March 31, 1975, over 3,000 new applications were approved. I hesitate to mention the fact that according to answers to questions I placed on the order paper some 7,600 received extra benefits as a result of our phasing out of the act.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. It being five o'clock it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 58 the proceedings on the motion have expired.

It being five o'clock this House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 26, 1975

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER MEETINGS SEEKING CONSENSUS ON RESTRAINT—DATE OF FINAL ASSESSMENT STAGE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance arising from the reported statement of the Prime Minister during his tour of Ontario that no further consensus talks are scheduled between the ministry and the groups involved in the earlier discussions. Would the minister indicate to the House why this is so, particularly now that the budget has been delayed almost a month beyond what he had originally hoped?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is true that in a formal sense there will be no further talks until after the budget, in view of the fact that we now have to review options, but there have been technical discussions held since my last meetings, and as I said to some members of the press, it may be that I will want to have further meetings with some leaders of the business and labour communities.

Mr. Stanfield: It rather looks as though the consensus program is in the same condition as some of the animals delivered for human consumption in Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Without any such talks between the minister and the groups he had been meeting before, could the minister tell us what other input he will be seeking before making his final assessment on the prospect of a voluntary restraint program? When will the minister enter his final assessment stage, and will he make a final assessment before the budget?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I think that might be one of the matters I will want to deal with on budget night.

Mr. Stanfield: Speaking about budget night, in view of the delays, confusion and deception, which I hope has not been intentional, I must ask the minister whether he is prepared to stake his continuance in his present office on his ability to present a budget no later than June 23.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there are enough risks in this office already.

INFLATION—DATE OF DELIVERY OF WORKING PAPERS ON RESTRAINT GUIDELINES SUBMITTED TO CANADIAN LABOUR CONGRESS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Notwithstanding the minister's desire to remain silent about future developments—or the lack of them—in the consensus program, would he at least clarify a few points about what has been done up to this time. In view of the fact that Mr. Joe Morris of the Canadian Labour Congress has stated publicly that the first time he saw the federal government working paper on consensus was when he read it in the May 5 edition of the Toronto Star, could the minister tell the House when a copy of the working paper, as now tabled in the House, was delivered to the CLC and to Mr. Morris?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think they were delivered to the CLC before the documents were made public, and certainly before the executive meeting of the Canadian Labour Congress and the meeting of the council of the Canadian Labour Congress. I believe Mr. Morris had not had a chance to review the paper personally because he had been out of the country on official business.

INFLATION—SOURCE OF LEAK OF WORKING PAPER ON RESTRAINT GUIDELINES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. As the leak of the consensus paper apparently contributed to the hardening of positions and an atmosphere of confrontation, judging from the comments made by Mr. Morris, can the minister tell the House whether he has investigated where the leak occurred? If it occurred in his department what remedial action has been taken?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): We have not found the source, Mr. Speaker.

INFLATION—POSSIBILITY OF MINISTER MEETING CANADIAN LABOUR CONGRESS TO DISCUSS COUNTER PROPOSALS TO RESTRAINT PROGRAM

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A final supplementary. Considering that the minister, as of May 23 had not met with Mr. Morris to discuss the CLC nine point counter proposal, can the minister indicate whether or not he is prepared to meet with Mr. Morris to at least discuss the CLC proposals?

Oral Questions

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is badly informed. I have met once with Mr. Morris, privately and once with his executive to discuss their nine point proposal.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGED CONFRONTATION BETWEEN MINISTER AND EMPLOYEES—SUGGESTED MEDIATION BY DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the serious state of confrontation that seems to be developing between the Postmaster General and the postal employees, would the Prime Minister consider asking the Minister of Labour to make the services of his department available in a third party situation so that this problem might be resolved?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I address a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. If the Prime Minister will not ask the Minister of Labour to make his services available, I wonder if the minister would offer those services himself?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Unfortunately I did not hear the hon. member's question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My question was based on the serious state of confrontation developing between the Postmaster General and the post office employees. I asked whether the services of the Department of Labour, as a third party, could be made available?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I think the matter is already in competent hands, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO DEAL WITH EMPLOYEES WHO CLAIM THAT THEY ARE SICK

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Postmaster General.

Can the minister tell the House how many cities and employees are now affected by the epidemic which has struck postal employees, and what steps he intends to take in this regard?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I believe all postal employees in Montreal are sick today. As usual, we do not want sick employees to work while they are sick. Doubtless, when they come back to work tomorrow, they will bring proof that they are in good health.

[Mr. Stevens.]

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION FOLLOWING PRESENTATION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance arising out of the questions asked by my leader. Is the minister sufficiently aware of the likely content of the new budget to be able to indicate if legislation will arise out of it? If so, will that legislation be commenced before the summer recess? In particular is the minister aware of the kind of tax increases the Prime Minister promised when he spoke at Belleville?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in terms of the hon. gentleman's assumptions I do not know whether he would consider me sufficiently aware or not, but I think I know what I am doing.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY—POSSIBILITY OF CONTRACTUAL LINK

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As it has been indicated that during his trip to NATO, on which he leaves tomorrow, the Prime Minister will continue to pursue the elusive contractual link, has he reason to believe that his pursuit on this occasion will be more fruitful than it has been in the past and does he expect to be able to make an important announcement about this when he comes back?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for wishing me well on my NATO trip. The purpose of my trip to Brussels is not the pursuit of a consensus. My trip to Brussels is concerned with NATO rather than with the consensus. I will be speaking to the Prime Minister of Denmark and the Prime Minister of Luxembourg about the—

Mr. Stanfield: Missing link?

Mr. Trudeau: —contractual link. The hon. member is saying that it seems to be elusive. Perhaps he has not seen rather extensive reports which have been carried in the press to the effect that the commissioners' recommendation has been made to the commission, and the commission will be asking the council of ministers to authorize the beginning of negotiations with Canada. This, it seems to me, is very good progress indeed. Perhaps the hon. member does not understand it. I will try to explain it to him.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do understand it very well and I am sure all members of parliament do. As it has been indicated a number of times in the past that representations will be made to the commission to make possible the contractual link with Canada and nothing has happened so far, has the Prime Minister reason to believe that more concrete results will be obtained this time than were obtained in the past?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not expect to be able to show concrete results at the end of this week. As I have explained to the hon. member, it is now up to the council of ministers to agree to the recommendation put to them by the commissioners. I point this out to the hon. member: on the one hand, we have talked to the commissioners, both at the official and ministerial level and at my own level, and they are now making this type of recommendation to the council of ministers. On the other hand, while I tell the hon. member that I have been speaking to all the heads of government of the nine, the only two which remain are the ones I will be seeing this week. Therefore it will be up to them to decide whether they want to give this authority to the commission. I will not be able to make an announcement at the end of the week, as I believe the commission will be submitting this matter to the council of ministers some time in July.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I say sincerely that I think all members of parliament wish the Prime Minister well on his important mission.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: We sincerely hope things work out the way he desires.

NATO—POSSIBILITY OF INCREASING OR ALTERING FORM OF CANADIAN COMMITMENT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Prime Minister and relates to his forthcoming visit to Europe and his participation in the NATO meeting. Will the Prime Minister be accompanied by the Minister of National Defence on that trip, and will he and the Minister of National Defence bear in mind the criticism made by the United States Secretary of Defence, that several NATO allies are reducing their military budgets at a time when Russia is increasing its military budget. Will he and the minister be proposing increases in Canada's commitment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, to answer the first part of the question, the ministers of national defence of the NATO countries will not be at the NATO meeting. They are meeting now, as the hon. member knows, and their meeting is preparatory to the meeting which will be held later this week between heads of government, plus their foreign ministers. Therefore our Minister of National Defence will not be present; neither will the other defence ministers be present.

To answer the second part of the question, let me remind the House that in this year's budget, over last year's, defence expenditures have been increased by some 12 per cent, give or take a fraction. This increase is the highest of any NATO country's, bar one. Therefore I think we are in a good position to say that we are permitting our defence establishment to keep up with inflation in real terms, whereas no other NATO country, with the exception of one, is. We think that this is a very genuine indication of Canada's concern and its determination to ensure that its participation in NATO is indeed up to standard. I hope that members opposite will not be asking us to exercise restraint in that area again.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Will the Prime Minister be indicating that Canada is planning to alter the form and nature of its commitment to NATO by withdrawing its land forces, which are short of modern tanks in any event, and perhaps beefing up its air commitment?

Mr. Trudeau: That, I suppose, is a representation made by the member opposite. The Canadian government has, of course, reserved its right to make sure that its participation is the most effective possible. However, the overall commitment remains as has been stated by the minister and myself, namely that we will maintain our commitment to NATO and maintain it up to present standards. The question of whether one type of armament will be replaced by another is a question that is being reviewed at the present time.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

EFFECT OF ALLEGED FAILURE TO APPLY LAW RESPECTING CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—PROPOSED INTRODUCTION OF MEASURES TO REDUCE VIOLENT CRIMES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. It relates to some of the Prime Minister's philosophic comments to students in Montreal about social unrest which coincided with the interesting speech by the Chief Justice in Vancouver about disrespect for the law. In view of a publication by Statistics Canada which indicates that murders have increased by 11.8 per cent in a year, does the Prime Minister feel it is conducive to unrest and/or respect for the law for the government to not apply the law presently on the statute books, namely the capital punishment law that is there until changed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it important to remind the hon. member that the government has been acting entirely within the law. He seems to forget a very important part which is that the prerogative of mercy is part of our legal structure. It has been for many centuries. I hope the hon. member is not arguing for the abolition of that prerogative.

Mr. Nowlan: In view of the interesting comment in the press that hanging will be suspended until parliament considers new legislation, which will be sometime before December 1977, does the Prime Minister have any firm date in mind? If violent crime is increasing, does the Prime Minister not think measures to reduce it should be introduced now, if there are such measures, separate and apart from the emotional debate that capital punishment will invoke?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is making the point I myself made a few times in the past. I think it is a very fundamental one. The government will want to make sure that citizens are reassured that our laws are being applied and being respected and that severe measures will be taken to ensure that criminals, either through the parole system or the conditional release system, are not put in a position where they can endanger the security of law abiding citizens. I repeat, I have made that point a few times. It is very basic to the government's approach to this whole problem.

GOVERNMENT VIEW OF EFFECT OF DELAY IN INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister which is along the same lines. I have read his remarks in the national press and have listened to his answers today. Am I to understand that capital murder sentences will be postponed sine die until a new abolition bill is introduced in the House? When will that bill be brought forward? The publication indicated it was anticipated about 1977. Whatever position one might take on this subject, does the Prime Minister not think that is probably the most inhumane position one could take at this time, since there are eight people who have been convicted of capital murder?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it would be inhumane. However, it is not the government's intention to proceed in that way.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I would like a clear answer. Is it the Prime Minister's answer that, with the increase in crime as set out by the Chief Justice and himself over the weekend, the government proposes a postponement, not a commutation, of all capital murder sentences, leaving the whole matter in a vacuum and legal inhumanity?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not the government's intention. I remind the hon. member that what was being asked was a specific question about the postponement of the execution of one man, Mr. Vaillancourt. I was not asked a general question, nor did I indicate that legislation would take that into account in the determination of its date.

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps the Prime Minister could indicate to the House what the intentions of the government are with regard to legislation. Is it, for example, the intention to introduce legislation this fall? Could the Prime Minister be a little more precise as to what the government's intentions are?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I expect the Solicitor General will be making an announcement on these subjects in the fairly near future.

IMMIGRATION

REASON FOR DETENTION AND INTERROGATION OF DR. FAYEZ SAYEGH, AN ARABIAN DIPLOMAT

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It concerns the detention and interrogation at Toronto Airport of a most distinguished Arab scholar and statesman, Dr. Fayez Sayegh, who came to Canada last Sunday as guest of honour of the Canadian Arab Federation of which many Canadian citizens are members. Considering that this gentleman, as well as carrying his UN documents, was travelling on a diplomatic passport from the Government of Kuwait, will the minister investigate this regrettable discourtesy to a respected personage and a friendly state?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The facts, as stated, with regard to the inquiry in Toronto are generally correct. The gentleman in question admitted to membership in the Palestinian Liberal—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Liberal?

Mr. Andras: —Palestinian Liberation Organization. This, under Canadian law, makes him a member of a prohibited class. Consequently, he was told that he was a member of a prohibited class, but under the Nicholson doctrine which was stated in this House some years ago with regard to temporary entry, he was given a minister's permit for the express purpose of his visit to Toronto and for a limited time only.

Mr. Macquarrie: Is the minister indicating that all members of the PLO, whether they be priests, clergymen, pacifists, or what, are, in the view of the government, not admissible to this country?

Mr. Andras: The advice given by the Department of Justice is that the PLO is an organization, the members of which are prohibited entry except upon special permit.

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO PALESTINIAN LIBERATION ORGANIZATION MEMBERS ATTENDING CONFERENCE IN TORONTO

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, that is a most interesting answer. What does the hon. gentleman intend to do about the United Nations Congress on Crime which is to take place in Toronto in September and at which the PLO has the status of an official observer?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The action I described in response to the question by the hon. member for Hillsborough set out the policy in existence at present. That policy is being examined at this moment.

REASON FOR ALLOWING ENTRY OF LIEUTENANT-GENERAL DANG VAN QUANG FROM VIET NAM

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the same minister, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that a United States State Department official has been quoted as saying that Lieutenant-General Dang Van Quang, presently residing in a luxurious home in Montreal, has always been No. 1 on the list of venal personalities who must be gotten rid of if Viet Nam were to be saved, and in view of the fact that another high-ranking United States official stated that Quang was perhaps the epitome of everything that was wrong in South Viet Nam, can the Minister of Immigration explain just how this gangster was allowed to enter Canada and just how long it will take the department to eject him in the interest of maintaining at least a semblance of fair play in our Immigration Department?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): General Quang, his wife and three children are in Montreal; I cannot attest to whether or not they are in luxurious surroundings. The three children were admitted as visitors from April 19 to July 19, having been issued visitors visas in Saigon on April 15. The General was admitted on May 15 under a minister's permit, valid until May 13 of next year. He has applied to remain permanently. We will be examining that application. He applied under the refugee program, of which hon. members are aware. I do not think it would be appropriate for me to comment further until we have gathered all the information and attested to the validity or otherwise of the allegations, some of which the hon. member made. Our decision will be made at a later date.

● (1430)

Mr. Blackburn: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister to what extent RCMP and immigration officials investigated this man's background, the amount of money that he was going to bring into the country, how much he in fact brought in and so on? How many of these facts were assembled before the minister granted a permit to this man to enter?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, he came in as a refugee. He had proceeded from Fort Chaffee in the United States and entered the country, but he is under a minister's permit which does not make any permanent commitment by the government to his residence here. All of the information that the hon. member is suggesting be gathered is now being gathered by the agencies to which he referred.

AGRICULTURE

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION DOES NOT ENTER INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Would the minister tell the House what safeguards his department is taking or what investigation he is causing to be made to ensure that there is no interprovincial trade in meat designated unfit for human consumption?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have jurisdiction over all meat that is traded interprovincially. It is supposed to carry an inspection stamp; it is supposed to be inspected as fit for human consumption. Any meat used for pet food does not come under our jurisdiction.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister what steps he is taking to ensure that meat unfit for human consumption or meat that has not been inspected by his department is not getting into other provinces, in view of the revelations now taking place in Quebec?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, under the British North America Act we have authority to inspect plants within our jurisdiction. I have received a complete report which will take several minutes or even longer to read, but I should be glad to put something together or table it if that is what the hon. member wants.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO INCREASE FEDERAL INSPECTION OF MEAT IN QUEBEC

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the minister might agree to table the report, but in the meantime could he tell the House what initiatives he is taking with the government of Quebec to increase federal inspection jurisdiction in the province, in view of the fact that more than 85 per cent of all Ontario meat is now federally inspected?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have offered the same services to any province of Canada. We are prepared to offer co-operation and provide our inspection services, etc. I understand that some talks have taken place between federal and provincial officials concerning provision of this inspection service, but we cannot force upon them our inspection services.

GRAIN

WHEAT—GOVERNMENT POLICY ON COLLECTION OF OVER-PAYMENTS—REASON FOR ALLEGED DELAY IN SENDING REQUESTS FOR PAYMENT

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. In view of the fact that prior to the last election many over-payments were made to farmers under the two-price wheat special permits payment program, has it been the policy of the government since the election and is it still the policy to collect all these over-payments from the farmers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is. As soon as the computer error which allowed these over-payments was discovered, letters requesting repayment were issued and a very high percentage of the amounts have now been refunded; but action is continuing in relation to the balance.

Mr. Yewchuck: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister indicate whether any punitive action is contemplated or does the government intend to take to court farmers who are not in a financial position to repay these over-payments?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the usual collection procedures are in play, which means that if somebody intending to make a repayment wishes an arrangement over time, we will naturally take that into consideration, but not as a means of escaping payment. Legal action is instituted if a person refuses to make a payment.

Mr. Yewchuk: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the error was discovered approximately on June 21 and letters were written and dated at that time, can the minister say why they were not sent to the farmers until after the election was held?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, that is not accurate. Many farmers received letters before the election was held.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE IN INTEGRATING IMMIGRANT CHILDREN INTO CANADIAN SCHOOL SYSTEM

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. What assistance is the minister giving to aid school boards across the country to integrate immigrant children into the Canadian system and help ensure that racism will not be allowed to raise its ugly head in our Canadian cities?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the question of the education of children, whether immigrant or not, is primarily one of provincial jurisdiction and responsibility. However, in certain areas of the country there have been discussions with provincial authorities as to what assistance might be possible through the various range of federal programs, but no definite commitment to a program has been made as yet.

MULTICULTURALISM

DATE OF REPORT OF CANADIAN CONSULTATIVE COUNCIL—REQUEST FOR TABLING

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister in charge of multiculturalism. On March 3, 1975 the minister stated that the report by the Canadian Consultative Council on multiculturalism would be released in the near future. Would the minister indicate to the House when the report will be published and whether he intends to table it in the House?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the report is at the printers now. I am hoping it will be ready the latter part of June or mid-June and at that time I will be pleased to table it.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

POSSIBLE USE BY GOVERNMENT OF PRIVATE MAIL DELIVERY SERVICES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF COST

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. Would the minister say whether the government of Canada is utilizing private mail delivery services in this country and, if so, why and at what cost?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the services being used are in any way competitive with the postal service. I am sure that such is not the case, but I shall surely inquire into the matter and submit an answer to the hon. member.

[English]

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ALLEGED MISLEADING ADVERTISING BY POST OFFICE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I will direct to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that the Post Office is still in a shambles, would the minister say why he is not fulfilling his responsibilities to the Canadian people by preventing further misleading advertising that assures Canadians of next day delivery, which is not true and does not work?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has some direct complaint about publicity seen or heard by him yesterday, he could submit such a complaint to me and I shall be glad to study it. But, in my opinion, he has not witnessed such publicity in recent days.

[English]

Mr. Bawden: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister knows very well that the mail service in this country is not meeting the statements contained in advertising being presented right across Canada. I should like to know why the minister is not taking steps to do something about it, and why he has one set of rules for the government of Canada and another set of rules for business and other Canadians?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: For two reasons, Mr. Speaker. First, I fully trust the present Postmaster General, who will surely find a way to settle the conflict. Second, I have not witnessed such publicity in the past few days and I challenge the hon. member to submit to me such publicity if he has witnessed it recently.

IMMIGRATION

USE OF LAW ENFORCEMENT INTELLIGENCE UNIT—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday the Minister of Manpower and Immigration took as notice a question that I asked him in regard to allegations by some police forces in the United States of improper conduct on the part of the Law Enforcement Intelligence Unit, a police co-operative. Can the minister now report to the House?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have an annual membership in this particular group for which we pay $30. As the hon. member knows, our immigration policy is global in scope and we do subject people who are seeking permanent residence in Canada to character and background checks. We have been members of this organization but I am not familiar with its style of operation. It is rarely used and we are examining continuation of membership in it at the present time.

Mr. Beatty: A supplementary question. The question I asked the minister last week was whether or not he could assure the House that allegations made by some United States police forces of improper activity on the part of the LEIU were in fact incorrect. Secondly, may I ask the minister why his department feels it is necessary to belong to a police co-operative to gain information of possible criminal activities by individuals as opposed to relying on the policing ability of the RCMP to supply that information?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, we do not conduct surveillance in other countries, but we do rely on the exchange with friendly nations of information of a police nature. As for the particular organization to which the hon. member referred, I indicated that we are taking a look at it. I was not aware of these allegations until I heard them the other day. I am not even sure whether they are true. Our examination of the matter will involve checking the validity of the allegations or otherwise.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REASON FORCE DOES NOT BELONG TO LAW ENFORCEMENT INTELLIGENCE UNIT

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary question for the Solicitor General. If the services provided by the LEIU in terms of providing police information on individuals who might be involved in crimes is as important as appears to be the case as far as the Department of Manpower and Immigration is concerned, why does the RCMP not belong to the organization instead of relying upon the Department of Manpower and Immigration to supply information generated by the LEIU for the RCMP when that information originates with police forces across North America?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether this organization provides the information in the manner described by the hon. member, but the RCMP obtains its information with regard to criminal activities from police forces in other countries and not from private organizations.

Mr. Beatty: One of the officials said they did.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGED ILLEGAL DISBURSEMENT OF FUNDS BY CHAIRMAN OF CANADIAN LIVESTOCK FEED BOARD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, in Belleville the right hon. Prime Minister was reported as agreeing that Dr. Morgentaler was a fine humanitarian, and quoted as follows:

I have known him for 20 years. The point is that he deliberately broke the law. When a man deliberately does this he can't complain about being put in jail.

If this reporting is correct, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the same logic and justice should not apply to the minister responsible and the Chairman of the Canadian Livestock Feed Board who were examined under paragraph 38 of the Auditor General's report and found to have deliberately disbursed $822,000 from their funds after being advised they had no legal authority to do so?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I fail to see, first of all, that the Prime Minister could be expected to have that information at his fingertips and, even if he did, how he could give that information without expressing a legal opinion on a matter outside his jurisdiction.

ENERGY

OIL—PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL FLOOR PRICE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the International Energy Agency is meeting tomorrow and one of the items on the agenda for discussion is a floor price for world oil, could the Prime Minister indicate what position Canada is taking? Are we supporting the proposition that there should be an international floor price for oil established?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think we would like to see such a price established, but we are not very hopeful about the possibility. The minister at the meeting will be trying to respond to other governments' positions and come back to this government with a reference to see if we want to take any steps in Canada. I would just remind the hon. member that we have, of course, had an administered price in Canada now for a year and a half, and in that sense it is not contrary to government thinking to have a certain price for oil, but whether this is the kind of result we can get in Paris is something I cannot predict.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I would again ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether the minister in Paris is putting forward any specific figure as being the price that Canada thinks might be acceptable as the floor price for oil on the international market?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we have talked about figures in Cabinet but the minister will not put any binding commitment of the government to that meeting. He will explore the positions of other governments.

THE BUDGET

REASON FOR DELAY IN PRESENTATION

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance regarding the advice he is getting. In light of the fact that the financial and economic police program of the Department of Finance has a budget in excess of $16 million and employs almost 700 people, will the minister explain why his department cannot provide him with sufficient advice and data for an earlier budget, and why he has to wait for the GNP figures at the end of the month?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did not give as a reason for delaying the budget the fact of having to wait for GNP figures. I spelled out the reasons in full for the hon. member for York-Simcoe on Friday.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, could the minister explain why the budget is being delayed to that date, because this does not give the country much time to consider its implications, and does not give parliament very much time for a budget debate?

An hon. Member: You have all summer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My distinct impression is that the Minister of Finance just said he has already given an answer to the question as to why the budget will be coming down on June 23. If the hon. member has another supplementary question he might want to put it now.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON EFFECT OF INDUSTRIAL WAGES AND PRODUCTIVITY ON CANADA'S COMPETITIVE POSITION

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Finance now in a position to present some information for which I asked him regarding wage increases in certain industries and their effect on our competitive position and productivity? He said he would table that information at the appropriate time. In view of the delayed budget and the relatively short period of time there will be to examine it, it would be very useful if the minister could present that information at an early date. Has he collected this information in respect of industrial wages, productivity and how this affects our competitive position, and will he make it available immediately?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check my response to the hon. gentleman, as I do not think I gave him an undertaking to table that information. I will look at exactly what I did say. I think I said I would take his request under consideration, and I will still do that.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REASON FOR REMOVAL OF FINANCIAL SUPPORT TO RURAL DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I was not able to give the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion notice of this question. Recently the financial support which was given jointly by the provincial and federal governments to the Rural Development Council of Prince Edward Island was removed. Was this done with the prior knowledge of the minister or at his request?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I can say quite specifically that it certainly was not with any prior personal knowledge. Whether there were any discussions with any of my officials I am not sure. I received two wires and a letter today making representations in this regard. They were on my desk when I arrived. I have asked that there be a thorough examination to let me know what the background is.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SHIP REPAIR UNIT—REQUEST FOR EQUAL PAY FOR EMPLOYEES IN ATLANTIC REGION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board, or, in his absence, to the acting and I hope activated minister. It arises by reason of the fact that negotiations and conciliation proceedings have broken off between the board and the ship bargaining unit for Esquimalt and Halifax, as noted by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich last Thursday. Since the strike vote will be taken June 3, and since the price spread is $1.05 per hour, will the acting minister or the minister try to hold at least that line for Atlantic workers who are very restive in respect of equal pay? I might indicate that the conciliator, Mr. O'Connor, agrees with me.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, while the views of the conciliator are not binding, the views of Mr. O'Connor are always taken into account.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA FOR PROJECTS

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, with the publication of the December and January list of accepted DREE offers, a check of which indicates none from British Columbia, would the Minister of Regional and Economic Expansion indicate the state of negotiations with the provincial government toward enlarging the areas in that province that are to be designated?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered this question in part on a previous occasion. There are three or four areas of negotiation at the present time. One, as I recall, has to do with the infrastructure of Fort Nelson, and another has to do, not necessarily with a geographic designation but the designation of a particular industry or aspect of it, namely the forest industry in that part of the country. There are one or two others the government is putting forward, but I cannot give the hon. member a specific report on the status of these negotiations at the present time, other than that I have been told progress is being made.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, in view of the apparent non-acceptance of applications from that province, could the minister indicate whether, during the negotiations with British Columbia, more stringent criteria have been set for acceptance than for those agreements signed with other provinces?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot really give the hon. member an answer on that today because I do not know just how far the talks have progressed at the official level in terms of what the British Columbia government wishes to put into the agreement, but I will make inquiries and hopefully will be able to give a progress report within a short time.

NATIONAL PARKS

ST. LAWRENCE ISLANDS—REQUEST FOR CONFIRMATION OF EXPENDITURE ON EXPANSION AND IMPROVEMENT

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development arising from his most welcome illustration in an Ottawa address on Saturday night that the government has finally decided to accept certain representations from my constituency. I should like to ask the minister whether he is prepared to confirm to the House that $30 million will be spent on expanding and improving the St. Lawrence Islands National Park located primarily in the constituency of Leeds and partly in Kingston and the Islands.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SETTLEMENT OF LAND CLAIMS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—RELATIONSHIP TO DISCONTINUANCE OF OFFICES AND SERVICES

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and may I tell him that it has nothing to do with the picture of him that was published in the Prince George Citizen. In light of the minister's statement in the House of Commons on May 14 to the effect that that he is prepared to close and phase out the offices and services of his department in areas where native leaders and their people consider it in their interest to do so, can the minister inform the House how he is responding to demands from the Union of British Columbia Indian Chiefs for immediate action on the cutoff land question and land claims and their determination not to accept any further services from his department's offices in British Columbia?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, basically we have supported for some time now the position of the Indian people of British Columbia and, more particularly, the position of the Union of B.C. Chiefs vis-à-vis cut-off lands. We feel that so far as this matter is concerned the ball is in the court of the provincial government in Victoria.

Mr. Oberle: In light of that, is the minister prepared to phase out the many offices and costly services in British Columbia which the native people there consider to be the major hurdle standing in their way to settling their land claims and to self-determination in areas of cultural, social and economic development?

Mr. Buchanan: We are certainly prepared to discuss this aspect. I do not accept the suggestion that there is a high correlation between that and the settlement of either cut-off lands or the broader land claims question. I think these are two clearly separate items.

AIR TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF DIVISION OF TRAFFIC BETWEEN AIR CANADA AND CP AIR AND POSITION OF AIR CANADA IN NEW TRANSPORTATION POLICY

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. However, in his absence perhaps I may direct it to the acting minister or to the parliamentary secretary. Since it has been revealed by Professor Myron Gordon of the University of Toronto in the recent CTC hearings that Air Canada's operation is significantly less efficient than that of CP Air, in spite of the restrictions imposed upon CP Air's transportation policy, can the acting minister say if the government is giving any consideration to reviewing the existing national transcontinental policy which restricts the air capacity of CP Air to 25 per cent of the traffic, so that the beneficiaries in this case might be the passengers who might get a more equitable air fare structure?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, of course the minister may be considering this matter within the department, but to the best of my knowledge no change has been made or is contemplated with regard to the transcontinental policy. I have not seen the statements of the professor to whom the hon. member referred, but perhaps it is because the CP structure is less complex than that of Air Canada that he was able to reach the conclusion he did.

Mr. Mazankowski: In light of the fact that the evidence that has been documented by Professor Gordon cites a number of inefficiencies—evidence that has been well documented—and that, as he points out, there is no evidence that Air Canada is being saddled with uneconomic routes or low fares, can the minister advise the House whether this matter will be taken into consideration during the total review of the transportation policy, in this case the national air transportation policy?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that that is the case. Indeed, some such general discussions have already taken place at the cabinet committee level of one kind or another and in various official groups.

OLYMPIC GAMES

DISTRIBUTION OF TICKETS—SUGGESTED RE-EXAMINATION OF SYSTEM

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that the 1976 Olympics is an event of enormous national interest and importance, and in view of the fact that my constituents must travel 800 miles to Vancouver and back to place their orders and subsequently travel another 800 miles to pick up their tickets, will the minister assure the House that this asinine situation will be sensibly resolved, or are the people of Kootenay West second class citizens?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there are any more second class citizens in the hon. member's constituency than in others. If he wants to ask the question to my colleague the President of the Treasury Board or to the Postmaster General, I am sure one or the other will take it as notice and will see with the Olympics authorities what can be done to correct the deficiency mentioned by the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Brisco: My supplementary question is directed to the Postmaster General. Can he advise the House whether or not any re-examination is presently being conducted of the system, according to which citizens of Canada can obtain tickets to the Olympics in 1976 without driving some 400 to 800 miles, whatever the case may be? Right now the situation is completely ridiculous and out of hand.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am responsible for coins and stamps. Nevertheless, I will contact COJO today and try to get a more detailed explanation of precisely how people in that situation should obtain their tickets without suffering the inconvenience described by the hon. member.

CANADIAN WARPLANE HERITAGE ASSOCIATION

NEGOTIATIONS FOR PURCHASE OF HANGAR AT MOUNT HOPE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works and it concerns the Canadian Warplane Heritage Association. Is the department sincere in its desire to ask this benevolent association to purchase a very aged hangar at Mount Hope or to negotiate some other kind of deal?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, as to the sincerity of the department, I can only reiterate the general understanding. Whether one can negotiate a special deal for this particular group, I think really this is still an open question.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR MEETINGS WITH SASKATCHEWAN FEDERATION OF INDIANS ON LOCAL GOVERNMENT GUIDELINES

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Last Wednesday, in response to a question on guidelines by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys, the minister indicated he would arrange for consultation between senior officials from his office and the presidents and band chiefs in Nova Scotia. In view of the fact that the Saskatchewan Federation of Indians has expressed similar concern about the guidelines respecting local autonomy, will the minister give the same assurance to the native people of Saskatchewan and will he meet with the native leaders of that province?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that there have been offers of similar meetings made to the Indian people of Saskatchewan. At the most recent one, although they were reluctant to meet with the acting director in that province—this creates problems. But I understand that discussions have been going on with some of the people at the band level. Of course, personally I have met them on several occasions, not on the guidelines but on other matters, and I am always happy to meet with the representatives of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indians.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE BAND FUNDING NOT CONDITIONAL ON ACCEPTANCE OF LOCAL GOVERNMENT GUIDELINES

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Since the minister indicated previously that the guidelines are of an interim nature, will he assure the House that until such time as consultation has taken place there will be no interruption in band funding, and will he also assure the House that band funding during this period will not be conditional upon the acceptance of guidelines?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): We have indicated that the guidelines which have been proclaimed will be going into force, but we are prepared, prior to the beginning of the next fiscal year, to discuss them and alter them if that seems the prudent course. We have indicated they are in effect. As to the other ones which have not yet been put in place, we are prepared to hear representations on them before they come into effect.

PRIVILEGE

MR. STEVENS; MR. KAPLAN—PROCEDURE FOLLOWED IN STANDING COMMITTEE—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. On Friday, May 16, 1975, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) raised a question of privilege questioning the actions of hon. members in leaving one of the standing committees, and in turn questioning the action of the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs in allowing a minister to speak on the subject, during which time hon. members left the meeting, and thereafter refusing to put a question because of lack of quorum.

● (1500)

I indicated at the time of hearing the hon. member for York-Simcoe that my preliminary inclination was to re-emphasize that the Chair would not sit in appeal of decisions which have taken place in a standing committee. However, because of the raising of this very interesting point I undertook to re-examine the precedents. I have done so and I cannot find any ground which should cause me to change my mind or to recommend to the House a change in that practice.

I might say, secondly, that the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), who was at the time of the hon. member's complaint the chairman of that committee and still is, but who has declined to act for an interim period pending the resolution of these matters, on the following day raised a question of privilege which took exception to the language of the hon. member for York-Simcoe in describing the actions of the chairman as being part of an obstruction of the work of the committee.

In respect of the word "obstruction", several meanings have been ascribed to it. One does not have to examine the precedents. It is not an infrequent occurrence in this House that one side refers to the actions of the other side as being an obstruction of one kind or another, so much so that on one occasion where precedent does provide some assistance the use of the word "obstruction" in respect of an individual and specific member was found to be not out of order—and I cite page 419 of May's eighteenth edition.

There cannot be much doubt, however, that the role of a chairman is considerably different in some respects, and because of the special connotation where the work of a chairman of a standing committee is involved, and because of the acceptable principle of refraining from commenting on the actions of the chairman, it may well be that that particular term if examined carefully could be an impropriety in respect of a description of the actions of a chairman. The traditional means, of course, for examining that conduct would be, first of all, by appealing the ruling of the chairman or his conduct to the committee as a whole, by requesting that the committee make a report on the incident, or raise a debate on a motion of censure by any member. Perhaps fortunately for the Chair, I do not feel a case has been put which causes me to decide that, because when the hon. member for York Centre raised that complaint originally, he sought at the conclusion of his alleged point of privilege a remedy when he said as follows:

> That the question of my chairmanship ruling as to a quorum in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, as referred to by the hon. member for York-Simcoe in Hansard on May 20, 1975, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

In other words, the remedy sought by the hon. member for York Centre in raising his question of privilege initially was that his decision or handling of the matter be reviewed by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections—not the allegation of an hon. member in the committee. It may seem a technical point, but I hope it is not taken that way. The fact of the matter is that it seems to me the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for York-Simcoe is invalid from a procedural point of view because, once again, it relates to proceedings in a standing committee.

The subsequent question of privilege raised by the hon. member for York Centre is equally invalid because although the problem may have had some validity—I will not decide that at the moment—it seems to me that a different remedy ought to apply than to the question raised by the hon. member for York-Simcoe. In that case, both hon. members made subsequent representations in the House and it would appear that both recognized the inherent difficulty in his own case and endeavoured to remedy it with a subsequent representation each in his own way: the hon. member for York-Simcoe by endeavouring the following day to accomplish by consent that which in my opinion could not be accomplished by his original point; and the hon. member for York Centre, on Friday, by seeking to attach to his original complaint the remedy which might have been more appropriate to it in the first instance.

In any case, I can only reiterate—I think I ought to observe this in setting aside both alleged questions of privilege—that by permitting the hon. member for York-Simcoe to proceed, as I have on several occasions already in this session, by permitting a member to go on initially with an alleged question of privilege concerning events in a standing committee, we are only inviting difficulty. It is a well established practice of this House—and one which recommends itself, upon reflection—that events which take place in a standing committee cannot only be questioned there in the manner in which I have cited, but also in other ways, and that this Chair ought not to sit as a court of appeal in respect of the proceedings in standing committees.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I therefore simply indicate that, this difficulty having arisen on both sides by first permitting the hon. member for York-Simcoe to establish this question of non-privilege and to speak for some time provoked responses from the other side, and in fairness it seemed to be desirable that in that situation the Chair should allow equal comment from both sides notwithstanding the fact that the Chair is firmly of the opinion that no question of privilege exists.

Accordingly, it seems to be the proper course in the future to insist that when questions of privilege are to be raised concerning events in standing committees, the notice must contain some singular feature which takes it out of the general area of the proceedings in standing committees, otherwise the Chair ought not to allow the member to raise his question in the House at all.

Finally, I will make two other observations. First, both members at one time or another suggested that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections ought to have these questions referred to it, which to me would seem to establish a precedent and initiate or encourage a practice whereby the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections would become some kind of court of appeal on the proceedings of other standing committees. It seems to me that nothing could be more unacceptable as a practice and should be more directly discouraged.

I will conclude simply by saying that if either hon. member feels that the grievance he has put forward, and which I feel compelled to set aside is still of sufficient strength that it ought to be dealt with further, the remedy of a substantive motion of censure by either member still remains, although it certainly seems to the Chair at this moment that the matter has had a pretty full airing.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order because the Minister of Agriculture is about to leave the House and during the course of the question period he agreed to table certain documents with regard to the question I directed to him. I rise now to alert the minister to the fact that he will have an opportunity on the next order, or after that when tabling of documents is called, and I hope he will table these documents.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I did not say when I would table them. I will put them in proper order and proper perspective. Some of them are in the form of notes. I will put them in proper form and I hope to table them tomorrow.

MARITIME CODE ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE A MARITIME CODE FOR CANADA

Hon. Otto E. Lang (for the Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-61, to provide a maritime code for Canada, to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential or related provisions.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 1,227, 1,832, 1,921, 1,987, 2,080, 2,092, 2,119, 2,176, 2,226, 2,235, 2,236, 2,260, 2,263, 2,272 and 2,283.

Mr. Speaker, if question No. 1,162 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call starred question No. 2,443?

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

PRIME MINISTER'S CADILLAC

Question No. 1,227—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the purchase from public funds of a second armoured Cadillac automobile for the Prime Minister and to the Prime Minister's subsequent statement that the purchase was made at RCMP insistance (a) what are the names and positions of any and all members of the RCMP who played any part whatsoever in such insistance (b) on what date and by whom in the RCMP was the final decision made to insist on such a purchase (c) on what date and by whom was such insistance conveyed to the Prime Minister (d) what part, if any, did the Solicitor General have in this entire process (e) on what date and by whom were instructions given to the Department of Supply and Services to proceed with the purchase of the car?

2. If the RCMP did not insist on such a purchase, for what reason did the Prime Minister state otherwise?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Ministry of the Solicitor General

(Royal Canadian Mounted Police) and the Prime Minister's and Privy Council offices as follows: The purchase of the 1974 vehicle was part of the original plan to have one vehicle for the protection of the Prime Minister and the second to be available for backup purposes when the first car is being serviced or repaired, and also for security of V.I.P.'s during state visits. When he was made aware of the plan, the Prime Minister insisted that the second vehicle not be bought until the matter be reconsidered by the R.C.M.P. and a written recommendation be made by the R.C.M.P. Such a recommendation was made by memorandum referred to below. In this light, the word "insistance" has been interpreted to mean "strong recommendation", and part 1 of the question has been answered in this vein. 1. (a) It is contrary to constitutional principles to identify individual public servants in matters of this kind. There were five officers of the R.C.M.P., involving the then commissioner, involved. (b) Following financial approval by Treasury Board, the then commissioner approved the purchase on May 4, 1974. (c) Privy Council was advised by the Director of Protective Policing in a memorandum dated November 7, 1973. (d) The Royal Canadian Mounted Police's recommendation to approve in principle the purchase of a second armoured limousine to provide security to the Prime Minister and visiting heads of state was approved by the Solicitor General and submitted to Treasury Board for financial approval on March 8, 1973. (e) The officer in charge, Material Management Branch, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, advised the Department of Supply and Services by memorandum dated July 23, 1973.

2. See reply to part 1.

APPOINTMENT OF CHARLES GUAGLIANO

Question No. 1,921—Mr. Cossitt:

1. On what date was Mr. Charles Guagliano of Hamilton, Ontario appointed to the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Committee and what were all his qualifications for this position?

2. Was the appointment announced in a press release dated April 27, 1972 by the Minister of National Health and Welfare at the time?

3. What fees and expense allowances are paid to members of the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Committee?

4. (a) Was Mr. Guagliano's term of office to expire in October 1975 (b) did he resign on or about December 19, 1974 and, if so (i) was his resignation requested (ii) by whom (iii) for what reason (c) what were the reasons for his resignation?

5. Is the government aware of any charges against Mr. Guagliano under the Criminal Code of Canada, and, if so (a) what are such charges (b) on what date were they laid?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Mr. Charles Guagliano of Hamilton, Ontario was appointed to the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Committee on April 13, 1972. The Canada Pension Plan statute directs that the advisory committee is to be composed of members who represent "employees, employers, self-employed persons and the public". Mr. Guagliano's long-standing association with the Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners was regarded as appropriate background for him to speak as an "employees" representative.

2. Yes.

3. A member of the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Committee is entitled to a per diem allowance of $100 a day for each day that he attends a committee meeting, and is also entitled to be re-imbursed for the reasonable travelling and living expenses incurred in the course of committee duties.

4. (a) Yes. (b) Yes. (i) Mr. Guagliano resigned on his own initiative. (ii) Not applicable. (iii) Not applicable. (c) No reasons were given.

CONTRACTOR OF COMPUTER SPARES

Question No. 1,987—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Was a contract awarded April 2, 1974 for a quantity of spare parts from Litton Systems Ltd., Rexdale, Ontario for a total dollar amount of $595,154?

2. On which department's behalf was the contract awarded?

3. For what computer system are the spare parts used?

4. How old is the computer system?

5. What is the expected length of time the computer is to be used in terms of years?

6. Have any of the spare parts been used?

7. Is it the policy of departments such as the Department of Supply and Services to always have spare parts in inventory for their computer systems?

8. Would it be more economically sound to order parts when their necessity is visible?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Supply and Services and National Defence as follows: 1. Yes, however the contract was dated March 8, 1974; the news release of the award of contract was dated April 2, 1974.

2. Department of National Defence.

3. AN/USQ 501 (v) installed on DND ships.

[Mr. Andras.]

4. The first system was installed aboard a ship in 1972.

5. Approximately 20 to 25 years.

6. Yes.

7. The Department of Supply and Services does not stock spare parts in its inventory to support computer system bought on behalf of other departments and agencies. It is the policy of the Department of National Defence to acquire some spare parts to ensure the operation of its equipment.

8. Not in some cases. The computer is essential to the operation of the ship and the ordering of some essential parts only after a failure had occurred could seriously affect operational ability.

OLYMPICS 1976

Question No. 2,080—Mr. Saltsman:

1. In regard to the apparent lack of enthusiasm for athletic training for the Olympics, is the government prepared to make a full commitment to assist in preparing Canadians for participation in the Olympics?

2. Will there be a statement from the Prime Minister pledging full Cabinet and government support of our Olympic athletes?

3. Will there be funding for a programme of information and publicity designed to make Canadians more aware of the accomplishments of their Olympic and international athletes?

4. Will there be (a) part-time jobs for athletes near their training sites to help them defray their expenses (b) permission for time away from their jobs to get the competition necessary to ensure peak performance at the Olympics (c) increased financial contributions to the Canadian Olympic Association's olympic trust?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Prime Minister's and Privy Council Offices follows: 1. As of March 19, 1973, the federal government committed itself to providing special assistance to national sport bodies who would be participating in the Winter and Summer Olympic Games in 1976. A unique partnership between the federal government, certain provincial governments, the Canadian Olympic Association and the Olympic Trust was formed in order to coordinate the public and private sector financing and planning for our international teams. This unique partnership is called the Game Plan Programme. In the first year of operation (1973-74) it spent $1.1 million, in 1974-75 it spent $1.8 million and is planning to spend close to $2.8 million in 1975-76. All of these funds are supplemental to the ongoing sport programmes these agencies support. The game plan support includes funds for national and international competitions, training camps, national coaches and other support staff, talent identification programmes, planning meetings, individual athlete support and many other items.

2. There in none anticipated.

3. At the meeting held on March 13 and 14, 1975, the sports coordinating committee of game plan approved a promotional programme with a budget of up to $100,000 per year as part of the Game Plan Programme. This promotion programme is being implemented co-operatively by the parties in game plan. The following information activities were proposed for 1975-76 in order to create a greater public awareness and knowledge of game plan athletes and their accomplishments: periodic release to news media of Game Plan Programme and activity news; publication of athlete ratings; series of wire-story features on game plan athletes; publication of feature articles on game plan programmes and athletes; newsletters; brochures; COA luncheons; audio-visual materials; media athlete promotion; events promotion and coverage of pre-Olympic events, Pan-American Games, 1976 Winter Olympics, others, photographic distribution; coverage of eight Canadian national teams in Cuba.

4. The primary responsibility for finding part-time jobs for Olympic or other athletes remains in the first instance with the individuals themselves, their national sport bodies and the organizers of the national team programme in the local community. However, the federal government does assist by writing to employers on behalf of the athletes. In addition, the Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch has approached other federal agencies to request assistance in finding work or in releasing its employees to participate as athletes. In 1975-76, the Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch will provide close to $500,000 of athletic scholarships to approximately 300 athletes who are the game plan classified athletes, and who will represent Canada in the Winter and Summer Olympic Games. In addition to this, approximately $300,000 will be provided by the federal government and the other partners of game plan to defray individual training competition and salary expenses incurred by the athletes. Support to individuals represents approximately one-third of the Game Plan Programme. A small percentage of the proceeds of coins sold in Canada is being diverted to COA-Olympic Trust for supporting some of the activities mentioned above.

UIC—AMOUNT OF OVERPAYMENTS, 1972-74

Order Paper Questions

STUDIES ON 1968 FEDERAL GENERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN

Question No. 2,119—Mr. Coates:

1. Since 1968, how much money has been allocated by the government to the Canada Council in the form of social science grants?

2. Of this amount, what was the total allocated to study the 1968 general election campaign?

3. (a) How many studies are being conducted on the 1968 general election campaign (b) how many have been completed (i) by whom (ii) at what cost for each (c) how many have not been completed (i) by whom are they being conducted (ii) to date, what is the cost of each (iii) on what date are they expected to be completed?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canada Council as follows: 1. From 1968-69 to 1973-74, the Canada Council has received $163,455,000 in unconditional grants from the parliament of Canada. Of this amount, $24,221,000 have been awarded as research grants in the humanities and social sciences. (No separate statistics exist for the social sciences as distinct from the humanities).

2. No part of this amount was allocated to the study of the 1968 federal general election campaign.

NOTE: A sum of $397,556 has been granted since 1968 to Mr. John Meisel under the Canada Council's Killam program to study the role of parties and elections in the Canadian political system. The Killam awards are not funded out of government money, but out of a special trust fund established by the late Mrs. Dorothy J. Killam and administered by the Canada Council.

3. The Canada Council is not in a position to answer this question.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS—COMPLAINTS OF REFUSAL TO SUPPLY

Question No. 2,176—Mr. Saltsman:

1. How many complaints of refusal to deal have been made to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs since the Department was formed?

2. What is the breakdown of such complaints by year of receipt?

3. How many such complaints were examined in detail by the Department including obtaining explanations from the party against whom the complaint was made?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The information requested is not readily available in the format requested. However, for the six months period June through November, 1974 the answers are as follows: 1 and 2. Twenty-three complaints deal with refusal to supply.

[Mr. Andras.]

3. Ten of the complaints were examined in detail by the department and in four of these, explanations were obtained from the parties against whom the complaints were made.

REVIEW OF DRUG SUBMISSIONS

Question No. 2,226—Mr. Herbert:

1. Does the Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare always adhere to the 120 day schedule for the review of drug submissions and, if not, for what reason?

2. How many submissions have had the reviews delayed in the past year?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare has not always been able to adhere to the 120 day time limit for the review of drug submissions. The delay in responding is due to the increasing number of submissions received, the increased volume of data with each submission and the increasing complexity of the information contained in the submissions.

2. From April 1, 1974 to March 31, 1975, there were 485 New Drug Submissions and Supplemental New Drug Submissions on drugs for human use reviewed. Of these, 126 or 26.0 per cent exceeded the 120 day limit. While there is no statutory time limit for Investigational New Drug Submissions, a total of 342 on drugs for human use were evaluated during the same fiscal year. Of these, 63 or 18.4 per cent exceeded 120 days for a response. With regard to drugs for veterinary use, 186 New Drug Submissions and Supplemental New Drug Submissions were reviewed during the same fiscal year. Of these, 59 or 31.7 per cent exceeded the 120 day limit. While again there is no statutory time limit for Investigational New Drug Submissions of drugs for veterinary use, a total of 21 were received. Of these, four or 19.0 per cent exceeded 120 days for a response.

PUBLIC SERVICE—HIRING CRITERIA

Question No. 2,283—Mr. Lachance:

In the light of judicial decisions concerning hiring criteria in the Public Service, is there a research division in the PSC responsible for the submission of changes required in the Public Service Staff Relations Act?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: The Planning and Evaluation Directorate of the Commission's Staffing Branch has two divisions concerned with the matters raised: (1) The Personnel Psychology Division which is responsible for the development, modification and maintenance of all Selection Standards. (2) The Policies and Procedures Division which is responsible both for recommending new or revised policies and procedures and for responding to judicial decisions which may affect the Regulations or the Public Service Employment Act.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

*STORAGE OF BUTTER

Question No. 2,443—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

1. Of the 49,215,000 pounds of butter in storage as of September 1, 1974, how much was produced in Canada?

2. Was any of this imported and, if so (a) for what reason was the government participating in a programme of importing butter (b) was this in excess of our needs (c) what effect did this have on the income of Canadian farmers?

3. How long can butter remain in storage and still be fit for human consumption?

4. What are the plans for eventual disposal of the butter now in storage?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the answer is as follows: 1. 42,715,000 pounds.

2. (a) Yes. Butter production in Canada was not sufficient to meet the demand. (b) No. Butter was imported only in quantities sufficient to meet the difference between domestic production and consumption. (c) None, for the reasons outlined under (a) and (b).

3. Butter stored in Cold Storage Warehouses remains fit for human consumption indefinitely.

4. Current stocks are being sold to meet domestic market requirements.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

LOANS TO COUNTRIES, 1965-1973

Question No. 1,162—Mr. Gauthier (Roberval):

1. For the years 1965 to 1973 inclusive, has Canada granted loans to some countries and, if so (a) to which countries (b) what was the value of such loans (c) what was the term (d) what was the prescribed interest rate?

2. What percentage of such loans come from (a) new estimates (b) the Consolidated Revenue Fund?

Return tabled.

● (1510)

Mr. McKenzie: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On April 29 I placed two starred questions on the order paper, Nos. 2,407 and 2,408, regarding a question raised by the hon. member for Calgary South about the federal government hiring private mail contractors. The government has had over four weeks to file answers to these questions. I know that Statistics Canada hires private mail contractors in Manitoba, but I want to know how many other provinces are hiring private mail contractors. It is no secret that Batterton's Mail Service handles mail for the House of Commons, and I have a question in regard to that, No. 2,411.

I also have starred question No. 2,448 regarding the new rules and regulations covering bilingual packaging and the requirements under the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act. The business community has been waiting for several months for these rules and regulations, and all we have had from the minister so far is a press release. Packaging establishments across Canada are concerned about labelling. We would appreciate an answer as soon as possible.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I signed the answer to the question today, and I expect the hon. member will have it by Wednesday.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

INCOME TAX ACT

REMOVAL OF PROVISION ALLOWING DEDUCTION OF EXPENSES FOR ADVERTISING IN NON-CANADIAN PERIODICALS

The House resumed, from Tuesday, May 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-58, to amend the Income Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be taking part in this debate, for a number of reasons. One is that despite what certain newspapermen say, I have very high regard for the minister who is sponsoring the bill. That is not just because a while ago he graciously received from me a Kronberg T-shirt to mark the wonderful concert that is coming to Ottawa tomorrow, but because I think he is a well intentioned, thoughtful and, in the good sense of the word with a small "l", liberal person.

I am also pleased to be involved because I have always been a very ardent nationalist. My party, the oldest in Canada, in my opinion has always been at its best when espousing and acting upon nationalist causes. My great heroes in Canadian history are the great nationalists—people like Sir John A. Macdonald, who insisted that we be not a colony but a country; Sir Robert Borden, who insisted that we not only move on to the international scene as a full-fledged nation but that we take our responsibilities fully and proudly in the world community. He was unlike those who wanted to isolate themselves from the world and from other international organizations. He was the man who in 1916 thought that governors general of this country should be Canadian citizens. He was thought to be hopelessly ahead of his time, yet it has certainly been the case that the finest and greatest incumbents of that office have been men born in this country.

I think we are looking at ways to expand our Canadianism and buttress our nationalism in a very important aspect of life, namely, in publications, in the media. The communication of ideas and thoughts, of course, is the essence of any civilized society or co-ordinated community. I have always been disposed toward those organizations which help extend Canada's intellectual independence. Even with its thousands of faults, I like the CBC and when I am outside the country I miss it. I can even live with its great Toronto empire and all the emperors and praetorian guard that it has built into its headquarters. They are probably better paid than even Roman emperors paid their praetorian guards.

I think we have done more great things in this country through such organizations as the Canada council which has allowed Canadians of talent and ideas to be heard more clearly and read more widely by their fellow citizens. I might even say—despite my youthful appearance—that I remember such bodies as the humanities research council and the social science research council which did great things before the Canada Council began to pick up that major responsibility and important challenge.

This has always been a problem in Canada. It is as trite as it is truthful to say that Canada has been troubled about its identity. In problems social, in problems economic we obviously, because of our location, have had to be preoccupied with the assertion of our economic individuality, our political integrity and our cultural identity. Sometimes in the past it has been a grim, crude struggle for survival; in the later stages it has been a push for identity. In crude geo-political terms, I suppose we would not want to admit that at times our country existed at the sufferance of the United States. That phase, barring a nuclear conflict, which of course would make all those considerations academic or non-existent, is now past.

I think we have reached the stage where we need no longer worry about the bare fact of our cultural survival. We are here. The Dominion of Canada is. Canadians are. At this time, in 1975, we can assess our cultural and spiritual values with more realism, less frenzy, more careful thought and less blowing of uncertain trumpets.

The question of what to do about or with Time and Reader's Digest is not new. It was very much in the public domain before I entered this chamber 18 years ago. We have had many briefs, investigations in depth and at length, numerous recommendations, as well as abortive efforts to legislate curative measures.

I know it has been said that Bill C-58 is really not a Time and Reader's Digest bill. I suppose, strictly speaking, we must accept that. The major thrust of my remarks will deal with a publication which is neither Time nor Reader's Digest but which is gravely affected by this bill. In the public mind, however, this bill is about Time and Reader's Digest. Each of us knows, of course, that if it were not for those two compendia of the printed word in Canada, there would be no Bill C-58 before the House of Commons.

I think in the main the debate has been a serious and helpful discussion of a complex and difficult matter. It is difficult because it requires us to do more than look at the formal phrasing of the statute and, heaven knows, I cannot think of anything less interesting than legal language, if I may call it that.

● (1520)

Before we consider the clauses of the Bill we must assess and evaluate the social goals for the advance of which this bill is a mere vehicle. Debate on this measure has attained the level of the philosophical, as is proper. Recalling the adage that all comparisons are odious, I shall be careful in selecting my words. I read the minister's speech carefully. It contains thoughtful utterances and evidence of positive thinking. Some of its aspects disturb me, although his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford), disturbed me even more when making his statement several months ago.

The chief spokesman for my party, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), set the tone of this debate at a high level and rendered the proper discussion of this matter a great service. I also salute the valuable contribution made by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart). He and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) merit the commendation of the House for speaking on this measure with such forthrightness and independence of thought. By saying that, I am not exuding the mean satisfaction of an opposition member because backbenchers on the government side or private members, to use the proper expression, have differed with the government. That they have differed I do not consider significant. I note that the newspapers paid them some attention, more for reasons of their deviation from the government line than for the forthrightness of their remarks and the value of their opinions.

All this underlines something serious. In this country, in this House, we are inclined to overvalue party solidarity and undervalue individual assessment, especially of measures such as the one now before the House. We must remember that neither the House of Commons nor the illustrious Senate run the country. The government runs the country. The members of the House of Commons must try to reflect the aspirations of the people they represent, and it is difficult to reflect those aspirations if on every issue they must indulge in partyism and uphold the party point of view. I have said many things for many years to which nobody listens.

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Macquarrie: We take too many votes in this House. Too many times do we stand up and vote, even though the results of the vote are a foregone conclusion. Far too often we consider an issue on party lines. I am convinced that if in a large room a lot of people are ostensibly thinking the same thing, you have a great many people who are not thinking at all. I suggest that we could improve our system if we looked on votes of confidence as rare occasions indeed and voted mush less frequently than we now do.

A good many years ago—I do not want to sound like a patriarch—we could appeal the Speaker's rulings. I remember when the deputy chairman of the committee of the whole made a ruling. One of my colleagues from my class—he is not here now—thought Mr. Rea was right and, in the appeal, wanted to support him. He was soon told that that kind of nonsense had best be forgotten because the party was appealing Mr. Rea's ruling. In other words, a matter of procedure became a matter of party policy. No one can tell me that makes for good legislation, good representation or good parliamentary performance.

Partyism, surely, has no place in the consideration of this measure, although I recognize that partyism is an integral part of parliamentary democracy. In looking at this bill we should ask: Is this the best method or even a good method for improving the nationalistic content of our intellectual lives? Is this the best way of obtaining certain goals we have in mind? To be simplistic, is it likely to advance a healthier Canadianism in the realm of publications? Or, as we must ask ourselves, is it likely to be an exercise in tokenism? Is this a measure which will make our nationalistic flags wave? Is it another exercise in Canadian nationalism, and is that of itself demonstrably a good thing? That gives rise to another question which one is reluctant to ask: Does it involve, perhaps ever so slightly, a slight case of anti-Americanism? One of the great luminaries of the University of Toronto, Professor Underhill—if as a McGill man I might mention that institution—used to say that Canadianism is often largely anti-Americanism. Perhaps we had best stop to think and reflect on that.

I said earlier that the part of the measure which troubles me most is that part to do with Canadian content. The minister told my colleague for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) that Canadian content has nothing to do with this bill. I see that he shakes his head affirmatively. I would love to be convinced by him but I am not, because I have treasured, cherished and held to my bosom the statements made by the Minister of National Revenue who talked about Canadian publications being 80 per cent different from the publications of United States parents. I foresee a difficult exercise in measurement. What kind of litmus paper will you use to measure that 80 per cent difference? Will the standard be eight maple leaves on every ten pages? I would be a bit leery about the imaginative conceptualism of our Canadian bureaucracy. I am told of one branch saying to a person 88½ years old that if he came back in 33½ years he could collect his old age pension. That was a bit ridiculous, but a bit less fatuous than measuring something as tenuous as an 80 per cent difference from a U.S. parent publication.

That little problem worries me. The present Minister of National Revenue may not be here forever, and when he is gone the difficulties might become even more horrendous—and they are pretty bad now. How do you measure Canadian content? How do you evaluate it? I have always been deeply troubled by the Canadian content provision. I do not know that Canada is made the stronger if someone rules that I ought to hear Gordon Sinclair on television instead of Alistair Cooke. I think we would do well to listen to Mr. Cooke. Since I am not a negative man, I will not dwell on the other aspect of the question. This is what the measure involves, although I know the bill does not say so. Remember, acts of parliament are passed to affect people.

I still think we must consider the question of freedom of choice. When I go to certain totalitarian countries, to their reading rooms or their railway stations or airports and read nothing but the party line, I long for the opportunity to go to a bookstore and pick up anything I like. I probably would glance through it and then put it down without buying it, being a Scot. However, I have noticed on my few occasions of travelling on aircraft that if you want to get Time magazine, you have to sit pretty close to where the stewardess starts delivering the magazines because that is the first one to go. This seems to indicate people like that magazine. I am going back to the days when Air Canada was very affluent and even gave you a magazine to read and newspapers to peruse.

I know that the people of Canada like Reader's Digest. I have had some of the most thoughtful letters from my constituents and other Canadians about Reader's Digest. I do not think it solves the story to say that it was a brilliant promotion job by Mr. Zimmerman. The letters I received indicated people had thought a good deal about this. One person wrote and said it is the only thing that is good bedtime reading. Some people have insomnia; they have the cares of the world on their shoulders and cannot get to sleep quickly. Sometimes they make the mistake of picking up a mystery and then cannot get to sleep. That is how I began reading Agatha Christie. This person who wrote to me said you can read one article in the Reader's Digest and not only remember it in the morning but go to sleep untroubled. People have a perfect right to like Reader's Digest. The same is true of Time magazine.

Another aspect is that this bill may injure publications that are of real value to Canadians. I am going to refer without hesitation or reservation to what I consider the finest newspaper in the world, the Christian Science Monitor. It has the finest international section. I am sure the Minister of Communications (Mr. Pelletier), a great newspaper man, will agree with me on this. It has topnotch articles. It has a most enlightened, highly trained cadre of journalists and reporters. It does not advertise tobacco, which is proper. It does not advertise alcohol, for which I will forgive it. In fact, it does not advertise anything it does not think is suitable and proper for the buying public.

It is noted the world over for the depth of its perception and the objectivity of its coverage. While the Christian Science movement is a very important portion of the Christian church, it does not use its newspaper to propagate its particular religious teachings. There is but one small section in each issue. They go from language to language through the issues dealing with Christian science. Under present circumstances, that paper is sold in Canada with a subsidy from the Christian Science Society. They put in about $76 a year for a paper which sells in Canada for $40 per year. Therefore, there is $36 subsidy per newspaper from the Christian Science publishing house.

Since 1966 the Christian Science Monitor has enjoyed exemption from the provisions of subsection 19(1) of the Income Tax Act by virtue of a ruling from the Department of National Revenue to the effect that it qualified for exemption under subsection 19(4). However, as we all know, subsection 19(4) is being repealed under Bill C-58. Nothing is put in its place. The exemption which was granted the Christian Science Monitor will therefore disappear. I believe that any government which cared for the enlightenment and edification of its citizens would take no step to make it difficult for the Christian Science Monitor to be read by Canadians, but would take steps which would make it easier for that splendid journal of thought and opinion to be read by the people of this country. Therefore, that aspect disturbs me.

I find a great deal of difficulty in being totally condemnatory of this bill or taking the opposite point of view. We are often faced with that in this House. One occasion is when you are presented with an omnibus bill, three items of which you think are great, two of which you do not agree with and four of which you are opposed to—and you can do nothing but vote for the whole thing. That is a real distortion of the logical process.

I think the goal is a good one. I am not suspicious of this minister's intentions. I am not sure that we have yet achieved the right conceptualization. I am always a little bit worried about something that looks like a maple leaf curtain over the forty-ninth parallel.

We maritimers are a bit leery about tariffs on economic goods because we began to get it in the neck when we were told over 100 years ago that we had to erect tariff walls to protect the infant industries of Ontario. Some of those industries have died of old age but the tariff walls are still there and we are still suffering from them.

I am a little troubled about some of the negative approaches. There is a little too much reliance on the tariff syndrome. I would also say, as was mentioned a few days ago, that part of the trouble started for our publications when the Hon. Eric Kierans was postmaster general. I may be pardoned for saying "I told you so" at the time of the severe increase in postal rates for publications. Church publications and many others have suffered from that unjust and unnecessary imposition.

My colleague, the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston), referred to Time magazine the other day and its performance in the 1963 election. I thought it was Newsweek which had done its worst on that one, but I would not say that Time magazine was alone in presenting distorted views on what goes on in the Canadian political scene. There are Canadian magazines and newspapers whose reporters and editors might just as easily be stationed in Lhasa or Ulan Bator as far as really stating what goes on. This is especially true around election time.

Mr. Woolliams: Name some.

Mr. Macquarrie: If I had more time I would name a great many at the invitation of my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). I could give quite a compendium. But I have been known in this House for never exhausting all my time. I will not say what I may do to my auditors, but I have never exhausted all my time. I want to keep up that tradition, if I maintain nothing else of a virtuous type here in parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: I might say on this measure that the best and most sincere recommendation I can give the minister is that he take the bill under further scrutiny. It is obvious that members of his own caucus are giving a great deal of thought to the matter. They are coming up with some very excellent suggestions. The minister has been given some very good advice by members of my party, particularly the chief spokesman, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal.

● (1540)

I have gone over some of the points which have been raised. The suggestion that the government make greater advertising use of our own periodicals is, I think, a splendid one. I was a little surprised to hear Reader's Digest criticized for sending its articles to be translated into

French outside Canada. If there are translation facilities available in Canada, I think they should be used, but I have listened a thousand times to spokesmen for the government saying that royal commission reports, for instance, could not be tabled because the translation was not ready. Both official languages enjoy equality in this House: this has been the position since 1867, though many people believe it only came about much more recently. Mr. Speaker, if we have all these translators available for use by Reader's Digest, I suggest the government should be employing them.

Finally, to the minister I would say this. Give the matter a little more thought; Think carefully about what has been recommended to you, especially by the hon. member for Cochrane, on the matter of guidelines. Have a serious talk with the Minister of National Revenue before we get into this 80 per cent question.

Mr. Basford: How about 70 per cent?

Mr. Macquarrie: The hon. gentleman thinks the figure is important. I think that what one is measuring is more important than the percentage. The minister is confirming what an old don used to say, that certain students had the capacity for majoring in minors. It is not the figure; it is a matter of goals and directions. I am not usually a man who suggests we slow down legislation, but on this occasion, to use a turn of phrase familiar to Prince Edward Islanders, I think we would be advised to put her back in dry dock for a while and take another look at the ship before launching her again.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising now is not to reply to the distinguished professor from Prince Edward Island who has just so knowingly spoken. But before making my own remarks on the matter before us, I would like nonetheless to reassure the hon. member who preceded me on some questions he wondered about.

First I must say that I was personally reassured by his speech. I was reluctant to take part in the debate, since departmental business kept me away from the House last week when the matter was debated. But I think the speaker who preceded me was also absent because he raised questions that had been solved even before he mentioned them or spoke.

For instance, I do not understand how he can still talk about this matter of the Canadian content when I read in the speech the minister made when he introduced the bill in the House the following remarks, quote:

> Contrary to the view expressed in a recent editorial in one of our leading financial journals . . .

And I should say contrary to the view expressed by our hon. colleague opposite—

> . . . a periodical, to be counted for tax purposes as a Canadian publication, does not have to have a certain minimum percentage of Canadian content. It should be understood by everyone that to be "not substantially the same" as a periodical printed, edited or published outside Canada does not mean that a magazine's contents have to be Canadian in whole or in part. They simply have to be such as to make that magazine, for the most part, different from a foreign counterpart.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

I suggest that these very words should have calmed in advance the worries the hon. member has just expressed on he issue of the Canadian content.

Secondly, I should like to reassure him about the possible voting along party line by hon. members. I would like to tell my hon. friend that he will not be able to level this charge at me. As a matter of fact, I was a newsman when this problem occurred for the first time, 12 or 13 years ago. I belonged to the occupation under discussion today and I have unequivocally expressed my objections against the exceptions made in favour of Time and Reader's Digest, which are incidentally two of the richest publications in the whole world; they are loaded with money and they do not need Canadian charity to pursue their careers.

Finally, I would like to reassure the hon. member about the unsolved questions he has just mentioned and which led him to advise the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) to put his bill in dry dock. I think this question has been in dry dock for too long. It seems to me that with his already long parliamentary experience, and in spite of his youth, the hon. member must know that the committee is the best place to solve the matters which remain unsolved, which can cause some concern to the hon. member. Instead of recommending to the minister who took this matter out of the dry dock to set it afloat again, he should let it afloat, refer it to the committee by a majority vote of the House, or even better, by consent of the House. In committee, as he perfectly knows, unsolved issues can be solved. Concerns that worry us can be cleared up. All lacking precisions can be obtained. And above all, a bill can be pushed through if, in the opinion of the great majority of the House, it should become law as soon as possible.

I come back to my point, Mr. Speaker, which prompts me to rise in this debate. It will consist, first of all, in stressing the importance of measuring the point of view of Canadian broadcasting. I do not think that aspect of the question has been very strongly questioned by any member of the House. But I would like the rationalization of the provisions of the bill on broadcasting to be included in the file of the bill. What is it all about on the broadcasting standpoint? It is a question of stations located in big American urban centres near big Canadian centres. But, often, too it is a question of broadcasting stations purposely located on the Canadian border. In both cases, the evident objective is to exploit the Canadian market through the border.

● (1550)

One needs only see the size of the villages and small towns where some of the stations concerned are built. The size of these villages and small towns does not justify, in many cases, the size of the stations themselves. That is the best indication that the goal is not to enrich the American broadcasting system with American funds, which is an honourable objective for our southern neighbours to pursue, but most of the time to exploit systematically the Canadian broadcasting market, which is not large enough in itself for us Canadians to decide to give up whole parts of it to foreign broadcasters.

If anybody doubted that these stations seek in many cases above all to exploit the Canadian market, he would only have to consider the kind of advertisement aired by these stations. For example, Montrealers know very well that some American stations located near the border advertise suits sold on the Plaza Saint-Hubert in Montreal, for which Americans could certainly not care less, or restaurants located on the outskirts of Montreal, or products for which the American price would often be lower than the Canadian price.

It is therefore obvious that an intentional and exclusive operation exists in the United States with a view to exploiting Canadian radio and television stations, which is inadmissible.

It is also obvious that stations existing for other purposes in major American cities bordering on large Canadian centres—for instance, in the Niagara Peninsula—direct towards Canada, with a view to obtaining a share of the Canadian publicity market, commercials that are in no way justified by American stations interested in American publicity or businesses.

Pragmatically, such a situation is easy to evaluate. Between 20 to 30 million dollars in Canadian publicity cross the border to enrich American stations. I know that some Canadian stations, and one in particular that I shall not bother to mention, create fund transfers in the opposite direction, but such transfers are evaluated at five to seven million dollars, whereas funds for commercial publicity aired by American stations are estimated, as I have just stated, at between 20 to 30 million dollars, which makes of us overall losers.

Everything points out to standardizing a given situation. It is not a question of persecuting anyone, it is simply a question of standardizing a situation, such as we have done in 1969 when the government asked the CRTC to grant broadcasting rights only to stations that were 80 per cent Canadian-owned and that were headed by boards of directors made up totally of Canadian citizens. I am aware that at the time, some people cried out aloud. Like the previous speaker some said that we were anti-American. But all we had to do was answer them that such legislation was being applied by the Americans themselves. Have you ever accused Americans of being anti-Canadian because they did not allow Canadians to go and set themselves up in the American broadcasting system?

I would also like, Mr. Speaker, to say a few words on the debate with which I became acquainted through Hansard. While reading the report of this debate, seemingly based on a few newspaper reports which I had also read, I was astonished, I must confess, by some statements. Indeed, the former Secretary of State has been charged with failing to develop a policy on publishing and periodicals in line with the bill now under consideration. Mr. Speaker, I confess that I find that statement astonishing. I do not understand how it could have been made. No policy on publishing or periodicals, Mr. Speaker? I wonder how could he call those steps taken during the past four years by the Secretary of State. Firstly to help directly, through subsidies, the publication of Canadian books and periodicals by Canadian publishers. Secondly, the promotion in Canada and abroad of Canadian books and periodicals also through Canadian subsidies. Thirdly, the translation in Canada of Canadian works, from French into English and from English into French, so that Canadian cultural activities are not stopped on all sides, do not come up against the language barrier on both sides.

What more do they want, Mr. Speaker, when the government already helps the publishing itself, when it assures the promotion and the translation as well which, I admit, has often been a serious obstacle to the knowledge of Canadian English works among the French-speaking people or of Canadian French works among the English-speaking people? Often, it is well known, a writer earned less, and it is perhaps still true, with copyrights than it costs to get a translation in another language. And that does not mean that the book is valueless. The fact is that the Canadian publishing market is rather limited. And this is one of the unfortunate but inevitable results of limited markets.

As I was saying: once we have taken these steps, what more do they want? The government's part, in cultural activities, Mr. Speaker, is not to define itself the cultural values. This task is up to the citizens, to those called cultural workers, or cultural officers. It is up to the citizens, and the government's task is to help setting up conditions which allow the cultural workers to do their job in the most favourable conditions possible.

Were the state to go farther, that would be interference in cultural matters in contempt of the most basic and dearest liberties to the citizens in any real democracy. And I can hardly refrain from mentioning a very well known French example, André Malraux, a renowned critic, a French writer amongst the best known in the whole world, translated in some 30 languages. When he was Minister of Cultural Affairs, because he understood the nature of the cultural activity, Malraux has always contented himself with setting up the favourable conditions and never tried to run cultural affairs. He knew that, as a minister, it was not his role and that would have been an unwarranted intervention of the government in intellectual matters which are none of the state's business. On the other hand, one of his successors, whom I shall not name, a mediocre novelist, adopted a totally different attitude and presumed to say what theatre would be seen, what music would be heard in France; within a matter of five or six months he came to grief.

That is to say, then, that those who have reflected upon the matter know that the state has no direct role to play in matters of culture, of its contents, but that it behoves it to create the environment, the circumstances which allow culture to develop and flourish.

Those who say that the Secretary of State has no policy in matters of publication, what more do they want? I wonder. That we hold them by the hand? That we publish in their stead? That the state substitute itself to the initiative of the journalists in putting out their publications? Then, Mr. Speaker, one could rightly strike out against what would constitute real aggression against some of the fundamental privileges of the citizens in a democracy, those that allow those citizens to define their cultural values themselves and serve them as they see fit.

As a former journalist, for one thing, I could not allow that request, that which would have us go further than we already have gone. We could perhaps increase our assistance. Perhaps is there a question of degree. But, to say that there is no policy strikes me as obviously false to any open mind. Once the circumstances are created, then it is up to the press itself, which is in no way crippled, as far as I know, to assume its responsibilities as the government has done already, and as Parliament will have done when this bill has been passed.

● (1600)

[English]

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, as I take part in this debate I am somewhat confused by two references. The first is that on the order paper we have Bill C-58 listed in the following way:

Resuming debate on the motion of the Minister of Finance for the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts of Bill C-58, and act to amend the Income Tax Act.

Then I have in my hand a news release from the office of the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) of May 8, 1975, headed "Secretary of State Faulkner gives second reading to bill to amend the Income Tax Act". It goes on to state:

The bill to amend section 19 of the Income Tax Act respecting foreign-owned periodicals received second reading in the House of Commons today by Secretary of State J. Hugh Faulkner.

It seems to me there is some confusion, and it is a little difficult to reconcile these two circumstances. First of all, I do not think the bill was given second reading; in fact, it is very evident that it was not. The other paradox is that it is stated that the Secretary of State gave second reading to it. I was always under the impression that it was parliament which decided that particular issue. I thought I would just call attention to these anomalies as we enter this debate this afternoon.

In view of the great amount of correspondence which has come to the desks of members of parliament I would be remiss in my duty if I did not participate, however briefly, in the debate on Bill C-58 which is before us. I share many of the views expressed so lucidly by members of the official opposition and some other members of the House, particularly the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart). His participation in the debate indicated quite clearly that the opposition to the bill is not opposition for the sake of opposition, but because of a mounting feeling that not only will this measure fail to achieve the goal desired by the minister in its presentation but it will seriously erode some basic principles, adversely affect many individuals whose employment will be threatened, and will have detrimental effects on the Canadian economy as a whole.

The main thesis upon which this legislation seemingly rests in open to legitimate and serious doubt, namely, that the effect of the measure will result in a significant redirection of substantial advertising revenues into the wholly-Canadian publishing industry. This assumption is not substantiated by various inquiries carried out. It is suggested that any redirection of advertising would amount to a very small percentage, possibly in the area of 7 per cent to 10 per cent. It would appear that past performance by certain agencies has failed to generate confidence in their ability to respond to the reading pleasure of the Canadian public, and their promises of conversion for the future are not taken too seriously at the present time. I want to come back to that particular thought a little later.

[Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga).]

One of the questions raised is whether or not it is desirable or proper to use the tax weapon as a means of manipulating the reading habits of Canadians. The reason Canadians have become avid readers of, particularly, Reader's Digest and perhaps to a more limited degree Time magazine, is that it more fully measures up to what is desirable in reading material and provides material that has not been available in the Canadian magazine market. I tend to the belief that had the Canadian publishing industry been more responsive and more prepared to provide readers with a truly informative and less politically biased periodical, it would have won much wider support and greater financial return without waiting for assists such as are envisaged in this legislation.

It is not my intention to deal with the factors that have already been dealt with by my colleagues, but I would make reference to the unusual constituent opposition to the provisions of Bill C-58. As has been pointed out, it is true that an appeal was launched by the publishers of Reader's Digest. What is significant, however, is the fact that so many Canadians took the time and made the effort, not to sign a pre-planned ballot but to write personal letters requesting maintenance of the present status for Reader's Digest because of the nature of the periodical, its contribution to reading pleasure, the policies of the company as a good corporate citizen, and its significant contribution to the economy of this nation. One hundred and thirty-five persons have written me personally urging my opposition to the measure, and unless significant and fundamental changes are made in the bill now before the House it may be that this option will have to be followed.

In taking part in the debate, the hon. member for Cochrane pointed out the opposition of members in the government party to some aspects of the bill; the contrary views of members of the cabinet, the intransigence of the minister, and the probable absence of many ministers when this bill received cabinet support. Surely the influence of all these factors, coupled with the submissions of members of the opposition, should cause even the most determined minister to concede the possibility that more thought should be given to this proposal, and fundamental changes made before asking that second reading be given this measure. I say again that, in spite of the news release, the bill has not yet received second reading.

The background information paper about the proposed amendment to section 19 of the Income Tax Act reads as follows:

Debate specifically over Time and Reader's Digest has continued since their advent upon the Canadian market and their large gains in advertising revenue relative to the gains made by all Canadian magazines.

There appears to be an inference that the "large gains in advertising revenue" enjoyed by Time and Reader's Digest are responsible for the unsatisfactory economic position of the Canadian industry. This conjecture forms the basis of the decision to amend the present act on the assumption that this will correct the situation. I do not believe that this is so. Let me quote one or two further statements contained in this news release. The second paragraph reads:

"Canadian magazine publishers have been forced to exist for too long in an economic and psychological climate that has not been conducive to growth or new ventures", Mr. Faulkner said as he outlined the government's proposed amendments.

Further in the news release it is stated:

Speaking on behalf of the Minister of Communications, Mr. Faulkner also outlined the clauses of the bill dealing with broadcasting, which will amend the Income Tax Act so as to encourage the flow of Canadian advertising revenues to Canadian broadcasting media by disallowing deductions against income of the costs of advertising broadcast on non-Canadian stations.

Tying these together, it seems that the minister is confident of the fact that by these amendments to the Income Tax Act he is going to redirect a substantial portion of revenue into the Canadian operation. I do not think that is necessarily so. First of all, let me say that the relevant success of the two periodicals mentioned, particularly Reader's Digest, is that it is, in format and content, what Canadian readers want and because it has wide public appeal it has developed an exceptionally wide market.

If Canadian publications had taken the initiative and provided what appealed to readers in the way of clean, informative and entertaining material, they would have succeeded in gaining a large section of the market and, consequently, a much larger share of the advertising revenue. It is logical that the wisdom of the adage "you cannot build yourself up by tearing the other fellow down" might apply not only to the individual but to corporate policy as well. The passage of this amendment does not and will not ensure the diversion of advertising revenue into other periodicals. I believe this objective can and will be achieved much more effectively when Canadian publishers take the initiative and come up with something even better than Reader's Digest rather than waiting, as I have indicated before, for this parliament to pass compulsory legislation of the kind that is presently before us.

Perhaps it would be of value to state again some of the economic facts regarding this particular publication. While some have questioned the validity of some of these arguments, I believe they are basically sound and dependable. It has been pointed out that Reader's Digest is more than 30 per cent owned by Canadians. With the exception of one, its directors are Canadian. Its full-time Canadian staff numbers some 450 persons, and of course it indirectly gives work to thousands of others as well. Reader's Digest has owned its own press in Montreal since 1948. It publishes in both English and French, and it is now investing $3 million in new printing equipment. Articles about Canada—this refers more to the content—originated by Canadian editors are circulated in 26 international editions, in 13 languages, for a readership of approximately 105 million people. Those are just some of the facts that we should take into consideration as we assess the measure before us and the impact it will have, not just on the industry itself but on the total Canadian economy and community.

It seems to me that as we look at this situation and consider it from every point of view, we find that Reader's Digest has measured up in a substantial way to the qualifications required of a good corporate citizen. I do not propose to talk at great length except to point out some of the statements made by members of the government party. These have been placed on record but I would again like to call attention to one or two of them. The hon. member for Cochrane, in participating in the debate said the following:

Mr. Speaker, I rise in this debate to express some very serious reservations about the bill which is before us.

He later made the following statement:

I have reservations about this bill simply because I feel there has not been sufficient effort made to establish guidelines to be followed for a publishing company to maintain its Canadian status. There seems to be an intransigence on the part of the minister to make any compromise on this, and on this point I do not understand the minister.

Reference was made by the Minister of Communications (Mr. Pelletier) to the effect that this subject has been kicked around for quite a long time and we should be grateful for the fact that it has been brought before us in this form. We realize fully that there has been a great deal of discussion, there may have been a great deal of thought given to it, and it may have been kicked around for a long time. But it would seem to me that there has been a lack of really in-depth study and inquiry into the effects that this proposal would or would not have, because I believe there are many things still open to question and it is difficult to gauge the impact of measures such as this. I believe that a greater measure of in-depth study should be given, to try to ascertain to the optimum degree just what the impact will be in various areas.

Not only did the hon. member for Cochrane make the statements which I read, but the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) circulated a letter which I should like to quote in part. I believe it is a very thoughtful presentation. Everything that the hon. lady advances in that letter is, in my opinion, well thought-out and we should give it ample consideration. She wrote:

I have been openly opposed to this step. It is discriminatory and unjust—a threat to the life of a first-class landed (corporate) immigrant for more than 30 years. Not only has Reader's Digest provided jobs and writing opportunities to many Canadians within a small industry—magazine publishing—but more than any other magazine published in Canada, has provided features and news (mature and well-researched) each month from all parts of Canada, linking this country.

I will continue my fight against the proposed action when it comes before the House of Commons, and if it comes before the Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts Committee.

In the next to last paragraph she wrote:

I have, and will continue, to oppose any attempt to end the life and public responsibility of Reader's Digest in Canada.

The opposition being expressed is not opposition only from the official opposition or even from all opposition parties. I believe there is significant opposition within the ranks of the government itself, and I believe all these factors should be taken into consideration in the assessment of this matter. My colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), suggested that this bill should be withdrawn. I also believe that it should be withdrawn until far more consideration is given to all the factors involved—whether this action is justified in light of the sincere and effective steps taken by Reader's Digest to act as a good corporate citizen and their evident success in contributing to the Canadian economy, and whether any appreciable benefits will accrue to the Canadian publishing industry from the passage of the legislation.

I urge the minister to consider these facts as he weighs the issue, and to consider whether it would be advisable, in light of all the sources from which the opposition comes, to take the step which he proposes to take; or whether it should be given further consideration before we are asked to give second reading to this legislation.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I share the views so eloquently expressed by my colleagues. I believe that in fact this bill should be withdrawn, notwithstanding all the work that has gone on throughout the years commencing with the O'Leary commission. The fact is that there is every indication, from what we are now hearing in the debate, that the bill was hastily drafted, that it is ill-conceived, and that it was presented to the House before even the minister's supporters in his own caucus had an opportunity to adequately present their views. When the O'Leary commission on publications made its report in May, 1961, it emphasized the following:

—in an era as vital and sensitive as that of the press, whatever is done should be positive rather than negative, with the goal the promotion of the Canadian periodical, not the suppression of the foreign.

That was from the report of the O'Leary commission. The bill now before us is, in my opinion, a very negative approach to this problem. No one, and I do not think anyone involved in this debate, has tried to deny or to speak against the principle of support for Canadian periodicals and publications. God knows that the Canadian publishing industry desperately needs help. I am sure that when the minister does bring forward a measure to assist the Canadian publishing industry, it will receive the support of this House.

As has already been stated, the fact is that the revenue which will be freed by taking away the tax exemption privileges of Time and Reader's Digest will not necessarily all go to the Canadian publishing industry or to Canadian magazines. I would like to quote a survey conducted by Canadian Facts Incorporated, in January of this year; it was a survey of Canadian advertising executives. It found that very little new advertising revenue will accrue to Canadian publications. As a matter of fact, that report tells us that just under 20 per cent of the bulk of the new revenues will go to one magazine company, the Maclean-Hunter Publishing Company which already accounts for 42 per cent of the total, and despite the fact that the minister has identified the smaller, special interest magazines as the real problem area we are told that a very insignificant amount of benefit in the form of new revenues will go to smaller magazines as a result of the amendments to the Income Tax Act in the bill before the House.

As the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) has said so eloquently, the smaller publications could be helped in a very positive way and in a very meaningful way by, for example, the government restoring the special postal rates those publications once enjoyed and which were removed by this government. In other words, a return to the postal rate calculated on the basis of circulation would give the smaller and specialized publications in this country a better chance to survive and flourish.

[Mr. Patterson.]

Then there is the argument that the advertising dollars will go where the maximum audience is. That is an indisputable fact. Hence, most of the advertising dollars which will be put into the Canadian market as a result of this amendment, if it passes the House, with a small exception will not go to Canadian publications and will not help the Canadian publishing industry. They will go to the maximum audience achievement which can be bought for the dollar, and in this case it will go to newspapers and to radio and television stations. I submit that it will be a very significant windfall for Canadian radio and television stations and newspapers in this country, which are already in a lucrative position.

Regardless of what new benefits accrue to Canada's major publications, and in this case I mean Maclean-Hunter and Maclean's magazine, I am satisfied that Time magazine, whether it will appear as the international edition, the American edition or under a new cover as a Canadian magazine which fully meets the terms of the legislation—this, I submit, could possibly happen by Time Canada selling out 75 per cent interest to Power Corporation or F. P. Publications or some other Canadian company—will have little or no impact in this country because there will still be Time magazine one way or another. It will still have a large circulation in this country because it has the worldwide capability to provide Canadians with a first-rate international magazine. But I do not think it matters a great deal. In the final analysis we will still have Time publishing in Canada in one form or another, or at least distributed in Canada from the United States.

What does matter a great deal to a significant percentage of the members of this House is Reader's Digest. I, for one, make no apology for standing in this House and saying that I firmly believe a special case can be made for this publication. A special case has already been made by hon. members on both sides of the House. My colleague who preceded me referred to the speech of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart), and he quoted from a letter which has been distributed to all members of the House by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt)—both very eloquent arguments in favour of the retention of tax exemptions for Reader's Digest in Canada.

It is an indisputable and undeniable fact that Reader's Digest has striven to be a good corporate citizen of this country. I think it has succeeded in doing that. There has already been reference to the very substantial investment this company has in this country—an investment exceeding $8 million. Reader's Digest has met and exceeded every guideline for corporate behaviour laid down by Canadian governments, including the 12 guiding principles of good corporate behaviour laid down for foreign subsidiaries in 1966 by the then minister of industry, trade and commerce.

In addition, Reader's Digest meets the qualifications of the Income Tax Act in that its editions are typeset in Canada, printed in Canada and wholly edited in Canada by a company which is a good corporate citizen of Canada, which is incorporated under the laws of this country, whose presiding officer and all other officers are Canadian citizens and taxpayers and, as my hon. friend has already said, five or six directors of the company are Canadian citizens. Sir, that is good corporate citizenship.

In addition, the company has actively supported the Canadian publishing industry through contributing to advertising research, graphic arts and bookbinding technology and by providing an expanding market for writers and illustrators through its magazine and book business. This is significant, especially in the absence of any positive policies by the minister to support the Canadian publishing industry. This company, since its inception in this country in 1943, has been employing Canadians full-time and today employs 470 full-time employees, 47 of whom have more than 20 years' service with the company. Since it has gone public, it has some 600 Canadian shareholders.

Impressive though all those arguments may be, I submit that there is another argument which should carry even greater weight and perhaps it will explain why there was such a great response from the publishers of Reader's Digest and from its readers across the country. I know that every member of parliament has received many letters. I received more than 100 from my constituents. I think the reason the response was so great was that in today's permissive society there are so few magazines which you can safely lay on your coffee-table. There are very few family magazines. The minister smiles. I do not know if he has examined the racks of magazine stores lately and has seen the kind of pornography and trash that passes for Canadian and American publications. This fact alone perhaps explains why there is so much interest in this bill. Reader's Digest is unique and has become a tradition in this country. Many of us grew up with this magazine as a family publication and part of our way of life, whether it be the French edition or the English edition. I think most hon. members will support that point of view.

● (1630)

This uniquely family magazine has striven to be a good corporate citizen of this country. It has almost reached its own objective of 30 per cent Canadian content. Whether this magazine reflects American points of view, British points of view or French points of view, the fact is it reflects substantially the points of view of the many Canadians who contribute to it whether in book or magazine form. I believe it is a good, clean, wholesome magazine and we as members of this House have an obligation to do whatever we can to ensure its continued publication in Canada so that it can be enjoyed by the people of this country.

I hope the minister will get the message. I am sure when the bill gets to committee we will hear these arguments again and the minister will be constrained to entertain amendments which will allow this commendable publication to continue to serve the people of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question? The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens).

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, as has already been mentioned in this debate, when the minister made his initial statement concerning his intentions to introduce legislation with respect to the matter before us today, I replied on behalf of our party and indicated, as has been indicated today by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) and other of my colleagues in this party, that the principle the minister referred to is acceptable. Where I personally have had great difficulty with the minister's proposals in Bill C-58 is the detail. When I commenced to read the portion of the Income Tax Act referred to in the bill, subsections 19(1), (2) and (4), and realized in what way the minister wishes to amend those subsections, I felt much had to be said before the bill is passed by this House.

While it may be very easy to accept something in principle, I would suggest that we in this House must be doubly certain at times that in attempting to achieve something that appears to be good we do not inadvertently limit freedom of the press or create hardship with respect to a publication in Canada that has been a good corporate citizen. Above all, I believe we have to satisfy ourselves that the measure proposed by the minister is going to be beneficial to Canadian publications in general.

In this respect, I was disappointed to read the address to this House by the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) on May 8. He listed eight points that he regarded as "should nots" or "have nots" with respect to the concept that we have before us. He then raised four points of "shoulds" or desirable things that he hoped to achieve. In short, he touched on eight negative and four positive points in order to justify the bill. Subsequent to touching on those points, he mentioned various things that he felt the government was doing in order to encourage the Canadian magazine and periodical industry.

What has been even more of a disappointment to me since I spoke to the House on this matter on January 23 is the evidence that the government appears to be growing indifferent to the problems of the press. Many people were shocked when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) withdrew departmental advertising from Le Jour, a Montreal newspaper. He stated that federal advertising should not be placed with a newspaper whose views were incompatible with those of the federal government and with the preservation of the nation. As we know, Le Jour is a separatist publication. Subsequently, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) backed up his minister and said the question——is to decide if the government should help commercial enterprise.

Madam Speaker, is that really the question when you are dealing with a matter as important as freedom of the press? One would have thought that the only reason for the government to give advertising to the media would have been to inform the public about matters of national concern such as government policy, new laws or regulations. To withdraw advertising on political grounds is to deny a certain segment of the population—in this case the readers of Le Jour—their right to such information. I would suggest it is a bad precedent, and once established it will be difficult for the government to draw a fair line between acceptable news media and those that are unacceptable.

Few would support separatism; certainly I presume virtually no one in this House would support that concept. Should the government be allowed to use their economic clout as a tactic to influence the free expression of opinion in any periodical or in any newspaper in Canada, however? I relate this to the bill before us, because while it is a simple matter to suggest that the government should require foreign publications in Canada to be at least a majority, or 75 per cent owned by Canadians, where we obviously get into difficulty is when the government states that for any advantage to accrue to the periodical being owned by Canadians it should have a content that in some arbitrary way meets the requirements of, say, the Department of National Revenue.

When comments along this line were being made earlier by the hon. member for Hillsborough who was challenging the concept of an 80 per cent content rule, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford) shouted, "Would you sooner have 70 per cent or 60 per cent?" I would suggest that indicates that the minister is insensitive to what we are speaking about today. We are speaking about the possibility that so-called content rules could be used by the government in power to influence their decision as to who shall be treated as a Canadian magazine and who shall be treated as a non-Canadian magazine. To the extent that any government in future could use that power to thwart freedom of the press, I believe the rule must be resisted.

I have been alarmed over the past few months by the growing indifference of this government to freedom of the press. Let me refer to the response made by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) when he appeared before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs in April. On that occasion he gave newsmen further cause for concern when questioned on certain measures in the proposed competition bill which is now before the committee.

● (1640)

The Canadian Newspaper Publishers' Association had asked for changes in the bill to ensure freedom of the press. They pointed out in their brief that unless the act is modified, purchasers of advertising may agree together to prevent or lessen competition in the purchase of their advertising generally, or in relation to a particular medium of communication or in relation to a particular newspaper or radio or television station. They asked the government to put advertisers in the same position as others who would conspire in such a way; that is, they asked the government to make it illegal. Mr. Ouellet, who appeared before the committee, was entirely unsympathetic to the proposal of the newspaper publishers.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I remind the hon. member that when referring to the minister he should refer to his portfolio.

Mr. Stevens: Yes, Madam Speaker. I said in committee that, given the Le Jour incident and the government's apparently firm position not to protect the news media from advertising conspiracies, we have an indication of how fragile freedom of the press may be in this country. This view was heightened by the remarks of the minister's parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) who chose that occasion in committee to register his hostility to the press in his area, a hostility arising from treatment afforded him during political campaigns. He is reported to have said:

> As soon as an election writ is issued you get a visit from all the advertising people from each of the newspapers, and some of them make it very clear—and some of them do it less overtly—that they would like to know what advertising you are going to give them, and the message is certainly fairly self-evident before the conversation is over that if you do not advertise with them, you will not get any coverage. I have found that the impression that that is true is usually substantiated in fact. I have found that from those with whom we do not advertise, we certainly do not get any coverage.

The hon. member, whose absence I am sorry to note, then was more specific. Referring to the Inland Publishing Group, which apparently has newspapers in his riding, he is reported to have asked witnesses appearing on behalf of the Daily Newspaper Association the following question:

> What is your view about publishers who own a number of small newspapers who in fact would have exactly the same editorial go out from all of them in respect of a very sensitive subject, when in fact those local newspapers carry the banner, and create the appearance of being locally oriented newspapers, but they are really centrally controlled . . . does this strike you as being responsible policy?

The witness stated that they did not agree with such policy. Then the hon. member for Ontario shouted, "What would you do about it?" and Mr. St. Clair Balfour, president of Southam Press, replied, "It would never happen in my company." Mr. John J. Robinette, Q.C., counsel for the Daily Newspaper Association, added in jest that we are "the good guys." The hon. member for Ontario concluded by saying, "We make a distinction between the good guys and the bad guys, I guess." That exchange should give cause for alarm as it indicates the attitude of the minister, the government, and of the parliamentary secretary on the question of freedom of the press. Apparently the minister and the parliamentary secretary think that if a newspaper publishes something they do not find attractive, certain repercussions should follow.

Given the present political atmosphere, the language of Bill C-58 leaves much to be desired. To the extent that we impose arbitrary rules for content and decide who is a bad guy and who is a good guy, the freedom of the press is lessened. Consider, for example, the action which the Quebec government might take to restrict the activity of the press in that province. The premier of the province has indicated that he plans to introduce a bill in the provincial legislature which will affect the concentration of press power in that province.

I think we should put on record what has been said by at least one minister of the Bourassa government about the provisions of the proposed press legislation in Quebec. Fernand Lalonde, minister without portfolio, indicated in Toronto not long ago that the Quebec government is thinking of imposing a code of ethics on the Quebec press; in other words, there are to be guidelines on what may or not be published in the newspapers. That is an alarming suggestion. That government, which has been stung by certain press comments and does not like being criticized about current scandals in the province, has suggested, through the mouth of one of its cabinet ministers, that it will introduce a code of ethics to govern newsmen and newspapers.

In light of current events, we in this House must make doubly sure that Bill C-58 does not in any way give this or any future government a weapon to use against publications in this country, a weapon which can be used in accordance with the political feelings of the government or the minister of the day. Let me make another point about the situation in Quebec. In the Montreal Star of April 1, 1975, Dominique Clift, in an article headlined "Quebec considers press curbs," said in part:

For more than five years various committees of the national assembly have been studying the growing concentration in the ownership of communications media as well as the public's right to unbiased information. The issue is a serious one in Quebec because the French cultural and economic environment is somewhat constrained, so that it becomes relatively easy for anyone to acquire a monopoly position in this field.

The article goes on to say there has been considerable pressure for government action in this field and that the premier has promised to introduce a law which will take care of the situation, that is, the concentration of power with respect to the press. The article goes on to say:

Current plans are to introduce the legislation some time in May or June. While the bill has not yet been drafted for presentation in the national assembly, the government is leaning toward the idea of making information media fall under the definition of "public services." This would place them under the jurisdiction of the Public Services Board which would grant accreditations or permits, and implement government directives on ownership and possibly other matters as well. No matter how straightforward and innocent these controls might be, suspicions that the government is trying to muzzle the press are very quick to be aroused.

The article expresses the views of a journalist who is alarmed about the suggestion that the provincial government may try to muzzle the press in that province. In the Toronto Star of May 17 we find a similar byline story by Robert McKenzie, entitled "Bourassa may restrict the press". In this article out of Quebec City it is pointed out:

● (1650)

Liberal supporters are incensed at the media's role in hammering home the scandals which have hurt the party's image in recent months.

When Fernand Lalonde, a minister without portfolio and a Bourassa confidante, said in Toronto last month that the government "is envisaging" imposing a code of ethics on the Quebec press, the premier sought to defuse the remark the next day.

I could quote much more from that article. Perhaps it is sufficient if I simply indicate that there is a discernible degree of intolerance with regard to the press at the present time. Some—and I hope they are few in number—in politics are suggesting that, for the first time in Canadian history, there should be some restriction on the freedom of the press. That is why I believe we in this House of Commons have to be extremely careful that we do not amend the Income Tax Act or any other act and inadvertently give an unfair clout to somebody in government to stifle our free press.

I wish to touch on another point. I would comment at this point that I have found this debate very refreshing in the sense that we have had participation from government backbenchers, members of my caucus and the other caucuses. Many members have made an important contribution in their remarks concerning what they believe are the inadequacies of the bill. I refer, for example, to the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) and the hon. member for Cochrane from the Liberal side.

I am sure the House will accept my independence on this matter if I specifically point out to the minister where I believe his eight negatives and four positives of May 8 do not apply to certain periodicals in Canada. I will mention one instance. As the act now stands, the minister is going to require newspapers in Canada to go out of business simply because he is not willing to accommodate them. I refer to the Red Deer Advocate and the group of newspapers in British Columbia that are controlled by the same group in England. While this group owns 100 per cent of the stock of these Canadian publications, they in no way direct the content of the newspapers. The staff is entirely Canadian. I would say that the Red Deer Advocate, for those who have read it, is as good a daily newspaper as you will find in any city in Canada of comparable size.

If you read the remarks of the minister at pages 5592 and 5593 of Hansard, you will find he gives a list of eight points—situations which he says should not be allowed to continue in Canada. I suggest that not one of his eight points applies to the Red Deer Advocate, yet the minister makes no exception for this type of publication. My colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough, indicated that the Christian Science Monitor represents perhaps another difficulty if the amendment before us is passed. However, let me deal specifically with the Red Deer paper. For example, the minister stated as one of his negative points:

—we do not want the continuance of a situation wherein the world view of Canadian readers is being influenced by American periodicals the operations of which in Canada are facilitated by a tax deduction provision primarily intended to assist Canadian publications.

What does that have to do with the Red Deer Advocate owned by British interests? Absolutely nothing. In another point he stated:

—we do not want the continuance of a practice whereby the stories and articles reproduced in the French language Canadian edition of Reader's Digest are usually translated outside Canada.

That has nothing to do with Red Deer.

—we do not want the continuance of an arrangement whereby the editorial content of these foreign-owned magazines is imported from parent houses in the United States—

Again, nothing to do with Red Deer.

—we do not want the continuance, on the part of two foreign-owned magazines, of editorial policies that can hardly be said to be making a real contribution to Canadian cultural development and expression.

That has absolutely nothing to do with any magazine in Canada other than the two foreign magazines to which he referred.

—we do not want the continuance of a situation wherein foreign-owned magazines claim the right to be called Canadian while taking their editorial direction and most of their editorial content from their parent houses abroad.

Again, nothing to do with the publication to which I am referring.

—we do not want the continuance of a Canadianization progress record which, after 30 years, finds Time in Canada still owned and controlled entirely by Time Inc. in the United States—

The minister then refers to Reader's Digest. Again, it has nothing to do with the publication to which I am referring. He then mentions, as a second negative point, that he is alarmed at the $19 million of revenue that is being taken by two foreign-owned periodicals. Presumably he is not including the group of papers I am referring to in his $19 million reference.

In particular, I am trying to indicate that the minister's stance in drafting this bill and his statement were very, very subjective. He seems to be deliberately moving to thwart two magazines, Time and Reader's Digest. The fact that, in thwarting those magazines, he is creating problems and will probably hurt other publications in Canada which have in no way contributed to the problems that he alleges exist is secondary in his mind. I want to develop this further, because the minister then states there are four good things he is trying to accomplish by this bill. He stated:

What we do want is: first, the continuance of a situation wherein there is no interference with the freedom of Canadians to read Time and Reader's Digest—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTION TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—External Affairs—Proposed establishment of subcommittee to investigate CIDA; the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco)—Society for the study of the Heritage of Canada—Reason for payment to society to compensate for use of name "Heritage Canada"—the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston)—Regional Economic Expansion—Request for statement on negotiations with British Columbia for projects.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Motion No. 2, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander).

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If Your Honour will call notice of motion No. 38, I believe you will find there is agreement to deal with it this afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it agreed that all notices of motion prior to No. 38 stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Stevens.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROCEDURE FOLLOWED IN COMMITTEES RESPECTING HEARING OF WITNESSES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River) moved:

That this House: Holds that it tends to a contempt of parliament and a subversion of the constitution to assert, as did the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources before a standing committee of this House in a previous session, that a minister of the Crown may order a witness not to attend a committee or to withhold evidence from the committee where, in the minister's opinion, the witness has an advisory responsibility to the minister or the government:

Informs the minister and others of the government that the implementation of this pernicious doctrine by obstruction, threat, intimidation, molestation, offer of advantage, other corrupt practice, or at all, is a crime against the law and custom of parliament;

Affirms that it is the undoubted right and ancient privilege of this House that all witnesses to attend before this House or before any committee of this House have and enjoy the privilege of this House in coming, staying and returning; and

Declares that it is a breach of the privilege of this House to tamper with a witness in regard to his evidence to be given before this House or before any committee of this House, or endeavour, directly or indirectly, to deter or hinder any person from appearing or giving evidence, or attempt by persuasion, solicitation or advice of any kind to induce a witness not to attend or to withhold evidence or to give false evidence, or otherwise interfere with his freedom to form and express his own opinions honestly in the light of all the facts known to him.

● (1700)

He said: Madam Speaker, I did not want to deprive you of the privilege—I would have liked to have heard the terms of the motion in French; I think it would be good for members of the government side to become acquainted with them.

I was only persuaded to proceed this afternoon because members over there were so disappointed with the performance of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last Thursday that I thought this whole issue should be reviewed and discussed again. I trust this will have the effect of persuading them to change their minds so that they will no longer be the unthinking members on the government side that they have been in the past. The motion is phrased in colourful terms. It states:

That this House holds that it tends to a contempt of parliament and a subversion of the constitution to assert, as did the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources before a standing committee in a previous session that a minister of the Crown may order a witness not to attend a committee or to withhold evidence from a committee where, in the minister's opinion, that witness has an advisory responsibility to the minister or the government;

Informs the minister and others of the government that the implementation of this pernicious doctrine by obstruction, threat, intimidation, molestation, offer of advantage, other corrupt practice, or at all, is a crime against the law and custom of parliament—

Had there been an opportunity, I would have amended this motion so as to include the Prime Minister and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) because they, too, brought themselves into contempt of the House, having asserted last Thursday and on other occasions that they possessed this right. However, I cannot change the motion now. I merely wish to make it plain that I am not picking on the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald). I am thinking, too, of the Prime Minister and his seatmate, the President of the Privy Council: the words have application to them. I bring to the attention of the House particularly the third paragraph of the motion:

Affirms that it is the undoubted right and ancient privilege of this House that all witnesses to attend before this House or before any of committee of this House have and enjoy the privilege of this House in coming, staying and returning; and

Declares that it is a breach of the privilege of this House to tamper with a witness in regard to his evidence to be given before this House or before any committee of this House, or endeavour, directly or indirectly, to deter or hinder any person from appearing or giving evidence, or attempt by persuasion, solicitation or advice of any kind to induce a witness not to attend or to withhold evidence or to give false evidence or otherwise interfere with his freedom to form and express his own opinions honestly in the light of all the facts known to him.

That is what the Prime Minister says he has the right to do. That is what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources says he has the right to do. That is what the President of the Privy Council says he has the right to do. That is, a right to tamper with evidence, a right to tamper with the calling of witnesses before a committee. While the motion uses colourful and, some might say, extravagant words, the words take us back to the time of Charles II, the king who lost his head because he asserted the divine right of kings somewhat in the same way as the present Prime Minister. It is the same type of right as the former president of the United States claimed for himself in the exercise of executive privilege. President Nixon said that as executive head of the United States, he had the power to say to witnesses, "You need not appear before a congressional committee and testify, if I tell you not to." That is exactly the position taken by those ornaments of the treasury benches who sit opposite.

It is all very well, apparently, for committees to call witnesses from the streets outside this House. Presidents of corporations, presidents of unions—any witness can be called and is compellable. But if he happens to be a member of the civil service, then according to the principle asserted initially by the minister of energy and repeated by his more or less distinguished colleagues, he need not and cannot be called because he is a member of a class set apart. Thus, the divine right of executive privilege is alive and well and flourishing in government today.

Members opposite attempt to defend this attitude by advancing a complete distortion of the phrase "responsible government". They say, in effect, that a government composed of ministers drawn from the House of Commons and elected in a general election has no responsibility other than to the House itself and that having discharged this responsibility they are free to prohibit the calling of witnesses before a parliamentary committee. I assert that this is a distortion of the principle of responsible parliamentary government. Over 100 years ago in this country, under the guidance of the famous Baldwin-LaFontaine ministry, responsible government was brought in. I have here a book called "Baldwin and the Great Experiment", by R. M. and J. Baldwin, the distinguished, direct descendants of Robert Baldwin who has written this book in collaboration with his wife and I will quote from it what I suggest to be a most acceptable definition of "responsible government". At page 134 of the book we read:

Why did it (the Crown) not keep a minister in office in spite of the voice of parliament? It was impossible for such influence to interfere, for it did not exist; while he enjoyed the confidence of parliament he continued in office; when he lost that confidence he was obliged to cease being a minister. The breath of parliament made him, the breath of parliament unmade him—

To my mind there could be no clearer, more concise or better definition of what we mean or ought to mean by "responsible government". The hideous, distorted paraphrase of it which the right hon. gentleman opposite and his colleagues have attempted to foist upon parliament is quite unacceptable to me, to my hon. friends and, I would hope, to many hon. members sitting on the other side of the chamber.

What was it that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said on Tuesday, December 18, 1973, before the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works? As reported on page 14 of the Minutes of Evidence, he said:

I have no objection whatsoever to appearing with Mr. Stabback—

He was a witness the committee was thinking of calling.

—and having him answer questions on matters of information, but as he is one of my advisers for whom I am constitutionally responsible I would have to appear when he appears. It should be understood that I will appear with the witness and, of course, I will be quite agreeable, but from a constitutional standpoint he has been acting as adviser to me and as such should appear in my presence.

Later the minister went on to say:

I am sorry, that is too much. The minister is responsible; if he chooses to have his deputy minister appear without his being present, that is the minister's choice. Ultimately, it is the minister's responsibility as to who shall appear.

I then said:

The minister is wrong. He is challenging responsible government, the right of the House of Commons—

At this point the minister rudely interrupted me and said:

I must say that responsible government means that a minister is responsible for his portfolio to the House of Commons, not individual public servants.

Nobody would challenge that assertion standing by itself, but not in that context. I was left with the only retort I could think of immediately, namely, that the minister would not recognize responsible government if it got into bed with him. Then on May 13, during the question period, I put a question to the President of the Privy Council on the idea of responsible government. The President of the Privy Council, as reported at page 5769 of Hansard, had this to say:

● (1710)

Ministers take responsibility not only for their own actions but for the actions of their departments and for their civil servants . . . If you go behind the minister and compel civil servants to appear, then, of course, you break down the whole principle of ministerial responsibility.

Then later on, as reported at page 5770:

Surely this is the principle upon which this House must operate, otherwise the whole system of responsible government breaks down.

There is the bold, unqualified assertion that a committee of this House cannot of its own right call a civil servant to appear as a witness before it. Unless the minister in whose department that civil servant is employed gives his approval, that civil servant cannot appear, cannot give evidence and cannot be called. This was repeated on Thursday, May 22, by the Prime Minister and the President of the Privy Council. The Prime Minister was the first offender in that long, dreary monologue when he slyly conducted himself in such a way as to prevent this House from questioning him, as had originally been understood. The Prime Minister said, as reported at page 6015 of Hansard:

> In Canada, the ministry is responsible to parliament and must defend itself there every day. As I have said, this government is in a position to be more sensitive to this than most, on the basis of the experience I quoted earlier ... Our policy, Mr. Chairman, has been to improve and defend the system we have enjoyed in Canada for over 100 years and which has had a great role to play in preserving our democracy by making the elected member paramount in the decision-making process and accountable for his actions when he is a member of the ministry.

What tripe, Madam Speaker! What drivel! The Prime Minister goes back to his coach in this, the Minister of Evergy, Mines and Resources, and reasserts the same principle. Then the President of the Privy Council, as reported at page 6038 of Hansard, had this to say:

> —and that does raise a question whether, if a minister objected and the committee then required his attendance, that would raise issues with which I am not quite sure how to deal.

A little later on the same page:

> The question which arises is whether a committee may summon an official contrary to the wishes of his minister who is taking responsibility for his actions, and in these circumstances, since I have never seen a situation like this, I treat it as a hypothetical question.

I then rose to point out that when I was chairman of a special committee of the House in 1962, that committee summoned the then Clerk of the Privy Council to appear to deal with the War Measures Act, and the distinguished Clerk of the Privy Council, Mr. Bob Bryce, appeared and gave very eloquent testimony.

So there, Madam Speaker, the issue is joined. We say that any person is a competent and compellable witness before this, the highest court in the land or before any committee of this House or this parliament. The government says no, if such a person is a civil servant he is only to be called if the minister in charge permits this to come about. In the name of heaven, what would happen to the public accounts committee in the circumstances? Is it the assertion of this government that public servants who appear and answer for the misdeeds of their department with respect to spending programs can only appear if they get the permission of their respective minister? If there is a discrepancy or a miscalculation, or if there is some skullduggery, it may be corrupt or simply an error.

Are the Prime Minister and the President of the Privy Council saying that if a minister of the department involved says he is not going to have his civil servants appear, then the public accounts committee cannot call them? It seems to be the assertion they are making. But it is not enough to say that public servants shall appear. We are talking about a principle—the right, the assertion, that this House and this parliament is paramount. The government gets its authority primarily from the House and generally from parliament, and it should not be heard to enunciate here the principle that it can prevent witnesses from being called.

I know that what we have now is government of the bureaucrats, by the bureaucrats and for the bureaucrats. Hon. gentlemen sitting opposite may disagree with me, but I hope they do not. I think those of them who regularly attend their caucus and are subject to the discipline of their caucus would be inclined to agree with me if they would only open their hearts and say so in this House. I suggest, Madam Speaker, that the unbelievable complacency of politicians, of the press, of sections of the public toward a kind of government that we are seeing develop by the enunciation of principles of this kind is beyond all description.

We all know that even with responsible government ministers make mistakes. No one has ever urged that a member of parliament has the right in a committee to question a public servant on an issue of policy, or on an issue of confidentiality involving criminal prosecutions, information under the Income Tax Act or information derived from the confines of secrecy in the Privy Council office. That is not what we are asking for. Today governments have become involved in the development of difficult, complex, intricate and complicated programs for legislative purposes and for spending purposes, and they take months and months to develop such programs through information and facts brought to their attention by civil servants and consultants brought in to supplement civil servants. And I suggest to the House that there is no good reason why members of the House both on the government side and on the opposition side should not in committee be entitled to know something of the facts.

A member of parliament is entitled to ask, "What are the facts upon which this decision is based? I am not asking you to tell me why the policy was made, because that is a government decision". No one but the government takes responsibility for policy decisions in regard to bills and spending programs, and the government stands or falls at the next election upon its policies. But as for development of policy and the right to ask questions about facts, it would be an intolerable situation if a committee of this House were deprived of the opportunity of calling a witness to put to him factual questions that fall outside the ambit of that which is confidential.

It is on that basis that I have brought this motion to excite some interest and to find out whether there is support from different parts of the House for it. It also puts the matter into the public domain. As far as the government is concerned, I know its general tendency to be despotic and tryannical will prevent it from giving effect to the proposals I have made. But I hope my motion will initiate a public airing of this issue so that the matter is taken to the people. The only way an issue can be finally settled in a democratic system is to put it to the people. I do so in the clear knowledge to that this party is pledged to bring in laws as to secrecy and with regard to the right to call witnesses and to develop a full and open society. I hope we will get some reasonable discussion, not only in this House but in the country at large, of this major issue.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to speak to this motion which has been moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). It is one of his favourite topics and I am sure he has enjoyed presenting it to the House this afternoon. It is surely an important matter of the rights and privileges of members of parliament. It seems to me his allegations in the motion before the House and in his presentation really bear pretty close scrutiny. For instance, he suggested that witnesses had been prevented from appearing before the national resources and public works committee by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald). As we look at the evidence, and surely he did not substantiate his claim very well, this is just not so. I am aware of no witness who has been summoned by the national resources and public works committee and who has not appeared.

The work of the committee has involved some 20 meetings since January. The steering committee has set out a schedule of witnesses, and whether it has been in respect of the miscellaneous estimates, the study of the international energy agreement, the study of Petro-Can, the departmental estimates or the estimates of Crown corporations and other agencies, representatives of which appear before this committee, in no way has the minister prevented any witness from appearing. Likewise, on some occasion these witnesses have appeared before the committee without the minister or his parliamentary secretary being present.

It seems to me that the question we have before us today is whether the hon. member for Peace River really believes in responsible government. One of his allegations was that we really have government by bureaucrats, for bureaucrats—and I forget the rest of that couplet. I suppose if you really believe that bureaucrats make all the decisions, then, as he feels, he should be able to question them on matters of policy. We do not believe that on this side of the House. We believe ministers are responsible for the setting of policy and they should have to answer questions on policy before parliamentary committees. We believe that civil servants, when they appear with or without the minister or parliamentary secretary, are there to answer questions relating to information or administration.

The first statement in the motion of the hon. member for Peace River reads:

> That this House: Holds that it tends to a contempt of parliament and a subversion of the constitution to assert, as did the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources before a standing committee of this House in a previous Session, that a minister of the Crown may order a witness not to attend a committee or to withhold evidence from the committee where, in the minister's opinion, the witness has an advisory responsibility to the minister or the government—

Let us go from that and just see what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said on the occasion referred to, and I quote from the record of the national resources and public works committee meeting of December 18, 1973, at page 24:14. He said:

> Mr. Chairman, I might speak to the suggestion concerning Mr. Stabback who is a public servant and in his capacity as a member of the National Energy Board is one of my advisers. I have no objection whatsoever to appearing with Mr. Stabback and having him answer questions on matters of information—

It does not seem that the hon. member has substantiated well his claim that the witness was prevented or ordered not to attend.

Mr. Baldwin: What about what he said on page 33, which I read?

Mr. Foster: The second claim is that the minister was forcing the witness to withhold evidence from the committee. Let me complete the rest of the sentence that I read in part:

> —but as one of my advisers for whom I am constitutionally responsible, I would have to appear when he appears. It should be understood that I will appear with the witness and, of course, I would be quite agreeable but from a constitutional standpoint, he has been acting as an adviser to me and as such should appear in my presence.

It seems to me the situation is that when a committee hearing is taking place, we do not have questions put by members of parliament in a neatly compartmentalized way but, rather, questions that involve matters of administration and policy. If a good committee meeting is to be held with information being supplied, we should have people in attendance who can answer questions on policy and on administration information as well. This is what the minister was saying, that if a member of his department or an adviser to him is to appear, he should be able to attend the committee to answer in respect of matters relating to policy.

The second paragraph of the hon. member's motion before the House this afternoon reads as follows:

> Informs the minister and others of the government that the implementation of this pernicious doctrine by obstruction, threat, intimidation, molestation, offer of advantage, other corrupt practice, or at all, is a crime against the law and custom of parliament—

That is pretty strong stuff. I do not know if that is the kind of language the hon. member for Peace River would normally use, but it certainly does not—

Mr. Baldwin: It is among my mildest.

Mr. Foster: He talks that way on opposition days; however, he did not talk early enough last Thursday, apparently, because that was a pretty weak and pathetic performance. I admit that he probably made the best presentation possible from that side of the House, but it was a pretty weak performance on the whole.

It seems to me that we have very serious allegations in the hon. member's motion this afternoon, but we do not have much substance to back them up. We have a minister of the Crown saying that when there are matters of policy being put before a standing committee to the House of Commons, the minister will or can be there to answer those questions and that civil servants will and can answer questions relating to administration or information. If we look at the proceedings of the national resources and public works committee we will find that on occasion witnesses have appeared without the minister being present and in those circumstances, of course, the witnesses have had to turn aside questions on policy.

Mr. Baldwin: Well coached ahead of time.

Mr. Foster: It is rather interesting that the hon. member for Peace River should have referred to the public accounts committee, because surely there is no other committee that day after day, year after year and committee session after committee session has called more witnesses, deputy ministers and other officials on matters relating to administration. The hon. member really weakened his argument by even raising that matter, because everyone knows how many times officials from every department of government are called before that committee to give testimony and information.

It seems to me that what is being followed is a long-established tradition of the British parliamentary system. I am not sure whether the hon. member for Peace River wants to move toward the congressional system, with a separation of powers, but under our parliamentary system surely the minister is responsible for policy.

Mr. Baldwin: It beats the Roman system.

Mr. Foster: Knowing the hon. member's great interest in the parliamentary procedure, I find it hard to believe that he really wants to attack our system of responsible government.

Mr. Baldwin: Remember that Caligula made his horse a member of the council. That is the kind of thing we see.

● (1730)

Mr. Foster: In looking at this matter, the hon. member also raised the matter of privilege. I would like to read that section of the Journals that concerns those special privileges that members of parliament have. It reads:

> Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to declare to you that he freely confides in the duty and attachment of the House of Commons to Her Majesty's Person and Government and, not doubting that their proceedings will be conducted with wisdom, temper and prudence, he grants and upon all occasions will recognize and allow their constitutional privileges.
> I am commanded also to assure you that the Commons shall have ready access to His Excellency upon all occasions, and that their proceedings as well as your words and actions, will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

So we do have these special privileges given to us from the Crown, and under our system the government has a responsibility to the House of Commons for all the people who work under it in its departments.

The hon. member for Peace River has tried to broaden the motion before us today. As it is written, it refers directly to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and I would like to indicate that the minister has never ordered a witness not to attend a committee meeting, or ordered a witness to withhold evidence from a committee as is alleged in the motion. Records of the work of this standing committee will show that he has co-operated fully in providing witnesses before the standing committee. I really think the hon. member should consider withdrawing the motion because it has no substance, as I am sure he is aware.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, hearing the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) I was a little uncertain just how to take him because, frankly, I was uncertain as to how he was taking himself. Listening to him I did not know whether he was actually making arguments which were subversive of the parliamentary system and of responsible government as we know it, or whether he was just repeating some tired old arguments for the sake of the reading public. Those who could hear the manner in which he was making his remarks and the lack of effort he put into it in comparison with the effort he usually puts into even his most unworthy causes would have the same doubts as I have. We missed his enthusiasm today.

[Mr. Foster.]

Mr. Baldwin: I was trying to speak seriously, but when I saw the blank faces of people opposite who did not understand the issue I was discouraged.

Mr. MacGuigan: In view of the manner in which he presented his own arguments I tend to think he made a political speech, I do not know whether in the best or the worst tradition. If we were to take seriously the kind of arguments advanced today by the House leader of the opposition, we would have no responsible government left.

Up to a point he is entirely right in what he says. He says that it is the undoubted right and ancient privilege of this House that all witnesses who attend before this House or before any committee of this House have and enjoy the privilege of this House in coming, staying and returning. All this is right, provided he makes what he says subject to responsible government.

I should also add that there is one other aspect of parliament's power which is not being questioned here today and which I am sure is common ground to all parties, that is, the power of the whole House to summon before the bar of parliament any person in the country for an accounting of his actions. Parliament has not chosen to exercise that right very often, but I think that it includes even civil servants in a case where, because of some individual action of a public servant, the whole House decides to call him before the bar of the House in such a case the public servant would be required to attend. That is a very unusual situation which is not under discussion here this afternoon.

The House leader of the opposition is attempting to make it a rule that parliament, without any reference whatsoever to the doctrine of responsible government, should have the right to summon any public servant before it. That is not only not the intolerable situation he asserted it to be but in fact it is the unbroken tradition of parliament that it is the government that is responsible for the actions of the public service, and that it is the minister to whom the public servant is responsible who has not only the option but indeed the duty to appear before either the House or the committees of parliament to account for the actions of his public servants.

The House leader of the opposition and I have even sat on some of the same committees, and we have both observed the same things, namely, that when a public servant is summoned before a committee, he is normally accompanied by his minister. The minister may choose to answer most of the questions or he may choose to inform himself of the facts from the public servant who may be there speaking into his ear. In fact committees have sometimes halted proceedings while a public servant has an opportunity to acquaint his minister fully of the matter being discussed. That is the way the system operates—it operates through the minister. On those comparatively rare occasions when a public servant appears before a committee without the support of his minister, it is by advance permission and with the knowledge of the minister.

The House leader of the opposition has sat on various committees with me, among others on the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments and I believe also on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada. In both these committees we heard public servants who were unaccompanied by their ministers, but this was done with the knowledge and authorization of the ministers. In fact I can recall speaking to the ministers on those occasions to see whether they would have objections to their public servants appearing on their own before the committee. Because of the limited nature of the inquiries that were being made and the fact that where a policy was involved it was so well-known that it was thought no confusion could arise, the ministers said that it would be perfectly all right with them if the public servants appeared on their own.

In case of the Public Accounts Committee as my colleague, the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), said, it has enjoyed the greatest possible freedom in the investigation of witnesses, a freedom I am sure all members of the House would like to see continued. But the fact is that it is the minister who is responsible. If the minister chooses to appear on his own, or chooses to appear with his public servants and to take full responsibility and fully explain to the parliamentary committee what has happened, that is the minister's responsibility.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the hon. member permit a question? I would like to ask the hon. member a question regarding his interesting comments. I hope it is taken off his time because he is entitled to full time. Does he urge the adoption of the principle with respect to the Public Accounts Committee that if a minister see fit to instruct a public servant who had been asked by the committee to appear before it not to go, the public servant would not be allowed to appear before the committee?

Mr. MacGuigan: In my opinion, if the minister refused permission for that public servant to appear before the committee, it would be the minister's responsibility, and he himself would have to explain to the committee why he did not allow the public servant to attend. The minister would have to take the political consequences of his decision. That is what the discussion is all about, the responsibility of the government for the political consequences.

Governments cannot escape their responsibility merely by allowing some public servant to take the rap, at least if it is a matter which involves the normal implementation of government policy. There may be an unusual situation where a public servant has been indulging in a frolic of his own for which he himself deserves to bear individual responsibility, but in a case such as that the government would want to cut that man loose from its protection. However, in a more normal situation it is the government which has responsibility, before the committee and before the House, as well as before the public.

I am pleased the House leader of the opposition has cited the origins of the doctrine of responsible government in Canada, the doctrine which those great Liberals, Baldwin and Lafontaine, brought to this country, and which had been developed earlier in Britain as a result of the actions of earlier Liberals. It is a doctrine to which we on this side fully subscribe. I hope the fact that the other party came later to it in historical sequence does not mean that their devotion to it is any less, but that they are prepared to join with us in re-affirming the fact that this is not only a parliamentary democracy, but that it is also one based on responsible government.

Obviously there have to be some bounds to responsible government, and there can be some argument as to the difficult cases, but the kind of case to which the House leader of the Official Opposition is referring is not a difficult case. What he is proposing is flying against the mainstream of parliamentary tradition. It is not a doubtful or difficult case at all. He is proposing that a committee should have the right to summon a public servant apart from his minister. If the doctrine of responsible government means anything it means that the minister is the one who is primarily responsible; he is the one who has the duty to answer for his public servant and the actions of his public servant.

I often wonder what is behind this attack, and others of this kind, by hon. members opposite. I suspect that their motivation is very political. In view of the kind of declarations we hear from the hon. member for Peace River and sometimes from the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark), members who, certainly in the case of the hon. member for Peace River, understand the parliamentary system so well that we can hardly believe that they stumble unknowingly on these positions which they are putting forth, I suspect that there is a kind of design on the part of hon. members opposite to confuse the public about what is happening in parliament today, and to suggest that there is something completely unwarranted happening.

We hear cries from those opposite that the parliamentary system is being changed into a presidential system. They present the parliamentary system as it should be in terms of, for example, Bagehot's "Constitution of England," of 1867, which, as hon. members opposite well know, describes the British House of Commons for a period of some 30 to 40 years between the first and second reform bills and only that period of parliamentary history out of the 300 or 400 years of parliamentary history.

During all the rest of that period the meaning of parliament has carried with it a certain supremacy of the executive, often too much, and I often join with hon. members opposite in suggesting ways in which the powers of the executive should be limited. I might say also that I join with them on many occasions in suggesting that the principle of open government is of crucial importance to the future of democracy in this country, but I cannot go along with hon. members opposite when they try to depart from these valid principles and valid suggestions about the needs of parliamentary democracy today, and to perpetrate on the people—and I think it is nothing less than a perpetration—extensions of those doctrines and distortions of what is happening so as to suggest that the government, in effect, is not following parliamentary tradition.

We are here dealing with the mainstream. We are not talking about doubtful cases at all. The hon. member opposite, if he were to be taken seriously, would be making a subversive attack on the very foundation of our system of parliamentary democracy. I do not think he intends to go that far. Indeed, I am sorry to say that I think his motives are somewhat less worthy than that in the sense that I think he is not speaking here as a statesman but as a politician, and I am sorry that he chooses to act as a politician in a matter which is of such basic importance to our country, a matter on which I think parliamentarians of all parties should speak with a united voice.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, it is not my intention to get into the argument which is taking place between the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and those on the other side of the House. With respect to the last remark of the last speaker, it seems to me that it is one we often hear. The other fellow is always the politician; the one who has the floor is always the statesman.

An hon. Member: It certainly is true in this case.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is my hon. friend saying it is true right now?

An hon. Member: The previous speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I cannot even get a compliment when I set it up and ask for it, because I am on the other side of the House.

Mr. Cullen: When you get to the Senate we'll call you a statesman.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Oh, my goodness! Not only are they unwilling to pay me a compliment; I am now being insulted.

Mr. Baldwin: That is a compliment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I said when I first rose that I was not going to get into the argument. I am not sure there is much of an argument, when one pulls brushes aside the words and the epithets which are thrown back and forth. I think there is agreement on both sides that the general system of responsible government we have is a good one, and that on both sides of the House there is a desire that responsible government should really work.

I rose, however, because I have the feeling that one of the reasons why we have this kind of motion before us, and one of the reasons why we have had a number of discussions lately about how things proceed in committees is that there is a certain amount of unhappiness, certainly less than happiness, about the way some of our committees are functioning. We in this House are aware that the amount of business we have to do in the course of 12 months is so voluminous that it is not possible for all of it to be done here. This means we have to make greater use of the committees than has been the case in years gone by. If we are to make greater use of committees, they are going to have to work. Therefore when things happen in committees which we do not like, there is this feeling of unhappiness.

I want to speak only for a minute or two, and I will not go much longer than that, Madam Speaker, because you will probably wonder whether I am in order or not. I will get it over before you rule me out. I just want to say that I think one of the reasons why there is unhappiness about committees and that this unhappiness produces this kind of motion, is that our committees are too crowded in their operations. This leads me to the pitch I have been making for a good many years, and that is why I took the floor today. I think we must organize our work so that there are occasions—for example, a week at a time—when the House does not sit, so that committees can be at the centre of the stage and have time to do their work without the members of those committees being concerned about having to be in the House or having to do other work on those days.

[Mr. MacGuigan.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is not a new idea. I said that I have proposed it a good many times. I was not the first to propose it, but it seems to me that there is agreement that it is a good idea. I was applauded for it just now. There is agreement on this proposition, yet we never seem to get around to doing anything about it. The successful working of the committee system is important. That includes the right to question the witnesses who appear before them. But I think it is terribly important that we find better ways to accommodate the work of our committees, and I hope we will do something about this very soon.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I just want to say that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in a very statesmanlike speech made a suggestion with which I am in wholehearted agreement. I think there ought to be more time for committees so that they can function without having to worry about the operations of the House of Commons, which does tend to dominate their activities, particularly since the amount of work now going through committees and the importance of that work have become so fundamental to the proper functioning of the House of Commons.

I believe that the House of Commons has lost its capability to deal with the amount of work which has to be done. As a result, it will have to consider its own operations with a more clear eye as to what is actually going on, the kind of work which the government is increasingly putting before it, and the frustration of the House in not being able to process that work in a way which is becoming to the House, to the members, the committees and, indeed, to the institution of parliament.

● (1750)

I believe, therefore, that the motivation which has led to this particular resolution on the order paper is a genuine one. It stems from the frustration as to the proper relationship between the House of Commons and committees. It stems from a frustration that members feel about the operation of committees and the lack of knowledge as to what the powers, authority and privileges of the committees are vis-à-vis the House of Commons.

We have seen over the last week where His Honour the Speaker has had to deal with a number of motions hon. members have brought forward regarding conflicts in the standing committees. Many of us feel that the conflicts are not going to be resolved in the standing committees until we work out some system by which members agree that solutions reached in committee are equitable and fair.

I feel that the current system of appointing chairmen, and the way committee business is handled by the steering committees and committees themselves, leave a great deal to be desired. We have to look for substantial reforms in this area.

I want to deal more specifically with the proposition advanced by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). At the start I think we should make clear what he is talking about. In his motion the hon. member alleges that the committee has been tampered with in so far as a member of the Public Service, and adviser to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), was not permitted to testify before it. I would say that a committee of the House of Commons has certain rights to command the attendance of certain people before it to give evidence on certain subjects.

Mr. Baldwin: It is a very dangerous doctrine.

Mr. Reid: I would say that when it comes to compelling people to appear before the committee, the committee does not have that power. It is within the power of the House of Commons, however, to compel somebody to appear either before the bar of the House or before a standing committee, but a committee itself has very limited powers in that area. Let me give an example, Madam Speaker.

Committees are generally given the power to summon persons, papers and records. We have seen a number of examples of those powers being exercised. When a committee has before it the estimates of a government department, however, or a bill of the House of Commons, then it seems to me that the only witness a committee has power to compel to attend is the minister who has sponsored that legislation in the House, or the minister who is responsible for the estimates for which he has signed and which are before the House, and which the House has referred to the committee.

In our system ministers are responsible for decisions taken; civil servants are not responsible for decisions taken. That is why ministers sit in the House of Commons, it is why they answer questions and why they take responsibility. If we were to accept the doctrine that civil servants were responsible for these decisions, then perhaps civil servants should be invited to sit on the treasury benches in this House of Commons so that they could be responsible to the House.

That is not the system, however. Our system is clear, exact and precise. Decisions are taken by ministers—they are imputed to have been taken by them even though they have not in fact been taken by the ministers. Ministers stand and fall in the House of Commons defending those decisions taken by them and the advisers who work for them and under their authority.

I recall one occasion when a minister was in deep trouble in this House over a decision that had been taken by his advisers, and about which he had not been aware. He told me, "There are at least 92,000 public servants in my department. If by nine o'clock in the morning Ottawa time one of them somewhere has not got me into trouble over something, then obviously the department is not doing its job." He acknowledged that he accepted responsibility for the activity of public servants engaged in implementing policies to which he had given concurrence, and implementing decisions in which he had participated with his colleagues.

I think we should make it quite clear that when a minister's estimates are before a committee, or when a bill is before a committee, that committee does have the power to compel the minister to appear before it, or a representative of the government to appear before it. I would even go further and argue that if a committee wished to have outside advice from somebody who is beyond the government pale, somebody who is an expert in the university or business field, the committee would have power to compell him to appear before it and give testimony. But I make a clear distinction between the committee's power to do that and the power the committee has to compel members of the government to appear. I believe this is an important distinction, because in the case of the government it is crystal clear that employees are responsible for the activities, responsible for their proposals—which after all is what the estimates are and what a bill is. The people brought in by committees—and they do this and it is a desirable practice—are there to give testimony to the committee within the bounds of their specialized knowledge. That is one of the reasons why committees have taken advantage of this, to call people before them, some of whom have not always been happy to appear, but whose testimony has been valuable.

I can recall a number of instances when I was chairman of a committee when in order to obtain information on what was going on we requested the presence of an individual who had prepared a report for the government on a particular subject. That gentleman came before us and gave testimony on what we wanted. We found his testimony quite useful. We did not get the government report we wanted, but we got the use of the expert witness who had immersed himself in the subject and who was not in the public service. Madam Speaker, I see it is six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hour appointed for private members' business having expired I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Non-Canadian Publications

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

REMOVAL OF PROVISION ALLOWING DEDUCTION OF EXPENSES FOR ADVERTISING IN NON-CANADIAN PERIODICALS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-58, to amend the Income Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, just before the supper recess I had been reviewing Bill C-58 and the effect it will have on non-Canadian newspapers. As an example I single out the Red Deer Advocate. I understood the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) to say before supper that in his opinion the bill does not pertain to the Red Deer Advocate, even though it is wholly owned by a group in England. Having read the bill I see no foundation for the Secretary of State's statement about the Red Deer Advocate.

I submit that proposed section 19.1 will apply to advertising space in the issue of a non-Canadian newspaper or periodical. I particularly emphasize the word newspaper. The definition of non-Canadian or Canadian, as the case may be, turns in part on share ownership. Three quarters of the issued shares must be Canadian if the publication is to be considered as Canadian owned.

I draw attention to these facts as I feel the present language of the bill is too all-encompassing. It affects both periodicals and newspapers and casts a net, so to speak, which catches newspapers like the Red Deer Advocate.

We should remember that Canadian newspaper and publishing companies are healthy and prosperous and, to put it mildly, large. According to the latest figures available, four of our largest publishing groups enjoyed sales of $546 million in 1973. Those four groups consist of Thomson Newspapers Ltd., which made $157 million worth of sales in 1973; the Toronto Star Limited, which sold $94 million worth of goods that same year; Southam Press Limited, which enjoyed sales of $183 million, and MacLean-Hunter Limited, which enjoyed $112 million worth of sales. The 1973 revenues of these companies were substantially larger than their 1972 revenues, and I understand the 1974 figures will be even larger.

One cannot suggest, surely, that a foreign-owned newspaper like the Red Deer Advocate is a serious threat to Canadian newspapers. I just indicated how large are the revenues of our four largest publishing groups. It goes without saying that they are Canadian-owned, and the number of shares held by foreigners is not meaningful. This being so, I find the position of the Secretary of State strange. He insists on the inclusion of periodicals and newspapers.

We should compare the earnings of some foreign publications with the earnings of our own. Although I do not have available the figures for Time Canada, I do have available those for Reader's Digest Association of (Canada) Ltd. Compare the sales of MacLean-Hunter Limited of $112 million for 1973 with the sales of Reader's Digest of $28 million during the same period. Clearly, although some foreign newspapers or periodicals operating in Canada have been given income tax advantages, our Canadian companies are healthy and doing relatively well.

[The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin).]

Another point I would like to touch on is the fact that we must be very careful in discriminating against foreign investment in this country, and perhaps even more so in discriminating against the investment of foreign concerns in newspapers or periodicals. We are coming into a world environment where many countries are tending to be much more nationallistic in their attitudes with regard to trade and investment in their own countries. The United States, for example, which has been among the world leaders in encouraging other countries to keep relatively free as far as trade is concerned and also to open up with regard to foreign investment, has now shown for the first time a distinct trend in favour of restricting foreign investment in the United States.

Canada, being one of the largest if not the largest investor in the United States, has to be exceedingly cautious in doing something that may inadvertently cause more and more concern in the United States with regard to our investment in that country. I refer to the fact that congressmen who are presently greatly exercised over the danger of foreign acquisition of United States companies and strategic natural resources in the United States have introduced nearly three dozen bills to curb foreign investment in recent months. The most widely publicized bill, one written by Senator Harrison Williams, a Democrat from New Jersey, would give the President authority to veto foreign acquisitions of more than 5 per cent of the stock of virtually any publicly-owned corporation in the United States.

The Williams proposal has been sponsored by eight senators who represent almost the full spectrum of political opinion from liberal Democrat to conservative Republican. Since the Williams bill does not need the President to allow the takeover of one domestic corporation by another, it overtly discriminates against foreigners who might be interested in investing in further concerns in the United States.

In short, as I indicated earlier, this bill, in setting up some type of content rule with regard to what magazines or newspapers will be considered to be Canadian, is getting into a grey area that may lead to some limitation of freedom of the press in this country. This, I suggest, we must resist. In any event we must resist the broad spectrum that is thrown out by this bill which includes newspapers as well as periodicals. Surely a paper such as the Red Deer Advocate does not have to be caught up in the provisions of this bill as it is now before us.

Finally I suggest in the broader sense that we must be cautious that we do not provoke retaliation in the United States or in any other foreign country, be they countries in which we are presently investing or not. The retaliation, I suggest, would come in the form of resistance and restrictions against further investment by ourselves in those countries.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill C-58. With the exception of capital punishment and abortion, this bill has given rise to more correspondence than any other subject that has been debated in the House since I came here in 1972.

The majority of my letters have been with respect to Reader's Digest. With one exception they have all been opposed to the legislation. I had fewer letters in connection with Time magazine, but here again of all the letters I received there was only one that was in favour of the legislation.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): And that was from the publisher.

Mr. Neil: My hon. friend said that was from the publisher. I was very interested in reading the remarks of the minister as recorded in Hansard for Thursday, May 8. I wish to quote from page 5592, the first paragraph of the minister's speech, as follows:

It seems to me it is a fact that in any free society, magazines significantly influence the development of the culture, the national sensibility, the free play of ideas and exchange of views and the critical faculties of its citizens. One might say that the part magazines play in this process is perhaps not as directly influential as television or films, but that may be largely a matter of taste and circumstances. Certainly, if one can judge by the views expressed by hundreds of persons who have written to me during the past few months about possible changes in the income tax law affecting advertising in periodicals, magazines are a very important factor indeed in terms of developing and nurturing a distinctly Canadian culture and identity.

I was impressed by the words "a free society" because that is what every man, woman and child in Canada is concerned about today; a free society, a society in which we have freedom of expression, freedom to move about, freedom from fear, and freedom to read whatever books, magazines, periodicals or newspapers that one wishes. All these are freedoms which individual Canadians hold dear. We should have a free society that creates an atmosphere which lends itself to a natural and gradual development of a culture, unencumbered by government legislation and regulations.

You cannot legislate culture. All a government can do is create an atmosphere which lends itself to the development of the richness of one's culture. Culture in a nation such as Canada, which is young in years, has to evolve with time. It develops as a result of the intermingling of the ideas and customs of those various ethnic groups who came as immigrants to Canada to meld their thoughts, ideas and cultures into the mosaic of our society.

Bill C-58 will not do anything to add to our distinctly Canadian culture and identity, as the minister put it. This legislation has one purpose and one purpose only, to assist the Canadian periodical industry. Development of our cultural society is secondary and very minor in the mind of the government. I wish to quote again from page 5592 of Hansard where the minister, talking about the Canadian owned periodicals and the industry, said:

The difficulties facing that industry have for some time been a matter of concern to my department and to me; for some months now, we have been engaged, in co-operation with the industry, in the development of a plan of action aimed at finding solutions to certain of its problems. I regard the amendment proposed in this bill as an important element of that plan and one that is essential to its success. . . . It is not a negative decision if it leads to positive results; when it is seen as a stage in the development of a program of effective government assistance to Canadian periodicals about which I shall be speaking a little later.

In other words, the government is not concerned about the cultural aspect of the magazine industry. It is concerned about assisting the publishing organizations and the periodicals that are published in Canada today.

● (2020)

Later in his speech the minister said that Time and Reader's Digest have an unfair advantage over Canadian periodicals. What is this advantage? My reading of the present law is that these foreign-owned periodicals compete on an equal footing with Maclean's and all other Canadian magazines. The only advantage they have is an advantage with respect to other foreign magazines. So what is the problem?

Why is the Canadian magazine industry in difficulty, if it is in difficulty? After listening to the remarks of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) I doubt whether it is in real difficulty judging from the profits the Maclean-Hunter organization has made, for example. It is not the lack of advertising dollars.

I went down to the Parliamentary Library this morning and thumbed through the most recent issue of Maclean's. Between one third and one half of that magazine is taken up with advertising—I suggest it is a larger percentage of advertising than most magazines carry. Basically, people buy magazines to read the articles, not for the sake of the advertising and, frankly, it is annoying to have to search through the advertising to find the continuation of articles.

As I say, people buy magazines to read the articles, and this is where Canadian magazines have fallen down. They do not carry articles which the general public finds interesting or informative. They carry articles which in many cases are biased, and in others, critical articles which are never complimentary of our public figures, our society or our way of life. If it is poor circulation these magazines complain of I submit it is not the fault of competition but the fault of editors failing to keep their finger on the pulse of the nation so as to know what the public wants.

I should like to comment on a number of other statements the minister made during this debate. As reported at page 5593 of Hansard on May 8 he talks about the world view of Canadian readers being influenced by United States periodicals. Surely Canadians are intelligent enough to read foreign periodicals, whether American, French, German or others, and understand that in most cases, in their editorials at least they are inclined to be biased in favour of the country of origin. Surely adult Canadians are intelligent people who can assess the comments made in these magazines and draw their own conclusions.

A short time ago I had occasion to speak to a group of servicemen. The first thing they said to me was, "Make certain you vote against that legislation because we want to see Time magazine continued." I questioned them, and they said, "We agree it is inclined to be somewhat biased toward a United States view but, on the other hand, it is the only magazine where we can get in summarized form an overview of what is taking place in the world; we discount it and still find it is a good source of information." Does the government have to protect the public by shielding them from news reports or features it doesn't like? It seems as though this is the case.

I was listening to Canada-AM a short while ago. A prominent provincial Liberal was appearing on a panel discussing newspaper reporting and periodicals in Canada. He was complaining that most newspapers and many periodicals did not act in a responsible manner in reporting the news. He felt the government of Canada should set up a Crown corporation along the lines of the CBC to publish a newspaper throughout Canada in order that Canadians could get a proper view of the news. What a lot of nonsense! Heaven help us if it ever comes about.

Later on, as reported at page 5593, the minister said he did not want to see the continuance of a practice whereby the stories and articles reported in the French language Canadian edition of the Digest were translated outside Canada. Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that a good deal of the translation of government papers and documents is done in France, or in New Orleans in the United States. If what I am saying is correct, how valid is the minister's statement?

There are many other points I could raise, but I do not wish to repeat what has already been said by other members. I do, however, wish to commend the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) who gave us a comprehensive review of advertising revenues, circulation figures, capital investment by Reader's Digest, employment created by that magazine in the Province of Quebec, and so on. I would also commend for reading by the minister a letter regarding Reader's Digest and Time circulated to all members by one of his own supporters on the government side, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt). That hon. member is a writer, and I believe she expresses the fear of many Canadians when she says:

> At the very time when free societies are being swallowed up in the Communist thrust to achieve its proclaimed aim—world domination—this action is symbolic of a concerted effort to alienate an old and strong ally and Canada's closest friend, the United States. One wonders if we are not being used by the small but vocal Toronto-based anti-American clique.

This should be read in the light of the statement by Senator Keith Davey when he talks about "a window on the world through American-tinted glass".

I believe in a strong Canadian magazine industry, but it should be an industry which is built on competition, an industry which is based on public demand in terms of content, not of what a few intellectuals think is right for the public to consume. If a magazine is responsible to the wishes of the public and publishes what the readers find interesting and educational, it will be in demand and achieve popularity. Consequently it will be profitable and able to compete on an equal footing with other magazines and periodicals.

In closing I should like to read a letter from a constituent of mine. It is typical of many letters I have received, and I believe it is typical of the feelings of the majority of Canadians. It comes from Mr. H. D. Wilson of Moose Jaw. It is dated March 10, and it reads:

> Dear Mr. Neil:
>
> This is to advise that as a lifelong subscriber to Reader's Digest and Time magazine I take a dim view of the government's current effort that may deprive me of my major sources of pleasant, meaningful and informative reading.
>
> I have no reason to feel that either magazine has deliberately omitted anything Canadian that might be newsworthy, pleasurable, entertaining or informative. Both seem to fill the gaps left by Canadian magazines, newspapers, radio and television.
>
> I do not subscribe to either magazine because of their Canadian content but rather for their detail in American and worldwide coverage.

● (2030)

> I would be deeply appreciative of anything you can do to help ensure that these two time honored magazines continue to be available to me and my fellow Canadians.

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, the sheer volume of mail on the subject of these amendments to section 19 of the Income Tax Act forces me to speak on behalf of my constituents. I am one who has always enjoyed the arrival of my Time magazine. It gave me a quick overview of Canadian news and a very quick perspective of world affairs and how they related to me as a Canadian. As for Reader's Digest I seldom purchased a copy; I always managed to borrow one of the family's or finish reading it in a doctor's office or, heaven forbid, a dentist's office.

I now find myself as a new member of the House of Commons participating in a debate determining the future of these two magazines, along with others, that will be affected by Bill C-58. We are not just talking of Time and Reader's Digest, as we have a tendency to think. There are other foreign owned publications that will be affected by the revocation of section 19(2) of the Income Tax Act. For example, there is the Red Deer Advocate, the Chilliwack Progress, the Abbotsford News and the Fraser Valley Record. These are all owned by the Liverpool Post and Daily Echo Limited. In addition, in the periodical field there is Modern Medicine and a magazine entitled M.D. The former is now printed and published in Canada by Southam under a licence from the New York Times, and I believe there is now a 50 per cent ownership on the Canadian operation.

It would be impossible for Canadian editors and writers to write the input of periodicals like Modern Medicine and M.D. because what our professionals in those disciplines are trying to achieve is a perspective and insight into what is going on in other countries and among people in other countries who are writing in certain fields of research. These are all institutions and media that will be affected by the bill we are debating here this day.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner), in a release dated March 26, pointed out that successive Canadian governments have considered the action we are discussing, since 1960. In that year Senator Grattan O'Leary, head of a royal commission, urged that the country develop a self-sufficient national press. I should like to quote one point he made which the Secretary of State quoted in his release on March 26. He said:

> Only a truly Canadian printing press, one with the feel of Canada and directly responsible to Canada, can give us the critical analysis, the informed discourse and dialogue, which are indispensable in a sovereign society.

The commission at that time concluded that:

A nation's domestic advertising expenditure should be devoted to the support of its own media of communication and a genuinely Canadian periodical press can only exist if it has access to a fair share of domestic advertising.

Another quotation from the commission used by the Secretary of State in his March 26 release is the following:

It is largely left to our periodical press, to our magazines, big and little, to make a conscious appeal to the nation to try to interpret Canada to all Canadians, to bring a sense of oneness to our scattered communities.

I remind hon. members that these very sincere words were written in 1960 by a royal commission of that day. The Secretary of State has made use of these words as the basis for his move to remove special status from Time and Reader's Digest in Canada. The Secretary of State has pointed out in this release that Time and Reader's Digest took over half of the total of Canadian advertising revenue earned by 14 member magazines in the Magazine Association of Canada. In an address at Trent University on January 24 the Secretary of State said this:

—the real problem area is that occupied by the smaller special interest magazines which are just getting by or are having trouble staying alive.

He is not really basing his reasons for this legislation on the magazine industry per se. He is extremely concerned about those small magazines that are just getting by. He leaves out of his consideration the Magazine Association of Canada group of 14 who are actually doing very well in the Canadian periodical and magazine market. In his address at Trent University he went on to say this:

These are the magazines that attract a limited number of readers and have little hope of substantial commercial support through advertising. They are dependent almost totally on readers' response and publishers' support for their financing. The former is rarely sufficient to cover costs and most of them require financial assistance from governments, associations, groups or private individuals to keep going.

Yet here we are today, Mr. Speaker, placing emphasis on legislation that is going to risk the continuance of two major magazines on the Canadian scene. It appears to me that the real pressure has come from the Canadian Periodical Publishers Association, which in March of 1973 had only ten members but grew to some 58 members in September of 1974. I have reviewed this list of members and magazines belonging to the Canadian Periodical Publishers Association and, without doubt, many of them are extremely sincere in their efforts to try to interpret some aspects, some limited aspects, of Canadian life. However, their position in the Canadian reading scene in no way relates to the importance that we seem to be giving to them in Bill C-58.

In light of the review I have made of this list of some 58 members of CPPA, I sincerely believe that we should look seriously into some more facts in order to round out a sound and solid perspective before we work Time and Reader's Digest, and other papers and periodicals that I have mentioned, perhaps right out of the Canadian reading scene.

It seems to me that there has to be a more positive perspective and approach to resolve the dilemma that I find myself in this debate. If these small magazines can survive, we should do all we can to assist them through our taxation laws, rather than adopt the course of direct government involvement through subsidization. I sincerely believe that subsidization of magazines and papers and other reading material for Canadians has some very serious, inherent dangers.

According to Charles Lynch, magazines just cannot live on nationalism alone. He has also said that if Time and Reader's Digest disappear from Canada there is no guarantee that Canadian readers would either like or buy a domestic product that seeks to take their place. I personally do not find Maclean's magazine to be the type of reading for which I have time as it just does not fill my needs. I am sure I am not alone in that, although I respect the fact that there are others, because of its circulation, who find it completely satisfying. Are we going to cater to just one class, or are we going to cater to all the inputs which are available to Canadian society?

● (2040)

As Charles Lynch said in the Province of January 25:

When governments enter the picture subsidies cannot be far behind, and government subsidies in the field of publication almost invariably are bad news, never more so than when they are coupled with appeals for patriotic support of the publications in question.

An editorial in the Ottawa Journal recently stated:

Governments should not be in the business of magazine or newspaper publishing, by almost outright subsidization.

Why do we keep subsidizing and thinking we have to support inefficiency in this country? What is wrong with placing incentives into this line whereby we support and reward the people who are successful? What troubles me is trying to reach a perspective in this debate, and I would now like to review with you some of the redistribution of advertising revenues that would be available if Section 19(2) were revoked by Bill C-58.

The total advertising bill in Canada is approximately $1.5 billion, and of this the daily newspapers receive slightly less than one-third, that is, 28.6 per cent, or approximately $500 million. Television receives 14.1 per cent, or about $250 million; radio receives 11 per cent, or around $175 million; business papers, I am surprised, only receive 2.4 per cent of this total advertising bill or $38 million; general magazines receive 2.3 per cent or around $37 million, and the weekend magazine supplements that we get with our newspapers receive 1.6 per cent of the total revenue, or about $26 million.

It is estimated that Reader's Digest would lose some 64 per cent of its revenue if this bill became law. The survey by Canadian Facts Co. Ltd. indicates that of the revenues diverted from Reader's Digest and Time, 19 per cent would go to other magazines, yet this entire debate seems to rest on the rediversion of the advertising revenues that these two great magazines have, as the sole source of salvation for a lot of independent periodicals that probably, with all the help in the world, could not sustain themselves legitimately under legitimate sale and purchase arrangements among the Canadian public.

Of that 19 per cent the major beneficiary would be Maclean-Hunter which now holds 40.1 per cent of the revenues shared by the Magazine Association of Canada, which is a group of 14 major magazines in Canada. Some 41 per cent of this diverted revenue would go to newspapers, magazine supplements, television and radio. I would repeat that 41 per cent of the diverted revenue, as a result of passing this bill, would go to existing newspapers that already have 28 per cent of advertising held in Canada, magazine supplements, television and radio. Twelve per cent of this diverted revenue would go to other forms of promotions and advertising.

I really think that these facts are indicative of the need for us to take a good second look at this bill to make sure we are on the right track. As I have said, it is estimated that Reader's Digest would lose 64 per cent of its present revenue.

I have just given you the redistribution of that revenue which in no way seems to indicate a re-organization or re-allocation of the revenue in the direction the Secretary of State would like.

Another factor we should keep in mind is the area of growth in this list of media I have presented. Where are these areas growing, in the total concept of the advertising dollar that is available? I should like to put on the record some figures covering the period from 1960 to 1974.

During that period the daily newspapers have grown by 170 per cent, and television has grown by 350 per cent. If we took a close look at the situation I think we would find that television is the major villain as far as periodicals are concerned and the reading time of the Canadian public.

During the same period radio has grown by 250 per cent; business publications have grown by 48 per cent, and the general magazine industry, to my surprise, has grown 76 per cent. In 1960 it had a revenue of $21 million whereas in 1974 its revenue was $37 million.

Although magazine revenue has grown in terms of dollars, and I have not corrected these dollars to constant 1961 dollars, the paid consumer market share during that 14-year period from 1960 to 1974 fell from 3.8 per cent to 2.3 per cent of the market, a drop of 1.5 per cent, I believe. During that same period the total dollar growth for newspapers has been 18 times that of the general magazine category. Television has been 11 times that of the same general magazine category while radio has been eight times. As I mentioned, television seems to have affected magazines perhaps more than any other media.

In 1954 Canadian magazines enjoyed 4.2 per cent, or $14.2 million of total revenue. In 1960 this dropped to 3.8 per cent, and in 1965 to 2.6 per cent, but in the 1965-66 period there was a turn-around and Canadian magazines increased their percentage of that market by .1 per cent, and it climbed to 2.7 per cent in 1966. In 1974, however, it had slid back to 2.3 per cent, or $37 million. In the meantime in 1954 television revenues were $8.6 million, and in 1974 they were $225 million.

I know statistics and figures are boring, but in light of these figures I do not think we can afford to rush this bill through. I think the perspective for 1974 was much different than the perspective for 1960 when this royal commission report came out.

I mentioned earlier in my speech that the 14 magazines belonging to the Magazine Association of Canada have enjoyed a healthy growth. The one with the largest growth has been Miss Chatelaine by 838 per cent. Second to Miss Chatelaine was Time with 115 per cent. Reader's Digest had a growth rate of 37.9 per cent in the period from 1965 to 1974.

● (2050)

The total growth of the Maclean-Hunter publications between 1965 and 1974 was $6.3 million, or a growth performance of 68 per cent for that group which already controls 40.1 per cent of the advertising dollar in that category. The total growth of Time was $5.8 million, or 115 per cent, as I have already mentioned, and the total growth of Reader's Digest was $2 million, or 33.8 per cent in the period between 1965 and 1974.

It is probably worthy of note that Reader's Digest has been an exceptional corporate citizen. They are reaching for a 30 per cent Canadian editorial and subject matter content in their publication. As we all know, they print an English version and they also have a French version, Sélection du Reader's Digest which costs them a subsidy of $157,000 per annum. I think they are an organization which has tried to play the game and they have been very aware of and sensitive to the wishes of the House and of the Canadian people.

I do not want to appear to be affected by their lobby, but I have read the material presented to me quite objectively and I think it is a sound argument for the minister in charge of this bill to take a good second look at before this legislation becomes law.

In this period also another factor has affected us. There has been a rapid growth of major free distribution magazines with advertising revenue in 1974 of $10 million, with total copies per issue in 1974 reaching 2.7 million. This is a sizeable entry into the market for the advertising dollar in Canada and I wonder if it is truly part of the considerations behind this bill. One has to conclude that magazines are still in the process of establishing their medium as a viable competitor to the other media mentioned.

I have mentioned the position of newspapers and particularly of television and radio as the true competitors of the periodical industry, and the establishment of a truly Canadian owned periodical industry in Canada. The Association of Canadian Advertisers had something to say on this subject. Their members are responsible for some $400 million worth of advertising placed in Canada. They have stated that the proposal to rescind Section 19 (2) of the Income Tax Act would:

> . . . tend to weaken the whole magazine field as a medium in Canada compared to the strength of television, radio and daily newspapers.

I urge the minister to look at these facts seriously when he considers this bill and the amendments to it in committee.

The question now before the House would appear to be to provide such legislation guidelines by which the industry can attain a final maturity as a medium deserving the lasting respect and support of the Canadian reading public and those wishing to reach that audience through advertising. I cannot emphasize the phrase "lasting respect" enough.

One of the things that has happened in the last ten years is the destruction of the Canadian decision making base. The private sector does not know where it is at any longer. It is getting retroactive legislation; it gets itself established on one course and pattern; it makes capital investment of a sizeable nature today, and then all of a sudden, through nationalism or a sense of other urgency, we in this chamber start changing the rules. There is a general lack of confidence throughout Canada that is a very serious factor facing the way of life and the standard of living we will have tomorrow.

There are certain criteria that are perhaps necessary and that we should consider. I do not think these are too difficult for a magazine to live up to. It should be edited and published in Canada—that we know. All its publication functions, such as typesetting, platemaking, printing, the circulation, advertising, customer service and billing operations, treasury and administration, should be conducted in Canada. The magazine should be published by a Canadian corporation, proprietor, partnership or association incorporated or registered under the laws of Canada or one of its provinces. We are asking for 75 per cent Canadian ownership. Personally, I think that is excessive. I think we should be asking for 51 per cent over a period of three years.

It should have a degree of Canadian ownership as defined in section 257 of the Income Tax Act, and the magazine should publish in Canada in two official languages. I do not know that that would always be possible for the small periodicals which seem to be the source of demand and agitation for the bill that we are discussing now. I agree that the policy should be controlled by a Canadian board of directors and that at least 75 per cent of those directors should be Canadians. It should be wholly directed and edited in Canada by a management and staff resident in Canada. It should be able to grant complete freedom of editing to its editors, the editors being in Canada and subject only to copyright law.

A Canadian magazine should contain a proportion, excluding advertising matter, of editorial content to the extent of 30 per cent. I think that this is a reasonable demand of any foreign owned magazine working in Canada if the Canadian people are to have a perspective of the globe and of other countries, and of what is happening in other spheres of influence. What are we going to do in our rush for nationalism, just become knowledgeable of this land alone when the globe is getting smaller and smaller as our ability in communications speeds up faster and faster? It does not make sense to demand any more than 30 per cent Canadian content in that type of magazine.

We should encourage the development of editorial material about Canada which could have international appeal outside of Canadian borders. I think that Reader's Digest has been a magazine that is underrated in the exposure it gives of Canadians and this great land to other peoples of the world.

I think these are a clear set of standards that would enhance the free flow of information essential to citizens in a free state such as Canada. Let me return to the words of the royal commission. This set of standards would ensure the attainment of objectives outlined by the Royal Commission on Periodicals which stated:

> Only a truly Canadian printing press, one with the feel of Canada and directly responsible to Canada, can give us the critical analysis, the informed discourse and dialogue which are indispensable in a free society.

I think those are criteria for which we can ask without threatening the survival of the Time and Reader's Digest and the other newspapers and periodicals I have mentioned at the beginning of my address.

In order to help some 58 small independents, this bill risks Canadian payrolls, Canadian plants, Canadian suppliers, and a chance for the world to see Canada and for Canada to see the world through the eyes of other writers. I think that is too much to risk with this bill. We also risk the French edition, Selection du Reader's Digest", in Canada which is already costing that organization a subsidy of $157,000 a year.

● (2100)

I would like to see a much more positive approach on this subject. I think we should correct the distribution system. I think it is fundamentally wrong, and I do not know how we got into the position where 13 of the 14 distributors of periodicals in Canada are American owned. If we are to give Canadian magazines and periodicals a chance, I believe that we should provide a tax incentive, and not a disincentive, as we are doing under this bill. If we are to help these 58 small magazines, and if we are to help cultivate talent in students from our universities interested in writing and dedication to a particular point of view, then we should do it with incentives, and not disincentives. I do not think we should threaten that which is serving us well. If we want improvements, we should provide incentives.

In reading one of the reports from the twenty-ninth parliament I was fascinated by the fact that these small, independent magazines with a Canadian perspective could be helped by giving the advertisers in those small magazines 125 per cent deductibility on their advertising dollar. In that way there would be an incentive to encourage advertising in those small magazines. The hardheaded world of advertising and business just will not spend money in small magazines which are struggling for a breath of life because large circulation does not exist. I cannot get it out of my head that if we want to help this Canadian need, and if we want to help these budding Canadian artists, an incentive system like 125 per cent deductibility on the Canadian advertising dollar is the way to do it.

I think we should also return to having postal rates whereby the larger the circulation the higher the bulk rate because, after all, the Post Office is working at a loss, and these bulk rates cannot cover their cost. If the Canadian people are subsidizing the postal service, perhaps the higher the circulation of the periodical or magazine, the higher the bulk rate should be. That would give the small Canadian entrepreneur and the Canadian artist a chance to enjoy a lower cost and a competitive distribution, because economy of scale does apply, and it applies more importantly in this area than in most other aspects of industry.

We have discussed 75 per cent Canadian ownership. I think that is extremely severe and impractical. I think we should be satisfied with 51 per cent Canadian ownership of magazines which want deductibility privileges in Canada. I think we should ask that this be achieved over a 24 to 36 month period.

We have discussed the need for Canadian editorial content, Canadian management, Canadian production facilities, Canadian payrolls, and the use of Canadian supplies. I think it would be a mistake to demand more than 30 per cent Canadian content. I do not think we have the talent to produce more than that and still maintain the broad popularity and the world perspective most Canadians want, at least the Canadian readers who support such magazines as Time and Reader's Digest.

I plead for a more positive approach in resolving this national debate and the dilemma which have now been going on for more than 15 years. I think we should try to resolve them with a program of incentives and not of disincentives and destructives moves such as are contained in Bill C-58.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, one should express gratitude for being able to participate in an important debate such as this, but I personally have mixed feelings about the privilege of standing here to respond to a measure which I consider to be a threat to the orderly cultural evolution of our country.

I listened with great interest to the minister when he spoke in defence of this measure, the elimination of Section 19(2) of the Income Tax Act, and I heard him speak about the cultural integrity of our country. He compared the magazine industry with our transportation industry. He went as far as to compare the magazine industry with the National Hockey League. I wonder whether there will ever be a day when I will have to speak in this House in response to a measure which might recall our Canadian hockey players from the United States, or which might put a tariff on editorial comment which may come to Canada from other parts of the world or leave Canada for some other part of the world. That is about how ridiculous I consider the measure before us.

We want to protect and stimulate interest within the magazine industry in Canada, and the problem is that there is an obvious and deliberate attempt to censor not only magazines coming into Canada from other parts of the world but also to direct the content of the Canadian magazine industry within our country. This is a serious matter which is of concern to most of us. It is a deliberate attempt to direct cultural evolution within our country. I would like to know who is attempting to direct our cultural evolution. It certainly is a departure from the words I heard expressed by one of our learned colleagues, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien), who was here a few moments ago.

A couple of years ago I had the privilege to attend a dinner at the Chateau next door when we had asked a number of young Canadians under the Adventure in Citizenship program to come to the capital city. I was proud to be a member of parliament that night because the then secretary of state for external affairs told these young Canadians that he was not so concerned as some people about the lack of an identity for our country, but that he was concerned with the preservation of something we valued, a multicultural approach and the cultural mosaic of which we are so proud, and of which the world is so envious.

This cultural mosaic allows us to pick the best from the world and from all the cultures of the citizens who live within our country, and to shape it. I do not see any attempt by the government to go to the newsstands and regulate and direct the cultural evolution when it comes to dirt magazines. They seem to have taken over. I wish the hon. member from Vancouver who spoke before me had expounded on how that industry has been allowed to evolve and take over the front shelves of the newsstands in the last while.

Mr. Huntington: I don't read them.

Mr. Oberle: My hon. colleague does not read them, and neither do I. Nor will I encourage my kids to do so. This is a matter of serious concern to many people in my constituency, and they have written to me about it. It is a matter of serious concern to many people in other parts of the country as well.

How is this cultural maturity, of which the minister speaks, to be achieved? Is it for example to be achieved in a similar way to the way we treat CBC? I think the reason why the minister is concerned about the financial welfare of the magazine industry in Canada is that he considers it to be in trouble. The magazine industry in Canada is in as much trouble as the CBC would be were it not for the taxpayers of Canada who support it. The reason is that neither the CBC nor the magazine industry responds to the contemporary mood and desires of citizens. The electronic and the print media are directed by a group of intellectual socialists, an elite group who believe it necessary to direct and advance the cultural evolution in the way they see fit. That is the reason why the magazine industry is in trouble, and that is the reason why it costs Canadians so much to support this monster called the CBC.

● (2110)

As you know, Madam Speaker, I grew up in another part of the world. I too am starved for the cultural milieu in which I grew up. I used to enjoy classical music, and still do. Nobody denies me the privilege of reading classical books. I too am starved for this cultural milieu that these people tell us is missing. But I travel around this country, Madam Speaker, and I feel the pulse and the desire of Canadians. They are not the same as I feel perhaps, or that the people I represent in this House feel, who live so far away from the great cultural centres of Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver. They live in the smaller centres of the country, but still are not as culturally starved as some people who live in the concrete jungles. That is because they can make contact with things that people in the great cities cannot—with nature. They know what it is to be out and challenge the elements, to be your own man. They have the pioneering spirit still, which is being stifled by this cultural evolution that is taking place. It is necessary to preserve that pioneering spirit if we are to continue to develop this country in the way it has been developed over the last hundred years.

I should like to know who is making the decision that there is going to be censure. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford) has said that he will insist that the magazines coming into Canada be 80 per cent different from those published by the parent company in another country.

The minister who brought this bill before us says there will be no censure. Surely he cannot be so naive as to try to make us believe that the difference in the magazines can be that in one an article appears in the front, and in another it appears in the back. Surely he would not defend this bill on those grounds. No indeed, he insists that the contents of the magazine which this act regulates be 80 per cent different from the magazine published in the United States. He cannot tell me that is an attempt to help mature this cultural evolution—that it is not an attempt to erect a cultural barrier along the longest peaceful border in the world, that between the United States and Canada. He cannot tell me there will not be a curtain along that border with the maple leaf on it. Some of the other measures with which we are confronted point that out in no uncertain terms.

We have a problem when attempting to defend some of the action we have taken in the electronic media against our American colleagues. We are pirating signals from the border cities of the United States, stripping them of advertising and selling them to a Canadian audience. What price cultural integrity there, I ask—what about any kind of integrity in the face of a scheme like that? The United States has no laws similar to those we are constructing here. They are not afraid of something that might come down from Canada although perhaps they had better be soon.

It is ridiculous to try to defend ourselves and make any kind of sense in talking to our American counterparts—as we recently had the opportunity of doing in Quebec City—when we come up with such laws and regulations.

Section 19(2) of the act provides the same privileges for Time and Reader's Digest as for many other publications. Today I learned that a number of newspapers in western Canada are totally owned outside this country. They have always presented the Canadian viewpoint, always displayed the contemporary scene in the little towns they serve where no Canadian had the guts to start such newspapers. They had to come from the United States and Great Britain. All of a sudden we say that these newspapers are in our country and doing something bad to us. That is nonsense, Madam Speaker. Surely we cannot let it go unchallenged.

When the minister says that Time and Reader's Digest enjoy special privileges in this country he is misinterpreting the facts—the minister is a stranger to the facts. These magazines do not enjoy special privileges in our country; they enjoy the same privileges as any other publication in the country—that of allowing advertisers to deduct that cost as an expense for taxation purposes. I say it is wrong that this privilege should now be taken from them.

If we have to discuss the matter at all we should at least have tried to make a distinction between Reader's Digest, that great window of the world, and Time magazine. I agree with the minister that it is impossible to do this; they are already in an impossible situation, and to perpetuate it would be wrong.

I think this bill should be withdrawn, Madam Speaker. The minister is embarking on a course that will haunt us. We are talking about advertising dollars which are presently being spent in these great international magazines and which will apparently now flow to the Canadian media.

I have used advertising in the various business I have conducted in my time. I consider an advertiser to be much like a reader. If I spend a dollar on advertising I insist that I get my money's worth. Any smart businessman would. The giant-international corporations and the large corporations within our country that can afford to advertise in these international magazines will continue to do so even if the tax privilege is removed. They will continue to advertise in those two magazines in preference to any other media. Time and Reader's Digest will likely continue to send their publications to Canada—under considerable hardship no doubt, but I do not think they will be discouraged by a measure such as this from catering to the needs of the Canadian people.

I must confess that Reader's Digest is a little more to me than just a Canadian news magazine. I have a very direct, personal, and emotional relationship with the Reader's Digest and I hope you will bear with me if I elaborate just a little. I started reading Reader's Digest when it was called Das Beste, which in English means The Best. That magazine was published in the country in which I grew up.

I was 12 when the second war ended, and even at that tender age I felt that my mother country had nothing to offer me in the future. I looked around the world because I was young and ambitious. My older brother had read Reader's Digest when he was a prisoner of war in Great Britain. He advised me to read Reader's Digest and bought me my first subscription. I was 19 when I read two particularly good stories about Canada. I then decided what part of the world best suited me and my particular needs. Even at the tender age of 19 people have their own ideas.

It was the two stories about Canada I read in Das Beste which influenced my decision to come to Canada. That is why I am emotionally involved with the magazine. I do not want to see people all over the world deprived of the wonderful stories Reader's Digest prints about Canada. I want to see people of 26 countries who read that magazine read the wonderful stories about my own country, about Canada. I, for one, commend that magazine's objective and disciplined reporting of the contemporary scene. We should all be proud of the series of magnificent stories about this country which are read throughout the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, I object strongly to having our window on the world shaded by this stupid proposed regulation. All of us here have received hundreds of letters on this issue, and I have received not one which supports the minister's attempt at regulation.

Mr. Woolliams: Neither have I.

Mr. Oberle: Let me read into the record what a writer in Prince George has written. He says in part:

> The Reader's Digest, in my opinion, is one of the finest monthly publications on the newsstand today. Its Canadian content and educational material is accepted and read in our Christian home faithfully and any attempt to remove it from the bookshelf would be an insult to my family's intellectual capacity to freely absorb unbiased opinion of current world affairs.

Mr. Woolliams: Just look at the government members laughing.

Mr. Oberle: Obviously the government finds this funny. I do not think the people we represent in our constituency find this quite as humorous. I do not think the people in the constituencies of hon. members opposite find this funny. After all, I do not need to defend myself in their constituencies. They will have to defend themselves when their actions come back to haunt them in the not too distant future.

I will not bore my colleagues by articulating how we should encourage young people to enter the publishing field. If we want to create a viable cultural strategy in our country, we must ensure that all Canadians, whether they live in Prince George or downtown Toronto, in Lower Post, B.C., McBride or Tuktoyaktuk—

An hon. Member: Or Humboldt, Saskatchewan.

Mr. Oberle: Yes, or even Humboldt, Saskatchewan—we must ensure that all Canadians are included in our cultural community and are served by a medium of culture. As for Humboldt, there is a culturally starved community.

Mr. Lang: If you believe that, you believe anything.

Mr. Oberle: During the last election campaign I visited my friends in Humboldt. They were of my ethnic background, and they had an old-fashioned picnic with all kinds of razzmataz and a brass band for those who turned up in great numbers. It was an expression of old-time culture in Humboldt. We did not perform the music of Mozart of Beethoven, but we did tell them a few facts. I was quite fair about the minister. I said he is a good representative of his party in the House of Commons but I had my doubts about whether he really represented the farm community in Saskatchewan. I am sure, when those people evaluate the minister's contribution to this debate, they will remember the fellow who came from British Columbia. They will remember what he said and wonder if he was not right when he suggested that their member of parliament does not really represent the views of his constituents in the House of Commons.

We must make sure that Canadians, wherever they live, have access to the electronic media. Not all Canadians have such access. The CRTC puts all sorts of stumbling blocks in the way of people who want to establish radio or television stations in out-of-the-way places where people are denied access to the electronic media. When I was first elected in 1972, part of my constituency on highway 16 consisted of 5,000 people who did not have access to television. They could listen to one radio program of questionable quality which originated in a far-off centre. I discussed this problem with the minister. Of course the CBC had decided that establishing television service in my area would not be lucrative, and therefore the people living in McBride and other isolated areas would have to do without television service. The corporation could not afford to install it. The minister told me if it cost 25 cents less to put the eleventh channel into downtown Toronto than to put the first channel into McBride, that channel would go to into Toronto—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I wonder if the hon. member has not strayed from the bill. We are discussing, Bill C-58, which is to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, I am talking about broadcasting. Surely the magazine industry broadcasts some form of news. I am talking about the special problems of those who are not served with television programs. Until I represented them, many of the people of my constituency were without such service. We also read Time and Reader's Digest and, before we had access to radio and television coverage those magazines, for our people, represented the most sensible reporting which could be found in Canada. If it were not for the fact they now have one television signal, they would probably come here with placards protesting against this bill. They would consider it a further infringement on their special rights and privileges.

● (2130)

I am sorry to belabour this point, but I want to elicit the minister's support for a second television signal or cable system that would help the cultural evolution in those parts of Canada of which I speak. The minister said the CRTC must follow the regulations. He said the people in the city of Prince George cannot apply for a cablevision licence because they only have one of the existing TV signals, namely the CBC. In order for them to apply for cablevision, they must first have access to both television signals, the CBC and CTV, for one year. Only after that time can an application for cablevision be heard. Because you do not have access to both signals, you cannot have access to anything else.

If we really wanted to do something cultural in this country, we would ensure that every Canadian has access to all the media in this country, some of which are of excellent and enjoyable quality. We would give incentives to small entrepreneurs to provide those kinds of services. We would remove the stumbling blocks which I consider the CBC, CRTC and other regulatory bodies to be. However, that is not the intention of this bill.

The intention of this bill is to erect cultural barriers and to regulate and censor the media in this country. That should come as no surprise to anyone who has watched the performance of the government and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) since 1968. If I may refer to my country of origin, the first thing a gentleman there did when he got the power in 1933 was to censor the magazine and newspaper industry as well as the electronic industry. In fact he did not allow access from outside the country. That was the beginning of all evil in central Europe at that time. It should be no surprise to anyone to see this government embarking on that kind of course.

This is a strong, central government which is determined to remove the rights, privileges and law-making freedom of the provinces. It is attempting to take over private industry and destroy private enterprise. Wherever possible it establishes disincentives for anyone who wants to help himself and structure his own destiny. The government is determined to look after all its people from the cradle to the grave, destroying any incentive that anyone may muster.

This measure will come back to haunt us. Our friends to the south will retaliate. They have to retaliate. We already stepped on their toes with the measures I touched on earlier, the electronic media and the curtain we have put up. They will have to respond. I am afraid the response will not be welcome.

Surely the interests of this country would be better served if the government would respond to the contemporary mood and needs of the majority of our citizens, and provide incentives and encouragement to Canadian talents to compete against foreign publications, instead of erecting artificial barriers against them. The time and need for better understanding of a global problem have never been greater. It is essential to the very survival of the human race that nations and societies respect each other's integrity. In a country such as ours where the greatest asset is the multicultural heritage of our citizens, one wonders what the government intends to achieve by a move that is at least parochial, if not overly nationalistic.

I do not intend to support the government on this measure unless someone can demonstrate to me that, in the process of saving a Canadian publishing industry, it will not destroy something that is considered by many Canadians to be a Canadian institution itself.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, in the beginning I might say that I am quite opposed to the government's position with regard to which magazines are eligible for the tax changes imposed in this bill. I am in reasonable agreement with the proposition that most magazines should be 75 per cent Canadian owned. However, with regard to governing of content, the government has given the civil servants far too much power. It smacks too much of censorship.

My main objection to this bill is adequately expressed by a letter which the "Mennonite Brethren Herald" has written, I presume, to every member of parliament. I quote:

> If some of you have read Time's recent account of the U.S. government's debacle in Viet Nam, in terms of sober and ultimately health-giving reportage, I think you will understand what it is about a publication such as this which has made so many of us reach for it rather than for Maclean's. Or the Watergate coverage, to give another example.
>
> The government's position—as I understand it—would be that to qualify as a Canadian publication, the magazine would need to be 60-80 per cent different from the parent U.S. publication and 75 per cent Canadian owned. For Time this would obviously mean ceasing to be. The government would be totally re-making the magazine so that it could impossibly continue to be the very thing for which we have chosen to receive it. This is a form of muzzling of the press which I believe we should view very seriously. We are already exposed to many extremist voices in this country, and what the government is doing by its legislation is making us more susceptible to them. Rather than giving the privilege of easy access to publications with a large world view, it is opening the door for the narrowest kind of Canadianism or the strongly ideological kind of journalism which is becoming increasingly common in this country.
> It is this sort of manipulation of the press which we should view with the utmost seriousness. The free movement of the press ought to be one of our most cherished possessions and jealously defended. Canadians in a very real sense are being deprived of their freedom of choice in a manner which is much more reminiscent of totalitarian regimes than a truly open democracy. Such an action by a Canadian government brings to me a great sense of foreboding.

We have in this country far too many regulatory bodies in matters of culture that are directly related to what the government thinks. We have the CBC who are carrying on a virulent campaign of anti-Americanism and who are carrying on a virulent anti-Western campaign. Perhaps in the fate of Time and Reader's Digest and the noisy debate that has ensued, most people see in this an attempt by the government to restrict the freedom of the press, to establish some sort of cultural sovereignty with economic nationalism, anti-Americanism and corporate power, and to restrict the right of citizens to read what they please.

But let us take a look at what the government is actually proposing. This measure is technically a tax measure but the objective of the legislation is not to raise federal revenues. Almost certainly it will reduce them. There is not even an attempt to Canadianize Time and Reader's Digest, which might be a reasonable course, by use of the ownership principle. Obviously the idea is to knock out these U.S.-based publications so that they will no longer be major competitive forces in the Canadian magazine industry. It is obviously the hope that this will clear a path for new domestic publications, more specifically a weekly news magazine.

By the withdrawal of the income tax amendment it is intended to diminish the sale of these periodicals in the hope that the revenue from their former advertising will go to Canadian publications. But it is unlikely that this will happen to nearly the extent the government would like. Indeed it seems likely that with the phasing out of the tax measure both Time and Reader's Digest will find it profitable to leave the country.

But will this stop Time and Reader's Digest being read within Canada? I doubt that it will. In 1944, when Reader's Digest first came to Canada, sales in the English division were something like one million. It seems interesting that at the present time, taking into account the increase in population, sales in the English edition are not any larger. They have obviously added the French edition, which of course would be lost. Will the removal of these two publications from the Canadian scene meet the government's desire to increase the revenue available to Canadian magazines? It seems to be far from certain, the more you look at it.

The 1970 Davey Report on the mass media said it had to concede—it is impossible to predict the effects of removing the exemptions with much precision—and merely urged the government—to remove the exemptions and see what happens.—Presumably, as far as advertising is concerned, the magazines might decide to remain in Canada and continue as they are, in which event advertisers might decide to spend less on their Canadian publications in order to continue advertising in Time and Reader's Digest at a higher cost. Or they could decide to settle for less space in the two magazines at the same price they are paying now, which would not do anything at all for other publications.

Some advertising experts have predicted that if Time and Reader's Digest do leave Canada it would hurt rather than help the smaller publications, because the disappearance of these two magazines with their large circulations would make it unprofitable to prepare magazine advertisements. So it seems obvious, and it is a very real possibility, that we might lose two magazines and gain very little in return. There is no certainty that dollars which go to Time and Reader's Digest would go to other magazines.

It is interesting to note that the main contributors to magazine advertising—I did not realize this until I had checked it through—are liquor, automobiles and travel. It is significant these are fields in which international companies are usually involved and, as I understand it, even if they advertise in Time and Reader's Digest after they have left the country they could, in effect, recover the cost by charging a management fee to the Canadian subsidiary.

To attract advertising dollars, a magazine must first attract readers. Could, for instance, a news weekly magazine such as Maclean's, attract dollars if Time and Reader's Digest leave the country? I do not think anyone seriously believes any magazine could approach the Reader's Digest with its vast international appeal. Reader's Digest is in a class by itself. Its stories are universal in appeal; they can be set anywhere in the world; you only have to change the name of the place and the story is quite suitable. If a Canadian magazine can attract readers, why don't they do it now? There does not seem to be any reason at the moment why any Canadian magazine along the lines of Time could not be as successful now as if Time were no longer here.

People obviously read Time not so much for its Canadian content but because as a North American publication it gives us a window on the world. As for the Canadian content, I have never found it particularly good, and I can find the material in our own newspapers and elsewhere. We have to recognize that we live on the North American continent and we think of the world from a North American point of view. There is no assurance that if Time and Reader's Digest depart, an equivalent Canadian news magazine could give us this viewpoint.

Perhaps in this discussion certain things are not quite appreciated. Look at our population. Although we have a population of 22 million it is divided among two languages. In effect, the 6 million Francophones are not part of the English reading culture, so the market for English magazines is reduced to between 12 and 14 million people.

Again, we are very regional in our population and our reading habits; the English language magazines must necessarily be based in Toronto. I might say that if there is any group of literary Canadians more disliked in Canada by other Canadians it is those who live just outside of Toronto. The regional prairies and the West Coast are not interested in the day-to-day happenings of the Toronto literary world. If they must look outside they tend to look outside to Minneapolis and St. Paul, to Los Angeles and San Francisco. It is all part of living on the North American continent.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

Canadian publications which cannot hold their readers are not alone in their fate. In the United States, Life, Look, Saturday Evening Post and a host of publications in that country, with its vast market of 200 million people, have also gone under. It seems to me that with the publication of a Canadian weekly news magazine the problems are particularly complex. If such a magazine is to be called Canadian, then surely the six pages of Canadian content in Time will not keep it from attracting readers and advertising. On the other hand, if it is to be international in its scope, like Time, its competition for readers will be equally intense, whether Time has a Canadian edition or not.

It does not seem possible to me that a Canadian publication can expect the worldwide coverage Time or even Newsweek can provide for its market. The Canadian market simply isn't large enough to sustain an effort of that scale. It seems obvious that the outlook of a Canadian news magazine on the international scene will closely parallel an American viewpoint on the international scene. In other words, since we live on the same continent our viewpoints will be quite similar to those in the United States.

● (2150)

If Time is driven out of this country it seems likely that the United States edition will be available in Canada, and Canadian news magazines will have to compete with others in expressing their viewpoints on international affairs. The Canadian news magazine will be essentially similar. It seems to me that the argument really comes down to whether it is better to have a single Canadian news magazine owned by a concentrated group engaged in competition with Time, Newsweek and other trans-border magazines lacking Canadian content. While Time may not be what Canadians would like to have, it is so powerful that the present situation is better than what the new situation would be.

What about the rule that publications do not qualify if the contents are substantially the same as those published abroad? I understand that this regulation has been on the books since 1964 but has been largely overlooked because it did not apply to any major publication. No real guidelines as to the percentage of figures that a Canadian publication must have have ever been laid down. However, the Federal Court case in 1972 of Jay-Kay Publications had this to say:

> The evidence discloses that the Canadian publication has been mainly a repeat in a proportion of 60 per cent of the material published in the American publication, and for this reason alone it would not qualify.

That is to say, it would not qualify as Canadian under our tax laws. This type of percentage could be used to qualify a Canadian publication in the following situation. A Canadian publication might have ten pages of American content of high literary value and 20 pages of Canadian garbage and it would qualify, presumably by being under the umbrella.

I should also like to point out that there are one or two magazines that will be caught in the net that I think should be allowed to stay. I refer to the medical magazine Modern Medicine of Canada. I believe there are other artistic and scientific magazines in the same category. Since medical knowledge is world wide and really knows no international boundaries, it seems senseless to drive out what magazines we have at present.

In a brief presented by the publishers of Modern Medicine to members of parliament, they put forward a very good case to the effect that Modern Medicine of Canada is a genuine international, scientific and medical magazine, and that Canadian publishing policy should not discriminate against it and other publications. Modern Medicine is similar to other medical publications spanning five languages and 40 different countries in the international family of medical publications. The Canadian edition has access to material published in other editions. In effect, it is merely a collection of synopses taken from medical and scientific articles appearing in magazines throughout the world, of which there are a vast number.

Canadian scientists in general and medical scientists in particular find it very difficult to publish their articles, particularly on research, in any journal. The National Research Council spends $35 million a year on medical research projects. Large sums of money are also being spent by universities and provincial governments on medical research over and above this $35 million. One of the complaints of Canadian scientists and researchers is that the vast majority of this research, which is often quite good, never sees the light of day but accumulates, ages and withers in the files.

The throwing out of the two magazines M.D. Canada and Modern Medicine, particularly the latter, will in no way contribute to the publication of scientific articles by a Canadian scientist. Medical knowledge is a truly international field, and it seems that little will be gained by removing Modern Medicine from Canada. It will probably be replaced by the American edition and will feature mainly American authors. Canadian authors will not have any chance of publishing the results of their research. The problem of publishing scientific research results is so acute that I believe the Science Council of Canada has considered it, and is looking for ways in which scientists can have their research published.

This bill brings out the eternal problem of the goverment's right to intervene in the content of the printed word. It is substantially different from the situation in the broadcasting and television fields. My position is that the government should not withdraw the tax provisions relating to Time and Reader's Digest provided they meet the Canadian ownership rule of 75 per cent. To drive these two magazines out of Canada would not likely improve the position of the Canadian publishing world. The monopoly of the Maclean-Hunter chain would give Maclean's domination over the influential publishing and opinion moulding media of our times. I do not think this power should be given to Maclean's magazine or any other single magazine in existence. Therefore, Madam Speaker, I intend to vote against this bill on second reading.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, I should like to discuss Bill C-58 now before the House, but quite frankly I feel obliged to call it ten o'clock.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF SUB-COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE CIDA

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, on two occasions in the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence I have presented motions asking that a special sub-committee be established to examine the Canadian International Development Agency's financial controls, accounting procedures, and other matters related to the fiscal management and control within this government agency. My motions were defeated. I have since asked the minister of external affairs to consider establishing a special sub-committee to examine CIDA procedures as I am making no headway with these motions. I am now requesting the government to have the office of the Auditor General examine all CIDA operations.

In March, 1975, a report of the independent review committee on the office of the Auditor General submitted a 162 page report dealing with the Auditor General's functions. In this report a number of recommendations were made dealing with Crown corporations, and these recommendations could also be applied to government agencies like CIDA. One of the recommendations is that the Auditor General should have the right of access to the financial records and documents of all Crown corporations of which he is not the auditor, as he deems necessary to the fulfilment of his responsibilities as auditor of the accounts of Canada.

Another recommendation is that each commercially oriented government corporation should have an audit committee. The report also had 47 other recommendations. Many of them cover reasons why there should be a complete audit of CIDA's financial operations and a complete examination of all its documents, particularly in regard to the Cuban loans and the reasons why minutes of CIDA meetings are not finalized and reviewed by the CIDA management committee. The President of CIDA stated that minutes taken at management committee meetings have no official meaning. This statement is also unbelievable in regard to conducting government business.

● (2200)

At the External Affairs Committee meeting of Thursday, April 10, 1975 the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) stated that usual standards of government efficiency simply cannot be applied to CIDA operations. This is all the more reason why the Auditor General should be instructed to undertake a complete examination of the whole operation.

In a memorandum to the Secretary of State for External Affairs from the President of CIDA, dated December 3, 1974, the president stated:

It is currently estimated that sugar production by far the main source of exportation and hard currency earnings could be around 5.75 millions metric tons in 1973-74 which would make a 7 to 12 per cent improvement in performance over the last year crop. Although details of protocols between Cuba and its communists partners are not available it is expected that the communist countries will receive increased sugar supply commitments from Cuba. Approximately 3.45 million metric tons for which they pay less than on the free market.

We should be finding out what financial aid or other aid Russia is providing communist countries like Cuba before we supply aid. This area should be completely examined by the Auditor General.

Also in a memorandum dated December 13, 1974, from the President of CIDA to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, dealing with loan terms for Cuba he stated:

I would suggest that the press release announcing this project not mention specific loan terms and CIDA assistance to Cuba be linked to the totality of economic and trade relations between Canada and Cuba.

Why should not specific loan terms be mentioned? We are dealing with Canadian taxpayer's money. Also, there were difficulties within the Liberal government in that sugar-rich Cuba could, according to several experts, including the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), afford to meet stiffer terms. It also has been stated that CIDA was rushing to spend $117 million within the next few weeks in an effort to impress Treasury Board officials. CIDA apparently feels it must spend the leftover $117 million in order to strengthen its bargaining position when the Treasury Board considers the agency's 1975-76 cash allocation.

Among other loans the Auditor General could examine would be the national survey in Morocco which has cost CIDA $4,385,000 to date. The contract terms expired about one year ago, but the job is only half finished and its future is uncertain.

As a CIDA critic I do not argue that the use of even more money to send wheat to drought stricken areas, to vaccinate cattle, to develop agriculture and commercial fishing, to build badly needed bridges, power dams and irrigation systems, is wrong, but many of CIDA's country-to-country projects have been arousing interest. As an example, CIDA sent a machine which weighs grain and automatically fills and sews up bags to Calcutta, India, about a year ago at a cost of $300,000. Fortunately it has not been installed for use, since labour saving devices have sometimes provoked riots in Calcutta, a city with massive unemployment, but CIDA recently had tenders out for a second and more advanced machine of the same kind estimated to cost $500,000. These reasons are more than enough for a complete examination of CIDA by the Auditor General's department.

Another example was in respect of Senegal where labour is similarly cheap and plentiful. The polytechnical school at Thies is equipped with automatic dishwashers, according to CIDA employees. In addition a ham slicer was provided, a curiosity in this Moslem land where diatery rules forbid the eating of the flesh of swine. Schools have been built in several hot countries along Canadian lines, with few windows but plenty of electric lights. As one CIDA official said: "You know what happens— the hydro in these countries is a terrible price, so what happens is that the local government can't afford to use the building and it's wasted". Such occurrences are common enough in CIDA initiatives that they have now come to be taken pretty much for granted.

Also, Madam Speaker—

[Mr. McKenzie.]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the question of having the committee deal with CIDA over and above the study of estimates is one that the committee has dealt with on a few occasions. As regards another reference to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, the minister and I have indicated to the committee on a few occasions that we were interested in having a reference to the committee, not only to deal with CIDA but to deal with the whole question of Canada's economic and social relations with the developing countries. I think that this would be a good time for the committee to make a real and positive input to Canada's policy with regard to the developing countries.

I am at a loss to understand why the hon. member is concerned about access by the Auditor General to CIDA's books or management processes. I heard him mention at the beginning of his comments the question of Crown corporations. Let me point out to him that CIDA is not a Crown corporation, it is a department of the government, and the Auditor General has complete access to its books, to its structure, to its management processes, as much as to those of any department of the government. So I do not see the necessity of asking for special access by the Auditor General to CIDA.

Both the former and the present Auditor Generals are very competent people and they have had a very competent staff working for them. They know what work they should be doing. They check every department, and if they find something that is not in accordance with the rules and procedure, or with the votes appropriated by parliament, they make their reports which the House of Commons can study, and then suggest remedies and changes at any time hon. members want.

SOCIETY FOR THE STUDY OF THE HERITAGE OF CANADA— REASON FOR PAYMENT TO SOCIETY TO COMPENSATE FOR USE OF NAME

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak on the subject of the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada and, more particularly, to address my remarks to the garbage that has been submitted by the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner).

If I had asked a ten year old child to prepare something for tabling in the House, I am convinced that that child would have done a better job than this shallow, superficial, obviously neglectful attempt at providing answers to the scandal that exists right here with reference to that society. I am disgusted at not seeing the minister himself present to hear what I have to say. I find it very difficult to contain myself with reference to this matter when the government has poured over half a million dollars into a project that has gone down the tube. It has shown, by virtue of the comments contained in the report that was tabled in the House, that it has neither knowledge of nor concern about creditors. Not satisfied with legislating against Reader's Digest, it has helped them a little farther down the road by going after the Foreign Study League of Paris. I am sure that the Secretary of State is not even aware of the fact that a subsidiary of Reader's Digest is a creditor to the tune of $160,000 to the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada. I am very concerned about this attitude of the minister.

The Foreign Study League is only one of several creditors lending in excess of half a million dollars. It is interesting that the government has poured in excess of half a million dollars into the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada, and it is interesting that this society is now in the glue and owes people, including students, in excess of half a million dollars.

I think it is indeed significant that the minister has not indicated in his report that he has even seen the bankruptcy statement of this society, let alone that he is aware of the companies behind which this society is very well sheltered, and I refer to the same society with the additional name of Toronto. I refer to Palace Investments, M. and M. Travel, the LaSalle Hotel, and so on. There has been no concern about the students who have been ripped off. I wonder if he really cares about Marline and Charline Johnson, Helen Hollicks and Sue Messenger, four little girls from Creston whose earnings of $410 each have gone down the tube.

The minister said he has only received communications from two creditors. Obviously he has not bothered to lift the paper and look at it. He has not seen that the University of Ottawa was ripped off to the extent of $52,000. I told the Secretary of State that the reason the people of Canada were ripped off was that they thought this was an agency of the government, and I suggested that he look at their stationery, their logo, and read what they said. What has the Secretary of State provided in his report? He provided photocopies of two pieces of stationery which do not even apply.

If the Secretary of State had bothered to consult the trustees, he would have seen the slick material which was produced, which has the Canadian flag as its logo, the very words of which indicate that it is a society and a government agency. In his statements he has not demonstrated any concern about the money which came to this society through the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In fact he said that they recommended that the wilderness project not be funded, but the Indian Affairs Department funded it.

The minister had indicated no concern over the applications for charitable contributions to this society. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford) has given this society a certificate which says that it is an organization to which charitable donations are tax deductible. How much of the Canadian taxpayers' dollar has gone to this organization, and where is that money? The Secretary of State has avoided those questions. He has avoided involving the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Department of National Revenue, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), and the Minister of National Revenue. I say that the Secretary of State is doing Canadians a disservice.

Adjournment Debate

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, early in 1971 during preliminary planning for the establishment of Heritage Canada, officers of this department checked with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to see whether the name Heritage Canada was free for use in this connection or whether it had already been registered by some other corporation or person. We were told that the name was free for our use and that it would be protected until we were ready to establish Heritage Canada formally.

It was subsequently discovered that the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada had previously adopted a short form title, Heritage of Canada, for everyday use, including telephone book listings. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs then advised us that in the new circumstances the title Heritage Canada would not, after all, be available for our use, and that the only way we could obtain the use of that title would be by negotiating with the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada to obtain its consent to cease using its shortened title, Heritage of Canada. We were also advised that we should be prepared, if necessary, to pay compensation to the society for any reasonable expenses it would have to incur in making this change. I use the example of printing new letterheads, new brochures, new promotional material, etc.

After careful consideration at the highest level within the department it was agreed that Heritage Canada was, for a number of reasons, the absolutely right title for the organization we were proposing to launch, and that we should therefore enter into negotiations with the society to persuade it to cease to use its shortened title within an acceptable period, and to offer to reimburse it for all reasonable expenses that would have to be incurred by the society in making this change, such expenses to be authenticated by receipted vouchers or in some other way satisfactory to the department.

Treasury Board approval was obtained in September, 1972, to open negotiations with the society. This was done immediately, and a legal agreement with the society in a form satisfactory to the department was signed by officers of the society in October, 1972. The amount paid to the society under the terms of the agreement, after production by the society of the necessary supporting documents, was $79,262. Payment was actually made early in 1973 by Heritage Canada from earlier federal operation and maintenance grants provided at the establishment of Heritage Canada. This is the extent of the department's relationship with this organization.

The hon. member, who is disgusted with a $500,000 expenditure, would be well advised to observe how it was actually spent. I should also like to remind the hon. member that the money to which he refers was financially efficient in a program which brought the greatest pleasure, adventure and excitement to the lives of hundreds of senior citizens that they had ever known.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Adjournment Debate

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA FOR PROJECTS

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Madam Speaker, I rise to develop a question that I asked today and one that comes to my mind each time the report of regional development incentives is produced by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. One can go through this report very carefully and find not a single acceptance of a project within the province of British Columbia. This is true of the last two reports, and was almost equally true of the previous two although there might have been one small project accepted in them.

If it were a case that no area in British Columbia was designated to qualify for these grants, that would be the end of the matter. But there is an area in the province which lies within my constituency and that of Kootenay West that has been accepted by the program, but there is a dismaying lack of acceptance of projects.

When I was in the city of Cranbrook last winter I heard that it was extremely difficult to have a project from British Columbia accepted. I looked into a couple of cases. In one case the reason given was:

> In the face of a reducing production in the industry, one must recognize the fact that jobs cannot be created in this circumstance. New jobs would simply displace existing jobs in the total industry and the basic intent of the Regional Development Incentives Act would not be served.

That is one approach to one kind of project. One can argue that perhaps the department could have taken a fresh look at the research in the area. When one looks at the second case, however, one finds a different situation. This applicant was told:

> In the circumstances, we have had to conclude that you do not need our support to make this project feasible and financially attractive. We therefore cannot justify the use of public funds for this purpose in accordance with Section 7(1)(a) which stipulates that we cannot provide an incentive if it is probable that the facility in question would be established without such assistance.

That project was in the sawmilling industry, an industry that has been extremely hard hit in British Columbia over the past year by closures and layoffs. The slump is continuing. I should think that any sawmill in the province that had the courage to expand at this time would deserve every aid, co-operation, and assistance from the federal government.

● (2220)

I was particularly concerned when I received another news release from the same department, dated April 24. It says in part:

> The Honourable Don Jamieson, Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, today announced that The E.B. Eddy Company of Hull, Quebec, has accepted a regional development incentive offer from his department for the expansion of its facility at Davidson, Quebec, which manufactures spruce lumber and chips. The project is expected to create 73 jobs.
> The incentive offer, of approximately $510,000, is based on a rate of 15 per cent of the approved capital costs . . .

Are we to assume from this announcement that the E.B. Eddy Company was in such poor financial condition that it would collapse unless it received the grant? Contrast this attitude with the one shown to a small outfit in British Columbia which applied for an incentives grant. That grant would have created one third as many jobs in British Columbia as were created by the E.B. Eddy expansion; but the company in British Columbia was told that it did not need the grant because it was getting enough money already.

If one totals the grants made in the last two or three months, it is interesting to note that they have been awarded as follows: there were none at all for British Columbia, two for projects in Alberta, eight to Saskatchewan, one for Newfoundland, 16 for Manitoba, eight to Ontario, six to New Brunswick, four to P.E.I., seven to Nova Scotia, and 51 to Quebec. It is these figures which forced me to raise my question this afternoon, a question to which I did not receive a reasonable answer.

Are we to take it that these applications for projects are judged on a different basis, depending on their place of origin? Are the criteria different? If the criteria are the same we could solve some of the unemployment problem in British Columbia by asking for a team of advisers to be sent to our province from Quebec, to advise applicants from my province, from my constituency, just where they are going wrong in making their applications. Certainly, the rate of success of applications in the province of Quebec compares very favourably with the rate in other provinces. The success rates in the two provinces, British Columbia and Quebec, are so far apart that I am led to ask if there is not something basically wrong with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion incentives program.

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, it is impossible to compare responses to applications from one province with responses to applications from another, as each application is studied on its merits.

On the specific question of the status of the current discussions between DREE and the province of British Columbia, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) said this afternoon that he would seek an up-to-date report on the progress which has been taking place between the officials. When this information has been received, the minister will be in contact with the hon. member.

As hon. members are aware, DREE has undertaken negotiations with the various provinces under general development agreements signed last year. In the case of British Columbia where the southeastern region was designated eligible for DREE incentives, this designation was extended. The latest extension was announced on April 1 and is effective to the end of this year. This action was designed to allow additional projects to be considered for support in this particular area while discussions continue with the government of British Columbia on possible new economic development measures that might be undertaken before this designation expires.

I should like to correct an implication left by the hon. member's questions this afternoon, to the effect that there appeared to be no further DREE offers to companies in the Kootenays regions. Since the designation was extended, companies in the region have continued to apply to DREE for incentive assistance, and since January of this year four offers were announced, including one in the hon. member's constituency. These offers were contained in press releases from the department and will, as a matter of course, be recorded for tabling in the monthly incentive reports to parliament.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.27 p.m.

SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROTECT CONSUMERS FROM DISEASED MEAT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of evidence that has recently come to light that thousands of pounds of tainted meat from Quebec have been sold in Ontario over the past three years, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That this House call upon the Minister of National Health and Welfare to institute an immediate and efficient inspection and information program throughout Canada to protect Canadians from diseased meat.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion is proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 and cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF LACK OF PRECAUTIONS TAKEN BEFORE LISTING A PROSPECTIVE STUDENT EMPLOYER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43, having to do with the lack of checks or precautions taken by student manpower offices before listing a prospective student employer. This can result in students working for fraudulent businesses, getting paid no wages, and missing their opportunity for legitimate summer employment, as was the case recently in Winnipeg. I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk):

That the House direct the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to investigate the circumstances that allowed Mr. Paul Evans of Florida to register a non-existent company as a prospective employer and to be sent 12 innocent students by Manpower to inadvertently assist him in perpetrating a fraud.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion is proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 and cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROPOSED GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to bring forward an extremely urgent motion requiring immediate attention.

Mr. Robert A. McNair, chairman of the Canadian Association of Food Product Manufacturers, has stated that Canadian workers are now receiving better wages than those in the USA for the same type of work, even if our productivity is lower, and that if such a trend persists, the prices of our products will rapidly be higher than those of our competitors. Considering that wage increases are automatically reflected in the prices of products and that such an escalation settles nothing, considering also that it is important to increase the purchasing power of individuals so that they may buy part of our abundant production, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne):

That this House study as early as possible means to establish a universal system of guaranteed annual income that would be paid each and everyone so as to increase individual purchasing power without increasing the prices of products. Such action would put an end to the devastating effects of inflation.

Mr. Speaker: Under Standing Order 43, such a motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is such consent granted?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous consent, so the motion cannot be put.

FINANCE

AVAILABILITY OF REPORTS ON TAX CONCESSIONS TO MANUFACTURING AND PROCESSING INDUSTRIES AS WELL AS WAGE INCREASES AND PRODUCTIVITY PRIOR TO BUDGET

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Finance? It concerns the budget and the availability of certain documents before the budget date, documents which would allow members of this House to evaluate that budget. On May 14 my colleague, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, asked the Minister of Finance to account for the four and a half month delay in the tabling of the final report on tax concessions to manufacturing and processing industries and to give the House some idea when the report will finally be tabled. The Minister replied in part, as recorded on page 5,779 of Hansard:

> The report is now in its final stages and I am advised the committee expects the report to be ready for tabling within a month.

As the minister recently postponed another important statement to this House, can he tell us when the report will be tabled and assure members that it will be available before the date of the budget?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I must obtain up-to-date information on the status of the report before I can give any undertaking.

Mr. Saltsman: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister table the document or report to which he referred and about which I questioned him yesterday, the report or studies showing those industries in which excessive wage increases are threatening Canada's competitive position? In the alternative, by what other means does he propose providing that information to the House. Further, is he prepared to assure the House that this information will be available prior to the budget?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as I said to the hon. gentleman yesterday, I will review whatever commitment I may or may not have made and be in touch with him and the House.

Mr. Saltsman: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are we to take it from the minister's statement that not one of the studies and documents which are the basis of the budget proposals is available; because, certainly, our ability to consider intelligently what is in the budget will depend on what is in those reports? Is the minister suggesting they will not be available to us before budget time?

Mr. Baldwin: The minister does not know what is in the budget yet.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting that.

HEALTH

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PREVENT SALE OF MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The minister has stated that he was aware of the situation with respect to meat unfit for human consumption in Quebec as early as October 1973. I would like to ask him why he did not act under the Food and Drugs Act as the minister responsible for the health of the Canadian people and thus prevent the sale of contaminated meat in Quebec?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will merely repeat the answers given in that connection last week. In October 1973, an inspector of my Department undertook an investigation only from hearsay because there was no actual fact enabling to go any further. However, as soon as there were enough indications to notify the police force concerned, this was done.

[English]

ACTION OF MINISTER TO COMMUNICATE WITH QUEBEC MINISTRY CONCERNING SALE OF MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Last week, in the House, the minister said there has not been any correspondence on this subject with any minister in Quebec. When the minister first learned about putrid meat in Quebec what, if anything, did he communicate to the Quebec minister of agriculture or the officials of his department about this shocking situation; and, why did he not issue some statement to notify Quebeckers that after they have gone shopping they might be eating tainted meat?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as I said, the officials of my department have undertaken an inquiry. An extremely complex and difficult police investigation was in progress; it was important that this investigation should follow its course. Police authorities were responsible for this. There was no evidence enabling us to make specific allegations at any time, before the police investigation was concluded. And there has been, in fact, no oral or written communication between myself and Quebec ministers in this regard. However, the Quebec police force and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were involved in this investigation and, as a matter of fact, they have carried it out completely following the request made by one of the officials of my department.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Did the minister seek any assurance from the province of Quebec that it would immediately institute proper inspection proceedings where there is not federal inspection? In view of what is now public knowledge, as a result of the crime investigation in Quebec, that large volumes of tainted meet have been sold, how can the minister by any stretch of the imagination feel that he has discharged his duties as Minister of National Health and Welfare?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, in this respect, I have no hesitation in answering yes to the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

[English]

POSSIBILITY OF OBTAINING MEAT SAMPLES FROM ESTABLISHMENTS UNDER PROVINCIAL JURISDICTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the revelation by the minister that he first became acquainted with this situation in October 1973 as a result of rumours, may I ask whether at that time samples were taken from packing houses and abattoirs in the province of Quebec that were then operating outside the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture and, if not, why not?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member is once again distorting my previous statements in the House. I consistently said that in the fall of 1973 an inspector of my department started an investigation of the matter and later referred it to the police, but I never said that in October 1973, I personally was aware of the situation.

REASON FOR FAILURE TO PROSECUTE QUEBEC MERCHANTS SELLING MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): The minister stated he was informed of this situation in October 1973. He told the committee this morning he did not contact the RCM Police until February, 1974. My first question is, why the delay? Second, why did the minister himself not proceed under the jurisdiction of the Food and Drugs Act and lay charges through the Attorney General for Canada?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Once again, Mr. Speaker, those are exactly the same questions as last week and which I answered several times. I repeat that I was not the one who asked for the intervention of the police. The reference was made in the normal and daily course of my department's operations by an inspector of my department in Montreal who started an investigation and asked for the intervention of the Mounted Police only in February because the investigation started in October had difficulty in getting under way, which shows how complex the matter is. Things are much less simple than the hon. member seems to think. There is nothing magical, nothing sinister either in all this in the sense that officials of my department co-operated normally with police authorities to bring the investigation to a successful end, which fortunately seems to be the present result.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON SALE OF MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): In view of the substantial public unrest being created by virtue of the revelations being made in Quebec and the evidence that this tainted, contaminated, putrid, diseased meat has been sold outside the province of Quebec, in the interest of putting the minds of the public at rest, will the minister now follow the course he followed last fall when he was confronted with the situation of contaminated hamburger and make a statement in the House?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have already replied very clearly to that question. A Royal Commission has been set up, the investigation must follow its course normally, and I do not think it would be proper at this time to make statements right and left, as apparently suggested by the hon. member, either to facilitate the investigation or reassure Canadian consumers.

AVAILABILITY OF REPORTS ON SAMPLES OF MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicated that in February 1974 the RCMP were asked to investigate some evidence of tainted meat being sold. Can the minister tell us whether any samples were taken from the packing houses in Quebec at that time for examination to determine whether, indeed, this was meat from animals improperly slaughtered and, if so, are there reports available?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question is based again on erroneous information. As of February 1974, there was no evidence, only rumours, that such meat was being sold in Quebec. That is why police forces were called upon to carry out a full investigation, using all the means police forces have at their disposal and which my own department does not have.

REASON FOR FAILURE TO PROSECUTE QUEBEC MERCHANTS SELLING MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): A final supplementary. There now certainly appears to be evidence of tainted meat being sold on a massive scale. I do not think anyone questions this. I want to know why the minister is not laying charges and why he feels that, because an investigation is going on, charges cannot be laid.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think all hon. members will agree that I have allowed on several occasions a repetition of questions which have been answered by the minister. I was reluctant to interfere because of the importance of the subject matter, but it seems to me that the minister has answered this question several times and that I ought now to insist that if there are no fresh questions on this topic we should pass on to another subject.

An hon. Member: The questions are fresher than the meat, anyway!

Mr. Yewchuk: I should like to rephrase my question, then. The minister has stated that no charges were laid because a study by a royal commission is in progress. I am not clear as to why he thinks this prevents him from laying charges.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is much I could add to what I said last week on that matter. If the hon. member cannot understand why it would be improper at this time to institute proceedings, now that a Royal Commission has been set up, I do not think there is anything I can say to convince him or help him understand.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

POSSIBILITY WAGE INCREASE LIMITS APPLICABLE ONLY TO PRIVATE SECTOR—SUGGESTION PUBLIC SERVICE WAGE INCREASES SHOULD EQUAL THOSE IN PRIVATE SECTOR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. As the Minister of Finance is trying to obtain widespread acceptance of his consensus program he no doubt intends that it should apply to all sectors of the economy. In view of the fact that in a written reply to a question asked on May 9 concerning the federal public service and the proposed general wage increase limit of 12 per cent, the President of the Treasury Board stated, as I quote, "The government, as employer, is not subscribing to arbitrary wage increase ceilings in its negotiation of collective agreements", will the Acting Prime Minister tell us whether that statement by the President of the Treasury Board reflects government policy and, if so, whether it is intended that wage increase limits under a consensus program are to apply only to the private sector and not to the federal government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stevens: Considering that in the same reply the President of the Treasury Board stated that public service wage rates must conform to comparable rates of remuneration in the private sector, and that if they increase by 18 per cent he would endeavour to negotiate an 18 per cent increase, will the Acting Prime Minister inform us whether such a statement means that the government does not intend to set an example in wage increase restraint but will only follow the private sector?

[Mr. Yewchuk.]
