Mr. Sharp: I could answer with a simple "No" to that question but perhaps I should add that the purpose of seeking a consensus is to achieve some measure of general restraint. If this applied, it would of course apply to the public sector. If not, I would have to support my colleague the President of the Treasury Board because I do not believe it would be fair to the public service to treat them as being different from the public at large.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary to the Minister of Finance. The minister has expressed concern about the deterioration in Canada's competitive position resulting from a higher rate of increase in labour costs per unit of output in Canada than in the United States. Considering that the President of the Treasury Board states that in setting Canadian public service wage increases it is the higher Canadian wage scales which are relevant, not the more restrained U.S. levels, would the hon. gentleman tell us whether he, too, is concerned about our competitive international position only in the private sector, not the public sector?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, within the context in which the President of the Treasury Board was speaking, that more than bears the truth and I have nothing to add to it.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED MEASURE TO PERMIT EMPLOYEES TO PARTICIPATE IN PROFITS

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance a question.

Could the minister tell the House if he is aware of a statement made by Quebec Premier Robert Bourassa that his government is prepared to commit itself to introduce legislation allowing employees to share corporate profits and, if so, could he advise the House whether he intends to table federal legislation aimed at encouraging employers to allow their employees to share the corporation's profits through, for example, tax exemptions for corporations which implement a profit sharing program?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should first consider the statement of the Quebec premier, but I suppose the question should rather be directed to my colleague the Minister of Labour.

OIL—PRESENT OR PROPOSED INCREASED PRICE FACTOR IN SETTING DOMESTIC PRICE

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In the ongoing discussions over the establishment of a domestic price for crude oil for Canada, is the federal government taking as one of its parameters the current price of oil in the world market, or is it also including the 15 per cent increase in the price of oil that is now being talked about?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was listening carefully to the hon. gentleman but I missed his first few words. I wonder if he would mind repeating the question.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, in the discussion that is going on now for setting a domestic price for crude oil, to the extent that the international price is being considered in this discussion is the current international price a factor in which the government is interested, or is it including the anticipated 15 per cent increase that the OPEC countries have been talking about?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is certain in the hon. gentleman's mind that international oil prices are going up, but we have some doubts about that.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Given the fact that the Minister of Finance presumably needs a set domestic price for oil before bringing down his budget, am I to understand from the answer of the Acting Prime Minister that even if the world price of oil should be adjusted upwards in September by 15 per cent there would be no change in the domestic price of Canadian crude oil?

Mr. Sharp: Well, Mr. Speaker, that is a very hypothetical question. I think the hon. gentleman will just have to wait and see what is in the budget. When we have made our decisions, we will announce them.

OIL—RELATIONSHIP OF INTERNATIONAL FLOOR PRICE AND DEVELOPMENT OF SYNCRUDE PROJECT

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I put a final supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Given the fact that yesterday the right hon. Prime Minister said that the Canadian government had agreed in principle with the idea of a floor price and that the cabinet had in fact discussed prices—in which case I would think my question was not entirely hypothetical—is the floor price that the Canadian government is talking about a price that will ensure continued development of the Syncrude project and the development of oil out of oil sands?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, the two matters are not directly related. The decision on an international floor price might be quite different from that. The hon. gentleman knows that what was said about Syncrude was said about Syncrude and not about oil prices generally.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE VIETNAMESE ART TREASURES NOT CONSIGNED TO GENERAL DANG VAN QUANG

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I should like to address my question either to the Acting Prime Minister or to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. We have been hearing these last few days stories about a vast consignment of archeological and artistic treasures that have been smuggled out of South Viet Nam and have now been sent en route to their "owner", at present a refugee in Canada living in Montreal. Can the Acting Prime Minister or the Minister of Manpower and Immigration assure this House that that consignment of $150 million worth of treasure, presumably belonging to the Vietnamese people, is not consigned to General Dang Van Quang, whose presence in Canada alone has caused sufficient consternation among the Canadian people?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is indeed a great deal of confusion. Any information that I have with regard to these reported art treasures moving from Guam to Canada has not, so far at least, involved in any way Lieutenant-General Quang; that is a separate problem altogether. The only information that I can give the hon. member and the House is this. This information has come to me by way of public allegation; no evidence has been presented to me or, as far as I know, to any other member of the government.

The case involves one Dao Dip Khanh who has been a landed immigrant in Canada since 1971. She returned to Viet Nam and married one Vo Duc Dien. She returned to Canada recently as a returned resident, which she is entitled to do as a landed immigrant. Her husband is somewhere in the United States. She does not know where at the present time, but she knows her husband is sending her personal effects to her, valued at $100,000 by the report that we have had. She lives at this time with her father in Montreal who is also a landed immigrant and has been for sometime. She is coming into our Montreal office this afternoon to discuss the matter. As of now, the information I have would indicate that the other allegations really are not founded on any statement that we have been able to obtain to this time, but we will be continuing to follow this in light of suggestions which have been made through unofficial channels.

AVAILABILITY OF MEASURES TO DEAL WITH VIETNAMESE ART TREASURES UPON ENTRY INTO CANADA

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of National Revenue say that he has in hand measures to deal with this treasure when it shows up at the Canadian border as "household effects" destined to a refugee from Viet Nam?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as in the case of anything that arrives at the border for anyone, it would be handled pursuant to Canadian laws that apply.

ADEQUACY OF SUPPLY-MANAGEMENT PROGRAM OF CANADIAN EGG MARKETING AGENCY—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, on May 20, in reply to a question by the hon. member for St. John's East regarding import controls on U.S. eggs, the Minister of Agriculture said that no action will be taken until "it can be shown that the egg producers of Canada have their supply-management program in proper order". The minister went on to say that the producers claim this has already been accomplished, but he was checking out these facts. I should like to ask whether the minister has checked out the facts and is he now satisfied that the program in fact is in order?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am to get a report later this day so I am not at all in a position to indicate whether I feel the supply-management program is or is not in order.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell us when he anticipates he will be able to table the agreement, and would he also agree to table at the same time the amendments or riders the various provinces attach to that agreement?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I understand that these are public documents once they are signed, so I feel there should be no difficulty in tabling them, following the usual procedure of getting permission from the co-signers.

ENERGY

OIL AND NATURAL GAS—DATE OF MEETING WITH PROVINCES TO DEAL WITH PRICES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance. Is the minister able to report to the House that there has been any progress in arranging for the date of a further meeting of the first ministers of the provinces and the Prime Minister to deal with the prices of petroleum and natural gas? If so, what is that date and will this precede the budget mooted for June 23?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there have been some informal conversations but no date has as yet been fixed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, will the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that such a meeting is to be held?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think it would probably be desirable to have a meeting, but this is a decision which has to be made by all the prime ministers, including the Prime Minister of Canada; therefore, I cannot answer.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It won't be before June 11?

[Mr. Basford.]

IMMIGRATION

REASON FOR FAILURE TO CHECK BACKGROUND OF GENERAL QUANG BEFORE GRANTING PERMIT AS REFUGEE FROM VIET NAM

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Mr. Quang was brought to Canada, not from Viet Nam, but from the relative safety of the United States, and in view of the fact that according to the minister's own officials it is normal practice to check out a potential refugee's background when time permits or when the potential refugee's life is not at all jeopardized by such a gathering of information, would the Minister of Manpower and Immigration explain to this House and to the people of Canada why in this particular case there was such a hurry to grant Mr. Quang a minister's permit?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. A minister's permit is a very temporary measure allowing him to reside in Canada for a limited period of time, and it is revocable. An investigation is going on now, and there is no inhibition in respect of that investigation by virtue of it being done when he is here as opposed to when he was there. Any decision to formalize his authority or otherwise to stay in Canada will be based on the results of that investigation when we have them.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Mr. Quang is allegedly an important figure in the heroin trade which, if true, would make Quang ineligible for landed immigrant status in Canada, and in view of the fact that there was no need for any hurry in the granting of a minister's permit as well as in view of the serious nature of the charges against Mr. Quang, was there any pressure brought to bear on the minister's department by any foreign government or any agency of a foreign government, either formally or informally, to waive the normal procedure and accept Mr. Quang immediately?

Mr. Andras: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, and I have carried out some preliminary inquiries on that very matter. It has been confirmed to me at this stage that there was no such contact or suggestion by any foreign government or representative thereof. The fact is that Mr. Quang's children and wife, or children rather, were in Canada, and that was one of the considerations in granting the minister's permit, pending investigation.

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES—REQUEST FOR NEW POLICY TO PROTECT EMPLOYMENT

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Quite recently, the Prime Minister of Canada announced that his government intended to bring in a new comprehensive policy for the textile and clothing industry in Canada. Is the minister's department now in the process of formulating this policy and can the minister advise the House when a truly national policy will be launched so that employment in that industry will not be protected only but also encouraged?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we do have a textile policy right now which I think has served Canada well over the years. At the present time, however, there are difficulties as a result of low-cost imports. We have taken measures to deal with those low-cost imports, but there may be additional measures that will have to be taken. In light of that, we are reviewing the textile policy, and I would hope later this year we will receive a report.

Mr. Diefenbaker: By that time the textile industry will have gone.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Is the minister aware that the Prime Minister wrote to a mayor in the St. Maurice region assuring him that the textile industry would be protected and that an overall policy would soon be introduced in Parliament? Can the minister tell us whether he is aware of the statement made by the Prime Minister or the stand he took, and if so, when this will be done?

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that the policy is under review. The government is not yet in a position to make any decision and will not be for several months, but there is very active consideration going on at the present time.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

WITHDRAWAL OF VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION SERVICES FROM NATIVES IN MANITOBA—REQUEST FOR REVIEW AND REPORT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whether he was aware of the directive from his department withdrawing vocational rehabilitation services from the treaty Indians in the province of Manitoba. He indicated at that time he was going to investigate the matter and report at a later date. Is he ready with his information on that subject now?

An hon. Member: I hope so.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is my understanding that the withdrawal of the provincial services provided by the Manitoba Vocational Rehabilitation Services has not been abrupt, as I think was suggested, but has been gradual. It will be done on a gradual phase-out basis which I am told has been discussed and agreed upon.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the directive indicated June 30 was the termination date, and that this program is heavily funded by the Canada Assistance Plan and has been of great benefit to the treaty Indians in the province of Manitoba, and in view of the fact it is planned to transfer responsibilities to Canadian Manpower Centres which do not have the counselling resources to handle this program, will the minister review the matter further to make certain that this outstanding and beneficial service is not terminated on June 30 as that directive from his department indicated?

Mr. Buchanan: I have not yet had the report, Mr. Speaker, but it is my understanding there was a meeting last Friday between our regional director and the Canada Manpower Centre officials in Brandon, and that in addition to the regular manpower staff there are nine officers employed under the Pathfinder Outreach Program. It is felt that among them they will be able to accommodate the case load.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INTRODUCTION OF MEASURES TO DEAL WITH VIOLENT CRIMES—SUGGESTION NO DELAY PENDING DEBATE ON CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. I wonder whether the minister can tell us if he is in any better position today, after the federal-provincial conference with the law officials in Victoria and in view of the release by Statistics Canada over the weekend concerning the increase in violent crime, especially murder which is up 11 per cent, to tell the House when firm proposals to meet this problem of increasing crime can be laid before the House so that there can be a balance between reform, rehabilitation of the criminal and the protection of the person in a free society?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the goal we wish to pursue. We will have a measure to put before the House shortly. I cannot give the hon. member an exact date, but I hope to have an announcement soon.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, with an appreciation of the problems involved in this very sensitive area, can the minister assure the House that there will be no delay because of the involvement of inter-related measures which could help meet the crime situation now and/or the emotional debate that might ensue on capital punishment and that if there are measures to meet the crime situation now that they will be introduced and that capital punishment will be treated on its merits or demerits.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, there will be no delay of any measure in order to put it forward with a measure on capital punishment. On the contrary, we are trying to speed up some measures which might have taken longer so that we can do more to protect the Canadian people from crime.

CRIMINAL CODE

POSSIBLE AMENDMENT OF ABORTION PROVISION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Last week the Committee of One Million presented a brief on abortion to the Prime Minister in connection with the presentation to Parliament this Thursday of a petition of one million names. I should like to ask the minister now if he has studied the brief and whether or not he is giving consideration to legislative action to restrict abortions to cases where the medical need is indisputable and to do this by specifying in legislation that the word "health" in section 251 of the Criminal Code is not to include social factors?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any indication that social factors, apart from those which have an impact upon health within the meaning of the section, are relevant in any case. I do not think the brief changes the essential position of the government which is that if the medical committees are willing to take the responsibility that was transferred to them in the 1969 law, we have a law which can be made to operate. There is no immediate intention therefore to present further legislation.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, in light of the escalation of abortions which now exceed 43,000 per year or 12.6 per cent of live births, I should like to ask the minister if the government is giving any consideration to guaranteeing protection of the child conceived but not yet born.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the position of the unborn child of course was at the base of the thinking which led to the particular law in 1969 and that form of protection for it. We are looking at the whole question of the operation of the abortion law and the steps which should be taken to make it work more effectively. There may be some announcement in due course about this, but as to the specific intention in respect of legislation my previous answer stands.

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO MAKE APPLICATION OF ABORTION PROVISION UNIFORM—PROPOSED REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT FOR INTERPRETATION OF WORD "HEALTH"

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question along the same line. I might preface it by saying I agree with the position of the minister. There is a difference of opinion in the House on both sides relative to abortion. I should like to put this question to him because I believe it is very serious. In light of the fact that Morgentaler was convicted of certain acts and is now still being charged before the courts for acts which committees in other provinces are approving every day, does the minister not feel it is time the law was reviewed and changed so that the law is respected and made uniform throughout the country in this regard.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the law of course is uniform. A question does arise under the law concerning the place of, and the functioning of, the medical committee. That, of course, is another matter which depends upon the responsibility and the kind of action which is taken by authorities other than this parliament or this government.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, would the minister not consider taking this matter before the Supreme Court of Canada to obtain a judicial interpretation of the word "health" in the section with reference to abortion, what it means in relation to the mother and so on, so that the law will be applied uniformly across the country.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am not convinced that an immediate reference to the Supreme Court is the best solution. I did indicate in my earlier answer to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona that the question of the law and its operation is something we are looking at, and that we will be proposing certain steps in respect of its operation. As a result of the examination of this operation, I indicated there would be an announcement in the House in due course.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON ESCALATION OF PENSIONS OF RETIRED EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport may I direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. On Monday, May 12, as recorded at page 5689 of Hansard, when we were discussing the estimates of the Department of Transport, the minister said that on Monday, May 26, there would be a meeting of the CN board to discuss the question of the escalation of pensions of retired CNR employees. I indicated to him, and I am keeping my commitment, that on Tuesday, May 27, I would question the minister about this matter. I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary could now indicate what decision the CN board took yesterday.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in answer to my hon. friend I am not sure whether the decision was taken yesterday, but just before coming into the House I was given some brief information to the effect that there was an escalation provided for CNR pensioners effective January 1, 1975, pertaining to people who went on pension from December 31, 1972, and from thereon back. The amount varies from $12 a month to $7 a month. There are different rates. I may have to provide the details to my hon. friend later, but there has been an escalation covering the period of time from December 31, 1972, on back.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Will the parliamentary secretary ascertain whether this is the end of the story or whether the board has other decisions to make regarding Canadian National pensions.

Mr. McIsaac: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to make an inquiry in that regard because I cannot answer that right now.

The minister said in his letter at that time he was having a further investigation in view of the fact that Mr. Gonzales stated he did operate inside Canada. Can the minister advise me how his investigation is coming along?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not have a further report at this time but I will try to obtain one from the RCMP and report to the hon. member as quickly as possible.

CANADIAN EGG MARKETING AGENCY—POSSIBILITY OF ENFORCING AGREEMENT AND ACTION WITH REGARD TO BIRD POPULATION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Agriculture and arises from a question posed by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot. On the basis of the information the minister has before him, is he satisfied that the present agreement can be satisfactorily enforced, having regard to the terms and conditions which were added by the provinces to the original agreement, and has the minister obtained a legal opinion as to whether the penalty of $1.00 per bird on flocks in excess of quota can be legally enforced?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, I do not have a full report, and part of the report is the legal opinion I am waiting for.

Mr. Mazankowski: I wonder if the minister can outline to the House whether any positive steps have been taken to bring the bird numbers into line commensurate with production targets, or has there just been no action in this regard whatsoever over the last six months?

Mr. Whelan: It is obvious that there has been some reduction in the bird population. It is quite a bit smaller than it was at this time a year ago.

Mr. Mazankowski: Could the minister indicate to the House which provinces have not brought their bird numbers into line?

Mr. Whelan: No, Mr. Speaker, because I would have to familiarize myself with the record.

Mr. Mazankowski: Don't you know what is going on?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

METROPOLITAN AREA GROWTH INVESTMENTS LIMITED—DATE WHEN AGENCY WILL BECOME OPERATIONAL

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I would like to ask again whether he has any new developments to report on the progress of Metropolitan Area Growth Investments Limited which, as the minister knows, is becoming, after three years of non-operation, rather a symbol of ridicule and an object of wrangling between the government of Nova Scotia and the federal government. Has he set any deadline? Has he any progress to report in regard to when this important corporation, funded by the taxpayers of Canada to the tune of $20 million, will finally become operational?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a specific date, but I can report progress to the hon. member. He may have seen a news item to the effect that the board is in fact constituted. If it has not finished drawing up the terms of reference for a chief executive officer, it is in the process of doing so.

I have additional information for the Leader of the Opposition. I met with the two Nova Scotian representatives appointed by the federal government in the past few days. I hope to meet with the full board in the future. I can only say that the frustration of the hon. member is only exceeded by my own, and the faster we can get it off the ground the better.

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Defence concerning NATO. In light of Mr. Callaghan's report to the United States state department that the total cost to NATO for duplication of research and equipment has been over $20 billion, would the minister please explain what steps he has taken to ensure that in so far as Canada is concerned such waste will no longer be acceptable or accepted?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I indicated in Brussels last week at the NATO meeting that Canada was prepared to continue its contribution to NATO at the present level.

Mr. McKinnon: I am a little baffled by the minister's answer, but I will leave it.

Further with regard to NATO, Dr. Schlesinger in Europe last week sought assurances that the NATO countries would not cut their forces in Europe. Did the minister give Dr. Schlesinger such assurance that Canada will not cut its number of troops in Europe?

Mr. Richardson: We were not asked to confirm the size of our force in numbers. We indicated that we would keep Canada's contribution at its present level.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REASON FOR INQUIRY INTO ACTIVITIES OF SEAFARERS INTERNATIONAL UNION UNDER LABOUR CODE—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF REPORT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Now that we know that the reference to section 196 of the Labour Code by the minister is primarily a red herring in that we do not have an inquiry or a probe, nor do we have an industrial inquiry commission, but rather a continuation of the investigation done by the RCMP and officials of the minister's department, why was this matter directed to the Minister of Labour for further pursuit, thereby deceiving—and I say this respectfully—the Canadian people, rather than placing the matter before the Solicitor General?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): I appreciate that the hon. member can use strong language in a very quiet way and therefore have it escape some of the attention it would otherwise receive. Notwithstanding that provocation, let me say to him that this is anything but a red herring. It is exactly the traditional Canadian way of examining whether there is any wrongdoing, namely, to have an investigation which does not attempt to launder matters in public with all kinds of at-large hearsay allegations. This is the proper way of proceeding when there is a matter for investigation.

This matter is divided into two essential parts. One has to do with the part which may involve the Criminal Code of Canada, and any time those matters are involved, it is for provincial attorneys general to take charge. When matters involve the Canada Labour Code, whether in regard to offences or to the determination of what changes are needed, this is obviously the responsibility of the Minister of Labour, and it is a responsibility he has properly exercised.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Now that the minister has attempted to answer my question and has not, can he advise me whether the report will be published after the investigation has been completed?

Mr. Lang: This very much depends on the nature of the report and the kind of report which can be published.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: I am very surprised if the hon. member's colleague from Calgary North does not appreciate the fact that if a report contains certain charges allegations without foundation which could lead to a charge, that is not the kind of thing which in our system ought to be published, and it will not be published; but if charges can be laid, that will be done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REASON MINISTER SAID ONTARIO STRANGELY UNHELPFUL WITH REGARD TO ALLEGATIONS CONCERNING ACTIVITIES OF SEAFARERS INTERNATIONAL UNION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): It appears to me that the report will only be for the edification of the front bench of the government in power. I would like to ask a final supplementary of the Minister of Labour. Knowing that the minister does not like to deal with innuendos, and rightfully so—and he is concerned about that—I wonder if he can advise the House as to the circumstances which led him to indicate that Ontario authorities were strangely unhelpful—and I emphasize the word "strangely"—would the minister conclude that this is the type of innuendo he has registered his concern about?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, my question was framed whether the minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: Would the minister now indicate to the House why he used the word "strangely"? That is what I am trying to get at. Is he prepared to take us into his confidence?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I already dealt with this question when I dealt with the matter in the House last week, but I will repeat it for the edification of the hon. member. When provincial ministers call for a federal inquiry into a matter, as they did in this particular case, and while continuing to call for one they also indicate that they are going to send information down to Ottawa on which we can base a conclusion, and the information does not arrive for weeks and weeks until indeed we have to go out and search it out ourselves, I would call that just what I called it yesterday, strangely unco-operative.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION NOT SOLD TO CONSUMERS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I would like to ask him what he did when he found back in late 1973 and early 1974 that putrid meat unfit for human consumption was being sold in Quebec. Did he do anything to assure himself that the inspection system being operated in that province was successful, and if he made no approach to the government of Quebec with regard to this, what did he do at that time to discharge his obligation to prevent meat unfit for human consumption from being sold to the Canadian people?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am afraid that the Leader of the Opposition is turning into an old gramophone which repeats the same record. I have answered this question several times quite clearly.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have indicated once in this question period already that if further questions are to be pursued on this matter, they ought to break new ground.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, with respect, I am breaking new ground. I am not asking the minister why he did not prosecute people. I am giving him an opportunity to tell this House and the people of the country what he did, if anything, to discharge his responsibilities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Let me say once more that the situation is very simple, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition is again distorting the facts in the preamble to his question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I have said a dozen times in this House—and I am surprised that the hon. Leader of the Opposition cannot get that into his head—that there was no evidence in 1973 and early 1974. There were only rumours and innuendoes—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: Check the record. On that basis my officials asked the police forces to pursue the investigation because it could only be pursued by the police forces. The type of distortion that the hon. Leader of the Opposition is introducing in the preamble to questions will not help in clarifying this situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) on a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—SPEECH OF PRIME MINISTER ON PRIVY COUNCIL ESTIMATES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Even though sometimes things are said in the cut and thrust of debate that ought not to be said, I am not one who suffers from eggshell sensibilities. I can understand that in the cut and thrust of debate statements are sometimes made that all of us wish had not been made. That observation does not apply to a speech delivered on Thursday last by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I was ready to raise this matter on Friday but the Prime Minister was not here. Yesterday I was unable to be present owing to circumstances beyond my control. I am, therefore, raising the matter today so that there will be no loss of my rights and the rights of the House to be protected against diatribes and statements which bear no relationship to the facts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: On Thursday last it was understood between the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the government, in respect of the debate that was to take place, that 15 minutes would be allotted. The Prime Minister asked to go first.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: That is not the fact.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have touched a nerve over there, Mr. Speaker. I have not read the whole of the speech. In order to explain the fabulous, wasteful and profligate expenses, the Prime Minister decided to follow the practice which is sometimes followed—of producing something in place of the facts. He referred to me as a fisherman. I have fished in various parts of the world, and it is of interest—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have never had such audience participation.

An hon. Member: You got yourself some suckers this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The statements made regarding myself, while they cannot be described in this House of Commons in the words of Machiavelli—although the Prime Minister has always claimed that Machiavelli was in fact his political godfather—Machiavelli said that lies have their position; lies when used are bound to be useful. I have pursued this statement. The Prime Minister was in a position of endeavouring to explain how it was that his staff had increased five-fold since he took office in 1968, and the budget of the Prime Minister's office and that of the Privy Council Office had increased 39 times to almost $20 million.

I mentioned fishing, Mr. Speaker. There is a fish in Fiji—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to unduly restrict the right hon. gentleman, but there is a tendency to get into debate as opposed to a question of privilege. I wonder if the right hon. gentleman would mind making his point.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is just an example I wanted to give, Mr. Speaker. There are fish in Fiji that when in difficulty exude a black fluid to conceal themselves and their position.

The Prime Minister made a number of statements that I am going to quote. Commenting on the fact that he has two $80,000 cars at his disposal, he said:

I just remember, when the right hon. gentleman suggests that possession of this car—

He should have said "these cars."

—shows signs of paranoia on my part—

I never said that, Mr. Speaker, but I am not surprised that he came to that conclusion. He continued:

—that it was he who, at substantial public expense, had the bomb-shelter built at 24 Sussex Drive.

He went on to say:

The point is that he had that bomb-shelter built at substantial public expense.

Now, sir, I start with that.

An hon. Member: Start?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, is there nothing that can pacify these guilty souls? This expensive bomb-shelter was placed there as a result of a decision made in various parts of the world. The fabulous cost of the shelter to which the Prime Minister referred was estimated in the beginning to be $1,100 and, according to the Department of Public Works yesterday, ended up at $400. The Prime Minister compared that sum with the expenditure of $160,000 for two dreadnoughts. The speech became worse as it continued. The Prime Minister then said, as recorded on page 6010 of Hansard:

● (1510)

—the right hon. gentleman talked about Harrington Lake. I think that was another unfortunate reference, because I suppose he made the largest land grab when he was in office that was ever made by any private citizen of Canada. He did so when he decided that Harrington Lake and the buildings on it should be the country residence of the prime minister. I do not think anybody then sitting on my party's side of the House criticized that decision. He was adding thousands of acres of land for his private enjoyment.

I could not understand that when I read it in Hansard the next day.

I had nothing whatsoever to do with the purchase of that land. The purchase was made in 1951 by the federal district commission when the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent was prime minister.

Mr. Baldwin: Justin was right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: According to history, Machiavelli became a wicked old man. The statement I just quoted was not diluted by truth. I was amazed to read what the Prime Minister had said. He went on to say:

I think it was a justifiable gesture, one from which I personally have benefited.

Mr. Speaker, we did not spend tens of thousands of dollars on Harrington Lake. Actually, I believe less than $2,000 was spent on Harrington Lake. The Prime Minister then said:

In the same way I hope the next prime minister will benefit from the swimming pool . . . There is a difference: I do not intend to stock the swimming pool with fish, not even sharks—

I am glad he does not intend to stock it with sharks; they might think they have competition. Then the Prime Minister said:

The right hon. gentleman for Prince Albert liked fishing and had Harrington Lake stocked at public expense with fish for his enjoyment . . . That was a shameful incident.

Sir, I tell you that at no time during my period of office, according to the records of the Government of Canada, were fish stocked at Harrington Lake.

I have never, in all the years I have been here, seen such a collection of statements dangerous to the integrity of a member of the House of Commons delivered by a Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I only hope that the pit which has been dug will be fully filled before this matter is over. I took the trouble to find out when the stocking of fish took place at Harrington Lake. The National Capital Commission records indicate—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has the floor on a question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I secured the records. They show that the lake was stocked on April 29, 1967, four years after I had been prime minister, with 7,000 speckled trout, paid for by the National Capital Commission; on October 24, 1967, with 500 Atlantic salmon, paid for by the Canadian Wildlife Service; on October 31, 1967, with 1,000 speckled trout, paid for by the National Capital Commission; and in February, 1968, with 3,000 rainbow trout, paid for by the National Capital Commission. The Prime Minister said how shocking it was that I, at public expense and for my enjoyment, stocked Harrington Lake with fish. He said that was a shameful incident.

I could deal with other statements but will not at the moment because I want the Prime Minister to be here. He is away at the moment. He has every reason to be away, although sometimes there is no reason.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Diefenbaker: When he comes back I want him to answer in this House or in committee for statements that bear no relationship whatever to the facts. This is an appalling thing. Never in all the years I have been here have I heard such things.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I note the presence of the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer). He has something to answer for in Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understood from the right hon. gentleman's last remarks that he is reserving any motion which he may propose to move until such time as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) returns to the House. If that is the case, perhaps the matter could be concluded then.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to reserve my right until the Prime Minister's return. I reserve the right to bring in a formal motion then to have this matter placed before the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Statements of the Prime Minister have the same weight in the House as if made under oath. That is why it is so dangerous when a member of this House holding that position makes the sort of statements to which I have referred, statements entirely undiluted with truth. I, therefore, sir, wishing to preserve these rights, have brought this matter before the House at the earliest possible opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Why don't you defend the PM, Mitch?

Mr. Hees: John, it looks as if you will not have to wait quite so long.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport stated that he would provide the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with documents relating to CNR pensioners. Members of the Conservative Party are also interested in improvements to the CNR pension plan. I would appreciate being provided with the documentation that the parliamentary secretary will be presenting to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

● (1520)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order just raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre may I say that I spoke to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport about this matter and I believe he would be prepared to have the document made an appendix to today's Hansard, if the House agrees. I take it the parliamentary secretary has a document giving details regarding CNR pensions. I should like to request that it be made an appendix to today's Hansard.

Mr. McIsaac: Mr. Speaker, I do not feel at liberty to table a document that is addressed to the minister. I would be glad to table, later today or certainly tomorrow, the essence of the pension increase, the periods covered and all the other essential information.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. At the moment there is no document in the possession of the House and no document which the parliamentary secretary is prepared to table. I do not see how I can seek consent to table. In light of the parliamentary secretary's suggestion that he may have the document later today or tomorrow, perhaps consent could be sought at that time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, that is what I was going to suggest. It would be appropriate to have this information on today's Hansard. Perhaps if the parliamentary secretary has the document later today, we can revert to the appropriate item and put it in at that time.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 1,807, 2,430 and 2,444.

Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call starred questions Nos. 2,319, 2,322 and 2,448?

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

*CN—WITHDRAWAL OF TSS "PRINCE GEORGE" FROM SERVICE

Question No. 2,319—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

1. Is it the intention of the government to permit CN Steamships to withdraw TSS Prince George from service after its recent small fire?

2. Has CN Steamships given consideration to the repair of the fire damage to put the vessel back in service?

3. Is the government aware that the withdrawal of the vessel from service will put 122 crew members out of work as well as office and dock staff?

4. What steps is the government taking to find alternative employment for the seamen and shore staff?

5. Is the government prepared to see the carriage of tourists along the Pacific Coast become even more in the hands of foreign flag vessels?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in light of the rather lengthy answer, I wonder if hon. members would permit me to table this as read.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The answer referred to above follows:]

1. CNSS Prince George suffered a major fire, sustaining damages in excess of $400,000 and rendering the vessel unseaworthy. As a result, the vessel had to be put out of service.

2. CN has performed an appraisal of the damage sustained. The estimate is that more than two months and a sum of about $400,000 would be required to return the vessel to an operational state. As this would place the vessel out of service for about 6 weeks of the season, and as CN had planned to retire the vessel at the end of this season, CN felt that these major repairs could not be justified.

3. The government is aware of the effect of such a withdrawal and the steps taken to alleviate it.

4. CN has undertaken a multi-faced approach alleviating any difficulties that may arise from circumstances resulting from the accident. CN will absorb some crew members into the transcontinental passenger train service as stewards. CN will also provide a generous settlement for those employees not wishing to exercise this option. Management affected have been offered early separation settlements or other employment. Seasonal employees have also been given settlements or offered alternative employment.

5. The government is always seeking to assure the best and most reasonable service for the tourist trade along the Pacific Coast, within reasonable economic bounds. The route is served presently by many other lines, including at least one Canadian line.

*CHARLOTTETOWN AIRPORT—FROST DAMAGE TO RUNWAY

Question No. 2,322—Mr. MacLean:

1. Has a section of the runway at the Charlottetown Airport sustained frost damage that renders a section unserviceable and, if so, does such damage render the runway unsuitable for the operation of DC-9 aircraft?

2. Will repairs, if necessary, be completed before the scheduled commencement on April 28 of DC-9 service by Air Canada?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer is as follows: 1. On April 11 a small section of the runway at Charlottetown Airport sustained damage that rendered the area unserviceable for a few days.

2. The necessary repairs have been made and the runway is back in service satisfactory for the scheduled DC-9 service by Air Canada. The matter of a permanent repair of the runway is currently under investigation.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS—EMPLOYEES EARNING BETWEEN $15,000 AND $50,000

EXPORT OF ELECTRICAL POWER

Question No. 2,444—Mr. Herbert:

1. Have there been any discussions between Quebec or United States officials and officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources concerning the location or size of a power line which is to export electricity from Quebec to the United States?

2. Have any agreements been signed with Hydro-Quebec or the Government of Quebec?

3. Will the line be constructed by the National Energy Board?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 1. There have been no formal discussions.

2. No.

3. No.

*CONSUMER PACKAGING AND LABELLING ACT

Question No. 2,448—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What are the new rules and regulations in regard to the bilingual requirements under the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act?

2. What changes have been made in the requirements since March 1, 1975?

3. What information on such changes is presently available to Canadian businessmen besides a departmental press release?

4. Will the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs make a formal announcement concerning the rule changes as they have considerable effect on the import of goods to Canada and many Canadian businesses?

5. In order to alleviate the concern of Canadian importers and manufacturers, will the government give immediate consideration to the early promulgation of the new rules?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the answer is as follows: 1. The Consumer Packaging and Labelling Regulations which were gazetted on March 1, 1974, will become effective in regard to labelling requirements for non-foods on Sept. 1, 1975, and for foods on March 1, 1976. They will require that the common name and the quantity of the product be in both official languages. There are exceptions to this requirement, the major one being that prepackaged products manufactured and sold in a local government unit need only have mandatory information in one of the official languages if the population using the other official language represents less than 10 per cent of the total population of the unit.

2. While no changes have been finalized since March 1, 1975, certain proposals for amendments to the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Regulations were published in the Canada Gazette, Part I, April 26, 1975. These include several proposals which would have the effect of granting exemptions from some mandatory labelling requirements for certain prepackaged products.

3. In addition to a press release, copies of the proposed amendments were distributed to all industry associations affected for the information of their members. In accordance with the requirement of the Statute, a period of 60 days has been provided from the date of publication of the draft (April 26, 1975) for submissions by any interested parties prior to formal promulgation of the amendments.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED GOVERNMENT FAILURE TO RESOLVE LABOUR PROBLEMS

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska) moved:

That this House deplores the fact that the government has neglected to make legislative changes to remedy present problems at all levels of labour activity.

This neglect has resulted in:

(1) a climate of instability and dissatisfaction for workers and the working class in general;

(2) the toleration of a system which allows certain union figures to wield powers exceeding their responsibilities;

(3) the toleration of illegal strikes and work stoppages initiated on any pretext which paralyze or even destroy the economy and the social progress of vast fields of activity;

(4) a continued opposition between employees and employers instead of the development of mutual aid policies.

To remedy this situation, Parliament should:

(1) pass measures granting fiscal advantages to employees and employers to restore their motivation;

(2) effect stimulating measures to increase work attractiveness and professional satisfaction;

(3) urge corporations to set up employee shareholding and profit sharing programs;

(4) create labour tribunals made up of experts in employer-employee relations and empowered to set adequate working conditions for restoring mutual understanding and preventing conflicts.

Mr. Speaker, in looking at this motion, we see clearly that we have realized the great difficulties that exist in the employer-employee relations field and that we intend to make suggestions which seem practical to us to improve the impossible situation in which the workers find themselves these days.

For a few years, all observers of the employer-employee relations scene have been able to find out that the great many strikes of every kind, justified or unjustified, establishes clearly that the labour legislation is not suitable for present economic conditions. Today's negotiating mechanisms as they are used are outdated. They talk about strike first, then negotiations. You will probably remember the time when workers who disagreed with their employers negotiated seriously and, as last resort, they thought of going on strike. Today it is the other way around. It is recognized that many demands are sometimes justifiable, but what it is inadmissible it is that unwarranted irresponsibility they show when they call illegal strikes if union leaders feel it is necessary, and the only purpose is to put pressure on employers.

In almost all issues of the Labour Gazette, we can read articles that prove the concern that exists in employer-employee relations, Vol. 74, No. 10, October 1974, page 534: Going beyond collective bargaining, by Marcel Pépin, President of the CNTU, an article in which the author admits that union action is political; Vol. 74, No. 12, December 1974, page 666: The collective bargaining crisis; Vol. 75, No. 2, February 1975, page 77: In search of alternatives; Vol. 75, No. 3, March 1975, page 139: New outlook on trade unionism.

In most of these articles, present day difficulties are outlined in the field of relationships between workers and employers. Let me quote two short citations from Mr. Jean Pellerin's article on page 144:

> Due to the freedoms and the rights the system recognizes, unions were born and have been in a position to grow freely. If they propose to use these same rights and freedoms to destroy the system that has enabled them to become what they are, they will provoke, not its fall but its hardening.
> Already, a trend toward interventionism can be noted. The government must continually involve itself in unions' affairs, and that, at the express request of the latter. It is abnormal.

And yet, we all know that management and workers are somewhat like Siamese brothers: one cannot live without the other. They must be partners in production rather than rivals competing for the profits of the business.

Upon analyzing the wage-price structure, we perforce discover the cycle according to which raw materials coming from the fields, the forests, the ground, the sea or the sky are refined, processed, manufactured, then shipped to the retailer for distribution to the consumer. In their natural state, raw materials cost little or nothing and no price tag can at first be attached to any element such as cost ore from the earth, loom soil, forest trees, fish or sea minerals, the air we breathe. The conquest of raw materials, their processing into consumer products, the subsequent stages of transportation, processing and distribution determine the final price the potential purchaser and consumer must pay.

This listing of the various steps in the processing of commodities leads me to point out an interesting aspect of the Social Credit doctrine of economic distribution based on the value of the collective heritage resulting from the abundant natural resources which Providence so generously heaped upon Canada. Unfortunately, our petty politicians happy in their submission to a corrupted and corrupting financial system keep floundering about in debts, taxes of all kinds, strikes, crime, unemployment, inflation and pollution problems.

It is quite unusual that in a country such as ours there are workers who will have toiled and sweated for years to leave nothing to their sons and daughters but a heritage of debts, misery and hardship. That is why there has to be a reform of the present financial system which no longer meets today's needs.

The contradictions generated by the present system do not make it easy to propose solutions to the numerous problems of the workers. If finance were the faithfull mirror of reality, if a social body automatically issued new credit to finance any new production, there would be no need to abolish capital domination because that evil would not even exist.

Money capital would be raised as competent technicians and workers would start and pursue the development of our country's raw materials and this capital would in turn be at the disposal of those who are thus creating new riches.

All workers of various categories would find an acceptable solution to their many income problems if they finally decided to really get together and change the financial system which is depriving them, instead of going on strike to fight those who are paying them.

On June 15, 1972, I introduced in the House a motion about the possible reorientation of all labour legislation towards employer-employee profit-sharing. My motion read:

That this House deplores the fact that the government has not adopted the appropriate measures for involving workers in Canadian firms through prifit-sharing and stock purchase programs as a means of promoting social stability, reinforcing our country's economy and ensuring greater co-operation between capital and labour.

I had expected the reaction of some members who are too easily satisfied with existing situations, who prefer to take refuge behind the present federal jurisdiction and believe that a labour legislation governing employer-employee profit-sharing comes instead under provincial jurisdiction. I had tried to allocate the respective responsibilities in a problem of concern to all Canadians. Although the implementation of the suggested measures was restricted to industrial sectors under federal jurisdiction and a great many workers were employed in various administrative services, we feel that the government should set the pace by establishing, whenever possible, a profit-sharing scheme for the benefit of workers. There exists a great many ways to favour such participation.

Several Social Credit members had given at that time several good reasons which warrant employer-employee profit-sharing. I had the opportunity to hear a number of excellent speeches from various members, namely the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) who mentioned that incentives and policies should be applied to promote a greater participation in investments by Canadians.

The Minister of Labour of the day said he was glad that the Social Credit Party through me had asked that the question be debated, since he realized that we were searching for every means to improve labour relations and increase peace in industry. He then pointed out that the federal government's labour relations legislation was promoting a system in which the workers can have their say in the terms and conditions of employment through freely elected bargaining agents.

I take this opportunity to point out several mistakes made in the name of that so-called "freedom". It is a rather disreputed word nowadays, judging from its interpretation by certain advocates of freedom. We know some people who claim the freedom to bring down the system, after having secured from that same system the freedom to set up regulations on the compulsory check off of dues. Anything can be said, anything can be written in a democracy, but we find that this freedom is not enough for some. We tend to forget that whatever privileges we have, we got them from someone.

I have here an article published in Montreal's La Presse on June 3, 1972, entitled: "The freedom of others". There are some passages worthy of some thought which I will quote to you:

The post-industrial world is witnessing a strange situation. It finds that the freedom of some people sometimes destroys the freedom of others. Some freedoms do not exist yet. The worker has freedom of association, but not freedom of non-association. Neither does he have the freedom to choose a union other than the one certified where he works.

There is more. A journalist, for example, may break his contract because of a change in the ideological orientation of his employer, but he does not have the right to withdraw from a labour union for the same reason.

Hospital workers have the right to strike, but when they exercise it, they endanger the patients' life, who have a clear strict right to attentive and sustained care. Public servants have the right to strike, but when they do exercise it they are depriving old people, pensioners and welfare recipients from the right to get their always eagerly expected cheques on time.

Air Canada controllers and technicians have the right to strike, but when they do exercise it their action is detrimental to the interests of people living in the North who are fundamentally entitled to supplies. They nearly caused the death of a child because of the impossibility of sending a rare serum by air.

Teachers have the right to strike but when they do exercise it they deprive children of their basic right to a peaceful and stable education.

Post office employees have the right to strike, but when they do exercise it, they deprive the population of an essential service and seriously prejudice many companies who do their business by mail.

It must never be forgotten that "The right to live" for all and everyone springs from a natural right and that must be given priority over the right to strike and other ones.

I am in favour of the right to join a union, having been myself in charge of the Quebec loggers' organization for ten years, that is from 1952 to 1962. I must add that I am still a "trade unionist" but not a striker. I point out the difference.

In those ten years of union work, I sat through several rounds of negotiations with representatives from large lumber companies and we have always been able to agree on improving the living and working conditions of bush workers, and without ever going on strike.

The right to strike is a precious one, but it smacks of blind egotism when it deprives abusively other citizens of their own rights. Who would dare claim that the rights of union workers must take precedence over all others? Would it be that we have a deranged sense of justice? Going through a red light, parking one's car the wrong way, stepping on other people' toes, shouting at the top of one's lungs out on the street, in public places, are serious matters. But it seems people are unaware of the fact that it is far more serious for an organized group of citizens to use their rights at the expense of the rights, every bit as precious, of those citizens who are not organized.

We grant without any hesitation whatsoever that it is quite normal, quite in order to acknowledge the right of all workers to belong to the union of their choice. Still, if we really want to respect the freedom of those very workers, a text of law written in clear and specific terms should also exist mentioning that a worker has the right to join the union of his choice, the right to refuse to join it and also the right to withdraw from it.

The provisions contained in the collective agreements negotiated in accordance with the will of the majority of their free members, could determine the responsibilities of the union members with regard to union check-off. Well understood freedom, in the field of industrial relations as in any other field, involves three aspects which can not readily be separated: the freedom to accept, the freedom to refuse, the freedom to withdraw.

I have read somewhere that one must not be a slave to one's environment but one must transform it according to one's ideal. It is hard to find a good reason to justify the attitude of our governments which did not, at opportune times, pass legislation that would have stated specifically what are the rights, the duties and the responsibilities of everyone concerned in the field of union check-off.

Allow me here to quote the opinion given by Me Fernand Morin, in the 1969 edition of Relations industrielles, volume 24, page 789. This is what he said:

In our opinion, those conflicts and difficulties should have been solved once and for all a long time ago, by a clear and specific text of law. An act that purports to ensure peaceful and fruitful relations between employers and employees but makes no mention of or is ambiguous about matters of such importance is not good enough.

In view of all the restrictions resulting from compulsory check-off formula when applied indiscriminately to all collective agreements in general and since the recommendations made by Justice Rand in his decision by arbitration rendered on January 28, 1946, have not been implemented, even if he took the trouble to specify: "I do not suggest for one moment that this method can be applied across the board," Parliament should determine by means of an appropriate legislation the responsibilities of everyone with regard to compulsory check-offs. If I have time left and if my colleagues allow me, I shall come back to this question of check-offs at the end of my statement.

At this time and under the terms of the motion introduced, I should like to suggest a means which, in my opinion and in the opinion of many people who are familiar with labour-management relations, should restore some order in our troubled times. Any responsible observer will admit that most of our conflicts come from the lengthy discussions and the delays in settling disputes. It seems that this situation will continue as long as real labour tribunals are not substituted for existing bodies, providing all the safeguards of equity that one may desire, and whose decisions will be binding on the parties. Labour tribunals made up of labour, management and government representatives, made up of experts in the field of employer-employee relations must have adequate powers and information enabling them to: prevent inter-union conflicts by laying down a clear and specific procedure making it possible to determine by secret ballot, under the supervision of two members of the labour tribunal, the right of workers to be represented by a bona fide union; to set a period of negotiations not exceeding 90 days between the parties concerned and to provide severe penalties for those who fail to comply with the regulations; to make an adequate evaluation of the profitability of the undertaking or service taking into account the risks of the monetary reserves necessary to maintain the undertaking and required for income tax deductions and procedures arising from taxation regulations; to determine when required, according to a classification of duties based on the responsibilities of each class of workers, a wage range commensurate with the possibilities of the entreprise and the service and indexed on the cost of living; to require that all strike votes be secret and taken under the supervision of two members of the labour tribunal and that the strike be considered legal only when it is accepted by half—50 per cent plus one—of the employees, and after all the above-mentioned means have been exhausted; to direct the negotiations in the public service area to determine wage adjustments according to varied percentages, by increasing lower wages first, in order to reach a proportional equilibrium between all wages. We do not claim that these labour tribunals will solve all problems, but we have good reasons to believe that they could greatly improve the situation. This is as good a time as any to recall the events that happened at the end of August 1973, here, in Parliament, around one o'clock in the afternoon, when a group of railway employees on strike entered the Parliament buildings.

One may assume that had they been more familiar with the inside of the building, they might have gone to the House of Commons, occupied the premises and delayed the sitting. For the first time since Confederation, the Speaker of the House of Commons and his escort of dignitaries entered by the back door. Such events should make it abundantly clear to the legislator that the labour legislation must be amended as soon as possible.

I said earlier that I would state more clearly my viewpoint on the application of the Rand formula and on the circumstances in which this decision was rendered. I notice that many seem to be unaware of the facts.

For several years, unions have been using the Rand formula to ensure their incomes. On several occasions, they have even gone overboard by setting up what they call a common front.

It would be in order to recall the events that led to Justice Rand's award and to the very specific recommendations he submitted concerning compulsory check-offs.

This formula is named after an arbitration award issued by Justice Ivan Cleveland Rand of the Supreme Court on January 26, 1946 in a dispute between employers and employees of the Ford plant at Windsor, Ontario. The strike of the Ford employees had been going on from September to December 1945 when Justice Rand was appointed artitrator to make a ruling on these issues under dispute. On January 29, 1946, he issued an arbitration award applicable to the parties concerned. The union wanted a union shop clause along with a compulsory checkoff. The union shop clause allows the employer to hire any worker, belonging or not to the union, provided that, within a delay prescribed by the agreement, those employees should join the union, otherwise they are fired. As for the compulsory checkoff, it is a sum of money that the employer deducts from the salary of the worker and returns to the union.

Justice Rand prefixed his ruling with important considerations on the philosophy of labour law in this country. Then he gave his sentence. First, he turned down the request of the union shop clause:

> I am unable in the circumstances to award a union shop.

Then he added:

> It would deny the individual Canadian the right to seek work and to work independently of personal association with any organized group.

On the other hand, Justice Rand did not hesitate to admit the principle of a compulsory check-off:

> My award is a compulsory checkoff upon all employees who come within the unit to which the agreement applies.

Here is the essential part of Justice Rand's arbitration award. Then he added:

> I do not for a moment suggest that this is a device of general applicability. Its object is primarily to enable the union to function properly. In other cases it might defeat that object by lessening the necessity for self-development. In dealing with each labour situation we must pay regard to its special features and circumstances.

Furthermore, Justice Rand bound the checkoff with very precise conditions:

1. Every strike should be called by a special vote taken by the majority of the members;

2. The union should take the responsibility of stopping any illegal strike or picketing.

3. Any employee participating in an unauthorized strike should pay the company a $3 fine for every day's absence from work and lose one year's seniority by every week of absence;

4. Should the union violate the obligations stipulated at subsections 1 and 2, its right to the compulsory checkoff would be suspended;

5. Every year, 25 per cent of the employees could require a secret ballot to confirm the mandate of the existing union or to appoint a new bargaining agent;

6. That checkoff clause became a work condition;

7. All employees had the right to join the union, provided they complied with the by-laws;

8. Any misunderstanding about a clause constituted a grievance and was subject to a procedure established for that particular case.

Since then, the Rand formula has taken a more restricted meaning. The conditions which Justice Rand had imposed on the formula proposed in a dispute of the automobile industry have been ignored. Today, the Rand formula is nothing else than a compulsory checkoff clause.

This situation has never been cleared. In various occasions, judgments have been made. In some circumstances, they were favourable and, in others, opinions were divided. In spite of precedents from the Supreme Court in particular cases, the legality of checkoff clauses, of which the Rand formula is only one example, continues to be the target for criticism.

It is true that the Rand formula is in force in many collective agreements. However, that does not mean the freedom of the individual is being respected. In various provinces of Canada, the modes of application vary. Among the arguments advanced for mandatory checkoff, it is often pointed out that labour law has progressed.

I mention in passing that the right to strike also has progressed, and not always for the better.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has now expired. To continue, he needs the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): I thank hon. members for giving me a few more minutes to complete my remarks on this very important subject.

One needs only to observe what is happening in this day and age when strikes follows strikes at an alarming rate. It must also be added that union security clauses give union members a feeling of security allowing them to work out a better coordination between business management and workers. It is obvious that unions are assured of a revenue in the form of substantial amounts they receive every month from any employer in employer contributions.

Millions are taken out of workers' salaries every month in payment of union dues.

Note that I am not against the payment of dues to a union, provided the amounts are paid voluntarily and the money collected is used in the interest of workers in general. Unions were formed to meet a need, and I see that that need still exists.

However, we also see that several individuals are members of various associations, such as the Knights of Columbus, the Daughters of Isabella, Chambers of Commerce, and hundreds of others. Generally, people are free to join or leave the association. The freedom of people is fully respected.

The value of an association lies in the value of its membership. I admit that a member drawing benefits from his association must contribute to its operation; on the other hand, if the leadership goes astray, he must not be forced to continue to pay for the mistakes, and that is why we suggest that the government should pass legislation to clear up definitely this matter of union check-off which up until now has stemmed from a precedent, a decision in an entirely particular case.

[English]

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in following my colleague the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne), I think the first comment is that there ought not to be too much difficulty, even on the government side of the House, in agreeing with the general proposition which is implicit in the hon. member's motion, namely, that labour and management relations in this country at the present time leave a great deal to be desired.

The stark fact, as was brought to light for the Canadian public a few weeks ago, is that presently we have the worst record in respect of work stoppages of any industrial country in the western world with the exception of Italy. It seems to me this is a matter which ought to concern every member of this House. It ought to, and does, concern the public. I know, from my conversations with men and women in the unions of this country, that it concerns them; and, of course, it also concerns management.

It is not necessary to elaborate in this House on the total collective loss to the community of continued and excessive work stoppages, because all hon. members are fully aware of the hardship, the difficulties, the bitterness and the social strife created by these work stoppages. There is another aspect which I think all hon. members would agree is paramount in our consideration of undue work stoppages. I refer to the colossal waste of our productive capacity and manpower in terms of the men and women in the work force.

It is interesting that the history of work stoppages in the last several years more than illustrates the fact that we have a serious problem. The House of Commons has been called together to legislate the end of work stoppages a number of times since the summer of 1972. In October, 1972, the House of Commons ended the longshoremen's strike in eastern Canada. The House of Commons ended the railway strike in August and September of 1973 by legislation. Further, the House of Commons ended the strike of the grain handlers on the west coast in 1974. Since then the House of Commons again acted in respect of the longshoremen on the west coast and ended that lawful strike. Just recently the House of Commons ended the lawful strike of the longshoremen operating at the three river ports of Trois-Rivières, Quebec City and Montreal.

The apologists for this particular method of ending labour strife believe an ad hoc approach of this sort is the most effective means of responding to a difficulty while at the same time retaining the respect and the right of free collective bargaining with the mutual or collateral rights of walk-out and strike. However, if I may say so, those who cling to that position—I know there are some on the government side of the House—are a long way behind public opinion, because clearly the public has little sympathy with an absolutely unstructured method of solving work stoppages which affect either essential services or the totality of the public interest. I say very pointedly to my colleagues on the government side that despite what some of the apologists for the government may say, there is growing doubt within the cabinet itself that the present ad hoc system is adequate.

As some hon. members know, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) some months ago delivered a confidential document to the cabinet in which he very honestly faced up to some of the specific problems. I shall quote a paragraph of that document and ask government members especially who are sometimes too quick to support the present ad hoc system, which I do not think is satisfactory, to note it because it comes from a document that is before the cabinet today. I quote:

> There have been disruptive work stoppages this past year and I sense growing pressure to review and revise labour relations law and policy—to have another task force research and produce volumes. The Woods report was very useful and the studies are still relevant. That work led to a comprehensive revision of our labour relations code which came into force after intensive lobbying less than twenty-four months ago.

The minister goes on, I think quite properly, and says:

> It does not answer all of our problems and in our democratic society it never will—not if the hope is for a quiescent work force and a strike-free economy.

That is the end of the quotation. So, there clearly is a recognition on the part of the government of the day, despite statements made by some of its own members, that the government or at least the Minister of Labour is not satisfied with the present ad hoc method of solving these crippling work stoppages when they affect essential services or, as I said before, when the total effect of the strike may not confine itself merely to essential services but affects the national interest.

Therefore, I think it is true to say that there is far greater agreement that we must find a better way, among all members of this House, the public, members of the labour force, management and other interested groups within our community, than is now apparent. This better way has been apparent to us for quite some time and it is interesting that the Minister of Labour, in the document sent recently to his colleagues in the cabinet, referred to the Woods report.

Mr. Alexander: He stole our policy.

Mr. Fraser: My colleague is suggesting that the minister stole our policy. If the minister wishes to pluck the policy out from under us, we are prepared to look the other way or we are prepared to give it to him. It is interesting that the minister has said the Woods report is very useful and the study is still relevant. The minister should be bemused at hearing these remarks because today the first page of the business section of that very reputable gatherer and purveyor of news, the Globe and Mail, contains this remarkable headline, "Council established in hope of reducing stoppages in work". I quote from the article:

> The federal government has established an industrial relations council of union, management and government representatives to examine ways of reducing work stoppages and labour strife and of improving the work environment.

It is interesting that the article goes on to say:

> Labour Minister John Munro will be chairman, according to Gordon McCaffrey, special assistant to Mr. Munro.

I want to say, on behalf of my party, that whatever surprise we may have in finding that many years after the Woods report came out the minister is beginning to implement parts of it, nonetheless we congratulate him sincerely on taking this very excellent recommendation from the Woods report and implementing it into policy at this time. On page 170 of the Woods report the authors of the report said:

> To ensure that the members of the commission—

That refers to the Public Interest Disputes Commission of which I will have something to say in a few minutes.

> —have the confidence of the parties as well as the public, the Canadian Industrial Relations Council, the creation of which we recommend later, should be consulted in their selection. Once appointed, such members should have the equivalent of tenure—

Then if we read page 214 of the Woods report we see that in paragraph No. 769 the authors recommend the establishment of a Canadian industrial relations council, and I quote:

> Departments of labour and industrial relations in general have been well served by labour-management advisory committees in a number of jurisdictions in this country and abroad. We recommend that such a body be established at the federal level in Canada and that it be termed the "Canadian Industrial Relations Council". The council would be able, on its own initiative or on the request of the department, to examine all manner of industrial relations issues and to offer its advice and counsel, especially on proposed policy and program changes.

Then it lists further details of what the council would do. In the document to which I refer, which the Minister of Labour submitted to his cabinet colleagues some weeks ago, he outlined some of the difficulties facing the world of work, if we want to use that phrase, at the present time and on page 3 of that document he says, with considerable accuracy:

> Some of the problems are of a structural nature in that there are too many bargaining points, too many bargaining agents and unions. The result, as any holiday traveller in Canada knows, is something as exciting as the Olympic lottery. As he embarks on his holiday, confident that the airline pilots are working and that the machinists are also on the job, there just may happen to be a walk-out of ticket clerks and other personnel. And even if all of these private sector employees are on the job, the trip could still be placed in jeopardy by collective action taken by air traffic controllers, technicians, airport electricians or firefighters. There are similar difficulties in the movement of grain—

I will say something about that in a moment.

> —with risk of its steady flow being halted, if in the long stream handling the commodity, there is labour peace on the dockside but not on the ships or the waterways.

I would ask all hon. members, especially those on the government side, to take note of the next paragraph. The minister says:

> It is clear that the system today lacks coherence and has a great potential for conflict.

On page 4 the document to which I refer goes on to say:

> I am proposing, therefore, the establishment of the Canada Labour Relations Council as a mechanism that will go beyond one-shot, crisis or ritual consultation.
> Our own objectives for the council would be:
> —an alteration of bargaining structures so as to reduce the number of bargaining points,
> —the utilization of structures for on-going relationships,
> —to persuade the parties to adopt alternative modes of settlement of disputes so as to lessen impact of conflict on others if not on themselves,
> —to ascertain what additional programs and services we should be providing in the way of support,
> —to maximize the use of collective bargaining as a means of dividing the national product in a fair way.

So far as this party is concerned, at least as far as the minister has gone with respect to the direction in which the government is going the minister and the government have our support; but we are a little astounded to find, when we read pages 170 and 171 of the Woods report, that the things the minister is referring to today, in 1975, in his cabinet document were set out as part and parcel of the recommendations, considerations and deliberations of the Woods report which came to the government in 1968. I will not take the time to quote them, but they are there for hon. members to read.

Although I am a relatively new member, it was interesting for me to listen day in and day out, month after month, for the last number of years to Liberal candidates and Liberal members over and over again saying that the Woods report would not work. We remember ministers of the Crown saying that it would not work.

Mr. Alexander: I remember that.

Mr. Fraser: Others in government have said that only rarely do we have to bring in legislation to end strikes and the ad hoc system we have followed is the best. However, the facts have overtaken them, and in the absence of any structured system which in an effective way involves labour, management and the government, the so-called ad hoc, occasional piece of legislation to end strikes has become a recurring pattern and it shows every sign of increasing. So we say that we support the minister and his recommendations but we ask him to remember that we have been saying since 1968 that this should have been done, and the government has said over and over again that it could not be done.

Mr. Stanfield: The government forgets bad meat, too.

Mr. Fraser: I know that the Minister of Labour will speak to us this afternoon. When he does, I wonder if he would elaborate on an article which appeared this morning in the Globe and Mail with respect to the industrial relations council which has just been announced by the minister's special assistant, Gordon McCaffrey. In this regard, it would not be amiss to suggest to the minister that when an important statement like this is to be made, it might be preferable that it be made in the House of Commons, with notice to the parties.

● (1620)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: I say this conscious of the fact that the minister has known for some months that I have had his document and I am fairly familiar with the details. In any event, I think it would be in order if the minister were to elaborate this afternoon or, if this is not the occasion, if he would shortly make a statement on motions to explain the purpose and direction the government wishes to take, even though this is obvious and has the support of our party.

There is another matter which I think is of considerable importance, Mr. Speaker, and it fits in with the general tenor of the motion of the hon. member for Kamouraska. I refer to the question of illegal strikes. As the minister said when talking about the right to strike, that freedom, while unchallenged, is not absolute. The legal right to strike is not absolute, I think most people would agree, when it infringes to an inordinate degree on the public interest. But there can be no question about illegal strikes.

An extraordinarily interesting address was delivered at the convocation at Simon Fraser University, in Burnaby, British Columbia, last Saturday which I had the privilege of attending in an official capacity. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada made a speech which was short and very much to the point. He said that if because we did not like a law, or thought a law inconvenient, or for any reason decided we could ignore a law, such an attitude would inevitably destroy the social fabric of the community and put an end to our freedoms and liberties. It is a sad commentary on the state of affairs in Canada when the Chief Justice of Canada has to make such a remark under those circumstances. There is no question in my mind that the Chief Justice was saying something which he thought had not been said clearly enough by others in the community and had to be said by the highest ranking judge in the country.

One of the difficulties is that the procedures by which we have passed back-to-work legislation leaves a great deal to be desired in the wording of the clauses and in the measures used to force union members back to work. While our party supported the recent legislation affecting the St. Lawrence Seaway workers because we believed that the farmers of Quebec had to get the grain, we are not happy with the form of legislation presently being used to force workers back on the job. That legislation requires us to apply for a court order to be served on the union or union members requiring them to return to work. If they do not obey this order, then they have to brought back to court where they are treated as if it were a traditional case of contempt. I suggest to the minister that there is good reason why this particular form of legislation ought to receive further consideration. The contempt process of the courts ought not to be used to interfere in a union-management dispute. The courts are reluctant to do this.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but he would only be able to complete his remarks with the consent of the House as the time allotted to him has expired. Is there consent to allow the hon. member to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for their generosity. I would ask the minister to consider this point. There has to be a more effective way of having the law take effect immediately, otherwise there is an inclination to delay obedience to the law. Such an example to the rest of the community is not to be tolerated. I will not be much longer, Mr. Speaker, but I want to raise with the minister another item which appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning. The minister or his friends must have been very busy these last few days because there is more labour news in the Globe and Mail this morning than there has been for weeks. One headline reads, "CLC plans talks with grain handlers on strike problem". The article begins:

> The Canadian Labour Congress plans to hold talks soon with affiliated unions involved in the movement of grain to seek some co-ordinated approach to collective bargaining. The move is an effort to avoid a succession of strikes affecting grain shipments.

The article does not suggest that this has taken place as a result of the initiative of the Minister of Labour, and I am sure the minister is not so modest that if he were behind it he would not say so. If he had something to do with it, of course, I commend him and compliment him on his initiative. I also want to commend and compliment my colleague the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt) because he has been advocating this approach for a long time. On May 20, as reported at page 5905 of Hansard, he said:

> Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43. My motion concerns the sale and delivery of our grain to foreign customers. The foreign exchange earned by our grain sales abroad is vital to our economy at any time; these sales are especially vital when this country is running a present trade deficit which economists forecast can only worsen. Recent failures to meet our delivery commitments due to lawful strikes within Canada in grain delivery operations have seriously hurt our grain sales efforts; already foreign buyers have gone to rival producers. Not only has our whole economy been injured but our farmer-producers have had to pay millions of dollars in demurrage charges.
> In a matter so important to all Canadians, we cannot afford labour-management confrontations where there are no winners, only losers. I suggest that organized labour must be made a party to our international grain sale negotiations. Therefore, I propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):
> That the government immediately invite organized labour to participate as a party in contract negotiations for the sale of Canadian grain to foreign buyers, to the end that grain movement is guaranteed to meet delivery commitments to foreign purchasers despite any lawful strike.

Unfortunately, as seems to happen too often, the hon. member's motion did not receive unanimous consent. It is a matter of some comfort, however, to see the headline a week later in the Globe and Mail, "CLC plans talks with grain handlers on strike problem". The hon. member for Lethbridge deserves credit. He nudged the minister, who in turn nudged the CLC into acting. Hopefully, we shall witness some degree of co-operation which will end the chaos of recent years.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I, too, welcome this opportunity provided by the motion of the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) to express my views on the industrial relations issues covered by his omnibus motion.

The point that should be made at the outset is this: the hon. member's motion seems to assume that most of the troubles now besetting labour-management affairs are susceptible of legislative solution. The implications of the motion are that all problems in this field are the result of government failure to provide the right kind of legislation, and that the problems can be solved by the enactment of appropriate new laws or the amendment of existing laws. This shows touching faith in the power of legislators. I only wish it were well founded.

The fact remains that we are dealing with some very complex socio-economic developments and they do not lend themselves to quick, easy or arbitrary treatment. At most, legislation can provide a suitable framework within which the parties themselves can work out a satisfactory and constructive relationship. This is the philosophy embodied in the Canada Labour Code. Its preamble refers to "the encouragement of free collective bargaining and the constructive settlement of disputes." It declares its support for the principles of freedom of association and free collective bargaining as the basis of effective industrial relations.

This government has always supported, and will always support, these basic principles. We do not believe that in a democratic society the relations between labour and management can be determined by legislative fiat. This belief has not been shaken in the least by the disturbing increase in the number of industrial disputes and work stoppages in recent years. These signify a weakness in the collective bargaining system or, rather, its inability in its present form to cope with the increasing strains imposed on it by a rapidly changing society with its growing interdependence and technological advances.

We agree that there must be reforms. The structure of collective bargaining and of industrial relations in general must adapt to the new challenges and complexities that now confront it. But that does not mean we should legislate away basic rights, abandon our faith in the ability of the parties to accommodate their conflicting interests, and try to substitute a Big Brother-like regimentation of all labour relations activities. In a democracy, change—if it is to be durable and acceptable—must come from a process of consensus; and that applies even more forcibly to the volatile world of labour-management affairs.

My department quite openly identifies itself with the interests of the labour movement. We exist to foster and facilitate its legitimate objectives of promoting the welfare of working people. We consult with labour leaders on all aspects of policy affecting their members. We have in recent years expanded this kind of consultation in an effort to involve organized labour in the discussions and dialogue that form such a vital part of the decision-making process of government. We make no apologies for this policy and we intend to develop other channels of consultation with labour and, of course, with employers as well.

As a result of the greater frequency of strikes—particularly those that interfere with public services—many people are complaining about what they perceive as the exercise of excessive power by unions. The hon. member makes this point in his motion. There is a clamour in the press and in the legislatures and in some company boardrooms to curb this alleged abuse of union power. The motion we are debating today reflects that feeling when it refers to "certain union figures wielding powers exceeding their responsibilities."

This conjures up an image of autocratic union leaders bullying their reluctant members, feeding their aspirations with unreasonable wage demands and goading them into strike action against their wishes. This stereotype of the average union leader bears no resemblance to the world of reality. The average labour leader of my acquaintance today is trying to curb his members' expectations and militancy, not stimulate them. He is trying to dissuade them from adopting unrealistically high demands. He is doing his best to avert strikes, not start them.

There are, of course, exceptions. A few well publicized union leaders are speaking and acting irresponsibly. A few are guilty of inflating their members' bargaining objectives and of inflaming their distrust of the employer through misrepresentation and distortion. These few are the ones you read about. The vast majority who are conducting themselves responsibly—who are much more typical of union officials—get little attention in the media. They are too lacking in controversy to make news.

Actually, a good case could be made that most unions and union leaders, far from being too powerful, are not powerful enough. One of the main reasons for the multiplicity of strikes now being experienced—especially those that occur successively in the same industry—is that collective bargaining is splintered among so many different bargaining units. Power, instead of being concentrated in one union or one bargaining unit, is diffused among several organized groups.

When we talk about the need for industry-wide bargaining to do away with this fragmentation of contract negotiations, what we are in effect advocating is the concentration of more union power. This would repose in the central union leadership, rather than in the hands of numerous small union fiefdoms, the power to bargain for all the workers in an industry. Strikes would be fewer and would require the approval of a majority of the entire work force instead of a majority of each small subgroup.

I am not implying that all central labour organizations lack power under the present bargaining structure or that they are not sometimes guilty of abusing their power. We have only to look at the revelations of the Cliche commission in Quebec to see how corrupt, venal, unscrupulous leaders can gain control of some unions and misuse their power to the detriment not only of the industry and the economy, but of their own members as well. Although the rot that permeates the construction industry in Quebec is outside the federal jurisdiction, it does serve as an object lesson of what can happen when rank and file unionists lose or surrender their democratic rights. It also underlines a glaring omission in the internal mechanism of the labour movement in Canada—the lack of a code of ethics and the means to enforce it.

The reticence of the Canadian Labour Congress preceding and during the Cliche commission hearings—as well as its aloofness from the latest controversy involving the Seafarers' International Union—has not been particularly impressive.

If the congress does not set up the needed internal machinery to expose and correct wrongdoing among its affiliates, it will have no one to blame but itself if governments are compelled to step into the moral vacuum and do the clean-up job the labour movement neglected to do. Government intervention of this kind should be a last resort, undertaken only when the central labour body has attempted to institute reforms and failed. Because the CLC has no ethical standards or mechanism for policing them, the government intervention to which labour objects remains the first and only corrective available.

This is not to convey the impression that corruption is rife among CLC affiliates. Far from it. The vast majority of affiliated unions, locals and union officers at all levels are scrupulously honest and honourable. We all know that. Their over-all record for integrity, I am sure, would match that of any other institution or section of society. This is all the more reason, of course, for the honest majority of unionists to act quickly to rid their organizations of the minority of those whose interests and actions do not reflect those of the membership.

Time does not permit my dealing as extensively as I would like with the prevailing myth that excessive wage settlements are the main cause of inflation, that they are running at double the average rise of wages in the United States, and that they threaten our competitive advantage over the Americans.

I would refer hon. members, instead, to two articles in the Financial Times, one by Peter Cook on April 21, the other by Don McGillivray on May 19, which go far to debunk this myth about allegedly excessive wage increases. Mr. Cook quotes figures to show, first of all, that inflation in Canada "is under better control here than in Europe or Japan"; secondly, that our strike record is not nearly as bad in terms of international comparisons as had been thought; and, thirdly, that the rise in wage costs in Canada has been lower than in all countries except the United States and West Germany.

In his article, Mr. McGillivray admits that Canadian wages have been rising faster than those in the United States, but so has our productivity. In the five years 1969 to 1974, Canada's real gross national product, eliminating all inflation, grew by 23 per cent, as compared with a growth of only 10.2 per cent in the American real gross national product. Mr. McGillivray also points out that when the statistical distortions are removed, average Canadian wage gains have been running at less than 1 per cent ahead of those in the United States over the life of collective agreements, instead of the widely but incorrectly reported double the United States figure. I am not implying for one moment that all settlements are reasonable; some are obviously not, and these remain a matter of real concern. I think this myth about Canadian wage settlements being double those in the United States should be laid to rest right now.

The motion before us refers to an alleged "toleration of illegal strikes" by the government. I would challenge anyone to substantiate that charge. When parliament has acted in cases of economic crisis to enact back-to-work legislation, defiance of the legislation has met with the appropriate response to enforce compliance. This action may not satisfy the authoritarians. It may not appear to be sufficiently prompt or punitive. However, it has been taken in the most feasible way to ensure an orderly resumption of work without going to the harsh extremes that prolong, rather than end, the dispute.

We must always remember that ad hoc, strike-ending legislation, while it may sometimes be the last unavoidable means of protecting the public interest, is a poor substitute for voluntary agreement. I agree with the spokesman for the Conservative Party, the labour critic, in that regard. It necessarily imposes a settlement that is not freely accepted by one of the parties, usually the union. It appears to the labour movement to be a one-sided intervention by parliament on the side of the employer since it takes away the union's sole bargaining lever and forces the employees back on the job against their wishes.

This brings me back to the question of what the government, and my department specifically, is doing to bring about the needed changes and reforms in our particular labour relations system. We are convinced that the system can be improved to meet the challenges of the times and that it can best be done through consultation with the participants. This is a slow and often tedious process, but in our opinion it is the only way. It involves much more effort and time than would be involved in passing the kind of legislation called for in the motion before us.

The goals of the proposed legislation are in some respects admirable and not far removed from our own objectives. However, they cannot be accomplished unilaterally, without involving the parties in the decision-making process. It would be convenient, as the motion urges, to set up "tribunals made up of experts" to devise the new approaches and policies required. However, there are no real experts in the labour-management field; there are only people with enough knowledge of the complexities to know that there are no simple answers to be handed down from on high.

We hear today that the public is fed up with strikes. This has been said repeatedly and to a degree it is true. However, this is an oversimplification and one might ask: If the public is fed up with strikes, why do we have strikes? When we speak of the public, we cannot segregate working men and women in Canada from the public.

In most strike situations today, working men and women are fighting for more dollars to keep ahead of the inflationary spiral that is plaguing this country and indeed the western world. There is another underlying cause for the labour unrest we are experiencing today. As society changes, traditional job values change and people become, rightfully or wrongfully, dissatisfied with their place in the pecking order, as basically we still relate salary to status. We have not yet reached, if we ever will, the millennium or Armageddon described by Alvin Toffler in "Future Shock" where people will have to be paid a salary to stay home and our whole status of values related to wages and salary will have to change.

With larger segments of our working force moving to the service sector of our economy, strains have developed. Those engaged in some services feel there should be drastic changes in the pecking order. A few years ago snide remarks were made about the work of the garbage collector. In today's society we find his work can be pretty important if garbage is piled in the parks in the summer months when he decides he is entitled to more dignity, which in today's terms can only be accomplished through the status of a higher wage. The same holds true for hospital workers and, indeed, the trained nurse—whose skills are greatly needed—takes the position, why the great disparity between her salary and that of the doctor with whom she works?

Traditionally, remuneration has been based on higher education. It was the hope of every working father to be able to put his children through university so they would not have to toil with their hands and they would enjoy the status delegated to those with degrees by our society. I sense the winds of change taking place in this country. Perhaps we will have to pay a premium to those we ask to bend their backs and toil with their hands. Perhaps we will have to pay a premium to those who keep unpleasant things out of our sight, such as garbage, and to those who look after our sick and aged in hospitals and old age homes. It is all very well for us to sit in this House and express horror at certain percentage increases without examining the base rate. We might have different ideas of what our percentage increase should be if we were handling bedpans in hospitals or clearing the garbage from the streets.

Our problem is that as people fight to better their position in the pecking order and correct long-standing inequities and anomalies, other highly organized groups within the work force say, "Traditionally our wages were such a percentage higher than this group, and we must maintain the differential." We are going through rapid change in this country and all the gnashing of teeth and wringing of hands will not prevent changes from taking place.

I say to those who suggest instant answers to these problems through legislation or other means that they are either naïve or foolish. Over my years in the House I have heard at one time or another the whole range of fantasy from compulsory arbitration to an industrial disputes commission. If solutions are to be developed, they will have to be developed by the social partners, labour and management, acting in unison with government. Only in this way, through participation, can we achieve the commitment to make policies work. It is for this reason that we are in the process of establishing a tripartite type of council to cope with the problems now besetting us and which will intensify in the next decade. I have high hopes for this council, but let me sound a note of warning. The adversary nature of our industrial relations system, which has been fostered since the days when working men had to meet secretly to discuss their conditions of employment, will not be dissipated overnight.

It would be premature to speculate on what the council will deal with, but among the things it may well turn its attention to is the creation of an independent research institute which would be the source of reliable and generally accepted data on which the parties could agree as the basis for negotiation.

Another area where experimentation is long overdue is that of industrial democracy and job satisfaction. I am glad to note that my colleague, the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey), plans to give the concept of workers' management a trial in the Post Office. I wish him every success and trust this will be the beginning of a new era in labour relations.

I see in these initiatives the prospect of getting at the root causes of the labour unrest which the motion decries. What we have to do is to provide the stimulus, the framework and the resources which will enable the practitioners themselves to alter their thinking, their traditions, their bargaining structures. At the last meeting of the tripartite council I attended, I was mightily impressed by the tremendous enthusiasm of both labour and management, the determination to get on with the work of the council and give it the time and resources necessary to get on with this type of job because they fully realize the challenges which must be met if we are to maintain a free, collective bargaining system which we all value so highly.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) for introducing this motion into the House at this time. That is about as much as I have favourably to say about what he said. He has introduced the matter at an important time. I must say his interpretation of the Rand formula going back to 1946 pretty well left me astounded, because he does not seem to have understood the difference between a closed shop and a union shop. To say, as he said, that he rejects dues payments that would be irrevocable, or what he calls compulsory—which is called the agency shop in the United States—and to say he is all for dues being voluntary, is just to say what the management of the United Aircraft plant was saying at Longueuil—now Pratt and Whitney—to the workers there.

I do not think he would say that to the medical profession or the legal profession, and so on, who would not accept into their ranks, into their types of unions, people who would only voluntarily contribute to the good of that union. Mr. Justice Rand, in his famous decision in the UAW case in 1946, pointed out that workers who do not belong to a union and insist there be freedom of decision on their part nevertheless have to recognize that the union is a group working on behalf of the workers, and as such gets certain benefits through the collective bargaining process and these benefits redound to the benefit of everyone in the bargaining unit, so workers who do not want to join the union must at least pay union dues if they are to get the benefits the union provides. In trying to bring about a compromise, he said it is unquestionably right for the people who do not want to belong to a union to be protected, but at the same time they must make a contribution in terms of union dues since they will get the benefit of the work of the union acting as an agency on behalf of all the workers.

Some hon. members know about the compulsory arbitration system under Australian labour courts and tribunals that has been tried, and I for one am very leery to see too much legalism put into trying to reach a compromise between labour and management in such situations in a free society. The fact is we have too much legalism, in my opinion, in the situation now. Labour courts or tribunals are not going to help very much.

The last part of the resolution the Social Credit party presents, urges corporations to set up shareholding and profit-sharing programs, and so on. I think we can go along with that within a certain framework and subject to certain constraints which I will mention as I go along. The point I want to make, as far as the Progressive Conservative spokesman is concerned, is this: I take little objection to what he said. I was glad to hear him remind the minister that the tripartite council he proposes was something coming out of the Woods report, and althought it is a very belated recognition by the minister of this important suggestion, nevertheless we all agree it should have a valuable role to play.

The spokesman for the Progressive Conservative Party notes the colossal waste of production because of the number of man-hours lost through strikes, illegal and otherwise. We all know that this type of statistic is easy to get at, and in parallel we should also note—and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) should recognize it when he makes a speech as he did today—that when you deliberately create unemployment as the government did in 1971 and 1972, and as they are doing now to fight inflation, you should have a figure amounting to $5 billion or $10 billion for goods and services lost through unemployment.

My point is that the amount of production lost through strikes is always noted, but very seldom the amount of goods and services lost through the deliberate creation of unemployment in the economy. I would agree with the minister, though, that we should not be looking primarily for a legal solution in labour-management relations.

I was quite surprised but pleased to hear the minister refer to the myth that has been propagated, that Canadian wage settlements are double the rate of United States wage settlements. He said he wanted to lay that myth to rest once and for all. I wish he would tell the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) about this, because the Minister of Finance has been propagating this notion all across Canada. Every editorial I have read keeps repeating that labour wage settlements are pricing workers out of the market. On more than one occasion the finance minister has said—I have questioned the Minister in the House on this—that the major cause of inflation in Canada is wage settlements achieved by unionized workers. This is why I wish the Minister of Labour would bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Finance. Certainly, I hope that in his forthcoming budget there will not be a repetition of what the Minister of Labour is now calling a myth that needs to be laid to rest.

In referring to the difficulties presently existing in labour-management relations in Canada, the minister noted that the structure of unions in small bargaining units is something requiring serious consideration. The minister is all for more concentration in bargaining units so as to give, he hopes, union organizations more weight, which will cut down on labour strife. He also mentioned the lack of a code of ethics for the CLC and referred in particular to the construction industry in Quebec. I suggest there is an analogy here, one the minister might have brought out, with what took place in the United States in the 1950s when corruption became such an issue among the unions there that the AFL-CIO started to police themselves by setting up their own code of ethics.

The minister also mentioned the drastic change that is taking place in the pecking order, as he put it, and said workers today want a certain dignity. People in the so-called dirty jobs, like garbage collection, want a higher place in the pecking order. We do not disagree with this, but it strikes me that there was a notable omission in the minister's remarks in reply to the hon. member from the Créditiste party who introduced this motion, and the spokesman for the official opposition. I refer to the fact that he failed to mention that inflation was one of the dominant reasons the unions are asking for such high wage settlements and are so disturbed.

I suggest to the minister that if someone in his department researched this question, he would find a very close analogy between today and 1946-47. Incidentally, if I may return to the minister's argument about wage settlements in Canada not being so far out of line with the United States, this very point was made by my parliamentary leader in a debate on May 14 last, as reported at page 5794 of Hansard, the fourth paragraph. I am glad to hear that the minister agrees with my parliamentary leader on this subject, but again I ask him to make the situation known to the Minister of Finance.

To return to the question of inflation, recently Dr. Donner, an economist, wrote a comment in the Globe and Mail regretting the amount of industrial unrest in Canada today. In his article he makes the same major criticism that I have made of the minister's remarks today. He says:

[Mr. Hogan.]

Unfortunately, the hostility now arising is being directed at particular groups, such as big unions or big government, though rarely is it ever directed at the real culprit in the picture—Canada's high rate of inflation.

I should like to add to that Canada's high rate of unemployment is also causing insecurity among people who are already working. Not only do they fear prices going even higher, so they try not only to catch up but to anticipate future increases, but they fear that the many hundreds of thousands of Canadian workers who have already been laid off will create insecurity in their communities that will flow over into labour-management relations. Dr. Bonner goes on:

Indeed, with the benefit of hindsight, it is clear that it is the gross under-anticipation of the high rate of inflation of the past several years, as well as the efforts to catch up with the lost real earnings by labour, that are now at the centre of the industrial turmoil.

Management was no more perceptive than labour in evaluating the accelerating pace of inflation of the past two years, although management was more quickly able to capitalize on the excess demand pressures of 1973 and early 1974 by increasing prices ahead of rising costs.

We know, of course, that there is a very strong statistical correlation here. When the business cycle moves up, big business can increase their prices and this results in the abnormally high profits that were present in the Canadian economy between 1972 and 1974. It is true that in the first quarter of 1975 the profits of many firms went down, but this is just a phenomenon of the business cycle in a serious recessionary phase. Dr. Donner goes on to say, and it is very important that parliamentarians recognize it:

Labour tended to be locked in by one and two-year contracts, and many of these contracts in the recent past did not have adequate inflation escalation clauses . . .

Moreover, when the ratio of profits to GNP declines sharply, as it did in 1970, and when the labour movement feels that it must catch up with past real income losses, it is not surprising to see the number of man-days lost because of industrial disputes reach high levels. In 1975 we could see the number of man-days lost reach as high as 13 million, 260 per cent above the average for the period 1963 through 1974.

I am making this long quotation from Dr. Donner's editorial because he speaks with wisdom and because the minister failed to deal with this matter in his remarks today. I am happy to see that as a result of high inflation and unemployment, labour and management are getting together. I hope the government will take some of the recommendations flowing from the Woods inquiry and apply them to the labour scene at the end of the 1970s and the beginning of the 1980s.

As far as I am personally concerned, the major cause of industrial unrest in Canada today is, as Dr. Donner points out, our failure to anticipate inflation. I remember during the last election campaign that members on the government side were saying that they could not do anything about inflation. Then we come to this parliament and the Minister of Finance brings in his first budget and says we have a cost-push inflation: then it is a wage-push inflation. The ball game keeps changing every few months. He was still expecting the United States to rescue us from our own problems, which have become worse.

I am not contending that there are any easy solutions to inflation in Canada or anywhere else in the world but I am saying that countries like Germany have done a much better job of managing their economy than we have. We in this country have had a repetition of much the same kind of policies that we had in 1971 and 1972, although not as restrictive as that period. One would think that the government had learned their lesson; they were almost thrown out of office in 1972. Since we are 3½ years away from the next election, the government probably feels more secure today.

The high rate of inflation in this country, coupled with a high unemployment rate, make a much more serious contribution to industrial unrest and to the kind of illegal work stoppages we have been experiencing than any other one variable mentioned this afternoon. I repeat for the second or third time that I am surprised the Minister of Labour did not make this point an essential part of his argument. But once again I congratulate him for having the courage to say that it is a myth that Canadian wage settlements are far out of line with United States wage settlements. That should mean that no one, including editorial writers and people in the government, can any longer try to make labour the scapegoat for our problems.

It was interesting this week to watch the minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) working hard around the country trying to sell the notion of industrywide bargaining. The minister developed that idea this afternoon and I was pleased to hear him do so. But I would consider it a little premature or presumptuous on the part of the Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister, having announced the establishment of a tripartite labour-management-government advisory council, to then suggest or tell that council that industrywide bargaining is the solution to our problems in the labour-management field. What makes them so sure of that? There are many examples of industrywide bargaining in the United States which would indicate that it could create even more difficulty. This matter is so complex that it has to be looked at very seriously by the experts in this complicated field, although the minister and the Prime Minister did not suggest that this should be done earlier this week; they just offered it as a solution.

I think we are facing the danger of creating an oversimplified panacea, which obviously the minister should want to avoid. It is all right to look at the Canadian steel industry, as one journalist pointed out today, in terms of industrywide bargaining. This type of bargaining seems to be made for that type of industry in which the firms in Ontario control 70 per cent to 80 per cent of the production of all steel products in this country. But what about Dofasco which never had a union organization? How will you get industrywide bargaining in a situation like that? What about Sidbec, in Quebec, which is owned by the provincial government? What about our provincially-owned poor version of Sidbec called Sysco? The federal government practically washed its hands of that when it refused to allow the Cape Breton Development Corporation to take over the steelworks. I say that despite intermittent DREE grants made to Sysco.

I give the federal government full credit for setting up the Cape Breton Development Corporation, but it took away one of its most important controlling aspects when it did not allow the corporation to take over the Sydney Steel Works, forcing that industry back on a relatively financially weak province which did not have the civil servants, expertise or the know-how to tackle the difficulties in creating an internationally competitive steel industry. We are paying for that failure in Nova Scotia today.

When we talk about industrywide bargaining, these are some of the critical problems involved. We have to be very careful now even talking about voluntary arbitration as a good solution. I know George Meany in the United States came out in favour of this, but let us not do the work of the council before it even sits.

Having said that, let me congratulate the minister for having accepted the recommendation of the Woods report and setting up the council and making it a reality. If this is a by-product of the labour unrest due to our inflation and high unemployment, all well and good. I think the references in the resolution to industrial democracy in terms of profit-sharing and workers' shares should be seriously considered by this council as a tool for bringing labour and management together in the 1970s and the 1980s. I join with the minister in wishing the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) well in his attempt to make industrial democracy work in the Post Office.

Perhaps I could just have one or two minutes more, and I will be through, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The hon. member's allotted time has expired. He can be allowed to conclude his remarks if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hogan: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and fellow colleagues. I just want to make this point about the profit-sharing scheme mentioned in this resolution. I think shares going to the workers is a fine idea and I am all for it. I think if we had had some workers on the board of directors in the Cape Breton situation, the 1971 fiasco there would not have happened. I do not want to take the time of the House by going over that matter now, as time is pressing.

Let me remind Social Credit members and everyone else here of what the minister implicitly mentioned today. He said that in no way should these things such as profit-sharing be substituted for collective bargaining as a key implement in our free society. They are good ideas so long as they are not used to subvert union organizations or the organization of certified unions. Having said that, let me suggest that I feel there is a conservatism in the trade union movement, coupled with excuses for not attempting to establish industrial democracy, which are the kinds of things the minister's council well have to consider and overcome in their attempts to accomplish what has been suggested along the lines of the last part of this resolution. They are all part of the over-all picture.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. I interrupt the proceedings of the House to inform hon. members that pursuant to Standing Order 40 the questions to be raised tonight at the time of the adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt)—Environmental Affairs—Reason for failure to adopt standards for asbestos fibres under clean air act—Possible protest from United States; the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—Air Transport—Suggested separate ministry for civil air transport—Government position; the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan)—Income Tax—Decentralization of data processing—Possible establishment of office in Atlantic region.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED GOVERNMENT FAILURE TO RESOLVE LABOUR PROBLEMS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska):

That this House deplores the fact that the government has neglected to make legislative changes to remedy present problems at all levels of labour activity.

This neglect has resulted in:

(1) a climate of instability and dissatisfaction for workers and the working class in general;

(2) the toleration of a system which allows certain union figures to wield powers exceeding their responsibilities;

(3) the toleration of illegal strikes and work stoppages initiated on any pretext which paralyze or even destroy the economy and the social progress of vast fields of activity;

(4) a continued opposition between employees and employers instead of the development of mutual aid policies.

To remedy this situation, parliament should:

(1) pass measures granting fiscal advantages to employees and employers to restore their motivation;

(2) effect stimulating measures to increase work attractiveness and professional satisfaction;

(3) urge corporations to set up employee shareholding and profit sharing programs;

(4) create labour tribunals made up of experts in employer-employee relations and empowered to set adequate working conditions for restoring mutual understanding and preventing conflicts.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate to stress some features in the brilliant demonstration by my colleague for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne).

Mr. Speaker, my party is privileged to show once more, with a certain amount of courage, some of the ills that, unfortunately, there is a tendency to ignore. The present labour situation is so clear, so obvious, that it is not longer possible to be satisfied with suggestions that problems are complex, that there are no miracle solutions, and so forth. To keep on saying this is simply to admit the situation. The present nightmare in certain areas, and especially in Quebec, is so horrendous that the time has come to wake up and find solutions. It is all the more easy for us to talk about it as we have been referring for years to this extremely bad situation, at the risk of being labelled at times anti-labour and anti-worker, which is totally inaccurate. When we take such positions, it is to defend the worker himself who is being mocked in the process. If this kind of condoning goes on, if the government in particular remains negligent as we feel it is in that area, our democracy might be over and done with.

Concerning the second consequence of the neglect we refer to, the toleration of a system whereby certain labour leaders wield powers exceeding their responsibilities, we are now experiencing such a consequence of the failure of government leaders.

When certain labour leaders, specifically those who were responsible for gangsterism in James Bay, who in the course of simple labour conflicts caused tremendous property damage totalling over $35 million, when these same individuals are expected to decide today whether or not the Olympic Games will be held in Montreal in 1976, is this not giving them a responsibility that is not theirs? Have these people not proved by their former behaviour that they are far from having the qualifications required to take such responsibilities?

Such is the situation, Mr. Speaker. Who in this House can now say whether the Olympic Games will be held in Montreal in 1976? Who can state positively that they will be held as planned and at the date which has been set? No one can say so, no one can be certain. Why? Because certain union people can decide otherwise. If this is democracy, Mr. Speaker, where is all this leading? If this is respecting the rights of labour, where is all this leading?

Mr. Speaker, it is now time for us to truly take our responsibilities and to truly defend those who need it. Mr. Speaker, have you noticed that the conflicts which cause the most perturbations in our society are most often those which draw no sympathy from the population? To mention only one example, when the Montreal firemen decide to have a work stoppage, legal or not, since today no one cares whether they are legal or illegal, and ask $16,000 instead of $14,000 or $15,000, Mr. Speaker, who can sympathize with them? We understand the responsibility to fight fires, to protect homes and material, with one call a week or every two weeks, while the rest of the time is spent playing cards or dice, this is what it means to be a fireman.

Then how can they hope to gain the sympathy of the population when there are still small wage-earners who work from morning till night to earn the minimum wages and whose income will increase only because the provinces have now decided to raise the minimum wages. In my constituency, there are still small industries which pay minimum wages. If those were the people we have to defend, if those were the people who were asking for better wages, everyone would sympathize with them and, as the minister said, it is obvious that certain categories of manual workers, like the garbage collectors or those who do the cleaning in the hospitals, deserve much more our consideration and, consequently, maybe a higher income.

We agree that those people need help to balance their income with regard to other trades or professions. But it is not in such cases that the disruptions ar worse. It is always in cases when workers are well-paid and do not ask for more. Usually it is a small group that stirs up trouble and under the pretext of some social revolution, wants to separate the working class from the worker's true objectives thus taking simply advantage of an extraordinary force that was obtained through the force of circumstances. And now I would like to make mine an editorial that appeared in the December 1974 issue of Opinion Canada, in which is stressed a point which, in my opinion, is very true:

Trade unionism has for a long time been viewed favourably by the public due to the fact that the workers were deemed to be the scapegoat of management and of big companies that often seemed to have the support of governments and of police forces to victimize them and reduce them to a state of helplessness.

And the editor goes on to say:

It was an illusion. On the contrary, history shows that in North America, successive liberal governments, in Washington as well as in Ottawa, have not sought to victimize trade unionism, but to promote it, by legislating in order to enable it to resist the assaults of all-powerful multinational organizations.

American and Canadian laws have widely contributed to give the unions the power they now enjoy. Power and a certain degree of immunity have made major labour organizations arrogant, and the increasing number of strikes in the last few years are a major factor in alienating public sympathy from the unions. In reply to a recent Gallup poll on the confidence Canadians have these days in labour unions and large corporations, only 10 per cent answered they had great confidence in the labour unions, and only 8 per cent in large corporations. Those figures reveal less confidence as compared with preceding polls; a similar decrease was also noted in the United States in recent years.

To go back to my quotation:

People are starting to get the impression that unions strategies, which in the past proved themselves in private enterprise, are become overbearing and indefensible when aimed at public services.

It would seem that the time has now come for governments to help the unions find new bagaining and negotiating formulas for the members assigned to those services.

Mr. Speaker, how true those specific points are. There were confirmed once again a fortnight ago by a survey conducted scientifically in Montreal which proved in addition that the vast majority of the people, and what is more, the vast majority of the union workers and specifically those of the QFL, are calling the shots in the field of construction in Quebec. Ninety-five per cent of those very workers replied that they were against the methods used in labour negotiations, in other words, that they were against their union leader. Not so long ago, on May 1st at the Paul Sauvé Centre in Montreal, one Mr. Laberge, president of the QFL was unable to address a crowd made up exclusively of union workers.

This indicates that labourers as such as well as the Canadian people in general want these things to end. We are here it seems to help the people through legislation, through example. This is why I think the government should never have had anything to do with these rights given to public servants.

Mr. Speaker, as my colleague from Kamouraska so well underlined, there are priorities which must be taken into account. Are we going to condone the exercise of a right when rights which are still more fundamental are at stake? No one will ever make me admit that the right to strike should be extended to firemen, for example, when the very day they did strike—and I refer to a specific incident which happened in Montreal, damage by fire ran into several million dollars. The strike of policemen is another illegal strike, in Montreal too, which resulted in disaster and crime. Terrible things happened at that time!

Mr. Speaker, I shall never tolerate that, bringing someone to hospital for emergency treatment, pickets decide whether the patient will be admitted or not. There are limits! We do not deny workers the right to unionize, to defend their interests, but we are absolutely against the social unrest that those rights could create. We do not want to do away with the right to strike, but as my colleague for Kamouraska said, we must try to adopt by legislation such effective means that the right to strike could become outdated.

Indeed, in 1975, it is completely unacceptable in our advanced society that we are still using old fashioned processes to solve a labour dispute, as it were impossible to hold meaningful negotiations. Mr. Speaker, people work backwards not even thinking about negotiations, about getting together in order that both parties, employer and employees, come to an agreement on a reasonable contract. No, they go on strike right away, no matter if it is an illegal strike! If they have to book sick to do so, no problem. That is the situation we are denouncing, because it upsets and disrupts the economy, as we know that in 1974, 9,255,120 man-days have been lost in this country. Where are we going now?

We can understand why the worker is demanding job security, that he is trying to oppose automation because we have not yet established a guaranteed minimum income plan to allow him to take advantage of the automation and not to be a victim of it. We have always stated that if machines take the place of men, the products of machines must be distributed to the workers. That is clear and those are the policies that should have been established.

However, Mr. Speaker, and I will conclude on this, what is the actual reason for all those disputes? Simply that employers and workers try to have a guaranteed income, they try to have more advantages, but it is impossible within the present system. Why? Because banks consider money as a commodity, an actual value, and this is not true because it is a relative value. They try to maintain money in great demand. And people need money as they need food products or any other product. That allows banks to increase their power and their control over the whole community. To that end, they tighten or ease credit so that prices grow faster than incomes. That is the basic issue, Mr. Speaker.

It is the basic economic problem, the real cause of labour-management conflicts. Workers and employers are fighting over an inadequate purchasing power. In such circumstances, it is impossible to find a satisfactory solution for all. Before considering a solution to the labour-management problem, we should relieve the artificial pressure exerted on the economy. When the purchasing power will have reached the production level, the present struggle to appropriate an inadequate money supply will have ceased.

That is the real reason. We realize that the workers seek a higher income and want job security, while the employer is trying to produce at a competitive cost. Such being the case, according to the motion, the government is to be blamed for being negligent, unconcerned and tolerant to such an extent that drastic measures are now required. The fact remains however that the government can be sure that steps in that direction will get the massive support of the people.

Mr. Speaker, coming back to the example given a moment ago, if the Olympic Games do not take place in Montreal in 1976 because a small QFL group has so resolved, you can be assured that any government that would end these absolutely equivocal, inadequate and inappropriate situations would receive tremendous support from the whole population, and that, without any mental reservation. This is what we must keep in mind and any government action should be oriented toward policies of this kind.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that this motion supported by different points will be well understood. We have spoken plainly because we want the members of parliament to grow aware of problems that are continually cropping up: longshoremen strikes, railway employees' strike, postal employees' strikes. And the minister said a moment ago that if the people do not want strikes, they have to bring about a change! But, Mr. Speaker, people have elected us to do this job. They have elected us to change what is wrong. Sometimes, people find it difficult to communicate in times of dispute. If there is a dispute in the Post Office Department, one cannot write to the minister. If there is a dispute in the telephone system, one cannot get in touch with the minister. As I said, all these strikes disrupt the social and economic life of our country. They have to come to an end and we hope that through this motion, all members of parliament will become fully conscious of the seriousness of the problem.

[English]

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the constructive tone of much of this debate, although it is true that in the speeches of the Social Credit members, and especially in that of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), one does not sense a great sympathy for the aspirations of labour unions and members of labour unions.

It is also true that the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) brought an unduly sharp note into today's proceedings with his parading of some doctrinaire nonsense about the economic policies of the government at the present time, alleging that the government is following restrictive policies similar to those which it followed in 1971. If the hon. member does not know, everyone else in the country knows that the government has been following an expansionary policy, and the general criticism is that the policy is so expansionary that it has been causing more inflation.

The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond also spoke about the subject of inflation. I have no particular quarrel with what he said in relation to the effect of inflation on labour contracts, but he treated us to a collection of truisms in his lecture on economics. The fact of the matter is that the debate today is not on the subject of inflation but rather, given the existing degree of inflation, what should be the response in the area of labour relations, and I regret that the hon. member did not devote more of his time to that subject.

Nevertheless much of the debate has been constructive, and I think the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) was right, for example, in pointing to the difficulties in the form of a legal settlement which was used in the Montreal longshoremen's strike, a form which led to an application to the court in proceedings analagous to those seeking an injunction. I think the decision of Chief Justice Deschênes in that case goes a long way toward establishing this procedure on firmer ground. I very much doubt whether we will have that kind of problem again. Nevertheless the means we choose to settle strikes, when parliament is occasionally called upon to intervene, must be kept under continual review.

I could not agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South on the reason for the address made recently in his home province by the Chief Justice of Canada. He suggested it was because of the lack of such statements by other people, members of the government in particular, that the Chief Justice had found it necessary to address himself to the subject.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) has many times, especially recently in the case of the Montreal longshoremen's strike, enunciated the supremacy of the law and his expectation that the longshoremen would return to work. The Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) found himself in a small amount of hot water for so enthusiastically proclaiming the virtues of the law in the Montreal situation, but the court quite rightly exonerated him of any attempt to interfere in the judicial process. The fact is that the government has been very strong in its position on this subject. I think it is not fair, therefore, for the hon. member for Vancouver South to suggest that this was the motive of the Chief Justice; his motive obviously was that one more authoritative voice, especially the supreme judicial voice of the country, might well be of assistance in dealing with the mood of disrespect for the law that sometimes asserts itself in various parts of the country.

Despite the constructive aspects of this debate there is, nevertheless, an over reliance on law by many of those who spoke before me. I sometimes think that we ought to have a debate in this House on the limits of the law. Certainly there is no area of human endeavour in which the law must tread more softly than the area generally described as human relations. And hon. members realize, of course, that labour relations are a particular case in the field of human relations.

The hon. member for Vancouver South fell into this error of excess in a previous debate in this House on April

23. I am sorry to embarrass him in his presence, but I want to recall to him the words he uttered on that occasion. As reported at pages 5126-7 of Hansard for that date, the hon. member said:

If we are to bring in legislation four weeks after a strike affecting the national interest takes place, is it not more logical to anticipate such a strike before it takes place, to pass legislation and not allow it to happen in the first place?

An hon. member says we cannot do that because it would interfere with the right to strike. What can be more ridiculous than knowing you are going to do in the end but not doing it at first and allowing the situation to go on and on; and then, after the damage has been done, coming before the House and saying piously, "We have decided we cannot stand it any longer; we must act".

It is an undue reliance on law and an interference with the due process of collective bargaining to suggest that there should be general legislation which, in the first instance, before any labour stoppage had taken place, would say to the members of the unions, "You shall not exercise your free right to bargain collectively by going on strike."

The reason the government sometimes has to decide after a number of weeks or a number of days that the situation is such that it must be dealt with by way of legislation is not, as the hon. member for Vancouver South suggested in his previous address, that the government is moved by popular clamour; rather it is that at a certain point it becomes obvious the strike is not going to be settled by the process of free collective bargaining. When the government comes to that conclusion, then, and then only, is it possible for the government to take the position that it should interfere with the normal process.

The Finkelman report which is being considered by a committee of the House seems to many hon. members to take an approach which is unduly legislative and regulative in recommending the appointment of a public commissioner whose powers could easily have the effect of undermining the collective bargaining process with the risk of jeopardizing any chances for a real labour-management relationship. The recommendations in the report would also impose more severe penalties. It seems to me this is not the general solution to the kind of problems we are facing.

The resolution presented to us today by the Social Credit Party and as developed by their speakers, especially the hon. member for Champlain, is an extreme oversimplification of the effect that law can have in the area of labour relations.

Generally speaking, there is a movement today to what we might call decriminalization, a movement which in the area of criminal law realizes that many things which have previously been subjected to criminal penalties should be no longer so subjected; a movement which, in the recommendations of the law reform commission, would change the character of a number of regulatory offences so that they would be less criminal or not criminal at all; a movement which in the area of administrative law, particularly with regard to fair accommodation practices, has seen all provinces try to rely on conciliation methods rather than on the harsher methods of the law, except as a last resort.

Generally speaking most of us in the House have remarked that from their position on the omnibus Criminal Code bill, of 1969 and onward, members of the Social Credit Party have been unsympathetic to this whole contemporary movement, and it does not surprise us that they take the position that in the area of labour relations solutions are to be found through the law. The fact is that the Social Credit proposal if taken literally, especially the proposal to create labour tribunals to settle practically all matters normally subjected to collective bargaining, would destroy collective bargaining.

The situation in Canada is not as grim as is often supposed. It is generally said that some nine million man-days of time were lost in the last year through strikes, and that this is a larger number of days than was lost in the previous year. In fact, this is not a very exact test. Let me indicate what those nine million plus man-days represent. They represent some .46 per cent—less than half of 1 per cent—of total working time, and less time than is lost through accidents and sickness. In 1969 we lost exactly the same proportion of total working time; in 1970 it was .39 per cent; in 1971, .16 per cent; in 1972 .43 per cent, and in 1973, .30 per cent.

The figures go up and down from year to year but it should be noted that the number of man-days lost under federal jurisdiction in 1974 was not only very small, 323,000 days in total for the public service as well as areas under the jurisdiction of my minister, but this was a very considerable decrease from the number of man days lost in the previous year. If this were to be taken as a test, the Department of Labour obviously did a better job in 1974 than in 1973. I would suggest, however, that the Department of Labour had many other bases on which to base its reputation in its seventy-fifth year of service to Canada. The use of this kind of test would be an over-simplification. All you need is one long strike and you have a lot of man-days lost. For example, the higher number of man-days lost in 1974 is attributable to the large number of man-days lost in the forest industries of British Columbia which, incidentally, are not under federal jurisdiction. When something like this happens occasionally, the number of man-days lost is magnified.

Indeed, if we establish more industry-wide bargaining, as the government hopes, we might even have more man-days being lost, in the sense that when there is a work stoppage the number of man-days lost would be greater. Again, that is not the test which ought to be used. The test is whether the system, according to all criteria which can be applied to it, is working effectively.

We, on this side of the House, are not satisfied with how the system is operating.

The minister advanced a number of proposals, both today and previously, for solving some of the difficulties we face. His chief proposal was, of course, the establishment of the Canada Labour Relations Council, which has already begun its important work. In addition the minister wishes to encourage more ongoing bargaining so that the collective bargaining process does not begin merely when the collective agreement is completed; rather, he wishes to encourage closer relations between labour and management during the currency of the contract.

Indeed, as shown by the progressive steps the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) has taken with respect to the concept of workers' management in the Post Office, the government in its own bailiwick is adopting the most contemporary and enlightened views on industrial democracy. That subject has caused even some members of the New Democratic Party, which has shown some understanding of labour matters, to become overly legalistic. It is one of the most cherished theses of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), the House leader of that party, that industrial democracy should be legislated. I can only say that we should approach industrial democracy legislation with as much caution as we approach legislation having to do with all other areas of labour relations. In this area the government should give leadership and encouragement, but it should not attempt quickly to adopt any legislative formula which might be considered as an easy solution to our present problems.

I see that my time has almost expired. As I want as many hon. members as possible to participate in this debate, I shall say just a few more words in conclusion. In my view the law in this field should be as minimal as possible. The government should provide as much encouragement as possible in the field of labour relations. Labour relations, being really human relations, are a field in which the expression of human freedom is of paramount importance.

Those who know the history of the labour movement, of workers in this country and, indeed, of all western countries, know how sensitive workers are on the subject of legislation. Only comparatively recently have they attained the right to the collective bargaining system which they now enjoy. For more than a century the working classes of all countries struggled hard to become free of repressive laws. Those on this side of the House do not propose to subject them ever again to such laws.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, as it is almost six o'clock, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House agree to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Discussions among those here at this time reveal that there might be a disposition to agree to a 15 minute limit on speeches for the rest of the evening to allow more members to take part in the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The House has heard the suggestion of the parliamentary secretary that speeches be limited to 15 minutes for the remainder of the evening. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us is a timely one, no doubt prompted by the growing labour unrest in the country and particularly recent events in the province of Quebec.

As I read the motion, the mover, the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne), indicates its content that he is hoping there will be some urgent government action to deal with the problem of growing labour unrest—in the province of Quebec, mainly because of the threat to the Olympic Games. We are faced with a situation there where, in order to keep the workers on the job, it has become necessary to introduce a police state with three levels of police supervising the construction site of the Olympic Games to exclude trouble makers. This indicates the degree to which labour relations have degenerated in this country. It is not something that has come about overnight. It is symptomatic of the general unrest in society which is a part of our industrialization and urbanization process.

In a recent speech the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) referred to our emphasis on material values that is creating a situation of rising expectations, which has resulted in the current stress in our society. All sorts of solutions have been put forward. The socialists look toward Utopian economic solutions. The communists have authoritarian solutions. The resolution before us, and this has been mentioned by several speakers, suggests that we might resolve the problem by legislative action. No one else agrees that that is the solution. While there is a commonly used phrase that says "there ought to be a law against it," I do not think that any legislative provisions can deal adequately with the deteriorating labour situation that confronts Canada at the present time.

There is a fundamental change in values, a breakdown in the traditional hierarchy system where wages used to be related to education, and also a decline in the work ethic. We have a situation where the working poor who stay on the job are in a worse position in terms of income than those who decide to take advantage of unemployment insurance. These are all symptoms of the degree to which the problem has developed in this country. It is aggravated by rampant inflation.

Just as an example of how inflationary expectations have become built into our economy, I was shopping in my constituency yesterday and I made a little purchase. There was one price of $5.50 and another price of $4.50 on the box. This is a very simple little souvenir, a letter opener, which is now selling for $5.50. When I asked the salesgirl, who was going to charge me the new price of $5.50, why the increase, she said the latest inventory indicated there should be an additional dollar increase. This product is distributed by one of the large companies in Canada which also manufactures beer. I do not know whether it is a head of barley or wheat in the handle, but it is an indication that inflationary psychology is rampant. It is a problem that must be dealt with if we are going to come to grips with the current labour unrest in this country.

Mr. Woolliams: Is the government to blame?

Mr. Dinsdale: The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) asks if the government is to blame. Just look at the rapid rise in government expenditures and I think you will see where the main problem lies.

While the motion emphasizes legislative solutions I think we all agree that what is required is skill and sensitivity in human relations, along with goodwill and good faith which can only be produced by improved working conditions which help to relieve the monotony of the assembly line approach to modern industry, introducing repetitive monotony into the manufacturing process, and in particular a sense of community.

The government in its statements thus far today has adopted simplistic solutions. Always under pressure, the government feigns a flurry of action. As has been noted by previous speakers, there have been several announcements, as reported in today's Globe and Mail. One of the solutions is a labour council that will bring together the diverse groups in the bargaining process. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacGuigan) pointed to this as a major breakthrough in dealing with the problem. Obviously it is hardly enough to scratch the surface.

One of the people who has been most critical to the government approach to the problem has been the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey). He has been locked in debate with the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien), who has great responsibility in matters of labour relations in the public service. I quote from an article in The Ottawa Journal of October 11, 1974, by W. A. Wilson, as follows:

> The new President of Treasury Board, Jean Chrétien, has said firmly and publicly that the government should not be the best employer in the country. This is a somewhat old fashioned view which has respectable antecedents but which is probably much less generally accepted than it would have been 25 years ago.

> The new Postmaster General, Bryce Mackasey, facing the challenge of bringing to an end a long period of internal strife and deteriorating service in the Post Office is firm in his view that all things considered the government must be the country's best employer.
> "The government can hardly go around . . . telling private enterprise that they must be good employers if they're not the best employers themselves," Mackasey said in a recent television appearance. Chrétien's contrary view was expressed with equal firmness in a radio broadcast last weekend.

Here is a problem right in the bosom of the cabinet, and it will have to be resolved if we are to come to grips with the breakdown in the collective bargaining process in the public service. The situation at the moment is best described as an adversary system where the union leader becomes the organizer of discontent rather than one who helps bring about a consensus.

There has been a deterioration in the public service since 1967 partly because of the frustration created by the attitude of Treasury Board. I have several clippings from the Globe and Mail which relate to this aspect, and one of them is dated April 23, 1975. It reads:

> William Ladyman, a Winnipeg employee relations consultant, says the federal Treasury Board may create "absolute anarchy" in the public service if it continues to act as bargaining agent for the federal government.
> Mr. Ladyman, formerly an international vice-president of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and now a consultant . . . says the Treasury Board's ineptness and "plain stupidity" have precipitated most recent strikes by various groups of federal employees.

Unfortunately we are now confronted with a situation where the attitude is "strike first and negotiate later". One of the reasons for our present difficulties may be that the system which has been applied to the public service was developed in the private sector and does not fit four square into the public sector. Those of us who have been active in the committee which is considering the Finkelman Report, for example, have discovered that there really is not a bargaining team which meets all the requirements of an adequate collective bargaining process. Management and labour do not, in fact, confront one another. Other weaknesses were discovered—failure to deal with grievances, failure to use the pay research bureau to establish comparable rates outside the service, an inability to deal with illegal strikes, and so on.

One of the witnesses who appeared before us was a representative of a public service union. He pointed out that most of the employees who go out on an illegal strike feel a deep sense of guilt if they are given a two-dollar parking ticket. Yet their attitude is such that they blithely go out on an illegal strike and seriously disrupt the economy in Canada. The only solution offered by the government so far has been to ask parliament to pass ad hoc back-to-work legislation—not a rewarding course to take in the long term. Obviously, though legislation is not the complete solution, the law will have to be brought up to date; present circumstances demand nothing less.

May I refer now to the Post Office and what is happening there. The Postmaster General has been recognized as one of the more progressive members of the government in the area I have outlined. The Post Office itself is one of the more visible arms of the public service. Unfortunately, it has been neglected for some 80 years.

Members of the Letter Carriers' Union voted 81 per cent to ratify the agreement which was reached with them a short while ago. It was a fair settlement. Let me quote from the Courier, the official news voice of the Letter Carriers' Union of Canada—this is the edition of March-April when they were getting set to strike:

> We will probably be in a legal strike position when this issue of the Courier reaches you. Several months ago each local received an L. C. U. C. strike manual explaining how to organize for this period. By now, your strike committee should be well organized, your picket captains appointed and your picket rosters brought up to date. All your strike machinery should be well oiled and ready to move if the employer forces us to use our strike mandate.

Well! Fortunately, it did not go in that direction because a spirit of goodwill and good faith was introduced into the negotiations, with the happy result I have mentioned.

Now the government is engaged in critical negotiations with the Union of Postal Workers. One of the fundamental issues is the issue of automation. This will be a real test of the government as represented by the Treasury Board, the postal officials and the Postmaster General, in bringing about the new spirit which is required if we are to see a happier situation in the collective bargaining process in the public service.

Ultimately good communications are the essence of good human relations. If each of the parties involved in the bargaining process knows what the other is trying to introduce into the discussions, if the parties talk to one another and listen to one another, if there is a positive attitude of goodwill and good faith, the success of any negotiations is far more likely. This is the only way in which we can overcome our present difficulties. If the work situation is unhappy, collective bargaining in a spirit of good faith is next to impossible.

Perhaps I can close by quoting one of the outstanding leaders in the field of labour relations in Canada, Senator Goldenberg, who said it was clear that the evolution of any new system must command support on a national basis. Just as international treaties do not prevent wars, we find that laws do not necessarily prevent strikes. There are problems in human nature which cannot be solved by law alone.

The dilemma outlined in the motion moved by the hon. member for Kamouraska can only be solved if the government accepts its responsibility by trying to encourage consensus rather than precipitating confrontation. This applies to the whole of the government from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) down, because the right hon. gentleman has been quoted as saying that one of his outstanding traits is that he swims against the stream—he is inclined not to accept accepted opinions. This is no way to establish a consensus, and I trust his colleagues will steer him in the right direction.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in this debate and congratulate my good friend and colleague, the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne), on the motion he introduced this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker, it is an opposition motion that we wished to bring before the House for a long time. Today its importance and its urgency can no longer be ignored. For some time, we have noticed an increase in labour-management disputes in this country. Consequently, our party thought it advisable to draw this House's attention to some suggestions which we feel would result in more harmonious relations between management and labour, above all in fields where profit sharing can be applied.

Mr. Speaker, before coming to the heart of the matter, I want to say that as the time allotted to me is very limited, I shall restrict myself to one aspect of the motion, employee profit sharing, while also referring to the necessity of a labour participation in the development of Canadian business. But before considering this aspect of the motion, it would be appropriate, I think, to review the current situation.

Mr. Speaker, we all know that anybody who actually wants to work in Canada must first of all submit to a union, that is, join a union. In other words, he must pay monthly dues. In Quebec, it is called the Rand formula, but in fact they are union dues. We really believe that compulsory union freedom, established by the provincial legislatures in Canada, goes against the Canadian bill of rights. Therefore, it seems natural that the people are entitled to demand the abolishment of the compulsory check-offs; otherwise, it is clearly a serious breach of the worker's freedom of non-association and, in the end, the security of this country is greatly threatened by the power of union leaders.

We have no objection to workers being free to belong or not to unions. What we really want, is that they remain free. On the other hand, we oppose what is now happening. Because, in our view, when one feels compelled to pay dues to some union, although it does not fulfill one's objectives, this is highly similar to the franchise in communist countries.

If we are really intent on upholding private enterprise and on giving back their freedom to workers in the process, in order that the people be finally assured of having at all times the services they are entitled to, there must be an immediate end to the Rand formula of compulsory check-offs now in use in Quebec.

According to a Canadian Institute of Public Opinion survey published in The Citizen, of May 3rd, a majority of the people are in favour of a curtailment of strikes. Most Canadians, that is 56 per cent, wish that strikes be forbidden in essential services.

Approximately a third of the people, or 34 per cent, feel they should not be prevented, and 10 per cent have no opinion. Those figures are almost unchanged from a similar survey conducted in 1972, although our economy is faced with labour conflicts.

If I remember correctly, at that time some 57 per cent of the people felt that public service employees should not be allowed to strike. And further back in 1969, the figures were approximately the same.

Indeed, I read on March 5 in the Montreal Star that a survey by the Canadian Institute of Public Opinion indicated that 37 per cent of the people were severely hit by strikes in the three preceding months, either in their jobs or in their lives.

If we start with the fact that in Canada, there are now approximately 14 million adults, we can see that more than 5 million Canadians have had to reduce in some way their standard of living. Now, if we glance at the number of man-days lost because of strikes or lock-outs, we can see that Canada would hold first place for this doubtfull distinction in the western world if it were not for Italy.

This is not very reassuring if we consider that by the end of the present year, the economic rate of growth in Italy will probably have gone down by 3.9 per cent from 1973. In 1973, 5,776,140 man-days were lost, while in 1974, the grand total of man-days lost was 9,255,120 days. If we go further, from 1901 to 1970, an average of 1,332,740 man-days were lost. From 1946 to 1970, there was an average of 2,527,410 man-days lost, and from 1960 to 1970, the grand total was 3,351,490 man-days lost.

We can therefore note, Mr. Speaker, that these figures clearly show the dramatic increase in the number of man-days lost because of strikes or lock-outs. Despite the very high number of man-days lost in 1970, the average from 1901 to 1970 is just over one million. This is due to the fact the number of man-days lost during the last year is extremely high compared with that of the previous year.

In fact, this explains why the average is lower than the figure for 1970.

I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the contradictions of the present system, it is not easy to suggest solutions to the many problems of workers. Yet, we of the Social Credit have been advocating for many years serious solutions which could solve all this. Indeed, one of these solutions would be to allow Canadian workers to share in the profits and the interests of businesses.

Moreover, we also know that the monetary reform of the Social Credit, by permitting a fairer distribution through social security of our country's wealth, offers an alternative which is attractive for Canadians who want to protect their individuality. However, a reform of the monetary system will never bring about real social peace, that is true justice, if a few individuals continue to control all the means of production. In this case, society will always be at the mercy of the owners of those production means and the workers will still remain second-class citizens.

In fact, I believe that the only way a true social peace might be established is by setting up profit sharing programs for the Canadian workers. Therefore, the real solution is not in the sole ownership by the state, as required in a socialist system, but in a collective ownership.

Mr. Speaker, in 1889, at the International Convention on profit sharing which took place in France, profit sharing was defined in this way:

> A freely accepted agreement by which the employee receives a pre-established share of the profits.

At the same time, The Council of Profit Sharing Industries, in Chicago, has given the following definition:

> Any method by which an employer pays or makes available to his regular employees, besides their normal wages, immediate or differed payments based on the corporation profits.

Mr. Speaker, in the magazine L'Action Nationale, in the February 1972 issue, Father Jean Genest gave a remarkable analysis of the changing philosophy concerning the participation of the workers to the development and the profits of Canadian corporations. Here are some excerpts of that article:

> ... makes it a duty for those concerned: "sharing has become a human right. Every man is equally originator, responsible and recipient of the collective work. Every man therefore has the correlative right and duty to participate in that work. In that sense, participation must be considered in terms of right for those concerned and not in terms of duty for the management. Participation must even include a change with the structures of the undertaking. Those new structures must help initiate a dialogue. However, it must not give rise to the sharing of sovereignty." We could discuss at length whether such participation is a right of the labour force, but it remains that business heads on the whole have more often acted according to their interests rather than their duty. Today, we can no longer overlook the labour views. Their systematic refusal to take part in a certain management of the undertaking is often the main reason which has prompted the labour force and their unions to join socialism and in its extreme form of communism. Their unassumed social responsibilities, great and serious, lead us to a decade of violence and confusion. We must act.
> ... The second aspect of social development is the profit-sharing of workers. Profit-sharing is usually divided into three main forms:
> (1) an outright cash bonus as soon as profits are declared, according to a preset percentage; (2) a form of bond saving given out on the occasion of an illness, termination of work or on retirement; (3) the allocation of the firm's shares known as employee shareholding which has the merit of making employees legal owners of the firm as the other shareholders.
> These three forms of profit sharing have a very powerful psychological and social effect first of all through the interest sharing of the employees in the firm and the participation which makes the whole staff jointly responsible to one an other. Among these three forms, bonus, savings plan and shareholding, the latter two have held the greatest attention."

Mr. Speaker, this is not the only existing program concerning the profit sharing of employees. There is in the United States another program which is even better known and is advocated by Louis O. Kelso. Besides, the Kelso Plan can be summarized in a few words as follows.

Since Mr. Kelso recognizes that workers happen to put less and less energy into salaried production, mostly because machines and automation replace them, and after having easily observed how industrial concentration is going on, he came to wish that all workers were capitalists, while being provided with means of becoming shareholders in the companies employing them.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw your attention to one of the suggestions contained in the Kelso Plan which reads as follows:

> Recognition by the government of the duty that falls upon it to ensure all members of society a reasonable participation in the production of wealth so as to enable them all to make a decent living.

One can easily imagine that everybody is looking for that, since all Canadians, whoever they are, want to receive an income which will permit them to live.

In a speech which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) delivered at the Craig-Allen Golf Club, in Woodstock, Ontario, on May 8, 1974, we find the following statement:

> Worker participation is one of a number of areas which are of special concern to myself and my department. The others are job satisfaction, job security, the need to extend unionism, and the work environment.

Further on, we find this other statement:

> Unfortunately such programs of worker participation are still not too prevalent in Canada. Many more companies, in my opinion, should take an active interest in the areas of job enrichment as a starting point for more ambitious employee participation and even profit-sharing programs.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, we realize now that the government emphasizes work ethic. But does the same government pay any attention to the fact that automation could liberate mankind from work bondage? Quite the contrary, its main purpose is mainly to maintain this subservient attitude which modern society favours by all possible means.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. I regret very much having to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has now expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to thank the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) who has given us the opportunity to dwell a little longer on the matter of industrial relations as they exist now in Canada. Unfortunately, I cannot thank him further, because, as a result of his remarks, I think I totally disagree with him.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, to read again the motion presented by the hon. member for Kamouraska: on behalf of Social Credit Party of Canada:

That this House deplores the fact that the government has neglected to make legislative changes to remedy present problems at all levels of labour activity.

At the very start, Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with a present-day problem to show that it is not necessarily the government which, by legislative action, will solve the problems which exist within the trade union movement.

I want to deal briefly with the problem of the Post Office in Montreal where two unions are presently negotiating. The first, the Letter Carriers' Union, accepted by 82 per cent the minister's offers. Workers voted very democratically under the union's constitution across the country for the employer's offers. Nobody was heard to complain that the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) was anti-union.

There was also a problem in another union, the Postal Workers' Union, which started negotiations at the same time as the Letter Carriers' Union. No agreement has been reached yet on a single clause. Furthermore, they claim that the minister is against them, he who, after all, has made worthwhile offers accepted by 82 per cent of the letter carriers.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the problem has nothing to do with the legislation, with the men who have to make the decisions. If we are a self-respecting society, it must also, with all the intermediaries involved, abide by the law, the gentlemen's agreements, the collective agreements signed for one, two or three years. I feel that the problem that exists, and I took the postal workers and the letter carriers as an example, in the final analysis, is a problem between individuals.

There are people, today, in the world of labour unions, who forget that one is a union member to work for the union movement and not to do politics or seek power. There is a notion, becoming ever more widespread amongst union leaders, that they are there, not necessarily to inform their members about their rightful claims, but merely to increase their membership and, as a result, their own personal power.

It is easy to find, in this day and age, people who like to imagine that, as president of a union that has 80,000 members across the land while the other fellow is president of 1,000 members, he has more power since he presides over 80,000 members.

Mr. Speaker, I have more respect for the president of a 1,000-member union, who sees to it that the collective agreement he signed is respected, who strives towards bettering the lot of the workers, who is completely concerned about the workers, instead of trying to trick or mislead them.

At the present time, an attempt is being made in Montreal, to bring the postal workers to reject negotiations that are being conducted in good faith by saying: We will not negotiate as long as those who have been suspended, or fired, are not reinstated.

How is it, Mr. Speaker, when those same people have agreed, for years, and within the scope of collective agreements, that a member who is not satisfied, an employee who does not agree with the decision of his employer, who with good reason to do so, should decide to file a grievance, or to go to arbitration? How is it that today, those same people who have been asking for these clauses in the collective agreements for several years, do not recognize even the principle to say, if the minister made mistakes by dismissing or laying off people, we will go before a labour tribunal.

I think the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) made a very reasonable offer, which several leaders of local unions would have liked to hear from company presidents. Never in a hundred years did many company presidents refuse this formula. We have a Postmaster General who said: Okay, if you think my judgment is bad, if you think my representatives in Montreal made a bad judgment, if you think they made a bad decision, I am prepared to submit to arbitration the cases of the 18 or 20 persons who were dismissed or those of the 500 or 600 persons who were laid off for one or two days.

The minister said: We will go to arbitration if you want. How is it, Mr. Speaker, that these people reject the system which has served them for many years?

I think, Mr. Speaker, there are people at the head of the postal union in Montreal who are not there to lead their members astray or to help them. They are strictly there for political gain, I mean to play small petty politics within a union, to make a name for themselves and some day perhaps control a labour organization in Quebec. That is perhaps what the president of postal workers is trying to do in Montreal to the prejudice of the workers.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard hon. members in this House suggest that we should perhaps do away with the Rand formula. I do not agree entirely with that, because although some union presidents, Mr. Speaker, are somewhat dishonest in discharging their responsibilities, there are also corporation presidents and multinational companies that are unable to respect the people with whom they work, those people who earn them money during the whole year.

And I have in mind a situation I have been living for the past 17 months, a conflict at the United Aircraft, a company whose name no longer a profitable concern with the people, has been replaced by Pratt and Whitney. There are companies, Mr. Speaker, although their actions are perfectly legal on a moral standpoint they do not show the slightest respect for their employees.

Here is the president of a company who, after sober consideration, take the trouble to write to the federal Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, assuring him that, once the labour conflict at the United Aircraft is over, there will be a full expansion program and that he undertakes to re-hire everyone. We know what happened then. The Quebec Department of Labour asks for an investigation among those workers that are still on strike, and asks those the company is still interested in keeping to go back to work at United Aircraft. They are 976, out of a total of 2,600 at the beginning of the strike. After 16 months, 976 are left, saying: Yes, we want to go back to work for that company. From that, we must conclude that the company has won over the union, has managed to get everything it wanted and to crush the union as it wished to do. The managers of the company are not afraid to say so.

After that, Mr. Speaker, the company makes an offer, and says: We are no longer ready to take these people back. We are ready to offer 250 jobs to these people. As for the other 700, we will see if we ever need them.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is very difficult to accept such a position from an employer. I feel that such a type of management leads much more surely to anarchy than the type of unionism practised in certain sectors throughout Canada. It is true that in some sectors, union leaders have proved lacking irresponsible. It is also true that some Canadian entreprises, or rather pseudo-Canadian enterprises that represent American interests in Canada, have made decisions that are contrary to Canadian traditions, contrary to the interests of Canadian employees as well as contrary to people living in Quebec.

That is what happened in the case of United Aircraft, that is what entailed violent incidents that I condemn in all respects. What I wish to prove here, is that exasperation or the way to negotiate with a union may incite individuals, or a small group of individuals, to abandon everything, to disobey legislation and make their own laws. I feel that in a society such as ours in Canada, such a situation is unacceptable. Such situations must not be tolerated in Canada, and must not be tolerated to any greater extent than any violence either by management or union.

Which leads me to say, Mr. Speaker, that when I witness people in Canada rise to their feet because American companies come here and say to us: Well, Gentlemen from the Montreal Locomotive Works, you shall not sell any trains to Cuba, I find such a situation unacceptable. When I see people rise in the House of Commons to say it is an awful thing for Americans to come and dictate to us why we should not sell anything to Cuba, I cannot agree with them. But I have yet to see people rise to say that it is awful for Americans to come and tell us what industrial relations we should use with regard to their companies in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the present concept of industrial relations in Canada should be that such relations should not be dictated to us, either by Connecticut or by a foreign country. They should be established by our own people, here in Canada. We have enough experience to manage our unions and make our own decisions, which would result in much more harmonious relations.

I also heard several people who took part in this debate and wanted to disclaim being anti-labour. A lot was said about the Cliche Commission. Mr. Speaker, if there are bandits in one area of the labour movement, it does not mean that everyone in the labour movement is a bandit. If there are bandits within a government agency, if there are one or two troublemakers, it does not mean that everyone in there is a bandit. This calls for qualification. I think that what has happened in the Quebec construction industry might be the result of laisser-faire in that area, laisser-faire also on the part of those who were running the province of Quebec. It must also be borne in mind that what happened in the Quebec construction industry came under Bill 290, that provided the powers which exist now. It must also be borne in mind that it is under another legislation, Bill 9, that bargainings which were taking place illegally before were more or less legalized. So, when you do that, whether it is in a National Assembly or a Parliament, you contribute more or less to the erosion of authority. So, one should not indeed imagine that because one area was corrupted, as the construction area in the province of Quebec, the whole labour movement in Quebec is a corrupt system. It is not true and I think that those who so suggest are indeed quite short-sighted about what is happening within the labour movement.

There are many people, Mr. Speaker, who really work for the advancement of that cause, and if we had not had the labour movement in Quebec in particular, and in all of the rest of Canada, we would still be in the stone age in many areas. Fortunately, there were people who stood at the forefront of companies and established a system—just remember the years prior to 1960 in Quebec—because if there had not been people to fight for humanitarian ideas and also the respect of individuals who worked within these corporations, and if there had not been a labour movement in Quebec, I wonder where we would be now.

It is not because there is a gang of tramps, Mr. Speaker, who managed to invade a whole segment, that that segment must be condemned in its entirety. We must absolutely not try to embark in that system. Otherwise, we will also be condemned later.

I hear people say: We are in favour of strikes, in favour of this or that, in favour of unions and a lot of things, but when unions exercise their rights, we no longer agree with them. We should decide once and for all if we want to grant civil servants the right to strike. When they will go on strike, of course it will be a nuisance, because they will have a power which will enable them to tell their boss: "You better do something, or I will go on strike". That certainly harms some people. Some are deliberately unaware and publicly say, performing quite a political stunt: I am with the unions. Big deal! But as soon as a strike occurs, they stand back and say: I no longer agree.

We should be conscious of our own decisions and also of existing legislation. There is a number of things which will have to be revised.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) put forward some very constructive ideas this afternoon, and I believe the House should consider the measures he suggested. He mentioned a sort of tri-partite council in which the three parties would be led to have discussions on the future. He mentioned a bank of data to keep labour as well as management from being so obstinate. Who is right when one says that the inflation rate is 12 per cent and the other says it is 10 per cent? If we had a bank of data to show that the inflation rate is 15 per cent, everyone would be on an equal footing.

Union structures might also be taken into consideration. In the Post Office Department for instance, another union does not agree, they go on strike, and the whole problem starts anew. Maybe the unions should also review their own structures.

Labour Relations

Mr. Speaker, I realize that time passes—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. I regret very much to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a most timely motion, and I cannot but agree with the preamble to it that there is a climate of instability and dissatisfaction for workers, and indeed for the whole work force at almost all levels.

With the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and others suggestion that wage settlements have been so high that we have been pricing ourselves out of the market, the headline in the Ottawa Journal tonight is, "costs dim hopes for cheaper food", and an official of the grocery industry is quoted as saying:

"With settlements running in the 17-to-19-per-cent bracket with fringes and COLA clauses, we are rapidly pricing ourselves out of the business.

These are factors in food costs which will likely continue. I agree with much of this motion; it puts forward some interesting views on what might be done to get us out of some of our problems. But I am somewhat in disagreement with the second paragraph which suggests that certain union officials wield powers far exceeding their responsibilities. This may be so in selected areas, but if unions are properly organized and are responsible to their membership, surely this charge should not be levelled at all union leaders.

In the finance committee it was suggested to Mr. Smith of the Economic Council of Canada that some unions leaders exert influence far beyond what they should or what was reasonable, and his suggestion was that he did not think so, at least in the long run.

It seems to me that it is somewhat of a truism to say that if large unions in many cases have abnormal influence on our society, it is often the fault of the economic and social system which allows or necessitates a concentration of workers, so that union leaders of necessity have to wield their great powers, or are able to do so.

In the third paragraph of the preamble it states that there have been illegal strikes in the past. It is certainly true that work stoppages may sometimes paralyze the economy, but at other times they are necessary to create job improvements and conditions for employees, as well as to force management into more efficient practices which will still retain profitability for corporations in the interests of the dividend shareholders who, incidentally, more and more are becoming the collective workers with pension plans who own many shares in our corporations.

The social Credit motion has brought forward certain proposals which can be supported, at least to some extent, which I think would meet with general approval by all parties. I think it is significant that this motion was proposed by hon. members from Quebec because it is in that province where at the moment there is serious unrest in the labour movement and serious confrontation between the provincial government, corporation management, and union heads. Other parts of Canada may have their problems, such as the problem experienced in regard to the west coast grain handling stoppage which resulted in serious delays in grain exports at a time when the world's hungry needed our grain and Canada needed the foreign exchange earnings which the sale of grain would earn.

Many of us from the west do not understand the province of Quebec as well as do those from other parts of Canada, but what is happening in that province is cause for concern to all Canadians. No doubt all parts of the country will be faced with some of the problems already present in that province. There is good reason for serious unease right across the country about the confrontation in that province between union, management, and Premier Robert Bourassa. It seems likely that the labour movement in that province will shortly put up a common front and call for a series of illegal stoppages and strikes. As well as affecting the province of Quebec, this will certainly damage Canada's international reputation, particularly in the field of export trade. This is happening to some extent in the grain industry, and also with regard to the Olympics.

The Quebec premier in 1972 dealt with labour's common front by jailing union leaders for refusing to obey the back to work order of his government. It is to his credit that he appointed the Cliche Commission which investigated Quebec's construction industry. Mr. Cliche seems to have laid blame for corruption and lawbreaking indiscriminately and impartially on the unions, on government, and on management, but at the moment the premier has only clamped down on unions. He has made no move to clean up his own party's electoral machine, and he does not seem to have acted aggressively, against corruption in the civil service. It also seems that contractors to this date have escaped disciplinary measures which would have encouraged honesty among contracting companies.

In regard to the Quebec situation the Financial Post in an editorial had this to say:

Furthermore, those whom the government appoints as trustees to run the construction unions placed in trusteeship should be unquestionably identified as labour-oriented or they will be unable to maintain or gain the support or respect of the workers involved. Individual workers must be given greater assurance that, if they want to work when union leaders are pushing for illegal strike action, they and their families will not be victims of strong-arm tactics.

I believe that this indicates quite a serious concern to all legislators. Further evidence that an explosive confrontation in Quebec between the powerful labour movement and the provincial government will occur has been detailed in the Financial Post of May 24, by a correspondent writing from Quebec city. This correspondent, Mr. Rumball, pointed out that following the aftermath of the Cliche Royal Commission on the construction industry, which showed that that industry was extensively corrupt, Mr. Bourassa's government seems to have made a strategic error in its reaction to the recommendations of the commission. If the assessment of Mr. Rumball is reasonably correct, it certainly reminds us of the great problems involved in dealing with labour and settling strikes by the legislative process instead of by other methods.

The Quebec government seems to fail to attack all sources of corruption simultaneously, and so far it has only brought forward bills focussed on unions, placing unions under trusteeship and barring certain criminals from holding union office. For us who are outside Quebec this seems to give an opportunity for the Quebec Federation of Labour to oppose the government. We are all familiar with and have heard and read what happened at the Pratt and Whitney plant where there was civil disobedience. In this movement by the Quebec Federation of Labour it seems significant that they have been supported by the CNTU and by the Quebec Teachers' Centre, which have brought with them 250,000 unionists.

Some of these problems that have come to the forefront in Canada's second largest province only point out the timeliness of this resolution.

In the broader labour field in Canada the announcement by the federal government of an industrial relations council of union, management and government will be welcomed. If it can find ways and means of reducing work stoppages, labour strife, and improving the work environment it may be of some value which certainly is more than can be said of many government boards.

I am not so sure that the appointment of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) as chairman is a good one; not that I have anything against his abilities but I doubt that he should assume this position at this time because I believe the purpose of this body is to bring labour and management together. As I understand it, the unions are represented by the Canadian Labour Congress, and the spokesman for management is from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

If this board can develop some procedures whereby labour and management can settle their differences through the collective bargaining process, it may be of some help. Apparently the United States and the European countries have had such tripartite arrangements for a long time and even they have had their problems. If, as has been suggested in a speech by the Minister of Labour, this will clear away some of the legislative logjams that now hamper unions and employers from developing industry-wide bargaining, then this exercise may be of some help.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) suggested last week in Montreal that the structure of collective bargaining in Canada has broken down, as indicated by the large number of strikes in Canada last year. There is not any doubt about the sorry state of industrial relations in Canada. This is manifested by the frequent refusal of union members to ratify agreements reached by their bargaining agents. This has seemingly become very widespread.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour seem to feel they have the answer in some type of industry-wide bargaining. I should like to remind them that this industrial relations council has been established to bring forward solutions to problems. There may be some validity for this viewpoint, and certainly in the grain industry it may well be of considerable value. Last year we had the grain handlers strike, followed by the grain inspectors, and then the weighers and samplers, all of whom represented only 400 or 500 people in each group. They might well have been bargained for by one body.

The efforts of the Minister of Labour and of the Prime Minister to sell the idea of industry-wide bargaining when the government is in the midst of establishing this tripartite advisory council, suggests that they are usurping beforehand the council's duty to analyse industrial relations and establish new approaches. There are some serious difficulties with industry-wide bargaining, as has been pointed out by various people. Industry-wide bargaining has been most successful, as examples show, in Germany and Sweden, but I believe these are unitary states and do not have the federal system that we have. There are provincial governments in this country which prevent national bargaining among employees of mining and metallurgical companies.

It has been suggested that industry-wide bargaining might not promote as many strikes, but that strikes would be much larger and worse if they did occur than they are now. Presumably industry-wide bargaining means very large unions, with union management being far removed from the rank and file of their supporters. This is one of the complaints of ordinary union members, that they lose touch with their officials.

In the short time allocated, Madam Speaker, we can only have a preliminary discussion of the great problems involved—work stoppages, strikes, and walkouts which are a part of our free society. I believe the increase in the number and length of strikes is due to the financial immunity which workers now enjoy—they can strike and their families will not completely lose their income. In years gone by, in less affluent times, the grocery bill hung heavily over a family affected by a strike. Various welfare programs and unemployment insurance benefits for those who are put out of work without their unions being on strike have had an influence in slowing the settlement of labour disputes. Many families now have two wage earners and are not as compromised by a strike as was the case in years gone by.

Indeed, although the strikes in the grain handling industry were quite severe and serious, it seems as if Canada will be able to export all the grain it has on hand at the present time. That either indicates that the grain handling system is efficient for the volume of grain we have to sell, or that its capacity to export when alternatives are given is considerably above what has been estimated.

This debate is timely, I repeat, and I hope that reasonable solutions to our problems can be found. Certainly profit sharing is one area that can be looked at with favour. Anything that will improve worker identification with his firm and his job is to be commended. We can look with dismay at the confrontation shaping up in various parts of Canada, and hope that the differences can be resolved so that further confrontation will not take place in other parts of the country.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate today for the purpose of attempting to offset the very common notion that labour is the principal cause of inflation; it is the scapegoat in this inflationary cycle.

I think we must look at the last three, four or five years of really heavy inflation. In 1973 the cause was the rapid increase in food prices which was brought about by natural and other causes. It was a world-wide situation. In 1974 the major factor was oil prices which tripled and quadrupled in an artificial manner. Another cause was the very high profits in large sectors of the economy, particularly in what Galbraith would call the planning sector of the economy, the sector which can control its own prices through multinational corporations functioning on a world-wide basis.

I will not go into detail, but I think if we were to look at the curves on a graph showing the differences between wages and prices we would notice a considerable lag in the inflationary spiral, with the prices curve well ahead of the wages curve. I think this is extremely important now as we begin to see a decline in the inflation cycle which started four or five months ago. The figures released by Statistics Canada in the last 24 hours show that the wages of Canadian workers increased by 14.8 per cent from the end of February, 1974, to the end of February, 1975. The figures from the end of March, 1974, to the end of March, 1975, show a decline to 14.3 per cent.

One can see what has been happening. Prices, especially profits, have gone up quickly; this trend is now easing, and wages have risen, to catch up. That pattern is not unusual. What is unusual is the extent of the price rise and the extent by which wages had to rise to catch up. We should not blame labour for attempting to catch up with a price rise which began long ago.

I should like to deal briefly with two basic criticisms levelled against labour in this country. One is that Canada, next to Italy, loses more man-days of production than any other industrialized country; second, that wage settlements in Canada, which have been running at between 14 per cent and 16 per cent, have been higher than wage settlements in the United States, which have been running at 9 per cent. Let us examine the first objection. On careful examination, the figures do not appear to be as bad as one thinks at first. As well, there is a definite relationship between growth and wage settlement, particularly at the end of the cycle. In 1974 Canada, Italy and France—and Italy supposedly was in a worse position than we were—led western nations in growth.

Apparently there is some relationship between economic growth and the number of man-days lost through strikes. When demand for labour is strong, labour is scarce and can bargain effectively. It is apparent, also, that the recession in this country has not been as deep as the recession in other countries, particularly the United States. Italy, oddly enough, is now coming nicely out of its recession.

Exactly how many man-days, in percentage terms, were lost in 1974? According to figures available to me, .46 of 1 per cent of total working time was lost through strikes, or less than one half of 1 per cent. As the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacGuigan) indicated earlier, that is the same figure as applied in 1969. So, although the figure is high, it is not higher than that of previous years. Clearly there is little ground for the sort of frantic concern which suggests that our situation is desperate. It is not. The percentage of man-hours lost in 1974 is the same as the percentage in 1969, and I do not recall a great outcry in 1969. The performance of industries working under the federal labour code was considerably better in 1974 than it was last year.

As the parliamentary secretary said earlier, the number of man-days lost can vary considerably. It takes only one major strike averted in one industry to move this country from second to fifteenth on the list of countries which have lost man-days of work through strikes. I think we have over estimated this particular difficulty. We have every reason to be concerned about inflation but, as Peter Cook wrote in the Financial Times last month, Canada is coping with inflation more adequately than most European countries and Japan.

The second point at issue is that Canadian wage settlements have been much higher than comparable United States wage settlements, that our competitive position vis-à-vis the United States has worsened, and that we shall not be able to continue exporting at present rates. We are told that settlements in the United States, in round figures, have been running at slightly under 9 per cent, whereas settlements in Canada have been running at between 14 per cent and 17 per cent. Let us examine these allegations. I am told that one cannot make such simple comparisons between figures as other factors, such as fringe benefits, must also be considered. Don McGillivray, writing in the Financial Times, a publication not known for its pro-labour sympathies, has indicated that the real difference between settlements is not much more than 1 per cent.

One should remember, as well, that unit labour costs in Canada in 1974 were 82 per cent of similar unit labour costs in the United States. Clearly we have still retained our competitive advantage, an advantage we must be careful not to lose.

An hon. Member: But we are close to losing it.

Mr. McRae: Also, while it is true that our economy depends to a great extent on exports, we have been able to maintain effective demand within the economy. Reasonable wage increases tend to support the strength of effective demand. We must be careful not to bandy figures around loosely, not to create a sombre mood, because conditions are not nearly as serious as some have tried to indicate.

I now wish to deal with something which the NDP House leader often mentions in the House, namely, that wage settlements in percentage terms are unfair. I submit that the government, including Crown corporations, and industry should examine the whole question of percentage settlements.

Consider what happened when the railway engineers walked out in January. They wanted a wage increase, which they thought should be awarded in January and not in April. I am told the amount suggested was about $3,000. The point is that many railroaders were given a 15 per cent increase in January. That increase in many cases did not amount to more than $1,000 or $1,100. People earning various kinds of income work in the field of transportation, and a 15 per cent increase for someone at the top of the railroad industry may be very substantial, but it does not represent very much for someone earning $6,000, $7,000 or $8,000. That is why I was so pleased to note that Mr.

Justice Emmet Hall recommended an across the board increase for railway workers. I think it represented about 47 cents an hour for everybody across the board. That was a move in the right direction.

Personally, I favour across the board increases. At present they are not being granted in the public service, in which there is a substantial spread between money increases granted to those at the top and to those at the bottom of the scale. At present those at the bottom should get more, because they must endure increasing hardships. If the rate of inflation is 11 per cent and a wage increase of 15 per cent is granted, you must remember that, in real dollar terms, that 15 per cent represents considerably more money to a man earning $20,000 than it does to a man earning $7,000. I submit that the Treasury Board should consider this matter very seriously.

I shall conclude by making some observations about the Post Office. I support strongly what the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) is trying to do. He is trying to come to grips with a difficult situation. I realize that the question of postal service in Montreal is a difficult one, but I am 100 per cent behind him in what he is trying to do. I think he is making a magnificent effort.

There is one problem I would like to see looked at by those people running the Post Office, those running Treasury Board, and by the Postmaster General. That is the whole matter of grievance procedure and how postal employees and postal management at the local level get together to solve their problems. We have a ridiculous situation where a grievance filed in the Post Office can take three months to a year to be dealt with fully. It is dealt with at the local office where the manager who took the action in the first place handles the grievance. It is then moved to the second, third or fourth level, and it hangs around for a year.

There is a case in the Thunder Bay post office which involved employees threatening to walk out for a day. A year later it was brought back in the same form, and the trouble started again. The way to handle problems of this kind is to do it locally and rapidly. There should be in the public service throughout the country local committees of management and employees. In the beginning there should be neutral people. This system works in industry where management will chair for one month and the employees for another. I am talking about a new setup for the Post Office. An outsider will probably be required as chairman in the beginning.

Grievances, and other things that should not come up when bargaining starts over wages, are there because they have been allowed to get under people's skins. These people are irritated. Bargaining is difficult because there are all these irritants to start with. They should be solved in the local community by a committee of management and employees, and perhaps with some outside help. I know the Postmaster General, who is very interested in this, will keep this in mind when establishing new patterns for the Post Office once the present mess has been straightened out.

I wish to conclude by suggesting that we should not become panicky. Collective bargaining as it has evolved in North America over the past 100 years was and is a good tool. Some people say we should have compulsory arbitration, but that does not work all that well. It does not work well in Australia. They have many minor or short strikes, and the days lost are very significant.

Collective bargaining is good. It can be improved. I have suggested one way of improving it. Grievance procedures and local problems should be handled at the local level. That is a system that works in industry and will work in the Public Service.

We have had a very serious inflationary cycle. It started with food, went on to petroleum, and was increased by the planning sector of our economy. Wages are now levelling off in the same way that inflation levelled off earlier. We should allow the collective bargaining system to continue. The culprit is not labour. It is the whole cross-section of our economy.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Madam Speaker, I would first like to say how pleased I was listening to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) attack some of the myths that have been created in the past two years concerning the causes of inflation. I understand the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) also dealt with that this afternoon. I am sorry this is not a motion on which we will vote so that these fine labour defending speeches could be reflected in the votes of our friends in the government.

I am impressed with the sympathy shown to labour by some of the speakers from government benches. I wait in patience and expectation for the June 23 budget when we will see whether the provisions of the budget reflect the sentiments expressed here today by some of the members on the government benches. I hope before that budget comes down that the Minister of Labour and others who have made these very sympathetic speeches toward labour will have some impact on the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). However, I must say that I am pessimistic. I am quite skeptical that the kind of budget we will see on June 23 will be one that those who work in this country will not like all that much. Nevertheless, it is just a prediction. We live in hope, and we hope for the best, but I am a bit pessimistic.

Dealing with the motion, I agree with those speakers who have said that it is timely. The preamble reads:

> That this House deplores the fact that the government has neglected to make legislative changes to remedy present problems at all levels of labour activity.

It is inherent in that preamble that the problems we now face are labour problems. The problems we face are society's problems. They are not at labour's door. The inference contained in this motion is wrong and unfair.

I suggest to those who presented the motion that if they travel to places like Mexico or the Bahamas they will not find any labour people. They will find a lot of doctors, middle management and so on, who have done well in this society over the past ten years. However, this society is under a strain for the very reason that those who labour have done nothing more in the last year than keep pace with inflation. In fact the industrial wage index was about 11 per cent, exactly the rate of inflation over the past year. They are as entitled to share in the productivity gains in this society as anyone else. Therefore, I am sincere when I say how pleased I was to hear so many speakers in this House today attempt to redress what I think is a media myth that is becoming prevalent in this country, namely, that of laying all of our ills in terms of inflation at labour's door.

Another portion of the motion that bothers me is the following:

—the toleration of a system which allows certain union figures to wield powers exceeding their responsibilities.

I am not sure what that means. However, if it suggests there is a large number of union leaders who are wielding powers exceeding their responsibilities, the facts belie it. In fact most of the settlements that have been rejected were rejected by the membership. It is the membership that is unsatisfied with its share of the national income and the national economy. We must be sensitive to the problems of the rank and file of the trade union movement who very often reject the recommendations of their own executive.

We must remember that those who go on strike never make the decision lightly. They may get $20 a week in strike pay. I heard someone saying the amount they have to pay for food is not as significant as it used to be. If you are on a union scale receiving $20 a week, have house payments to meet and children to feed, it is a very serious decision you have to make to go on strike. It is never done lightly.

When workers go on strike as much as they have in the past year, we should take a careful look at our society. The phrase "industrial democracy" is thrown around from time to time. It seems to be a pretty useful phrase, one which we should consider in a very serious way. I am pleased to see the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) in the House because I wish to quote something he said on May 14 to the Canadian Direct Mail Association, as follows:

Production, production—that's management's real concern. We see employee behaviour as something that hurts or helps production. The employees know this, they know that management's real concern is the system—all this industrial democracy jazz is a ploy to goose up production. They are not stupid, they know when concern is phoney.

Our attitude goes back to the robber barons. They believed absolutely in their right to limitless power. As John D. Rockefeller said, "God gave me my money".

The rationalization is bankrupt today but our goal has merely broadened. Instead of personal wealth, it's national wealth. We genuflect to the growth of the GNP. Our basic relationship isn't to man, it is to things. And so we don't design machines for man's needs, just for efficiency. We don't organize work with man in mind, just the product. We treat labour more humanely than we did in 1867 when Karl Marx outlined what he called "the irreconcilable opposition of capital and labour", but our attitude hasn't really changed, labour is still a commodity. The system doesn't exist for man, man exists to serve the system.

That is a most penetrating critique of the kind of society we live in today. I live in hope that the Postmaster General in the discharge of his responsibility will attempt to apply some of that philosophy to those who work in the postal service.

The discussion concerning industrial democracy is one which I hope will find its place at the bargaining table and lead to meaningful, practical clauses in the collective agreements under which workers will be asked on a regular basis to engage actively in the management and provision of whatever service is concerned—and in the Post Office it is the delivery of mail and associated services. The sickness that exists in the Post Office is not only the result of a lack of involvement in managerial decisions; it comes from the dehumanizing nature of the job itself.

My father worked in the Post Office in New Westminster for 36 years. He was proud of the fact that he worked for the Post Office. He had memorized almost all the routes. There was some challenge attached to the work, and doing a good job gave him satisfaction. But there is a difference now.

Workers are too often asked to do things which are so routine, so dull, so soul-destroying that they attack the machine which they sense is destroying them as persons. This thought has been well expressed by the Postmaster General and I commend him for his very human approach to the problem. It is one which is developing not only in the postal service but in industry throughout the western world. It is a new world, a new system and I believe that until we recognize the frustration generated by this system we shall not be able to solve the problems which arise. Throwing blame around makes no contribution to industrial peace.

If we examine the societies which have experienced least industrial unrest over the years we find that where the feeling of the common good, the social contract, if you like, is most accepted, there has been least social disruption. We can get to that point if we carry out significant experiments in industrial democracy, through profit sharing, through moving away from the old idea that bargaining is strictly a poker game. I believe there is need for full disclosure. I am tired of the two sides in a labour dispute playing games with each other. It should be required that the management side fully reveal its cost and profit picture, and similarly it should be incumbent upon the representatives of labour to make full disclosure.

Labour intransigence is not always the problem. Remember the grain handlers strike last fall. It was the companies, not the union, which refused to accept the conciliation report of Dr. Perry. To give another example, the asbestos workers are presently on strike at Thetford. What are they striking for? They are striking for the right to monitor dust levels so that they do not die as a result of the effects of asbestos on the lungs. Mr. Speaker, I wonder how long it would take this House to pass legislation to control asbestos pollution if we faced high asbestos levels as we talked in here every day, and people told us that one out of every five of us would die from cancer of the lungs.

The question of time lost because of strikes has been dealt with by many speakers today. It does not amount to as much as time lost through lay-offs, or time lost through illness. But when it comes to developing a consensus we still have to ask ourselves serious questions about the kind of society in which we live. Alienation in the work world is developing in line with a society which tells us that if we compete with each other to the utmost of our ability we shall lead a successful life. This philosophy also leads to urbain crime, drug abuse, and the waste of our resources. It is a system which assumes that competition is the basic instinct of man and is in itself a desirable thing.

I do not believe we need this kind of system in the last half of the present century. It is likely to lead us to a degree of waste and destruction in the western world which, to my mind, is awesome.

The interests of management and labour may at this point be different, or appear to be different, but in the future I believe those interests may, in fact, be the same. In other words, as the pie gets larger and larger we shall find that other important public interests are being eroded. There is the environment to consider, the whole question of the style and quality of our lives. The time will come when we realize that we must finally manage the system and reach what is now called a steady state economy so that we can rationalize competitiveness within the system, and in this way eliminate the fantastic social strains we see all around us and reduce the urban disease which is spreading beyond our cities into the country. This is a system which can only be administered properly within an egalitarian and socialist philosophy.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. J. Larry Condon (Middlesex-London-Lambton): It is certainly a pleasure to hear the NDP view on labour, Madam Speaker. We all know that they are solid supporters of labour except at election time when very few labour speakers are on their platforms. Their platforms usually consist of doctors, lawyers or social workers, and I notice that following the last election there are in the caucus of that party at the present time just two of 15 who are labour oriented.

Some of the views expressed today cause me to wonder what are the views of the people of Canada. We are all aware that only one third of the working force in Canada belong to a labour union. To make this point I should like to read part of a letter I received from one of my constituents that illustrates how people who are not in a labour union feel when they get a little older:

> While you are in Ottawa try and do something for the salaried personnel that have no union or anyone that will assist in obtaining a living wage.
> We are in the position of being just over the minimum wage scale but far from the range required to maintain a proper standard of living. Due to my age being 63 I am helpless to obtain a salary that is anywhere near today's standard; we are told "If you don't like it, quit."

I just wonder whether the people of Canada realize the problems facing not only the labour unions but the white collar workers, who seem to be forgotten in these days of so-called unrest. Why is there labour unrest today? Perhaps we should look back a little over the years. This constituent of mine, salaried, obviously underpaid, at 63 years of age after some 35 years in the business is told that if he does not like it, quit.

What about the employers' obligation to those people who work for them? I refer not only to members of unions but to workers who do not belong to any union. Is money what the unions really want? Surveys that have been made indicate that the first choice of a worker is not money but the opportunity to work in an environment he is happy in, one where his boss will say hello to him in the morning and give him an opportunity to be part of a team.

It seems to me that the only time management talks to labour is at the bargaining table. Do hon. members remember the days before the labour unions became as strong as they are now, when the bosses came round and talked to the workers? In my lifetime I can remember when they would say to a worker who was doing his job, "You are doing a good job, Charlie". Or: "How's the family?", or "How's the kids?", or "How's the wife?" The fact that this is no longer said may be one reason for present labour strife; it has nothing to do with money, as some people say.

Mr. Towers: It is because we have a Liberal government, Larry.

Mr. Condon: Well, Madam Speaker, I feel happy that someone has taken a shot at me, I appreciate that. Perhaps some of these remarks are coming home to people who run businesses. The obligation of management has for too long been forgotten. The unions get blamed for everything. According to headlines you see in the press every day, the unions are running the country. All hon. members get letters from people who are not knowledgeable enough to realize that more than labour is running the country; it has to be a combination of labour, management and government.

Every time some difficulty crops up in Canada, or for that matter in North America or even in Europe, the government gets involved. Why cannot labour problems be settled at the bargaining table where they are supposed to be settled? Honest bargaining, with the realization of the needs of management and the needs of labour, is what we need.

Much has been said today about the strike of the postal workers and the problems facing the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey), indeed facing all of us. I heard a gentleman on television tonight who is a postal letter carrier. He has been working for the Post Office department since 1968, and he has been off work one day since that time. He explained on television tonight how the letter carriers were the most important postal workers because they realize their obligations. Perhaps somebody in the postal department in middle management had passed the time of day with him and said, "Jack, you are doing a good job". Or perhaps the lady down the street had said: "Boy, my mail is always on time, even when it rains, because I depend on my pension cheque and on letters from my children overseas". This is the kind of worker running the postal service, and we meet them every day.

Only a small percentage of postal workers are creating problems for the Post Office department. Ninety-five per cent of the workers are there working for us every day, but the remaining 5 per cent try to stir things up and make them all look bad, especially the hard workers.

Some labour unions are not really unions. Some years ago my brother, who is a school teacher, used to comment on the way the unions ran the country. Now after 15 years he is a member of a union. It is not called a union but an association. People today are now complaining about school teachers. Why did the school teachers have to get together? It was because the school boards could not sit down with them and talk to them on a man to man basis.

As I say, this is partly the reason for labour trouble today, a failure by labour and management to communicate with each other on a man to man basis.

I realize another hon. member wishes to speak, Madam Speaker, so I shall conclude on this note. In this great country of ours we must realize that we have so much going for us. Our country is strong and proud, and this fact alone will make us even stronger. No country became great without facing many problems. We are one of the few countries of the world that got our flag from parliament; many others had to bleed for it. I say to the members of this House, thank God that we only have postal and other labour problems in this country today, and have not had to shed blood in order to stand under our flag.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, I am quite pleased to take part in this debate launched by my colleague for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) who is a distinguished unionist well sensitized to the problems of workers who are now facing troubled times not only in Quebec but throughout Canada.

Needless to add, Madam Speaker, in the short time allowed to me that more than 3,351,390 man-days on average have been lost each year between 1960 and 1970 as a result of various strikes. Needless to add either that in several cases, the strike is not only legal but often justified, that is the workers have the right to strike and they are urged to do so. One only has to think, for example, of a strike which is now affecting my constituents in the furniture industry where, after 27 years of employment in the same dusty plant, even though they are practically artists, some cabinet makers or furniture finishers still earn $2.60 per hour, which is the new minimum wage in Quebec.

Generally speaking, one can say that in most cases, workers are peaceful people who want to better their lot, who do not want to break anything nor restrict the rights of others in our society. Unfortunately, these people are manipulated, lead by union leaders, who often abuse their power, their prestige, their title, compel workers by restricting their freedom and leading them to actions that everyone regrets in the end.

I do not refer necessarily to acts of violence, since these are exceptional. But when a strike has lasted two, three or four months in some sectors, how long will it take for the workers who were to be given help through the strike, because the strike weapon has been invented to defend the workers' rights in extreme circumstances, how long will it be before they return to normal conditions? Finally, the strike is not a peaceful means. It is an extreme means, once all other avenues have been unsuccessfully explored.

As my colleague from Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) very rightly said, today, under the influence of union leaders, workers go on strike first and then, having demonstrated their strength, they go on to bargaining. While logic and common sense dictate that everything possible must be done to negotiate, if that does not succeed, legal mechanisms provide this extreme solution, the strike. Why do I say it is extreme? Because rarely does the worker, whatever increase he gained through this pressure action, recoup the amounts he lost during the strike.

That shows, Madam Speaker, that the main problem facing our society is not necessarily the strike mechanism, but rather the bargaining process that is defective. Indeed, everyone can strike in any circumstances. Today we have rotating, legal, wildcat, vertical, horizontal and all kinds of strikes. But what we fail to develop is our bargaining process which must precede any collective or common action called a strike. That is why my colleagues and I are for the right to strike. Because association is a human right, we cannot in any event deny that right derived from the right to associate and which is the counterpart of that of the employer. The motion we proposed today seeks especially to improve the bargaining process since it is at that exact level that the main problem lies.

For instance, to say that after two or four months negotiations have still not been held between employer and employee is ridiculous and the worker is always the victim. On a limited striking fund, he goes on strike and there are no negotiations. Finally, Madam Speaker, even this last resort means of protecting the worker's right works against him because he must bear the financial consequences. If we add abuse to that situation, on the one hand from union leaders who generally are associated with politicians—and here I have in mind the Parliament of Quebec which uses such gimmicks that there is no longer any form of union freedom—then the problem takes extreme proportions. Anyway, Madam Speaker, those union leaders who abuse their influence, call for violence, and rebellion against those in power are finally exploiting workers to create an unofficial government and challenge the very real strength of democracy invested in the duly elected representatives, so that we wake up in a state of permanent turmoil, of constant distrust, and God knows where we will end up. When faced with such situations of extreme abuses, Parliaments—and this one is no exception—are forced to step in often in turn in an extreme and abusive way, supposedly under the legitimate pretext of preserving the common interest. That is why this Parliament, including myself, has adopted special legislation to settle so-called exceptional situations. All of this, because the parties involved probably refused to bargain in respect, honesty, good will and good faith. This, however, as suggested by my colleague the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne), is probably due to the fact that our labour legislation, including our Canadian Labour Code, is outdated.

Madam Speaker, as this debate is coming to an end, I take the liberty of asking this question. Why are all Canadians and hon. members so anxious to streamline our democratic institutions, improve the financing of political parties, modernize and adapt all our legislation? There is no exception to this rule, whether it be in the fields of communications, culture, economy, finance, income tax—hon. members will readily remember the thorough tax reform that was adopted by the House.

Yet, for more than 25 years, only one area has not been updated, has not been improved, has not been adapted, and it is our Canadian Labour Code. It is the only area we are not really looking into in order to adapt our negotiation and our arbitration methods to the modern conflicts which have modern causes, like automation.

I see the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) who is present and who is showing remarkable leadership in dealing with a conflict in postal services. Well, Madam Speaker, this proves once again that the minister's only way out is the recourse to the oldish grievance procedure which takes—and on this the union leaders are right—tremendous time. So, the postal workers have no other choice but to resort to violence and to voluntary exclude themselves from the democratic process, because they no longer believe in it, because it is outdated, because it takes too much time.

Madam Speaker, today we have moved this motion, which I find positive, and have asked our colleague from Kamouraska to do so because he knows this field. It is precisely to make Parliament fully aware of the situation of conflict we are constantly experiencing from sea to sea. I want to point out to my colleagues from the other provinces that those conflicts are not restricted to Quebec alone. It is imperative that we should notice it, and take this opportunity today to think positively and try to convince the minister that the act should be brought up to date in its widest sense that it might adapt to our modern times.

Madam Speaker, this is extremely important. Electronic automation is replacing man increasingly. More and more thought is being given to reducing work hours, to improving work conditions, to reducing the work week, precisely because the machine is replacing man.

In a second stage, after having modernized our negotiating institutions, we will inevitably have to tackle our social security system to guarantee an income to our workers who will have been replaced by the machine.

Madam Speaker, will we wait for the ridiculous situation where union leaders will ask to throw out the machines under the pretext of guaranteeing the worker job security?

How ridiculous for us to have reached that point! It proves that the source of the evil, for the workers, is the lack of income or income security, and not so much job security.

That is why, Madam Speaker, we are happy not only to have raised this debate but also to have heard useful comments from both sides of the House. This is the third time that we have launched such a debate in the House to speak of the sharing of employees in company benefits and to speak of unemployment, which is particularly acute among our young people who really wish to get satisfaction out of their work.

Contrary to many of our predecessors, Madam Speaker, this is our third attempt at raising the issue. We shall try and do so again later, but we are quite happy with today's reaction to the motion, hoping that it will contribute to the rallying of goodwill in Parliament as well as in the country, so that finally, all Canadians will unite to build their country and stop holding records for more man-days on strike than at work. Madam Speaker, when we have such a high unemployment rate in a country of our size with such a small population, we cannot allow ourselves, in a state of economic crisis such as the one we are now facing, to play the game of union leaders who abuse their powers or the game of some politicians who dream up gimmicks with union leaders.

That is why I feel the federal government should show leadership in this field.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. It being 10 o'clock, I must point out to the House that under—

Mr. Olivier: I should like to rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker, before you call it 10 o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) wishes to make a point of order.

Mr. Olivier: This may be a minor detail, Madam Speaker, but to my right it is 10:02, 10:05 in front of me and 10:01 behind me. Perhaps somebody should look into it some day.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): This matter has been raised in the past.

Mr. Fortin: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker.

● (2200)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: I wish to thank the hon. member for Longueuil for keeping a close watch on time, probably because of his great interest in what the Social Credit members were saying. I thank him.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), the proceedings on the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS—REASON FOR FAILURE TO ADOPT STANDARDS FOR ASBESTOS FIBRES UNDER CLEAN AIR ACT—POSSIBLE PROTEST FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Madam Speaker, on March 20 this year I asked a question of the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) which dealt with the problems relating to asbestos in this country. There are really two aspects to the question.

I asked first why the minister has not brought in regulations concerning asbestos under the Clean Air Act so we can have a national environmental standard in an effort to help to overcome the problem at Thetford Mines. I could also mention Cassiar Mines in British Columbia, Clinton

Mines in the Yukon, and so on. The following is the answer in part given by the minister:

> We are now looking into the asbestos question, and when we get together to regulate those standards the provinces, using their authority, will implement them.

With the greatest respect, it is my understanding that the minister under the Clean Air Act has jurisdiction to impose ambient air standards; that is, standards for the air outside enclosures. I suggest that she does not have to regulate in this regard through the provinces. She may have to consult with the provinces, but she does not have to wait for the provinces to take action. There is a consultation procedure, but the minister does have the jurisdiction to solve this very serious problem in the outer air.

This is a problem which we cannot treat lightly. I should like to read from some recent information. I shall quote from the Montreal Gazette of May 20, 1975. The headline is "Industry, doctors accused of cover-up in asbestos peril". It reads:

> Brodeur, a New Yorker magazine writer and author of two books on lung diseases affecting asbestos workers, defined the 'medical-industrial complex' as an 'entrenched group of doctors working for industry and government'.

The article continues:

> Brodeur said he has found it peculiar that, as far back as 1917, virtually all Canadian and American insurance companies were refusing to insure asbestos workers.

That was back in 1917. It has taken the medical profession, the government, and industry another 50 years to discover the danger of working in asbestos mines. I suggest this is really a national scandal that has gone on in respect of the asbestos mines.

Again I should like to quote from this article in the Montreal Gazette:

> According to Brodeur, statistics have shown one in five workers exposed to asbestos dust particles dies of cancer or asbestosis.

There are also severe risks related to asbestos for those who work in the railroad industry. I should like to quote now from an article by Dr. Thomas F. Mancuso, an IAM medical consultant: He says:

> The old time railroad machinists from every section of the country have independently described the asbestos dust exposure which centers on the steam locomotives; the use of asbestos to cover the steam boilers of the engines, ever since the steam engine and the railroad began. The pattern of work exposures and procedures were similar in all railroad shops in the country.

This is not something new. This is something which has been going on for many years, and yet governments have fallen fast asleep in regard to protecting workers from death by cancer simply because of the old productive wheel which had to keep turning regardless of the risk to those involved.

A second aspect of the question which was asked on March 20 dealt with information I had that the environmental protection agency operating from Maine had lodged a complaint with the Canadian government concerning ambient air which was blowing across the border from Thetford. I would be happy to be corrected because that information came to me through a radio broadcast. I see my hon. friend the parliamentary secretary smiling, so it could be that the information I had may not be correct. I have not been able to trace the source of that information.

I understood that there had been a problem and that an official protest had been made. It is probably fair to say that there was a problem, but whether an official protest was lodged may be in some doubt. I will let the parliamentary secretary deal with that.

I cannot, however, fail to feel somewhat outraged that the answer I received with regard to the imposition of clean air standards for asbestos is that we will see those standards before the end of this year. I submit that people will be injured and will suffer additional cancers before the end of this year, and in my view it is untenable that the government should not immediately impose ambient air standards right across the country.

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for bringing this important question before the House. He has been very consistent, and this is undoubtedly a very important matter which must be dealt with. I suppose there are many good reasons it has not been dealt with before now, but in all fairness the Clean Air Act is a pretty new piece of legislation which was passed by the parliament of Canada.

The air pollution control directorate of the Department of the Environment has been studying the problem of asbestos fibres in the air for some time. Meetings have been held with officials of the province of Quebec as well as with those industries involved in the mining and milling of asbestos. The Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) will be proposing to the governor in council national emission standard regulations for asbestos mining and milling operations prior to the end of this year. These regulations will allow control of stack emissions in both the mining and milling processes, as well as for fugitive dust emissions resulting from handling operations and waste disposal.

The regulations will be established under the Clean Air Act, and the provinces will be implementing the standard under their own authority. As a regulation under the Clean Air Act, however, the federal government can of course enforce the standard itself, should this prove necessary.

Officials of the Department of the Environment, of the Department of External Affairs and of the Canadian embassy in Washington are not aware of any protest being received from any U.S. authority concerning airborne asbestos fibres crossing into Maine. I was glad to hear that the hon. member was relating his information to a radio broadcast. I would like to know if he has any further information. We would be glad to follow it up.

AIR TRANSPORT—SUGGESTED SEPARATE MINISTRY FOR CIVIL AIR TRANSPORT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, last month the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) indicated that a separate ministry for air transport was one of the aspects of transportation policy being considered. I want to point out this evening that over ten years ago the Glassco Commission considered this option, but the government of the day decided on a wider approach, a so-called co-ordinated policy embracing all types of transport as they related to the economic growth of Canada. I suggest that it is time to re-assess the situation, particularly in view of the increasing complexities of the whole transportation question and the demands on the ministry as it now exists.

The duties of the Minister of Transport are spelled out, among other places, in the National Transportation Act, the Railway Act, the Pilotage Act, the Canadian National Railways Act, and the Aeronautics Act. They involve responsibility for certain aspects of rail, air, and sea travel, for northern transportation, and for the Canadian Transport Commission. Dredging contracts, airports, freight rates and so on, all are matters of concern to the Minister of Transport. Certainly this heavy workload has a direct relationship to the sorry state of affairs within the department. A separate department of air would relieve the burden somewhat, and seems particularly reasonable given the fact that the Department of Transport shows every sign of continuing to grow and, within it, the field of air transportation is one of the fastest growing elements.

Steadily growing expenditures are one indication of the growth of the ministry. The budget of the Department of Transport has increased by about 267 per cent in the last five years, from 354.2 million in 1970-71 to nearly one billion in 1975-76. Within this, the expenditures for air transportation have increased at a rate of 237 per cent, from 198.7 million to 471.3 million. Moreover, expansion of air passenger traffic is expected to continue at a rate of 8 per cent a year until 1978; while air cargo is presently growing at a rate of close to 18 per cent. This continued growth of air transportation presents a strong argument in favour of a separate ministry of air, particularly since the main argument against it—the need for a co-ordinated transportation policy—is inconclusive.

One of the things a minister of air or of civil aviation could do, for example, would be to reorganize the affairs of Air Canada. He could provide for a more flexible type of Crown corporation; he could direct an infusion of capital, and so on. In passing, Madam Speaker, I should like to point out that the debt-equity ratio which is now being used as a financial crutch by management is not entirely justified. The other side of the coin is the very favourable interest rates that have been of assistance to Air Canada in the past. I should like to observe also, Madam Speaker, that under a separate ministry sporadic and purely political interference in civil aviation could be replaced by steady supervision.

A new minister of air could co-ordinate civil aviation policies. The same minister would not be in charge of competing modes of transport and would focus responsibility for a national air policy through one department. A minister for aviation would thus have time to supervise activities and direct policies on this unique form of transport. He or she could thoroughly evaluate and give attention to regional air policies—rationalize them—lessen Air Canada's monopoly in some areas where smaller airlines could do better, and encourage Air Canada to do a better job on long haul domestic and international flights.

A recent article in the Ottawa Citizen of May 23 quotes an airline executive as saying:

> Sometimes I have to wonder where Air Canada ends off and the Ministry of Transport begins,

The article later quotes a regional airline president as follows:

> The government should either let the airline completely alone or it should step in to enforce some sort of consistency,

I suggest, therefore, that the argument for a separate ministry of aviation is a sound one, and I urge the minister to give it considerable thought. Such a ministry could also pay greater attention to Air Canada's activities abroad which affect our trade patterns and our national interests. For example, Air Canada is getting a black eye because the strike of its employees in Paris has been allowed to drag on for over a month. There have been many unfortunate side effects, and a loss of revenue.

I hope the minister will accept my observation in the fashion in which they are offered—an open minded fashion. I recognize his problem, but I hope he recognizes and the government recognizes that problems must be solved sometimes by using innovative methods and procedures at least on a trial basis. Certainly there are arguments to be made against a separate ministry, but I hope the government will fully explore both sides and attempt to do something.

If the creation of the Solicitor General's portfolio from the area of responsibility held by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) could be justified in 1965, then surely there is just as much if not more need for a ministry of air vis-à-vis the general portfolio of transportation than there was, let's say for a separate portfolio for the RCMP and the penitentiaries approximately ten years ago. In the interest of keeping cabinet positions within manageable numbers, I suggest that the government should consider abolishing the Solicitor General's portfolio. The Department of Justice should be responsible for carrying out the work now performed by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), and a new ministry of aviation should be established as an experiment.

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I assure the hon. member that his comments this evening will be considered carefully in the spirit in which he made them. He has acquired a reputation in the House for being hard working, responsible, and knowledgeable in many fields.

As the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) indicated on earlier occasions, he hopes to be in a position in the not too distant future to indicate to the House the results of the current review of transportation policy. In carrying out this review the minister has considered a wide range of options and assessed the implications of each of them. In the meantime I might mention that one of the requirements we see is the need to develop all modes of transport in an integrated way so that the best use is made of each mode in relation to others. The requirements of all modes can then be considered in a balanced way, by taking into consideration the requirements of users, carriers, and governments. The desirability of creating a separate ministry of aviation would have to be examined within this concept.

I should add, as a western Canadian, that I also look forward to the minister's announcement concerning the new transportation policy. We, in western Canada, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will no doubt agree, face many problems in transportation. We hope that a new transportation policy will soon be formulated and resolve many of our transportation problems.

INCOME TAX—DECENTRALIZATION OF DATA PROCESSING—POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF OFFICE IN ATLANTIC REGION

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Madam Speaker, as recorded at page 5822 of Hansard for May 15, replying to my question concerning the criteria to be used in deciding on a location in the Atlantic region for the proposed data processing unit of his department, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford) noted several yardsticks he would use. These criteria included the number of tax returns filed with the Atlantic region, the availability of part-time and full-time workers, the availability of space, and the availability of communication links.

I want to develop some further observations on this matter this evening. I think the Sydney industrial area is an ideal location for such a data processing unit. We have an abundance of part-time workers available. Our latest unemployment figures for Cape Breton Island, as forwarded to me by the Nova Scotia department of labour, show unemployment rates for January, February, March and April of 13 per cent, 16.1 per cent, 17 per cent and 14.3 per cent respectively. These figures, of course, do not include the discouraged workers, male and female, who stopped looking for work because they considered it hopeless to do so. Besides that, our labour force participation rate for the first quarter of 1975 was 8 percentage points below that of Economic Region 6 in Nova Scotia, which includes Halifax County. Thus there is an abundance of underutilized human beings ready to work.

When it was announced that a satellite data processing centre was to be established in Winnipeg, it was noted that, initially at least, 125 highly skilled permanent jobs plus 1,000 part-time jobs would be created, with a 1975 payroll of $4 million.

I want the minister to know that the Nova Scotia Eastern Institute of Technology in my riding now teaches data processing. They are capable of training most of the highly skilled personnel needed, as well as the part-time people. We, through the Cape Breton Development Corporation and/or the College of Cape Breton, can provide adequate space; I think the minister would find the communications links more than suitable.

When the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was decentralized a couple of years ago, 84 members of the department were stationed in Moncton, 43 in Halifax, 41 in Fredericton, 19 in Charlottetown and 41 in St John's, Newfoundland.

As Nova Scotians we were happy to see the Halifax-Dartmouth metropolitan area profit from a special agreement entered into between the province of Nova Scotia and DREE. In Halifax a total of $87.7 million was earmarked for waterfront development, including a new, large hotel in downtown Halifax.

Some in Cape Breton thought it was an anomaly to build another luxury hotel in Halifax when our housing problem is so acute in Cape Breton, but the development of Halifax has helped Cape Breton in that many Cape Bretoners—they never call themselves ex-Cape Bretoners—can get steady jobs there.

We all hope that the metropolitan area growth investment scheme will be successful, and we are glad to note that following DREE's announcement of the special grant to the Halifax-Dartmouth area that One Sackville Place Ltd. of Halifax said it would build a $5 million low-profile eight storey building in Halifax on a 40,000 square foot site adjacent to the Hotel Nova Scotian owned by the Canadian National Railways.

It is time for some government agencies to be decentralized in favour of high unemployment areas, especially when they have almost 20 per cent of a provincial population as does Cape Breton county.

Surely it is unfair to let such areas try to fight the cold winds of international competition in their basic industries when all that is needed is the political will to make the government department decentralization process a tool of diversification and growth for such hard hit areas. I appeal to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) to take a strong stand with the Minister of National Revenue and other cabinet colleagues on this matter, which I consider a matter of principle as well as being an important means of getting balanced provincial development.

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's question in the House on May 15, followed by the remarks which he has just concluded, arise from an announcement the minister made in Winnipeg on May 9.

On that occasion he announced the government's decision to carry out a geographic decentralization of the Ottawa Data Centre for the processing of income tax returns. The first of the satellite data centres is being established in Winnipeg. Within a period of up to five years, similar data centres—all linked to the central facility in Ottawa—will be established in the other four regions of Canada, that is in the Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Ontario, and the Pacific region.

I should mention that even before this important decision was made, the department, both on the taxation and the customs and excise sides, was one of the most decentralized of government departments. For instance, more than 80 per cent of the taxation employees are situated outside the capital.

I realize the big pitch the hon. member is making here tonight is important, namely, that these centres should be located in the slow growth areas of the country. I should also mention that very strong representations have been made to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford) by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen). All that the Minister of National Revenue can honestly say at this stage is that he is listening to all the representations being made to him. He has also mentioned that representations were received from the other maritime provinces.

Our first regional data centre should be in operation by late 1975. In support of what I have said about the effect on the local labour force, I might mention that the Winnipeg facility will require approximately 125 full-time and more than 1,000 casual employees during 1975-76. The 1976 payroll will exceed $3,800,000. It is a very important policy in many ways.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.26 p.m.

PROPOSED UNILATERAL DECLARATION OF MANAGEMENT OF MARINE RESOURCES TO EDGE OF CONTINENTAL SHELF—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise to ask leave of the House to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

Having regard to the fact that the fishing industry of this country is in danger of being totally destroyed as a result of overfishing off our coast by foreign fishing fleets; and, in light of the failure of the Geneva Law of the Sea Conference and all other such conferences dating back to 1959 to agree on a solution to the problem, I move, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That this government establish a date within the present year, 1975, on which this country will, in the absence of a satisfactory agreement by the other fishing nations of the world to reduce their fishing efforts over our continental shelf, unilaterally assert its control over the marine resources to the edge of the continental shelf and the slopes thereto, thereby enabling Canada to properly manage, harvest and rehabilitate our fishery resources and, further, that this country's delegates to the forthcoming ICNAF meetings be instructed to convey this ultimatum to all other member nations at the June 6 meeting of that body.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 and cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED REVIEW OF INADEQUATE ESCALATION OF PENSIONS OF RETIRED EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It arises from yesterday's announcement concerning the escalation of the pensions of Canadian National retired employees. It is a motion which I hope the House will see fit to accept.

Sir, in December several deputy ministers retired on sizeable pensions and received cost of living increases of more than 10 per cent in January, the very next month. Canadian National proposes to escalate the pensions of those who retired more than two years ago by a formula involving increases from 6 per cent down; for those who retired in 1973 and 1974 there is to be no escalation at all. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House hereby declares that the recently announced minimal cost of living increases in Canadian National pensions in the case of those who retired prior to January 1, 1973, and the refusal of the CNR to grant any cost of living increases at all in the case of those who retired in 1973 and in 1974, are totally unacceptable, and this House calls on the Canadian National Railways to review this matter forthwith, it being the view of this House that all pensions should be escalated at least by the percentage of the rise in the cost of living.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House before presentation. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED INCREASED PENALTIES FOR THOSE WHO SELL MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to bring forward an extremely urgent motion requiring immediate attention.

Given the fact that the revelations heard before the Quebec organized crime inquiry have shown unquestionably that Canadians, and particularly Quebecers, have eaten tainted meat sold by unscrupulous individuals, and that the repressive measures provided in the statutes are far too weak to dissuade tainted meat dealers from poisoning the population, since the fines are under $100, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That this House consider the measures to be taken in order that the tainted meat dealers upon conviction for a first office, be liable to imprisonment for a term of at least two years without any respite nor parole and, for a second offence, to imprisonment for a term of five years without any respite nor parole, in order to protect Canadian citizens from the disgusting doings of those who sell tainted meat for human consumption.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Under Standing Order 43, such a motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is such consent granted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous consent, so the motion cannot be put.

ALLEGATION PRIME MINISTER'S SECRETARY, MR. AUSTIN, USING OFFICE TO FIGHT INCOME TAX CASE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion that is self-explanatory. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

In view of serious allegations yesterday by Southam News Services that the principal secretary to the Prime Minister, Mr. Jack Austin, has been using the Prime Minister's office as an information gathering centre to fight a $70,000 personal tax case with the Department of National Revenue, including specific use of the Prime Minister's telephone number and an office address in the East Block of the parliament buildings on letters dated January 30, 1975, the House request a full and complete investigation of this matter and that the said Mr. Austin should remain absent from his duties or otherwise be suspended until such time as the allegations are disproved or otherwise.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 and demands the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ALLEGEDLY CONFLICTING VIEWS OF CABINET MINISTERS ON WHETHER EXCESSIVE WAGE SETTLEMENTS THREATEN CANADA'S COMPETITIVE POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. I would like him to tell the House who was expressing the position of the government, the Minister of Labour yesterday when he described as a prevailing myth that excessive wage settlements threatened our competitive advantage over the United States or the Minister of Finance who said in Sarnia on May 9, and I quote:

The very fact that for a considerable period of time Canadian wages and salaries have been rising at a very much faster rate than those in the U.S. should make it obvious that our competitive position is being seriously jeopardized.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have been looking at the remarks made yesterday by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Stanfield: I bet you have.

Mr. Sharp: He did not quite say what the Leader of the Opposition has said. He quoted Mr. McGillivray, a journalist, who had pointed out that average wage gains had been running at less than one per cent more than those of the United States in collective agreements. At the end, he said:

I think this myth about Canadian wage settlements being double those in the United States should be laid to rest right now.

One can have a difference of view as to whether wage increases have been doubled. The Minister of Labour was expressing some doubt about that. He did not say that our position had not deteriorated. Indeed, our position has deteriorated. Both the Minister of Finance and I would affirm that.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I quote word for word what the minister said, as reported in Hansard.

Mr. Drury: The whole, not part.

Mr. Stanfield: I will quote the whole for the Minister of Public Works. I quote:

Time does not permit my dealing as extensively as I would like with the prevailing myth that excessive wage settlements are the main cause of inflation, that they are running at double the average rise of wages in the United States, and that they threaten our competitive advantage over the Americans.

That is to be found at page 6163. May I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the Minister of Labour was stating the position of the government yesterday or whether the Prime Minister was stating the position of the government at the first ministers meeting in April of this year when he said: "Meanwhile, our industries are facing increases in their wage settlements that are twice the size of those being made in the United States".

Mr. Sharp: Quite clearly, the Prime Minister speaks for the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I don't know what that does to the Minister of Labour, but I should like to know what it does to the government's consensus program. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether his government can properly present a consensus program to the people of Canada before it has achieved consensus within its own ranks.

Mr. Sharp: The government is fully behind the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: And all other points of view expressed by the cabinet.

Mr. Sharp: —both of whom have been urging upon business, labour and the community in general the need for restraint.

SUGGESTION EXCESSIVE WAGE SETTLEMENTS RESULT NOT CAUSE OF INFLATION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Yesterday, the Minister of Labour said:

> Time does not permit my dealing as extensively as I would like with the prevailing myth that excessive wage settlements are the main cause of inflation.

If these remarks are accepted, does the government now concede that wage demands are only the result of continuing inflation and not the cause of it?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fraser: Could I then ask the minister just what he did mean by those words?

CANADA'S STRIKE RECORD—POSSIBLE JUSTIFICATION OF HIGH WAGE SETTLEMENTS IN VIEW OF INCREASED PRODUCTIVITY

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. In the light of the new information which has been placed before the House by the Minister of Labour, does the Minister of Finance now share the Minister of Labour's view that our strike record is not nearly as bad in terms of international comparison as he is making it out to be?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I shall be dealing with that matter on budget night. I shall be glad to produce the figures for the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Saltsman: I imagine the Minister of Finance needs some time in which to consult with his colleague, the Minister of Labour, in order to work out a new consensus on this matter. It is a subject of considerable interest since these two opinions are floating around the country, and I think it is the minister's responsibility to let the country know what position he is taking. Does the Minister of Finance share the view of the Minister of Labour that Canadian wages have risen faster than wages in the United States because our productivity has been rising faster—

Mr. Hees: Our productivity has been going down and you know it, John.

Mr. Saltsman: —and that higher Canadian increases are therefore warranted?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Generally speaking, the Minister of Labour and I have been continuing to hold discussions with representatives of the labour movement. We both recognize that wage demands have reflected a legitimate catch-up because of inflation in terms of higher prices for food, clothing, oil and various other commodities in 1974. The thrust toward catch-up is a legitimate effort on the part of the labour movement. What we are most concerned about is that in attempting to catch up labour, business, the professions and indeed governments will attempt to over-reach in anticipation of further and future inflation rates. On that subject, the Minister of Labour and I are not in disagreement.

PRINCIPLE OF CABINET SOLIDARITY ON ECONOMIC POLICY—POSSIBILITY OF FREE VOTE ON BUDGET

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my final supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister because I do not think the House has been reassured by the information that has been given to us today on what is the position of the government. I wonder whether the Acting Prime Minister can deal with the question and inform the House whether the cabinet has decided to abandon the principle and tradition of solidarity in respect of economic policy, and whether the budget, when it comes, will be subject, as far as the government side of the House is concerned, to a free vote?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, it will be a question of confidence, as it was the last time when we had a resounding victory.

INCOME TAX

RIGHT OF STUDENTS TO DEDUCT MOVING COSTS

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Revenue.

SALE OF SUBSIDIARY CHAPMAN TRANSPORT TO DIRECT WINTERS TRANSPORT—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Would the minister advise the House whether Canadian National Railways has sold one of its trucking subsidiaries, Chapman Transport Limited of Kelowna, B.C. to Direct Winters Transport of Toronto, which is controlled by Fuqua Industries Inc. of Atlanta, Georgia, an American corporation?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): This I will have to investigate, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think any member of the House believes that Air Canada or the CNR make daily reports on all the transactions they are conducting in Canada. If hon. members want this to be so, we would have to modify the law.

Mr. Baldwin: I expected the minister to take notice of it, Mr. Speaker, and would he also take notice of this question. As Crown corporations are excluded from the provisions of the foreign investment review legislation, would the minister, when he is making inquiries, find out from the CNR what particular benefit there is to Canada in a transaction of this nature?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I think the way the question is put is very civilized and I am going to do that.

SUGGESTED TESTS OF VIETNAMESE REFUGEES FOR TROPICAL DISEASES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of admissions of South Vietnamese children, orphans and others, from this war torn area, since many of them come from areas where tropical diseases, intestinal parasites and so on, are common, can the minister assure the House that proper tests have been carried out to detect any such diseases and whether preventative innoculations have been carried out according to accepted principles?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is aware that Canada has one of the most comprehensive tests for immigrants, especially with regard to tropical disease. As for the Vietnamese, I am advised that this type of procedure has been followed in all cases and that tests and examinations have been carried out before entry. There have been a few cases where it has been impossible to carry out the tests before entry, but they were carried out immediately after entry and any indication of something abnormal was reported to the provincial health authorities for further action.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

POSSIBLE INCREASE IN FUNDING TO COVER INCREASE IN BENEFIT PAYMENTS—NOTICE TO MINISTER OF FINANCE OF NEED FOR FUNDS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, now that the net unemployment insurance benefit payments have increased by over $200 million in the first quarter of this year as compared with the first quarter of 1974, will the Minister of Manpower and Immigration now tell the House whether his department's anticipated transfer of $890 million to the total unemployment insurance account will have to be increased by supplementary funding, and could the minister venture a projection as to what amount of supplementary funding will be required, given that the number of unemployed is hardly likely to decrease this year?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the amount of $890 million is actually an estimate, and of course refers to what was required to supplement the government's cost of unemployment insurance benefits paid last year, not this year. Consequently it is an accurate figure. In fact, the amount required might be a few million dollars less than that, but it relates to unemployment for last year, not this year. In so far as a projection for this year is concerned, I indicated in another place that with variations in the levels of unemployment there would be variations in the levels of the benefits that will be required.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I would direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. In light of the fact that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration revealed last night that Canada can expect an even higher unemployment rate this year, the highest in some 14 years, and as it is clear that vastly increased government funding will be required to maintain the flow of benefits to an expected record number of unemployed claimants, will the minister inform hon. members as to whether he has received notice from his colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, that heavy additional government expenditures will be required in this area?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): That is one of the matters in respect of which we are consulting, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO EXCLUDE CRIMINALS FROM FOOD PROCESSING AND PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRIES

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Can he assure us and the Canadian public that, considering the recent revelations made before the Dutil Commission in Quebec and the previous findings of his investigators, he gave official and specific instructions to the services concerned within his department with a view to countering any eventual infiltration by organized crime in the field of food or pharmaceutical products, and can he tell the House whether there exists a standing interdepartmental committee working to subdue organized crime which, as is obvious, seeks to exercise activities beyond the control of citizens and of governments?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the hon. member's question, I would first like to take this opportunity to correct mistaken information that he submitted to the Canadian public last Friday, mistaken information that he could not have known to be so since he informed the Canadian public that no meat seizures had taken place. In fact, the hon. member knew full well, in light of the press release that had been issued for at least a week that more than 210 tons of meat had been seized in Quebec.

As to the question raised by the hon. member, I must reiterate that my officials were the instigators of the investigation conducted by the police. I have no reason to doubt their honesty, integrity and devotion, and I feel that the facts clearly indicate that they carried out their duties within their mandate. As for the latter part of the hon. member's question, I have no knowledge of such a special standing committee. As everyone knows, we have a police force called the RCMP that enjoys the trust of Canadians and surely that of the government. The force is under the official authority of the Solicitor General and is more than capable of carrying out its duties required for the application of Canadian legislation.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT TO PROTECT QUEBEC CONSUMERS FROM MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary.

In addressing my supplementary to another minister, I should also like to say that I did not mislead the people when I advised them that the minister had behaved stupidly by refusing to prevent the sale of tainted meat, of which he is now aware, and by claiming that he had to wait for the end of the inquiry before acting.

I therefore put my question to a minister who is more responsible, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. At some time or other in the last two months has the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the food advisory division of the Department of National Health advised, as it should, the department to pay special attention to the sale and advertising of certain food products of which the raw material seemed of doubtful quality some time ago according to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, some federal inspectors and, if so, what has been done?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I must remind the hon. member that this matter does not fall within my responsibilities; still, I have discussed several times, with my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, this matter which seems to concern the hon. member to the highest degree.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I have another supplementary for the learned minister.

In addition to his talks with the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has the minister done anything to help the people?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should not confuse the responsibilities of each minister. He seems to be doing his best not to understand or to pretend not to understand the answers given to him by the Minister of National Health and Welfare which are quite clear.

ADEQUACY OF MINISTER'S AUTHORITY TO INSPECT MEAT SOLD FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that section 4 of the Food and Drugs Act prohibits the sale of meat unfit for human consumption, and section 22 authorizes inspections by the minister's officials of any abattoir or place food is stored, can the minister indicate whether he has consulted with his legal advisors to determine whether these two sections of the act indeed give him all the authority he needs to inspect any place handling or storing food or whether there are any situations in respect of meat where he feels he does not have authority to gain access?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, again, this is a matter of legal interpretation which is out of order.

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I should like to rephrase the question in another way and make it much more simple. Can the minister indicate whether he feels there is any place in Quebec where meat unfit for human consumption is being sold or that there is any abattoir or place where meat is stored in respect of which he does not have authority under the Food and Drugs Act to enforce the law.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Still the same question, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

LACK OF REGULATIONS TO PROTECT QUEBEC CONSUMERS FROM MEAT UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION— GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Yesterday the minister mislead the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs in connection with his estimates when he said there was protection afforded to Quebec consumers by a provincial act known as the Dead Meat Act. In checking with the Quebec government today I find there is no such legislation. The Quebec officials confirmed the fact that there are no regulations protecting consumers in the province of Quebec. In light of the fact that there is no consumer protection to Quebec consumers what is the minister doing to carry out the law in respect of the statute which is his responsibility and send additional inspectors into the province of Quebec under the Food and Drugs Act.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, once again, the hon. member is still vague in the information he is referring to. The legislation I referred to is the Public Health Act, Quebec R.S., Chap. 21, and the regulations under the act, and the hon. member only has to refer to them; they are quite clear.

IMMIGRATION

SUGGESTED REVIEW OF METHOD OF OBTAINING BACKGROUND IMFORMATION ON POTENTIAL IMMIGRANTS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Since the minister did not understand my question yesterday concerning why the normal investigation into the background of General Van Quang was not undertaken prior to his entry into Canada, I will try again with a related question. A recent press report alleged that a self-confessed torturer, bomber and accessory to murder who was also a CIA-trained Uruguayan police officer, Nelson Bardecio, has been granted landed immigrant status under somewhat strange circumstances. Can the minister assure the House that his present method of relying on foreign-based intelligence agencies such as the CIA for information concerning potential immigrants to Canada is being seriously looked into at this time?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the people responsible for advising on the security or criminality of applicants for admission to Canada do not concentrate on the use of one or another agency. They use various sources of information, so the CIA was not the only source of information used.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, as the RCMP normally relies upon outside agencies for information about potential immigrants, and since cases such as those of Quang and Bardecio make it clear that agencies such as the CIA are not going to provide information about the criminal activities of their former paid agents, is the minister, along with his colleague the Solicitor General, considering measures to guard against the use of Canada for cooling off former CIA employees and keeping them out of the eye of United States Congressional committees?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I will note the hon. member's representations.

AIR TRANSPORT

AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL COMMUNICATIONS—SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF POLICY ON BILINGUALISM

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. In light of the BILCOM report put forth by the minister's task force investigating bilingualism in respect of air traffic control communications which did not receive the support of the Canadian Air Traffic Controllers Association, will the minister, in the interest of public safety, agree to the recommendations of the Canadian Air Traffic Controllers Association and either place geographical restrictions on unilingual pilots or provide them with English language training so that they can communicate with ground stations in controlled air space?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I made public both reports, the majority report and the minority report. I have received representations from the Pilots Association which I think is a good thing. When I have received all the representations, which are of any value, I will see what kind of policy we will design in that field.

FISHERIES

SUGGESTED UNILATERAL DECLARATION OF CONTROL OF MARINE RESOURCES TO CONTINENTAL SHELF—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the very serious problems facing our Canadian fishermen and the fact that they are facing perhaps total destruction of their means of earning a livelihood because of the over-fishing efforts of the foreign fishing fleets off our coast, and in light of the fact that the Geneva Law of the Sea Conference and all other such conferences have failed to find a solution to that very serious problem, is the Acting Prime Minister prepared to say if the government will establish a date, preferably sometime in 1975, beyond which Canada will not tolerate any further plundering on the part of foreign fishing fleets and will unilaterally declare its right and its intention to manage and control our marine resources to the slope of the continental shelf.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the alternative the hon. member has put up is one that is under consideration by the government. If the Law of the Sea Conference lamentably fails to achieve a general agreement, then it is certainly one that we would consider. I cannot, of course, give any dates because it is still our objective that there should be an international agreement.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister referred to the Law of the Sea Conference. I presume he was talking about the ICNAF meetings in Stockholm. Will he tell the House whether it is the intention of the government to make such a declaration if our delegation fails to reach the agreement being sought at the ICNAF conference whereby we are requesting that the fishing efforts of foreign nationals be reduced by 40 per cent.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we could only get the authority the hon. member seeks over our off-shore either through international agreement at the Law of the Sea Conference, or an international convention or by unilateral declaration. So, these two matters are closely related. I assure the hon. gentleman that we are quite well aware of the problems he has outlined and the possibility of unilateral action is not ruled out.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT ON USE OF LIMITED TACTICAL NUCLEAR WEAPONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In view of world concerns regarding the potential escalation of a conventional limited war into a nuclear war through the use of limited tactical nuclear weapons, has Canada entered into any formal or informal agreements with its allies in either NORAD or NATO agreeing to the use of limited tactical nuclear weapons?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Wenman: Does the minister consider limited tactical nuclear weapons as military hardware within the currently accepted limits of a limited war?

Mr. Richardson: If I understand the question correctly, Mr. Speaker, nuclear weapons can be used in a tactical sense and they would be very much a part of our deterrent, particularly on the central front in Europe.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

METROPOLITAN AREA GROWTH INVESTMENTS LIMITED—DATE WHEN AGENCY WILL BECOME OPERATIONAL

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, if I could get his attention. Inasmuch as 1023 days have gone by since his department announced the establishment of the Area Growth Investments Corporation in the city of Halifax area, can the minister now give some indication to the House as to when his department and the province of Nova Scotia will arrive at an agreement on the question of a chairman for that group so that the metropolitan area can have some benefit from the many billions of dollars that have been lying idle in the bank?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it has been 1023 days, or whatever the hon. member said, since the corporation was formed, but it is only one day since I answered the same question posed by his colleague, the hon. member for Central Nova.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion that instead of engaging in foolishness his department could spend the money on something worthwhile, such as a tunnel under the Northwest Arm, and be done with this charade.

AIR TRANSPORT

FARE INCREASES—POSSIBILITY OF INTERVENTION BY MINISTER

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and it arises out of the increase in domestic air fares which went into effect yesterday. Is the minister satisfied that the amount of the increase awarded to the airlines by the Canadian Transport Commission is justified and, if not, does he plan to intervene under the provisions of the act?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I already said in the House that I asked Air Canada first to try to reduce some of the proposed increases. I think they did reduce those increases in the Maritime region. Apart from that, I am not the one who is supposed to be the judge of that. It is the responsibility of the CTC.

SUGGESTED CONSIDERATION OF INEFFICIENCY OF AIR CANADA IN ESTABLISHING NEW TRANSPORTATION POLICY

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): In view of the fact that the hearings revealed that the operations of Air Canada show significant inefficiencies and the fact that Air Canada happens to be the price pacesetter in the airline industry, is the minister looking into this, and also is the minister looking into the mass cross-subsidization which is taking place in the operations of Air Canada at the expense of the western air traveller and if that practice is consistent with the national air transportation policy?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I think the hon. gentleman knows that right now there is an inquiry into certain financial aspects of Air Canada. I think it is unjust to refer only to the loss or deficits of Air Canada and to say that it is not as efficient as other airlines because we ask Air Canada to do things that we do not ask private companies to do.

An hon. Member: Such as what?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I think it might be a good opportunity when we receive Mr. Justice Estey's report to review the whole thing and see whether the financial administration is good.

Mr. Mazankowski: The question I posed has nothing to do whatsoever with the inquiry. I asked a simple question as to whether the minister approves, as part of the over-all national transportation policy, of the mass cross-subsidization which is taking place in Air Canada and whether in fact the revelations that were brought forth at the hearings concerning the gross inefficiencies in Air Canada are being looked into as part of the minister's review and the over-all approach of the national transportation policy. It is a simple question which has nothing to do with the inquiry. Perhaps the minister might also advise the House whether any consideration is being given to a review of the domestic transcontinental air policy.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, there will be a review. As to the subsidization of certain areas in Canada, it takes place not only with regard to the airlines but even with the railways. This is something we are looking into.

REQUEST FOR REDUCTION OF FARES ON SHORT FLIGHTS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Since the increase in air rate for a very short flight, actually a flight of twenty minutes between Victoria and Vancouver, represents a 50 per cent increase, while the one between Ottawa and Montreal amounts to 27 per cent only, would the minister be prepared to set aside that confiscatory increase on this short flight in British Columbia, in order to reestablish a more equitable rate for western passengers?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I think, Mr. Speaker, this is a highly appropriate question. It is true not only between Victoria and Vancouver, but throughout Canada in general, that short distances, short flights indeed are subsidized by long ones and that, of course, is often not justifiable. The case of Victoria is one of those, and it is precisely one of the things that we try to correct. However, this will require a very deep change of attitude, not only on the part of the department, but also on that of the CTC, which has that responsibility. I am sorry.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary question. I would like to remind the minister that subsidies are paid by the passengers but would he be willing at least to suspend the federal tax on tickets for flights lasting less than one hour, for instance, between Victoria and Vancouver and between Ottawa and Montreal?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I think I already mentioned that this is true, generally, not only for Victoria and Vancouver, but also for other regions of the country. What I want is a global policy which applies throughout the country.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED REVIEW OF REDUCTION OF TARIFF ON TIRES

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance and it relates to questions asked of him last week by the hon. member for Winnipeg North regarding the rubber industry in Canada. In view of the lay-offs in the Canadian tire industry, and in view of the trade deficit in tires jumping from $25 million to $155 million last year, is the minister prepared to review his government's decision which reduced the tariff on tires from 17½ per cent to 12½ per cent?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are examining the matter in the light of the representations last week of the hon. gentleman's colleague.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

Mr. Symes: In view of the fact that sales of tires are about the same as in former years but that a smaller proportion of sales is made up of Canadian manufactured tires and that the import of U.S. tires is increasing, will the minister meet with representatives of the rubber industry to resolve our worsening trade balance with the United States?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I will take note of that argument, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

POSSIBILITY OF PROHIBITION OF STRIKES IN ESSENTIAL SERVICES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In view of the minister's threat to clean up corruption in unions if this is not done internally, a threat supported by similar statements by the Prime Minister, is this crackdown on labour indicative of a new government policy moving toward the prohibition of strikes in essential services? Further, does this new law and order posture reflect the recent Canadian Institute of Public Opinion poll showing that Canadians strongly support the prohibition of strikes in essential services?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker, my statement in that connection did not reflect any of the conclusions that are very widespread that the hon. member is talking about. What I was saying was that I believe the CLC should set up the criteria necessary to enforce its own code of ethics so that the government does not have to intervene in the way we have experienced recently.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question. Could the Minister of Labour explain how this new strong stance against labour fits into the government's new, broader consensus policy as promoted by the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the allegations of corruption against certain union officials has no direct relationship to the consensus exercise. What I was talking about in this particular case was the necessity for labour itself to take a very vigilant posture toward wrongdoing within its constituent membership and affiliates. The reason I say that is that I believe in that way the good name of labour can be protected. We are all prepared to acknowledge that there is a great amount of integrity within the rank and file of the membership of the unions and their leadership in Canada, but a variety of examples have come to our attention lately which indicate that some people will use certain methods in order to dirty the name of labour generally throughout Canada. I believe the best defence against that is for the labour movement itself to set up the machinery necessary to enforce a code of ethics within the movement.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SHOOTING IN TOWN OF BRAMPTON—REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF GUN LEGISLATION

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of grief and shock that I rise to advise the House that about an hour ago there was a major shooting in the town of Brampton, as a result of which a high school teacher and a student were murdered and probably as many as 16 other students injured by the same gun fire. I should like to ask the Solicitor General if he would pledge his efforts to have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police co-operate in any way they can with the local police relative to the gun issue and perhaps even question whether the government will seriously review the gun legislation in Canada?

Mr. Horner: Was it a stolen gun?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I just heard about this terrible crime during the question period. I understand there was a labour problem in that school and this young boy entered the classroom and shot the teacher and some of the students. I intend to get a full report on the situation that led to the crime—the background of the boy and how he came into possession of the guns.

CRIMINAL CODE

SUGGESTED REFERENDUM ON RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General.

In the light of statistics which indicate an increase in murders in the country, could the minister tell the House whether he is prepared to let the Canadian people decide whether they are in favour of the restoration of the death penalty through a referendum?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, that is a question that will be decided by parliament. The government does not intend to have a referendum on the issue. I think if we are seriously concerned with the problem of murder we should direct our resources and attention to the causes of crime and not to penalties that will have no effect whatsoever.

AGRICULTURE

USE OF INSECTICIDE SEVIN—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROTECT WILDLIFE

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and in his absence I presume his parliamentary secretary will deal with it. It arises from complaints I have received from constituents as a result of the government's present program of aerial spraying with the dangerous insecticide Sevin to kill gypsy moths attacking trees in Frontenac county. Since this spray also kills wild and tame bees and beneficial predator insects as well as the birds that eat them, may I ask what the government is doing to assure the safety of the latter and to avoid disruption and damage to the basic balance of nature by this dangerous insecticide?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the question directed to the minister who will be pleased to answer on his return.

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF MINISTER CONTINUING IN PORTFOLIO IN LIGHT OF VIEW EXPRESSED BY MINISTER OF LABOUR ON WAGE INCREASES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance who has made it a very central concern to express a position against the erosion of Canada's competitive position, and has frequently expressed the view that our competitive position is being seriously jeopardized by the rate of increase in wages and salaries in Canada. In view of the fact that the Minister of Labour has expressed the view that this is a prevailing myth, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether he intends to continue to serve in that portfolio in a government in which the Minister of Labour expresses a completely contrary view?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I intend to serve in the government as long as the Prime Minister asks me to serve.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question. May I ask the Minister of Finance how he proposes to restore the credibility of the policy position he has taken in view of the fact that the Minister of Labour has directly challenged the validity of that position?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should not like to think that my credibility depended entirely on the view of the Leader of the Opposition.

INFLATION—PROPOSED LIMITATION ON GROWTH OF MONEY SUPPLY

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance in regard to his concern about inflation. Has he noticed a recent reduction in credit purchases in Canada which corresponds to a reduction in credit purchases in the United States?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, because that is a very carefully posed question, before I give the hon. gentleman an answer I shall look it up.

Mr. Horner: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker, so that I may clarify the point for the minister. Is Canada's central bank prepared to go as far as the central bank of the United States and suggest that the growth of Canada's money supply for next year will be limited to 5 per cent or 7 per cent to control inflation?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there are some risks in suggesting a target like that. Arthur Burns admitted that before Congress.

Mr. Horner: Are you prepared to risk it?

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

ALLEGED LEAK OF CABINET DOCUMENT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as President of the Privy Council. On May 6 during a meeting in which officials of Central Mortgage and Housing, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the National Indian Brotherhood were participants, a document identified as a secret cabinet discussion paper was circulated and debated. The document left the room and found its way to the press. This occurrence bears a striking resemblance to a similar situation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question, perhaps he would put it to the minister.

Mr. Oberle: My question is to the President of the Privy Council. Has the government changed its position in regard to secret cabinet documents from that which resulted in the firing of a senior official last year or will the leak result in the firing of similar officials this time?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if the government should find that there had been a deliberate leak of a document by a senior civil servant I think that would be grounds for dismissal.

Mr. Oberle: A supplementary question. Has the occurrence of May 6 been the subject of discussion in cabinet and is any action contemplated at this time? If not, does the government intend to reinstate Mr. Rudniki or offer him a settlement out of court, since his situation is identical to that which just occurred?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the statement of the hon. gentleman. If any senior civil servant deliberately leaks a document then that is good ground for dismissal.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East on a question of privilege.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege has to do with a reply given to me in the House today by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). The minister has left the House; whether he did so deliberately or by inadvertence is not for me to say.

Yesterday in the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs I was pursuing a question with the minister regarding his responsibilities in face of the fact that there are no regulations or statutes in the province of Quebec to protect Quebec consumers from having to buy tainted and contaminated meat placed on the market for human consumption. Let me quote the minister's reply. According to the transcript in my possession he said:

● (1500)

There is provincial legislation . . . I refer you to the Dead Meat Act of Quebec. I do not know whether you are aware of it and the regulations under the Dead Meat Act in Quebec. Are you aware of this particular legislation?

The minister, of course, today denied saying that, or implied he had not said it. I will deal with that in a moment.

I checked with the provincial department of agriculture of the province of Quebec and was told that there is no Dead Meat Act in Quebec. That is my first point. Further, today the minister when replying referred, I think, to the health regulations in Quebec. I was told by the same source in Quebec that there are no such regulations, or that those regulations are not in effect, and cannot prevent anyone in Quebec from placing tainted or contaminated meat on the market.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. McGrath: I submit that the minister has great responsibility in this field, as the regulations under Bill 31, the only legislation which affords any degree of protection to consumers under the jurisdiction of the province of Quebec, have not been proclaimed. In other words, there are not any regulations for protecting Quebec consumers. This makes it all the more necessary for the Minister of National Health and Welfare to discharge his obligations to the people of Quebec, obligations spelled out in the Food and Drugs Act, and give those people the protection they deserve as citizens of this country. I submit, without debating the point—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: —that the minister, as I have shown, misled the committee yesterday, and today stood in his place and, in replying to my question, misled the House.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the advantage of having before me a transcript of the committee discussions of yesterday, but I submit that if the hon. member were to read a little further on, and not stop where he stopped, he would see that I corrected that answer later in my testimony. I noticed that I should not have referred to the Dead Meat Act, but to the regulations regarding dead meat, which come under the Public Health Act of the province of Quebec. This is in the record; I remember having said that. I will check carefully, and if it is not there I apologize to the hon. member. There is a Public Health Act in force in Quebec which is chapter 21 of the Revised Statutes of Quebec, and the matter of dead meat comes under the regulations under that act. I will be glad to send a copy of them to the hon. member for his information.

To answer the hon. member's second point, we have the Food and Drugs Act available to us and certain dispositions have been made under the Food and Drugs Act. As I was saying last week, my officials have been active in this respect. It was they who initiated the investigation and the inquiries which are going on at present; I have nothing but praise and commendation for them and for the job they have done with such integrity. I hope hon. members opposite will consider this matter with a little more justice, towards those officials who are doing their best to protect consumers.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As a response of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) involved some misunderstanding, I am not raising a question of privilege.

Answering the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco), the Minister of Transport replied, as recorded on page 6055 of Hansard for May 23:

> Mr. Speaker, I think it is a general practice of all airlines to give names to travel agencies. I know that some passes have been given. I regret that the hon. member for Hamilton West is not here, because I think he was one of the officials of Heritage Canada and he might tell us how he travelled.

I do not know what the minister was driving at. Knowing how sensitive we all are in this House to innuendoes, I hope the minister will clarify this matter now, for my edification. If he has not facts to substantiate that I travelled with Heritage Canada, I respectfully ask him to withdraw his statement.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) is right; there was some confusion in the way I answered. I did not intend to imply that he was travelling free, with Air Canada, because he was a member of the society named. I always thought he was a member of that society. It is a respectable society; there is no doubt about that.

An hon. Member: Oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Do you think it is a respectable society?

An hon. Member: Ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner).

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I believe it is respectable, and I did not intend to imply that the hon. member abused any privilege. I think Heritage Canada charter aircraft for journeys abroad; I do not know if the hon. gentleman went abroad. Certainly, in these circumstances, the society has to pay the rate for charter aircraft.

There were two elements to the question asked of me by the hon. member for Kootenay West. One had to do about any possible relationship between Heritage Canada, the CTC and Air Canada. I think one vice president of Air Canada was on the advisory board of Heritage Canada, but I do not know anything about passes. I just said that it has been the custom for airlines to give passes to travel agencies. That was the question asked of me. I did not intend to imply that the hon. member benefited one way or another from that privilege.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, if I may pursue further the point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has recited his point of order; the minister has made his reply. It seems to me perfectly clear. I think that ought to dispose of the matter.

UIC—CASES HEARD BY ARBITRATION BOARD

Question No. 2,099—Mr. Laprise:

For the fiscal year 1973-74, how many cases were heard by the UIC arbitration boards and how many were decided in favour of the beneficiary for the (a) Montreal area (b) Province of Quebec?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Insofar as the Unemployment Insurance Commission is concerned: For the fiscal year 1973-74, 56 cases were heard by the Umpire of the Unemployment Insurance Commission in the Province of Quebec. (a) 7 were decided in favour of the claimant in the Montreal area; (b) 23 were decided in favour of the claimant in the province of Quebec.

UIC—MEDICAL CERTIFICATES

Question No. 2,160—Mr. Gauthier (Roberval):

1. What must be the average duration of an applicant's medical certificate to be entitled to the maximum sick pay benefits under UIC?

2. Is the medical certificate to be obtained by the applicant or the Commission?

3. What fees do independent doctors receive for such service?

4. Are independent doctors paid by the Commission and, if so (a) how are they chosen (b) by whom?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Seventeen weeks.

2. By the applicant.

3. The customary fee is that which prevails in the particular province.

4. Yes. (a) and (b) They are recruited by the district offices of the commission subject to acceptance by the senior medical advisor of the commission.

UIC—MATERNITY BENEFITS

Question No. 2,180—Mr. Herbert:

1. Are maternity benefits under unemployment insurance payable for a maximum eight weeks before the expected week of confinement?

2. Must a woman file ten weeks prior to the expected date of confinement in order that the mandatory waiting period be served before the specific maternity schedule commences?

3. For a woman living in Ontario earning $185 per week, submitting an individual tax return with standard deductions and entitled to maximum maternity benefits, what is her net after tax gain per week should she voluntarily choose to continue working during the eight week pre-confinement benefit period rather than draw unemployment insurance benefits?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Maternity benefits per se are payable from the eighth week prior to the expected week of confinement so long as the waiting period has been served and the claimant is entitled. However, where an incapacity originating from complications of a pregnancy is supported by a medical certificate and occurs prior to this eight week period, the claimant may qualify for sickness benefits up until that eight prior week, at which time, maternity benefits prevail. In any case the maximum payment for maternity or sickness benefit or a combination of the two is 15 weeks.

[Mr. Reid.]

2. The waiting period cannot be served until a claim for benefit is established, and benefits are paid only after the waiting period has been served. A woman who files a claim in the tenth week prior to the expected week of confinement may serve the waiting period prior to the commencement of the specific maternity schedule.

3. The working woman would receive $185 less $31 income tax for a net of $154. The claimant would receive $123 less $16 income tax for a net of $107. The difference between the two is $47. (This information was obtained from DNRT—Source Deduction).

ELECTRICITY EXPORTS TO NORTHEASTERN UNITED STATES

Question No. 2,445—Mr. Herbert:

1. Has the Department of External Affairs received any representations from United States concerning the projected Hydro-Quebec high tension power lines which are to carry exported electricity to northeastern United States?

2. Is the location and size of the line subject to formal agreement between the two countries?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The department has not received representations from the United States on this subject.

2. The location and size of a line for the export of electricity would not normally be the subject of a formal agreement between Canada and the United States. These matters are, however, subject to the authority of regulatory bodies in both countries.

USE OF AIRCRAFT TYPE GAS TURBINE ENGINE FOR NATURAL GAS TRANSMISSION

Question No. 2,452—Mr. Brisco:

Are aircraft type engines currently being used by the government or private industry for pumping natural gas in pipelines and (a) if not, is it proposed that aircraft type jet engines be used for such purpose (b) if so, what is the fuel consumption rate per (i) hour (ii) day (iii) week (iv) month of each such engine?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: Yes, the aircraft type gas turbine engine has been developed for industrial service. It is currently being used for natural gas transmission in the pipeline industry. (a) Not applicable. (b) The gas turbine engine fuel consumption will depend on several factors, such as the size of the unit, station location, altitude, calorific value of the fuel, operating efficiency, ambient temperature, volume of gas transmitted, etc. However, a typical 30,000 H.P. large aircraft type gas turbine unit will consume natural gas at the rate of about (i) 250,000 cubic feet per hour; (ii) 6,000,000 cubic feet per day; (iii) 45,600,000 cubic feet per week; (iv) 182,400,000 cubic feet per month.

Motion No. 47—Mr. Lawrence:

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SUGGESTED REVIEW OF INADEQUATE ESCALATION OF PENSIONS OF RETIRED EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 26. My reasons for asking leave to present a motion under that Standing Order are those which I gave when I sought earlier today to move a motion under Standing Order 43, so I will not endeavour to repeat them. Had that motion been accepted by the House, it would not have been necessary to offer a motion at this time.

● (1510)

Accordingly, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the announcement made recently by the Canadian National Railways to the effect that cost-of-living increases in the pensions of employees who retired prior to January 1, 1973, are to be minimal, and that there are to be no cost-of-living increases at all for those who retired in 1973 and in 1974, in order that this House may make it known to the Canadian National Railways that this announcement is totally unacceptable and should be reviewed forthwith, it being the view of this House that all pensions should be escalated at least by the percentage of the rise in the cost of living.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 26, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) gave notice to the Chair of his intention to move this motion.

While this is a matter of great concern not only to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre but to all other members of the House, I have insisted in the past that motions put forward pursuant to Standing Order 26 which seek the setting aside of special hours outside the regular hours of sitting of the House for debate of a subject must concern a subject which has inherent in it some crisis or emergency proportions by which action may be taken as a result of the discussion in the House, that would somehow remedy or improve the situation which has taken on emergency or crisis proportions.

The situation referred to in the hon. member's motion is a matter of great concern. However, I am sure the hon. member is aware it has been a matter of great concern for some time. Perhaps he more ably than other hon. members has taken advantage of a number of the procedures of this House to bring to the attention of the House the problem of the pensioners involved. Those occasions have presented themselves to the hon. member in the past, and they will equally in their infinite variety present themselves to the hon. member during the course of this and future sessions.

Therefore, on both grounds, first that the matter is one of continuing concern as opposed to emergency proportions and, second, that the hon. member will, I am sure, in common with some of his colleagues take advantage of other opportunities to bring this very serious problem to the attention of the House, I respectfully decline the setting aside of special hours for debate of the motion.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58

House in committee of supply to consider a certain item for the year ending March 31, 1976, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 58(9)—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

Industry, Trade and Commerce

Vote 1—Trade-Industrial—Operating expenditures—$67,157,000.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I would like to suggest, and I think I have the agreement of the representatives of the other parties, that in our proceedings in committee today we might follow the precedent that was established when my colleague, the Minister of Transport, was before this committee on his estimates, namely, that the discussion should be divided into 15 minute intervals during which a member can either use the whole of the time for speaking, or part for speaking and part for questioning, and that the minister at the conclusion would have an interval of approximately that time to conclude the discussion. I think these are the general principles that we found quite useful during the previous discussions when the Minister of Transport's estimates were before the committee.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, what the government House leader said at first is quite agreeable, but because of the shortness of the time I raise the question of summing up, unless there is an insistence on it, and even then I would not be too happy about it, because we will want to get in as many members as possible. I imagine the minister will be answering all the questions of those who are speaking. He will have every opportunity to do that. In order that all members may have a chance to participate, including members on the government side, I suggest that we eliminate both the closing statement of the minister and the closing statement of the first speaker who moved the motion.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I think it really depends on how the discussion goes in committee. If there are a series of speeches without an opportunity for the minister to reply to them, I think we should be prepared to allow some flexibility. I know my colleague is more anxious to get his estimates approved than he is to speak.

The Chairman: Order, please. Hon. members of the committee have heard the suggestion made by the President of the Privy Council which seems to be approved with the explanation made by the hon. member for Peace River. Is it agreed that we proceed in this way?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, with unemployment holding at well above 7 per cent of the work force, and giving clear indications of rising considerably above that figure as the year goes on, it is the responsibility of those of us who sit in parliament to examine the causes of the economic stagnation we are experiencing, and make positive suggestions for correcting it.

The basic reason for the slowing down of the economy has been the steady decrease in the volume of exports and the increase in the volume of imports that have been taking place during the past 18 months. The prices of our products have steadily become less competitive with those quoted by other countries, and the quality and design of our products have not been good enough to overcome this disadvantage.

During the month of April this deteriorating situation was temporarily halted by the erosion of the value of the Canadian dollar, which has, during this short period, made our exports more attractive in price, and imports from other countries less attractive in the Canadian market. However, this temporary help cannot be counted on to last for very long, and the dollar has already risen well above the level to which it dropped a couple of weeks ago. Therefore we must look for other remedies to correct our sick economy, and I suggest we examine three main approaches: first, increasing productivity; second, increasing industrial research and development; and third, lowering unit labour costs.

Taking a look at productivity we find that during the 28 years since 1947, when the government first started to measure it on an annual basis, industrial productivity in Canada has increased at an average annual rate of 3.2 per cent a year. Examining our performance since 1970, we find that in 1971 productivity increased by 3 per cent over 1970, or slightly below the average rate; in 1972 the increase was reduced to 2.6 per cent, in 1973 to 1.5 per cent, and in 1974 there was an actual loss of one half of one per cent. The present indication is that the slide will continue at about the same pace during the present year.

What can be done to increase productivity and thereby help make our products more competitive? To do so we must offer incentives which will persuade producers that they will be able to pay for the new plant, machinery, and production systems they will have to buy, in a reasonably short space of time, and in this way make it as easy as possible for them to meet the high expenditures usually involved. The kind of incentive I have in mind would be one whereby (1) all capital expenditures may be written off in the period decided upon by the plant owner; (2) a plant would be rewarded in the form of a generous cash bonus at the end of the year in proportion to its increase in productivity during the year, compared to the base year—the last full year before the plan goes into operation.

This form of incentive has been very effective in increasing productivity in such countries as Japan and West Germany where spectacular results have been achieved since the end of the second world war. There is no reason why such an incentive would be any less successful in this country.

In addition to price, we know very well that quality and design are also very important in making our products competitive. It is obvious that we must spend at least as high a proportion of our GNP on research and development as our chief competitors do, if we are to hold our own in this important field. To see how we have been doing in this regard as compared to our major industrial competitors, we should look at the latest figures published by the OECD. These show what percentage of its GNP each of these countries spends on research and development. The figures are as follows: United States 2.8 per cent; United Kingdom 2.4 per cent; France 1.9 per cent; West Germany 1.7 per cent; Japan 1.5 per cent; Canada 1.3 per cent. It is obvious that we have been doing badly in comparison to our major competitors in this regard.

To capture new markets which are looking for new and better designed products, and to reduce costs and become more competitive, it is obvious that we must carry out a great deal more research and development in this country. To bring this about we should allow industry to write off 200 per cent of the cost of current and capital expenditures on research and development in excess of those made in the base year—the last full year before the program is introduced. In addition to writing off the full cost in one year, it will put a considerable cash reward in the pocket of a company undertaking the research.

The kind of program I have outlined has been successful in significantly increasing the volume of industrial research in countries where it has been introduced, and will prove equally effective in Canada.

Finally, what can we do, in addition to increasing productivity, to reduce the labour cost of the products we must sell? There is a great deal of business which Canadian companies are unable to compete for because of low labour costs in the foreign countries where the products are made. If Canadian companies are to be able to compete for a good proportion of this business, and thereby obtain additional employment for Canadians, they must have an incentive which will enable them to reduce their labour costs on this potential new business to a level where they are within striking distance of these low foreign rates. Then, by accepting a lower than normal margin of profit on this extra business in order to get started, they can compete for these orders and stand a good chance of obtaining a reasonable proportion of them. What kind of incentive will do the job?

The government should say to all business—not just manufacturers and processors—that it will reward overall increases in employment during the year by way of an employment incentive which will be paid in direct proportion to the increases that are made. It is simply a matter of comparing the total number of man-years of employment by a company in the tax year under consideration with the last full year before the plan is put into operation—which will be the base year. The employment incentive would be paid in proportion to the increase in employment and the general wage level of the plant concerned, and the company will thus be able to calculate well in advance just what amounts of money it would receive for various increases in employment. This will enable Canadian businessmen to calculate in advance how much their labour costs would be reduced on additional business which the employment incentive would make it possible for them to go after. All such business obtained in this way will be a net gain for Canadian employment.

The three incentives which I have outlined will pay for themselves many times over in the years ahead, in the following ways: (1) We can drastically cut the present far too high expenditure on unemployment insurance by stimulating the economy and enabling people to find work. The potential in this regard is at least $1.5 billion of the $3 billion a year which we are at present paying out in unemployment insurance payments. (2) We can greatly increase tax revenues, because (a) more people will be working and paying income taxes; (b) more commodities will be sold, and will be paying additional commodity taxes, and (c) the increased volume of business will lower unit costs of production, and make available more profits to tax.

I think it is obvious that the government has shown great negligence in allowing our export trade to deteriorate seriously during the past 18 months without introducing the measures which were available to it for re-establishing the competitiveness of our products. It is equally obvious that the minister must take the primary responsibility for this sorry state of affairs, and has in no way justified the salary he is being paid as a minister.

I therefore move:

That Vote 1 of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce be reduced from $67,157,000 to $67,137,000.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether you would explain the rules of this debate in terms of the minister's time to ask questions or to respond to each speaker within the 15 minutes arrangement that has already been made.

The Chairman: My understanding is that each member is entitled to 15 minutes and has the right to take his whole 15 minutes without allowing time for the minister to reply. This is why there might be 10 or 15 minutes at the end, so that if the minister feels he needs that time to reply to some of the questions raised, or arguments put forward by members which he did not have the chance to reply to within the 15 minutes allowed all hon. members, he can do so.

Mr. Gillespie: You recognize, Mr. Chairman, that if every member takes his full 15 minutes it will be impossible for the minister to reply during his 15 minutes at the end to all the points raised. It is my impression, based on previous practice, that the minister has an opportunity following each statement either to make a very brief statement himself—and I mean brief—or to put a question for clarification purposes. In the case of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings, he has referred to a number of interesting ideas and, quite frankly, I should like him to give the House an elaboration, particularly regarding one idea he put forward.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order raised by the minister, the rules provide that each member may speak for 15 minutes. He can use this time to make a speech or to ask questions and receive answers. I have taken my 15 minutes to make a speech because I had some very valuable ideas to put before the minister. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the logical procedure would be that if the minister, as in any other debate, wants to say something about the ideas that are put forward by members on this side, then he should take one of the 15 minute slots provided to the government side, at whatever time he likes to do so, and use it as the 15 minutes allotted to him. As I understand it, the official opposition, on the proportion of time available, will get about four time slots, the Liberal party four time slots, and the other parties one or perhaps two. If the minister wants to take 15 minutes away from one of his own members, that is fine.

Mr. Gillespie: Let us be clear on this point, Mr. Chairman. These are my estimates. I have been asked by the House to defend these estimates and to answer the various points raised by hon. members. The hon. member from Prince Edward-Hastings has moved an amendment. It would be quite impossible for me to answer all of the various points that will be raised during this afternoon's debate if I am limited to 15 minutes at the end of the day. I ask for the indulgence of the committee that I at least be permitted to respond very briefly to each statement. I would think that is the practice of the House, and I should be recognized for that purpose when I stand following a speech such as the one made by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Mr. Hees: On the point of order, the rules we are following were established—

The Chairman: Order, please. Perhaps we should hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre at this point; I will return to the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, instead of spending a large chunk of the afternoon arguing over a point of order, why don't we follow the procedure laid down on the suggestion of the President of the Privy Council, on which you received the sense of the House, and that is that each member has 15 minutes to use as he wishes? The minister may say that these are his estimates, but this is an opposition day.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Lotbinière on a point of order.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and I do not see why today we should adopt a procedure different from that which was adopted under the procedures themselves.

[English]

The Chairman: There has been an agreement made. If the minister wishes to seek the floor at this time, he will be using his 15 minutes. If he wishes to seek the floor a second time, it will be after other members from the government side who wish to speak. That is in accordance with the agreement made for the debate on the transport estimates. In any case I feel that the minister should give it a try, and perhaps he can raise his point of order later since we are losing valuable time at this point. The minister cannot speak now without using up his 15 minutes. He could do so by unanimous consent, but there is no unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

The Chairman: Order. Before I recognize the hon. member on a point of order, I would like to read the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees).

[English]

It is moved by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings:

That Vote 1 of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce be reduced from $67,157,000 to $67,137,000.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to prolong this procedural question. I just want to say that it was not my understanding that the minister would not be permitted to ask a question or to make a very brief reply. The second point I want to make on the point of order is that the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings knows that I have a senior and strong delegation from the U.S.S.R. in the city at the present time, and that I am in the middle of a mixed commission meeting with them. I have had to leave that mixed commission meeting. I shall have to leave the debate this afternoon at about four o'clock, but I shall return at very close to five o'clock. All I am saying is that this was known to the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings—

Mr. Hees: That is right.

Mr. Gillespie: —and that it does seem to me that my rights as minister to defend my department have been seriously circumscribed.

The Chairman: Order. The minister can only blame himself because he was party to the agreement that was made.

[Translation]

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Longueuil on a point of order.

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Chairman, I do not accept at all the principle that the 15 minutes can be transferred to government or other members. Nobody in this House has the authority to transfer time accruing to each member, and I do not accept at all that procedure.

The Chairman: In any case, the hon. member for Longueuil was also present when the agreement was reached, and it was unanimously agreed that each member would be entitled to 15 minutes to use as he wishes, either to make a speech or put questions to the minister. Then, the minister may be recognized at any time, if he wishes to use his 15 minutes—he is in his right—whether he uses his time at the end of the debate is his decision.

[English]

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to grant the minister the indulgence he wants so as to give him the opportunity of speaking, providing it is understood that he replies to the questions I am going to raise rather than to those of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

I would tend to support the motion moved by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings if it were made retroactive, because I think that just about every minister of industry, trade and commerce that we have had in this country has been derelict in his duty. I do not know whether this is the fault of the minister we have had at any particular time or whether it is because of the advice the minister gets from his departmental officials, but I rather suspect that it is because of the advice he gets from his department. In any event, it is not our job to question that or know about it. After all, it is the minister who is held responsible in this House.

Wherever ministers have been getting their advice on economic and industrial policy in Canada it has been terrible, and almost invariably policy has been based on continentalism all the way through. Whenever we talk about productivity or the rationalization of industry, it is always rationalization with the United States.

The chickens are now coming home to roost. Up until recently, when the United States was fighting a war, there were tremendous demands by the United States for all kinds of products Americans could not produce themselves, so the problems in respect of foreign ownership and their consequence on our productivity were obscured. Now the United States is in a recession, and fortunately for humanity's sake the war is over. We are now beginning to see the consequences of foreign ownership in this country.

I should like to point to one industry, although I could point to many, to show that the effect of foreign ownership has not been a Machiavellian scheme to brainwash us or change our culture, but has been one of giving us an incredibly inefficient industrial structure. We see this everywhere we look; whether it is in respect of chemicals, rubber or electronics, the intrusion of foreign ownership in this country has prevented Canada from living up to its potential.

There seems to have been some kind of reverse alchemy at work which, in this country with all its advantages, natural resources, people and energy, has turned our gold into dust. They have reversed the process. We would have been better off without a Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce than having one that has led us into continentalism, whether in respect of the Canada-U.S. auto agreement or the rubber industry. We are now beginning to see what happens.

Most of us have received a petition from the Canadian rubber workers asking us to support increases in tariffs. This industry is in danger of going under. It is not as though the minister was not warned about the consequences of the situation. For years it has been pointed out that this kind of attitude on the part of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, with lack of coordination of regional development policy, foreign ownership legislation, and combines legislation, would lead to an incredibly inefficient rubber industry, almost totally foreign owned and inefficient compared to that of the United States.

The argument has always been that we have overcome this kind of inefficiency by low wage rates in Canada. Traditionally this is what we have done; we have overcome the inefficient structure of certain industries by paying our workers less than those in the United States. This cannot go on forever. The wages of our workers are now approaching those of workers in the United States, but our industrial productivity is not approaching that of the United States, and that is why the cry goes up that our workers are getting too much and are asking for too much. The fact is that they are not getting too much and they are not asking for more than their U.S. counterparts who are doing less work. But our industry is certainly not as effective as industry in the United States.

At the time we brought Michelin into Canada there was a warning that the rubber makers in this country would ask for tariff concessions. They got those tariff concessions to rationalize continentalism. The result is that production is being shifted to the United States. That is the consequence of branch plant economies. The minute problems develop in one country where the corporation originates the branch plant, that part of the world suffers, and we are paying the price of being a branch plant economy with this production shift to the United States. In spite of every give-away the Minister of Finance has been able to put forward, including concessions in the way of corporate taxes and write-offs to offset the DISC program in the United States, this production is being shifted out of the country.

There are many things that could be said and that I would like to say, but 15 minutes is not enough time in which to vent my anger about the insane policies pursued by the government. I do not think 15 minutes will be enough time for the minister to reply or to explain away generations of incompetence in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in directing industrial forces in this country. He is not going to have 15 minutes, but whatever time he has will not be long enough to accomplish that.

Since the minister has asked us to pose specific questions, perhaps he will have the courtesy to listen to those I wish to ask. The minister has said on many occasions that there is no such thing as industrial strategy. He laughs at the idea of an over-all industrial strategy. Instead of that he says we have sectoral strategy—we have specific strategies for specific industries. In view of the enormous layoffs in the rubber industry and the demands by workers in that industry for some tariff protection, will the minister tell the House today what is the strategy of his department regarding the rubber industry, and what he intends to do about providing jobs in that industry?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge is perfectly correct when he says I do not believe it is possible to devise and tailor a great big blueprint which might be called an industrial strategy for Canada. Indeed, I believe, as the government does, that the right way is to deal with each industry on a case by case basis. Each industry has particular requirements, particular constraints, particular opportunities, particular weaknesses and particular strengths.

In respect of the tire industry, my department has already entered into discussions with Canadian tire manufacturers, which the hon. member was quite accurate in describing as being largely if not completely foreign controlled. These companies have in the past seen their strategy in terms of North American strategy. What we are anxious to do is work with them to develop a rationalization and a more modern industry that will operate in terms of an optimum scale rather than with some rather small plants as at the present time.

The present situation is the result of a number of factors, partly related to the automobile industry itself. That is to say, the industry is suffering a very significant depression at the present time. The present situation is partly related to the fact that the Canadian tire manufacturers have not moved as rapidly as their parent companies toward radial tires. At the present time I think some 75 per cent of all tires going on new commercial or passenger vehicles are radial. There is not a capacity for radial tires here at the present time. I am told that a number of manufacturers have already started quite significant investment plans to modernize or convert their plants to radial tires.

The other reason for unemployment is that there is a heavy inventory of non-radial tires, which has to be seen in conjunction with the condition of the automobile industry at the present time. I would hope that by putting this particular industry on an industrialized and rational basis we will be able to work out with them a more efficient industry which will have a Canadian perspective rather than the kind of perspective it has had in the past, which is part of the North American strategy and has a "made in U.S." label on it.

Mr. Saltsman: I hope the minister realizes the damning nature of some of the things he has said. He has said that, given the recession which is taking place and the change in demand now for radial tires, the bulk of the investment and the first production has been in the United States while Canadians are being asked to work off the inventories of non-radial tires. We are supposed to take the brunt of this technological change. I suggest this is the result of branch plant economy. I am not suggesting it is unnatural for the United States to behave in this way. Their first interest is in the United States just as our first interest is in Canada. They are naturally going to look after their problems in the United States before they look after our problems in Canada.

I am encouraged to some extent by what the minister has said in that it would indicate he is at least aware of the problem. Up until now there has been a tendency to laugh and suggest that we are always talking about foreign ownership, blowing its consequences out of all proportion. There has been a tendency to say this has nothing to do with our problems, and that the best solution is to rationalize on the basis of continentalism. Apparently now there is at least some awareness of the situation.

How is the minister going to enforce on foreign corporations his suggested program for rationalization in Canada? What specifically is the minister proposing to these companies, and what kind of assurances and protections are being looked into in order to see that this kind of thing does not happen again where, when there is a problem, the United States looks after itself first, and then we are used as the overflow to catch up if there is any kind of a shortfall in their production?

Mr. Gillespie: I think the first point which should be made is that nothing will happen in the industry unless the industry itself sees there is a problem; that is, unless the Canadian industry sees that it is losing out relative to the tire industry of other countries. That is the first point with which we must deal. The second point is that it must be in their interest to invest in Canada because there is no way I know that the government can force them to invest. Clearly it must be in their interest. They have to decide that the market is growing and that there is an opportunity for them.

I think the third point is to make them aware of the problems that are likely to be realized if the industry continues to have as many separate plants as it presently has. I think that with the degree of scale that is now required, for every tire manufactured we will probably require fewer rather than more tire manufacturing companies in Canada. I think very likely there may be incentive programs already within my department which could assist them in this rationalization. The fourth lever I would suggest to the hon. member is the moral suasion lever. I think sometimes this probably is underestimated. I think most of the individuals managing these companies in Canada want to see their industry developed in tune with Canada's needs.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, the minister is not a naive person. I do not accuse him of being one, but what he is saying is absolutely incredible. He is saying that the government is not directly interested in this matter beyond moral suasion, and will depend on the companies and on the instinct of this industry to do it.

I am not questioning the good instincts of businessmen or their desire to be good Canadians. I am sure that is true. What I am questioning is their ability. They are locked into an archaic system from which they cannot break out.

Unless the Canadian government is prepared to move in and do something, then nothing will be done. How do you expect people who are competing with each other internationally in the rubber and tire industry, suddenly to get together in Canada and work out a system which is in the national interest? Surely this is a time when, much as we may be concerned about the particular interest of a company, we must be far more concerned about the national interest, and the only one who is in a position to determine that, and act on behalf of the people and make it stick, is the minister himself, and not some well intentioned president of a rubber company.

Mr. Gillespie: I can only take it that the hon. member is suggesting that the Canadian government nationalize this industry—

Mr. Saltsman: I just say "do something".

Mr. Gillespie: —that it acquire all the existing companies, nationalize them, and then tell its own industry where it should go. This is not the philosophy or approach of this government. Our approach is to work with private industry and show it that it is in its interest that what it does will be in the national interest, and therefore it will be in our interest. I think we have been successful in this and in other areas in this regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, since the minister seems to be in such high spirits this afternoon, I should like to give him the opportunity to show his mettle and ask him a few questions dealing with the textile and clothing as well as the furniture industry.

As the minister knows, both are major industries in our country, and especially in eastern Canada. The companies involved employ a large number of workers and they are faced with problems because of foreign competition. It is basically not a matter of dumping, but a matter of competition which companies find extremely difficult to face.

Moreover, if you talk with union leaders not of strike but of production, of satisfaction with working conditions, of the future of that industry, they will complain that they have no say when discussions are held. When I meet with the owners of furniture or textile plants, and there are several in my riding, they complain of not knowing exactly what is the overall policy of Canada with respect to textile or furniture.

On the other hand, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), as I told the minister in the House this week, sent a letter recently to a mayor from the St. Maurice Valley stating that the federal government was about to introduce an overall textile and clothing policy for Canada. To complete my question, the minister is aware of imports of some polyester and cotton fibres and other kinds of fibres from the Republics of Korea and Taiwan and a number of other countries, and the Textile Board was ordered to inquire into those imports. The results of those inquiries are in fact strictly provisional, but then again are not meant to pave the way for only an employment protection policy which has already been implemented in Canada, but also an overall policy designed to give the economy of those industries a new impetus.

I would therefore like the minister to tell me first of all if his department now has the required data to implement an overall policy on textile as well as clothing and furniture. Is his department aware of the situation in those plants? Is it aware of the fact that almost 50 per cent of the Quebec market is under the control of foreign markets in those areas of industry and trade. Finally, I ask the minister when he intends to announce an overall policy in this respect. As I said at the outset, those industries are the backbone of our economy, especially our Quebec economy. If they were to disappear, I believe we would have two or three times the current unemployment rate.

I am very much concerned about the future of these industries, remembering what happened with the shoemaking industry. The government acted there, but when that industry had disappeared. Therefore, my question is quite clear. Although it deals with complex and elaborate problems, I would give the minister the time to bring forward am answer hopefully encouraging not only to the owners of these industries, but also to the workers who, although intent on staying on the job, are extremely concerned about the future.

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Chairman, a great deal of work was done by my predecessor in respect of the textile policy for Canada. That work was done with the representatives of the unions and with the representatives of the companies in the textile industry. It took place over a period of probably two years. The background to that policy at that time was the fact that there was a real threat from the low wage countries of the world.

The textile industry, if we go back to about 1970 when the present textile policy had its beginning, was an industry which was characterized with all the typical features of a declining industry. Employment had been going down, wages were very low, and imports were increasing as a percentage of the domestic market. Many of the plants were rather old fashioned, many had not received any new equipment because of the declining situation. In many cases, managements were out of touch. They had not introduced new measures. Very little had been done with respect to design and fashion, and no real effort had been made to look at the export markets of the world because of the considerable defensive position of the industry toward imports.

The textile policy was announced in 1970 with the legislation which provided for the Textile and Clothing Board. The basic elements of the textile policy, which is now in place, are to provide an incentive to companies to modernize and make themselves internationally competitive. The instrument for that was the Textile and Clothing Board. The employers and producers have the option of going to the board and seeking support for various kinds of restraints which would be negotiated with the low cost countries—voluntary quotas, if you like—and the assistance of the Export and Import Permits Act supports this policy.

A considerable amount of investment took place as a result of that policy, and for the first time employment started to rise, not decline, and wage levels came up a little. I will not argue that wage levels in this industry approach the national average in manufacturing; I think they are still significantly lower, but they improved and the outlook improved.

Various other steps were taken to assist those who might be laid off as a result of the rationalization of smaller units into larger units. The background to all that was the low cost import.

Today the situation is quite different. It is still a situation where the low cost import can provide a considerable downward pressure on the Canadian market in terms of price, to some extent in terms of pre-empting part of the Canadian market, but it is not nearly the problem it was, relatively speaking, back in the early 1970's.

The real problem today is that industrial activity in the textile industry in Canada is down because the market is down. It is down because the distributing trades, the retailers and wholesalers, have been cutting their inventories, and so they have not been placing their orders with their regular Canadian suppliers. That situation has been aggravated by imports from abroad, not just from the low cost countries but as well from the industrial countries, such as the United States. That is a significant change in the situation.

We have introduced a large number of measures. We have put many of these products, in fact most, on the import control list to ensure that we have precise and up to date information on imports wherever those imports may come from. I have had a number of discussions with the industry's representatives, both labour and management, with respect to the state of their industry and their outlook for it. We have negotiated restraints, voluntary quotas if you like, with the countries of origin of many of these products.

So far as the textile industry is concerned, the situation in the short term at present reflects market conditions in the world and in Canada. I think the long term outlook for the industry is still strong and I expect the industry to pick up and to continue to grow. Indeed a number of textile manufacturers are making significant investments to the tune of $40 million and $50 million.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, before my time is expired, I would like to tell the minister about one disappointment. I hope it will not be ignored, but will produce positive results. One of the departments where communications and information are most important, as far as business is concerned, is Industry, Trade and Commerce. It has a particularly high number of complex branches and programs. Industry owners I know in Victoriaville, Princeville, Daveluyville, Warwick, Sainte-Croix are unanimous.

In other parts of Quebec also, I hear the same questions. Everytime I speak with those people, I am asked whether Industry, Trade and Commerce would not do such and such a thing, whether it could not help them know foreign markets so they can export. Can they be told what products are made in other countries?

Of course, this extremely important and worthwhile information comes from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I believe, Mr. Chairman, and I submit very humbly and very respectfully to the minister that there is certainly a gap in the information on the various programs available. This valuable and essential information which our constituent and especially the owners of these plants, need to develop their business has to be made available in our constituencies.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Mr. Chairman, I would like the minister to tell me whether he his aware of this root problem? I know that his departmental officials have this information, but if we put ouselves in the shoes of the businessman who can hardly manage to run his business, we find that he does not have the time to learn all about these various programs which are sometimes good and sometimes not so good, but which are always extremely important.

I am also well aware that by writing to the minister, we can obtain material such as the hon. member is now showing to me, but sending this material to the constituents involved does not necessarily solve the problem.

I should like to know not only what efforts the minister intends to make to publish information on those various programs, since this material already exists, but whether he intends to increase his staff or to improve his communication system so that the businessman may obtain everything he needs either to diversify his products or to promote the export of his production to other countries or to improve his own production in his own plant? I believe, Mr. Chairman, that I represent a highly industrialized constituency and that all my constituents have some grievances have some grievances or requests to make in this connection.

My question is very simple: Is the minister aware of this problem? Does he want the people to benefit as much as possible from the various programs of his department, and what efforts does he intend to make in this regard?

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Yes, Mr. Chairman, we certainly do. I agree with the hon. member when he says that it is sometimes difficult to sort out which particular program might be of assistance to a manufacturer or exporter.

We have a large variety of programs. For example, on the design side we have the Industrial Design Assistance Program on a cost sharing basis which assists, for example, furniture manufacturers to build or design new units. We have Fashion Canada which helps textile manufacturers on the design side. We have the GAAB Board which helps industries to restructure themselves. We have the Productivity Improvement Program, again on a cost sharing basis, which is aimed at assisting the management of these firms to improve their productivity and to make them more competitive. We have a program for the export market development which is aimed at assisting the self-starter manufacturer to find new markets abroad. Again it is on a 50-50 cost sharing basis. I would be very pleased to provide the hon. member with this information. Perhaps that would be the easiest way of satisfying him on this point.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: I think that the minister has not fully grasped my question. I am well aware of these different programs. However, I am not in a position to inform each and everyone of these industrialists, because I am not an expert in each of the fields concerned. What I am asking the minister, is what means he uses to ensure that such information be truly and well used by the industrialists. Can the minister dispatch a few of his officials to visit on location one of these furniture manufacturing plants, either Victoriaville Furniture, or Fonderie Sainte-Croix, which is one of the most important Canadian foundries and which is precisely in need of advice to diversify its production, in Canada as well as abroad?

Has the minister such services at his disposal to vulgarize and explain to the common folk the multitude of documents with which I am well acquainted? But not being an industrialist, I cannot explain all the aspects of each of these programs to the industrialists in my constituency. Can the minister, within his own department, intensify or even increase the number of experts to visit industrialists and encourage them not only to expand but also diversify and improve their production?

● (1610)

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: It is very intensive—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister but the time allotted to the hon. member has now expired.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Chairman, in my remarks pertaining to the estimates of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and as the minister has to leave temporarily on important business, I should like to review the responsibilities of this department with particular reference to the federal government and export trade.

The Canadian economy continues to be vitally dependent on international trade. Canadian exports of goods and services now account for about 25 per cent of gross national expenditure at market prices. The share of export trade in total national income has increased steadily since 1959 when it represented about 18 per cent of all goods and services produced in Canada. The Canadian economy, therefore, is becoming increasingly dependent, and therefore vulnerable, to fluctuations in external demand.

With the current economic slowdown in most major industrialized countries, international competition is intense, and increased exports are not easily achieved. A successful Canadian export trade can be assured by combining good products, efficient production, and aggressive, intelligent marketing, with government support.

Federal government support is provided mainly through the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Export Development Corporation. ITC assists Canadian industry from research, design and development through the production and marketing of the finished product. The EDC provides insurance, guarantees, loans and other financial facilities to assist Canadian exporters. The EDC is a Crown agency which reports to parliament through the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In addition to ITC and EDC, there are numerous other federal government organizations that are involved in Canadian export trade. Many of these other organizations are responsible to different ministries, and I want to make reference to this again before I close.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce was established in 1969 as a result of the merger of the departments of trade and commerce and of industry. The department has the responsibility for stimulating the establishment, growth and efficiency of the manufacturing, processing and tourist industries in Canada and the development of export trade and external trade policies. With respect to export trade specifically, responsibility lies with the senior assistant deputy minister of international trade.

Under the ADM of international are the ADM Export Development, Trade Commissioner Services, and the ADM International Trade Relations. Departmental units involved in international trade within ITC are the office of general relations, office of special import policy, export and import permits branch, the international bureaux, trade commissioner service, office of international special projects, financing and aid branch, grain marketing office, transportation services branch, fairs and missions branch, and the program office (export market development) which handles the administration of the program for export market development.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce's functions include: improving access of Canadian goods and services into external markets through trade negotiations; contributing to the improvement of world trading conditions; providing support services for industrial and trade development, including information, import analysis and tariff services; analysing the implications for Canadian industry, trade and commerce and for tourism of government policies related thereto in order to contribute to the formulation and review of those policies; and compiling and updating detailed information on trends and developments in Canada and abroad related to the manufacturing and processing and tourist industries.

The department operates eight regional offices located across Canada, and the trade commissioner service which has 82 trade offices in 57 countries. The minister also reports to parliament on behalf of Statistics Canada and the Export Development Corporation.

Boards and other organizations reporting to the minister are the General Adjustment Assistance Board, the Machinery and Equipment Advisory Board, the Pharmaceutical Industry Development Advisory Committee, the National Design Council, the Standards Council of Canada, the Textile and Clothing Board, the Preparatory Commission for Metric Conversion, and the minister's advisory council.

The Export Development Corporation, a Crown corporation, reports to parliament through the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and is empowered by federal statute to encourage, facilitate, and develop Canadian export trade by providing credit insurance, guarantees, loans and other financial assistance to enable Canadian exporters to meet international competition. The EDC, which succeeded the Export Credits Insurance Corporation in 1969, has its head office in Ottawa and district offices in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver. Direction of the affairs of the corporation is vested in a 12 member board.

The main functions of EDC are to insure the Canadian exporter against non-payment due to credit or political risks beyond the control of either the exporter or the buyer when export sales are made on normal credit terms. Almost all export transactions are insurable, not only those involving goods or technical services but also those involving invisible exports such as managerial services, advertising programs, the licensing or sale of patents, trademarks, copyrights, etc. Its functions are also to issue appropriate guarantees to chartered banks or to any person providing non-recourse supplier financing in respect of an export sale. Guarantees may also be issued in connection with a loan made to a foreign buyer for the pruchase of Canadian goods and services.

It also finances foreign buyers of Canadian capital goods and related services when extended credit terms are necessary and are not available from commercial lenders. Major engineering and other technical services—but not feasibility studies—may be financed, even when such sales are not related to the export of goods. It also has a function to insure Canadian investments abroad against non-commercial risks such as loss through confiscation, expropriation, war or revolution, or the inability to repatriate capital or earnings.

The General Adjustment Assistance Board administers the general adjustment assistance program. The program helps manufacturers take advantage of export opportunities arising from the Kennedy Round; assists manufacturers of textiles, clothing goods or footwear to improve their competitive position in domestic or export markets; and aids those who have been injured, or threatened with injury, as a result of Kennedy Round reductions of Canadian tariffs. Financial assistance is also made available in the form of government insurance on loans, direct loans and grants to manufacturers for restructuring projects necessitated by tariff changes. The board has members representing both private industry and government, and reports to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Tell us about the metric commission too.

Mr. Herbert: The objectives of the Standards Council of Canada are to foster and promote voluntary standardization in fields relating to the construction, manufacture, production, quality, performance and safety of buildings, structures, manufactured articles and products and other goods, including components thereof, not expressely provided for by law, as a means of advancing the national economy, benefiting the health, safety and welfare of the public, assisting and protecting consumers, facilitating domestic and international trade and furthering international co-operation in the field of standards.

A comprehensive statistical service on Canada's external trade is available from Statistics Canada, formerly the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. In addition to broad quantitative data published in monthly, quarterly, and annual reports covering import and export trade by commodities and countries, Statistics Canada offers a service of special tabulations of unpublished data in a variety of combinations to meet almost any specific need for export or import figures. The administrative head of the bureau is the Chief Statistician of Canada, who has the rank of a deputy head of a department and reports to parliament through the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Other federal government organizations and related agencies with involvement in Canadian export trade include the Agricultural Products Board, the Bank of Canada, Canadian Development Corporation, Canadian Grain Commission, Canadian International Development Agency, Canadian International Development Board, Canadian Transport Commission, Canadian Wheat Board, Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, Department of Communications, Department of External Affairs, Department of Finance, Department of National Revenue, Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation, National Energy Board and National Farm Products Marketing Council.

In addition to the foregoing, other federal government organizations and related agencies with indirect or peripheral involvement in Canadian export trade include Air Canada, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, Canadian Film Development Corporation, Canadian Government Specifications Board, Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, Canadian Patents and Development Ltd., Defence Construction Ltd., Industrial Development Bank, Inter-American Development Bank (Canadian Section), International Development Research Centre, Machinery and Equipment Advisory Board, Ministry of State for Science and Technology, (Bilateral Co-operation Division), National Design Council, Post Office Department, Preparatory Commission for Metric Conversion, Metric Commission, Tariff Board, Telesat Canada, Textile and Clothing Board, Uranium Canada Ltd., and the Interdepartmental Committee on External Relations.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think the parliamentary secretary is asleep.

Mr. Herbert: The Canadian economy is extremely sensitive to fluctuations in international demand for Canadian exports. A successful Canadian export trade can only be assured by combining efficient production and marketing together with government support.

Mr. Clermont: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: I recognize the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, an hon. member said that I was taking a nap. I strongly protest against such an insinuation. I know the member represents Grenville Carleton and he is Mr. Baker.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I apologize to the hon. member. I accept that he was not asleep. It was just that from the position of his downcast eyes it looked as if he was asleep. I do apologize.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, I have yet to see a member of the House read a document with his eyes on the ceiling. It so happens that reading one was exactly what I was doing.

[English]

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Chairman, may I say, after that little pleasantry, that I intended in my remarks to identify some 20 federal organizations and related agencies with direct involvement in Canadian export trade. It is clear that the focal point of federal government activity in export trade centres on the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Commerce. However, there has been an increasing tendency for other government departments to become involved in Canadian export trade. I will be interested to hear the minister's comments on the part played by his department in co-ordinating the activities of the groups that I have enumerated.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Chairman, it is great to follow a penalty killer. It gives one a chance to review what one intends to say. I should like to add a few remarks to what my colleagues have said, during consideration of the estimates of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce which are now before the committee. The minister is meeting a Russian trade delegation and was kind enough to let us know in advance that he could not be present for all of today's debate. We wish him well in his deliberations.

Today the Standing Committee on Industry, Trade and Commerce lunched at the Bank of Canada. When I came out, after the meeting, I was accosted in front of the Bank of Canada by a panhandler who asked for a handout of 25 cents.

An hon. Member: I bet you turned him down.

Mr. Kempling: This shocked me. That people are panhandling openly in front of the Bank of Canada may be a sign of the times.

Like many Canadians, I am deeply disappointed with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I am disappointed at his lack of energy, imagination, and leadership in the many fields of trade and industry. His efforts could be best described as a holding action—holding on for dear life, holding on and hoping for some economic miracle that will reverse the dangerous course we are now travelling.

We are paying today for the patched up programs, the ill-conceived plans and decisions taken in the past few years. We are paying the price for poorly thought out programs which were put into effect with much fanfare and publicity. The minister gives the impression that he is dealing only with shadows; he never seems to come to grips with the substance. The minister has a standard, stock answer to any question regarding industrial initiatives: "My officials are studying the matter." This usually leads to the hiring of a private consultant who recommends the establishment of yet another alphabet program under the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Then again if you ask the minister a question about industry or trade, he reels off programs called PAIT, DIP, FLIP, FLOP or SLUSH, or other programs which have been put in place. I do not intend to make light of these programs—SLUSH is the name that amuses me. Many of these programs existed for many years, and they still exist. Many of them are ineffective, or not properly oriented. At best they are marshmallow programs. They have all the impact and impression on our industry of a marshmallow. We need industry programs which go further than the handing out of grants. All that program directors do consistently is publish a multi-coloured booklet.

I submit that what we really need are basic decisions as to where our industry and trade are to head in the years to come. We need some short-term immediate action which will be part and parcel of a long-term plan. We need a minister who will fight like hell for industry.

An hon. Member: That is precisely what we now have.

Mr. Kempling: We do not have such a minister now. We need a minister who will pound the table for a capital cost allowance which will compensate for inflation, and who will work with his colleague who is responsible for the finance portfolio for the establishment of an allowance or adjustment which will apply to inventories in place, as present allowances or adjustments do not allow for replacement cost of those inventories.

In short, we need a minister who will bite the bullet, and face the facts of foreign investment legislation in Canada. The fog created by the Foreign Investment Review Board has effectively frightened away investment. The minister is encouraging joint ventures in Canada, but waffling on phase two of the foreign investment legislation. He has failed miserably to put into effect a long-term program to develop a secondary industrial base in Canada. We continue to trade off resources for finished goods.

The minister has made many confusing statements about an industrial strategy, that range from his view that he does not think it possible to develop an industrial strategy in Canada to his statement that he may have 18 or 19 different sectoral strategies. I hope the coming months will show us a little bit about what these strategies are.

The minister is urging Canadian businessmen to go outside Canada, open joint ventures in developing countries, and export back into Canada. His colleague, the Minister of Finance, upon returning from the Middle East, announced recently that Canadians should seek out joint ventures in the Middle East countries.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce when cornered always falls back on that old chestnut that Canadian businessmen are not venturesome, that they are not innovative, and that they are not willing to go out and seek business. Well, let me say that people in industry are sick to death of hearing that story.

The plain truth is that we have a minister who, as the press noted recently, is barely keepling afloat. He is a very average minister, or should I say a barely average minister, a nice guy who likes to philosophize and pontificate about industry and trade, and who loves to use a lot of commercial buzz words.

He is the sort of front-of-the-bus, middle-of-the-road, back-of-the-church fellow who lives in the hope that some miracle will rescue him from his dilemma.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: Let us take a look at a few industries that clearly illustrate what I am talking about. The automotive parts industry has had a trade deficit with the United States for ten consecutive years. Last year the deficit was in excess of $2 billion. The minister says this is because the U.S. auto industry is down. Well, it certainly has not been down for the last ten years. The minister has done next to nothing since assuming his portfolio to change this picture.

For years the Americans have endeavoured to make the auto pact a true bilateral agreement. The pact is bilateral from their side and multilateral from our side. As a result of failing to come to grips with this problem, over one and a half billion dollars has been invested in an automotive industry in Brazil, with another billion slated for that country by 1977. Mexico, Argentina, and Venezuela are all building automotive industries. In fact by 1980, automotive production in Brazil will outstrip ours in units produced. We are importing more and more automotive components into Canada from other than North American sources. We are becoming a pass-through assembly operation, and that is tragic. The North American automotive market is being diluted more each year, and our automotive parts industry is dying on the vine.

Take a look at the rubber industry. The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge made some remarks and asked some questions about that. I heard the minister's answers. I was not particularly impressed by them. This industry employs 18,000 people. More than 2,000 have been laid off with little chance of being rehired. We see this industry, which serves a market that consumes 20 million tires a year, being strangled by on-again-off-again tariff policies, and by imported tires. In the past three years we have imported 33 per cent, then 45 per cent, and in 1974, over 60 per cent of the tires we consumed. I will back off on the 60 per cent to this point. We know there were a couple of disastrous strikes in that year, but the fact is that the trend is there. We are importing more and more of the tires we consume in this country.

We only produce half the radial tires required for original equipment production on automobiles and trucks. The tire industry is waiting for some assurance from the minister that he won't give it all away at the GATT meetings in Geneva.

If you were the president of a tire manufacturing company and wanted to get the approval of your board of directors to expand your plant capacity or increase production, what chance do you think you would have if they have a gut feeling that the government is going to pull the rug out from under them at the GATT negotiations? How long can this industry wait for something positive from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce? We know that this industry employs 18,000 people and produces a sales volume of half a billion dollars. We know that they are producing under capacity today and that they can expand their capacity. We know that they have the labour skills, and we know that the market is there.

We also know that we have government in power that does not want to come to grips with inflation or inflationary expectations. We know we have a government in power that is directly responsible for the labour unrest in this country; a government that is overstocked with unimaginative, do-nothing ministers who refuse to face reality. What does the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce propose to do? He suggests we form joint ventures in third world developing countries so we can produce in a cheaper labour market. What the hell is that going to do for unemployment in Canada? How the hell is that going to improve Canadian export trade?

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Kempling: The hon. member says shame. He should be ashamed of his performance.

What the minister should be doing is pounding the cabinet table for a full revision of our tax laws. He should be demanding action on capital cost allowances to reflect inflation. He should be insisting that we maintain the integrity of our currency. He should be setting forth in clear terms our foreign investment policy, and either state the government's clear position on phase two of that policy, or scrap it.

Joint ventures will not flow into Canada in enough volume to affect our unemployment, trade, exports, or balance of payments unless taxation, regulations regarding foreign investments, and capital cost allowances are re-examined, changed, and communicated in precise language. Without this kind of action we will languish in trade imbalances, continued high unemployment, balance of payments deficits, and our recovery from this current recession will lag behind our trading partners some of whom, I might add, have had the courage to take action. We are at a turning point, and what we do in the balance of 1975 and in 1976 will determine our economic activity for the next several years.

We have in our Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce the greatest expertise and talent of any country in the western world. Our GATT negotiators are the most knowledgeable and expert of the group assembled in Geneva, but what are they negotiating toward? Toward what plan are they negotiating? We have no long-range plan for industry in Canada. We have only short-term, ad hoc, patch-work programs; no real incentives to put our resources and labour skills to work on a long-term basis. This comes as no surprise to anyone who looks beyond the façade of glib answers and ghost-written speeches that tumble from the minister's mouth.

As the press acknowledged recently, the minister is treading water. I hope to God that someone will have enough compassion to toss him a rope before he goes under and drags the industry of Canada down with him.

Let us take a brief look at a few of our industries that are in varying degrees of trouble. Many of them are covered by programs. This is why I ask why they are not working. There is the rubber industry, textile industry, automotive production industry, automotive parts industry, feedstock for our chemical industry, the electronics industry, television production, shipbuilding which cannot operate without massive government subsidies, furniture, and footwear. I could list another half dozen or more. This is a pretty sad picture.

When I was in Europe recently I talked to some of the trade people there. The department some months ago sponsored a show for the furniture people in Europe. What do you think they brought over? Canadian designed Scandinavian furniture, chromeplated garbage. Those people are not interested in that. They wanted to see some really good Canadian wood furniture, but they did not get to see that. Somebody along the line muffed on that one.

All these industries are in trouble because the government lacks the basic guts to deal with the problems facing industry. The government refuses to deal with inflation, yet is hot on bilingual labelling. It puts in place foreign investment guidelines in clouded terms, then urges Canadians to seek out joint ventures. It has allowed our currency to float, which is inflationary, and has done nothing to improve the integrity of that currency. It pays out billions of dollars in unemployment benefits but has no meaningful retraining program and no industrial strategy through which retrained labour could be channelled.

There is a need for capital investment in Canada, but the government urges Canadian businessmen to form joint ventures in developing third world countries. It is obvious the government is adrift in an uncertain sea with no maps, no rudder and, worst of all, no captain.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Kempling: I see I have run out of time. Gee, I had a real good remark here, but you cut me off.

Mr. Cullen: On a point of order, the hon. member mentioned the furniture trade show outside this country and that particular operation. I know he did not do it deliberately but he failed to tell the committee that an outstanding success came out of this initiative. Sales were phenomenal and the furniture industry was very pleased with it.

Mr. Stanfield: May I say with all respect that that was clearly not a point of order. A man holding the high office of parliamentary secretary should not abuse the rules of the House.

Mr. Cullen: The reason for my point of order was that I knew the hon. member would want to correct his statement.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. parliamentary secretary knows he is entering into debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak today about a few matters which are now creating new economic and political situations and on which I would like to draw the attention of hon. members because, for my part, I believe that these matters are extremely important, particularly now when we are trying, by all available means, to fight inflation, unemployment and recession and are attempting to find the most stable economic balance possible.

My first subject concerns Canadian industries and foreign capital. To protect Canadian industry, the government has asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) mainly to control the investments of foreign capital in Canada to prevent this economic sector from being invaded by foreign interests and thus to prevent an uncontrolled take-over of our industries by foreigners. This position of our domestic policy is normal and commendable. Certainly, no one here will dispute the value of this policy.

However, we must realize that this type of decision also has certain drawbacks and often places certain industries which would need mixed capital to survive in serious situations. Unfortunately, Canadian capital is not sufficient to develop adequately our industries. Consequently, businessmen are tempted to seek foreign capital. But now, they cannot do so.

I can quote the recent example of a businessman in my constituency who was just refused such a privilege. Yet, had he been allowed to associate with English interests, his business would have developed to such a point that he could soon have doubled his staff. On the other hand, the government is doing nothing to stop Canadian industries from closing their plants in Canada and from moving to other countries where administration and production costs give them a greater margin of profits. Recently, two Victoriaville textile manufacturers announced that they would soon leave Canada for another country.

What is going to happen therefore, Mr. Chairman, if on the one part we prevent industries from developing with foreign capital and on the other part, we allow industries to leave this country? Unless we take rapidly the necessary steps, we shall inevitably witness the slow and last agony of our Canadian industry, which nobody here desires I am sure.

That is why I say: Let us promptly take care of this situation. Shall we broaden our regulations concerning foreign investment? Are we going to resort to incentives to persuade our businessmen to stay here and especially in Quebec? That problem should be dealt with in committees and suggestions from individuals, officials and groups should be studied so as to bring about a quick and efficient solution.

Mr. Chairman, the second question I should like to raise deals with the Industrial Development Bank. This bank, created about 30 years ago, has been of great assistance to the Canadian industry, there is no doubt about that. It was established to encourage Canada's economic prosperity by increasing the efficiency of monetary action through provisions of credit availability for industrial undertakings, by completing the activities on the part of other lenders and by providing help to the small enterprises encountering financing problems.

It is not my intention here to criticize the Industrial Development Bank as to what it was and what it was not, because I prefer dealing with its future. The possibility of making it a Crown corporation is being considered. As for me, I would like to suggest something else. It would seem logical to me and probably more efficient to link it to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and I will give explanations.

Up to now, the part played by the Industrial Development Bank, by reason of its working, was economic. It had to lend money, guarantee loans, acquire shares and put them back into circulation. And because it paid out of its revenue the interest on its bonds, its staff emoluments and all its administration costs, its financial constraints surely obliged it to show wisdom, looked upon as exaggerated by some people, at any rate to temper its spirit of enterprise and avoid risks as far as possible.

I personally know something about this for having helped on various occasions some of my fellow citizens who were trying to get its cooperation. The bank is quite willing to lend to expand a business, for example, but the borrower must prove that he cannot obtain funds elsewhere, that there is already enough capital in the business, and that others like it have invested or are about to invest in it.

I must naturally be convinced of the viability of the business because it bases the amount it may lend on the profit outlook. It is also quite willing to lend to straighten out a financial situation, but it must not be due to incompetence or mismanagement.

Mr. Chairman, it will easily be understood that all those requirements and limitations have affected the efficiency that this financial instrument could have had and they also led to help industries located in the richest provinces, especially those which needed it less, because the risk was smaller. That is why in 1974 the number of loans reached 34 per cent in Ontario, 33 per cent in British Columbia and 19 per cent only in Quebec, and 14 per cent in the Atlantic region. In other words, the provinces where industrial development leaves much to be desired were forgotten. If that development corporation were attached to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, it could be given a political as well as an economic dimension; like the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which gives more grants to underprivileged areas it could thus both benefit and have underprivileged areas benefit from it.

Furthermore, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce already has all sorts of mechanisms to help industry. So the different sectors could combine their efforts. For example, an owner faced with financial difficulties because of a lack of competence in management could first avail himself of the management program, that is the CASE program, which has the advantage of making available at minimum cost a service provided by retired businessmen selected for their experience in management. The owner could thus become eligible for loans from the bank.

Mr. Chairman, surely it will have been noted that my views and my suggestions were directed mainly to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie), and that is not by mere coincidence. Having served as Parliamentary Secretary to that department, I was able to fully appreciate its outstanding organization, the competence of those civil servants, the understanding and the communication among departments. I am therefore quite convinced that through that department we could answer both questions I raised today.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, may I challenge some of the statements of the opposition member who spoke before me. He said that the government and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce lacked imagination and ability; that is how far they went. But I shall ask that and other opposition members what they have to offer.

I listened to every speech this afternoon. We are about to complete consideration of the estimates of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and we heard nothing but criticism from opposition members. Mr. Chairman, I also had some criticism about the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but I did dig into the problem, I studied it to make efficient and positive suggestions. They have no program, no alternative. They say ministers cling to power but, Mr. Chairman, do they believe that they will come into office without any program or any alternative, and just tell Canadians: Now, we shall take the place of the Liberal party. We are Progressive Conservative members and we have no program. We do not have anything to say, we just utter criticism.

I ask the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) especially, since he was the first critic of his party, to listen to me. I was extremely patient in listening to him moments ago, but he actually did not play the role which the opposition should play in this House.

What is aimed at, in this House, is playing partisan politics to have Canadians believe everything is wrong in Canada. Repeating this does no good, because the press gallery is much more receptive to criticisms, as is evidenced by the press reports we read at night before going to bed. We have trouble going to sleep because we read only bad news about Canada, nothing ever would go right.

In effect there are lots of good news. No reference was made to Statistics Canada's last figures on our balance of payments. According to the last figures, our balance is in a surplus position this year. There was no mention of that. Not a word. I submit to hon. members on the other side that although I can criticize within the Liberal party, I am also capable of introducing efficient solutions. If the opposition were to fulfill its true role, it should tell the people: "There is such and such a program. Make use of it, even if it is not perfect. If we gain power, we will change it in such and such a way." This is what the opposition should do, but it does not.

I believe, not as a government member but as a member of parliament, that every hon. gentleman here should double up as information officer to the Canadian public. We have programs. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) announced recently the new shipbuilding industrial assistance program. This program became permanent,—you said earlier we have nothing but temporary measures—the STAP, after an experimental stage, is now the SAP. It became a permanent assistance program to the Canadian shipbuilding industry. Small manufacturers, who are most in need of assistance, are not told about the program that can help small enterprises, as in Quebec for instance, to obtain the expertise they need to rationalize their management, to rationalize their marketing, so that these industries become viable. That is what it is to be a member of this House, period, not a member of the opposition or a member on the government side. That is what I reproach particularly the members of the Progressive Conservative Party with. I believe that the real role of the opposition must be one of cooperation. I readily admit that we should criticize, but it should not be the only thing we do. I have been in this House for many years, almost 13 years, Mr. Chairman, in many occasions I have had the opportunity . . . The member over there who shouts behind the curtain, Mr. Chairman, probably regrets having failed to make suggestions earlier when he was speaking!

The Assistant Deputy-Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

[English]

Mr. Ritchie: Madam Chairman, in the short time allocated to me it is impossible to give anything more than some small facts about selected areas of our over-all trade problem. Everyone knows that Canada is now faced with the highest imbalance of payments in its history, or at least within the last 25 years, both in actual dollars and real dollars. The obvious reason that the budget has been delayed until June 23, when the government side is so anxious to get out and get home, is that it does not know how to deal with the present combination of rising costs, inflation, and high unemployment.

Furthermore, the Department of Finance is obviously having difficulty forecasting the way in which events will unfold during the summer months. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce seem to be taking refuge in the hope that there will be an upturn in the economy, and particularly in the world economy. But most business forecasts from the United States are bleak. For example it is said that from the business statistics through early May it is not possible to forecast an early upturn in the economy.

The Japanese government is considering changing its two-year policy of tight money "in view of an acute slump in industrial activity in recent months". The West German government is expecting a delayed economic recovery as a result of the world trade recession. It seems probable that the government will stand aside and let the market system operate. This is an expensive answer in terms of unemployment, lost production, and a squeeze on profit.

Much of our troubles, which are certain to get worse before they get better, can be traced to the government's action, or I should say lack of action, in the export field. Our troubles can largely be traced to the government's reaction to our greatest trading partner, the United States.

The history of our trade with the United States is a long and involved one, but I think to some extent the present situation between our two countries can be likened considerably to the trade wars that developed in the thirties. It brings sharply into focus the exchange of views between Mr. Porter, the Unites State Ambassador, and our Secretary of State for External Affairs. Mr. Porter maintains that whatever the relationship between our two countries, it would have to be something special in this world. In other words, because of our close proximity we must have an unusual relationship. But the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that there is no special relationship, and he is also quoted as saying that special relationships no longer serve either of our best interests.

I now wish to talk about this special relationship in the matter of trade and energy. The government told us it was going to conserve oil, first by raising its price to the Americans and thus discouraging them from buying it, and then by phasing out exports to the United States altogether.

Earlier this month the government reversed itself and cut the price of light and heavy crude oil exports by 80 cents a barrel in order to make Canadian oil more competitive and, incidentally, improve our balance of payments situation. It is obvious that the government is contradicting itself because it has not acted to develop a comprehensive new policy in trade and energy. It is not going to be too long before we reap the whirlwind, and it is going to lead to more unemployment and more inflation.

The decision of the Canadian government to introduce the two-price oil system in 1973 has become more and more a problem. The addition of the export tax of $5 a barrel to the Americans, and the use of this money to finance a subsidy to eastern consumers to offset imported oil at $11 a barrel, has resulted in Canadian oil becoming the highest cost source of oil imports to the United States.

When the government served notice last November that it would phase out exports from a million barrels a day to 650,000 by July, 1975, and to none in 1984, the Americans began looking elsewhere for supplies. Even oil seems to be capable of being priced out of the market. For April, instead of the 800,000 barrels a day authorized, only 600,000 were exported. Canadians thus became a net importer of oil as eastern Canada is importing at a rate of 820,000 barrels a day. Canada is not now making enough on the oil export tax to cover the subsidy to eastern consumers so dependent on imported oil.

Canada has a capacity to produce two million barrels of oil a day with the possibility of exporting approximately one million barrels, but because Ottawa has been so single-minded about curtailing exports to the United States the industry has been forced to shut in 400,000 barrels a day. Investment money is locked in, earning no returns, and thus reducing money available for exploration and development.

This is one area in which the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce must exert itself, and decide what it is going to do about exports in order to earn badly needed foreign exchange. This is the only country in the world to show a decrease in 1974, with a further decrease forecast for 1975. The fact that Ottawa has cut the price of export crude is the first indication that the government is slightly aware of the mess it has spawned. We are losing exports, income and jobs very quickly.

We need a real conservation policy within the country, and this is where the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce should be active. We have to consider an increase in the price of domestic oil whether we like it or not, because this will give conservation a real thrust. We must once more consider our industry and our economy in terms of the rest of the world so far as energy prices are concerned. There should be some tax relief for the oil industry so it will have more money and incentive for exploration and development.

Having regard to its balance of payments difficulties, the President of the United States has ordered another $1 tax per barrel on imported oil, and Mr. Ford's energy program is based on the rather practical and simple theory that higher costs will reduce consumption and price control on domestic oil will encourage more production.

This price increase is aimed directly at Canada, designed to shut out our exports as well as those of other exporting nations. Surely the United States would agree to a supply of oil at a maximum amount per year well into the future. We should aim for this. This should not be so high as to endanger Canadian production. Indeed, it makes sense to export to the United States if we continue to import offshore oil.

The abrupt cessation of oil exports is one of the major causes of our dollar weakness versus the U.S. dollar. The government miscalculated when it felt that the amount of U.S. dollars available for capital inflow did not occur because of the overloading of the U.S. bond market.

In order to facilitate an over-all trading climate with the United States, government policy should be directed toward maintaining the Canadian dollar at close parity with the U.S. dollar. The strong trading linkages between Canada and the United States are what lie behind the two currencies being close to parity. When the economic performances of the two countries differ, as they do now, the danger of a fairly severe exchange rate fluctuation arises. The U.S. economy may not be performing as well at the moment, but it is bringing inflation more quickly under control.

The threat of wage-price inflation is a particularly severe one in respect of our trade imbalance. Devaluation, although supporting trade, could ultimately provide continued support for unrealistic rates of wage, salary and price growth. If devaluation were combined with an attempt at wage and price controls, the outlook would be very serious. Canada will need to attract large amounts of capital for our huge energy needs in respect of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. Therefore, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce should decide whether it wants to proclaim the second part of the Foreign Investment Review Board measure or forget about it, as has been suggested.

Furthermore, a reasonable accommodation with the United States should reduce the influence which the application by El Paso Gas to transport natural gas from Prudhoe Bay to the continental U.S.A. instead of using the Mackenzie Valley pipeline will have. In this way that influence will be blunted. At the present time the main argument of El Paso is that the Canadian administration cannot be trusted. I suggest it is most important that a decision be made in respect of this matter. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has not grappled with this problem of exports, and the problem in respect of exports of oil to the U.S. is most serious, and one of the most important ways, properly handled, to improve our balance of payments position, and in the long run provide a more acceptable solution.

Mr. Gillespie: Under the rules of this debate, Madam Chairman, it is going to be very difficult for me to respond to all the points that have been made this afternoon. I will do my best to cover at least some of them.

In the opening statement of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings he referred to R and D, and productivity, and seemed to imply that my department was not interested in sponsoring research and development, or productivity. I would remind him that the program for the Advancement of Industrial Technology, PAIT, and IRDIA are both fundamental to the support of research and development in Canada. I would remind him that the Program for Industrial Design Assistance is directed toward another aspect of innovation, that is to say, better designs which will sell in Canada and better designs which will sell abroad. I would refer to Fashion Canada, which is a specific program aimed at the clothing and textile industry.

There are other programs which have research and development content. The Program for Defence Industry Productivity has a very important research and development element. Under that program a very significant and new technology has been developed in Canada. I am referring to the D.T.6 and the jet version of that engine produced at U.A.C.L., which has given Canada world leadership in this particular family of motors. I would also refer to the 50-passenger Dash-7, the prototype STOL aircraft which has every promise of being a world leader in its particular category.

I should like to refer the hon. member to a number of other programs because the suggestion was made by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth that we were not interested in producing new programs, and that our programs were all old. I should like to remind him that this is indeed far from the fact. He should be referred to the new changes in the GAAP program, the General Adjustment and Assistance Program, aimed at widening benefits for Canadian manufacturers and those in the service industries who service those manufacturers.

I would like to draw to his attention the new program for the footwear and tanning industry that was introduced about a year ago, and CASE, the counselling assistance for small enterprises that was introduced about a year ago in the House. After a period of development more than 1,000 field workers are now operating across the country and in every province.

I would remind the hon. member that the old shipbuilding program has been replaced with a new program tailored to new needs. The shipbuilding industrial assistance program is aimed at ensuring that that industry will be internationally competitive. It has a built-in incentive for modernization. There are many other programs aimed at assisting Canadian industry to increase its productivity. I referred to several of these in reply to a question by the Social Credit member in respect of the textile industry. There are programs with respect to productivity improvement in the pharmaceutical industry where there is a development assistance program. I have already referred to the Defence Productivity Program and the Industrial Design Assistance Program.

A question was raised by the hon. member for the Social Credit Party concerning what we were doing to ensure that this constellation of programs which are there for the assistance of private industry is made known to private industry. I should like to state that we have intensified our efforts in many ways. For example, we have opened regional offices of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in all provinces across the country.

This government has created the Federal Business Development Bank, which bank will be in business within a very short period of time. I have indicated in the House previously that this bank is more than just a financing institution, which is what the industrial development bank still is. It is an institution which will provide consulting services, management consulting services, to the owner-managers, and which will take over the owner-manager training programs previously undertaken by the Department of Manpower and Immigration, and the technical services which are made available to small businesses by N.R.C. It will provide information services through some 60 different branches across the country. That seems to me to be a constructive way to tell the story and make available to the small businessman the information he can use to make his particular business more competitive or more productive.

I believe it is also important to deal with some of the other questions concerning trade. I could give a long catalogue of the activities this department has initiated over the past year. They are very substantial in terms of outgoing and incoming missions. Something close to 100 incoming and outgoing missions will have been completed in the year 1974-75. In addition there were 51 international trade fairs, exhibitions and seminars abroad in which the department participated and made available to small and larger businesses across the country.

The program for export marketing development has assisted over 3,600 companies since its inception. The pay-off on that program has been remarkable. The cost-benefit ratio for this program is indeed in the order of 40 to one. As a result of this program there have been new sales which otherwise would not have taken place in the order of close to a quarter of a billion dollars, at a modest cost to the Canadian taxpayers of $6 million. As I say, the ratio is 40 to one.

We have had more intense activity than ever before in terms of ministerial missions to the newly developing countries and to the potential industrial market for Canada. I am referring to Brazil, Mexico, Cuba, Venezuela, the Middle East countries, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Lebanon and Iraq. We have had missions between Canada and the EEC and between the EEC and Canada. We have had missions to Japan. The role of my department has never been greater than in the past year. In saying all this I think it is important to realize that the government cannot deliver or close a sale with regard to an export opportunity.

It is the responsibility of the government under our system to make available to the private sectors the opportunity to close a sale. We can provide the incentives and the opportunities, but we cannot close a sale. To take the line of the NDP spokesman it would seem to me he would find the solution to industrial problems in Canada by a nationalization. That is not our approach. We think the private sector in the last analysis is the sector that will have to deliver. We are prepared to support those who have shown self-help and those who are the self-starters.

There have been references to some of the industries that are in difficulty at the present time. We are concerned about those industries and are anxious to help them. I have already referred to the action in respect of the rubber and tire industry, and what we are doing in relation to the textile industry in respect of both management and labour as well as the Canadian Textile Institute. I have referred to the action we have already taken in respect of imports which are distorting the Canadian market at this time.

I should like to make the point that our approach has been to deal with specific industrial problems on an industry by industry basis rather than as a broadsweeping generalization which really would not get to the heart of the problem. That is the reason why the industrial strategies approach is important. It zeros in on specific industries for specific purposes.

The auto industry is in difficulty today. It would be in much greater difficulty had it not been for the strategy applied in respect of that industry in the mid-1960's. I refer, of course, to the auto pact. Since the auto pact was signed the percentage of Canadians working in the auto industry in North America has increased each year. Investment has increased in Canada over levels that would not otherwise have taken place had it not been for that auto pact. The price differential has narrowed. The auto industry is in difficulty, but by taking an industry approach I think we have served Canada well because we have a more internationally competitive industry which, even though it is hurting, is not hurting as much as its competitors south of the border at the present time.

We have taken the same approach with respect to the shipbuilding industry—I have referred to that already. We have taken the same approach with respect to the footwear industry, and we are presently working with the furniture industry in trying to provide for them a rationalization assistance, clearly providing the over-all perspective, the over-all climate, saying to them, "What are you prepared to do?" because in our system it seems to me that the companies themselves have to take action; we cannot legislate what each particular company will do. We can provide the incentives and the assistance, as we have done and will continue to do.

I think I am close to the end of the time allotted to me, but I would like to reiterate what I said at the beginning, that we are emphasizing research, development, and productivity, we are emphasizing export opportunities, and what we ask of the Canadian private sector is that they seize these opportunities and make use of them. We cannot do it for them, but we sure as hell will help them.

Mr. Leggatt: Madam Chairman, I was most interested in the comments of the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth—I see him behind the curtain—who suggested that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce should be ashamed of himself because he has frightened away foreign investment with, as he said, the fog of the Foreign Investment Review Act. I also believe the minister should be ashamed of himself, but that is not the reason, in my view, for which he should be ashamed of himself. He should be ashamed of sitting here and presiding over the continuing takeover of Canada by foreign corporations, and of failing to introduce to the House meaningful foreign investment review legislation which would stop the continuing erosion of Canadian sovereignty caused by the takeover by foreign investment. What has been going on in this country is nothing short of a scandal. The minister must take the responsibility for it because it is his department that is supposed to be administering that legislation.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Tell the B.C. government to sell their products in Canada instead of selling them in the United States.

Mr. Leggatt: I would be perfectly happy to say that to all the provincial governments in this country, all of which have copped out on the major issue of protecting Canadian sovereignty. I am much more interested in listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Windsor West who makes the same point over and over again, and who wishes the minister could come forward with what his report really meant, and give to Canada the kind of leadership that many other countries in the world have embarked upon a long time ago.

According to the latest count we have about 90 takeover bids, 80 of which have been approved. Let us look at some of these. In this country 99 per cent of the petroleum industry is foreign owned. One of the recent approvals is for Pacific Petroleum Limited of B.C., controlled by Pacific Petroleum of the United States, to take over Wizard Oil Limited of Montreal. This legislation sets forth ten separate criteria. The last of those criteria—that is one out of ten—is that the takeover be compatible with the industrial and economic policy. How in heaven's name is the Foreign Investment Review Agency to justify the taking over of the last tiny percentage of Canadian ownership in the oil industry on the basis of significant benefit for Canada?

That is why I say this legislation has become a farce, a laughing stock among those many people in the country who are finally waking up to the fact that Canadians are independent and that we have a sovereignty to protect. We have to stop selling ourselves out for every buck that comes across the border. One of the reasons why we have high real estate prices in British Columbia is that 67 per cent of the new investment has not been domestic but has come in from Hong Kong. It has driven our cost of land up to a tremendous degree.

I do not want to run through the litany of foreign ownership. Making an investment in this country right now is as hard as joining the Book of the Month Club or passing a skill testing question after you have joined a supermarket contest. There is no real review mechanism at all, otherwise we would not have these ridiculous takeovers being continually approved.

I want to ask the minister several questions before I sit down because I think they are significant in terms of where we go in administering the present legislation. First, what are the reasons for the decisions that are given by the Foreign Investment Review Agency which are published, and can those reasons for the decisions be appealed, or does the public have access to them?

The second question is one regarding good corporate citizenship, one of the criteria that the Foreign Investment Review Agency uses. I refer specifically to the Reed Group paper company takeover of the Alpha Group when the Reed Group has continually been polluting the Grassy Narrows Indian Reserve with mercury, yet this does not seem to affect the decisions that are made. I do not know whether there is interdepartmental consultation about the corporate citizenship of those who are applying for approval of takeovers.

Third, how many corporations have received the advice that they are deemed to be Canadian corporations without having to go through the review mechanism? Also, how many have received advice on how to get around the provisions by the simple expedient of changing their stock or reducing their capitalization below the reviewable amount?

Mr. Gillespie: On the first question which the hon. member asked regarding the reasons about the decisions not being published, I should like to make two points. First of all, we are providing information on how the particular transaction meets the criteria in the act. Each time I announce the cabinet's decision with respect to allowances and disallowances, we publish a schedule which shows all the companies for which an allowance was given. I think there are something like 90 different colums, and we indicate how that particular transaction met the particular criterion. If it meets it, there is an indication.

Also, we have been trying to provide more information on some of the major transactions so that the public can understand what the benefits were that were negotiated in rather more specific terms. For example, in the Reed-Alpha transaction which the hon. member mentioned there was a considerable amount of information given. I am speaking from memory but, as I recall, the transaction will result in close to 2,700 new jobs in northwestern Ontario. That is because as a result of that transaction and what it involved, which was a vertical integration on the part of a purchaser of a distributing organization, he was prepared to go ahead and make a major investment in Northern Ontario. There is interdepartmental consultation, of course, with respect to this transaction.

To answer the last question of how many companies have been given binding rulings with respect to their eligibility or non-eligibility, I do not have the number at my fingertips but I think it is something like 20, and I can check that. I can assure the hon. member that there has not been the kind of jiggery pokery he implied in his question. We are interested in real control, not the cosmetics, the point being that if a company has, for example, a 15 per cent foreign share ownership we will look at that very closely, although it is a long way from 51 per cent, because it is possible in certain circumstances that 15 per cent could be controlling. If it were, of course, that company would be found to be a non-eligible person.

The second point in that connection is that these rulings are subject to two things—they are firm for two years only, and of course binding only if there is no material change in the circumstances of the particular corporation.

Mr. Leggatt: Madam Chairman, I should like to point out to the minister with regard to the Reed Alpha group takeover that Reed Alpha had been fined previously approximately $25,000 under the Combines Investigation Act, as I understand it. The effect of that takeover will be to dominate the pulp and lumber market and will provide the government with a further problem of more investigation under the Combines Investigation Act to see whether the same kind of thing is taking place as a result of the takeover. That is why I questioned the significant benefit to Canada of that kind of transaction.

The other question I want to ask is in response to the minister's—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River.

Mr. Leggatt: I thought I had one more minute.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Chairman, the hon. member for Vaudreuil conducted a very interesting exercise this afternoon by reading aloud from some pamphlets and brochures the interesting things that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is engaged in. If one more program had been enumerated under the wing of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce I think we could have concluded that all Canadians would be working for that bureaucracy in some way or other.

There were times in the House this afternoon when officials of the department sitting in the gallery, including the deputy minister, outnumbered the members down here in the chamber. It is also interesting to note that this minister is following the lead of the Prime Minister and not exposing his new deputy minister to the scrutiny of the House of Commons by having him down here as an adviser. He is sitting in the gallery following the debate. I hope he has followed the debate with interest—

Mr. Gillespie: That's a cheap shot.

Mr. Oberle: I am just pointing out that this might be the new approach taken by the government. I hope the deputy minister and the other officials in the gallery have listened with interest because this debate has pointed out some very positive and constructive proposals.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We are not going to get much of that right now.

Mr. Oberle: It also pointed out that there is not much of an industrial strategy for the minister or any of his officials to follow. The department relies heavily on other departments and other countries to do things to bail it out of a very serious and critical situation. Our industrial strategy is based on what the Department of Regional Economic Expansion might be able to do—

Mr. Jamieson: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: —and what the Department of Finance might be able to do to breathe some life into our industry—what the Department of Transport might be able to do to decentralize and open up areas. We know all these other departments are in a mess as well, and so we cannot expect any industrial strategy to develop in our country.

The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings referred to what other countries are doing in this area. Countries in the free industrial world depend heavily on their departments of industry and trade to solve such problems as inflation and unemployment. They do this by creating a climate in which industry and commerce can flourish, not by doing what we are doing here, creating a climate of disincentives which chase industry to other parts of the world. We find that our own industrial plants sometimes have to compete with those industries that leave our country because of some ridiculous tax law or some condition under which no ordinary businessman could be expected to carry on a decent business.

It seems to be the minister's strategy, out of all the industrial capacity we have, to pick those industries with the least chance of survival in our country because of climate or location. We seem to have to take these industries and stretch them on the floor. I see the minister bending over, resuscitating them, breathing life into industries that have no chance to do anything in this country because the minister has no place in the country to catch a mouthful of air. The air he is breathing into these industries is lead.

This has resulted in problems to which the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings has alluded, such as the bad showing in the area of productivity which in the last year arrived at a .5 negative position. This is a very serious and critical situation. The hon. member, however, advanced some positive and constructive suggestions related to the problems of productivity, industrial research, and labour costs.

I should like to add a proposal that has been developed and seriously discussed with some talented economists in our country in regard to the problems of incentives and the problem of unemployment. This is in addition to the proposal of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings to subsidize industries that would take additional people from the unemployment rolls over and above their normal requirement. My proposal is to allow some incentives to those major commodity groups within our country—Madam Chairman, if I may point out to you the minds of the trained seals are not on the job, and it is very difficult to hear.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair is having some difficulty hearing the hon. member. Perhaps we could have silence for two or three minutes.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Chairman, I refer to commodity groups which through cyclical fluctuation are faced with ups and downs in world markets. I am talking about the lumber industry, and the lumber and pulp commodity groups which are presently facing all kinds of difficulties. I have asked the minister what the government is prepared to do to help this significant industry which, directly and indirectly, employs about one million Canadians, exports about $7.5 billion worth of products, and imports only about $2.5 billion worth, and thus contributes positively to our balance of payments to the tune of about $5 billion per year. At present our unemployment rate is about 7 per cent, and we are paying $3.5 billion-odd annually in unemployment insurance. Would it not be sensible to help the commodity groups about which I am speaking to trade on world market—

● (1740)

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I notice that our Hansard reporters are also experiencing difficulty in hearing the debate. Perhaps we could have a little more order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: As these commodity groups are finding it difficult to break even and maintain employment at their plants, surely the government should respond by stepping in and helping. It can do this through the normal channels without setting up another bureaucracy. It can do it through the chartered banks. After all, it has helped other industries by establishing marketing boards. It has helped the farm community by making available to it the advantages of section 88 of the relevant legislation. The government, by helping through the chartered banks, would enable these industries to keep going. If such help had been given in the current crisis it would mean that 35,000 people now unemployed in British Columbia would not be on the unemployment insurance rolls. The government could take a position in these commodity groups and ask the chartered banks to maintain inventory control. If the market price were to improve, the federal government could see to it that these commodities are made available to the domestic market. That is the way to bring about full employment—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Chairman, do you mean that I cannot ask my question?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to section 9(a) of Standing Order 58, to interrupt these proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the proceedings.

The question is on the amendment—

Some hon. Members: Out. Get out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: May I remind hon. members that when the Chairman is putting the question no member shall enter, walk out, cross the floor of the House, or make any noise or disturbance. As I said, the question is on the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Hees) negatived: Yeas, 59; nays, 76.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Shall Industry, Trade and Commerce—Vote 1 carry?

Mr. Baldwin: On division.

Industry, Trade and Commerce—Vote 1 agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the resolution?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

UNANIMOUS CONSENT SOUGHT FOR GRIEVANCE PROCEDURE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes left I should like to take advantage—

[The Assistant Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member will allow the Chair to seek unanimous consent of the House.

An hon. Member: Surely that is not necessary.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. As hon. members are aware, the grievance procedure we have followed on the last three occasions when we considered estimates in committee of the whole is not included in the report and is not in our standing orders. At this time I would normally be seeking to adjourn the House, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 2(1). I think the procedure we followed the last several times might be worth pursuing. I hope that the House will at least give me the chance to ask whether there is unanimous consent for the grievance procedure which the hon. member seeks to follow.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the procedure which has been followed in the final few minutes on the last three occasions is unusual. Perhaps the opposition will agree that whoever speaks on its behalf should only take half the time.

Mr. Stanfield: That's fair enough. We are not like the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

● (1750)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The remarks of the government House leader prove that it is worthwhile to ask unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say with regard to the division of time that we will follow the Trudeau principle.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to rise, if I might—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) on a point of order.

Mr. Olivier: I just would like to emphasize to the Chair that I have not given my consent. Therefore, there is no unanimous consent.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I will have to call it six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It was never in the rules of this House that there was a grievance that could be ventilated in this way. It was always by tradition. That was done for many, many years.

We have now brought ourselves back as far as we can to the same position we were in before the new rules were brought forward in 1968. With this government, there are now many more causes for grievances.

For many, many years it has been the tradition that supply cannot be granted to a government until everybody has a chance to ventilate grievances. We have certain procedures for those grievances. When there is an additional amount of time before six o'clock, there is a long tradition—I believe there is a song about that—which permits this to be done. If there is any doubt in Your Honour's mind, I think the benefit of that doubt should be given to those members of this House who have so many grievances to raise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Although I wish to sympathize with the point raised by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), he will admit that we have changed the procedure of supply. In the days the hon. member is talking about there was always a motion before the House that the Chairman leave the chair. The procedure is not the same.

The hon. member will admit that I have tried to seek the consent of the House. I am trying to be as co-operative as I can. However, I do not make the rules of this House.

Hon. members have had the experience of the last three times. It might be worthwhile to look into the possibility within the next few days of having an order of the House by agreement for a procedure to follow, or include it in an agreement by unanimous consent on other days.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I wish to remind the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) that the tradition transcends this parliament. It goes back to Charles the First, a king who lost his head on account of this type of behaviour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If this government and its trained seals—I beg your pardon, its supporters, I do not want to insult the seals—is so sensitive to the grievances from opposition backbenchers, then I say to the government House leader that he better have a chat with some of his people because that traditional right, and the matter which I wanted to raise in the course of discussion, are important. The latter deals with the whole failure of the committee system in this parliament as it deals with estimates. In terms of dealing with estimates the committee system has failed as a result of the operation of the rules of this House that were put through this House by closure long before I came here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We have only considered one vote in the agriculture committee, vote No. 75. None of the estimates before the broadcasting committee have been considered. We have not even dealt with Information Canada yet. The health and welfare committee has not dealt with the estimates of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet). The transport committee has not had time to deal with the Post Office estimates.

Speaking to the point of order which was raised at the beginning, I think that these matters are important. Items of this nature ought not to be laid to rest because the hon. member for Longueuil is so sensitive about criticism and takes such a dreadful attitude to the rights of members of parliament who are backbenchers like himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If the hon. member for Longueuil is representative of the majority of his party, then I fear for the parliament of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Out of fairness to the government House leader, I am going to give him his 30 seconds to answer.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Order, please. I would invite the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) to take his seat.

[English]

The House will deal with one thing at a time. We are dealing with a point of order. I will call upon the government House leader on the point of order.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the front benches of the government would have followed my advice. However, I say to the hon. member who has spoken that all members of this House have equal rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On the same point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) has the right to be heard. I will then recognize the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), and then the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I invite other hon. members, who I am sure want to be fair to all members, to give the Chair an opportunity to hear the points that are being raised.

The hon. member for Longueuil.

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Speaker, I wonder what the opposition has to object when we ask if there is unanimous consent. The Standing Orders are there. But according to our rules, as you make your bed, so you must lie upon it. If we want laws to be accepted, let us respect them. If I decide not to give my consent, I am free, being a member of the Parliament of Canada, not to give it. If they want to take this liberty away from me, it is just too bad, but I will not agree with them. The people have judged them as retrograde. Let them stay where they are, and I shall stay where I want to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Grievance Procedure

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that we should have to end the day on such an acrid tone, but I must say in all respect that I think you interpret the Standing Orders wrongly as regards the request for the approval of the House. Many sections of the Standing Orders require general agreement, unanimous consent, and it is very clear. Right now, the unanimous consent gives one member, without reason nor justice, the right of veto, and I say that in the circumstances, that right does not exist, has never existed and should not exist.

● (1800)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must tell the hon. member that I have made my decision and that I stand on my decision. If he wishes to argue the case with the House leaders and attempt to have the rules changed and clarified, that is his privilege, but a decision has been made and unless there are further points of order or questions of privilege I shall call it six o'clock.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I wish to say something on this point of order because I think the government House leader is a little concerned about what has happened today. I believe he is genuinely concerned about the operations of the House and the rights of hon. members. He did say that all members were equal in terms of the rules and procedures of this House, but I think the demonstration today indicates that some members are more equal than others.

An hon. Member: What a pompous statement.

At 6.04 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION OF LOCAL GOVERNMENT GUIDELINES PENDING CONSULTATION WITH NATIVE ORGANIZATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The importance and urgency of my motion should be obvious to all members of parliament. This issue relates to guidelines D-1 on local government operations as directed by the Department of Indian Affairs to local band councils. Let me make it absolutely clear that native leaders across Canada have no argument with, and in fact welcome, the general principle of accountability of funds that is included in the said guidelines. However, inasmuch as phases included in the guidelines contravene the Indian Act and alter the role of the Chief-in-Council; removing them from their legitimate right to manage the affairs of their respective bands; and since there are statements in the regulation that threaten the power of the chief and his council and other statements that are ambiguous and lead to misinterpretation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes):

That the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development do not implement the guidelines on the scheduled date, but rather extend an ample period of grace wherein native people may make representation against the cruel and unusually harsh regulations that are about to be imposed upon them.

We urge the adoption of this motion in light of the fact that native people very much want to co-operate—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion is presented pursuant to Standing Order 43. It cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF ABORTION PROVISIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the renewed representations made to all members of the House, urging the House to examine the overall abortion laws and in view of the fact that this is a matter dealing with life itself, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston):

That the government be instructed to form forthwith a committee comprised of members of this House to thoroughly investigate this entire area affording such organizations as the Alliance for Life and others, in fact all segments of our society, the opportunity to express their views on a matter involving the very lives of thousands of unborn children.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As popular as the motion may seem to be, I have recently ruled in respect of a similar motion concerning the situation of old age pensioners in this country that the matter of their pensions is of continuing concern to this House. The suggestion that legislation be amended is not really a proper subject matter for a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43. This motion touches on an extremely important matter. It has been and will be the subject of continuing representation concerning amendments to the law. However, it would be improper to put upon this matter, by virtue of renewed representations only, the element of urgency that would qualify it for a Standing Order 43 motion.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER CLARIFYING HIS AUTHORITY UNDER SECTIONS 4 AND 22—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the conflict between the apparent authority afforded by Sections 4 and 22 of the Food and Drugs Act and statements by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) concerning what he feels is his authority, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes):

● (1410)

That the minister make a statement to the House clarifying his authority under the Food and Drugs Act as pertaining to sections 4 and 22 of the said act.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is put forward under the terms of Standing Order 43. As such, unanimous consent is required before it can be moved. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Oral Questions

DATE AND TERMS OF PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO ABORTION PROVISION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice arising out of his suggestion in the House the other day that the whole subject of the operation of the abortion law might be inquired into and some announcement made shortly, and his indication outside the House that an inquiry in depth into this issue would be conducted by the government. I should like to ask the minister about the terms of reference of the proposed inquiry. Is it intended to include in the terms of reference the grounds upon which a legal abortion may be carried out or is it his intention to confine the inquiry to questions related to the administration of the legislation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Obviously my answer in the House the other day indicated that a decision had not yet been taken and in these circumstances no announcement as to the details can possibly be made. Any statement which seemed to go beyond that outside the House represented, really, a rather distorted view on the part of the newsmen rather than anything I said.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Stanfield: In view of what I know to be the minister's longstanding concern over various aspects of this legislation and my assumption that he has been giving this matter a good deal of thought for some time, is he in a position, now, to tell us in approximate terms when he can announce the decision of the government in regard to such an inquiry? Can we expect such an announcement within a week, or within a month, or is it to be made in the distant future?

Mr. Lang: It is always difficult to indicate when a decision will be taken because the process of making a decision can itself be a complicated one depending upon the nature of the issue under consideration. The Leader of the Opposition is correct, however, in assuming we are conscious of the importance of this issue and we shall be examining it with great thoroughness in order to find the right kind of solution, one which will develop approaches to or changes in the law and practice and which will meet the problem rather than simply appearing to meet it.

CONCLUSIONS TO BE DRAWN FROM ABORTION STATISTICS

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice. On December 12, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, the minister said he was giving particular attention to a study of the reasons the abortion rate is highest by far in the three wealthiest provinces, British Columbia, Ontario and Alberta. Can he now state his findings and do they confirm that these provinces are loosely interpreting a badly worded federal law, forcing us to the conclusion that the law must specify that abortions will only be permitted in medically indisputable cases?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): I think the conclusion to be drawn from the figures can be drawn by anyone. It seems to me fairly obvious that interpretations and applications do vary significantly from place to place. This, of course, is the very kind of question we must look at in examining the way in which the law is operating and how it can be made more effective in terms of the spirit intended by parliament in 1969.

SUGGESTION PROPOSED COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY BE EMPOWERED TO SUBPOENA RECORDS OF HOSPITAL COMMITTEES—MINISTER'S INSTRUCTIONS TO PROVINCIAL ATTORNEYS GENERAL

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): My supplementary arises from the fact that the largest petition ever brought into parliament was presented today, signed by one million Canadians from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and asking for much faster action than the Minister of Justice seems to imply will be forthcoming.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: I should like to ask the minister, as he considers what kind of examination this question will be given and when, whether he would specifically consider the empowering of a committee to be set up to subpoena the records of hospital abortion committees to see whether cases are found in which abortions were permitted when the life or health of the mother was not in danger and, if so, whether charges will be laid and by whom?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the power to examine how hospital committees operate was in fact put into the Criminal Code and entrusted to the hands of the provincial ministers of health in the various provinces. I am impressed that many of the persons who appear to applaud the last question, and might applaud any other question if they thought it appropriate to do so on a given day, apparently have not been pressing their provincial colleagues to take some action in this regard.

Mr. Roche: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister, with reference to provincial actions, what instructions or advice he is giving the attorney general of Quebec in light of the reported ignoring of the abortion law by 103 doctors who have admitted performing or helping women to obtain illegal abortions?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, this issue is very much a matter for the provincial attorneys general; and of all the provincial attorneys general, the one who seems least to need advice from me is the one for the province of Quebec.

HOUSING

REQUEST TOP PRIORITY BE GIVEN CAPE BRETON COUNTY—ALLEGATION GLACE BAY BUILDING PROJECT WAS TO HAVE STARTED IN 1972

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs in charge of housing. In view of the fact that the capable regional director of Central Mortgage and Housing in Halifax has informed me in a letter dated May 15 that "housing conditions in Cape Breton industrial area are among the worst in Canada and in the province of Nova Scotia", would the minister use his authority to insist that designation of target areas in Nova Scotia under the federal-provincial agreement give top priority to the county of Cape Breton?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I accept the representation of the hon. member. I will be in Halifax on Wednesday and I will discuss this matter with my provincial colleagues and certainly give it the high priority that it deserves.

Mr. Hogan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister explain why Mr. Teron the president of CMHC said in Halifax yesterday that "there is only so much money to go around and housing will have to compete with other priorities?" Will the minister tell us if Mr. Teron was stating government policy on housing?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, he was stating commonsense, as he always does.

Mr. Hogan: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. My interpretation of commonsense is a little different. Would the minister inform the Minister of Finance before he introduces his June mini-budget that the present 1975 CMHC building program in Glace Bay, Nova Scotia is but a fulfilment of a project that was to have been started in, and was allotted for, the year 1972, three years ago?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I will look into the situation that the hon. member describes. I know our direct programs are moving extremely quickly but if there are some difficulties here I will be pleased to look into them.

POST OFFICE

POSSIBILITY OF GENERAL STRIKE TO SUPPORT WORKERS IN MONTREAL

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Postmaster General.

Can he tell us what he intends to do about the threat of the president of the Union of Postal Workers, who is calling a general postal strike in support of the Montreal postal workers?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the press release that was just issued a few moments ago by the national executive of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers deserves a short answer which would be unparliamentary. To suggest that there are 400 policemen inside the Montreal post office is a pure fabrication of the worst possible type designed to inflame the members across Canada and bring on a wildcat strike. The matter has no foundation; it is malicious and it is unreasonable and, in so far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, it is unworthy of anybody who is the head of a trade union in this country.

● (1420)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: I think history will prove that I am a better friend of the postal workers than their national executive, and I will not be intimidated by such statements into rescinding the suspensions and dismissals as a result of unlawful actions. I am glad they are now rediscovering the terms of their own collective agreement.

ALLEGED DELAYS IN GRIEVANCE PROCEDURE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, could the Postmaster General inform the House whether he is dealing with the complaints in view of the suggestion that the person in the province of Quebec who has the responsibility of hearing fourth level grievances has resigned and has not been replaced, which has resulted in preventing representative hearings of grievances?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, it is significant that finally, after two months, the union is now finding some fault with the grievance procedure which for two months they have refused to recognize as a lawful method of solving legitimate differences of opinion. The constant references to Quebec, French Canada and French, and the fact that the Postmaster General is English, by this union is nothing but a deliberate attempt to create the impression that in some way, shape or form the postal workers in the province of Quebec get less justice than the postal workers across Canada, which is in fact untrue and unworthy of that particular union.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: I have asked to see if there are delays in the processing of grievances. If there are, then this matter could have been brought to my attention two months ago when I invited the union to use this as the method of solving legitimate complaints. If there are delays, we will do everything in our power to expedite the grievance procedure, which at times does bog down not only for French-speaking Quebecers, but for English-speaking Quebecers and other Canadians as well. If that operation in the public service needs improving, then it should be improved. One of the handicaps I have to work with as the Postmaster General can be related to interference of other departments. Nonetheless, this grievance could have been brought to my attention two months ago had the union taken advantage of certain provisions in their own collective agreement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, with reference to the formal grievance procedure, is it possible, in order to meet reasonable or unreasonable demands, to foreshorten the four level procedure?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I made an offer to the union, that local, and to anybody who has been suspended indefinitely, or up to nine months, I believe, and in the case of dismissals, to accelerate this procedure, move immediately to the fourth level, and do everything in my power to see that justice is rendered. They have yet to take advantage of that. There has yet to be a single suspension or dismissal in Montreal arising out of our recent difference of opinion over casuals submitted to that procedure. I have said before, and I say again, I will do everything in my power to speed up the procedure in the case of the 38 people. It is unfortunate that the union leaders in Montreal, for their own selfish reasons, are denying justice in these 38 cases. Possibly in many instances the suspensions may have been modified; for example, a dismissal could be modified to a six months' suspension, or a six months suspension modified to a two months' suspension, depending on the findings of an independent arbitrator named by the Public Service Staff Relations Board.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GARRISON DIVERSION—SUGGESTION UNITED STATES BE ASKED FOR A MORATORIUM ON PROJECT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister and is in relation to the Garrison Diversion Project in North Dakota. This subject has been raised in the House and standing committees on countless occasions by myself and other hon. members requesting that the Canadian government call for a moratorium. All that is being done is that a joint U.S.-Canadian letter is being sent to the International Joint Commission asking for a study. I have new evidence which now fully confirms that Canada should ask President Ford for an immediate moratorium. In a letter from W. S. Moorehead, Chairman of the—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question would he put it.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, this letter recommends to Secretary of State Kissinger of the United States—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question would he put it to the minister?

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, my question is in relation to the contents of this and other letters. Will the Acting Prime Minister now call upon President Ford for a moratorium on the Garrison Diversion project.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be very grateful if the hon. member would let me see this correspondence. The Canadian government has been very active in defence of Canadian interests. The United States has made certain undertakings and if he has evidence that they are not going to carry them out I would like to have it.

Mr. McKenzie: I will table the two letters, Mr. Speaker. I have a supplementary question. In a letter from the United States Commissioner on Reclamation to the Deputy Under Secretary of State he stated—

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have a supplementary question?

Mr. McKenzie: Yes. In this letter he said—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR MORE RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT TO IMPROVE COMPETITIVE POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As industrial research and development is extremely important in making our products competitive both in Canada and on the export market, and as Canada spends a considerably smaller proportion of its gross national product on industrial research and development than our five principal industrial competitors, I should like to ask the minister when he intends to bring our efforts in this regard at least up to the efforts of those against whom we must compete for sales in the world market and if possible surpass those efforts.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there is a joint effort involving both the federal government and the private sector. The government, through incentive programs, through the National Research Council and through programs of my department is trying to do its part. We are also trying to encourage the private sector to do its part. In the last analysis increased research and development will only come about if they make the investment.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as the minister has simply outlined the reason the program in which the government has engaged has been so unsuccessful, I should like to ask him when he intends to give some leadership in getting our research and development at least up to the level of those countries which are beating the pants off of us every day in respect of sales in Canada and the world market.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Wellington.

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Would the minister indicate to the Minister of Finance his support for the suggestion just made by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings which is similar to that which I made recently?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to convey those representations to the Minister of Finance.

HEALTH

POSSIBLE STUDIES OF WORKERS EXPOSED TO CANCER-CAUSING CONTAMINANTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the galloping increase in lung cancer and the jungle of confusion in certain grey areas which points out the very urgent need for a thoro-epidemiological study of Canadian uranium miners as well as other workers who are exposed to cancer-causing contaminants, I should like to ask the minister whether studies on this frightful problem are underway in his department.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we have been following this issue very closely. We have been supporting over the years through medical research various research projects. This is an area of serious concern, but as the hon. member indicated, unfortunately at the present time there would still appear to be conflicting views among scientists with regard to the exact situation. I can only hope that further study and reserach in the future will clarify the situation.

● (1430)

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister if there are any statistical studies to date indicating more than one contaminant that might cause lung cancer, such as how many of those people were cigarette smokers and for how long.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I shall study the question and find out from the department whether we have made recent statistical studies which answer the question of the hon. member. I shall be happy to send him the information requested if my department has made those studies.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMPLAINT OF GENERAL ROHMER CONCERNING GOVERNMENT'S ATTITUDE—MEANS OF REGULATING USE OF NORTHWEST PASSAGE BY U.S. TANKERS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that the minister promoted Richard Rohmer to the rank of brigadier general in the reserves and named him air reserve adviser, does the minister have plans to rectify his complaint made last night in Guelph, Ontario, that Ottawa has little interest in the military?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to look at what General Rohmer had to say because he is a very competent officer.

Mr. Hees: And he knows what he is talking about.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Rohmer claims that the U.S.A. is building a fleet of giant tankers to take oil from its reserves in Alaska through the Northwest Passage to the east coast without consulting Canada. If this is true, how does the minister plan to regulate the passage of these ships when Canada presently does not have any Arctic icebreakers?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that we have complete surveillance of that area.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

TRADE

SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—INQUIRY AS TO SAFEGUARDS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the announcement made yesterday by the minister confirming the sale to South Korea of a CANDU reactor and the arrangement of a $300 million loan with EDC, will the minister advise the House whether any reassessment was made of the risks inherent in this sale of adding South Korea to the nuclear club in view of what many in South Korea now view as a new strategic situation following the withdrawal of the United States from South Viet Nam?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I explained, in announcing the signing of the Export Development Corporation loan, that it was conditional upon appropriate safeguards being worked out and signed bilaterally between Canada and the Republic of Korea.

Mr. Leggatt: Would the minister please advise the House first of all whether he will table the proposed bilateral agreement together with the terms of the loan interest, etc, and also would he advise whether that agreement contains any sanctions or penalties in the event of the default in the future to comply with Canadian safeguards, and if, in the event of an emergency, South Korea diverted plutonium from the CANDU reactor to manufacture nuclear explosives, what sanctions does Canada have to enforce that bilateral contract?

Mr. Gillespie: I indicated in my first answer that this matter is under consideration at present. It is under negotiation at present and those negotiations are not yet completed.

Oral Questions

SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF LOAN

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): I should like to address my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that a $300 million loan is being provided to South Korea by the Export Development Corporation, will the minister tell the House, either orally or by tabling appropriate documents, what are the terms of this loan with regard to the interest on the loan and the payout period?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think the press release indicated the terms of repayment and the part that Canadian private banking partners in the loan are playing as well as the part played by the U.K. banking group. In this sense, it is the first type of banking consortium arrangement worked out by the Export Development Corporation, a very important one, I think.

As to the question of the interest rate, that information will not be made public. That kind of information is always confidential.

Mr. Andre: In view of the subsidized interest rate—we do not know whether or not it is subsidized but there is reason to suspect that in fact it will be a subsidized interest rate that is not available to Canadian businessmen or indeed Canadian house buyers—and in view of the fact that a subsidy is tantamount to a reduction in price and to giving a lower than stated price on this reactor, will the minister at least tell the House what the real price of the reactor is?

Mr. Gillespie: I want to reassure the hon. member that these loans are not subsidized. The Export Development Corporation has made money each year. Its rate of interest is negotiated at comparable rates to those that are internationally prevailing and in situations where Canadian sellers have to compete.

PROPOSAL TO REDEFINE WORD "HEALTH" IN ABORTION PROVISION

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question the Minister of Justice.

Since the amendments to the Criminal Code have been applied with regard to the interpretation of what constitutes danger to the mother's health, the number of abortions in Canada has grown steadily, for various reasons, and the will of the legislator has not been respected: does he intend to reintroduce this act to Parliament and redefine the word "health" and thus encourage life in Canada instead of "slaughter"?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the question of appropriate action is the very subject which will be examined. Of course, the law is being applied, perhaps with some differences from province to province, and the actual application of the criminal law is ordinarily the responsibility of the provincial attorney general. It is his responsibility to see that the law is made effective.

SOCIAL SECURITY

MEASURES TO ENCOURAGE FAMILY FORMATION

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Has his department made any studies on the lowering birth rate in Canada and considered any measures, fiscal or other, to at least encourage women who wish to bear children and thus accomplish a great goal?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, for numerous years the government has endorsed a policy favouring family formation. If one considers the record of the Liberal government over the past 20 years, I think the country has nothing to be ashamed of, much to the contrary.

To answer the hon. member's question in a more specific way, I shall remind him that it is the present government which in the past two years has tripled the amount of family allowances, and the same government which last year issued new instructions concerning cost-sharing by the federal government in day-care nurseries, which now makes it possible for us to share a greater part of nursery costs with the provinces than for any other social services. These are simply measures. But in the Unemployment Insurance Act, you also have measures that were taken to favour maternity leave thus enabling pregnant mothers to receive unemployment insurance benefits. Finally, today, in this House, we are going to debate an omnibus bill on the status of women that will make maternity leave even more readily available to Canadian women.

AMENDMENT OF ABORTION PROVISION TO SHOW RESPECT FOR LIFE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): I should like to put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Considering the answer which has just been given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I would like to put again to the Minister of Justice whether he shares the view of his colleague instead of shifting to the provinces the responsibility for the administration of the Criminal Code as in 1968, so that the minister will assume his responsibility and introduce legislation in Parliament advocating respect for and protection of life rather than abortion.

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to emphasize that many observers can see that the Criminal Code, as it was written in 1969, very definitely respects life and the life of the unborn child. If there is any doubt about it, that should be seen by the provisions that we left in the Criminal Code, the very significant penalties for interference with the unborn child, with the fetus. Those are significant indeed, and that is the general pattern and trend of the law, to protect the unborn child in that fashion. It is only by way of attempting to deal with some specific problems that medical committees were given the responsibility of determining when the health or life of the mother was in danger.

● (1440)

In the circumstances where it is otherwise an offence punishable by life imprisonment, that should obviously be a very serious question for medical committees and one which they should, if they wish to take on the responsibility, be able to put into effect. It will be our problem, if medical committees do not appear to be able to come to that kind of judgment, to have to review the law.

SUGGESTED INSTRUCTIONS BY MINISTER TO PROVINCIAL ATTORNEYS GENERAL TO ENSURE UNIFORMITY IN APPLICATION OF ABORTION PROVISION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. I agree with him that the implementation of the law, when it comes to charges under the code, is the responsibility of the attorneys general of the various provinces. In putting this question I would like to remind the minister that it was his government which changed the law and left it ambiguous. In light of the fact that the law is interpreted one way in the province of Quebec and another way in the other nine provinces, and in light of the fact that the minister has made some statements on the interpretation, would he now instruct the attorneys general of the various provinces to see that the law is carried out uniformly across the country?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to what the hon. member refers when he says the law is being interpreted differently in different provinces because so far as I know it is clear in all provinces that without a medical certificate from an abortion committee in a hospital it is a criminal offence, and a serious one, to perform an abortion or assist in the performance of an abortion, and that is clear law all across the country. The question of the application of section 251 has been a subject of discussion between me and provincial attorneys general. Under the constitution or under any powers I know of I cannot instruct the provincial attorneys general how they are to operate, but I did bring to their attention the varying statistics from province to province and the very forceful fact that it is their obligation under the law to enforce the law as it is written in this parliament and not to apply their personal or political interpretations to that law, and they ought to carry out the law accordingly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROPOSED REFERENCE OF ABORTION PROVISION TO SUPREME COURT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): In reference to the interpretation of the law I could not agree more with the Minister of Justice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: But in light of the fact that he knows, and we all know, that it has not been interpreted properly in some provinces, will he now take my suggestion and have the matter referred to the Supreme Court of Canada so that the attorneys general will carry out what he has just said? What he has just said is merely words and not action.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): I am happy that the hon. member has said a couple of times that he shares my view with regard to the law and its application. I say to him that I am in no way convinced that further elaboration in a general way of the meaning of the law would help, and that in fact there is not so much difficulty with the words concerning danger to the health and life of the mother. I suggest to him that in context those are words clearly involving only a very serious consideration regarding the life and health of the mother, and that any court would hold it so.

The problem is really not to interpret them that way but to see that medical committees recognize that it is their responsibility, only when they have formed a serious opinion in that regard, to give a certificate, and that it is the responsibility of provincial attorneys general to try to bring before the courts cases where medical committees are not operating in that fashion.

TYPE AND DURATION OF PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO ABORTION PROVISION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have tried to follow the circumlocutions of the minister, but have had difficulty. If matters are as clear as he says they are, the responsibility is that of the provincial attorneys general and the section of the Criminal Code in question is so clear, then what did he have in mind when he stated the day before yesterday that it was the intention of the government to conduct a full and complete inquiry and, to quote the minister, "that we definitely are going to have a very fair and formal public examination of the whole question"? Is it going to be a Royal Commission? What is the purpose of setting up this commission if not simply to postpone taking a stand and to continue to answer questions with the indefiniteness he has shown here today?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it strikes me as somewhat strange that I can be attacked in this fashion when most people consider that I have probably been abused more than anyone else by people—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Do you want a towel?

An hon. Member: Poor Otto.

Mr. Lang: The right hon. gentleman must not have been here at the beginning of the question period when I said to the Leader of the Opposition, I believe, when he was quoting from that particular newspaper report to which the right hon. gentleman has also referred, that it was not a statement of my view, but that I stand by the words I used in this House with regard to what deserves to be investigated; what needs to be investigated is the way in which medical committees can and will be willing to perform their obligations throughout the country, and therefore, whether the law as written in 1969 can in fact be sustained, having regard to their willingness or the willingness indeed of provincial attorneys general in that it is a very serious question. That is straightforward. I hope the right hon. gentleman sees no circumlocution in that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, by the degree of applause I think it will be generally noted that the Liberal Party is opposed to this whole situation.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You can't have it both ways, Otto.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are a number of other hon. members who are anxious to use the remaining minutes for questions. I wonder if the right hon. gentleman might be permitted to finish his question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was interpreting the applause which was given by the Liberal Party and by the government. I was here from the beginning. I was here in 1969.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: If hon. members opposite think that this clack will keep me down, they are mistaken.

What is the nature of this investigation to be? Who will be involved? When will it start? How long will the inquiry sit, or is it just a simple means by the minister to get around to deciding the question, thereby postponing indefinitely the consideration of this great social problem?

Mr. Lang: I will say again that if the right hon. gentleman was here, he must not have been listening to the responses because I did indicate that. If he will refer to my answer yesterday, he will see that the decision of whether, and the nature of, the inquiry is not yet taken, so I am obviously unable to answer the questions which are the very ones I said would be announced in the House after that decision is taken.

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Lang: It is an important question. To my mind it will indeed deserve very careful consideration, and not the kind of politicizing of both sides of the question which we are apt to get from hon. members opposite right now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Lang.]

THE SOCIETY FOR THE STUDY OF THE HERITAGE OF CANADA

EFFICIENCY OF SOCIETY'S PROGRAM FOR SENIOR CITIZENS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State I will address my question to his parliamentary secretary. Both through the medium of the question period and in a verbal report from consumer affairs in a tabled report of the Secretary of State dealing with the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada, the inference has been that the society's program for senior citizens was a costly and inefficient venture. Yet in the adjournment debate of May 26 the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development stated that it was financially efficient. Would the parliamentary secretary inform the House which statement is accurate, that of the minister or that of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Mr. Gustave Blouin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take this question as notice.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ADEQUACY OF INVESTIGATION BY FORCE OF CIA ACTIVITIES IN CANADA

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question was intended for the Solicitor General, but in his absence I will ask the Minister of Justice who is, I believe, the Acting Solicitor General. In view of the fact that some of the alleged activities of the CIA in Canada may not, in a strict sense, be illegal although nonetheless pose a serious threat to Canadian sovereignty, and in view of the fact that the information the CIA passes on to similar Canadian agencies does not appear to include information on former agents of the CIA, as the Quang case makes clear, does the minister consider an investigation by the RCMP—in essence, an in-house inquiry—to be adequate? Will the minister outline the terms of reference of the investigation as presently constituted?

● (1450)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Acting Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have noted the Solicitor General's statement, as has the hon. member, that he will investigate any allegations in regard to the improper activities of the CIA in Canada. I would hope that he would conclude that an investigation by the police would be the appropriate starting point.

USE OF UNITED STATES EMBASSY BY FORCE IN CHECKING BACKGROUND OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES WHO WORKED IN THIRD WORLD COUNTRIES

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It has recently come to my attention that one of the procedures used to check the reliability of Canadian citizens who have applied for employment with the federal government and who have worked in the third world is to check their background with the American embassy in the country in which they were previously employed. Can the minister tell the House whether such a procedure is extensively used by the RCMP or other government agencies involved in checking the reliability of these Canadians?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Acting Solicitor General): I will see that the inquiry is made.

TRANSPORT

CROWSNEST PASS RATES—NAMES OF PROVINCIAL MINISTERS REQUESTING ROYAL COMMISSION INVESTIGATION OF COSTING ASPECTS OF GRAIN MOVEMENT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister inform the House of the names of the provincial ministers who requested the royal commission into the costing aspects of grain movement—which is really a royal commission into the Crowsnest Pass rates—in light of the declaration by all western ministers of transport that these statutory rates should not be changed in any way whatsoever?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I think they are the four transport ministers from the west.

Mr. Murta: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister either did not hear my question or did not want to answer it so I will ask basically the same question again. In view of the fact that what I believe the government has called the Snavely Commission inquiring into the costing aspects of grain transportation in western Canada, which in reality is a royal commission looking into the Crowsnest Pass rates, can the minister inform the House which provincial ministers requested this, in view of the fact that the ministers stated publicly they did not want any change whatsoever in the statutory rates?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I can give no other answer. There is a royal commission on grain handling in the west and it is known publicly, I think, that the ministers from British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba asked us not to modify the Crowsnest Pass rates.

RURAL DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—PUBLIC PARTICIPATION IN SECOND PHASE—POSSIBLE SUSPENSION OF ACTIVITIES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It refers to a question asked earlier this week by my colleague the hon. member for Malpeque with respect to the total suspension of funds at the end of June for the Rural Development Council. In view of the recommendations of the consultant's report a year and a half ago that a five year extension should be granted for the work of the RDC on the second phase of the plan, and the fact that the second phase is now before the minister and his colleagues, can the minister assure this House and the people of Prince Edward Island that there will be adequate provision for public participation in the second phase of the development plan?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, on the question of public participation, there undoubtedly will be. It is our intention to support and encourage the government of Prince Edward Island in this regard. As to the specific organization in question about which I was also questioned by the hon. member for Malpeque, I have checked it out and it is entirely within the responsibility of the province to decide whether it supports that particular organization or not.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question. In view of the fact that 75 per cent of the funds for the Rural Development Council have come from the federal government and the fact that all major questions have been determined by both parties consenting on the importance of various elements, has the federal government agreed to the suspension of the Rural Development Council and its activities?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I also answered that question but I will be glad to elaborate slightly. We did not agree, in the sense that we were not consulted. The action was taken by the province of Prince Edward Island which has a complete right. We only heard about it subsequent to the action having been taken.

REPLY OF MINISTER TO COMMUNICATIONS FROM RURAL DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): A supplementary question to the same minister. May I ask the minister if he would indicate the tenor of his reply to the communications from the Rural Development Council of Prince Edward Island on this matter?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I replied in about the only possible way I could, given the situation I have outlined. I am indicating to all those who make representations to me that I am transmitting their concerns and interests to the government of Prince Edward Island which seems to me about the only route I can follow at the present time.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REASON FOR EMPLOYMENT OF ECONOMISTS AT HIGH SALARY LEVELS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. In view of the answer given to question No. 2125 which revealed that the Department of the Environment has 163 economists at a total salary of $3.8 million per year and that $3.8 million is more than is paid all the economists in the Department of Finance, could the minister indicate why these economists are required in her department at these salary levels?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure that information could be obtained in another manner. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta.

POSSIBILITY OF MEETING MR. FITZSIMMONS, PRESIDENT OF TEAMSTERS' UNION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour of which I tried to give his office notice this morning but they never called me back. In view of the fact that the minister has arranged for a public relations promotion for Mr. Cesar Chavez of the United Farm Workers at the front door of the House of Commons next Tuesday, can the minister advise the House whether he has also invited Mr. Fitzsimmons, president of the Teamsters' Union who represents 85 per cent of farm workers in California?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, if Mr. Fitzsimmons writes and requests to be met I will be pleased to meet him.

TERMS OF PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO ABORTION PROVISIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like clarification from the Minister of Justice on a very important point. When I asked him earlier whether the inquiry would include the grounds on which an abortion might be legally performed or would be confined to the administrative aspects of the law, he indicated that the question had not been decided. I should like him to reassure me of that in view of his apparent response to the right hon. member for Prince Albert indicating that it was the manner in which the abortion committees, doctors, had been observing it that required looking into. Is the minister and the government considering an inquiry into the grounds on which a legal abortion may be performed as well as the manner in which the law is being administered or not? I think it is important.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will confirm that the decision has not been taken. The further discussion about the kinds of questions that may arise is obviously a discussion of the sorts of issues that have to be looked at in determining the nature of any possible inquiry.

INTERPRETATION OF WORD "HEALTH" IN ABORTION PROVISIONS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact the use of the word "health" in the Criminal Code is what seems to be the basis of the problem of interpretation of what the intention was in this legislation, I wonder if the minister could indicate why he has consistently refused to draft some specific rule as to what the government interprets this to mean?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have had occasion to give my opinion as to what I think it means and have received criticism for even venturing that far. I would remind the hon. member that further discussion on the subject of the definition did take place in this House at the time of the passing of the bill. I can refer hon. members back to that discussion where I think the spirit was clear that the words "health" and "life in danger", in the context of a law otherwise requiring serious punishments for interfering with the fetus and destroying it, was that it would clearly be only a very serious matter that would be involved. I personally have the view that an attempt simply to introduce some qualification like that would not accomplish the end that is sought in creating consistent administration around the country and therefore some further examination of the issue is needed. What I do not want to do is simply, as some hon. members would have it, appear to do something which in fact accomplishes nothing. I want to accomplish something.

Mr. Yewchuk: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the hon. Minister would agree to tell the House whether "health" means physical health or also emotional health?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Despite the minister's special capacity surely this is not the proper forum in which to discuss the hon. member's opinion on matters of that sort.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government House leader about the business for the rest of this week and next week.

Mr. Sharp: First of all, Mr. Speaker, may I designate Monday, June 2, and Thursday, June 5, as allotted days? Today the House will consider second reading of Bill C-16 on the status of women. I hope it will be possible to dispose of this legislation today.

● (1500)

Mr. Stanfield: At the second reading stage.

Mr. Sharp: The second reading stage, yes. In order to do this, perhaps the House might be disposed at some stage after the first round of speeches to limit the length of speeches in order that as many members as possible might participate. Tomorrow we will proceed with a number of report stages and third readings in this order: Bills C-37,

C-3, C-13, C-47, C-33 and C-50. On Tuesday and Wednesday we would like to complete anything that has not been completed in that list, and also add these items which might also be disposed of: Bill C-57, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, and Bill S-20, the Territorial Lands Act.

Mr. Baldwin: In the event that the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, and the Minister of Labour can reconcile their differences so that the Minister of Finance can be delivered of a budget on June 23, will it be the intention of the government to proceed thereafter with the completion of the budget debate and any budget bills that might arise out of that? I know this is in the contemplation of the government, but it might be of some help if this information were available now.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I cannot be very definite about this, but certainly the government will want to complete the budget debate itself? I should warn the House that it is quite possible the government will wish to dispose of some of the bills which may result from the budget proposals.

Mr. Stanfield: It's going to be a cold summer anyway.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, can the government House leader tell us the present status of the proposed legislation to amend the Old Age Security Act? It has been a long time coming.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the bill was finally approved in cabinet today. It is my intention to place notice of the bill on the order paper over the weekend.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a fresh attempt to have the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) tell the House when the amendments to the present Unemployment Insurance Act promised in the last throne speech will be brought forward?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not expect that it will be brought in before the summer recess.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, may I ask the government House leader whether he has given any consideration to the striking of the joint committee dealing with the national capital. I understand there might be some expedition of the work of that committee, in the sense that it could deal with briefs over the summer period.

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. There are a number of other items on the order paper that are not legislative items. There is a motion in my name on the travelling of one of the committees. I have also given notice of the establishment of a committee on the National Capital Commission. I would like to have conversation on this motion through the usual channels. I hope we can expedite these items through the House. In particular, with regard to that committee when it is struck I believe it would be desirable that it hold one meeting before the summer recess so that various documents can be distributed and studied during the summer.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Thank you very much.

Business of the House

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, can the government House leader indicate when the government will be bringing forward the legislation they have been promising with regard to regulation of the federal data banks? It was promised earlier this session. I wonder whether this legislation is going to be delayed until after the summer recess.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we have been considering this bill in cabinet. It has now been drafted and I am awaiting an opportunity to introduce it. There is no reason to delay its introduction; I expect it will be very soon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on another point of order. A couple of days ago I believe there was agreement to have appended to Hansard the full answer to some questions of mine regarding Canadian National pensions. If the Minister of Transport has that information today, I wonder if it could be appended to today's Hansard.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of the House, I am prepared to table the promised document.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the minister shall have leave to table the document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And that it be made an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: It is suggested, as well, that the document be appended to Hansard as if it had been read. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CRIMINAL CODE

PETITION IN RESPECT OF LAW ON ABORTION

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great sense of pride, history and honour that I rise today to present a petition containing 1,027,425 signatures of Canadian citizens who plead that it is parliament's most basic duty to protect innocent human life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: Scientific evidence now puts in beyond reasonable doubt that a human life begins at conception, yet our laws permit the widespread practice of abortion in Canada. On this occasion, I also rise on behalf of the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean), the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), who is represented by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan), the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne), the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac), the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche), who also represents the Territories, and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco).

● (1510)

Mr. Speaker, over one million Canadians call upon parliament to enact legislation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has adequately described the nature of the petition and the circumstances surrounding it. I think it ought to stop there.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, on this particular day I would appreciate it very much if you would give the hon. member a chance to carry on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I am sure we can get the unanimous consent of the House to allow her to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member may know, we have made extensive arrangements for the acceptance of this important petition. The hon. member has described the petition and she has referred to the member from each province who was involved in the presentation of the petition. We have extended all these courtesies to make sure that the presentation of this important petition is as dramatic and emphatic as I am sure all hon. members wish it to be. It remains only for the petition to be presented. We are fully aware that it constitutes some 35 packing cases of signatures which I am sure the hon. member does not have with her at the moment. If there is anything else I can do to accommodate the hon. members who are interested, I am certainly prepared to do it.

Mr. Roche: I cannot add to what Your Honour has said about the nature of the petition. I would only plead that you allow the words of the petition, which constitute only about one more paragraph, to be read into record at this point so that thousands of Canadians who read Hansard can see them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member raises an interesting point. Other hon. members will be aware that it has been held in the past—I have cited one of these decisions in connection with a petition presented by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Roberts)—that the reading of representations attached to petitions is not the proper way to bring petitions before the House; that it is to be done through hon. members, in debate, and through their efforts to persuade the cabinet that the law should be changed. However, in this situation, if there is unanimous consent that the balance of the petition be read, I am prepared to be guided by hon. members. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. Appolloni: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Over one million Canadians call upon parliament to enact legislation providing for the child conceived but not yet born the same protection as is provided for any other person, and also urge parliament to show leadership in fostering a life-sustaining society.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the member presenting the petition on behalf of the signatories from New Brunswick and future generations of that province was the member for Northumberland-Miramichi.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,581, 1,825, 2,326, 2,372 and 2,385.

I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

AIR CANADA—APPLICATIONS FOR STEWARDS AND STEWARDESSES

Question No. 1,825—Mr. Schumacher:

1. In the years 1973 and 1974, how many applicants for positions as stewards and stewardesses, whose stated home address was (a) Manitoba (b) Saskatchewan (c) Alberta (d) British Columbia (e) Yukon (f) Northwest Territories were (i) interviewed (ii) hired by Air Canada?

2. In each of the years 1973 and 1974, by province and territory, how many of those hired as stewards and stewardesses stated their mother tongue was (a) English (b) French (c) other and in each case how many were (i) proficient in both official languages (ii) entered in either English or French language training programmes?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: The data provided below pertain to the number of new flight attendants who actually entered Air Canada service during the years 1973 and 1974. The figures cannot, however, be related to the number of people interviewed during the same period, as someone interviewed during one year is often called for employment in a subsequent year, according to employment demands. Also, those who are interviewed possess only basic requirements. Following the first interview, a second interview is given to those identified as being most competitive. At the time of recall for this second interview, in the past two years, the airline has experienced a "no show" factor of between 14 and 38 per cent in the western Canadian provinces alone. At this second stage, the most qualified persons are selected and sent for a medical examination. If successful, they then wait for placement in a training course as openings occur. Competition among applicants steadily increases every year and while in 1973 there was one successful person out of every 13 applicants, in 1974 the ratio was one out of every 21. As well, the airline's requirement for new cabin personnel has decreased since 1973 and this has also tended to make competition more intense. 1. (a) 1973 (i) 197, (ii) 24; 1974 (i) 303, (ii) 37; (b) 1973 (i) 72, (ii) 4; 1974 (i) 159, (ii) 7; (c) 1973 (i) 265, (ii) 22; 1974 (i) 249, (ii) 10; (d) 1973 (i) 838, (ii) 66; 1974 (i) 869, (ii) 17; (e) (i) (ii) 0; (f) (i) (ii) 0.

2. Manitoba, (a) 1973, 21; 1974, 33; (b) 1973, 3; 1974, 7; Saskatchewan (a) 1973, 4; 1974, 5; (b) 1973, 0; 1974, 2; Alberta (a) 1973, 38; 1974, 14; (b) 1973, 3; 1974, 3; British Columbia (a) 1973, 65; 1974, 21; (b) 1973, 15; 1974, 2; Yukon and Northwest Territory (a) 0; (b) 0. (c) Recruiting for flight attendants was done exclusively within Canada during 1973 and 1974 and only English and French mother tongues were recorded. (c) (i) In 1973, 58.5 per cent; In 1974, 51.1 per cent; (c) (ii) 53.

LANGUAGE INFORMATION FOR NEW IMMIGRANTS

Question No. 2,326—Mr. Herbert:

1. For what period of time does the Immigration Division of the Department of Manpower and Immigration retain language information for new immigrants?

2. Is such information retained on file (a) after the new immigrant finds employment (b) if the new immigrant changes his or her province of residence?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Information on the language capability of immigrants is recorded from information contained on their landing records and forms a part of the permanent statistical inventory maintained by the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

2. This information is a measure of the immigrant's language capability assessed at the time of application or interview and is not altered or updated at any time.

LIP—PROJECT APPROVALS IN KENORA-RAINY RIVER, 1972-73

Question No. 2,372—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,039 to the effect that a memorandum from the office of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, dated January 30, 1973, addressed to Mr. D. C. Trehearne, then Director of Programmes for the Local Initiatives Programme, did not "in effect order approval of LIP projects in a number of named constituencies...", what then exactly did this memo do and what was the exact purpose and meaning of the following statement appearing at the top of the list of LIP projects in various constituencies: "It is requested by the Minister's office that the attached list of LIP applications be approved"?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): See answer to question 1,039, part 1, April 22, 1975.

$500 HOME OWNER GRANT

Question No. 2,385—Mr. Schellenberger:

Will the Minister reconsider the five year requirement that restricts the obtaining of a $500 grant, in most cases, for mobile home owners who do not stay in any location for five years and can only obtain a two year lease from most mobile home parks?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): It is not intended to reduce the period from five years to two years, for mobile home owners wishing to obtain the $500 grant.

STATUTE LAW (STATUS OF WOMEN) AMENDMENT ACT, 1974

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH EQUALITY OF STATUS FOR MALE AND FEMALE PERSONS UNDER CERTAIN STATUTES

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-16, to amend certain statutes to provide equality of status thereunder for male and female persons, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is most appropriate in this International Women's Year that we should concern ourselves with legislative action to remove a number of prejudicial or discriminatory provisions from federal statutes. While today I will be presenting an omnibus bill containing amendments to several acts, I would also like at this time to place in context the movement toward women's equal status in Canada.

The status of women is certainly not a new issue in our country. Back in the early 1900s dedicated Canadian women like Nellie McClung fought to give women the vote. In 1913 the premier of Manitoba advised Nellie McClung that he "didn't want a hyena in petticoats talking politics" to him. Nonetheless, by 1916 the women of Manitoba had won the right to vote provincially. The other provinces, with the exception of Quebec, granted the vote to women shortly thereafter.

It was not until 1929, however, that women won the right to appointment to the Senate. It was in that year that the Privy Council in London declared women to be indeed "persons" for purposes of Senate appointment. Today there are nine elected women members in the House of Commons—and I am pleased to note that eight of them sit on this side of the House—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: —and seven women senators. While this representation is high in comparison with the representation a decade ago, it is curious to consider how proportionately small this representation is, for women constitute 51 per cent of our population.

The battle to gain the vote and the right to Senate appointment was in many ways comparable to the work being done in the present decade to bring women equality. However, it is necessary to change not only legislation but attitudes. Women's rights can be recognized in law, but laws are empty unless society accepts and supports those rights. Here in Canada during International Women's Year a major effort is being made to challenge some of the old and timeworn attitudes toward women. It is the year in which we are making every effort to inform all Canadians of the present status of women in this country. It is also a time for every person to consider his or her own attitudes. It is evident that legislative change alone would be a hollow victory for women, for if laws change and attitudes do not, women's position in our society will remain unchanged.

The discrepancy between law and practice is illustrated by the wage gap between women and men which continues to exist despite the fact that in all provinces but one, discrimination in employment is now prohibited by law. Back in 1962, a man working a full year in Canada was earning an average of $5,014, and a woman working a full year was earning $2,634. What progress has been made? Well, in 1971 the average woman's salary for a full year's work was $4,755; for a man the figure was $8,513. In 1971, women were still earning 44 per cent less than men. Recent data on salaries indicate this disproportionate gap is not narrowing.

In this connection, it is interesting to note that figures for Sweden indicate that in 1965 women were earning 75 per cent as much as men, and that by 1970 this had risen to 80 per cent. There may be several factors involved, particularly the fact that in Sweden, for instance, well over 50 per cent of women are in the labour force and many more are found in the higher paying professions than they are in Canada. But the facts still are there for everybody to see. Women have not yet achieved equality in Canada, and it is for this reason that International Women's Year can and must provide the impetus for change.

In 1967, the Royal Commission on the Status of Women began its hearings across the country, providing a forum for public opinion and an opportunity fully to investigate women's status. When the commission's report was tabled in the House in 1970, it included 123 recommendations which fell within federal jurisdiction. I am happy to report that a large proportion of these recommendations has either been implemented or is in the process of implementation. However, there are still some areas where the changing role of women has not been recognized. It was for this reason that my predecessor, the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), introduced the omnibus bill on the status of women approximately one year ago. The election prevented the passage of the bill and it is for this reason that we are dealing with it today on second reading.

Before proceeding to a detailed examination of this bill, I should like to set it in the context of the government's program for International Women's Year, since, once again, legislative change is only one facet of the government's initiatives in this area. As I have mentioned, it is apparent that one of the major needs of this country is to inform Canadians on the status of women. The media campaign launched for International Women's Year Secretariat in January of this year was designed to that end.

While "Why Not!" may have been criticized by some, it generated a great deal of interest and support both in Canada and abroad. In fact, today more than 75,000 individual requests for information, posters and buttons have been received. This figure does not include the many hundreds of bulk orders handled by my office. About 150,000 buttons have been distributed. Lately, I have been wearing with great pride the one that I am wearing today. It is hand-made by Indian women in British Columbia. These women are very active with regard to women's rights, and the revenue from the sale of these buttons helps them in fighting for equality. In fact, we have started a small cottage industry at the same time as a public education campaign.

A second major part of the national program for 1975 is now launched in all the provinces and the territories. Each province and territory chose from a number of options the program which it was felt will best meet the needs of the people in that area. Eight provinces have decided to have mobile information centres. These will be travelling throughout each of the provinces and the Yukon during the summer months, distributing information on federal and provincial programs of interest to women as well as information on services and laws relating to women. Some of the provinces opted for conferences either on a provincewide or a regional basis. These would provide a forum for discussion of different issues concerning women and also a basis for determining future action.

The main thrust of the government's program is designed to bring the changing role of women clearly before all Canadians, for the equality of men and women will only come about when each person in this country sheds those attitudes that encourage inequality in fact if not in law.

To this end, amendments have already been made to the pension plan to provide equal treatment of men and women under the Canada Pension Plan and those changes became law on January 1. My colleague, the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner), has also brought before this House amendments to the Citizenship Act to ensure equal treatment under the act regardless of sex. Another measure related to equality before the law which the government announced in the Speech from the Throne is the human rights legislation. All these bills involve legislation eliminating those instances of bias in favour of women as well as those favouring men.

Furthermore, this bill is another step towards the achievement of the government's objective, that is the implementation of most of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, which had already advised the government to enact some of the changes provided by the bill. As to the other changes which are put forward, they have been incorporated in the bill following the very useful and constructive recommendations made by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, many agencies and individuals.

Before coming to the details of the changes provided under Bill C-16, I would like to mention that it is my predecessor as minister responsible for the status of women, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), who took upon himself the responsibility of drafting the bill presented to the House today on second reading, and that he advised the government to prepare this omnibus legislation. I would be remiss if I did not emphasize the support we, my predecessor and myself, have received from our colleagues responsible for the implementation of the various laws modified by this bill.

Bill C-16 modifies the following acts: the Canada Elections Act, the Criminal Code; the Immigration Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, the National Defence Act and the Unemployment Insurance Act. Furthermore, the last elections showed us the appropriateness of the government's decision to introduce amendments to the Canada Elections Act within this omnibus legislation. Even if the Royal Commission on the Status of Women had not taken into account the problems raised by the implementation of this act, the government has received many representations from citizens interested in this question, and has decided to amend it and shape it according to the idea of the condition of women in our society today. For example, some women have pointed out to us that the Canadian woman still appears on the electoral list according to her marital status, even if women have enjoyed the right to vote for half a century. Unfortunately, those changes could not be implemented before the last election.

Under Bill C-16, voter registration rules are the same for both men and women. The enumerators would therefore register the name, address, occupation and sex only of each voter. This would automatically eliminate the need for mentioning the marital status of women, by prefixing their names with the abbreviation Mrs. or Miss, as is now done.

The voter, whether male or female, will be registered under the given name and surname by which he is known and the polling division, without the need to prefix them with an abbreviation. Therefore, a married woman known locally by her maiden name shall be registered under that name. The special rules now applying to women, whether married, divorced, single or widows, would be repealed, thereby eliminating a source of problems sometimes stemming from a false interpretation of the act.

Where the name of a husband or wife is entered below the name of his or her spouse, no occupation is required to be placed after the name of the second spouse if the latter does not request so. The changes also include, concerning residential quarters of husbands of wives filling a temporary job, a provision similar to that concerning wives of temporary workers. Secondly, the omnibus bill amends the Criminal Code. For example, section 23(3), under which it is now presumed that the wife was forced by her husband to assist a party to an offense, is now repealed.

The Royal Commission on the Status of Women included a recommendation to the government that the section be amended, so it would apply equally to both spouses. Participants to the conference of commissioners on standardizing Canadian law, held in 1971, were submitted that recommendation. The royal commission recommended the elimination of that section in order that wives be on an equal footing with husbands, because the presumption of constraint on which it was based was no longer acceptable.

The Royal Commission had pointed out that section 18 of the Criminal Code also states that there cannot be any presumption that a married woman who commits an offence does so under compulsion by reason only that she commits it in the presence of her husband. It follows that the wife must prove that she acted under the compulsion of her husband, as she would do if she pleaded compulsion in any other case under criminal law. However, subsection 2 of section 23 of the Code recognizes the special relationship between spouses since it rejects the idea of accessory after the fact in the case of a married person assisting the spouse for the purpose of enabling the spouse to escape.

On the other hand, the amendments to section 197 of the Criminal Code underline the wish of women to have equal responsibilities and equal rights. As you know, people related by marriage, adoption or blood have in general maintenance responsibilities. Indeed, the law forces some members of the family, spouses parents, children, to contribute financially to the support of other members who cannot support themselves.

Thus, parents whose children cannot support themselves because of their age or physical incapacity must provide for them. In the same way, children of old and destitute people must provide for their essential needs. People who think that most women are still unable to take on this responsibility will recall that the pension is generally established on the basis of need and financial means.

Therefore, the law does not aim at taking action against the spouse whose resources are limited if he or she does not support his or her unemployed spouse. For practical purposes, cases of refusal to support a spouse are most often submitted to the civil courts.

At the present time, all Canadian parents are held responsible under the Criminal Code for the support of their children and all husbands are held responsible for the support of their wives.

Such a provision enshrines or perpetuates the belief that all wives are dependent upon their husbands, and ignores the contribution, direct or indirect, they make to the economy. While many Canadian women are actually financially dependent, an increasing number are self-sustaining and the existing legislation does not reflect this situation. The Divorce Act, however, provides for mandatory reciprocal maintenance after marriage has been dissolved.

Under provincial laws, spouses must provide for the needs of each other during marriage. The Royal Commission on the Status of Women has noticed that the project on the family law put forward by the Ontario Law Reform Commission recommends that the obligation to support the spouse during marriage be made reciprocal.

The proposal to extend to the wives as well as to the husbands the obligation to support her or his spouse is consistent with one of the basic principles stated by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women and it reads as follows:

> . . . there should be equality of opportunity to share the responsibilities to society as well as its privileges and prerogatives.

The Royal Commission on the Status of Women has already recommended that either spouse be responsible for the financial support of the other and of their children. The amendment which is introduced today will make the act consistent with the principle of association in marriage. It also reflects the concern of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women and of most people who share the view that the rights of the married woman must be the same as those provided for in any economic and social partnership involving mutual responsibilities. The Immigration Act, the third act being amended by the omnibus bill, does not actually provide for any distinction between men and women.

However, the Royal Commission on the Status of Women called the attention of the government to the fact that the wife's right to enter Canada as an independent immigrant can be limited by the use in the act of the term "head of family" which traditionally describes the husband. Indeed, at present, it is implicitly provided in the act that a wife may ask to be admitted in Canada on an independent basis, since "head of family" means, and I quote:

that spouse who is financially responsible for providing for the needs of the family on a permanent basis.

In order to implement the recommendation of the commission and, more recently, that of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, the government took advantage of the drafting of the omnibus bill to amend the terms of that act and thus clarify its meaning while avoiding any reference to the sex of claimants.

The Royal Commission on the Status of Women had also noted, but, without making any recommendation in that regard, that family dependents can be included in the deportation order issued against a head of family. Bill C-16 prohibits this practice from now on when the dependents are Canadian citizens, have been lawfully admitted to Canada and have attained the full age of 18 years, or have acquired Canadian domicile.

The fourth act amended by this bill—The Public Service Employment Act—now provides that the Public Service Commission, in prescribing selection standards, cannot discriminate against any person by reason of sex, race, national origin, color or religion. Since that provision dates back to 1967, that is before the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada was set up, the commission did not make any recommendation in that regard. However, other people found that, even when discrimination by reason of sex is prohibited, discrimination by reason of age and family situation can take place against men, but especially women. That is why the omnibus bill adds those elements to the list of forbidden grounds for discrimination in setting out the implementation of those selection standards.

Age is also removed from the list of selection standards which can be prescribed to determine the basis of assessment of merit in relation to any position or class of positions. Furthermore, through amendments to the Pension Act, the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, which deal with the disability pensions paid to members of the Canadian armed forces, Bill C-16 provides for an equal status for men and women.

Although neither the royal commission nor the advisory council have really concerned themselves with those amendments, the government has included them in the legislation so as to put men and women on an equal footing under those acts. From now on, the husband and children of women who receive disability pensions will be entitled to the same benefits as those paid to the dependents of a male member of the Canadian forces. At the same time, pensions will be paid both to widowers and widows in order to ensure full equality.

Another amendment flowing from the above contains the rules for the payment of pensions to spouses who are both members of the Armed Forces. Further, the children of both sexes will receive pensions until they are 17 years old, while at the present time, these pensions are not paid beyond age 16. On the other hand, children attending school will be entitled to a pension until age 25, and not until age 21, as it is the case now.

The National Defence Act, although the Commission did not dwell on it, is another act being hereby amended. As a matter of fact, every summer, there is a section of the Act which prevents young girls from joining cadet organizations, and they have complained to the government. Therefore, the legislative text, using the word "boys" instead of the word "persons" would allow girls to become members of the cadets corps. There is no longer any reason to exclude them from this organization.

The last Act being amended by Bill C-16 is the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971. Indeed, according to the Royal Commission of Inquiry on the Status of Women, if Canada wants to respect the agreement made to avoid discrimination against women who bear children, those of them who have chosen to work must not risk losing their jobs, income, security or promotion opportunities when they give birth to a child. In 1971, pursuant to the Commission's recommendation, the government had amended the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide benefits to be paid during 15 weeks at the time of maternity leave. Three years after the implementation of the legislation, however, it appeared necessary to grant greater freedom in the distribution of the 15 weeks of maternity leave. The Advisory Council on the Status of Women, as well as other groups, advocated that measure.

In fact, because it is difficult to know in advance the exact week of the termination of pregnancy, women are denied part of the benefits to which they are entitled under the plan; administrative problems also arise. Therefore, the purpose of the amendment is to relax the provisions on the opening of the 15-week period during which maternity benefits are paid, depending on the week in which her confinement occurs and within the initial benefit period for the recipient, which will permit women who prefer it this way, either for health or any other reason, to reserve most of their maternity leave for after the child is born. These amendments will apply effective six months after Bill C-16 receives royal assent. I should like to remind hon. members that this legislation will provide women who chose to contribute to the welfare of their families and society, while assuming their function as mothers, with benefits similar to those previously granted to veterans and which permitted them to take up a career following their return from military service.

[English]

These amendments will serve to bring equality one step closer. Yet, as I mentioned earlier, we must be concerned that such legislation does not become merely a palliative to the problems surrounding women's status—legislation must be considered in the broader context of providing part of a viable base for true equality within our society. Earlier I mentioned the International Women's Year media campaign on the status of women. Sometimes I think it is possible for us to lose touch with the very real concerns of women in Canada, and yet one of the most gratifying results of this media campaign was the hundreds of letters received from women and men across the country. I would like to just quickly read from several of them. One of them was addressed to "The People of this Organization". It read:

> I really agree with you. Women are people too and are to be recognized among their community and country as basketball players, politicians, lawyers, doctors, store managers, construction workers and matadors. Not only as secretaries, playboy bunnies, typists and sex objects.
> I am only 12 years old but I am not dumb and I realize the work and responsibility nearly every woman has.

From British Columbia we received a long letter from a woman in her mid-fifties, who ended with this story:

> My husband being between jobs, I took work as housekeeper-nurse to an old, aristocratic man. During the interview he was shocked to hear that besides feeding the three of us, he was expected to pay me the fee of $100 per month. "I never paid my wife", he said. "I used to take her to tea once a month. Which I am willing to do with you." This man was the epitome of male supremacy. He thought all females should deem it an honour to wait on him hand and foot. Hooray for Why Not! Too late for me. But I have daughters.

Another, again from a young girl:

> Please tell me why a girl can't go into training to become a bank manager. I've approached two different banks in Lethbridge, Alberta. They laugh at me for even thinking of such a ridiculous career for girls. Why can't we be managers as well as men? Isn't this discrimination?

These letters are samples of hundreds received. It is only fair to add that not all have been positive, but the vast majority have been warm and positive.

Women's equality is not an esoteric issue. The prejudice that continues to exist has very real consequences for women in this country. While individual choice is considered a basic democratic freedom, it is evident that "choices" are still often arbitrarily limited for women. It must be the personal commitment of each woman and man in our society to work for the creation of equal choices, equal rights, equal opportunities and equal responsibilities. Ingrained prejudice and fear will only disappear when all people in our society are convinced that anything less than equality is an affront to human dignity.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, along with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) I had expected at one point this week to be on my feet in this House speaking on the budget debate, but the Minister of Finance has seen fit to defer that particular pleasure for me. My keen disappointment in respect of the delay of the budget is somewhat tempered by the fact that today we are dealing with this omnibus bill concerning equality of status for men and women. This bill has been around for over seven months in this new parliament. I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak to it and to respond to the minister this afternoon. I regret that the powers that be have seen fit to schedule some five House committees to meet while the debate on this important subject is going on. I think that further thought might be given to that sort of thing in the future.

Both my male colleague, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), and my female colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), have special responsibilities and interests in this bill and its subject matter and it is only because of their necessary absence from the House on other business which took them out of the city that I am afforded the opportunity this afternoon of replying to the minister. In some respects, I cannot help but feel a little bit like Edward Heath might feel doing Margaret Thatcher's laundry. I am sure he would feel he could not do it nearly as well. But that, after all, is an essential feeling to be experienced on the road toward equality of the sexes and I approach this job this afternoon with both pride and relish.

[Translation]

It is but rarely I have the opportunity to take part in a debate with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). We do meet casually from time to time to have a hamburger or a milkshake together, but it is so infrequent. It's a manner of speaking, nothing more. But, apart from those food issues, some might say that a steady diet from the minister will make you sick. I am not prepared to support automatically the ideas of his friends from the right wing of the Cabinet.

[English]

The minister has presented an omnibus bill today which proposes a number of changes in various statutes designed "to provide equality of status thereunder for male and female persons." With regard to many of these items, this omnibus bill represents what you might call a tidying-up operation. The bill changes the form of the language in other bills. I am not suggesting for a moment that these are not important changes, but in three areas the bill makes very significant changes: in respect of pensions, in respect of cadet services, and in respect of unemployment insurance maternity benefits. The minister covered the various aspects of the bill in some detail and I will not use the time of the House to repeat the sort of analysis that he has made.

So far as the bill goes, it is welcome. I am sure the minister will not be offended; he will probably agree with me when I say it is long overdue. In the context of the problems with which it is associated, while it is certainly necessary it is far from sufficient. So far as the general subject of the status of women is concerned, the minister, as one might have expected, endeavoured to create an impression of considerable encouragement. I want to be fair to him. He certainly indicated that there was a great deal to be done, but that progress had been rather limited. He indicated that perhaps some other countries had done rather better than we had. However, I do not find this quite as encouraging as he did.

When I look at the realities that present themselves, particularly when I think of what the government, as a government, is proposing to do and this parliament will be asked to do, without in any way wishing to suggest that the minister is indulging in any misrepresentation I simply ask the House to consider the possibility that in this instance his well known enthusiasm for what this government is doing has surpassed his respect for the facts. The facts as they exist are certainly no basis for self-congratulation or complacency, and I do not think the minister would say they were or indeed said that they were. On the contrary, the facts give cause for concern and a greater sense of urgency than the minister conveyed this afternoon—a sense of urgency which I believe the government does not possess.

Among women in Canada there is a very wide range of concerns relating to equality of status. I propose to limit myself pretty substantially to women in the world of work in this country. The minister cited some figures to show that not much progress has been made in Canada. The Advisory Council on the Status of Women has published figures to illustrate that the actual number and participation rate of women in the labour force is steadily increasing. Canada's rate remains significantly lower than that of Australia, West Germany, the United States, Britain, Japan and Sweden.

Furthermore, in Canada working women are concentrated—not entirely but there is a heavier concentration—in central Canada, with Ontario having the highest rate, and a high percentage of women work in service industries with occupations in clerical, service and sales positions. I do not want to suggest for a moment, by inference, that there is anything wrong with a woman staying at home and looking after her family if that is her choice, freely made. There is no more honourable occupation and career for a woman to pursue, and she should have the free choice to do that or to go to work.

In Canada, working women are younger and more often single than are working men. For women who must care for pre-school age children, the obstacles to steady and progressively more rewarding employment are enormous. As I understand it, child-care centres meet only 1 per cent of the need. Therefore, many women are limited in the hours that are available to them for work outside the home. Conditions are difficult for expectant mothers as well as for existing mothers. Maternity leave provisions are for the most part, as I understand it, quite unsatisfactory. Maternity benefits paid through unemployment insurance have been inequitable and we are pleased to see some improvement proposed in the bill before us.

There is no question that the definition as it existed, of 15 weeks for benefit eligibility, has been poor legislation. In the proposed flexibility the 15-week period will make a good deal more sense to all mothers, including mother nature. How in the world, under the existing section of the act, was a woman supposed to know her date of delivery eight weeks in advance? How she was supposed to know has certainly been a source of mystery to me as a father of four children.

It may very well be that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) appointed the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey)—who was the minister responsible for the department in question at the time the unemployment insurance provision was made—out of respect for the hon. gentleman's ability to forecast delivery eight weeks later. The sad part is that if the lady in question did not guess right in the game of what you might call reproduction roulette, she would suffer an economic penalty in her unemployment insurance benefits. That has been bad law and we will be delighted to see it expunged from the Canadian statutes. The improvement proposed in this bill does not, however, in any way remove the need for a comprehensive review of this country's unemployment insurance program—something which has been long promised by this government—a program which it is now forecast will cost between $3 billion and $3.5 billion this year. The maternity benefits paid out will constitute only a small fraction of that amount.

I referred a few moments ago to the facts and to the realities which are with us, but they do not seem to impress the minister quite as much as they impress me. There is no shortage of either data or conclusions on the subject of the status of women in Canadian society. I do not intend to be exhaustive this afternoon, and I pray I will not be exhausting, but in my remarks I do hope to cover enough ground with enough emphasis to make a dent in any self-satisfaction anyone in this House might happen to have with regard to the progress we have made toward equality of the status of women in the world of work in Canada.

In looking at the situation as it exists today I will be making use of research material from four sources. One source is the February 1, 1974, report of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. There is detailed study of women in business by Jones E. Bennett and Pierre M. Loewe which is being featured in a current series in the Financial Post. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation conducted an internal task force study in 1974 on the status of women in that organization. Fourth there was information provided to the miscellaneous estimates committee by Mrs. Irene Johnson, one of three capable women holding the rank of deputy minister in the service of this government.

Quite a disturbingly consistent picture emerges when all these four sources are examined. One gets an impression of how things are going in the strictly private and strictly public sectors as well as in the mixed context of organizations such as large federal Crown corporations. Across the board the picture is not encouraging. This is what we find in very recent canvasses: the "typical" Canadian private firm has major inadequacies of equal opportunity, particularly in terms of job access and of compensation. The Financial Post study cites these inadequacies in this way: due to historical labour patterns of today's "unwritten law," some jobs remain "men's" and others are "women's." Since "men's" jobs are generally of a higher status than "women's," women make less money, are less likely to be trained, have fewer advancement opportunities and hold a small proportion of decision-making power.

Contrary to popular belief, "ghettoization" of Canadian working women has become worse. This is a hard thing to have to say, but I think it has to be said. It has become worse, not better, over the last decade. For example, the proportion of clerks who are women rose 3 percentage points in that decade. In Canadian business, the average woman earns 45 per cent less than the average man, and I believe the gap actually worsened between 1972 and 1973. A female Canadian worker is 2½ to three times less likely to be trained than a male. Advancement opportunities for women are largely limited to those labelled "women's" jobs and have improved little since 1962, and only 4 per cent of women are managers as opposed to nearly 13 per cent of men.

Pension plans, group life insurance, disability and medical plans may contain sex-based differences in coverage and employee contributions. Most Canadian firms still have one or more such differences in their benefit package. Reimbursements apply to a "wife" rather than to a "spouse," so that a female employee cannot recover her husband's expenses. A sizeable minority of organizations still have these or similar provisions in their arrangements.

Though equal pay for men and women in identical positions is apparently not much of a problem in Canadian private business, facts on equal pay for work of equal value are unclear because of a sort of "chicken and egg" dilemma. It is just impossible to know if women's jobs have been improperly downgraded because women are in them or, alternatively, if women have been relegated to them because they are less valuable jobs. Much discrimination hides behind this curtain of confusion.

An inaccurate stereotype of women seems to influence every step in the employment and advancement processes, perpetuating occupational segregation and unequal distribution of corporate wealth. Most Canadian firms use sex-stereotyped recruitment materials and processes. Women are typically excluded from serious consideration for most jobs labelled "men", and vice-versa. Women who make it to the interviewing process are often discouraged from "men's" jobs by male decision-makers. Job evaluation and salary programs may not rate "men's" jobs and "women's" properly, relative to each other.

The Financial Post study also calls particular attention to the dilemma of secretaries in business. Secretaries—99 per cent of whom are women—frequently feel that they and their work are not valued and that they are mistreated by male bosses, particularly with regard to personal services expected of them such as getting coffee and doing personal errands for the boss. Another major source of irritation and resentment among secretaries is that a secretary's salary is determined by the organizational level of her boss rather than an evaluation of her specific job duties. Secretaries in almost every large Canadian organization are rug-ranked in this way. This practice causes considerable resentment among women due to dependency on men and the inequities among secretaries it creates.

We are all aware just how large an issue this is among secretaries in the federal public service. I understand that it is no different in the private sphere. Secretaries find it especially difficult to pursue other opportunities within their companies because in many companies advancement is restricted to the secretarial career path for women. In addition, there is a natural tendency for bosses to hang on to good secretaries.

Based on labour force statistics, two general conclusions can be drawn about the job status of women in the typical Canadian company. First, the "ghettoization" of women into low-skill, low paying jobs has increased in the past ten years. That is a sad thing to have to say and I would be pleased indeed if someone would disprove it in this House.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Second, there is a universal gap between the representation of women in companies and their share of influence. While the participation of women in managerial jobs is improving, at current rates it will be literally a century before they reach a proportion consistent with their level of participation in the labour force.

[Translation]

But this is far from sufficient. Those who are concerned by the issue, particularly the governments, the unions and other responsible persons, should stop mouthing platitudes and do everything within their power to speed up the process. As far as the government is concerned, much remains to be done, both within departments and Crown corporations.

[English]

Here are the findings of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation task force, the work being done in the year 1974:

> The task force interviewed some 850 CBC women across the country. It found, somewhat to the surprise of both the task force and management, that the large majority of women were dissatisfied with their status in the corporation. Time and again, women expressed their frustration with such bitter observations as: "We're watched over like three-year olds"; "The CBC is a man's world"; "All they want to know is if you can type"; "Women are ground down in this location".

The task force concluded that at the root of the dissatisfaction was a feeling of powerlessness among women. The working environment and careers of CBC women were controlled by a male majority of three to one who held an even greater proportion of decision-making power, 93 per cent of managerial jobs, and whose underlying beliefs about women's appropriate role at work differed drastically from the view held by the women as to their own roles. To oversimplify—I am still talking about the report of the CBC—the majority of men interviewed seemed to believe that "a woman's rightful place is in the home rather than out working," while the majority of women felt that "women should be equal partners with men in the world of work." Furthermore, this task force found that accompanying the women's feeling of powerlessness was deep frustration at seeing little real change.

The task force reasoned that this polarization of attitudes was due, at least in part, to fundamental differences in the ages and marital status of the people involved. Some 60 per cent of the women were under 35 and their attitudes were formed in the rapidly changing environment of the 1960s. In contrast, the same proportion of CBC men were over 35, the largest number being in the 45-49 bracket, with basic viewpoints shaped in the more tradition-oriented 1940s and 1950s. I was fortunate enough to have my views formulated in the very radical 1930s.

Moreover, nearly two-thirds of the women were single, while nearly three-quarters of the men were married—with their views on the appropriateness of careers for women naturally being influenced by the activities of their wives, most of whom did not work. Women were found by the task force to believe that men were basically oblivious to their dissatisfactions and concerns and had no real inclination toward equality of opportunity.

Turning to government service itself, I am sure that hon. members take absolutely no satisfaction from the fact that Mrs. Irene Johnson, a member of the Public Service Commission, told the miscellaneous estimates committee recently that, despite efforts to recruit bright young women for careers in government, more than 98 per cent of the top jobs are still held by men. Mrs. Johnson said that at present 20 of 1,200 executive level bureaucrats are women, compared with nine of 868 in 1973. She told the committee, "Statistically there has been no progress".

[Translation]

Mrs. Johnson stated that the commission had very badly failed to bring able women over to the public service. The commission is now focusing its efforts on women who are already working within the public service, but that initiative yielded only 25 women who would have the required potential to occupy a post in an executive capacity.

[English]

The commission has managed to increase the proportion of women in the career assignment program, a training school for potential executives, to about 30 per cent. However, only about 50 of the 500 program graduates to date are women. Mrs. Johnson said the pool of available female talent remains too small to make appreciable progress. "It's hard to make perceptible gains when you have such a small base to work on," she said. Little trace remains of anti-female bias in government departments and greater progress should be made in the future, she said.

So I repeat, Mr. Speaker, the evidence from all quarters is clear and cries out for attention. The pace of progress is too slow and the government has to accept some responsibility for some of the foot-dragging. The minister may talk about other actions yet to come. When? Surely he does not feel that the campaign he conducted earlier this year, for example, is anything like an adequate response to the type of challenge I have been describing this afternoon? When are further actions to come?

The minister and his colleagues may go on making references to human rights, but he and others cannot escape the import of the bulletin issued by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women following a Vancouver meeting in mid-January of this year, which stated:

> The major recommendations proposed by ACSW members at the meeting in Vancouver concerned the establishment of a federal human rights and interests commission. A wire sent by ACSW to Marc Lalonde, minister responsible for the status of women, read:
> "The ACSW strongly condemns the federal government for its inaction on human rights legislation. As early as July, 1973, this legislation was clearly identified as the ACSW priority and in December, 1973, cabinet approval in principle was announced. The action of the federal government to date has consisted of nothing but ineffectual promises. ACSW demands immediate introduction of the human rights legislation."

I may say in all modesty, Mr. Speaker, that as early as the winter of 1972 and again in May, 1973, I proposed the establishment of a human rights commission as a very substantial measure of working toward equality for the status of women besides making certain that other sorts of equality exist in the country. I do not mean to suggest that it is easy to produce effective human rights legislation, but I say to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) that expectations were raised by the government—commitments were made over two years ago—and the tone of the message from the Advisory Council on the Status of Women must surely indicate that there is no acceptability for complacency and indefinite delay.

The United Nations has proclaimed 1975 to be International Women's Year. Canada is participating in the promotion of the year but I fear we have a way to go before we can be said to be really participating in the spirit of the year. As individuals, we must all share some responsibility for that. As members of parliament, our burden is larger. The burden is heaviest of all for those who occupy the treasury benches. It is a burden that cannot be shrugged off by any of us. It certainly cannot be shrugged off by members of the government. The cause of equality would be far better served if the government stopped pretending that things are going well and it is doing as much as it ought to be doing in this field.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, today we are dealing with Bill C-16, the omnibus bill on the status of women which will provide needed changes to existing legislation ranging from unemployment insurance to the Canada Elections Act, the Immigration Act and the National Defence Act respecting female cadets.

Every day I am in the House of Commons I see the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) wearing his International Women's Year button which states "Why Not!". When I look at this government's record of legislation in implementing the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women to end discrimination against women in this country, I think it would be more appropriate, instead of wearing a button saying "Why not!" if the minister wore one saying "Why Bother?"

The record of this government in trying to eliminate discrimination based on sex is very sad. The cold, hard facts are that despite the throne speech promises and the pious platitudes from the minister, women in Canada are still discriminated against in the areas of job opportunities, job positions and rank, pay and legislation presently in existence at both the federal and the provincial level. They are also discriminated against in the government's own civil service and its operations.

The sad fact is that legislators have been too slow to react to the demands of women for equality in our society. Legislation to end discrimination against women has never been a high priority item for this government. The Royal Commission on the Status of Women began its hearings in 1967. Of the 122 recommendations it made which apply to the federal government, to date only 42 have been implemented. This bill will raise the number to 50.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sure the hon. member would not like wilfully to mislead the House. I tabled in this House some time ago a full and complete answer on the question of how many recommendations of the royal commission have been implemented and the figures contained therein do not coincide with those being put forward by the hon. member. The correct answer is in the records of this House. If the hon. member will check the evidence, he will find that he is not correct. I hope that he is not wilfully misleading this House.

Mr. Symes: It would be interesting to see the list, because some of them have only been partially implemented. I am talking about those which have been fully implemented. If I am in error, I stand corrected. I wish the minister would give the exact figure. The basic point is there were 122 recommendations and this government is far short of implementing them.

The roles for women in our society today are narrow, restricted and often onerous. There is still too much stereotyping, stating that the woman's place is in the home. Certainly, many women—perhaps the majority—feel that being a homemaker is a very rewarding and fulfilling experience. I have no quarrel with that whatsoever. However, if this is to be a just society with equal opportunity, an option should be open to women who do not want to conform to the role of homemaker. That option should be open to them without discrimination or impediment.

We find that many women in the home have the problem of being isolated from each other and from society at large. They often have to experience life through the achievements of their husbands and children. Many women I have talked to feel trapped in the home situation. Although it is rewarding for them to raise their children and prepare them for adulthood, many find it frustrating and inhibiting. They feel their creativity can only be channelled in a family direction rather than being free to pursue interests outside the family such as employment or further education.

Women in the home who would like to take courses or work part time are frustrated by the lack of child-care facilities in this country. What we have in child day-care centres today meets only 1 per cent of the need in this country. Because of inflation, many women who would like to stay at home and be with their children are forced to find work to supplement the family income so that their children may have a decent standard of living. For them, the lack as well as the expense of day-care facilities defeats the whole purpose of supplementing the family income.

Another situation of which we must remind ourselves is the degree of poverty that women face. Most women work in the home with no pay and no pension. The frightening fact is that in this country 60 per cent of those on welfare are women. Female heads of families are five times more likely to be living below the poverty line than male heads of families. Indeed, 40 per cent of women who head families in this country live in poverty.

This sad fact rests with this government's lack of initiative to bring in a guaranteed annual income and to provide adequate public housing at a cost these people can afford. It is not the fault of many single-parent families, especially those headed by women, that they are in this situation today. This government, through its inability to work out a guaranteed income scheme with the provinces, puts women and their families in an intolerable position. I see this whenever I am in my constituency and have appointments with my constituents. I can relate case after case of women who are experiencing abject poverty and extreme social and psychological stress because of the discrimination of legislation at the federal and provincial levels and because of the lack of policy in the social welfare field to alleviate these conditions.

What do you say to a separated wife who has a two-year old child to support, who is living in an upstairs apartment with no water facilities and has to carry water up in a bucket from downstairs. According to the regulations and laws governing payment of social benefits, she cannot move out of her apartment because she cannot afford any other situation. What do you say to her when she says, "I want to do something for my child. I want to raise him in an adequate home environment so that he will not become a delinquent or fall into the kind of poverty I see around me"? Or when she asks, "What am I supposed to do—go out and walk the streets to supplement my income?" We do not have answers because of the government's failure to implement programs along the lines I have described.

I could go on and on mentioning case after case of unmarried women who have decided to support their children, and the kind of difficulties they face. One woman desperately wants to work but cannot find day-care facilities for her child. These are the problems of poverty which face hundreds of thousands of women.

In addition, women face severe job discrimination. One-third of Canada's labour force is female and one-third of all married women work away from home. If we look at women's wages, we find they are significantly less than men's. When we examine people in managerial occupations, we find that the wages of men exceed the average wages of women by 107 per cent. If we examine clerical occupations, we find that on an average men's wages exceed those paid to women by 56 per cent. In the service industries the male wage exceeds that of the female by 112 per cent, in sales occupations by 167 per cent, and in professional and technical occupations by 66 per cent.

This discrimination exists in Canada today despite all the promised legislation and existing legislation. The inevitable conclusion is that the laws are not working to end discrimination in pay rates. Nor does it help if women get a higher degree of education. Studies have shown that men with no education receive wages which are 84.5 per cent higher than wages paid to women with no education. But suppose a man and a woman hold equivalent university degrees: the man receives 84.4 per cent more than the woman who is similarly qualified. From a survey of 74 occupations from 1969 to 1972, we find that the gap between men's wages and women's wages widened in 37 of those occupations; that is, in half of them.

It must be conceded that the government has failed to end discrimination in this field and that the situation is getting no better. Women have become a reserve pool of cheap labour and they are the least secure of all those in the labour force since they are most affected by lay-offs. Many employers use the existence of cheap female labour to blackmail male employees into accepting lower wages. Wage discrimination cannot help but promote hostility between men and women in the work force. Can you imagine the attitude of a man and a woman working side by side as senior accounting clerks when the woman, doing the same job as the man, earns only $117 a week and the man earns $151? Or a male X-ray technican earning $618 a month and doing the same job as a female who is earning only $576 a month? Or a professor in a university—if she is a woman she earns $19,750, while a male professor in the same faculty earns $20,635?

Example after example can be given to show that women are heavily represented in the worst paid occupations and in occupations subject to the poorest working conditions. If we look at women in the labour force, we find that one-third are in clerical occupations, one-third are in service occupations, less than one-fifth are in professional and technical occupations, one-tenth are production workers and only 4.2 per cent hold managerial or executive positions. This pattern is hardly an improvement over that of a decade ago.

If we look close to home at the situation in the government's own public service, the situation is equally bad. Since 1971, the gap between salaries paid to male and female public servants has actually increased. The median increase for men in the public service since 1971 has been $1,500, but for women it has been only $1,000. In the annual report on the public service tabled a few days ago we find that 77 per cent of the women in the public service earn less than $10,000 a year, but that only 46 per cent of the men earn less than that figure. Women make up 32 per cent of the total number employed in the public service, but hold only 2 per cent of the senior executive positions, 33 out of 1,614, and only 1 per cent of those in the senior management category, 17 out of 1,300 posts. We read in the women's bureau report issued by the Department of Labour the following conclusion:

> Although women workers still represent one-third of the labour force, they do not occupy a place in the labour force remotely proportionate to their numbers either in terms of occupational distribution or in terms of compensation.

There has been little improvement when it comes to ending discrimination against women in our society. We have polarized women into low paying and dead-end occupations.

I should also point out that the equal pay laws now on the books have no effect in areas where only women are employed. They apply only where both men and women are engaged in the same or similar work; where women only are employed, the laws are totally ineffectual. We need strong and enforceable laws to end discrimination against women on the grounds of sex, in terms of promotion, training and hiring as well as pay. To achieve this end, the law must first of all be written in clear language; it must be enforceable. Second, penalties should be provided to encourage full adherence. In Ontario, the maximum penalty for violating the human rights legislation applying to women is only $5,000, and not one case has been judged in this area to date.

We also need to make sure that the administrators of the law—that is, the government civil servants administering the law—are sympathetic to the intent of the law, and that the enforcers of the law, the courts, also have the proper attitude. We also need a campaign to promote the education of employers and employees as to what is the law and what are the rights of women under the law.

In this regard I ask the minister, why is there the delay in establishing the federal commission on human rights as recommended by the royal commission in 1971? The government has indicated that it is sympathetic to the idea, but we have not yet had this legislation. What we need is an independent commission with some power of investigation and prosecution so that the laws we design can be enforced. We should also have legislation to provide class action for women in the work force who as a group would be able to sue an employer for across the board discrimination in pay or working conditions. One individual female worker going up against General Motors is certainly not going to have much chance of success.

In regard to bringing in legislation and policies to end discrimination, I am proud to say that the New Democratic Party has had, as a matter of policy for many years, ideas and recommendations promoting equality of the sexes in the work force. For many years in this House we have espoused these ideas. The former member for Vancouver-Kingsway, Mrs. Grace MacInnis, was a pioneer in raising women's issues and in trying to get the government moving in this direction.

If we are to do something significant to end discrimination against women in our society, I suggest we implement some recommendations along the following lines. We should have vigorous and tough laws, enforceable laws that prohibit discrimination because of sex or marital status in the recuitment, classification, promotion, dismissal and advertising of jobs. We should make provision for child-care centres for children of all ages, which are free, community controlled and available 24 hours a day. We need tough laws, strictly enforced, to provide equal pay for work of equal value and to provide incentives to achieve this goal.

We need the provision of maternity leave with pay, of whatever duration the woman and her doctor deem necessary, and at the end of that time the right to return to her position without penalty as to seniority or salary. In the bill before us is, finally, an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act that would end some of the discrimination in the granting of maternity leave. However, even the amendment that the minister is proposing is very weak. The amendment allows about 15 weeks' maternity benefit, paid partly before the pregnancy and partly after the baby is delivered. Why not take the 15 weeks' benefit at any time during the claim year and leave it up to the mother to decide when she wants to take that kind of leave?

We should also provide that benefits for sickness not related to pregnancy, as well as maternity benefits, may be paid in the same claim year instead of persisting with the kind of discrimination that now exists. However, there is no provision in the bill to permit an adoptive working mother to take any maternity leave. Surely a mother who is adopting a child needs some time off work to acclimatize the child during the early days of the adoption period. We should have at least two weeks' maternity benefits for fathers so that they may be with the newly-born child and the mother to assist her around the house after the child is born. I also believe that the waiting period for maternity and paternity benefits should be waived. If we had that kind of amendment in this bill in regard to unemployment insurance, we would be making some kind of progress.

If we are to be serious about ending discrimination, we should also make changes in labour laws wherever required to provide collective bargaining rights and fringe benefits for domestic and part-time workers. We also require exploration of the concept of greater individual choice in the work week and work year. We need to amend our pension laws to give all women, including those who work at home, the same right to join pension plans and to draw benefits as enjoyed by men.

We must establish a comprehensive sex education program in the schools to end some of the stereotyping that goes on in regard to the respective roles of men and women in our society. Further, we need guaranties that male and female students are equally entitled to enrol in any course of their choosing, so that girls can become doctors, bank managers, or whatever they desire, and not be discouraged by guidance counsellors so they end up as being only tellers or nurses. We also need to eliminate sex stereotyping in all school text books. This is an insidious way of perpetuating the roles that men and women must conform to.

In addition, we need action to ban advertising which exploits sex and demeans the role and place of women in society. I believe we need amendments to take abortion out of the Criminal Code so that women are free, in accordance with their own conscience, to act on qualified medical advice. We need to have established in this country more sex education and birth control centres adequately equipped to advise on family planning, on birth control methods, abortion, and pre- and post-natal care. Lastly, we require community programs to encourage and assist women to take their full part in the political and cultural life of our country. Those are positive proposals, Madam Speaker. They are not new; they have been recommended by the royal commission and advocated by women's groups in this country. But this government has just dragged its feet in regard to implementing some of these very worthwhile and positive recommendations.

This omnibus bill, Bill C-16, provides a few improvements for the status of women in this country, but not many. There is still much to be done, but this government seems to be in no hurry to do it. I hope we will not think of this bill simply as a bill concerning women; I think we should regard it as more than that; because women's issues are men's issues too. We are part of a total society and we must understand that the measure of our society is how we treat all components of that society. The quality of our total society is surely measured by the quality of the least advantaged in our society. The measure of Canadian society today shows that there is no even-handed justice when it comes to the poor, the native people and to women.

We in Canada have deprived one-half of the Canadian population—the female population of this country—of their just place in our society. We have in turn been deprived of the potential of one of our greatest resources, the 11 million women who suffer discrimination because of government inaction.

In conclusion, I should like to quote from the Women's Bureau, 1974 report. I think they put this issue of the status of women in our country very eloquently. At page 31 of the report they say:

> When law affects women in a way that is different from the way it affects men, to the detriment of one or the other, then the quality of Canadian law is reduced. When the courts interpret the law in such a way as to reveal the influence of outmoded social traditions, traditions such as those which support a double standard of morality, one standard applying to men and another standard applying to women, then the quality of Canadian justice is diminished. When social custom and tradition remain fixed and unreformed in the face of growing awareness of the injustice of a double standard based on sex, then the quality of the Canadian way of life, for men as well as for women, is demeaned.

This situation of discrimination against women in Canada has existed in the past and it exists today. It is time it was stopped. This bill falls far short of tackling the major problems facing women, which I have described. I hope this minister and the Liberal government will finally wake up to the severity of the problem of discrimination in this country and make some fundamental reforms to the law instead of the token gestures which we have seen to date.

Mr. Cullen: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think it should be pointed out that the engagement of the hon. member for Sault St. Marie (Mr. Symes) was recently announced in the newspapers, and I am sure his intended bride will be reading this speech over and over again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, this afternoon we have undertaken the study of Bill C-16, a long-awaited bill, and I am almost tempted to say that the bill is late in arriving, since most women to whom the bill applies have shown so far their capacity and competence in numerous fields.

Madam Speaker, we have witnessed today a peaceful demonstration that has proven to us that when women put their mind to it, they can achieve great things. Within a few weeks or months at the most, they were successful in obtaining over 1,200,000 signatures with a view to having the government understand that abortion laws should not be liberalized any further. And I was especially glad this afternoon to witness a female member of Parliament accept, on behalf of her colleagues, to submit the petition to the Chair. Indeed I wish to congratulate the hon. member for South York (Mrs. Appolloni) for the way in which she carried out this task, which was greatly appreciated.

Madam Speaker, we are also in a position to note the way you carry out your duties. We cannot help but notice your patience, and especially your tactfulness, when you have to call hon. members to order. There is also a woman presiding over the Senate debates, and there again, we can see the competence with which she carries out her duties.

Besides, another lady had preceded her and I believe we find in parliaments everywhere women who assert themselves.

In Germany, there are 30 women who are members of Parliament in the Bundestag and one of them is the president of that Parliament. In England, a lady is at the head of the Conservative party and she is currently setting an example, to the prominent men of that party and of that country while at the same time giving goose pimples to members of the Labour party, if I may say so.

That goes to show that women did not wait for a law such as this one to take their place in public service more and more in business, in the professional as well as in the trading world, we see women asserting themselves and proving that they are as efficient as men, if not more so.

I believe this bill will nevertheless be welcome by the people. I hope it will be supported by all members so as to be passed following a study of all its objects for, as the minister said, it is an omnibus bill whose objective is to bring about improvement in many areas that have shown deficiencies up to now and particularly in certain fields, for instance as regards federal employees.

We are fortunate in Canada in that discrimination problems over race, colour or religion are scarce but still we should avoid sex discrimination.

We have been saying for some time now: Equal work, equal pay, not in the public service but in the case of federal employees other than public servants. For instance since 1971, a provision of the Canada Labour Code that came into force on July 1, 1971 provides that there must be no difference in the rate of pay of male and female employees working in the same industrial firm or under the same conditions, performing identical or substantially identical work, whose qualifications and endeavours are the same and whose responsibilities are identical or substantially identical.

As regards maternity leave for federal employees outside the public service, the Canada Labour Code provides a leave of up to 17 weeks, namely 6 weeks immediately following confinement and a period not exceeding 11 weeks immediately before confinement as well as any supplementary period resulting from a gap between the childbirth's actual date and the anticipated one. Afterwards, the employer must reinstate the employee in the position occupied by her at the time such leave commenced or in a comparable position with not less than the same wage and benefits. No employee shall be dismissed or laid off solely because she is pregnant. Mr. Speaker, one may recall that not so long ago, whenever a woman became pregnant, she was practically forced to leave her employment and sometimes, after confinement, she could not be reinstated in her position.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND PROVINCES ON SUBJECT OF ABORTION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster) moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence between the Minister of Justice and the Attorneys General and Ministers of Health of the provinces dealing with the subject of abortion and/or section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada.

He said: Madam Speaker, this motion was placed on the order paper some time ago; to be exact, on October 9, 1974. A long time after that, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), on March 16, 1975, rose in the House and objected to filing the requested correspondence, in this case hiding behind the cloak of confidentiality as his reason for not submitting the correspondence. The reason the motion was placed on the order paper was a suspicion held by a great many people concerning the allegations surrounding the Minister of Justice and the administration of his particular office which was being called into question because of the interpretation he was giving to section 251(4)(c) of the Criminal Code, which may have been in conflict with the intentions of parliament at the time the code was passed and may have been in conflict with the practices and standards being applied by therapeutic abortion committees across the country.

I submit that the onus in this kind of situation is on the government. The onus is on the government, when it hides behind the cloak of confidentiality, to satisfy this House that it is not under an obligation to introduce and table the correspondence, because the public has a right to know how any particular office is being administered, particularly the sensitive office of the Minister of Justice. The suspicions that were held at the time the motion was placed on the order paper, I submit, were subsequently confirmed by correspondence that came to light not too long ago.

Section 251(4)(c) of the Criminal Code provides an exception for a therapeutic abortion where the therapeutic abortion committee has by certificate in writing stated that in its opinion continuation of the pregnancy of such female person would or would be likely to endanger her life or health. It has been traditional in this country that the definition of "health" is the World Health definition. I shall read that definition:

> Health is a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity.

With that kind of background, one must examine what the minister said in the memoranda now released to the public. I wish to see more of the correspondence so that the minister will have an opportunity to defend himself against the very serious charges made that his own personal views on the subject of abortion have been reflected in the administration of his office. It is also interesting that at the time the law on abortion in this country was passed, the minister of justice at that time was the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). I should like to quote the minister of justice at that time, the present Minister of Finance, who had an intimate connection with this bill and piloted it through the committee and the House. This is what he said on June 2, 1970:

That was his interpretation as the minister responsible for the bill that was subsequently passed in this House and which is now being administered across the country. When we look at the statement made by the Minister of Justice in respect of the interpretation of that section, we find it is in clear conflict with what was intended when the bill was passed and is clearly in conflict with the statements the minister of justice made at the time he attempted to bring before the public some humane considerations on the subject of abortion.

Now I should like to quote from a memorandum which was circulated in October, 1974, to various officials by the present Minister of Justice. He said that social and economic considerations were not to be taken into account in determining whether a pregnancy lawfully could be terminated. That statement is in clear conflict with the law as it was understood, it is in clear conflict with the statements of the minister of justice at the time the bill was passed, and it is in clear conflict, I suspect, with the advice given him by the law officers of the Crown.

Therefore, I make the charge, knowing it is serious, that there can be an abuse of the role of this minister who indeed has a sensitive responsibility, in the administration of his office, to administer that office objectively—regardless of his personal views—and in accordance with the law, and to administer it fairly and justly in accordance with the views of his law officers. There is a substantial body of evidence to the effect that this has not been the case.

Unless this correspondence is tabled, how can members of parliament and the public determine whether the minister acted properly in carrying out the duties and responsibilities of his office? The cloak of confidentiality is no excuse, because the onus is on the government to tell us why this correspondence cannot be tabled and why the government is sensitive about this matter. I suggest it is sensitive merely because of embarrassment to the minister that would be created in having further correspondence released which might pertain to the conduct of that high and important office.

I submit that there is no right of confidentiality when a matter such as this becomes such an intense and important problem. There are circumstances in which the public interest is so great that when a government hides behind the cloak of confidentiality it is not doing a service to itself or to the Minister of Justice, and in fact leads one to the suspicion that justice is not being done or certainly is not appearing to be done. I believe it is incumbent upon the Minister of Justice to tell this House what he told the attorneys general of the provinces about the manner in which they should administer this most important section of the Criminal Code.

This matter is of great public interest, as was evidenced today by the many people who were here from the Right to Life group. That important group feels sincerely and strongly that this is a matter which should be imposed upon the country through the Criminal Code. The Morgentaler case is one reason this subject is so important in this House. I cannot argue for the release of this correspondence without again dealing with the real facts in respect of the Morgentaler case. He is in jail for one reason—his honesty and integrity in refusing to continue to participate in the sham that has been going on in the province of Quebec over all these years. The fact is, it has been admitted that 5,000 abortions were performed. Most of those were referred to Dr. Morgentaler by medical practitioners.

How many charges have been made against the medical club? How many doctors have faced charges? How many members of boards of directors of Montreal hospitals are facing charges today? The fact is that Dr. Morgentaler is carrying the load for the whole hypocritical system that has developed. The reason it got into that kind of state is simply that therapeutic abortion committees were not established in the province of Quebec. The state of New York now does 6,000 Canadian abortions a year. The only people who have more abortions in the state of New York are New York state residents. We have a law for the rich and a law for the poor. Those who can afford to go to the city of New York can get their abortions, but what happens when you come from Chicoutimi, from somewhere up in the sticks, or from the Northwest Territories?

An hon. Member: What's wrong with Chicoutimi?

Mr. Leggatt: I have nothing against Chicoutimi, I can assure you.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He comes from the sticks of Vancouver.

Mr. Leggatt: But there is no doubt in my mind that Dr. Morgentaler would not be in jail if he had not done something that can be called courageous. I agree he broke the law. That has been confirmed. Also, I abide by the decisions of our courts. But there is an element of courage in what he did. Today, 116 doctors in the province of Quebec admit that they, too, commit illegal abortions and that they conspire in these acts. I suspect that the number is closer to 800, not 116. The whole hypocritical sham that has developed around this subject needs correction.

One of the reasons we come to the House to debate the subject, no matter which side of the argument we support, is to get to the question of finally resolving the issue. One of the ways is to establish more therapeutic abortion committees, but another way—and it seems to me the only one that ultimately will be satisfactory—is to remove the subject from the Criminal Code and allow a person to follow the dictates of his or her conscience on this subject. This is not a matter of abortion on demand—that is a ridiculous claim—it is a matter of the conscience of the individual in possession of professional advice. I see no reason why that should not be consistent with anybody's view on the right to life. It is certainly consistent with decency and humanity.

I should like to quote a colleague of mine who is no longer in the House but who is a well respected former member, Mrs. Grace MacInnis, who spoke in the minority parliament on July 6, 1973, on this subject. This is what she said:

But like our own Dr. Morgentaler they have found themselves unable to wash their hands of the matter and piously leave women to suffer the tortures and dangers of a pregnancy which they did not want, for which they were only partly responsible, and which, in far too many cases, they did not know how to prevent.

This is the reality and the hyprocrisy of the whole matter of keeping abortion in the Criminal Code. This is where the injustice lies. I have tried to keep my remarks in low key, without touching on those horrors so often depicted graphically and in words when this matter is discussed.

I have tried to do that also. I do not think this very legitimate debate is enhanced with pictures of deceased women in morgues, or pictures of fetuses. I think that does nothing to rationalism in the debate. I respect views on the right to live and I recognize the concern that many people have that if life is taken, even in its growing form within the womb, if it is taken lightly we may have less respect for it. But there are no absolutes in this and women have a right not to be discriminated against in this one area where in vast parts of our country abortion is not available. Canada has one of the lowest abortion rates in the world. Those are things we should not forget.

Madam Speaker, I see my time is running out. However, I want to give credit to the Minister of Justice for one thing, that is that his position has apparently changed. In his latest memorandum of February 26, 1975, he departed very significantly from the position he had taken previously in advising hospitals, particularly those under his jurisdiction, that social and economic conditions were not to be considered in the decision whether to perform an abortion. In his last memorandum he stated:

For our part, it is clear that the justification for killing a fetus which parliament wrote into the law is one of health and life and that it is best to leave that judgement to experts. If medical committees will accept the responsibility and endeavour seriously to determine if the grounds set out by parliament are present, then the law will operate as intended.

I can live with that as a statement of the minister's responsibility. But it is a far, far cry from his conduct at the time when debate developed in the House between the minister and members of the opposition, when previous statements by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance were put to him. So I am pleased to see that there is a change. Nevertheless, it is a very deep responsibility that the Minister of Justice bears in the conduct of his office. During the period when he wrote the memorandum, when he attempted to stop grants to women's groups because of his suspicion that they may have been referring some of the women they were counselling to places where they could obtain abortions, there was an abuse of the minister's office, I submit.

We cannot use confidentiality to hide behind as a cloak with respect to what is fundamentally the government's responsibility, that is, to let the public know what has been happening on the abortion issue across the country and see how the Minister of Justice has been administering his portfolio. I urge, Madam Speaker, that the minister be required to table this correspondence so we can determine whether some of the things that I have read today are confirmation of the minister imposing his own interpretation of the Criminal Code on the attorneys general of this country.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Madam Speaker, I find it incongruous and infinitely sad that we should have listened to a speech in defence of somebody who is a self-admitted criminal. Dr. Morgentaler admitted that he had aborted women. The salient question he asked was whether they had enough money to pay him. These are the facts that came out in the transcript of the trial. Yet the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) is accused of hiding behind government confidentiality. We heard words such as "suspicion".

Questions such as whether the minister is carrying out his responsibility as Minister of Justice are being asked. Our Minister of Justice is being almost impeached in the House of Commons for carrying out his duty and defending the people of Canada. It is sad to see attempts at impeaching him when a known criminal is offered an award as a humanitarian. It may be a sign of what this society of ours is coming to. I should like to quote from an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Star of Wednesday, May 28, under the title "Signals of social breakdown". It reads:

In Canada there's a growing fear of social and political breakdown . . .

The danger is that an individual may think he can disregard the rules he doesn't like, and get away with it. But when everyone—groups, organizations and unions—

And, I may add, abortionists.

—does the same, it's destructive to society as a whole.

I understand the role of the Minister of Justice. His role is to make sure that justice is administered to all Canadians, to all humans. I submit that humanity starts at the moment of conception. Therefore, I am convinced that the Minister of Justice would be remiss in his job if he did not protect the weakest. And what is weaker than an unborn child?

● (1720)

We have been told that Dr. Morgentaler had great courage. We have been told that our Minister of Justice has been hiding. I think the hon. member wanted to give the minister a chance to defend himself. Quite frankly, I know of no other minister in the present cabinet who has so ably and so often defended himself both in this House and outside it. I think it is absolutely unjust to put him on the rostrum yet again and to accuse him as if he were the criminal, instead of the protector for all of us from such criminal actions as abortion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: We are told that the Minister of Justice—I am quoting the hon. member—has a deep and sensitive responsibility to be humane. What is more humane than admitting that after 17 days blood cells are formed in a fetus; after 20 days the heart and primitive intestine are formed; after 24 days the heart begins to beat in a fetus? The fetus is weak and is dependent upon its mother. Is it not humane to protect that heart and to let it grow to its full maturity until birth which comes along after the proper gestation period? That is what our Minister of Justice has been trying to do. Now he is accused of being secretive and of hiding behind confidentiality. I think the minister deserves a tremendous vote of thanks from all Canadians. He is a pillar of our society.

The hon. member ended by giving some credit to the minister. Frankly, I am afraid I missed it. I was too appalled by the accusations and innuendos. I will not repeat myself, Madam Speaker. I know there are other people who want to speak on this subject and who are as incensed as I am that a man who is protecting the weakest element of our society is now being impeached in this chamber. If I may, I would like to quote part of the oath of Hippocrates:

> The regimen I shall adopt shall be for the benefit of my patients according to my ability and judgment, and not for their hurt or for any wrong. I will give no deadly drug to any, though it be asked of me, nor will I counsel such, and especially I will not aid a woman to procure abortion.

The doctors who now brag of having broken our law took this oath. Do they now become heroes. Or is the real hero not the man who is being asked now to produce his papers?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to make a few comments in this most important debate. I listened with great interest to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) and, as I anticipated, he referred to the definition of the World Health Organization. He made reference to previous comments by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) regarding health and his interpretation of it, and the hon. member discussed the law as interpreted now and in the past. He discussed the Morgentaler case and he reiterated the same arguments we have heard from him so many times in the past. He reiterated them on behalf of many other individuals who support the pro-abortionist movement.

I say to the hon. member that in my view he has not accurately assessed the changing mood of the people of Canada as they have become more knowledgeable about the realities of abortion and more vocal in their determination to stop abortion on demand. I think this has been demonstrated in two ways today in this House. The Committee of One Million in presenting their brief on abortion to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last week and in presenting their petition today to the House of Commons, expressed their concern over the escalation of abortions which now exceed 43,000 per year in Canada, or 12.6 per cent of live births. They also expressed their concern regarding the deleterious effects of abortion on the health of women and their subsequent offspring, and about the social effects of widespread abortion in decreasing respect for every individual human life.

The formation of an all-party group in defence of the unborn child emphasizes the importance with which members of parliament view this problem and their earnest desire to promote fresh, meaningful debate. I believe the new order has begun. A new Canadian conscience is growing and demanding accurate information and informative debate, not only in this chamber but in every community and home in Canada. There is no place for misleading statements and misinformation which have contributed to the present situation of abortion on demand. The goal is to seek accurate information about the life and the world of the unborn child, to seek new approaches, to protect the life of the unborn child and to ensure that a mother's rights to health, happiness and freedom from other burdens are also protected.

I believe it is the responsibility of members of parliament to give the Canadian people the opportunity to determine the laws which will govern this country and it is in this spirit that I wish to make a few personal observations. The issue of abortion is not a private matter. It is not a sectarian religious problem or one of private morality. The issue is not to determine when life begins, for that is a scientific fact which is well known. The question which must be answered is what value we shall place on human life in general and whether the unborn human life in particular is entitled to legal protection.

The implications of this observation extend beyond the special concern of abortion, and in the final analysis they may be more important than the abortion issue before us. If we can justify the killing of an unborn child because it does not, by definition, fall within the arbitrary boundaries of humanity, then the question must logically be asked, will we decide that an individual, because of mental illness, senility, severe brain damage following an accident or for other reasons ceases to have the capability to lead a meaningful life, loses the protection of the law? The list of questions which can and should be asked in this regard is endless.

In the broader context of the abortion issue I would like to make reference to an editorial entitled, "A new ethic for medicine and society." This was published in the official journal of the California Medical Association at the height of a debate regarding the liberalization of the abortion law in California. The editorial discusses the controversy which exists not only in the United States but here as well in which the intrinsic worth and equality of every human life is secured by law regardless of age or health. It also discusses a new ethic according to which human life can be taken for what are viewed to be compelling social, economic or psychological needs of others. I would like to quote an important section of this article and it is as follows:

> The process of eroding the old ethic and substituting the new has already begun. It may be seen most clearly in changing attitudes toward human abortion. In defiance of the long-held western ethic of intrinsic and equal value for human life regardless of its stage, condition, or status, abortion is becoming accepted by society as moral, right, and even necessary. It is worth noting that this shift in public attitude has affected the churches, the laws, and public policy rather than the reverse.

Since the old ethic has not yet been fully displaced, it has been necessary to separate the idea of abortion from the idea of killing, which continues to be socially abhorrent. The result has been a curious avoidance of the scientific fact, which everyone really knows, that human life begins at conception and is continuous whether intra or extra-uterine until death. The very considerable semantic gymnastics which are required to rationalize abortion as anything but taking a human life would be ludicrous if they were not often put forth under socially impeccable auspices. It is suggested that this schizophrenic sort of subterfuge is necessary because while a new ethic is being accepted the old one has not yet been rejected.

In defining a growing role of physicians in deciding who will and will not live, the editorial went on to state:

One may anticipate further development of these roles as the problems of birth control and birth selection are extended inevitably to death selection and death control whether by the individual or by society.

Those of us who believe in the old ethic, and I am convinced that represents by far the majority of Canadians, are looking to the political process to reflect these views.

It is extremely important in debating this issue that we work and seek a point of view which can be accepted by all rational men and women. In this regard I must say to my colleagues and those individuals who utilize the term "sanctity of life" that I find the term is restrictive. In many cases it may only be accepted by those with religious views. It does have the advantage, or disadvantage depending on the point of view, of settling the abortion debate. In similar fashion for those who have the points of view that support abortion on demand, the debate is settled very quickly. So I say to you, Madam Speaker, that it is impossible to have a meaningful dialogue with that term.

Another term which is frequently used and which has some credibility is "quality of life". I know that term is used very frequently by those to my left. I believe it is at times an overworked phrase and can take on a very serious dimension which is unacceptable to the majority of people. When quality of life is interpreted as abortion, when quality of life allows a deformed infant to die, or when quality of life determines whether government medical priorities infuse funds to the elderly rather than to the young—and I give that as an example—then surely it is obvious that a consensus among men and women will not be reached.

The question must then be asked: is there a common point of view acceptable to all? I believe the answer to that question is an unqualified yes. In Canada we have the Bill of Rights and in the United States the Constitution, which indicate that to be human is to possess certain rights, and among these is the right to life.

The phrase, the right to life, suggests something objective, something which can be defined and acted upon. For example, the fetus has a right to life; a comatose patient has a right to life; a patient with a brain stem injury who is in a coma has a right to life.

This implies that a life should not be taken without adequate justification, and every living thing has a presumptuous right to live. In these circumstances the burden of proof rests on the individual who would take life and not on the individual who would preserve it. I recognize this leaves the crucial issue undetermined, namely, when is taking life justified? That, of course, is where disagreements occur.

I would state in the strongest terms possible that if we are looking for a point of view with universal acceptance, the right to life would fit the criterion, in my view. Such a point of view would protect our own self-interests and concern for our family, friends, and community. It is obvious there is an advantage to each of us to honour such a direction. And what is more important, Madam Speaker, it places the burden of proof on those who disobey the rule and opens the debate, as it should be opened, to decide what constitutes justifiable exceptions.

I hope my brief comments will serve a useful purpose in forming the framework upon which scientific data and the broad range of new knowledge and information can be added. I am convinced that if this House is permitted to debate this particular issue at a later date with honesty, with seriousness on the part of all members, and in a very rational form, and with new sources of information and knowledge, then the Committee of a Million that has been in Ottawa today will have been successful in its efforts.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): It is a rare event when we hear in this House a speech of such high principle and practical wisdom as we have just heard from an hon. member who is, I would remind you, Madam Speaker, a medical doctor.

I should like to say a word in response to the speech made by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) who summed up his remarks by saying, "Let's find out what is happening in the abortion issue". I can tell the hon. member what is happening.

I want to make some remarks concerning the suggestion of the hon. member in a spirit that I hope he will accept—a spirit that is not contentious, not filled with wild emotion. I would ask him to look at this very serious question in a way that I know he is capable of looking at it. In the time that we have served together in this House I have to come to admire the hon. member for the perspicacity of his approach, for his fighting spirit, for his legal expertise. Because he possesses these qualities I would ask him to move to an even higher level in this question and consider the civil rights of the unborn child.

The hon. member put forward a case that has a fundamental flaw. When he was summing up that portion of his remarks regarding Dr. Morgentaler he was calling for more therapeutic abortion committees to permit the kind of abortions that he would like to see permitted in the country. He moved from that to what is his real purpose, the real approach that he brings to this House, and that is not so much that he wants more therapeutic abortions as that he wants abortion taken out of the Criminal Code and made a private matter between a woman and her doctor—a matter in which, as he says, women will not be discriminated against.

I want to go on to the legal position. I encourage the hon. member to review this. I say to him, as the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes) has said, that abortion is not a private matter. The destruction of human life, even incipient or developing human life in the womb, can never be considered a private matter under our law.

I am not going to take the time to go down the side avenue of the legal case of a pregnant woman being hurt in an automobile accident and the double suit that results because there is a double life. I only want to say to the hon. member that just as the civil right to vote and the civil right against discrimination that all of us have must be protected by law, so too must the most fundamental and basic of civil rights, the right to life, be protected by law. It is that protection by law of the right of the unborn children of our country that I am addressing myself to, and practically no other element of this very complex issue.

If it was the intention of parliament to have the kind of abortion law envisaged by the hon. member for New Westminster, I think parliament would have made that clear in the 1969 amendments. I, too, have read those debates. I have come to the conclusion that it was not the intention of parliament to put through a law, the result of which would be the quadrupling of abortions over the next four years. In the year 1973, the most recent year for which statistics are available, there were 43,201 abortions, or 12.6 per cent of live births in this country.

I submit that the facts on that occasion illustrate the deep concern that members of parliament had to protect human life in the womb and at the same time to provide that avenue, as my colleague from Lambton-Kent said, for what constitutes justifiable exceptions. Therefore I appeal to the hon. member to consider that the intent of parliament, however badly that law was finally framed, was to protect human life and to allow for exceptions in cases that would be medically indisputable.

The hon. member comes from a province adjoining mine, the province of British Columbia. I ask him to consider British Columbia, Alberta, and Ontario, the three wealthiest provinces in this country, which now have the highest rates of abortion by far. Are we to suspect that it is more dangerous to a woman's health to be pregnant in British Columbia, Alberta or Ontario than in any other province? Surely that fact alone illustrates that in those provinces abortions are being performed for social reasons, which was not the intent of parliament.

As legislators we must give very serious consideration to our responsibilities. A short while ago the hon. member and I were on the external affairs committee together. We achieved a result because there was collaboration. We achieved something that will benefit Canada in the long run. We did that by working together, even though we do not share the same basic views. I ask him whether we can work together, as reasonable people who have a common bond in this House, for good law. I cannot believe that the hon. member will accept any law as good if it violates the civil rights of unborn children in such escalation as we have seen over the past four years.

[Mr. Roche.]

The hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) brought in a petition today with over one million names. I remember a cold, wintry day in November, 1973, when the Alliance for Life and associated groups came to parliament Hill with a petition of 350,000 names. They presented it to members of parliament in a demonstration of concern for the pro-life movement. We encouraged them to go back to their homes around the country and triple their efforts to bring back to parliament a petition containing the names of one million Canadians who wanted nothing more or less than justice on the abortion laws.

Today we have seen the result of the determination of that group of people who have touched the nerves of so many Canadians from coast to coast. The petition they brought in today asks members of parliament to consider this question seriously. Members of parliament from all four parties in this House have banded together in a spirit of co-operation to try to achieve a good law. I appeal to the minister and the hon. member for New Westminster to join with us.

We have produced a statement which all hon. members in this House are invited to join through signature or association. Many members of parliament have already become associated with this inter-parliamentary group. I predict that it is going to grow. As it grows and as we move into a major debate in this House, I ask the hon. member to consider seriously whether he can work with us to achieve what is our common goal of law.

The hon. member for York South put on record the words of the petition so that those thousands of Canadians who will be seeing Hansard over the course of the next few weeks will be familiar with what is actually stated in the petition. I want to put on record a few paragraphs of our statement of concern with which members of parliament are becoming associated. I quote the precise statement:

As members of parliament, representing all parties, we wish to indicate publicly our concern at the growing number of abortions in Canada.

Section 251 of the Criminal Code permits a therapeutic abortion committee to allow an abortion when continuation of a mother's pregnancy "would be likely to endanger her life or health". Since that law went into effect, abortions quadrupled to 43,201 in the four years 1970-73 and are now 12.6 per cent of live births in Canada.

This indicates to us that the word "health" is being defined very broadly and that in fact abortions are being permitted for a variety of social reasons. We believe parliament did not intend this to happen and we ask that legislative action now be taken to stop this needless escalation while at the same time allowing abortions in genuine cases of danger to life or health.

We affirm that abortion is not a private matter. The destruction of human life, even incipient or developing human life in the womb, can never be considered a private matter under our law. Nor is abortion a merely sectarian religious problem or one for the area of private morality. As legislators, we view abortion as a question of civil rights: the civil right to life of the unborn child. The civil rights of the mother cannot be expressed by summarily taking away the life of the unborn child.

In saying this we also emphasize our support of measures to assist pregnant women who are troubled. A positive response to social problems will help to remove the desire for abortion.

All this is a profound and delicate problem.

As legislators, we recognize that the problem must be dealt with primarily in parliament. It is not a matter of better application of the present law; it is the wording of the present law which permits such loose application and which consequently must be changed. This issue, cutting to the very core of life itself, transcends partisanship, and it is in a spirit of collective responsibility that we are seeking a better law. To this end we have formed a Parliamentary Group in Defence of the Unborn.

We welcome the petition of one million signatures sponsored by the Committee of One Million which requests legislation "providing for the child conceived but not yet born the same protection provided for any other person."

We ask the Canadian government to give earnest consideration to a legislative change in Section 251 to restrict abortions to cases where the medical need is indisputable.

I close on this note. I believe this to be a moderate and responsible approach taken across the aisle of this House, and I ask the government to give serious consideration to what we have set forth in this document, one which expresses the will of one million Canadians and many more besides.

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Madam Speaker, the important matter we are debating today concerns the confidential nature of the discussions and communications between the federal and the provincial governments. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) has asked that copy of the correspondence on abortion and section 251 of the Criminal Code exchanged between the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), the provincial attorneys general and provincial health ministers be tabled in the House.

In the last few years, the disclosure of information by ministers of the Crown has been the subject of many a discussion. Indeed, on March 15, 1973, the President of the Privy Council proposed a series of guidelines on that vast subject. The correspondence concerned in the motion before the House obviously falls under section 4, which guarantees the confidentiality of government documents whose disclosure could be prejudicial to federal-provincial relations.

On presenting that text, the President of the Privy Council stated, and I quote:

Our objective is to make as much information available as possible. We believe that Members of Parliament require factual information about the operations of the government in order that they may carry out their parliamentary duties. That statement is included in the general principle. We are also aware that the desire to make available as much information as possible must be balanced against effective public administration, protection of the security of the state and rights to privacy. It is always a delicate matter of judgment to balance the desire to make information available with the effective administration of the government, security of the state and other considerations.

All members, I am convinced, recognize unreservedly the often delicate and extremely complex character of federal-provincial relations. It is obvious that in some cases, the first governmental objective—information—should give place to superior interests, of which free and honest communication between the federal and provincial governments is not the least. One cannot deny that when information is intended for the population or for public debate, its expression often takes on a meaning or colour that is different from that which is important to the promotion and preservation of elements of compromise and comprehension as well as to the openness of mind and equilibrium essential to federal-provincial relations. It seems to me, Madam Speaker, that this touches on the main principles governing the divulging of internal administrative instructions and documents.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, may I point out that the Minister of Justice, members of parliament and the public in general have all interest in any information on governmental activities being published, but obviously, in my statement, there must be "reasonable" limits to such a policy, and the word "reasonable" is the key word, so that the government may act with efficiency and security. As a result, the exclusion of intergovernmental correspondence, such as the kind mentioned in the motion, represents an exception that is motivated as well as essential. In the present case, Madam Speaker, official secret regulations have been well observed, of that I am convinced, so I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion. Madam Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. The hour appointed for private members' business has now expired. It being six o'clock, I leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS

THIRD COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning a report tabled in the House today. I am referring to the third report of the Special Joint Committee on Public Service Employer-Employee Relations. I wish to point out a substantial discrepancy in the translation. On page 5 of the French text, paragraph (a) reads as follows:

(a) Les fonctions et pouvoirs du tribunal d'arbitrage, de l'arbitre en chef et des arbitres devraient être confiés à la Commission des relations de travail dans la Fonction publique et révoqués par les membres de la Commission, siégeant en comités ou à titre personnel;

I point out to the House that that was not what the committee had in mind when it drafted that provision. The English text is the one that reflects better the opinion of the committee, and I quote from page 5 (a):

[English]

(a) The functions and powers of the Arbitration Tribunal, the Chief Adjudicator and adjudicators should be assigned to the Public Service Staff Relations Board and discharged by members of the Board, sitting as panels or as individuals;

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I recognize the point raised by the hon. member is very important, doubly so as the report will appear in today's Votes and Proceedings. The Chair therefore will see to it that the matter is looked into and corrections made so that the text be consistent with facts and the translation revised.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

STATUTE LAW (STATUS OF WOMEN) AMENDMENT ACT, 1974

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH EQUALITY OF STATUS FOR MALE AND FEMALE PERSONS UNDER CERTAIN STATUTES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-16, to amend certain statutes to provide equality of status thereunder for male and female persons, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, when the debate was adjourned at five o'clock I was mentioning that in the old days female employees could be laid off because they were pregnant or after giving birth. This practically never happens nowadays, neither among federal employees who are not civil servants nor even in the private sector. So the legislation has evolved. Representations were made to that effect by organizations which defended the role of women in business, and employers took heed.

Mr. Speaker, there is also in that omnibus bill an amendment which caught my attention and which I fully endorse. I am referring to the cadet corps sponsored by the National Defence Department. Up to now, that department only accepted young boys in that cadet corps, and in the amendment of the minister, the word "person" would be substituted for "boy", which would enable young girls to take an active part in such cadet corps. Now, there again, Mr. Speaker, even though it was not provided in the act, the Department of National Defence has been allowing young girls into cadet corps for at least two years. In fact, a few days ago, I attended in La Sarre, in my constituency, the tenth anniversary of the foundation of the cadet corps, and I noticed several young girls among the cadets. At the various information booths, we saw for ourselves that those young girls, especially in the field of communications, managed quite well among the boys of that cadet corps. They showed that they could provide us with the required information, that they could find co-ordinates on maps of the area and, therefore, eventually render services and even direct, if necessary, the operations of a military corps. Well, I agree with that provision of Bill C-16 which will actually allow young girls to enrol in those cadet corps. Since it was decided that 1975 would be Women's Year in Canada, the press especially and the broadcasting media have given that event a wide coverage. This publicity has not always turned out to women's advantage. Even if they wanted or thought they would liberate women in all their daily activities or whatever, it seems that they tried to ridicule the role of women at home, and it is quite unfortunate. They have tried to lead people to believe that women had no future at home, that they should be only outside, that they could be useful only out of their home, which I believe, Mr. Speaker, is completely wrong.

Recently in northwest Quebec, in Abitibi, there has been a meeting of more than 250 women from Abitibi, a meeting about a project for the promotion of women; the women at the meeting have been able during that day to evaluate their situation and to think over many aspects of life today. They believe that publicity diminishes women by leading people to believe that the mother or the wife at home is of no use to society. They suggested that women at home bring out human values, they prepare the society of tomorrow, first by giving life, by educating children, by giving them the sense of moral and social responsibilities, as the family is the cell of society.

Mr. Speaker, how often have we seen or heard judges of the social welfare court mention that juvenile delinquency, for example, was generally due to the desertion of women from home. They have deplored this situation. But, to try through a huge and well-organized campaign to make people believe that a woman's place is not at home anymore, that is fostering juvenile delinquency. A woman's duty is first and foremost to her home. When she has to work outside for long hours, especially when there are young children, she cannot achieve maximum efficiency, either in one place or the other.

There is another important role: that played by a woman within the family. There is no better way to get involved in society. As far as religion is concerned, it is emphasized that the woman who believes in Christ gives another dimension to moral and human values; she gets involved in a more serene manner. That also is important, Mr. Speaker. There is too much of a tendency nowadays to forget human values. This definitely leads us to lose the sense authority. In the last fifteen years, especially in Quebec, there has been constant demands to relax authority, so that next to nothing is respected anymore. There is no more respect for authority. Parental authority is disregarded. So is government authority, at every level. The law is ignored, so we should not wonder at what is now happening. This is important. We must insist that the woman with small children may spend all her time bringing up her children, if she so desires. Ten years ago or so, one bank researched the homemaker's monetary value, what should be a fair return for the work she does in the home. The figure was quite impressive.

This is what was found ten years ago. The daily work load of the wife was assessed as follows: As a baby-sitter, $55.63 a week; as a dietitian, $3 a week; as a shopper, $4.95; as a cook, $32.75; as a dishwasher, $9.30; as a housekeeper, $26.25; as a washerwoman, $11.21; as a seamstress, $3.25; as a practical nurse, $1.20; as a caretaker, $3.83; as a gardener, $3.57; as a driver, $4.44 a week. That makes a total of $159.38, and that was ten years ago.

Mr. Speaker, if we had to pay wives at those rates, I believe that many more men would wash dishes, do the housework and the shopping, but such is not the case. The fact is that the housewife plays a very important role which frees the husband and enables him to spend more time at his work and earn what is required to support this cell of society that is the family.

Mr. Speaker, these values must not be ignored. This is why we are always trying to improve our social legislation, for instance. When we press the government, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), for instance, we are often thought hard to deal with and demanding, but, Mr. Speaker, we do this precisely to give more freedom to women, to enable the wife with young children to do her work and raise her children without having to get outside work in order to supplement the income required for the welfare of her family.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that Bill C-16, which includes several amendments, will improve in certain cases the status of women. In other cases, it may deprive the wife of certain privileges she previously had, for instance, when her husband is brought before the court for a criminal offence. Yet, Mr. Speaker, I believe that this bill should be considered further in the appropriate committee, and I believe that for the moment, even though we could ask for more, either in this bill or in the related legislation, it remains an important step, and we are ready to support and endorse it.

Mr. Lalonde: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister of National Health and Welfare on a point of order.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations with the representatives of the other parties and I think that the various parties agreed that the next speakers should be restricted to 20 minutes up to the end of the debate on second reading.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We agree, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): D'accord.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion. Is it agreed that the speeches be limited to 20 minutes?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the feminist author Simone de Beauvoir said that there were two kinds of beings in this world, human beings and women, but that when women began behaving like human beings they were accused of trying to be like men. We've come a long way as the ads say, but we have a whole world of attitudes to change before we will progress much further.

It was in 1921 that Agnes MacPhail blazed a trail from the prairies to Parliament Hill. But even then, once we knew the way, we did not follow in large numbers. In 1972 there were five women in this chamber. As five more came to join them, Grace MacInnis, a respected veteran of long years on the political and feminist scene, retired, reducing our total to 9 out of 264. We still have a long way to go until we accomplish the minimum 51 per cent coup d'état.

Exactly this time last year I received a letter from the only declared feminist in my area. It arrived just after my nomination, and read in part:

> Prime Minister Trudeau in his Throne speech promised "equality for women". There are very few women's rights groups in the north but it is only a matter of time before the movement reaches us with any momentum.
> The only people who can be truly interested in seeing the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women implemented are women themselves.
> If you become our elected representative I, as one of your constituents, would expect you to be familiar with the Royal Commission Report and also do work in support of its implementation. I will work toward a successful campaign on your behalf . . .

She went on to say I have her vote even though she is a socialist, and she hopes she can secure many more.

An hon. Member: Is that from Frank Howard?

Mrs. Campagnolo: No. It is from a woman.

I must tell my constituent, and her newly organized more than 200 sisters in the north, that the bill of rights, which will bring forward for debate the major unfulfilled recommendations of the report on the Status of Women, is almost completed. But I must admit, it seems there is an unjustifiable length of time before getting such measures into the House for consideration. What good is it to put forward a bill such as the one we address ourselves to tonight if it languishes, waiting for House time? Yes, it is good legislation.

The statute law (Status of Women) Amendment Act, 1974, would have been good legislation in 1954. Substituting the word "spouse" for "wife" is important. Amending the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide more flexibility in the period during which maternity benefits may be paid is important. Amending the Pension Act to create new entitlement for widowers of members of the armed forces is important. It is just that spouses of military women should receive benefits. It is just that members of the forces who are married to each other receive consideration. It is very important that girls be allowed to belong to cadet organizations, and that the National Defence Act be amended to accomplish that. But it is attitudes of mind that are the most important to change.

The persisting myths and fables about women must be banished forever. We women are reputed to be waspish, ungenerous, even evil; and of course, most of all, we are reputed to hate each other. We are manipulated to oppose each other like prize cats, a tactic that has worn thin with age and fatigue, for women of every station in life, of every philosophical persuasion, have come to realize that by being supportive of each other, by giving the other woman the edge, if you will, the unity that results can change our destinies.

I will not quote again the endless statistics that show quite clearly women face economic discrimination. I would like to remind hon. members that it costs as much for a woman to rent a room, buy food and clothes, get medical, dental and professional aid, as it does a man.

Are there 20 per cent price cuts in theatre tickets, for instance, to the hardworking ladies-wear clerk who makes 20 per cent less than the male clerk selling lingerie beside her?

Ah, but the potential employer says gravely: "No matter how competent you may be, you may prove to be unreliable because women have babies". I submit once and for all, so do men. Men have babies too. Parenthood is not a unilateral business.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: You will find that 34 per cent of families are headed by women in this country today. Is raising children to become exclusively women's work? I have real faith that the new generation will reserve this trend and allow fathers who wish it to become an integral part of their children's lives.

One of the concerns of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), both as minister of that department and as minister responsible for the status of women, has been to study the possibility of including non-wage earning spouses, those who work in the home, under the Canada Pension Plan. It was for this reason that last year he requested the Advisory Council on the Status of Women and the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Committee to submit proposals to him, outlining ways in which spouses who work in the home could become contributors to the Canada Pension Plan. Early this year he received the recommendations of these two groups.

Both advisory bodies considered three alternatives unacceptable. They concluded that it would be impractical to include non-wage earning spouses in the plan through the payment of a salary to spouses working at home. In addition, they submitted recommendations against including spouses in the plan through a system of voluntary contributions or through the establishment of a separate plan.

They did both recommend, however, that spouses at home be included within the plan, and that Canada Pension Plan credits be evenly divided or split between marriage partners for the purpose of applying benefits and other provisions—either on a continuing basis, or only in case of marriage breakdown. The Canada Pension Plan Advisory Committee suggested that this might be carried out on a universal basis, or only in the case of marriage breakdown. The ACSW, on the other hand, proposed that the splitting of credits be implemented on a universal basis for the future and, in the case of marriage breakdown, splitting of past pension credits also.

Now let us look for a moment at that romantic stereotype with which we are all so familiar, marriage. You all know it well. Women and men are socialized to believe that their roles as mother and wife and father and husband will prove to be the ultimate source of fulfillment. In some cases blessed couples are able to accomplish that, but the realities of marriage are harsh.

Let us look at some marriage laws and interpret the meaning, clear eyed and without romance, as a recent women's publication did. Here we have what women think about marriage:

> The law says a husband must support his wife and children . . . but a working wife can keep all her earnings for herself. She does not have to support her husband or even her children. The law means women are not responsible for supporting other people, women are kept, they are not keepers. The law says the wife must live wherever the husband chooses. If she doesn't she can be classified as a deserting wife. She will lose her dower rights and right to support, and he can divorce her. The law means she must be physically available. The law says if the wife leaves the husband or is unfaithful to him, she loses her right to be supported by him and she loses her right to his property. The law means even if she has lived with him for 20 years and has been a full-time cook, housekeeper, nursery-maid, janitor, secretary and lover, all without pay, she loses her rights to everything as soon as she stops providing sexual services exclusively for him. The wife has a right to the husband's property only so long as she is part of his property. The law says the husband can sue for loss of consortium, the wife cannot. The law means the wife has pledged her body, the husband has not . . . The law says a man cannot be convicted of rape if the victim is his wife. The law means it is not a crime to violate what you own.

There was talk of urgency today by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), and he is right. There is urgency. Women have defined beyond question their needs; they have been studied, they have been analysed, they have been researched. Now is the time to end the study and the talk, now is the time for action. Women have sought out their history and their heroines, and there are many, many heroines in this country, ordinary Canadian women who have striven, worked, protected, comforted and nurtured their families but who have sought a richer, kinder, gentler life for all mankind at the same time. Kindness is our weapon and our strength. A society as torn with extremes as ours requires healthy doses of love, warmth, and kindness if it is to survive. But we want these to be considered and actually to be male as well as female attributes. We want these characteristics to be assumed unashamedly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: In other words, we want both sexes to be full-flowering, well-rounded, loving human beings.

"Vive la vie", I see it around me today everywhere. Life is sacred and precious, and I agree most fervently. But "vive la vie" must be considered at both extremes in our society and in our time, and I submit that in extreme circumstances there will be abortions and there will be capital punishment under the laws as they presently stand. The two are irretrievably locked in logic. Neither abortion nor capital punishment would take place in an enlightened society. Abortion should be unnecessary, execution by the state unwarranted. But sadly, in my opinion, we are not at that stage of development at this time.

Before I was elected I told my future constituents how I felt about the issue of abortion. I said I believed abortion should be removed from the Criminal Code and placed under the provisions of the National Health Act.

I believe there are considerably more abortions taking place in our hospitals than are necessary, and I submit these abortions are dehumanizing to women and weaken their general integrity. I do not think that hospital committees are functioning in the manner in which they were intended to function in some cases, and I do not think the present system is equally administered across the country.

I believe that checks and balances are required, and I respect the stand of the Alliance for Life, but unfortunately I cannot agree with them, because until our country places more emphasis on sexual responsibility and contraception, there will continue to be too many abortions. There have always been abortions, there are abortions now, and I submit that until we have a perfect society there will continue to be abortions.

If we submit to the anti-abortionists, there will resume in our back streets the devastating disgrace of illegal abortions, a return to the maiming and deaths of women in the past. On the other hand, if we move to the completely pro-abortion stand, we will do irreparable harm to the social fabric of this nation. The Hippocratic oath, I submit, would have been written differently in the matter of abortion had it been men who conceived in ancient Athens!

It has been an emotional day in the House and many of us have met with the earnest representatives of the Alliance for Life, but I appeal to members of the House, and to people outside this House who look to us for leadership, for a rational approach to a profoundly complex problem. The present law of the land is a good law when administered with equity.

I think I would like to answer one question that was raised by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche). He wondered why the richest provinces had the highest abortion rate. I can offer an answer to the hon. member. The answer is that the wealthy of this country and the wealthy of the world have always had access to abortion, and the poor, the ill-educated, and those who are unfortunate not to share our level of life, have not. Their sisters are beginning to have the same type of equity as has been known in the circles of the rich since time began.

There must always be room for rational thought. Slides of aborted fetuses to sensationalize a particular philosophy serve no other purpose than to bring to mind the revolting human degradation of women who were driven by such desperation as most men cannot imagine to attempt to abort themselves, or to submit their bodies to an inept, illegal, back-street abortionist. Is the bloody and dismembered fetus any more or less repugnant to anyone here to view than, for instance, a thirteen year old girl, crouched naked in death in her own blood, after attempting to abort herself with a sharpened kitchen implement? I leave those two thoughts in the minds of hon. members tonight as they consider the status of women in this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset that although perhaps some of us in the House would not agree completely with all of the sentiments that have been expressed by the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo)—and I emphasize "the hon. member"—there are none in the House who would in any way deny the conviction and passion with which her speech to us was delivered this evening. After having said that, I would like to deal with the basis of the bill, and not to deny in any way the very strong feelings which the hon. member for Skeena has expressed.

Some time ago the director of the Women's Bureau of the Department of Labour was speaking at Thunder Bay, Ontario, and she put forward in a very simple but a very profound way the principle that the bill seeks to advance. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote her words on that particular occasion so that they may appear in the records of the House. She said:

Canadian society consists of a single total entity made up of many component parts, men and women comprising the two basic major components. But men and women in Canadian society belong to a considerable number of cultural, ethnic and religious groups, each of which is in itself an integral component of the total social structure.

Only in recent years have we come to understand that the quality of this total society cannot be higher than the quality of the least advantaged of all of its components. Thus, if the status of any one ethnic group is of a lower degree than that of another ethnic group, the quality of the total Canadian society is reduced, if the status of one cultural group is considered to be inferior to that of another, then the quality of the total Canadian cultural mosaic is thereby lowered. If the status of one racial group is inferior to that of another, then the quality of the total Canadian society is lessened.

Similarly, if the status of women in Canadian society is less than that of men, either in law or in practice—

As was so well put by the hon. member for Skeena.

—then the status of Canadian society, as a whole, is lowered thereby. For in these circumstances Canada is not only seen to be a society in which evenhanded justice fails to prevail but the country is deprived of one of its greatest resources, for it is deprived of a potential inherent in half of the population.

I think that hon. members on all sides of this House will agree that the words of the speaker on that occasion were indeed profound.

If Bill C-16 is carefully reviewed it can be found that it is part of the legislative action we must deal with in this House if we are to give more than lip service to the sound principle which is being discussed tonight, the principle of equality of status. In speaking to this bill and in stating my basic support for what it contains, I want to make it clear that I do not condone what must be described, even by the most unbiased observer, as some pretty slow progress by the government.

This bill, or one similar to it, was introduced into the twenty-ninth parliament, but during those days the government was more concerned with survival than with equity and justice, so it was allowed to die. I believe that its action—or in this case, its lack of action—is more eloquent than ministerial protestation and pronouncements, particularly in that year which preceded International Women's Year. This lack of action, I submit, speaks for itself. The fact is that the government has given a low priority to the status of women in our society.

In the fall of 1974 the bill came forward again in the form in which it is now before us, and here we are halfway through International Women's Year, just beginning the discussion of the principles of this bill, and at a time when this House is running into the tail end of the first half of this session. And all of this is occurring in the atmosphere which was created by a minister who tried to give the impression on the program entitled "Lady is a Four Letter Word" that his government gave it a high priority.

In view of the atmosphere he tried to create, perhaps we may be able to thank the minister for saying what he did because I am convinced that if he had not been cornered on that program, thereby creating the impression that he did, he would not have had to move at long last. The minister has now moved, and I suggest with the greatest of respect to him that he has moved in this direction not out of any great commitment to the rights of women, but by reason of a great commitment to himself and his own preservation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Caccia: How can you say that?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): All my friends on all sides of the House know that in a matter of this nature it is not my intention nor my way to be partisan—

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —because this piece of legislation does involve the fundamental rights of one-half of the Canadian people, how that one-half is to be treated, dealt with and considered, and in what way and whether that one-half is to be subject to the same law and the same practice as the other half.

What is the cause of women in Canada this year and, indeed, in every year to follow? Women in Canada are asking for the opportunity to play a full and complete role in the social, economic, and political life of this land. They ask for no more, and they will accept no less. In those terms they are asking all Canadians, men and women, to re-examine their respective attitudes toward women, and we are asked today to approve in principle a bill to give at least part of that re-examination some life.

I know of no case which could be based on a stronger foundation. Surely there are few causes which can claim to be based on such principles of human rights as have been proclaimed and are supported in our own country and in other countries throughout the world, through the auspices of the United Nations.

In Canada the fundamental document is the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, and human rights legislation, such as it is, in our statutes and in those of the provinces which have made advances in that sense. This bill puts forward for consideration by this House some eleven more of the recommendations of that royal commission, so it is important on that ground alone. But let us not rest on our oars, for this bill does not bring us to the end of our labours or to the end of the road. However, we can say that it is a step, even though it is a minuscule step, along the way to what women and, I hope, fairminded Canadians regardless of sex would like to see for that one-half of the population.

I had intended to deal at some length with the principles of the legislation. The minister was kind enough to do that in the course of his speech, and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has also touched on it. The Committee will have an opportunity to deal with the detail of this legislation, so I will not do so at this time. Regardless of that, the changes which are inherent and understood in this legislation are long overdue.

Although some may say that the government and the minister cannot be faulted for bringing these changes forward at this time, I say with a great deal of respect for the minister that he and the government can certainly be faulted for not bringing them forward at an earlier stage in this parliament or, indeed, in the twenty-ninth parliament.

In considering this bill I think it is fair to say to the minister that the work of the government and of this parliament with respect to the position of women in our society and their status in that society is by no means completed. For example, I would call the attention of my hon. colleagues to the position of women in the Public Service of Canada. Within that public service women are gaining some recognition for their abilities, but though women represent more than one third of the labour force they are still mainly restricted to lower paid, non management jobs. This is not to say that the onus must fall completely on the government. The government has made some efforts in the direction of assisting women, or providing the vehicle by which women can move into management positions to a greater degree.

There is certainly an onus on women to prepare themselves educationally for the positions they desire and then to push for recognition to obtain those positions. There is support for this from the Public Service Alliance of Canada, and I know that there is the same degree of support from the Professional Institute of the Public Service. I hope that as time goes on, women for their own part will adopt a firmer stand within their respective bargaining agencies. One would hope to see more women elected to executive positions in those bargaining agencies. I think that would be carrying on the example set by Mrs. Carr and others in the labour movement.

I suppose part of the problem is the question of attitude. I know the position is changing, but for many women now in the public service I am sure their early life was one in which they were encouraged to become participants in traditional women's occupations. There were likely very few Canadian homes in which it was said to the daughters of those homes that they ought to become lawyers, doctors, engineers, architects. This attitude is certainly changing as enrolment in the professional schools would indicate, but there is still that reluctance which only time and new attitudes can eliminate.

I would not want anyone to have the impression that the onus is all on the women in the work force to improve themselves—there is a very heavy onus on the men in the work force with respect to their attitude toward their employees who are women.

I should like to commend to members on all sides of the House an article, actually the first five articles, referred to by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon. The title of the article is "Canadian Business Isn't Really Committed to Extending Equal Opportunity to Women". The findings of a survey done by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of some 850 CBC women across Canada are surprising, to say the least.

The conclusions of the task force report are that the majority of women are dissatisfied with their status in the corporation; that they suffer from frustration in their work situation, and there is a growing feeling of powerlessness.

The very interesting statistic to be noted, and this was referred to by the Leader of the Opposition, is that the working environment in careers of CBC women are controlled by a male majority of three to one, who held an even greater proportion of decision-making power, 93 per cent of managerial jobs, and whose underlying beliefs about women's appropriate role at work differed drastically from the women's view of themselves. Another important finding is that there is a deepening frustration that there had been so little change made. As well, there was a deep-seated belief that men were basically oblivious to their dissatisfaction and concerns, and had no real inclination toward equality of opportunity.

The results of all this, according to the report, are a reduced willingness to work, diminished productivity, and subtle forms of non co-operation in daily activities.

The report contained an excellent discussion on the problem as it relates to one corporation. I would respectfully commend it to members of the House because it concerned a public corporation analogous to the Public Service of Canada.

I would not want it to be said that there has been no advancement at all in terms of the public service. In fact the Public Service Commission annual report for 1974 does reveal some improvement in the statistical sense. But in the sense of the numbers of women involved in positions of increasing responsibility, the record is nothing to write home about. It is in this latter sense, as opposed to pure statistics, that progress should be measured.

One of the basic and classic cases of the lack of awareness of the government, and its failure to act with dispatch in terms of a large group of public servants, can be found in the case of the public service secretary and—the whole matter of rug-ranking. As you know, Mr. Speaker, I raised this matter in the House. It struck me as rather strange that the government, having received a brief in July, 1973, was only brought to a realization of the problem on February 14, 1974, a cold and frigid day when some thousands of public servants marched to this hill. For the first time there was a statement by the then minister responsible for the status of women, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), that he at least recognized that they had a problem. This was a victory won by the women in the public service by way of a peaceful demonstration.

There has been a lack of action, Mr. Speaker, and a lack of awareness, and these can be found in both the public and the private sector in the world of work. The fact is that women can no longer be restricted to traditional roles. The atmosphere and the circumstances must be provided that will enable them to make choices where they are encouraged to develop their own talents in any area that they choose. That principle ought to apply in the field of federal appointments—to the bench and to government boards and agencies, and to the Senate. In terms of the public service, of course, equal opportunity for women is more fundamental than that of merely filling posts at the top; it is at the middle and the lower echelons of the public service that there exist grave disparities between the numbers of men and women.

There is a tremendous requirement in all of the urban communities in Canada for the facility of properly staffed and properly equipped day care centres. There are some who regret the necessity for this kind of centre in the community, and they are entitled to their point of view. But social and economic conditions exist in this country where, to neglect day care facilities and their importance, can result in the imposition of an economic ball and chain to those women who choose, through necessity or otherwise, to enter the work force. There is a corresponding danger to the children of those women in terms of their care. The statistical parameters of the problem can be simply put. In the city of Toronto there are 82,800 children in single parent families where there is the necessity for the parent to work.

We can deal with a number of factors that affect the status of women which this bill is intended to advance which, if I may put the case simply, is this. The case of women in Canada is the case of for equality before the law; equality in political life; in social and domestic life; education; and in employment.

While there is great emphasis given to the woman in the field of work, we must not forget those women who make the free choice of not participating in the work force but choose freely to participate in the community in the role of wife and mother. The government of Ontario has made some signal strides in this direction. The Law Reform Commission of the province of Ontario and the Attorney General of that province are to be congratulated. I suggest that such steps within the federal sphere would be welcome as well.

I do not know how one can reasonably argue that a woman who chooses to stay at home, raise children, and provide an atmosphere of tranquility, peace and stability, does not make a contribution in an economic sense to the well-being of that family unit and to the betterment of Canadian Society. Certainly the laws of contracts, and property rights, ought to recognize that equality. I believe that the law is generally moving in that direction.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say I do not believe that we have yet seen in this country or in the western hemisphere the opportunity for women, as one-half of the population of our country and of this hemisphere, to develop themselves fully in the sense that I have put before this House. I am one who firmly believes that while the initiative must rest with women to further their participation in those aspects of Canadian life, there is a duty on all Canadians, and a particular duty on this parliament and this government, to provide the atmosphere and the legislative framework for the advances that every fair-minded Canadian believes are right and just. Mr. Speaker, it is in that spirit that we must approach this legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, if at all times it has been said and readily recognized that behind every great man there stood a woman, I feel that the Progressive Conservatives, and especially the hon. member who has just spoken, should understand that the Liberals have learnt that lesson long ago and stick to it. The Liberal party has close to ten women members, whereas they have only one.

Another point raised by my colleague is that the government should appoint a great number of women to positions other than that of simply presiding over the Senate, but he did not say so clearly. I must remind him that in the past five years, seven Canadian women were appointed either to the Supreme Court of Canada or to the higher courts in the land. These are simply remarks that I wished to make following his speech which did not contribute much of anything positive.

But the fact remains that I realize, as he does, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian women have had to wait a long time before obtaining true recognition. One has only to recall the few following facts. In 1858, women were allowed for the first time to attend lectures at the University of Sackville in New Brunswick, where not until 1867 were they allowed to take a university course, although without hope of obtaining a diploma. In 1879, the University of King's College granted its first B.A. to a woman. Only in 1884 did McGill admit women, and only in 1885 in the case of the University of Toronto.

As for the role of Canadian women in politics, we had to wait until 1876 for the emergence of the first suffragette associations organized in Toronto by Mrs. Emily Howard Stowe, the first ever women doctor in Canada, who was to advocate women's associations that rapidly spread throughout the country. Then in 1916, 1917, 1918 and 1919, the provinces successively granted women the right to vote and to sit as members of parliament.

In the province of Quebec, which I represent, such rights were granted only in 1940, unfortunately. Only in 1957 did we have the first woman appointed Minister of the federal government.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, in 1975, while people of all countries are maximizing their efforts to eliminate all forms of segregation, our attitudes in our own country, which are based upon our deepest traditions, are prompting us against our will, I believe, to cultivate the least excusable form of discrimination towards the ones who, for a long time now, have shown us their equality pre-eminently, and I mean women with a capital "W".

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, one needs only take a look at a few recent statistics to show that before 1960, particularly in Quebec, people were talking about the elite from colleges and universities. But already in 1952, 21 per cent of registrations in colleges and universities were from women and that proportion reached 36 per cent in 1971-72. Moreover, I believe, whatever people may say, that liberal professions and professions from "social democracy", as some would say, were always the ones to contribute more than others to the progress of our societies. One has but to quote a few statistics to show to what degree women paved a way for themselves in our present society.

I need only talk about self-sacrifice. Whenever I talk about self-sacrifice, I talk about nurses. In 1968, 100 per cent of the nurses in Quebec were women. As regards social workers, 95 per cent were women. Twenty-two per cent of the psychologists were women although it is a science where it is most difficult to get a university diploma. I am also speaking about psycho-analysts and public relations agents.

I think we men must recognize that we have entertained and fostered certain myths because in 1968 .1 of 1 per cent of engineers were women. I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is important that we change our attitude. As the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) mentioned both in this House and in interviews he had previously, the government may bring in any possible and imaginable legislation, but if the attitude of Canadians does not change, if we are not prepared to evolve, none of those pieces of legislation will bring the results hoped for.

Yet Canada, even if we blame ourselves, as early as 1972 and 1971, to contradict somewhat my colleague opposite, passed an order in council to urge all deputy ministers to review the role of women within departments to make it easier for them to have access to senior positions in the public service. And in 1972, again Canada showed leadership at the international level—leadership that is increasingly recognized—by asking and putting before the International Labour Organization the instrument of ratification of Agreement No. 100 concerning equal pay for men and women for equal work.

Following the recommendations by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, the government also quickly passed several measures both regulatory and legislative, and I mentioned one a few minutes ago. And in 1971 also under the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Liberal government passed a legislation providing a maternity leave of 17 weeks. And Bill C-16 that will be passed I am sure by the majority of those who have an enlightened mind, will be a step forward even though it may not be the ultimate end of the purposes the government intends to achieve.

Indeed, Bill C-16 contains excellent steps such as those that were pointed out by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. He talked about the Canada Elections Act and the Criminal Code. However, there again perhaps women are losing some of their privileges. But actually, it is a sign of her equality when there is talk of complicity vis-à-vis her husband in respect of the Immigration Act, the Public Service Employment Act, pensions, the Veterans Pensions' Act and, as I said, the legislation of 1971.

All those actions are a step forward indeed. But there are others to be taken. When we talk about confinement leave, Madam Speaker, I think we should progress further. Just think of a Scandinavian country where women are granted—and that might be a measure to consider—six months' leave after confinement, and men are also granted six months' leave directly after that so that they can become thoroughly acquainted with the realities of home.

As far as industry is concerned, Madam Speaker, I think women, although they are reaching higher and higher, should make their way to executive occupations. In my profession, in lawyers' offices, I deeply regret that, when one of my colleagues who had completed her course applied at a lawyer's office, they would wonder why they would place hopes in a woman who, four or five years later, would get married, have a child, and leave the office. If that very conservative branch does not alter its attitude, as I mentioned earlier, we shall miss the boat. In the business world, in the financial world and in international relations, I met women who indeed could have given remarkable lessons to men who indulge in a conservatism which only women will reverse and turn into a better attitude.

Unfortunately, Madam Speaker, the year 1975 which was called Women's Year is falling short of its target, for this year should have been dedicated to the identification, not revalorization of women, since they were in Quebec and in Canada as a whole, I believe, given fair recognition. However, this year was used, I believe, more to voice claims than to identify women. The Secretary of State Department, through all its programs, gave Canadian women the opportunity to have programs which would enable them to come forward and display their sense of originality, not prove it, but show their mettle, for I think it had already been proven. And I wonder, after talking with many women in my riding, whether some of the movements really are representative. Indeed, they served all sorts of more or less bitter purposes which only lead to recriminations. Women in the Chambly constituency like all other women in Quebec and the rest of Canada really want to live Women's Year in a better way than several associations let us know, and they really want to secure through this year's programs, the means of putting forward on a long term basis programs which will not only provide women in Canada with a better situation, but will enable us to reach that just society the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) advocated in 1968. And if a majority of our population are women, we must also expect great efforts on their part to help us govern this country. Just as the prime minister repeated in Montreal last weekend, to govern is not merely to pass pieces of legislation, it is to try to improve the condition of a whole society and that improved condition, Madam Speaker, is for both women and men and for the entire society, present and future.

Madam Speaker, I must congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) who, I believe, increased his efforts by sponsoring Bill C-16. I commend him also for the meetings be held, for his drive and for the examples he gave to the Canadian people. It is not enough to pass laws in order that women be better accepted in the public service. It is not enough to pass laws in order to change something in immigration. It is necessary to adopt measures that will really change this society. Problems sometimes come from the laws, and I am sure the Minister of National Health and Welfare has already thought of a solution. I am also convinced that he has already engaged in talks with the provincial governments on that subject. One has only to think of the problem of alimonies when a woman wants to get a divorce. How many women are forced to collect their alimonies at unimaginable places. Their husband has fled the country, simply seeking to evade his obligations. I think the government must take steps to correct that situation. I remember that during the last electoral campaign, the Liberal party talked about a guaranteed income for all heads of families, and I expect this will be a subsequent step to Bill C-16.

Madam Speaker, we could enlarge upon many other subjects that should be dealt with along with Bill C-16, on the occasion of Women's Year. I believe hon. members who preceded me dealt with the proper subjects. As member of Parliament for Chambly, I wished to provide my whole support and agreement to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, to support the women and even the men who are participating in this year's activities and indeed urge them to understand the real meaning of Women's Year, instead of seeing in it a year in which we are merely going to display past sores without introducing new solutions.

[English]

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, at the outset may I say we have heard several erudite speeches this evening and these have dealt well with the philosophical and ideological implications of Bill C-16. I should like to take a few minutes to deal with a number of practicalities and suggest ways of solving certain problems. Along with my party in general, I support this omnibus bill which appears to be an attempt to provide equality of status as between males and females in our society.

I should like to make a few comments about the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act as applied to maternity cases, and the manner in which benefits are given out. I might say I question whether this omnibus bill is the appropriate place for these amendments. Successive ministers in this government have promised to bring in amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1971. It appears they have failed to produce them because undoubtedly they were afraid of being defeated in the House. Again, they have talked about amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, and there certainly is a need for a whole series of them. They were to have been brought in some time ago, but there is still little evidence that the government intends to move in this direction.

The cost of maternity benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act is one which remains approximately the same from year to year. In 1973, according to the Unemployment Insurance Advisory Committee, almost $67 million were expended in benefits. Certainly maternity benefits do not rise or fall with unemployment rates to nearly the same extent as regular benefits. It is interesting to me that sickness benefits paid out in 1973 amounted to a little more than $80 million.

The proposed changes are, indeed, welcomed. The records of the committee studying the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1971 show that the need for these changes was brought to the attention of the minister at that time. The answer then was that the requirement concerning the eight weeks previous to the confinement and the seven weeks after the confinement was in keeping with established international labour legislation. I would be interested to hear whether this international legislation has taken a different course, or whether there is new thinking on these matters.

Eligibility to receive maternity benefits under the act rests, first of all, upon the ability to provide a medical certificate. This would, presumably, not create any difficulty for most people, but there might be a few cases in isolated areas where pre-natal care is carried out by medical personnel who do not hold medical degrees, and in such circumstances it might be difficult to get such a certificate easily. I hope provision will be made in the regulations to take care of any hardship cases which might arise.

The second criterion of eligibility requires the applicant to have worked for at least 20 weeks within the year preceding the claim or since the last unemployment insurance claim. This is at variance with the regular benefits which may be obtained after only eight weeks of regular employment. The 20-week stipulation is in line, I believe, with the sickness provision, but it does create significant problems for claimants if they get caught in certain anomalous positions. For instance, if a woman temporarily collecting unemployment benefits becomes pregnant and then finds work but is unable to continue so as to accumulate 20 weeks of employment, because of her pregnancy she will not be eligible for any benefits even though she is a permanent member of the work force and a bona fide working person. I do not know what might be done in cases such as this, but possibly a careful framing of the regulations might be of help. I should like to hear from the minister on this point; we should certainly look carefully at this aspect in committee so that untoward hardship may be avoided.

Again, difficulties might arise in cases where a woman is an active member of the labour force at the time of conception. Human nature being what it is, few women remember precisely when they became pregnant, and as the months go by they become even more hazy as to when conception occurred. Most rule of thumb methods used to identify this date are based upon the date of the woman's last menstrual period. However, this is not a reliable guide due to the extreme variations in the physiological activities of women.

Most full time pregnancies are considered to last approximately 280 days, but again there seem to be wide variations. There is the celebrated case in English jurisprudence in which, in a paternity suit, the court accepted a gestation period of well over 300 days. Therefore the regulations governing the eligibility of maternity benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act should be looked at carefully to prevent situations arising which will deprive people of their benefits through peculiar circumstances.

Further, in the pay-out of benefits considerable difficulty arises for recipients of maternity benefits. Pamphlets underline the fact to the recipient that "Your benefit payments begin after you have served the required two week waiting period". This statement is not only misleading but somewhat fallacious. Eligibility begins after a two week waiting period, but payment will not be received until five to seven weeks after the applicant's interruption of earnings. Nowhere is this fact documented and, as a result, many families budget on the expectation that they will be receiving benefit payments two weeks after application.

In other words, a single parent family, or family with no visible income outside that of the woman's, may go for up to two months without receiving any benefits or any income. The only alternative is welfare. However, when UIC benefits are viewed as insurance and a "right", as the government proclaims, this is really a poor alternative.

In this area the government might consider whether the waiting period prior to receiving benefits could be speeded up. Certainly there are individual cases where, if the mother were the only wage earner in the family and were closely tied to her work for necessary income, she would suffer considerably. A change of the benefit period, which is something that I mentioned as being deficient in the old act, is to be welcomed. Benefits can be collected to a maximum of 15 weeks. However, this period was broken down to a maximum of eight weeks previous to confinement, then one week of confinement, and six weeks after confinement.

Babies have a habit of arriving early, due to the uncertainty of the mother as to her exact dates. Complications may arise leading to an early delivery, and in many cases late delivery. By and large, women prefer to work closer to their date of confinement and really, in many cases, they need extra weeks after the confinement rather than before the confinement. Certainly in a fair percentage of maternity cases the mother may have had unusual complications, or her infant may have developed problems that make it important that she has more time out of the work force after her confinement, both to provide for her own health and that of her child. Certainly this provision is welcomed, and it should certainly have been included in the first place. I think it is fair to say that it was the rigidity of bureaucratic thinking that prevented it from being put in previously.

This bill also removes the built-in work disincentive in that the woman who worked closer to her date of confinement was penalized in favour of those who took leave early. Therefore in the whole concept it has become fairer and, as such, will be welcomed.

Finally, turning to eligibility for regular benefits, several problems arise. Recipients of maternity benefits become eligible for regular benefits when the child is seven weeks old. In certain areas the recipient becomes eligible only when she is actively looking for work and can produce a certificate that child care arrangements have been made.

A survey in the Ottawa-Carleton region by phone turned up the following. There are very few day care centres, and of those surveyed only three made provision for a seven week old child. They all thoroughly discouraged the admission of the seven week old child. Of the estimated 1,000 children under three months, only five are receiving day care. Furthermore, most child day care centres contacted have an average waiting period of four months. In other words, this stipulation under the provision for maternity benefits would essentially disqualify the average mother from receiving any benefits after the initial six week period. I believe this is one area where further government input should be made. Certainly if the woman is a single family parent she may have great difficulty.

So, in summary, Mr. Speaker, this bill does offer improvement over the status quo, but there are indeed some snags which ought to be removed from these amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act as proposed in Bill C-16.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I should like to express my appreciation of the kind but appropriate reference the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo) made to the first woman member of the House of Commons, my late friend Agnes Macphail. I appreciate as well the equally kind reference made to one who is remembered by more of those who are here, namely, Mrs. Grace MacInnis.

The reference to Agnes Macphail reminded me of what I think is one of the best stories about her participation in debate. It seems that on one occasion when she was making headway with an argument, some male member for the House of Commons interjected by saying "Don't you wish you were a man?" Quick as a flash Agnes retorted "Yes, don't you?"

It will sink in in a minute, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Don't worry, we got it.

Mr. Woolliams: We just didn't want to laugh.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hon. members in all parts of the House are making what, in my view, are excellent speeches in this debate. For the most part they are agreeing that the bill is a necessary one and that it makes progress in the direction of establishing equality between men and women. But member after member is listing the areas and respects in which that equality will not yet be achieved even after the passage of Bill C-16.

I might add that Bill C-52, which will come before us some time later, might also be included among the bills that seek the establish equality. Bill C-52 is one that deals with pension rights under a number of pieces of legislation, and in all of those pieces of legislation it attempts to establish equality between men and women.

It is in this pension area that there is one shortcoming that I should like to mention. There have been discussions, and I believe that there is agreement that the second reading debate on this bill will conclude tonight. Therefore those of us who are now taking part are speaking for even a shorter period of time than was agreed to publicly a short time ago. This is my reason for dealing with just one subject.

I believe that it is a piece of gross unfairness that most pension plans—this is true of the Public Service Superannuation Act, it is true of the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, and it is true of the pension plans of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway and many other employers—provide that if there is a survivor pension it works in a strange way. If a man and wife have lived and worked together, presumably they are both responsible for whatever equity they have established. But when retirement time comes, assuming they are both still alive, a pension, whatever its full amount may be, is drawn by the husband. I am speaking of things as they are in most cases.

Now, if the husband dies before the wife, the usual plan is that the widow draws a pension which is only a portion of what her husband's pension was; in most cases it is 50 per cent. In the case of members of parliament, our widows will be entitled to a pension of 60 per cent. But in any case that is the situation. If the husband dies first the widow's pension is only a portion, in most cases 50 per cent. But if the wife dies first and the widower stays on, his pension is not 50 per cent, or 60 per cent, or 75 per cent, it is the whole amount, 100 per cent. We have had this kind of arrangement with us for so long that, like lots of other things, we have accepted it as though it were perfectly proper. I do not think it is.

It seems to me it should not matter which of the marriage partners dies first so far as the amount of the pension that goes to the survivor is concerned. My preference would be that it would be 100 per cent in either case, but if for actuarial reasons in order to get this sort of thing started we have to start with 75 per cent or 90 per cent in either case, let us do so. If it is proper for one of the marriage partners who survives to have a full pension, why does that not apply to the other?

I hope we will soon start to make progress in this field. There is no better place to begin this sort of change in respect of pensions than with those plans which are under the aegis of the federal government. The Public Service Superannuation Act is a case in point, and our own members of parliament pension plan is another. There are also the plans of the RCMP, the Canadian Armed Forces, and all the other plans that come directly under the government, as well as plans like those of the Canadian National Railways, Air Canada and so on.

As other members have been pointing out today, there is no use boasting about legislation establishing equality when so many areas of inequality remain. I am glad there are some points of equality which have been established under the Canada Pension Plan, and I am glad that under Bill C-52 there a number of instances in which a working woman who dies will be able to leave to her surviving widower the same benefit the working man would leave if he died first and left a surviving widow.

That does not touch this one point I am trying to focus on tonight, namely, that when both partners to the marriage survive into the retirement period, and one dies, why should not the benefits to the survivor be the same whether that survivor is a widow or a widower? I press that point as one that should be considered by the federal government because of the many pension plans for which it is responsible, and I also press the point that those who are dealing with pension plans in private industry should consider this as well.

There is no use muttering about things always having been this way, or about it being the man who has been the one to go out and earn the pension. They have both earned it, and if there is something joint or equal as between men and women let us make it equal all the way. I hope, therefore, that this point is one of those still unfinished bits of business that we will deal with at the earliest possible time. If we believe in equality, let us practice it all the way.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, among all the interesting events of today is this long awaited debate on the omnibus bill respecting women in Canada. The debate has hardly begun. We have hardly begun to discuss the serious ramifications opened up by the minister when introducing this bill, yet I understand the bill is about to be given second reading and sent to the committee.

I ask myself if this is all there is in the Canadian parliament to International Women's Year, that is, a handful of speakers in a mostly empty chamber? I ask myself if it is really possible that only one of nine women members of parliament wished to speak in this debate? Let me be fair to my friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Campbell), by saying that I have the impression she has given up her place in this debate in order that I might speak. If that is so, then apparently there has been some change made during International Women's Year in that apparently it is now gentlemen before ladies. If she intended to speak, then I exclude her from my general criticism of women in parliament for not having spoken during this debate.

Let me say to the women in parliament that the women of Canada want to hear their voices in parliament, but when they have the opportunity where are they? The hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo) made a speech, and I will refer to that speech in a moment or two. I think we might well ask in the words of that song by Peggy Lee, "Is That All There Is"?

Mr. Woolliams: Oh dear, oh dear!

Mr. Roche: The other day I received a letter from one of my constituents who wrote:

This letter is to ask you, as my member of parliament, to end the discrimination against women in Canada.

That is quite an opening sentence in the morning mail, and I was already on the defensive because there are limits to our effectiveness. This letter went on to state instances in which the courts have been discriminatory. The writer ended with what baseball writers would describe as a sliding curve by stating:

Please do not answer my letter personally. Use your time and your energy to right the wrong against women in Canada.

I thought that was what this bill and this debate were all about, but where do we start? I read Ms Magazine. I like to think I have been liberated from the chauvinistic thinking of a dying culture in which women's interests were cradle, kitchen, and church. I defend women's right to equal opportunity and equal pay. I have encouraged many women to run for political office since the city councils, legislatures, and parliament of Canada are largely bereft of women's voices. It is ridiculous to have only nine women among the 264 members of parliament. If India, Israel and Ceylon can have women prime ministers, why can we not have more Canadian women in public life? When I look at the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—well, let us not get into that.

If we had more women in public life we would get faster action on those discriminatory blotches that still mar our social landscape; labour and pension inequalities, inequitable executive opportunities, inadequate child care services, and unjust property settlements that degrade husbands and wives. On the other hand, the continuing economic and social handicap that women must surmount in order to succeed in modern society effectively bars many of them from public life.

The politician in me is anxious to proclaim that women's rights must be fully achieved, and that we will not have a truly civilized state until the full status of women is assured. Therefore I give my backing to the Advisory Council on the Status of Women set up by the federal government to give advice on how to implement the 167 recommendations made by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in 1970.

I give my backing to the present bill, C-16. We cannot afford to continue to waste the talent and potential accomplishments of 50 per cent of the population. These are all sincere statements. They are also politically popular and they might re-assure, somewhat, the women who voted for me. Truthful as they are, these statements are incomplete and they appear to me to be superficial. Politicians can get by with superficial statements. It would be easier not to pursue this subject beyond the black and white answers that can be so easily projected to the electorate. The full truth is that I am profoundly disturbed by the relationship of the women's rights movement to the over-all question of full humanism in modern life.

[Mr. Roche.]

What I am concerned about is value conflict. Professor Charles Hobart, a sociologist at the University of Alberta, expresses the conflict well:

The family depends upon and symbolizes inefficient values of being, knowing, caring, loving, unconditionally committing oneself. These values are incompatible with the urban industrial values of production, achievement, exchange, quantification, efficiency, success. Simultaneous unlimited commitment to people and love and concern—and to achievement, success and prosperity—is impossible.

It is disruptive and potentially incapacitating to try to accommodate both sets of values. Because men all too often sacrifice success in marriage for success in careers, should women too choose the dehumanizing urban values as the criterion for success? What business is this of the politician? Why does he not stick to the clear issue of removing discrimination against women?

Again I say that it is not enough to take a single-minded view. I want to say with respect to the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo), who made what I have already described as a courageous and fighting speech tonight, that I would encourage her as she considers the role of women in modern society, to which she addressed herself tonight, by saying that she will enhance and strengthen her case by taking a much larger view than that of abortion.

Most of the hon. member's speech concerned abortion. I would encourage her, having the feeling she has which I respect, to persuade her colleagues in the government to have a full and major debate on abortion. However, I say to her with respect that when she delivers a speech on women's rights, three quarters or four fifths of which were devoted to the subject of abortion, she does her cause a very serious injustice.

I cannot separate women from the totality of society any more that I can separate men. To express genuine concern about the attack on marriage as an institution and families as the central cell of our society, is not to diminish the need for women's rights. The two subjects must be fitted together. If that is not seen to be the job of the lonely politician, it is certainly the responsibility of the government in creating an economic and social climate that enhances the fulfillment of family life. I thought that was what International Women's Year would involve, and that parliament would be responding to that. I have not heard anything like that tonight.

I think that the status of the family may well become one of the explosive political issues in the decades ahead. The considerable talk today about complusory contraception, abortion, and sterilization indicates a foundation for state intervention in the name of quality of life. There is now abundant literature arguing against marriage in the traditional sense, and the increasing divorce rates reveal the de facto instability of the marriage institution. I will not take up the time of the House tonight to go through the divorce statistics.

Much of the new wave of thinking is suffused with the belief that the family is a tyrannical and decadent institution that needs to be replaced. In this view women should be liberated from child-rearing, mothers being an outdated occupational group. The door is then opened to those who would bypass reactionary parents by control systems that would not only biologically engineer children but program their social and cultural environment. The point I want to make now is that what is needed especially is an application of law that accords women their human rights and, at the same time, strengthens family, and hence human, life. This principle is valid whether a woman marries or not; there simply cannot be an artificial line drawn between the feminist movement and the general society, of which the family is the core.

In fact, we increase the serious political and psychological risks by continuing to frustrate such a sense of connection between the individual and society. Whether we focus on politics or family development, our aim should be to lessen the antagonism between the sexes and also between government and its women citizens. The point of women's liberation, as I see it, is not to create a new dominance but rather to make possible the fullest participation of women in the human conversation. In short, both men and women are responsible for changes in relationships that will have deep consequences for our children, and we may not escape such responsibility by focussing only on our own emancipation. Increased freedom should increase, not decrease, accountability.

What this argument boils down to, in practical terms, is the ability of people to experience other people as real, as human. That depends to a large extent on the ability of children to experience deep and lasting relationships with adults. Some institution must exist in our society to do this. Call it a family. Give it permanence. Help youth to grasp the idea that human beings are not manipulatory conveniences, floating in and out of the realms of life, to be disposed of with the rest of the junk in our throw-away society.

The resistance of people to the throw-away mentality depends on the depth of their experiences with other people—the kind of experiences that are developed in a family. It is essential for young children in particular to have secure relationships. This is primary not only to the well being of the child but to the stability of future society composed of individuals who are reasonably secure, reasonably strong. The way in which these relationships have been provided to children historically is by women. Today women want to do other things, one of the manifestations of women's liberation. They may be able to, but they cannot discard overnight their historic contribution to the development of children in the name of occupational rights.

Day care centres have value but they are not the total solution, nor should women shrug off their responsibilities by pointing to day care centres. I am saying that until I can be confident that the full human support the family gives a child can be protected I am cautious about women's liberation.

Reverting to my responsibility as a member of parliament, I look for social policies that will help families to stay together and develop the potential of all within the family. This certainly extends beyond voting for increased family allowances, which is the easy way out for the government in meeting its responsibilities. Every policy, whether it be economic, cultural, social, recreational, affects families in some way of course. We must begin to see more clearly the impact that they all have on human relationships. As William Dyson, executive director of the Vanier Institute of the Family says:

> We must go deeply into what we mean by law, which now reflects the machine world so heavily, and recognize fully that if we want a family policy that is truly applicable and useful, we have no choice but to perceive the whole of public policy as critical to our future as persons, as families, in our groups and in our society.

We are back again to the need to change our priorities in policy making so that people, not economic growth, come first. As a member of parliament, then, I am concerned with monitoring the consequences of policies and programs which may seem unrelated but actually make up the total social community. I have to learn to live with the fact that I do not have all the answers. Even being able to ask the right questions about the direction of society is a sizeable accomplishment these days.

I ask these questions in the framework of a set of values, that the good of everybody, women, men and children, be taken into account. One of the ways in which this total approach works out is seen in wages. A man today cannot afford to give up his job and have the family exist on his wife's earnings because women ordinarily earn less than men. But if her earning power were as great as a man's then the wife could, when desired, be the sole bread-winner, allowing her husband to manage the home or explore new interests. Thus women's rights could work for the liberation of men.

This larger view of women's rights was expressed by Sylvia Gelber, director of the Women's Bureau of the federal Department of Labour, who favours a bills of rights entrenched in the constitution of Canada to provide for women's equity before the law, as follows:

> If carefully drafted, it might also provide for other groups of people, people who are young; people who are old; people who are disabled; people who are poor; as well as people who are female, be they single or married, that even-handed justice which is the goal of those concerned with the well-being of our people and of our country.

In this way we can see women's rights as part of the whole human rights field that has occupied international attention since the end of World War II. When the universal declaration of human rights was adopted in 1948, fundamental rights were declared to be the right of all without distinction, including sex.

The United Nations has, in the meantime, devoted more energy to ridding the world of racial discrimination than sexual. Some specialized agencies have, however, adopted a number of conventions affecting the rights of women in such fields as education and employment. The International Labour Organization has adopted a number of conventions affecting the rights of women in all conditions of employment, including recruitment, promotions and pay. The I.L.O. conventions have been ratified by Canada, leading to the passage of anti-discriminatory legislation here—although it took the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women to produce clear legislation outlawing sexual discrimination.

Even now, however, more legislation is needed to amend the Canada Labour Code to ensure equal access to job opportunities; amendments to the federal Superannuation Act are needed to ensure equal pension and fringe benefit rights; there should be equality for women and inclusion of homemakers in the Canada Pension Plan; and there should be proportionate appointment to and employment by federal boards, commissions and Crown corporations.

The Canadian Bill of Rights, passed in 1960, was designed to provide, within the area of federal jurisdiction, equality before the law without distinction on grounds of sex. But, as Miss Gelber notes:

The courts have generally interpreted the Bill of Rights in such a way as to assume that parliament did not intend by its provisions to alter other federal laws which might have been interpreted as being inconsistent with the Bill of Rights.

Because of the limitations of this federal statute, a stronger instrument is needed to override any existing statute that allows discrimination. The laws in a number of provinces contain a variety of discriminatory clauses affecting women, particularly in the fields of family law, welfare and property rights. Welfare legislation often operates to the disadvantage of women, frequently denying equity on grounds of personal morality. We have not touched on that contentious issue tonight.

The assurance of equal rights in the provincial field is required as well as in the federal. This is what has led to the clear need for Ottawa and the provinces to agree on a constitutional bill of rights—even though this goal is a very elusive one. The establishment of the federal Human Rights Commission to enforce anti-discrimination laws is a step toward this goal because it will help to strengthen public attitudes concerning justice.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. He can continue only with the unanimous agreement of the House.

Mr. Roche: Madam Speaker, may I have three seconds more to complete my remarks?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Roche: Putting women's rights in the context of human rights enables us to think positively and avoid the polarization that is inevitably produced by the bra-burning syndrome. Men need to be liberated too. I agree with Betty Friedan's judgment that:

Women's liberation is only the first step in a sex role revolution that's allowing men to be tender, gentle and compassionate.

I hope she is right when she claims that dropping the masks of male dominance and female submission will not lead to unisex but to a more robust and joyous heterosexual love.

I think the present social position of women can be understood and improved only within a broad social context where, as Esther Greenglass says:

—the effects of attitudes, motivation and social structures themselves are systematically examined.

It is time, finally, to get rid of the idea that one sex must be compliant, supportive and inferior, while the other sex must be aggressive, ambitious, and strong. Parliament spends a lot of time on subjects of much less importance.

[Mr. Roche.]

Mr. Lalonde: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. There seems to be a favourable disposition on the part of hon. members to extend this sitting by ten minutes so that my parliamentary secretary may conclude the debate and we can give second reading to the bill tonight.

Mr. Roche: I rise on the same point of order, Madam Speaker. Speaking for our party, we would be most pleased to agree to the suggestion and to return the favour which the parliamentary secretary gave me.

Mr. Baldwin: Madam Speaker, you might probably be able, just as successfully as Mr. Speaker, not to see the clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, before proceeding I would like to refer to what the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) noted, namely, that there were not too many women present to speak in the House on the subject before us. May I point out that most women would prefer to hear men speak on the subject of inequality with regard to women.

Also, I would like to point out the active role that women politicians, at least from our side, are presently playing. Madam Speaker was in the chair during the debate; the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo) has spoken, as we know; the hon. member for Saint-Michel (Miss Bégin) is in Europe with the parliamentary committee; the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) is at the meeting of the Standing Committee on Immigration Policy; the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) was to speak this afternoon but had to be called away; and the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) has been in the House all evening during debate of this important topic and has spoken on it on many other occasions.

It is indeed with pleasure that I rise to close the debate on this bill called by many the omnibus bill but really called the Statute Law (Status of Women) Amendment Act 1974, and to see it go to committee, following which, I hope, it will come back here soon on the road to its final destination.

The bill, can only help all Canadians. As we know, it amends certain acts to provide equality under these statutes for male and female persons. The government, following the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, and of many organizations and individuals, has sought to do away with the provisions in eight pieces of legislation which discriminate against women or are otherwise prejudicial to women.

Among others, this bill will deal with the Canada Elections Act which will have one set of rules for listing electors. Information will now be descriptive of the elector in terms of the name, address, occupation and sex of the elector.

The Criminal Code will have two changes. No longer will there be presumption of coercion of the woman by her spouse under section 23(3). In addition, section 197 will be amended to make it obligatory for married women to provide the necessities of life for their spouses. This puts the same onus on both spouses.

The National Defence Act will allow girls to be treated the same as boys—all as cadets. The Unemployment Insurance Act will also be amended to make a flexible 15 week period for maternity benefits, something which I am sure most pregnant women merited in the past and will have in the future. Other acts to be amended are the Immigration Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Pension Act, and the Civil War Pensions and Allowances Act.

The government has also moved amendment to the Canada Pension Plan, one of the most significant being provision of full equality for male and female contributors and beneficiaries under the act.

Presently before the House there is the citizenship bill which, among other things, will grant citizenship for either the male or the female parent. It is also anticipated that the Human Rights Commission legislation will be brought to the House, as well as amendments to the Criminal Code in respect of rape and other sexual offences. All these amendments can only show the ability of this government to recognize the need for providing equal treatment for men and women.

However, attitudes will not change in Canada simply by enforcing legislation. One must remember that we are striving for equality between men and women on the basis of freedom of choice of work, freedom of choice of environment, and freedom to choose something other than existing ideas which categorized women in the past as being designated to one role.

Young people today are moving that way in a much easier fashion. There will be no stumbling blocks. They know what they want. I will quote from the magazine Ms., a letter from Anita Buzick II of Killeen, Texas:

> When I saw that in my spelling book they had "The Queen is the wife of a King", I got really mad. Even though I'm only nine years old, and only in the fourth grade, I've written five poems. One from the five I thought you might want to put in Ms.
> Here it is:
> If you think I'm going to slave > in the kitchen for a man who is > supposed to be brave,
> Then I'm sorry to say,
> but you're wrong all the way,
> Because I'm going to be an > astronaut.

These ideas are among our young coming up. No longer will young boys and girls be thought of in different directions. They are going to go after the same jobs whether they be in construction, teaching, medicine or any of the other fields.

I, being a parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), at any time in the short while in this position have had to clarify that I am a member of parliament and that being a parliamentary secretary is only for a member of parliament. It is always assumed when I appear to represent the minister that I must be one of the secretaries from within the department. This, I am sure, does not happen with the opposite sex because secretaries have always been designated female.

It is my understanding that a statement was made this afternoon in the House to the effect that every woman should have the choice to stay at home and be a housewife if she chooses. I agree with this commendable statement, but I would like to point out that it is the type of statement which creates an attitude, and a false one. One should say, rather, every person, instead of delegating the role of the home to a woman. While on the same statement I would like to go one step further and define choice.

In the past women had the choice to go out and work for a few years at some defined position which belonged to being a woman, and then to get married and have a family. There was no choice in this accepted role. The woman had to find a husband because she could not survive, for the most part, on the amount she could bring in and, under the circumstances, which would eventually offer no challenge to her. She therefore accepted to be challenged as a housewife without being able to choose any other role to fulfill herself. Equality in our society in the future will allow all people to choose a role and to further themselves within that role to the extent that their choices were educated and not designated by society to be fulfilled.

Under circumstances where women are employed and earning the same amount as men, perhaps at that point one can have an educated choice either to pursue the role within the working world or to stay at home, raise a family and be the supportive element to the working spouse. But for this person it will have been chosen and will become a career. This type of choice can only enhance family life.

At present there is probably under utilization of half the talent in this country. This can only show that both men and women are losers and that the country as a whole becomes a loser. Role stereotyping is damaging to men as well as to women, and true equality can only be good for both sexes.

I would like to speak for a few minutes on the economic discrepancies which exist and which it is hoped will be changed before too long by legislation at the federal level, such as the Human Rights Commission, and surely all provinces will bring this type of legislation into play in respect to provincial government jobs. However, to further heighten this point I would like to read from "Women's Bureau '74" put out by Labour Canada, at page 39:

> The average employment earnings of full-time full-year male babysitters were more than twice (127.5 per cent) those of female babysitters during 1970. In a world where we have become accustomed to looking on certain kinds of occupations as male and female, this interesting fact appears to be somewhat ironic. Yet it is not the only occupation generally viewed as female in which male workers show average employment earnings in excess of those of the female workers in the same occupation.
> Among the professions, for example, that of librarian is generally viewed as a female profession; yet the average employment earnings of men librarians exceed those of women by almost one-fifth (18.6 per cent). Similarly, the professions of dietitians and nutritionists are generally looked upon as female; yet male workers in these professions derive average employment earnings almost one-quarter (22.6 per cent) more than the female workers. Another example of an occupation that at one time was looked upon as male, but, in recent years, has tended to become female is that of tellers and cashiers; yet the average employment earnings of male workers in these occupations are one-half (50.9 per cent) greater than those of female workers.

Madam Speaker, I now turn to page 43 to read a little bit further about this economic discrepancy as follows:

In so far as the gap in earnings between men and women in the labour force is concerned, disparities are all too evident. In fact, in terms of actual dollars earned, there is evidence that in many instances the gap is a widening one. For example, between the years 1969 and 1972, the dollar gap between the reported earnings of men and women workers widened in 37 out of 74 occupations.

The broadening of the dollar gap, it would appear, is due primarily to the widespread practice of increasing wage rates on a flat percentage basis. Thus, for example, if in a given occupation, a male worker is paid $3.00 an hour and a female worker is paid $2.50 an hour, the effect of a flat rate 6 per cent increase is to widen the dollar gap between the two.

The remedy lies not only in achieving at long last the principle of equal pay for equal work but in opening up opportunities in the work world for women workers so as to remove existing obstacles to full participation in the Canadian economy. One of the means of achieving this end is by ensuring that women prepare themselves academically and technically through the existing institutions of higher learning as well as the technical schools of the country.

It is very easy for the members of the opposition as well as organizations to say that the government has not done enough. However, it is only recently that an awareness among 51 per cent of the population has started to take effect. It is only through those situations arising from their jobs that women can now begin to concentrate on what is dissatisfying, concentrating and organizing to use their very powerful 51 per cent to register their dissatisfaction and ask for more education, more legislation, to obtain more jobs of importance. This way women will be giving their own input to affect other women, such as the demand that all provinces obtain day care centres.

For example, in the case of women lawyers when a client comes to an office on a family matter most often the male lawyer cannot help but look at her and say "I suppose if I were married to her I would divorce her too, or separate from her" and the female lawyer deals with the matter. This is common amongst most male lawyers—at least the ones who have brought it to my attention.

Women are beginning to waken up to the fact that they too can do the job. Awareness of this fact will change attitudes, and time will bring this about. It is easy to hide behind the "do something" syndrome when women themselves do not know what to do because of the mixed feelings they have about their own role. It is not just by providing legislation that we will change and become equal—it is by attempting to change attitudes and make people aware that women can do the job equally as well as men, be it in the working world, be it at technical schools, be it at universities, be it in government, or be it in the homes.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

[Miss Campbell.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FINANCE—SUGGESTED REVIEW OF REDUCTION OF TARIFF ON TIRES

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, the other day I directed a number of questions to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) concerning difficulties being experienced in the Canadian auto tire production industry. The answers I received were quite unsatisfactory. Therefore I wish to pursue the matter further at this time in the adjournment debate.

We have witnessed recently yet another example of Liberal government economic policy putting Canadians on unstable economic ground. At Whitby Tire at Whitby, Ontario, 290 workers were indefinitely laid off. The company cites the economic slow-down in the auto industry as the cause, but the facts dispute this. Sales figures show that the volume of sales has increased slightly, although the profits are down somewhat. Obviously from the company's point of view, the decision was a micro-economic decision based solely on the profit maximization principle.

The United Rubber Workers, who incidentally report 2,000 of their 18,000 workers laid off, see part of the reason for the Whitby lay-off as the result of a tariff reduction from 17½ per cent to 12½ per cent on imported tires and tubes. This, without doubt, is a contributing factor, but the scope goes well beyond the tariff rate.

Since 1965 Canada has had a trading deficit in the rubber tire and tube industry every year with the exception of 1967. The total deficit to the end of 1974 was $298 million. The deficit for 1974 alone was $155 million, an increase of 600 per cent from 1973, and the trend shows no sign of change. The trade figures for January and February, 1975, show a $24 million deficit, itself equal to the whole deficit of 1973.

The causes for this jump are quite clear. In 1974 the companies tried to break a strike in the Canadian industry by importing American tires. The American parent of Whitby Tire, Firestone, increased their product imports at that time in an unsuccessful bid to circumvent the strike. Now that the American parent has a strong established foothold in the Canadian market, what use is there for a small subsidiary such as Whitby?

How many Canadian jobs must be lost before the government and its supporters realize that Canada must take positive steps to control its own economy? How many jobs of Canadian workers will be sacrificed to benefit United States parent companies before the government realizes that the Foreign Investment Review Act must be revised and tightly enforced? When is the government going to institute quotas as a stipulation in its tire-import-export trade?

The problem, as illustrated by Whitby Tire, is that Canadian plants do not have a reasonable share of the North American market. The Liberal government is guilty of mismanagement and indifference. The workers of Whitby Tire, especially the 290 laid off, would be the last to agree that the Firestone takeover of Whitby Tire is of "significant benefit to Canada", as required by the Foreign Investment Review Act concerning Firestone's takeover of the company.

Is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) prepared to review, along with his colleague, the Minister of Finance, the decision to reduce the tariff rate from 17½ per cent to 12½ per cent? Is the minister prepared to consult with the tire industry officials to work out a means of recapturing Canada's rightful market share? These questions have been asked before but responses have not been forthcoming. The question boils down to whether or not the government really cares about the thousands of rubber workers and their future.

The Department of Finance took some interest, for it invited the presidents of the Canadian tire industry to Ottawa so as to ascertain their plans for expansion and employment. Was a bleak picture presented? Quite possibly, because the department did not inform the union or this House as to what transpired. The only statement forthcoming was that at the present time there was no need to increase the tariff to its previous level of 17½ per cent. The fact remains that the present reduced tariff acts only as an incentive to import tires and as a disincentive to the Canadian industry and the workers directly and indirectly dependent on it.

Some will argue that an increased tariff would increase the price of tires. However, the reduction in the tariff has not reduced tire prices. I see no reason why an increased tariff should increase prices. The fact remains that United States and Canadian tire prices are similar, and claims that imported U.S. tires are cheaper are simply unfounded.

We in the New Democratic Party feel the government must protect Canadian industry and Canadian jobs. I ask that the minister take action to restore Canada's share of the tire market. Our working people have rights, and must not be left to the mercy of U.S. based multinationals. The Canadian tire industry must not be allowed to die.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, let me say at the outset that the government shares the hon. member's concern about the current employment situation in the rubber industry. The question is whether this is due to the increase in imports as such and, more particularly, to any increase which may have been occasioned by the reduction in the tariff, or whether it is a result of the general situation in the automotive industry.

Hon. members will be aware that this tariff reduction was one of a number of tariff cuts originally introduced in the budget of February, 1973, as part of the government's program for moderating inflation. The legislation gave the governor in council authority to restore the original rates of duty if circumstances warranted such action.

Following the introduction of the November budget the United Rubber Workers' Union requested the government to restore the 17½ per cent rate. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) directed his officials to carry out a full investigation of the situation and to report back to him. Officials of the Department of Finance and of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce met frequently with representatives of the United Rubber Workers. Officials of the two departments also sought the views of the major tire companies. The companies attributed the increase in imports to the decision of the automobile manufacturers to equip their new models with radials sooner than had been expected. This had taken place before planned expansion of radial tire production in Canada had come on stream. I am given to understand that some of these new plants will be in production shortly.

The union and the companies were asked to submit additional information concerning the outlook for employment and production in the industry. I understand that on the basis of this data a more detailed report has now been made to the Minister of Finance. It will, of course, be up to the minister to decide what further action may be necessary once he has studied the report. So, contrary to what the hon. member has said, there has been consultation, not only with the tire companies but with the union.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—GARRISON DIVERSION—SUGGESTION UNITED STATES BE ASKED FOR A MORATORIUM ON PROJECT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, this is the second time within nine days that I have risen to ask the government to call for a moratorium to halt the Garrison diversion project in North Dakota. On May 20 I gave reasons why a moratorium should be sought. One of them was a statement made by Mr. Charles A. Vanik, the Ohio representative, that the Garrison project was "environmental and economic madness." Mr. Vanik added:

> The Bureau of Reclamation has tried to do everything in its power to push the Garrison project ahead. Nothing can hide the fact, however, that it is an environmental disaster.

I presented new evidence to the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp) today and I propose to read a letter in just a moment or two. On May 20 the parliamentary secretary stated that the Canadian government would be sending a blunt note, along with the United States government, to the International Joint Commission, calling for another study. The last thing we want is another study into the Garrison diversion project. If time allowed, I could stand here for three hours quoting from studies showing why this project should not be proceeded with. It is unfortunate that the government is not looking at these studies because it would then know that it should be calling for a moratorium, not a further study.

What is also most disappointing is that the Schreyer government of Manitoba has gone along with this proposal that a note be sent to the IJC for another study. I note that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is here tonight, and I hope that he will use his influence to contact Premier Schreyer and ask him to get together with the federal government in calling for a moratorium.

Today I forwarded a letter to the Acting Prime Minister from William S. Moorhead, who is the chairman of the conservation, energy and natural resources sub-committee in the United States, to the Hon. Henry A. Kissinger, Secretary of State, dated March 19, 1975. The letter reads as follows:

Recently, the General Accounting Office and your department have concluded that "as presently proposed", the Garrison Diversion United in North Dakota, which the Interior Department is now constructing, "would likely result" in pollution of Canadian waters "in violation of Article IV of the Boundary Waters Treaty with Canada". Interior does not dispute this conclusion.

Despite this, Interior is continuing to construct the project as now planned. Indeed, in a February 28, 1975 letter to our subcommittee, Interior states that "adoption of significantly revised alternative plan of development" to avoid a treaty violation "would require new or amended legislative authority."

It has been suggested at recent joint U.S.-Canadian meetings that the matter be referred to the International Joint Commission (IJC). But in the meantime, the Interior Department is continuing to build the project which is now 18 per cent completed.

I do not object to such a referral. But I find it difficult to understand how the United States can justify continued construction of a project which is certain to result in a Treaty violation.

I hope the parliamentary secretary has some firm answer on this subject tonight, and will not simply say that we are just going to send off another little note to the IJC.

Assurances that the project will not be allowed to result in a treaty violation are empty since there is no indication any alternatives proposed by Interior will ever be acceptable to Canada or Congress. As more money is expended and more of the project completed, it will become increasingly difficult from a political point of view in the United States to halt the project if the IJC finds that no viable alternatives exist—

Mr. Moorhead went on to say:

I strongly share that doubt. I think it is time the United States face up to the fact that our treaty obligations with Canada require a moratorium on further contracting for this project until a viable alternative is developed. Such a moratorium should not result in any costs to the United States. I urge that you take the lead in establishing such a moratorium.

That is very strong language, Madam Speaker, and we cannot ignore it. In another letter from the United States Department of the Interior Commissioner of Reclamation to the deputy under secretary, it is stated, among other things, that the United States will have to do studies into field data for potential pumping plant sites, damsites, canal alignments, desalting plants and brine disposal sites, some in Manitoba, with considerable assistance from outside agencies. The letter goes on:

The March 11, 1975, memorandum from the Assistant Secretary—Land and Water Resources to you recommended that the studies be "informal" and not made available to "local interests nor to the Canadians."

So they are suppressing information from us. This is reason enough to call for this moratorium, and not just send some silly note off to the IJC.

It further states:

Further study of the alternatives at a level below feasibility grade, but sufficient to provide a closer look at the viability of the alternatives in sufficient time to properly consider the request for funding on the construction of the Velva Canal, can be completed by June 1976

In a press release issued yesterday by the Prairie Environmental Defence League Inc. it is stated:

U.S. Officials Conspire to keep Canadians in dark over Garrison project.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Desalinization plants and brine disposal fields are in store for Manitobans because of the Garrison Diversion project in North Dakota, according to George Heshka, chairman of the Prairie Environmental Defence League. The desalinization plants and brine disposal fields, a U.S. compromise to pollution of the Souris River, were named as alternatives by Gilbert Stamms, commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation, in a memo to the deputy under secretary of the department of the interior (attached). In the memo, Stamms said some of the brine disposal fields would be located in Manitoba.

Heshka charged the bureau with "deceit and secrecy" in not reporting the possibility of brine disposal fields to Manitobans and Canadians. Stamms said, "he concurred that studies (concerning desalinization plants and brine disposal fields) should be informal and not made available to local interests nor to the Canadians—"

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his time has expired.

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member keeps insisting on what he calls a moratorium. To start with, I will just quote what I said on May 20, as recorded at page 5955 of Hansard:

In February, 1974, the United States government gave assurances that the United States would honour its obligations under the treaty—

I was referring to the 1909 Boundary Waters Treaty. I went on to state:

—the United States would honour its obligation under the treaty and pledged that no project construction potentially affecting waters flowing into Canada would be undertaken unless it were clear that these United States obligations under the treaty would be met.

We have no reason to believe that the United States will not honour its commitment after giving us assurances that it would.

In view of our concern over the potential adverse effects of the Garrison project, as currently envisaged, we are of course pleased to learn, if the press reports are accurate as to the contents of this document, that the Bureau of Reclamation is examining alternatives to the current project. However, I would note that our ongoing discussions with the United States are being conducted at government-to-government level, and not at the level of the Bureau of Reclamation. I am confident that no significant information relevant to the Garrison project as it affects Canada will be withheld by either side, in keeping with the traditional candour and frankness which characterizes our exchanges with the United States.

The United States has assured us that no decision on construction involving any diversion of water into the Souris Basin would be undertaken prior to 1978. United States officials have further stated that, under the present timetable, construction of the Velva Canal is not scheduled to begin until 1980, and construction on the Souris River is not to begin until 1981. In this regard we are confident that the United States will honour its long standing pledge that no project construction potentially affecting waters flowing into Canada would be undertaken unless it were clear that the United States could meet its obligation under Article IV of the Boundary Waters Treaty not to pollute water crossing the boundary "to the injury of health or property" in Canada. We are, of course, in continuing consultation with the United States government on the question of project schedules as they might affect Canada. We shall, however, seek official re-affirmation from the U.S. government that our understanding of the construction schedules is correct.

Canada's discussions with the United States about possible reference to the IJC are at a preliminary stage and we have not yet received a U.S. draft. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) stated recently to the House committee on external affairs, to agree to a joint reference we would, of course, on our side have to get language that would be acceptable to Canada—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.31 p.m.

APPENDIX

CN PENSION INCREASES

On account of continued increase of cost of living it has been decided to escalate CN pensions effective January 1, 1975 on the following basis:

Retirement in	Pensioners monthly flat rate increase	Widows monthly flat rate increase
1967 or prior	$12.00	$6.00
1968	$11.00	$5.50
1969	$10.00	$5.00
1970	$ 9.00	$4.50
1971	$ 8.00	$4.00
1972	$ 7.00	$3.50

This approach gives pensioners and widows who retired before the benefits became payable under the Canada/Quebec Pension Plan, the largest increase (6%) tapering each year as benefits under these plans increased. No increase is being granted to pensioners who retired in 1973 and 1974, since they have benefited substantially from the improvements in the CN pension plan effective January 1, 1973.

The cost of escalating on this basis has been estimated by our acturaries at $2,230,400.00 per annum over an amortization of 17 years, 9 months in accordance with the pension benefits standards act.

Advice of the new increases will be sent to recipient with their June pension cheques and the increase including arrears to January 1, 1975 will be reflected in their pension cheques as soon as possible thereafter.

At the end of 1973 we had increased contributory pension on account of the cost of living by 2% for all years back to 1935. The latest increase applicable to all pensioners in payment on December 31, 1973 was 4% effective January 1, 1974.

FOOD PRICES

REQUEST THAT MORE UP TO DATE PRICE INDEX BE PUBLISHED BY STATISTICS CANADA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in view of the shockingly bad attendance on the ministerial benches because of 'flu or Friday—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Your benches are not exactly crowded. It is not exactly standing room only over there.

Mr. Baldwin: —on the ministerial benches by people who have a duty to be there—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Twenty-three Tories in the House right now!

Mr. Baldwin: —I should like to address this question to the Acting Prime Minister, the compendium of all knowledge.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: Take it easy.

Mr. Drury: The first sensible word you have uttered so far.

Mr. Baldwin: In the last few weeks, Canadians have become increasingly aware of the tainted meat issue. It now appears they are being faced with tainted statistics. In the light of the fact that the average housewife sees her food cost rising at a far greater rate than portrayed by Statistics Canada, will the minister instruct Statistics Canada to consult with the Food Prices Review Board and together establish a food index which more accurately illustrates the rising food prices for the average Canadian family?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): In case the interjections did not get on the record, may I say there are a number of ministers away today on official business. I hope there are enough Tories on the other side to ask sufficient questions.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Only 23 present!

Mr. Sharp: Since there are only 23 of them here, I am afraid they will have to double up to meet their responsibilities.

The Bureau of Statistics does expect to list a representative basket of food items on the basis of which to make its calculations. This is always subject to review, and I am sure the bureau has been reviewing the situation constantly. This has been its practice in the past and I am sure it will be in the future.

Mr. Baldwin: In the light of the fact that all indicators point to a substantial increase in food prices in the next few months, and since the Statistics Canada survey of prices is about two months old, would the minister instruct Statistics Canada to improve and speed up its procedures so Canadian housewives can be provided with accurate and up to date information?

Mr. Sharp: These are very difficult statistical problems. I believe our index of consumer prices is a reasonably good one. Though I do not think the Bureau of Statistics would claim it is representative of every family, it represents an attempt to achieve an average. I do not think there is any need to issue any such instruction to the bureau as the hon. member has suggested. They are certainly concerned about their professional competence.

SUGGESTED PUBLICATION BY FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD OF MONITORING FOOD BASKETS IN TWELVE CITIES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): My request was with regard to time. The minister might bear that in mind. I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In light of the moderating effect that the publication of the results of the monitoring of certain food baskets by the Food Prices Review Board has had in Ottawa, would the minister instruct the Food Prices Review Board to publish similar statistics for the 12 cities they are already monitoring?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall take up the matter with the president of the commission.

POTATOES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO IMPLEMENT RECOMMENDATIONS OF FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD WITH REGARD TO MARKETING

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is related to the tabling today by the Food Prices Review Board of its special study on potatoes and its recommendations, particularly those directed toward the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the statement in the report this morning that the board rejects mandatory supply controls as a method of stabilizing supply swings and instead recommends a potato market information organization and a contributory income insurance program that will be operated by the federal government, is the minister in essential agreement with the conclusions and recommendations of the Food Prices Review Board? What steps will he take to implement those recommendations?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, from the beginning I said that we would be establishing a federal-provincial potato study committee, and that has been established. It is holding discussions to try to work out what kind of program can be developed for the potato producers. I have said that it should be a one-desk selling system. I have not had time to read the report that was put out by the Food Prices Review Board, but they have been wrong many times in the past. I am not saying they are wrong this time because they have also been right many times in the past.

POTATOES—REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL REPRESENTATIVES FROM ATLANTIC REGION TO COMMITTEE STUDYING MARKETING

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I am glad that the minister is keeping an open mind in this situation, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps for him it may be the triumph of hope over experience. As a supplementary question, may I ask him whether, in light of the fact that some of the recommendations apply to more than just departments of agriculture, either federally or provincially, particularly in the area of increasing transportation difficulties and the present tariff problems with the United States, the minister will be adding to his committee representatives from the Atlantic transportation commission, which is presently studying this issue, as well as from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in order that a full and effective decision can be made with respect to the recommendations put forward today?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I think the recommendations are obvious ones, Mr. Speaker. No committee would be that naive not to take them into consideration because they are so obvious. I do not know whether I should congratulate the Food Prices Review Board for putting the obvious into their report or suggesting the obvious, but any committee of any intelligence at all would be suggesting and studying that matter.

[Mr. Ouellet.]

POTATOES—POSSIBILITY OF COMMITTEE ON MARKETING INVESTIGATING COST OF PRODUCTION

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, may I put one supplementary question to the minister. In regard to the terms of reference of this committee, will it have authority to look into input costs of production as well as merely the marketing of the product?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, again this would be a natural thing for them to do. With regard to the tariffs, if the Food Prices Review Board have experts on tariffs we would certainly appreciate hearing from them. Tariff discussions are going on at the present time in Geneva with regard to this very commodity.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON DUMPING OF HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS IN NORTHERN TERRITORIES

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The media in my constituency have mentioned a report commissioned by the minister to look into problems faced by consumers in the north. Specifically the news broadcasts mentioned the dumping of hazardous products which have been banned by the department into the northern market. Is the minister prepared to table this report?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall look into the matter. I am sorry, but I am not up to date on this matter. I shall find out whether the report can be tabled and, if so, I shall be glad to table it.

[English]

REASON FOR FAILURE TO ENFORCE HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS REGULATIONS SIMULTANEOUSLY IN NORTHERN AND SOUTHERN PARTS OF COUNTRY

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the minister. In view of the fact that products such as certain models of Sony television sets and children's bubble bath, which have been labelled hazardous by the department, were on the shelf for a considerable period of time after they had been removed from the southern market, can the minister explain to the House why the department's regulations were not enforced simultaneously in the northern and southern parts of the country?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot. I shall check and give the hon. member an answer later on.

[English]

Mr. Firth: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister prepared to commit more of the resources of his department in the future to the task of ensuring that northern consumers are afforded the same protection as consumers in the south?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, obviously, my department would like to give all Canadians equal services, regardless of where they live. Still, as all other departments, mine has budgetary constraints.

CRIMINAL CODE

REQUEST BY ABITIBI CHAMBER OF COMMERCE FOR REFERENDUM ON CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General of Canada. Can he tell the House whether he has read the resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Abitibi requesting that a referendum be held on capital punishment at the time of the next election; and also tell us whether he considers that request reasonable which would allow the Canadian people to express their wishes with regard to that very special matter?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have received a copy of the resolution passed by the Chamber of Commerce of Abitibi on this subject. I can only say to the hon. member that it is not our tradition to have that type of referendum on important subjects. Parliaments are elected to deal with these matters.

SUGGESTED INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION ON GUN CONTROL—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in light of the increase in the numbers of culpable and non-culpable homocides by the use of firearms, will the Solicitor General now move from his study process and bring forth for examination a bill to restrict certain guns and control others?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I have pointed out to the House on several occasions, we do have a special group within our department studying the present laws in order to make recommendations for reform and amendment. We are also having a meeting in Ottawa on Monday and Tuesday of next week of firearm registrars in order to get their opinions on these matters. While I want to speed up the report on this subject, I think we should recognize that this is a complicated matter and there are no simple solutions or panaceas. I think it is better to wait a few months and do the proper thing rather than do something just for show right away.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that Mr. Stevens said in the Globe and Mail that the minister said the same thing a year ago, does he not think he now has enough data, facts and evidence in reference to culpable and non-culpable homocides to bring forth a bill that is practical, realistic and workable?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the date in that report is correct. I do know we started this study several months ago, and because of certain serious crimes committed recently with guns we have upgraded the status of that particular working group and have established a date for the completion of its report. We hope to have that report by the middle of the summer.

EFFECT OF INCREASE IN MONEY SUPPLY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, as the Governor of the Bank of Canada appears to be prepared to allow interest rates, including mortgage rates, to rise as a mechanism for enforcing anti-inflationary discipline upon the economy, will the Minister of Finance tell the House whether he agrees with the Governor's position and, in that circumstance, whether he would approve such an increase in the cost of money, bearing in mind the consequences such a policy will have on housing demands and business investment intentions?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Governor of the bank pointed out in his recent address to the Life Underwriters' Association that he contemplated an expansion in the money supply sufficient to accommodate expansion in the economy, but not an amount that would provoke inflation. The hon. member really ought to make up his mind. He has spent a good deal of time during the past few weeks worrying about over-expansion in the money supply. Obviously, if there is to be any discipline of the money supply, interest rates will be affected.

SUGGESTED ASSISTANCE TO SECTORS OF ECONOMY AFFECTED BY HIGH INTEREST RATES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Finance had made up his mind a little earlier he might have been able to introduce a budget prior to June 23. In any event, if it is decided by the government that higher interest rates are required, does the minister propose to initiate any special assistance to sectors of the economy such as housing, which will be particularly hard hit by a higher interest rate structure?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is dealing with budgetary matters and he will have an opportunity to express his views shortly.

REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF CASH DEFICIT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, with government cash balances having fallen $1.2 billion since January and, as the minister has indicated, our cash deficits this year will be $3 billion, will the minister indicate if that is still his estimate of our cash deficit, bearing in mind the foreseeable unemployment insurance deficit and the possible falloff in future tax revenues due to the current recession?

● (1120)

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will be giving a precise statement on the cash balances of the government on June 23 and the projected cash deficit.

AGRICULTURE

CRIMINAL CHARGES AGAINST HOWARD BUCHAN, CHIEF OF FIELD OPERATIONS FOR PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture who is in charge of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration. According to the press today Howard Ernest Buchan, chief of field operations for the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, is to appear in magistrate's court on a charge of defrauding the federal government. According to an inspector of the Mounted Police the charges relate to the 1974 federal election campaign and favours and pay-offs to PFAA employees with Liberal sympathies. In the absence of the Minister of Justice, who is the minister of elections for the Liberal party in Saskatchewan, I ask the Minister of Agriculture what about this charge; are other charges to be laid and, in particular, because this investigation has been going on since December or perhaps prior thereto was Mr. Buchan suspended pending the result of the preliminary hearing and/or his trial.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether Mr. Buchan has been suspended, but in any event his term of office is up either the first or the end of July.

An hon. Member: He is going to the Senate.

Mr. Whelan: I wish to make it plain that I did not hire him. As I said earlier, if there is any wrongdoing let the courts take the proper procedure. I just received this report yesterday. I have not issued any instructions concerning whether he should be suspended. I will be meeting with my officials this afternoon.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will return to this subject on Monday. The jovial minister is always here and I know he will be around. I notice that at the preliminary hearing the Crown apparently made the request that this charge be set for June 12, the day after the provincial election. Is there any significance in that fact?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, this minister certainly would not interfere with the decisions of the courts or the police.

OBJECTION OF ONTARIO TO ATTENDANCE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF PALESTINIAN LIBERATION ORGANIZATION AT CONFERENCE IN TORONTO—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask some general policy questions about the Palestinian Liberation Organization and the UN meeting on criminology. In the absence of the Prime Minister and in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I guess I am stuck with the House leader.

An hon. Member: And we are stuck with you, Al.

Mr. Lawrence: In light of the revelations as long ago as May 9 that the government of Ontario made representations to this government and to the Prime Minister that it would be displeased if the PLO was admitted to the conference in Toronto this summer, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if a reply has yet been given the Premier of Ontario by the Prime Minister. If not, when will it be forthcoming? Will we be advised about this? Is the government still adamant in its stand that any invitation extended by the United Nations automatically will permit any such terrorist group to come to Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that a reply has yet been sent because the government has been looking very carefully at this question. As the hon. gentleman knows, we are host to a UN conference; we do not invite the members. There is a problem, however, with which we are now trying to cope, which is that we do not allow terrorists into this country under our immigration proceedings. This is a very difficult problem which I am sure my hon. friend understands. We have a responsibility as a member of the United Nations to observe the organization's rules. We also have a responsibility not to allow terrorists into this country. It is a very difficult problem and one that I am sure my hon. friend understands and would not want to exploit.

Mr. Lawrence: As usual, the House leader is making assumptions he should not be making.

In view of the apparent contradiction between the prohibited class as outlined in the House the other day by the minister whose responsibility it is to speak on these matters, and in view of what the Acting Prime Minister has now indicated, could he advise the House when the government could undertake to terminate this contradiction, whether there will be a determination of government policy, and if the government, out of courtesy if nothing else, could advise us whether there would be an opportunity for us to discuss the matter when the decision is made and certainly when a reply is given to the Premier of Ontario?

Mr. Sharp: As the hon. gentleman knows, this conference is to be held in September. We have to make our decision soon. I am sure it will be conveyed to the House and the public, if the House is then in session. I do not know whether I can undertake to promise that there would be a discussion in the House. There are many opportunities to exploit the issue, as the hon. member is doing now.

INQUIRY WHETHER UNITED NATIONS INFORMED CANADA DOES NOT WELCOME REPRESENTATIVES OF TERRORIST GROUPS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has the United Nations been informed by the minister, by his department or by anybody in the government that, generally speaking, terrorist representatives in Canada are not welcomed and a member of that prohibited class would have to make an application to enter Canada, UN meeting or no?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the information I conveyed to the House the other day was that the PLO has been decreed as being an organization the members of which are prohibited. But there is a provision in the law under which a minister's permit can be issued for a temporary entry for specific purposes where no danger is involved, and that is a judgment that has to be exercised. I am not aware of any specific communication to the UN about this to date, but I am of the mind that the UN may be familiar with those conditions. However, as the Acting Prime Minister has indicated, this is the situation at present, and the policy is being reviewed.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STRIKE OF NURSES IN YUKON—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO SETTLE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the fact that nurses belonging to the Public Service Union of Canada went on strike at midnight last night in the Yukon, that this strike will likely spread to all parts of Canada within the next week, that these nurses are making extremely reasonable demands in that they are looking for parity with their counterparts in the provinces, and that they have indicated that they would accept either a one year contract or a contract which includes a COLA clause, will the President of the Treasury Board tell the House if he is prepared to instruct his negotiators to make an offer which is more in line with the demands of the nurses and comparable to settlements being made in the provinces?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, this group of public service professionals has had the right to strike for several weeks. There have been isolated strikes across Canada in this regard. The government position is clear. There has been a unanimous conciliation report. The union spokesman, the government representative and the president of the conciliation board have all submitted a unanimous report that was accepted by the government. Naturally, when a union spokesman accepts a report, I would be ill-advised to contravene it.

● (1130)

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: I have just returned from the Yukon, and the nurses I have spoken with are extremely reasonable people, and the community in the Yukon is completely behind the nurses. Is the minister prepared to reconsider his obviously unacceptable decision, which will only result in hardship for the nurses and the patients?

Mr. Chrétien: Everyone in Canada knows that I am a very reasonable man, too.

REPORT OF PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION INDICATING VIOLATIONS OF MERIT PRINCIPLE IN APPOINTMENTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board, and it has to do with the annual report released by the Public Service Commission. That report indicates that one out of every four appointments in the civil service, and I am quoting from the report, "may constitute an actual or potential violation of the merit principle". In addition to this there are another 2,754 cases cited as failures to carry out the administrative directives issued by the commission. In view of these statements and reports by a reputable commission, is the minister carrying out an investigation to ensure that the integrity of the public service has not been violated, particularly with respect to the merit principle in the hiring and promotion of public servants?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the instructions are specific on the subject. There may have been some cases of violation, as was stated in the report, but they were not voluntary. Directives on the subject are clear and specific. Naturally, the hon. member is entitled to question the chairman of the Public Service Commission if he wishes to obtain further explanations on the subject.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Unfortunately, the chairman of the Public Service Commission is not in the House this afternoon to put questions to, but the President of the Treasury Board is. Would the minister then advise the House what steps were taken or will be taken to rectify this? Has he caused any investigation to be made of this to see whether the merit principle has in fact been violated, to what extent it has been violated and who has suffered as a result of the violation? Is the minister planning any investigation at all, or does he intend just to slough this off on the chairman of the Public Service Commission.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am not in charge of the Public Service Commission. The directives concerning the merit principle are well-established when it comes to hiring federal employees. We do our utmost so that the principle be respected. But the Public Service Commission is a body totally independent of my administration and directly answerable to the House of Commons.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POLLUTION OF ATMOSPHERE BY FREON GAS—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF UNITED STATES STUDY

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. As the minister's department is studying whether the manufacture of aerosol cans should be prohibited in Canada, and as the proposed Anglo-French Concorde jet is to be flown into Canada, will the minister also investigate the United States study which claims that these supersonic jets could also pollute the atmosphere and cause increased skin cancer like the freon gas from aerosol cans?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the danger referred to by the hon. member has been signalled. We are not yet certain whether this danger is real. We are just making studies on the use of this gas in spray containers to see whether they change in the atmosphere or not. This summer, in August, the department will make an experiment in the Arctic, because it is the area with the thinnest ozone layer, to measure this gas which can be suspended in the atmosphere. As for Concorde flights, the hon. member knows that Concorde has not yet been cleared to fly above Canadian territory. Therefore, although this problem is important, neither I nor the Department of Transport have promulgated rules about this.

PROPOSED USE OF SKIFFS BY MARINE PATROL—REQUEST FOR REVERSAL OF DECISION AND NAMES OF THOSE RECOMMENDING CHANGE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In late March I posed questions in respect of rumours regarding the elimination of the RCMP marine patrol service of Canada. The minister seemed to be unaware of such a retrograde step at that time. Following this, in a letter to me the minister confirmed that the present vessels would be replaced by 20 foot skiffs. In light of the many objections which have been received concerning this matter, would the minister consider having this decision reversed?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out to the hon. member in the letter I sent to him, this change was made as a result of a study carried out by the RCMP. The study indicated that better service could be given by smaller boats which were more mobile and which could be supported by aircraft. This was an administrative decision taken by the RCMP and not a policy decision of mine as minister. In response to the question by the hon. member, I have not received very many complaints. I have received a few, but a very small number.

Mr. Muir: In view of statements by former senior marine personnel that skiffs are simply not the answer to marine police and rescue work in Canada's coastal and great lakes environments, and that the use of skiffs would be like sending a boy out on a man's errand, would the minister investigate and report to the House who the marine and seafaring people are within the force who recommended this move to the government? In view of the fact that the minister said this was to save money, would he not consider the saving of lives to be more important than saving a few dollars?

Mr. Allmand: I do not think the purpose of the change was to save money. It was to bring about a more effective policing system within the RCMP. The larger boats could not be used on inland lakes and waterways, whereas the smaller boats could. They can be transported, so they can be used both on the sea and on inland waters. I might say that these suggestions were made after a long study of the subject by people who are supposed to be experts. I do not have the names, but I will try to find out who they were.

I must point out as well that there are other services within the federal government which provide help at sea, such as the coastguard, the Fisheries Department, and so on. They have vessels which are working in this area as well.

FINANCE

EXCISE TAX ON PRIVATE AIRCRAFT AND PLEASURE BOATS—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON EFFECTIVENESS IN LIMITING CONSUMPTION OF PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. With respect to the 10 per cent excise tax on privately owned aircraft and motor driven pleasure boats, which was part of the November budget, will the minister now advise as to what degree this tax has limited oil consumption in Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will have to consult with my colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but I would hope it had some result.

Mr. Fraser: In view of the fact that small boat consumption of petroleum fuel in Canada is less than one half of one per cent of the total Canadian petroleum consumption, can the minister advise whether it is the view of the government that it is necessary and practical to persist with this tax and whether it will result in any significant conservation of Canadian oil? The tax does appear to be illogical and discriminatory.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Every tax has a certain arbitrary feature to it, as the hon. gentleman knows. In terms of the policy of conservation, the government is reviewing every method to attempt to conserve petroleum and natural gas resources in this country.

Mr. Fraser: Would the minister, with his other colleagues, please consider the discriminatory effect of this tax on small boat owners and private aircraft owners as opposed to the great many other uses to which the gasoline engine is put in this country, keeping in mind the relatively small amount of fuel consumed in this area?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): This matter, of course, was debated thoroughly in committee of the whole when the bills pursuant to the November budget were before the committee. The hon. member will recall that the scope of the tax was reduced as a result of those committee discussions.

OLYMPIC GAMES

POSSIBLE MINTING OF COMMEMORATIVE GOLD COINS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. As actual net proceeds derived from the sales of Olympic stamps and coins on March 31, 1975, totalled only $22.3 million, far below the projected ultimate $260 million, as only one year is left before the Olympics and as the shortfall is likely to add even more to the already exorbitant deficit Montreal faces, can the minister advise this House if the cabinet has decided to supplement the existing program, perhaps by minting a gold coin piece or by some other ways and means, and will the government be introducing legislation to this effect?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the government is considering the requests of COJO to find procedures to increase revenues. As soon as the decision of the cabinet is taken, we will probably be introducing legislation in the House in the near future.

[English]

MINTING OF COMMEMORATIVE GOLD COINS BY HAITI—INQUIRY WHETHER PERMISSION SOUGHT

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As Haiti has minted and is now marketing Olympic gold coins of its own honouring the Montreal Olympics, will the minister advise the House if the government of Haiti approached the government of Canada for permission to mint such coins; was such permission given, and, if not, what assurances can be given that these coins will not find their way to markets where they will compete directly with our own fund raising coin projects?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether a request was made to mint foreign coins for the Olympics. Evidently if this affects the positions of COJO, we will take the necessary steps. But to my knowledge, no permission was granted in that connection.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROJECTION OF BENEFIT PAYMENTS TO END OF 1975—POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF BENEFIT PAYMENTS

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and has to do with the state of the unemployment insurance fund. Has the minister seen recent forecasts which project to the end of 1975 payments which will be made out of the fund in 1975, and has consideration been given to extending benefits to those workers whose benefits will run out and who therefore will be deprived of UIC pay.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in another place the other day I indicated possible benefit pay-outs in 1975 at various levels of unemployment and took into consideration the other factors, such as duration of unemployment, duration of benefits, wage rates, and so on. To answer the second part of the hon. member's question, no decision has been taken to extend benefits. In fact, the extension of benefits would require amendments to the act.

POSSIBILITY GOVERNMENT'S CONTRIBUTION TO ACCOUNT WILL EXCEED AMOUNT IN MAIN ESTIMATES—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF AMOUNT

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration? Noting that the conference board rather conservatively estimates that the unemployment rate will rise to 7.8 per cent by the end of the year and that benefit payments are already running at a 29 per cent higher rate in the first quarter of this year than in the first quarter of last, I ask if the minister is now prepared to concede that the government's contribution to the unemployment insurance account will have to exceed considerably the $864 million forecast in the main estimates for 1975-76?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my reply to a similar question the other day, the hon. member, with respect, does not understand the operation of the fund. The $890 million-odd in the main estimates for 1975-76 represents the amount calculated as being required to repay the advance made in 1974, that is, to repay the government's share of costs for meeting 1974 benefit payments. There will not be any requirement for additional funds for that item in the main estimates.

Mr. Oberle: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister prepared to give a rough estimate of the previous year's requirements; that is, is he prepared to give a rough estimate of the cash drain on the government during this fiscal year which is resulting from its contributions to the unemployment insurance fund. Obviously, the minister needs the money this year, even though he is to include it in the estimates next year.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I indicated the other day in another place when answering questions about various levels of unemployment and the way these would affect varying levels of benefit payments for the full year, the government costs required to meet those varying levels of payment and these were tabled. I do not have those details before me. They are public knowledge and I should be glad to furnish them to the hon. member on another occasion; or, he could refer to the transcript of the recent meeting of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST GENERAL QUANG—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Now that the minister has read the security report on General Quang sent to him by the United States, and as the U.S. has evidence which could block any re-entry of Quang into the U.S., is the minister now of the opinion that allegations levelled at Quang in this House are correct and, if so, what steps will the minister take to get rid of him?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have not completed our investigations. Although the hon. member obviously has access to information, I do not think his comment about the existence of evidence, which would prevent U.S. authorities from accepting General Quang, is necessarily correct. The decisions in this matter have not been taken, and I do not accept the premise of that particular aspect of the preamble.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ALLEGED LACK OF KNOWLEDGE OF REGIONAL STAFF OF LOCAL GOVERNMENT GUIDELINES AND CONFLICTING STATEMENTS IN GUIDELINES

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As the regional staff of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development themselves do not know about the contents of the D-1 guidelines on local government how can we expect these guidelines to be enforced on the date on which they are to apply to native peoples across Canada?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I understand that they have been informed about D-1. Other materials have gone out, to elaborate further these guidelines. Quite by chance I was looking at them when the hon. member asked his question.

Mr. Malone: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. How can the minister reconcile conflicting statements in D-1 which suggest a higher degree of self-government and, at the same time, the provision of operators' manuals on how native people should run their own affairs, including their own money?

[Mr. Andras.]

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated previously when dealing with the subject of guidelines, we feel that as substantial amounts of public funds are handled by Indian organizations, it is imperative from their point of view and ours for us to adhere to definite guidelines, procedures and auditing requirements in the disbursement and administration of these funds.

Mr. Malone: That is not the issue, and the minister knows it.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I shall make inquiries.

Mr. Coates: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister check some of the public statements which have been made in Nova Scotia by some of the people who have been appointed to the committee I mentioned and determine who is holding up action in this matter, so that we may know more clearly what is happening.

WINTER CAPITAL WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF COMPLETION DATE FOR PROJECTS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I believe he received notice of it. In light of recent recommendations made to the minister by various members of this House to extend the May 31 deadline of the winter capital works program for those municipalities whose projects have been delayed for various reasons beyond their control, for example, such as labour disputes or delays in approval by provincial administrative tribunals, is the minister in a position to announce today until when the completions of these specific projects will be extended?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, despite the courtesy of the notice, the answer is, no.

WINE DISTILLERS—EFFECT OF PROHIBITION OF USE OF WORD "CHAMPAGNE"—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Joe Flynn (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As court decisions will prevent our wine industry from using the word "champagne" on labels of champagne products, will the minister, in conjunction with the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs attempt to find some way to alleviate this serious difficulty of which our wine industry is a victim, and which is affecting adversely in particular Niagara area producers and six Ontario wine distillers?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to discuss this matter with my colleagues.

ALLEGED CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY OVER SEABED TO EDGE OF CONTINENTAL SHELF—REASON FOR FAILURE TO ASSERT CONTROL OVER AREA

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, may I direct my question to the Minister of State responsible for fisheries. In light of the Prime Minister's interview with George Radwanski of the Gazette on May 16, 1975 in which he said, "international law gives us sovereign rights over the seabed out to the edge of the continental shelf", is the minister aware whether in fact this statement is true?

● (1150)

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I am not a lawyer, but I understand that by the 1958 convention that statement is correct.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, if it is a correct statement, then why has the Canadian government not begun asserting its control over this area to protect its mineral and marine resources, since it obviously already is sovereign territory?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure of the words "sovereign territory". I will have to check the exact quotation that has been used by the hon. member. My understanding is that the 1958 convention applied only to the natural resources of the seabed. However, as I say, I am not a lawyer and I hesitate to venture into this area.

BANFF—REQUEST NEW HOUSING BE MADE AVAILABLE IN TOWN

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in his capacity as mayor of Banff. The minister is counting upon the town of Canmore to provide housing for Banff. I wonder whether he has noted the statement of the town of Canmore that new housing will not be available for Banff and the statement of the chairman of the Banff Advisory Council that unless new housing is announced for Banff, there could be demonstrations or other approaches to violence in Banff this summer. In that case, will the minister consider the possibility of making new housing available in Banff in the near term and not delaying it until the filing of the Oberlander report?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, that comment really does not square with the meeting I had with Mayor Klotz of Canmore and his councillors. They indicated they did not want to be purely and simply a bedroom community for Banff, but they were quite interested in participating in the development of visitor service facilities and along with that would go residential accommodation.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): When the minister checks with his officials and finds out that in fact Canmore has now indicated that no subdivisions and new development will be made available to residents in Banff, will he then seriously consider his refusal to allow new housing in Banff for the short-term and act to relieve the housing pressures in that community in the near future?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to look at the situation. However, we made it quite clear that we do not want to see unrestrained or unrestricted expansion in Banff. The residents of both Banff and Canmore are well aware of our efforts in this area.

CENTENNIAL PROPERTIES SENIOR CITIZENS PROJECT IN HALIFAX—REASON FOR DELAY—SUGGESTION CMHC NOT ADVANCE FURTHER FUNDS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. CMHC is financing, under the National Housing Act, the construction of several senior citizen housing projects in Halifax. I might add that there is a great need for such accommodation in Halifax as there are over 800 applications now on file. One of the buildings presently under construction is a project of Centennial Properties, a firm which our party has had cause to bring to the minister's attention on previous occasions for reasons of its questionable practices. My question is this: will the minister look into the Centennial Properties project and find out what problems are holding up completion of the building which was to have been finished a year ago this spring?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing the situation to my attention. I will certainly look into it and be in touch with him.

Mr. Gilbert: I understand that the subcontractors on the Centennial Properties project have not been paid since December and that further funds were not to be advanced by CMHC until the next stage of construction is completed. Will the minister assure the House that payments to Centennial Properties will not be speeded up until the minister has ascertained that the company is capable of completing the project and providing the desperately needed senior citizen units?

Mr. Danson: As I indicated earlier, Mr. Speaker, I will look into it thoroughly. I will not make any commitment until I know what the situation is. I want to see projects completed for senior citizens, especially in Halifax.

SAUNDERS AIRCRAFT—POSSIBLE REPRESENTATIONS BY HAWKER SIDDELEY OR MANITOBA—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister advise whether the Hawker Siddeley aircraft corporation or the province of Manitoba has made representation either to the minister or his department with reference to Saunders of Gimli, Manitoba?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge there have been no representations by Hawker Siddeley on behalf of or with respect to Saunders Aircraft. I have had discussions with the province of Manitoba with regard to the difficulties of the Saunders Aircraft Company.

Mr. Whiteway: In view of the problems of Saunders up to this point, and the fact the financing was done almost exclusively by the province of Manitoba, is the minister now in a position to indicate the type of financing or aid he has in mind for Saunders and whether it will be in the same proportion as that given to eastern companies such as de Havilland?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, we have had discussions with regard to Export Development Corporation financing and with regard to PAIT grants for any industrial applications. To date there have been two problems. One is that the advance in industrial technology has not met the terms of the program for the advancement of industrial technology. The other is that the firm has been unable to sell its aircraft outside the country in order to take advantage of Export Development Corporation financing.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give any specific date. It is a thorny problem, as mentioned by the hon. member. PUBLISHING

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO ENSURE UNITED STATES EDITION OF GUINESS BOOK OF RECORDS NOT SOLD IN CANADA

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I assure him it concerns a very important principle in Canadian publishing. In view of the recent speech by his colleague, the Secretary of State, in West Virginia to United States publishers when he stated that the Canadian government is prepared to intervene and scrutinize carefully any impending new foreign presence in Canadian book publishing, what action is the minister taking to ensure that the United States publisher Sterling will not be permitted to sell the American edition of the Guiness Book of Records in Canada, protected by a monopoly, thus taking away 50,000 annual sales of this book by a Canadian publisher, Mel Hurtig of Edmonton, who depends on this book for 20 per cent of his business and who is about to receive an award as Canadian publisher of the year?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I have no power under the Foreign Investment Review Act to deal with a commercial transaction of this nature. I fully appreciate the problem the hon. member has mentioned. I deplore the transfer but, as I have said, I have no power under the Foreign Investment Review Act to intervene.

PETITION ON ABORTION PROVISIONS—TABLING OF NINTH REPORT OF CLERK OF PETITIONS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid on the table the ninth report of the Clerk of Petitions.

[English]

The Clerk of the House announced that the above mentioned report meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I request, under Standing Order 67(8), that the petition presented by the Committee of One Million be now read by the Clerk, and because the subject is a grievance requiring an immediate remedy I ask that the matter be brought into immediate debate. Notwithstanding Your Honour's previous ruling under Standing Order 43 that abortion, while important, is of continuing rather than immediate concern, I respectfully suggest that the spcial circumstances of this petition enjoin members to give it their immediate attention so that we can urge upon the government a speedy and urgent remedy.

Never before has parliament received a petition containing one million names, and these one million Canadians will be affronted by this institution if the petition is relegated to the musty shelves of our basement, all the more so because abortions, which have quadrupled over a four-year period to 43,201, are now recognized as constituting a grave social problem.

I remind Your Honour that the groups making up the Committee of One Million have previously presented briefs to the government urging that section 251 of the Criminal Code be amended to tighten the law so that hospital abortion committees would be empowered to permit abortions only in cases where the medical need is indisputable. The government has not acted, and abortions continue to escalate. The Committee of One Million has therefore appealed to parliament to redress this grievance. Members of this institution are also ombudsmen and we must be permitted to debate vital national questions irrespective of the government's willingness or unwillingness to present these matters to us. Nor is this a partisan matter, as the formation of the Interparliamentary Group in Defence of the Unborn, composed of members from all parties, clearly shows.

Yesterday, the willingness of the House to take on this exceptionally important subject was evident. I ask, and will so move if acceptable, that we now debate the petition of the Commmittee of One Million.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has put into question the idea that we should consider an immediate debate on the petition which was put forward yesterday. The motion is that the petition be now read by the Clerk of the House and, further, that it be brought into immediate debate.

The hon. member has referred to a previous ruling of the Chair. I would remind him of that ruling; I do not propose to quote it. It was based on an explicit ruling of the Hon. Lucien Lamoureux whose tenor left no doubt about the principle, and nothing which has happened in the interval persuade me otherwise. The principle of the operation of a representative government, as this parliament is, is that the representatives are elected to bring here the views of their constituents and it is through them, in debate in the House and by representations to the government, that amendments to the law ought to be proposed, discussed, debated and finalized if it is the will of the House.

Nevertheless, there are exceptional provisions with respect to petitions once they have been received and certified as to form. The purpose of those petitions is to redress a personal grievance. The hon. member is first of all asking that the petition be read. He is aware that yesterday the petition was read by the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) when she put the petition forward. The fact of the matter is that the statement which was read as a preamble to the petition yesterday was somewhat different from that which is attached to the petition today. This, of course, was done in order to make it acceptable as to form. The portion which is now attached to the petition does not in any way state the case as strongly as was stated in the reading of the preamble by the hon. member for York South yesterday. In other words, it seems to me that one of the remedies the hon. member is seeking today is less effective than was already granted yesterday.

In the second place, the rule under which the hon. member was proposing to have this petition read and then brought into debate is Standing Order 67(8) which reads as follows:

No debate shall be permitted on the report but a petition referred to therein may be read by the Clerk of the House at the table if required—

Certainly, under the circumstances it does not seem to be required. The Standing Order continues:

—or if it complain of some present personal grievance requiring an immediate remedy, the matter contained therein may be brought into immediate discussion.

Clearly, a representation that an existing law which has been under consideration by the House in various ways and which, on the undertaking of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), will be looked in to by a committee and is to be the subject of further consideration, is a matter of general concern and can in no way be interpreted as a matter of personal consideration.

For all three of these reasons: first, that the petition has already been read; second, that it is not a personal grievance but, rather, a matter of general concern to all members; and, finally, that recommendations and suggestions for the amendment of legislation ought, surely, to be carried on by members who, obviously, have been influenced by the petition itself, I cannot accede to the hon. member's request. There is nothing the matter with a petition of this magnitude influencing members to take action in the House, but I still maintain, based on earlier precedents, that it is the members of this House who should make representations respecting changes in the law, and not outsiders by way of petitions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BILINGUALISM—ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE

Question No. 2,161—Mr. Cossitt:

1. On what date was the decision made that the Royal Military College, Kingston, Ontario, is to become a bilingual institution (a) was this decision made by Cabinet (b) what are the names and job designations of all persons recommending or taking part in arriving at such decisions (c) what are the reasons for the government not following the recommendation of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism that RMC should remain an English language institution?

2. (a) What is the full nature of the entire estimated or budgeted cost of making RMC bilingual (b) a description and cost of all new capital construction (c) the number of additions to the staff and total salaries involved?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): 1. September 14, 1972. (a) No, it was made by the Treasury Board. (b) The Defence Management Committee composed of senior officials of the department made the recommendation to the Minister of National Defence who approved it and submitted it to the Treasury Board. (c) The decision to introduce the programme of instruction in both official languages at RMC was taken to meet a requirement for training of future professional officers in keeping with the government policy on bilingualism.

2. (a), (b), (c). The estimated cost of the program to make RMC institutionally bilingual is as follows: (1) Capital construction to improve teaching facilities for the whole college and to provide the additional classroom, laboratory and office space necessitated by the requirement to provide academic programmes in both languages—$5,990,300. (2) Up to 84 additional civilian staff members and some 23 military personnel will be employed gradually over the next three years, as the program is implemented. The salaries of such personnel, once the program is fully implemented would be about $1,517,000 per annum.

CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS

Question No. 2,166—Mr. Herbert:

1. Has the Postmaster General been made aware that witnesses for the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, when appearing before the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service, stated that the objective of the convention mandate to go for a Crown corporation was because of a preference for the Canada Labour Code rather than the Public Service Staff Relations Board?

2. Has the Post Office Department considered granting to Post Office workers the same contract negotiation privileges enjoyed by employees of Crown corporations?

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): 1. Yes.

2. The Postmaster General has stated to Postal Unions that the Department is prepared to negotiate the effects of technological change on the workers. However, labour relations in the Post Office are subject to the Public Service Staff Relations Act, whereas most Crown Corporations are subject to the Canada Labour Code.

OCEAN DUMPING CONTROL ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR CONTROL OF DUMPING SUBSTANCES INTO THE OCEAN AND TO ESTABLISH A BOARD OF REVIEW

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment) moved that Bill C-37, to provide for the control of dumping of wastes and other substances into the ocean, as reported with amendments by the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, be concurred in.

(Motion agreed to.)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now, by leave.

Mrs. Sauvé moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Madam Speaker, in rising to speak on third reading of this important bill I wish to make the point to the House of Commons and to the public of Canada that we are dealing here, on third reading, with a much better bill than we started with—

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): —because in this case the House of Commons has been able to do part of the job that it was convened to do and introduce some amendments that were accepted by the government and which improved in committee the bill sent to the committee by the House of Commons. My colleagues and I regret that many of the very progressive and important reforms which were proposed in committee were not accepted by the government. This is a matter to which I will return later in my remarks.

I begin by reviewing for the House the contents of Bill C-37 which in effect will ratify, on behalf of Canada, an international convention that will try to bring some control over dumping of substances at sea as well as some protection to the oceans and shorelines not only of Canada but of other countries of the world. Unfortunately, the bill as introduced, and to a large extent the bill as it emerged from committee—due to the intransigence of members on the government side—still allows a very substantial and dangerous discretion to lie in the hands of the minister, particularly with regard to the issuing of permits to people who might want to be exempted from the provisions of this bill.

In effect, those permits could be regarded, as my colleague from Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman) indicated earlier, as permits to pollute. They are permits that allow a shipping company to be exempted, at the discretion of the minister, from prohibitions against the dumping of dangerous substances at sea. So the minister has this substantial power to issue a permit to a shipper which, in effect, could become a permit to pollute. There is, in my view and in the view of my colleagues, inadequate protection against the way the minister can exercise that very broad discretion.

There has been established a board of review which will allow a partial appeal from decisions made by the minister. Unfortunately, this right of appeal is open in a mandatory way only to the polluter; the people who are the victims of the pollution must rely upon the ever-present discretion of the minister to have the right to bring their objections to the board of review.

In the extensive committee hearings that were held, we sought some safeguards and were successful in achieving some safeguards. But I say frankly that we did not achieve all of the safeguards that we should have. There are still some serious weaknesses in the bill. However, it is a very important bill, a bill that will enable Canada to advance the development of the law of the sea and the process of building up respect for international law.

The bill could have been much stronger if, first of all, the government had used the opportunity that the bill presented to meet Canadian dumping problems which are not met or addressed by the international convention. I think particularly of the matter raised by my colleague the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) in regard to the very serious problem of small coastal communities on both coasts of Canada that make a practice of dumping by barge and who will be affected by the provisions of the bill.

We were given verbal assurances that this question was in hand, that there had been discussions between the federal and provincial authorities in regard thereto; but it is clear that the government should have brought some action into play that would bring relief to these communities, some guarantee that they would not be victimized by this law, and so that the provincial governments concerned could have acted to help protect those communities. That is one instance where the bill could have been improved. Another is with regard to making more stringent the regulations regarding Canadian ships operating in Canadian waters. These would augment the provisions that are already part of the international convention.

Another way the bill could have been made much stronger would have been for the government to accept amendments regarding public participation and the public's right of appeal. It is not only the polluters and the bureaucrats who have an interest in environmental questions, Mr. Speaker; this is a matter that is of vital concern to all Canadians, particularly the growing number of Canadians who are anxious to preserve the environment of Canada. Yet the public has been virtually shut out of this legislation, as unfortunately it has been shut out of too much legislation emanating from the Department of the Environment.

As I say, several improvements to the bill were made in the committee, and I think the work done in committee is a demonstration of the good work that committees can do if they are given the time. I want to make particular reference to the excellent contributions in the committee debate made by my colleagues from South Shore (Mr. Crouse), Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco), Fraser Valley West, Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), Prince George-Peace River, and St. John's West (Mr. Carter). I think that all of us who sat in the committee will agree that the procedures we have just come through revealed three major difficulties with the committee system, and I want to deal with them briefly at this point.

The first difficulty was that at the outset there was an indication that the government expected the committee stage to be a rubber stamp stage; that it would be short and would yield no changes. After the bill was reported from the standing committee, the parliamentary secretary declared, as he had before, that the standing committee did the job that it was supposed to do and that it took the time it needed to improve the bill. As I say, the government expected the committee to be a rubber stamp; to have a short debate, with no changes emerging. Instead, the committee was active, but it was active against the wishes of the government, at least in my view.

The second problem—I say this frankly because it also applies to other bills—was that in the debate around the table there were often traces of excessive partisanship. I admit quite frankly that this was the case on both sides. I confess to the House that one of our proposed amendments was not sufficiently thought through and it probably deserved the rejection it received. But I suspect that many other reforms were defeated simply because it was the opposition that proposed them. They were not defeated on their merits but because of their sponsorship. The government was not prepared to consider a good idea because of the source of the idea.

Mr. Malone: So what's new?

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): This has very serious consequences. My colleague from Battle River (Mr. Malone) asks, "What's new?" The point is that we have this kind of thing happening in committee after committee. The government rejects too many good proposals coming from other parts of the House simply because they do come from other parts of the House. Unfortunately, members of the government party abide too slavishly by the wishes of the minister and her officials and subjugate their role as members of parliament to that of supporters of the government.

The third major problem revealed in our consideration of the bill was lack of research staff available to committee and the problems that this can cause when committees are dealing, as ours was, with complex questions of law and international practice. The officials of the department specifically declined my invitation that they assist the opposition in preparing amendments. I understand their declining that invitation, but I would made the point that the minister could have made their expertise available. Instead, we relied on the official opposition research office which, while abundant in talent, is limited in time and was busy with other bills. We relied on such help as we could borrow from interested environmental lawyers. It is a clear deficiency of the system, in dealing with complex matters of this kind, when the official opposition and other critics, including private members on the government side, do not have the access which they should have to the expertise that allows for careful consideration and improvement of government legislation.

In view of these faults that I have mentioned, as well as others that are known to members of the House and which have become clearly evident to members of other committees, I suggest we are not dealing with a satisfactory system in relation to our committees. I notice the presence in the chamber of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) who is one of those responsible for putting together a package on parliamentary reform. I hope that this is one aspect of our present system in parliament that will be reviewed in any serious attempt that is made at parliamentary reform.

● (1220)

Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned, this bill is better than when it was introduced. However, it contains several major weaknesses. We have sought to correct some of the more obvious shortcomings in committee. However, government members rejected the amendments that could have protected the interests of the public while at the same time giving to those people who are concerned about environmental problems the same rights that this bill gives to those who cause those problems.

We tried unsuccessfully to make sure that large shipowners who cause damages to marine coasts could not escape the resulting legal responsibility simply because the minister granted them a permit. We tried other reforms that I will mention in a while and we think that those changes should be included in the bill. Of course, with the approval of this bill by the committee, we asked ourselves quite seriously whether we should reintroduce the amendments at this stage. However, we knew this course would result in two things. First, the government majority which defeated those reforms in committee would repudiate those measures in this House also. Second, if the government thought there would be a long debate about the amendments, it would have withheld this bill. In order to avoid this delay by the government, we decided not to reintroduce the reforms that the government rejected in committee.

We took that decision because it is important that Canada be one of those countries which will sign the international convention on ocean dumping. It is not only a matter of prestige. The first 15 countries which ratified that convention have the right to set up certain guidelines about the international law and its interpretation as well as its application.

It is important that Canada be allowed to take part in the drafting of these guidelines, because other countries might not be as exacting toward polluters as we could be. If the bill had but national implications, we would study it more closely to reinforce it, but in view of its international import, we are willing to support it today in the hope that its passage will strengthen the international law against dumping.

[English]

The government itself introduced several amendments at the committee stage. Some of those amendments were simply technical, designed to clear up mistakes in drafting or to clear up meanings. Once again I point out to the House that this indicates the very real importance of the committee stage, because even governments, I would remind the House, make mistakes. In this case the government had made some mistakes which it was prepared to clear up in the committee. Other government amendments accepted suggestions that were put forward either during the debate on second reading or at the committee stage by members of the official opposition.

One very important amendment introduced by the government, and one very important way that this bill is stronger than its predecessor, can be found in the fact that it is now clear that the minister who will manage this bill is the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) and not some other minister. This was a proposal I made, as well as colleagues of mine, at second reading. We are delighted it has been accepted by the government and we believe it is an important improvement.

Another very real improvement which was introduced by my colleague the hon. member for Kootenay West was to extend to wild animals the protection and consideration the bill would extend only to domestic animals. It may well be that in most constituencies in the country elk, deer and other wild animals do not have the vote, but there is at least concern shown for their welfare initiated by that hon. member and, I am pleased to say, adopted by the government.

Finally, there was an agreement to establish some limit, an inadequate limit but a limit at least, of a year in the life of the permits—which, as I said earlier, could be considered permits to pollute—that can be issued by the government. When the bill was first introduced, as it was read literally the minister had the power to issue a permit to pollute that could last as long as Methuselah. This has been limited now to a year as a result of pressures brought on by the official opposition in the committee.

In addition, amendments introduced directedly by members of this party made other important changes. One of those was to place the onus on the minister to appoint qualified persons as analysts and inspectors. As the language first read, the minister had the discretion to appoint anyone she might choose—anyone who might drift in off the sea—to be an analyst or an inspector. At the insistence of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich and some members on the government side, an agreement was reached that there should be something written into the statute as to the necessity that these analysts and inspectors be qualified. That improvement has the effect, in my view, of making the minister liable for a mistake and it allows some recourse for people who are the victims of pollution when a mistake is made as a result of an incompetent analyst or inspector having been appointed by the minister.

Again, a slight improvement was made when the government accepted an amendment from this side that required the minister to advise parliament formally, via regular reports, of actions taken under the act on permits granted. The government also accepted the mandatory requirement that the permit shall state terms regarding the effect upon human and marine life and the conditions upon which the permit is issued.

A more important amendment, in my view, proposed by the official opposition and accepted by the government was the one to ensure the impartiality of the board of review established to handle appeals. Unfortunately, these are appeals only from polluters because the public has no statutory right of appeal under this government. The board of review as established in the original bill could have been a board controlled by the minister; it could have been a board appointed from within her own department, and thus subject to her direction and control. It was improved, we believe, in that the board is to be an independent board. We achieved that independence by proposing the amendment, which the government accepted, to the effect that the chairman shall not be a public servant. The chairman of this board by definition will not be someone who is subject to direction by the minister or any minister of the Crown.

Again, the government accepted a proposal by the official opposition that would increase the maximum fine for the offence of failure to report emergency dumping. This increases the maximum fine to be paid by such as Christina Onassis from a paltry $25,000 to at least $75,000. This brings that maximum into balance with other maximums in the legislation. I make the point that this is a maximum fine. We argued, with success, that the maximum should be higher than it was.

Clearly, many of these amendments introduced directly by the official opposition, or introduced because our criticism inspired them, are important. It is clear that together they improve the bill. However, several other important amendments were lost. They were lost sometimes for technical reasons, because of a technicality, and sometimes because government members simply voted against reform. One series of amendments which were introduced, and which were automatically out of order because they would have involved expenditures that had not been contemplated on second reading, would have substantially increased the ability of the public to keep track of ocean dumping problems.

They would have done that in two important ways. First, they would have created a registry in which would be listed the names of those people whom we could call the environmental public, those people particularly interested in questions related to the environment. They would require that people whose names were listed there would receive notice of the action taken by the minister under this act. That was one reform which, for technical reasons, was ruled out.

The second recommendation was that notice be published in newspapers of general circulation in areas where dumping may occur, instead of in the musty tomes—"tombs" might be the proper word—of the Canada Gazette, a publication which few members of parliament and no one in his right mind reads with any regularity. Unfortunately, that is the only medium now in which the minister is required to publish notice of some of her decisions. We proposed that the general public, as well as the eccentric public which reads the Canada Gazette, be included in the ambit of notice. As I say, those amendments were ruled out of order for reasons which I do not dispute.

However, the point I make is that the minister at this stage had the opportunity to adopt those amendments as her own and to bring them forward here. They would have received immediate approval on this side of the House and I am sure by my colleagues in the New Democratic Party and the Social Credit party. They would have received immediate approval if the minister had committed herself to the principle of public participation and adopted those amendments as her own and brought them in.

Mr. Béchard: Why did you not move amendments?

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): My colleague, the chairman of the committee, asks why I did not move amendments. I tried to explain that during the French portion of my speech. I apologize to him if my French is so difficult to understand in Bonaventure that he did not follow what I said. The reason we did not introduce any amendments was this: we knew that if we did introduce amendments and raised the prospect of a long debate, the government would not give this bill the priority it requires and would not have brought it forward. We wanted the bill brought forward because it is important for international law. That is the reason we did not press those amendments.

We also knew that the same Liberal majority which obediently voted down reform in the committee would have obediently voted down reform in the House of Commons. We did not want to take the time of the House in delaying the development of international law for that purpose. I hope that answers my friend, the chairman of the committee.

A small step was made regarding information to the public. In the original bill the minister was required to report to an international agency. I make the point, and underline the anomaly and the irony, that in the first bill that international body had more right to information than the Canadian parliament or the Canadian public. The minister agreed to present to Parliament those reports which she will give the international body. We will get that information a little late, but now at least we in Canada in parliament and the public of Canada will be on an equal footing with this new international agency. It is a small step but it is a step.

My only regret is that the minister was not prepared to go further. I regret that she was not prepared to introduce simple provisions, which would not cost much money but would establish the principle of the public's right to participate in environmental matters, by ensuring that there is general notice of actions being taken regarding dumping, instead of those actions being filed away in the obscurity of the Canada Gazette.

Now I want to review some of the amendments that were lost and some of the problems we addressed which go unaddressed in the bill before us. Early in the discussion in the committee it became evident that the bill would cause problems for small coastal communities, as I mentioned earlier, some of which dump by barge. The minister assured us that the matter would be looked into, but her supporters—particularly incredibly, her supporters from British Columbia—voted against an amendment which would guarantee some protection for those small communities by requiring the agreement of the provinces. That amendment, introduced by my colleague the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), incredibly was voted against by Liberal members of parliament from both coasts.

I wish to refer to another amendment that was lost, and a weakness which persists in the bill. The bill provides that when a permit to pollute is granted, varied or changed, there must be notice in that well-read publication, the Canada Gazette. However, not even the Canada Gazette gets to learn when a permit is suspended or revoked. It is suspended or revoked in secret. There is no requirement for notice. It is a matter which no one has been able to explain satisfactorily. The law requires a birth notice in the Canada Gazette but refuses to require an obituary notice in the Canada Gazettee.

It is clear that the public of Canada is as interested in the end of a permit as it is in the issuance of a permit. We sought a reform which would require the government to tell Canadians, even if only in the Canada Gazette, when a permit is suspended or revoked. That amendment, however, was defeated and that information shall remain secret unless the minister in her discretion, or the company, choose to make it public.

There is another very serious deficiency in this bill as it stands which we sought, unsuccessfully, to repair. The present bill creates a double standard regarding the right to appeal decisions by the minister. Some big company which holds a permit or seeks a permit has a statutory right to appeal the granting, suspension or revocation of a permit. That is the law for the big guy. But the citizen or the community which might be affected by dumping has no statutory right of appeal. The public has to ask the minister, "Please, may we appeal?" The minister, of course, has the right to say no.

However, companies such as those of Christina Onassis and other big shippers have a stronger right than the public of Canada. They have the right to tell the minister they will appeal. There is a statutory appeal for the dumper. There is only a discretionary appeal for the dumpee. That is a double standard and unfairness which should not have been allowed to remain on the statute books of Canada. We sought to end that double standard, but the government members protected the privilege of the potential polluters and left the public at the minister's discretion.

There is another serious weakness which we tried to repair in this bill. Once an appeal board has been established, the bill gives all "interested" persons a right to appear. The problem, Mr. Speaker—you are not a lawyer, as I am not—I am advised by legal advisers, is that the word "interested", in law has a specific meaning suggesting a pecuniary or proprietary interest. We tried to broaden that adjective to "concerned" in order to allow a larger segment of the public to take part in any hearings that could be called. That attempt to involve more Canadians rather than a narrow group was rejected by Liberal members.

Again, another problem in the bill which we sought to address, without success, is that the bill says that any action against any dumper—a person who dumps, such as Christina Onassis or any other big shipper—must be brought before the courts of law within two years of the dumping. There is a two year time limit. Some environmental effects simply cannot be foreseen in two years. Some of them take much longer to become evident.

We tried an amendment which would write in a period of ten years instead of two years, in an effort to cover some of the unforeseen and unforeseeable environmental consequences of dumping. That attempt to protect the public of Canada was also defeated. Therefore a coastal community of Canadians concerned about the environment can do nothing in law about a company which dumps, so long as it takes longer than two years for the effects of that dumping to become known.

This bill, in the opinion of a departmental legal officer, may very well create a situation where the fact that a permit has been issued protects the polluter from civil remedies. Mr. J. C. Carton, the director of departmental legal services for the Department of the Environment, as recorded at page 27:46 of the committee proceedings said:

—there is jurisprudence on both sides of the fence. I certainly could not come down on one side or the other with any degree of assurance whatever.

● (1240)

The legal officer said there was no assurance. We introduced an amendment that would build-in that assurance, that certainty that a permit would not protect a polluter from civil action. However, incredibly, it was defeated because a sufficient number of members of the Liberal Party voted against it. I should say that some members of the Liberal Party supported that very progressive measure, but enough objected to it for it to be defeated.

Mr. Béchard: Is it possible for members of the Progressive Conservative Party to be progressive?

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): May I say to my hon. friend who asked me if it is possible for the Progressive Conservatives to be progressive, that anyone who has watched events unfold in Caada particularly in the years since 1968 knows that a more appropriate question would be whether it is possible for a Liberal in Canada to be liberal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): My colleague makes the point that so many of the reforms in Canada have been not simply progressive but Progressive Conservative initiatives.

Finally, we tried in the committee to have the reports which the minister makes to the international body, and which she has now at least agreed to table in parliament, referred to the standing committee. If that had happened, it would have allowed a reliable and extensive parliamentary review of what the minister was doing and how she was exercising her substantial powers of discretion. That procedure of course has implications for other committees. It gives committees rights of their own in the House of Commons and does not make them simply obedient creatures of the government. The reform, however, was just too revolutionary for the government; it wants to keep committees as dependent as possible upon references from the government. So that was lost also.

The bill before us, as amended and certainly as introduced, reveals serious weaknesses in the approach of the Department of the Environment, particularly regarding the highly important question of the right of the public of Canada to participate in environmental decisions. I have spoken about some of the amendments that we proposed in order to advertise decisions. I want to draw the attention of members of the House to the record of committee debates and in particular the contribution made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Marchand). When we were talking about introducing reforms which would inform the public of Canada, the parliamentary secretary said, "They are picayune, small points all the time". That is on the record at page 27:22 of the committee's proceedings.

We in the party disagree that public participation in environmental questions is a small or picayune point. We believe it is the essence and at the centre of the rights of the Canadian public in environmental matters, and we reject out of hand the suggestion of the parliamentary secretary that the right to public participation is a small matter.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): How about the amendment that was rejected by your own party?

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): The parliamentary secretary is trying to explain the inexplicable in trying to defend his actions. He knows that the record shows that his references were specifically to the proposal to involve the public in these decisions He called the rights of the public small, picayune points, and that is what we reject. Unfortunately, there has been an almost contemptuous attitude toward the rights of the public regarding environmental matters, not simply in this bill but in others.

Let me review the evidence of that contempt in this bill. First of all, there is a double standard regarding appeals. The big guy is given the statutory right to appeal, but the same right is denied to the public. This is a law that is clearly biased in favour of the big guys, of the polluters, and against the rights of the individual citizens and concerned groups. Second, there is an excessively wide ministerial discretion, a discretion that has been slightly limited, but only slightly so, in the amendments that we were able to bring through in committee.

Third, there is an incomprehensible satisfaction with the Canada Gazette as a medium of mass communication and the refusal to publish important public matters in publications which the public reads. Finally, there is the failure to introduce broader provisions regarding advertising or to create the registry which we proposed and which the minister could have introduced at this stage, at no cost and with no opposition, but which she chose not to do.

Unfortunately, this contemptuous attitude toward parliament and the public goes beyond this bill. For example, in the environmental impact assessment procedure there is a fundamental and excessive ministerial discretion which stands in dramatic contrast to the statutory rights of the public which exist, for example, in the United States. In the procedure there is virtually no right to public participation unless the minister chooses to let the public in. That is clearly an antiquated and unsatisfactory situation.

Again, in the Berger inquiry the Minister of the Environment has refused to intervene. She has given a right, which I must say appears to be a very limited right, to her officials to participate. It is unclear at this moment whether she will give those officials time off to participate. She nods that she will. It is also unclear whether she will pay their travel expenses and make funds available to them to go there. She nods that she will, and I am delighted to know that. It is also unclear whether they will go there not simply as witnesses but as resource people subject to questioning by other officials. She says they does. Excuse me for my lapse into incomprehensible grammar, but I am so overwhelmed—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hansard will straighten it out.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): I am so overwhelmed—

Mrs. Sauvé: By the generosity of the minister.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): —by the generosity of the minister. It is significant that she regards it as generosity rather than as her duty to make her officials available for public scrutiny. Because I was overwhelmed I lost track of my syntax.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Don't suggest a "sin tax." The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) might put it in his forthcoming budget.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): While I might have expected opposition to a "sin tax" from other members of the House, having it come from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is almost overwhelming. Bill C-37, which has been substantially improved in committee, is highly important for international law and for the development of better protection of our coast lines from pollution. It could also have been important as a sign that the Department of the Environment has changed its attitude and wants the public to be actively involved in issues concerning the environment which are, I submit, the most public of all issues because in the final analysis the fate of our environment affects each one of us more than any other matter which comes regularly before the House of Commons.

I had hoped that the bill would be used as a demonstration that the minister was prepared to encourage the public to participate in environmental questions. Instead, it has been used to demonstrate the opposite. We have a double standard regarding appeals. We have no willingness to advertise in publications generally read by the public, and no statutory right to review decisions. The bill is highly important for purposes of international law. It will allow the government to take place in the elaboration of the terms of administration in the details of the international convention, and that we applaud.

We think it is a very important bill for purposes of international law. We have done what we can to make it a better bill. If it were simply a domestic matter, we would have debated it at much greater length and introduced many more amendments. But it is a bill which we are very pleased to support as an improved bill on third reading.

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not want to prolong the debate, but let me just say that I am very happy the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) claims paternity to all these amendments. As he knows, in matters of parenthood it is only the identity of the mother that is beyond doubt.

● (1250)

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: How are you going to follow that one, Stanley? What do you do for an encore?

An hon. Member: You have a tough act to follow.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am glad that one does not have to explain remarks made just prior to getting to one's feet. In spite of its shortcomings, we welcome Bill C-37, to be known as the Ocean Dumping Control Act. We are pleased that it will soon be on the statute books. I realize that when I say "soon", I am assuming that the other House will not take very long to deal with it.

The bill is important to us in Canada because of the urgency of protecting the wholesome sea which is at our gates, if I may use the words which are carved over the entrance to this building. It is also important to us because of our international obligations.

It is not my intention to speak for more than a moment or two at this third reading stage. The bill received a good going over at second reading and in the standing committee, and I join the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) in welcoming the improvements which were made in the standing committee, whatever the parentage of those improvements might be.

We note that the minister, instead of being just some undisclosed person, is to be the Minister of the Environment. We note, also, that a number of definitions have been sharpened. We welcome the fact that in the case of one very serious breach of this law the potential penalty has been increased substantially. I am aware of the weaknesses and shortcomings which have been referred to by the previous speaker and it is our hope that in the not too distant future these shortcomings will be corrected.

Mankind is pioneering in the whole area of trying to do something about our environment. Perhaps prehistoric man tried in his way, but he did not face the problems and critical situations which confront us today. It is, therefore, good that we are getting started with legislation which will at least enable governments to do something about protecting the various elements of our environment. Accordingly, we welcome this legislation and we call on the minister and the government to use it to the full to protect our oceans.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACTS, 1867 TO 1965

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SENATE REPRESENTATION FOR YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-3, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1965, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-3, an act to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1965, be amended by striking out clause 3 thereof and substituting the following therefor:

> "3. This Act may be cited as the British North America Act, (No. 2) 1975, and shall be included among the Acts that may be cited as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1975."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At 12.56 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion was put before lunch. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion No. 1 (Mr. Sharp) agreed to.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That motion corrected a typographical error.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will now proceed to the consideration of motion No. 2 standing in the name of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, it seems to me that as the change proposed by motion No. 2 does not involve the spending of money, any member of the House can second the motion. I may argue the opposite on another stage that may come in a moment.

Mr. Woolliams: We do not need a minister to second the motion. The House can agree on a seconder by unanimous consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member's proposal?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Sharp, seconded by Mr. Marceau, moves:

That Bill C-3, an act to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1965, be amended by striking out the long title thereof and substituting the following therefor:

> An Act to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1975.

Motion No. 2 (Mr. Sharp) agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Sharp, seconded by Mr. Chrétien, moves that Bill C-3, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1965, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, be concurred in.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Should the motion not read as it has been amended, "to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1975?"

Mr. Woolliams: What a great observation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I believe the amendment is necessary.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. This material, of course, was prepared in advance without prejudging what would happen in the House. I will make the necessary correction.

Mr. Sharp, seconded by Mr. Chrétien, moves that Bill C-3, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1975, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

An hon. Member: By leave, now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Sharp, seconded by Mr. Chrétien, moves that Bill C-3, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1975, be now read the third time and do pass. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. A moment ago I suggested that a report stage amendment could be seconded by a private member, but Your Honour has now named a seconder who is not in the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I had not noticed that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) had left the House. I will rectify the matter.

Mr. Sharp, seconded by Madam Sauvé, moves that Bill C-3, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1975, be now read the third time and do pass. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, having made some simple corrections to this bill, having corrected one or two typographical errors, and so on, we have reached the final stage of debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Judging from the applause, this bill has a fairly good chance of passing. As everyone knows, the bill will merely add two more bodies to the other place.

Mr. Woolliams: Great!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) says "Great!" He may represent Calgary North, but that is not far enough north to entitle him to one of these additional Senate seats.

Mr. Lefebvre: Stranger things have happened, Stanley. People have moved. Canadians are mobile.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This bill will add to the other place a senator from the Yukon and a senator from the Northwest Territories. As I have said a number of times previously, we think this is a waste of time. We think that it is insulting northern Canadians to suggest that these new appointments will somehow bring them into the mainstream of Canadian life. This bill will merely add two more Liberals to the other place. In recent years, particularly in recent months, the other place has become merely the campaign headquarters for the Liberal Party of Canada. I oppose this bill.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member will permit a question. How can the hon. member be so sure that Liberals will be named to those two positions? What proof has the hon. member? Can he prove his assertion?

An hon. Member: Are you a prophet or the son of a prophet?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I cannot prove it—I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet—and to that extent I am stymied. However, judging from experience I say that within a short time two more Liberals will be appointed to the other place. It will be said that both represent our north. Perhaps the appointees already know about their prospective appointments. The salaries they will receive will be much greater than the salaries which applied when this bill was first put on the order paper. They will be Liberals, don't worry.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, on a further point or order, as we say in French—

You are striking a blow at your great experience in the House when you say that I am only guessing—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Although the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) sits far from the Chair, he should address his remarks to his hon. colleague of the opposition through the Chair.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I have asked the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) whether, by guessing like this, he is not afraid of losing his great personal value and his great experience in the House which are universally conceded. Moreover, I wonder if his reputation as a great man will not suffer from such risky guessing.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to admit that it is just a guess, but I suggest it is an awfully good one.

● (1410)

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say a few words with regard to this bill. Although I do not come from the territories, I think this bill advances a very important principle. The principle is that all the people of Canada, whether they reside in the provinces or the territories, have a right to be represented in all of the federal representative bodies in this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is the simple principle of this bill. I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has certain feelings about the other place, which he has expressed. There are some who share those views in some respects, at least in so far as the members of the other place are concerned.

However, that does not mean that the institution, properly manned, does not have a place within the Canadian context.

Every time I hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre attacking the Senate, I feel it is like one institution of parliament attacking another. Before we attack the Senate we should remember the purpose for which it was established in Canada. It was established for the purpose of ensuring representation in a different way to minority area groups which find themselves in the minority in terms of number in relation to other groups in Canada. If that is part of the purpose for the establishment of the Senate, then as much as I may condemn the government from time to time for some things they do, I think they are doing the proper thing in terms of the territories of this country.

A lot could be said about appointments to the Senate and those who are appointed. An argument could be made for at least broader consultation in terms of appointments to the Senate. These consultations might range among provincial premiers even though the premiers may be of different political cloth. It is not unreasonable to say that if the Senate is to be representative of the regions in Canada, it ought to be representative as well of certain of the political differences in Canada.

The quarrel I have with the Senate is not with the institution or the place of the institution in the scheme of things, but the way in which the institution has been used. I have said before in this House that I believe it is important that the Senate not be taken away or weakened, but that it be strengthened. Through the quality of its appointments, the representative aspect of its appointments and the geographical representation, the Senate should be given a new infusion of life with the appointment of youth. The youth need not only be in terms of chronological age; I am talking more in a sense of equality of mind, people who have an ability to express themselves, who have an investigative turn of mind and are prepared to devote a certain amount of their time to the service of their country. I think it important that we consider this bill in that light.

It is not a universal failing that every Liberal appointed to the Senate is necessarily a bad appointment; there have been some fine appointments from the other party. I hope there will be recognition of the need to strengthen the Senate on all sides and in terms of the political spectrum. It could not only become a livelier place but a much more vital place in terms of Canadian political content. We should consider this and urge the government to make the Senate a stronger institution of parliament, an institution to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre might some day like to go because of the vitality and strength of the place.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point of order is that I thought the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) was my friend.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would disabuse the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre if I thought he was suggesting I was anything else. I have said before in this House that he is not only a friend but a neighbour. It is generally known in Canada that there was at one time a political union of a sort between the NDP and the Liberal Party. I point to the twenty-ninth parliament. There is at least a mechanical union between the NDP and the Conservative Party, because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I have a quarter interest in the same snowblower. Sometimes when he says things about the situation in the Senate, and other matters, I am tempted not to send my children across the street to push his car out on a snowy morning, but my friendship has always caused me to relent. That does in fact happen; the hon. member knows it, and our friendship is deep.

I said that in jest, but I think it is important that the Senate be a place that is aspired to for the right reasons, because it is an important institution in the body politic of Canada. It is in that spirit that I rise in the debate to urge the House, particularly the Prime Minister's colleagues, to consider the importance of this institution in the parliamentary process.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I spoke at some length on second reading of this bill. I do not want to repeat what I said then or to delay the passage of this bill. I wish to point out to our friend, however, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that if he finds he has leisure time over the weekend he might read some of the debates in the other place. While two or three times a year he amuses this place by making a motion that the other place be abolished he may be surprised to know that similar motions are being made in the other place to abolish this House. The arguments there are as persuasive as his. There are some interesting speeches made at those times.

I want to add some thoughts as to the possible commposition of the Senate by comparing it to a similar body, another federal institution which I had the opportunity to examine very carefully during the past couple of weeks. I refer to the federal Republic of Germany whose federal constitution is an amalgam of things British, things French, things American and things German. I wonder how some people in this House can feel that our House of Commons with a temporary majority, should have the say right away and that it should be final; in other words, the people are said to have spoken.

Should the Senate in our parliament be named by the provincial administrations bearing in mind the differing political blends? Under the German constitution, where there is a small senate of 45, the landers or the provinces name a limited number of ministers, and usually the premier or the state president of the lander, to the body. All legislation is submitted to the lander before it is presented to the equivalent of the House of Commons in an informal way to get their view on it. Certain amendments might then be suggested or decisions made, or it might not again see the light of day, depending on the attitude of the bundesrat. It then goes to the bundeshaus where it is debated and amended. Subsequently it is returned for final approval to the house of elders, the bundesrat.

Mr. Woolliams: The wise men.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Remembering that they are the ones appointed by the provinces, it would be interesting to see that kind of framework in operation here. We could see a bill like the Competition Act, for example, or the National Petroleum Act submitted to the Senate first for general comment and, perhaps, suggested amendment. Then it would be brought back into this House, considered, passed and returned to the Senate, that body having the full power to amend it or defeat it, though being of a different political complexion.

It would make the temporary majority which sometimes blithely sits in this chamber think twice or maybe three times before going forward with certain items of legislation. But it would have the effect, in a federal constitution where there are differing responsibilities, of making possible a more equitable discharge of those responsibilities. At the moment we are seeing here a series of acts going forward—the Competition Act is one of them—in connection with which the federal government simply moves into what is clearly provincial jurisdiction under some spurious ground of need for order and good government and says, "We shall fill the lacunae, and if the provinces do not measure up, we shall jack them up." Mr. Speaker, this is a usurpation of power by a bureaucracy, a form of centralized bureaucratic thinking to which this administration and others before it have become captive. It is posing a grave danger to our constitution and to our national unity.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and I am warning members of this House, that the malaise which exists in certain parts of the country is growing. Do not think the malaise has died in the province of Quebec. It has certainly increased in the western provinces and it may yet appear in the Atlantic provinces. This is in part attributable to the actions, the philosophy and the centralized thinking of the Government of Canada intent on the usurpation of power. It may be a gradual process, but one notices the nature and type of legislation brought forward in the last two or three years and it becomes apparent that the pace of this usurpation of power has been stepped up a notch or two. I say that Canadians as a whole must step back, watch and re-examine their position.

I hope the government will choose the best men or women it can to represent the Yukon and the Northwest Territories in the other place, and that we shall see the beginning of a change in the nature of the appointments. As my hon. friend from Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) said, there are some eminently suitable public figures who have been appointed to the Senate and who discharge their duties as well as any member of this House. A number of them have the advantage of experience in this place.

It must always be remembered that the world was not discovered yesterday, that everything was not invented yesterday and that mankind was not born yesterday. There are a good many lessons from the past which can be applied to the present and the future. The work that comes out of the Senate depends entirely on the initiative of the government. Their Honours have done excellent work in examining bills. The competition legislation is one example. Even before they received the bill they carried out an examination of the subject matter. Their report is an excellent one. I do not wish to sound patronizing when I say that many of the committees in the other place put our committees to shame in terms of the assiduity with which the work is pursued, the depth of study and the value of the contributions made.

In conclusion, may I say I entirely support the bill before us. I hope the appropriate appointments are made and that the vacancies which now exist are filled so that we may join with our colleagues in the Senate and make a far better job of considering legislation, watching government programs and discharging our responsibility to the people.

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I spoke against this bill on second reading and I wish to reiterate briefly my opposition to it now. There is one feature of the bill which is obviously welcome—the fact that northerners will have additional voices here in Ottawa. No one can complain about that aspect. Nevertheless, I am opposed to the bill in principle. The government and its predecessors have on a number of occasions promised Senate reform and it is inopportune, to say the least, that we should be moving to add new members to that body before we have carried out the fundamental reforms which successive governments have promised.

I feel there is another side to the argument. It is entirely possible that the constitutional evolution of the territories may differ from the evolution which historically accompanied the development of the other provinces. A different approach might well be needed although, conceivably, no matter what kind of evolutionary path they may follow, representation in a reformed Senate might still be necessary.

In the present circumstances, the government should not be moving to add to this body. Let me reiterate. We all agree that the Senate is non-representative and non-elective. As long as it remains that way it is completely out of date. We should be moving to reform the Senate before we add to its members.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the comments made on this bill, but I feel at this time that something more should be said concerning the people who will be going to the Senate itself. It seems to me that my words would probably not be quite appropriate, but I might abridge the words of the great Lebanese Kahlil Gibran, who thinks of the Senate as "To be a garden without walls, a vineyard without a guardian, a treasure house for ever open to passers-by". If we think of the manner in which the senators, having completed their years, look down upon us, then they might feel, as Kahlil Gibran said:

To be robbed, cheated, deceived, ay, misled and trapped and then mocked, yet with it all to look down from the height of your large self and smile, knowing that there is a spring that will come to your garden to dance in your leaves, and an autumn to ripen your grapes; knowing that if but one of your windows is open to the East, you shall never be empty; knowing that all those deemed wrongdoers and robbers, cheaters and deceivers are your brothers in need, and that you are perchance all of these in the eyes of the blessed inhabitants of that City Invisible, above this city.

And now, to you also whose hands fashion—

And we say this to the people of the North.

—To be is to be a weaver with seeing fingers, a builder mindful of light and space; to be a ploughman and feel that you are hiding a treasure with every seed you sow; to be a fisherman and a hunter with a pity for the fish and for the beast, yet a still greater pity for the hunger and need of man.

I say that to each of these people who would come to us from the north. Kahlil goes on:

And, above all, I say this: I would have you each and every one partners to the purpose of every man, for only so shall you hope to obtain your own good purpose.

This is why they must be with us. This is why they must be part of our institution, whether they be as elected members of this chamber or of the Senate. As Kahlil said:

My comrades and my beloved, be bold and not meek; be spacious and not confined; and until my final hour and yours be indeed your greater self.

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to waste much more time on a bill that is already taking up a lot of time in the House, a bill that I do not think is of that much importance to the people of the Northwest Territories or the Yukon. We did not ask for the bill, and I have become a little suspicious of being given something—at least it appears we are being given something—for which we have not asked, about which we have not been consulted and which we do not want.

We have now reached the point on a Friday afternoon where we seem to be getting some kind of poetry being tossed into the debate. But I should like to make an important point. When discussing this bill previously, I mentioned in the House that if the government had discussed the matter in detail with northerners and had talked to the people in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, the government would have come up with a practical solution to what the government seems to regard as a problem, that we have in the other place no senators from the territories.

For about the same amount of money or less, a practical solution would have been to have an ombudsman represent both the Yukon and Northwest Territories. This would be more practical than the present bill. This would lead to a situation that would be non-partisan, where the individual concerned would be answerable to the House of Commons and would be able to represent well the people of both territories. That would have been a far more welcome proposal to the people of the north than what is in this bill.

I just wanted to make that comment again, and I hope that in future the government will take my words into serious consideration. I shall not waste any more time of the House on this matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION ACT

AMENDMENTS TO CONSTITUTION AND POWERS OF COMMISSION

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-13, to amend the Northern Canada Power Commission Act.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this amendment is a procedural one. The act contains a lot of amendments fleshing out, shall I say, the existence of what had been a very small body, the Northern Canada Power Commission, which has now been given much greater strength and frankly has become a monopoly in the north. Many of us in this House have regretted this development. I have had a good deal of contact with the utilities that developed from very humble beginnings and struggled to develop resources in order to meet the needs of the people both in the Yukon and Northwest Territories. Then along comes this colossus, this big, ravenous animal known as the Government of Canada and gobbles up a development that so many people have worked so hard to achieve over the years.

I do not think the people of the north are going to get any better performance as a result of the creation of this power commission, which frankly is going to be permitted completely to dominate the scene in regard to the provision of electric light and power to both the territories. Having said that, the Senate have taken steps to remedy something that I suppose was forgotten along the way which deals with the timing of meetings held by members of the commission. The meetings must not be held unless one clear day's notice has been given to each member of the commission at his place of residence. If that same principle were applied to many other government statutes, there would need to be many other changes. The centralized kind of thinking we have in Ottawa has always been that notice shall be deemed to have been received and the period for appeal will expire within ten days after having made an order or having issued a notice in Ottawa. In light of the postal service which it is Canada's disgrace to have at the present time, it is very chancy that one could get notice within the appropriate time to consider a government or court order and instruct a solicitor or take the necessary action.

There is one thing I want to point out in this bill that is ironic in that we are going to discuss the Judges Act later when dealing with salaries. This bill increases the number of commissioners from five to seven and provides for the payment of expenses, including travelling and living costs incurred by the commissioners in the performance of their duties under the act. I am wondering whether certain individuals in this House or engaged in the media, particularly the more hysterical ones, will take these expenses and add them to the salaries or honoraria of the commissioners and say that shall be their remuneration for the year.

Mr. Sharp: That is only for members of parliament.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): As the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) suggests, this is a unique privilege reserved for members of parliament whose expenses are added to their salaries and the total deemed to be their revenue for the year. It does not happen in respect of public servants, editors of newspapers, publishers or radio station disc jockeys, many of whom earn a great deal more than members of parliament. I hope when we see the reports in respect of the salaries of the commissioners of the Northern Canada Power Commission in the public accounts, they will include their travelling expenses and all those things chargeable to their accounts.

As to the amendment put forward by the Senate, of course it is acceptable and it is a good thing that it has been brought forward.

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to say a few words about Bill C-13, to amend the Northern Canada Power Commission. I understand it has been around for a long time. As a matter of fact, it has been in the planning stage, and so on, for a number of years.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is known as the Sir John A. Macdonald bill.

Mr. Firth: It was considered for a long time in committee, where we heard from a number of witnesses from both territories. I think the amendment to this bill is a very small but perhaps important one. The bill did receive approval of the House before, and I suppose it should now pass. However, I do want to make a couple of comments because of some criticism by the council in the city of Yellowknife. I hope the government will take into consideration these points at this time when the bill has almost passed the House.

The first point relates to the request by northerners regarding the Northern Canada Power Commission, that it establish its headquarters in the north. I hope that the commission will eventually be answerable to the councils of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. It has been recommended that there be two power commissions, one for the Yukon territory and one for the Northwest Territories, with an operational headquarters in the north.

The other important recommendation is that the commission should have the sole right to generate and distribute electricity for the benefit of northerners, at the cheapest rate possible. The commission should seriously consider bringing power to small businesses and homes as cheaply as possible, with the larger companies such as those in the mining industry paying the full rate.

Several other points have been made. I hope the government will seriously consider moving toward implementing the wishes of the people of the north. I do not think I need say more on this bill, but I do hope the government will look again at the very important suggestions made by representatives of both territories regarding the splitting of the commission in two, with headquarters in the north.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, amendment read the second time and concurred in.

JUDGES ACT AND CERTAIN ACTS RELATED TO THE SUPREME COURTS OF NEWFOUNDLAND AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR INCREASED SALARIES AND ADDITIONAL JUDGES

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-47, to amend the Judges Act and certain other acts for related purposes and in respect of the reconstitution of the Supreme Courts of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order having to do with some of the details of these proposed motions. They would appear to have been drafted by someone who had before him at the time only a copy of Bill C-47 as it was passed at second reading and sent to the committee. The committee made several amendments and ordered a reprinting. We now have the reprinted form and that is what is before us.

I would draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, in particular to the (b) part of motion No. 1 where it says "by striking out line 1." That ought to be "line 3". In part (k), where it says "Eighteen judges of the Dis-", that should just be "Eighteen judges of the". In motion No. 2, where it says "by striking out line 12 on page 24", it should read "by striking out line 11 on page 24".

The same changes need to be made in the new recommendations from the Governor General, and there are one or two other corrections that should be made in the French version of these motions. It seems to me if we are going to have amendments moved to the bill, they should fit the bill in the form in which it is now before us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I understand the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but it would be very difficult at this stage for the Chair to identify all these corrections. The hon. member has brought to the attention of the House the corrections to be made in connection with motion No. 1. Perhaps I should refer the hon. member to Standing Order 75(7), which states:

An amendment, in relation to form only in a government bill, may be proposed by a minister of the Crown without notice, but debate thereon may not be extended to the provisions of the clause or clauses to be amended.

Perhaps at this stage, if the hon. member could inform the House of the modification to be made we could proceed with the amendments so long as they are brought to the attention of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am not seeking, under the guise of a procedural point, to delay consideration of this measure this afternoon, but I do insist that we follow the rules. The rule you just cited, I submit, does not cover this situation at all. That rule permits the making of what is, in effect, a consequential amendment. The plain fact of the matter is that the wording of these motions as they appear on the order paper is faulty. They were obviously drafted by someone who did not look at the bill in the form in which it is before the House. I am prepared for the correction to be made before we proceed with these motions, but let us do it properly.

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Speaker, I was chairman of the committee on justice and legal affairs at the time the amendments were presented. I presume the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is referring to amendments which are now intended to be made at the report stage, and that he has no objection to those amendments that were made at the earlier stage before the committee and were passed.

Speaking as one who was present for all the proceedings on this bill before the standing committee, I may say I have not had an opportunity to see numerically the lines to which these amendments mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should refer. It may well be that we could verify what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said. I believe there is agreement on his part, from what I heard him say, that we proceed so long as the lines are referred to in the correct order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member is correct in saying I am not raising a procedural point in respect of the amendments passed in the committee, although I did study them carefully to see if I could find something wrong with them. It is clear that they were made within the terms of the royal recommendation.

What we now have before the House is a reprinted bill as amended in the committee, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) is proposing report stage amendments to that reprinted bill. Royal recommendations are required, and he has presented the royal recommendations. My point, however, is that if we passed motion No. 1 in its present form we would be making a change which would not make sense because of the lines listed and a few other things which are incorrect. It is a simple matter to make the corrections, but surely the way in which we do it should be correct.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think there is some sense in the suggestion of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin). Perhaps we might take a few moments, provided we do not take too long, to see whether there is some way in which the changes might be made. Although I do not know whether this is possible, perhaps by unanimous consent something could be done in respect of the order paper this afternoon so that we could proceed with the matter. I am sure all members wish the matter to be pursued and disposed of.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I say that the mistakes are not the mistakes of the committee. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin) is not on the spot. It is the Minister of Justice who has put down the report stage amendments and has not worded them correctly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is quite right when he says the motions before us now do not correspond to the reprinted copy of the bill. I must bring to his attention that the bill was reported back on Wednesday this week, and the minister had to give notice of his amendments which are amendments to the bill which was before the committee. To my mind, the reprinting of a bill is more for the convenience of members than for the purpose of changing the bill on which the committee has worked. I understand the point raised by the hon. member, which is that we would be examining amendments that do not correspond to the reprint of the bill which is before hon. members.

Unless someone has a solution to propose to the Chair, I think perhaps we should set aside this order for the moment and go to another order of business.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, may I say that the amendment is not a substantive amendment. Surely the bill could be considered at this stage as amended, unless my friend from Winnipeg North Centre can point out that this is a very serious amendment related to the substance of the bill. If he could do that, I would be sympathetic to his viewpoint, but surely we should not delay this matter on such a small point of procedure. With the greatest respect, I think the error was made when the documents were handed to you, sir. But surely we can debate the bill. The amendment is not one of great substance.

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre does not wish unnecessarily to delay consideration of this bill on a technicality. I think if we take these amendments which are before us and relate them to the bill in its form prior to the reprinting, we could make sense of each motion we would be debating. Then if each motion should pass, this could be done with reference to the new bill which has been presented in reprinted form as of May 28. In this way we could debate the matter with a clear understanding of the motions presented. The motions could be interpolated with reference to the bill dated May 28.

I think in this way we might follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and continue with consideration of the bill today and make some sense of it. If these motions should pass, they could very easily be interpolated into the bill as amended. Unless, as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton said, we could clarify the matter in a few minutes, I would like to see debate continue. It is clear to all of us where each of these motions is intended to be inserted. I think we should continue.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there have been occasions at the report stage when opposition members have made similar motions and the Chair has insisted that they be corrected in order to conform with the bill before the House. I think the rule should apply both ways. Although it is not my desire to expedite this bill, since I am opposed to it, I am prepared to be procedurally helpful.

All that needs to be done with regard to motion No. 1 is to change "line 1" in the (b) part to "line 3", and to change the phrase under (k) "Eighteen judges of the Dis-" to "Eighteen judges of the". I have other corrections to make to the other motions, but if these changes could be made, this one at least procedurally will be in order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This is exactly what I proposed at the beginning. If the minister wants to move an amendment to the motion in the name of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), the House will be ready to consider it. I would hope the hon. member would not ask the Chair to become involved in the correction of an amendment or the modification of an amendment of which notice was given by the minister. A representative of the government should ask the House to consider modifications to the motion.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Justice) moved:

That Bill C-47, an act to amend the Judges Act and certain other acts for related purposes and in respect of the reconstitution of the Supreme Courts of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, be amended in Clause 5

(a) by striking out line 13 on page 3 and substituting the following:

"(e) One hundred and one puisne";

(b) by striking out line 1 on page 6 and substituting the following:

"(b) One hundred and seven";

(c) by striking out line 22 on page 6 and substituting the following:

"(h) Thirty-one judges and"; and

(d) by striking out line 33 on page 6 and substituting the following:

"(k) Eighteen judges of the Dis-".

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move an amendment to the motion which would read as follows:

That paragraph (b) of motion No. 1 be amended to read

"(b) by striking out line 3 on page 6 and substituting the following:"

and that paragraph (k) be amended to read

"(k) eighteen judges of the"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent)) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Shall motion No. 1 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 1, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will now proceed to the consideration of motion No. 2.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Justice) moved:

That Bill C-47, an act to amend the Judges Act and certain other acts for related purposes and in respect of the reconstitution of the Supreme Courts of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, be amended in clause 28 by striking out line 12 on page 24 and substituting the following:

"(k) eighteen judges of the".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, according to my reading of the motion, it needs to be corrected toward the end of it, where it reads "by striking out line 12 on page 24". It should read "by striking out line 11 on page 24".

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker I wish to move:

That motion No. 2 be amended so that the words reading "by striking out line 12 on page 24" read "by striking out line 11 on page 24".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent)) agreed to.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to make some comments on this bill, and it is during the debate on these amendments dealing with increases in the salaries of judges that it would be appropriate for me to make my comments rather than on third reading of the bill.

Mr. Woolliams: I have to catch a plane.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) would prefer to speak now, then I will yield my place to him to facilitate his timetable which he cannot alter.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I have other commitments and I have agreed to catch a plane, but I intend to make some remarks on third reading of the bill. I am sure the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) would be in order at that time. Perhaps he would be prepared to agree to these amendments and to get to third reading of the bill. My remarks will take no more than five minutes.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): So long as I am not prevented from going into details.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will put the question on motion No. 2 and see how fast we can proceed.

Shall motion No. 2, as amended, carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 2, as amended, agreed to.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Justice) moved:

That Bill C-47, an act to amend the Judges Act and certain other acts for related purposes and in respect of the reconstitution of the Supreme Courts of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, be amended in Schedule IV

(a) by striking out the first line of paragraph 19(b) thereof and substituting the following:

"(b) one hundred and seven judges and";

(b) by striking out the first line of paragraph 19(h) thereof and substituting the following:

"(h) thirty-one judges and junior judges"; and

(c) by striking out the first line of paragraph 19(k) thereof and substituting the following:

"(k) eighteen judges of the District Court".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Are there any amendments to this motion?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In response to your question, Mr. Speaker, I will say what I want to say on the substance of this bill when we get to third reading; but so far as the form of motion No. 3 is concerned I find no procedural errors in it. Perhaps that is an accident, but at any rate that is it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt motion No. 3?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 3 agreed to.

Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time, by leave now?

Some hon. Members: By leave.

Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

● (1510)

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief this afternoon. This bill, as we know the procedure, came up for second reading and we had a debate at that time. It went before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and was carefully studied clause by clause. The committee met on May 27. We sat overtime, and the bill was analysed very carefully. I just want to repeat our position. We believe that judges should have an increase. We said that at second reading. I and all hon. members in the committee, with one exception, took that position.

I repeat that we have a very high calibre of judges in all our courts at all levels in this country. As a senior lawyer before the bar of Alberta and the bar of Saskatchewan I can say that we can be very proud of our judiciary from coast to coast, and particularly of our Supreme Court of Canada. We believe that the judiciary of Canada must always maintain its independence, not only from political institutions but also from any conflict of interest.

We believe judges should be secure in their jobs so that they can carry out their duties and responsibilities with the degree of independence we expect the judiciary to have, which separates it as an institution from other democratic institutions in the country.

In reference to the increases, perhaps it might have been better to discuss the question of income tax in this House on another occasion. My chartered accountant looked at the salaries of judges, and I have a chart of present and proposed judges' salaries and allowances, 1974 to 1976, which was prepared by the Department of Justice, and in checking the bill I find that it is accurate. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre mentioned at second reading that there was a $3,000 difference in my figures. That $3,000 is a special allowance to judges under another statute, so I think that explains it.

I am taking the salary of the Chief Justice of Canada at the total rate as of 1974. He was paid $50,000. His increase will bring his salary to $68,000. His total federal and provincial taxes on $50,000 could be $21,126, and on $68,000 could be $31,772. These are based on Alberta figures, and I might say that in Ontario they are higher because our province has the lowest personal income tax of any province outside of one.

An hon. Member: New Brunswick has the highest.

Mr. Woolliams: I am prepared to accept that. These figures may be approximations only to the extent that deductions are made in reference to any contributions which are now paid on pensions and so forth.

For the Chief Justice of Canada to gain $18,000 he is going to pay $10,600 more taxes. Really we are only increasing the salary of the chief justice by $8,000.

Let us consider the other judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. This bill moves their salaries up from $45,000 to $63,000. Their taxes on $45,000 were $18,181, and on $63,000 at the same federal and provincial rates they will be $28,785.

The salaries of the chief justices of the provinces will move from $44,000 to $58,000. On $44,000 they pay $17,640 tax. On $58,000 they will pay $25,840 tax. In other words, to gain that $14,000, they pay another $8,000 taxes. These are interesting facts, and when judges pay tax that money goes back to the same fund which pays the salaries.

An hon. Member: It comes off the cheque before they get it.

Mr. Woolliams: It is taken right at the source. I thank the hon. member. Judges of the territorial courts will receive $56,000 instead of $40,000. On the $40,000 their income tax was $15,503, and on $56,000 it will be $24,661.

The salaries of superior court judges rose from $38,000 to $53,000. On $38,000 their tax was $14,434. On $53,000 it will be $22,894. So in actual fact the figures will be 50 per cent or 60 per cent less than we are talking about today and, as my hon. friend says, it comes off the cheque before you get it.

The chief judges of district courts will receive $44,000 instead of $30,000. On $30,000 tax was $10,271, and on $44,000 it will be $17,640.

Other judges of county and district courts will earn $40,000 instead of $28,000. That is in the second phase. I have not referred to the third phase because it is not payable until 1976, and I am not a futurist. On $28,000 taxes were $9,287, and on $40,000 they will be $15,503.

If these judges, especially the senior men, have any savings or any other income, the tax increases accordingly, because we are operating under the progressive rate. I do not intend to name them, but I know that hon. members—at least one in particular pays the government more money than he receives as a member of parliament because he has other income. I would like to emphasize that here before the media.

An hon. Member: What media?

Mr. Woolliams: There is someone here from Canadian Press, anyway. I could have prepared the same chart with regard to members of parliament. Surely we do not all come here as poor as church mice. Some of us did make a little money before we arrived, even though we left home with no education and with holes in our pockets and at our knees. I am one who can talk like that. But the fact is we do have other income, so many hon. members are giving practically all their salaries to the Department of National Revenue. During the war such people were known as dollar a year men.

If the judges salaries did not increase, does that mean none of the men who are going to have these jobs, or very few would be more accurate, could not make almost double what they will be paid? One may say that after all they are serving their country and they should take much less. They are taking much less, but if we are not going to pay them more, what we will get will be from the bottom of the heap. How many Canadians would like to have the judiciary made up of men who came from law practices which made so little money they were glad to grab the job? What kind of judgments would we have from that kind of grey matter? We need men of some calibre.

While I am on my feet I would like to make another point because of remarks already uttered. I always accept another man's right to express his viewpoint. I have said many times that if we all think alike, there is no thinking. I would not want to think that in this House of Commons we would have men who could not earn two, three or four times as much. I know men sitting on the Treasury Benches, I know men on the backbenches, and I know men on our backbenches who could do that manyfold. But they come here. I will not get into why they are here, but I will say that anyone who comes to parliament, if he stays here long enough, is making a great financial sacrifice. I think that is necessary. I do not think he can serve his country unless he does.

I must tell the House about the funniest letter I ever received. It was in regard to the increases in the salaries of members of parliament. I received this letter from one of my friends in my constituency. I did not know his age until I read his letter. He wrote, "Eldon, I served my country from 1914 to 1918 and never took my wife to the trenches. You do not need little Erva in Ottawa." I have not answered that letter. He may be right. That is but one letter. The writer suggested that because I was serving my country, I should be prepared to make sacrifices. I do not think we are called upon to make those kinds of sacrifices.

In the last few years many young members made a significant contribution to the life of this House. Many of them have children who need educating. Are they to be left in Vancouver or elsewhere while their father serves parliament? When children reach their teens they need their mother and father.

Similarly, are we to ask judges to make those kinds of sacrifices? Frankly I do not think this bill is out of line. By appointing Chief Justice McGillivray to the bench in Alberta the government showed a remarkable lack of partisanship. I cannot say what the judge earned as a counsel, but I think I could guess. In that case the government appointed a man of proven ability, intelligence, and character. I am sure it has made many similar appointments.

An hon. Member: Perhaps the government made a mistake.

Mr. Woolliams: Perhaps. Our judges have always been of high calibre. Let me tell the House a little story which impressed me when I was in law school and which shows that our judges are endowed with knowledge of human psychology, decency, and a sense of humour. I do not remember the name of the case. Some years ago a lady complained about noises coming from a tent pitched on the banks of the Red River. She complained to the RCMP about noises of revelry at night. When the RCMP investigated they found the occupants of the tent asleep, and a few empty wine and whiskey bottles as evidence of revelry. The occupants of the tent were sleeping off the effects of their revelry. The occupants of the tent were brought before the local judge on a charge of disturbing the peace. After hearing the complaint of the lady who had been on the opposite side of the Red River, the judge dismissed the charge. He said that the complainant was not annoyed by what she heard and saw, but was annoyed by what she did not hear and see.

As long as appointees to the Bench show a similar understanding of human behaviour, our law and jurisprudence are in good hands.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, I did not have an opportunity of speaking on the second reading of this bill, nor of participating in the committee deliberations. Also, I did not participate in the debate when Bill C-44 was being considered by the House.

I must say, having been in parliament for some 18 years and seen some of the changes which have taken place with regard to the levels of remuneration paid to those in the House of Commons and elsewhere, that I am not confused but very concerned about the attitude shown in many quarters of this country with regard to the remuneration of people in public life or in public office. I am greatly surprised that members of parliament and Senators have been singled out by media and correspondence for an unprecedentedly vitriolic, uninformed, biased and hypocritical attack related to pay in public life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We saw an exhibition, both in this House and outside, on the part of the media, directors of the media, and others who should know better, which was nothing but a hypocritical, demogogical outburst. Many statements contained blatant untruths with regard to Bill C-44, as it was originally introduced.

Although flat percentages were applied to figures coming under Bill C-44, the same yardstick was not applied to Bill C-24 dealing with the salaries of Lieutenant Governors. Goodness only knows, those salaries needed changing, having gone unchanged for so many years. Although some salaries were increased by well over 100 per cent, was anything said of a critical nature? Oh, here and there we heard a tiny murmur; but was it said this was wrong, after it had been said that the increases for members and Senators were wrong? That was hypocrisy; that was evidence of a double standard. That is my first point.

Second, during consideration of this bill, Bill C-47, which first appeared on the order paper in December last, there has been a little tut-tutting on the part of the odd editorial writer, but nothing has been really said about percentages. And, remember, the percentages under Bill C-44 were all wrong—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that he may not discuss bills that have already been passed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, I do not want to criticize a ruling, but I may refer to any legislation that has been adopted. I cannot question a ruling of the Chair, according to our Standing Orders, but we may refer to such legislation. I apologize for disagreeing with the Chair, but we may refer to a legislation which has just been adopted, incidentally, during a debate, and very easily. That is done quite often.

[English]

Percentages were applied to Bill C-44 and great shock seemed to be expressed by some, who said that was all wrong. But on a bill which applies even greater percentages, what do we hear? Nothing. Again this shows that there is a double standard. The judges, I suppose, are not the favourite kicking boys of the media and some other people.

It is not that I object to the level of salary that the judges are going to get because, in the general scale of pay, they will soon be overtaken. We know what is going on at the executive level in the public service. In a few weeks we will hear the rumours about the increases due to come at the executive level of the public service. Where will members of parliament be then? They will be as newborn babes in their relative innocence.

Let us look at the provincial and civic administrations. Let us look at education, both the administrative level and teachers. There is a story in this morning's Globe and Mail which states that in a certain school district in this province the top is going to be over $26,000. We must remember that has security of tenure and pension rights. There is no application of any merit principle at any time. They refused it. Their job is not on the line every few years. As far as I am concerned, my job has been on the line eight times in 18 years. Teachers work ten months of the year. It is true they have to do some other things, but there is no such thing as working 12 months a year.

Let us look at industry. The so-called blue collar workers now receive $12 or $13 an hour with a guaranteed 40 hour a week and plenty of overtime all year long. True enough that may be the aristocracy of the blue collars, but before the last pay increase went through, on the basis of time put in by an average member of parliament, he was paid at the level of a plasterer's labourer. He was actually paid less than $5 an hour. When you work out the $1,800 a month salary, which is $450 a week, it comes to $5 an hour.

I find it ironic that in all of the discussions it was felt that people in this House after four years, and in my case as in many others for the third time in 18 years, were contemplating a change in salary levels. The number absolutely overwhelms me. I ask those who criticize, where do they sit? How have they benefited? What percentage increase did they get in the interval? Do they have other income? We sometimes wonder about their great stories here. We wonder what are their sources and responsibilities. Do they have children to educate? How far do they live from Ottawa? What is the cost of separate homes?

In so far as the judges are concerned, there are some similar considerations. A judge has to be the leader of his peers among lawyers. He is a man who has worked hard to reach that desired degree of excellence that we hope to have in our judiciary.

The salaries proposed in this legislation are not out of line. It is rather funny when you consider that a chief judge of a county court goes up more than 70 per cent over the proposed schedules of this bill and he will get the benefit of retroactivity. Up to now the judges have had a non-contributory pension scheme. Has that ever been translated into actuarial value? What is the value of a pension after 15 years' service, which is the minimum requirement under the act? There is a regrettably small survivor's pension, but it is part of the revenue from the position.

Superior court and county court judges are paid travelling and living expenses when they are away from their homes. Has anyone ever added that to their salary when totalling their revenue, as is done every day by some uninformed, misguided person in the media with regard to the salaries of members and ministers in this House? But everyone cluck-clucks and says it is wrong that the judges had to wait so long for changes. The same is true for lieutenant governors.

Cabinet ministers waited from 1952 until 1975 to have their increment changed. I think the appreciation the Canadian public shows to these men is really great. If ever there was a thousand per cent job, that is it. There is 1,000 per cent involvement. I speak with some experience. There is no other job in this country that has so much involvement from midnight Sunday all the way through to midnight a week later.

I will not speak about the emoluments of the Chair. I went through this same problem at the time I occupied the chair. There again there was no change in the increment for Mr. Speaker. I think that was a niggardly act on the part of the nation with regard to that office.

The same applies at the provincial level. The increments are subject to income tax. I have before me a schedule drawn up by a tax adviser as to the amount of tax that will be paid by a superior court judge, supreme court judge, Chief Justice of Canada, the superior court judges of the provinces, and the district court judges. How much will be recaptured by the treasury because it falls into the one taxation year? I leave it to hon. members, who can say just how much of the retroactive part of their salary increases went to the Department of National Revenue. The net cost of that pay increase to the Crown was very much smaller than would appear.

I do not think it does anyone any good to behave as this parliament and the public of Canada behaved over the last pay increase. It is very easy to say it should not be done, but somewhere the buck has to stop. Someone must take a decision. We have to amend bills every now and then to pass on judges' salaries. I believe the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) and his advisers make the best examination of the subject they can before putting forward proposals. These may have to be altered because the minister's colleagues will not accept them. Then, in this House, are we competent to decide exactly what a judge's salary should be?

We do not seek to determine the salaries paid to public servants at the executive level. We do not try to fix the wages elevator operators should be paid. There are standards set. There is an independent committee which advises the cabinet on the desirable level of executive remuneration.

Why not set up a parliamentary commission charged with reporting every two years with regard to changes which should take place in the remuneration of judges and parliamentarians, these recommendations to become law within a certain period unless negative action is taken by way of resolution in this chamber? To my mind this would be eminently fair to all parties concerned, the public included—and the public is to be considered in this—I do not mean to add them as an afterthought.

In France a member of parliament is paid $35,000 a year plus certain allowances; 45 per cent of that salary is not taxable. That salary is fixed by statute—it is to be the mid point, the average of the highest and lowest in the executive class of the public service. In this country it would be somewhere around SX-3 or SX-4. It is automatic—no fuss and feathers about it. Members of parliament there serve the people just as we do.

In Germany, a member of parliament is paid about $35,000 at today's exchange rates, plus certain allowances.

When one looks at pensions I have to laugh at the Globe and Mail and certain other papers when they insist that members of parliament enjoy the benefit of a most generous pension scheme. They ought to broaden their outlook and get a little more information. If people are adequately paid they will pay their proper contributions. I can agree that the front end load is wrong in some cases. On the other hand, the people who serve here for six years, especially if they are professional people, cannot step out of the chamber and adjust to civvy street as easily as changing a suit on a Monday morning. There is no severance pay as there would be in private industry; if there were we could dispense with this idea of a person serving here for six years and then drawing a pension.

One must consider, too, the entitlement of the widow or the spouse of this individual, and the role that person has to play in the life of a member of parliament. This is something which the media and the public forgot. In the case of a male member, the wife has rights too—she works damned hard for them, but in all this fuss and fury, amid the stage plays that were put on here and elsewhere, this was forgotten. However, my colleagues here do not forget it. They know what it means.

So, I would say this pay increase is needed. It is indeed unfortunate that the percentages have to be so high. I am glad for the sake of the 500 or so judges affected that the media have not decided to make them kicking boards because, on the basis of the performance of last December and later on, they should be kicked all over the lot at the present time. But no, there are double standrads, and I do not mind saying it. Double standards have been applied in this case.

I commend the bill before us today. I am sorry it has taken so long to get to it. I think there are better ways in which to proceed. I have suggested one, and I commend it to hon. members opposite as I would commend it to my hon. friends on this side of the House in the event we were forming an administration. There still has to be a decision made.

I don't give a damn about an argument which says we should not make up our minds for ourselves. This is what boards of directors do. It is done in all walks of life. The publisher of a newspaper sets his own remuneration. An editor who is a member on the board of a newspaper sets his own remuneration. It is not wrong for him to do so, but it is wrong for parliamentarians. It is the same in broadcasting stations.

I am sorry if I have been tempted to vent some spleen this afternoon, using as a vehicle a bill to which I give full approval, and I apologize to hon. members for having taken overly long. However, I did not say anything on the other bills, nor during previous stages of the bill before us.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, it is often true in this House that we can differ widely on an issue that comes before us and yet find some measure of common ground. At least it is usually the case that we can understand each other despite wide differences of opinion which may exist. I am afraid, however, that on this issue, as between many of my hon. friends in the chamber and some of us in this quarter, it is awfully hard to understand each other. The gulf between us is too wide.

I comprehend what the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) are saying. They believe in those at the top getting percentage increases that correspond to the percentage increases that others have had. Thus they believe that those at the top should get more. I just do not share that point of view, Madam Speaker.

I believe it is the job of government and parliament to try to get rid of the inequalities in this country and to concentrate on raising the incomes of those in the middle and lower brackets. We do not move in that direction when we add substantial increments to the salaries of those who are already in the top 10, 5 or 3 per cent of our wage or salary earners.

It is not my intention to prolong this debate. Apparently I shouted "nay" so loudly a while back in an effort to drown out the "yeas" on that Senate bill that I did something to my voice which will protect members from a long speech from me at this time. I have also got to save my voice a bit because in a few minutes we will be dealing with a motion of mine calling for an increase in the old age pension.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What will happen to that motion?

Mr. McKenzie: I will support it, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) says he will support it. I expect lots of members will support it. In fact they will speak about it so long that they will talk it out.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You have not the right to increase the pension anyway.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We have here an interesting contrast. Our judges are getting these high salaries, and my hon. friend from Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) slopped over into a rehashing of Bill C-44. Others are getting high salaries. A spirited defence is made for them that they should get these massive increases. I just do not agree. I think that this should not be our first concern, and I again make the point that I have tried to make in debates like this on other occasions, that at this particular moment in our history the issue is not whether our judges, lieutenant-governors, cabinet ministers or Senators need an increase in pay; the issue is the state of our economy.

The state of the economy is such that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is preaching restraint, and he seems to be doing his best to give us some hints of what is going to be in his budget. The budget is going to contain restraint measures.

Mr. Boulanger: Right.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend across the way says "right". If from this place restraint is to be preached to the Canadian people as a whole, then how can hon. members stand in this place, time after time, and support massive increases for those who are already at the top?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Why not tell that to your friends?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do. I made a speech when we were dealing with the Treasury Board estimates along this same line. Reference was made to massive increases that are coming to executives in the public service. When those increases come, Madam Speaker, I shall oppose them as well. I think percentage increases should apply only to that portion of one's income that must be increased in order to meet the basic cost of living. As for any increase above that point, especially in light of today's economy, my answer is no.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Is your answer still no even to the postal workers who are asking for 70 per cent?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My answer to these outlandish requests is that they are wrong, especially in the case of those who are already some way up the scale. But I point out that this rash of outlandish demands has come about since in this House of Commons in December it was proposed to give members a 50 per cent raise.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Nonsense. We did that a long time before.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend shouts "nonsense" and others show their sensitivities with respect to this issue, but that is the fact. We have fanned the fires of inflation by what we are doing in this House.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I saw a settlement of 35 per cent for one year last November.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am getting lots of help in saving my voice because of all these interjections, so I welcome them.

Mr. Boulanger: You had better go to Ste. Anne de Beaupré if you have hurt your voice.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That sounded interesting but I did not hear what my hon. friend said.

Mr. Boulanger: I said you will have to go to Ste. Anne de Beaupré.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I seem to be standing alone here today, Madam Speaker, but I was not alone on the vote on Bill C-44; there were 25 of us that opposed the bill. This shows that some members of the House have some conscience and are sensitive about this issue.

In regard to increases for people at the top, I say that the issue is not how long it is since they had their last increase. It is not whether they need it or that they should preserve their place in the pecking order. The issue is whether it is fair to the Canadian people to give them an increase in view of today's state of the economy, and I say it is not. I say that we did wrong, that we committed an outrage in passing Bill C-44. I say that we were wrong in raising the salaries of those in the other place and of cabinet ministers. I say the same thing in regard to judges and lieutenant-governors.

From this place, Parliament Hill, where we speak to and for the people of Canada, there should be a conscientiousness in what we do, and we should have an eye to the effect of what we do on the economy as a whole. It is for these reasons, Madam Speaker, that I opposed Bill C-44, and it is for these reasons that I oppose this bill as vigorously as I can.

I go along with all those who have argued about the importance of the judiciary, that they should be independent and so on. But to suggest that we will get impartial judges and good members of parliament simply by paying higher salaries I think misses the point altogether. I still hope that from this place, from this Parliament Hill, the voice of reason will be heard, and if there is to be the preaching of restraint to the Canadian people as a whole, which we will probably get on the night of June 23, I suggest that right here is the place where the practising of that restraint should begin.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No. On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being four o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, private bills.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT—CANADA PENSION PLAN

SUGGESTED REDUCTION IN AGE ELIGIBILITY AND INCREASE IN PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give immediate consideration to the advisability of amending the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan to provide for the pensions payable under these two acts to be available at age 60 to all persons who meet the other requirements of the said acts and who are not in or are prepared to withdraw from the labour market, and also to provide for the basic amount of the pension payable under the Old Age Security Act, at age 60 for those not in the labour market and to everyone at age 65, to be increased to $200 per month, for this basic amount to be escalated each year by an amount that will enable pensioners not only to keep up with rising living costs but to share in rising living standards, and also to provide for the elimination of any means or income test from the Old Age Security Act, so that the full pension thereunder will be recognized as the established right of all our people.

● (1600)

He said: Madam Speaker, this is an interesting coincidence, but there are those in the House who know I did not plan it this way. It was the officials in one of the offices that lined up this motion for debate this afternoon at four o'clock, and it was the government that lined up the bill to raise judges' salaries for earlier this afternoon. I hope the readiness that most of the members have shown to support substantial increases in the salaries of judges will reflect itself now in a readiness to support the proposal for a substantial increase in the pensions paid to our senior citizens.

Mr. Whittaker: They are going to accept it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend to my right says they are going to accept this motion. I would not be surprised if there are a number of speeches in favour of the general principle for which I am asking, but at five o'clock they will still be talking about it.

It is still my view that one of the finest moves ever made by the parliament of Canada was when the Old Age Security Act was passed and came into effect on January 1, 1952. The passing of that legislation changed the situation we had for a number of years in which older people got a pension only if they could meet a very severe means test, and in its place it was determined that everyone who met the requirement of residence and age, at that point it was age 70, would draw a pension as of right.

Let me say also that I think one of the finest acts ever performed by my late friend, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, was when he announced after the passing of that act that he was going to apply for his pension. He was the Prime Minister of Canada, he had a private income, but he was of pensionable age and he said to the people of Canada that he wanted to demonstrate that this was something that should go to all people who were of pensionable age and there was to be no stigma attached to it on the part of anyone. He said that was the reason he was applying for old age security.

Not only do I see this in terms of having lived through it all, but I feel we have changed the character of retirement living by the extent to which we have made other things which are available to older people a matter of right. We have come a long way in many respects since the Old Age Security Act came into being. That in itself was tremendous progress from what was done back in the mid 1920's. We have now added, even where they are not provided for everybody, hospitalization, medicare, prescription drugs, and free or low-cost travel on public transportation and so on, including half rates to movie theatres and the various other benefits which accrue to a person now simply because he is 65, without any questions being asked.

My concern is that these social advances which were made with the adoption of the Old Age Security Act should be continued, and we should improve the whole picture by substantially raising the amount of the old age security pension, by getting rid of the means or income test that applies to that portion known as the guaranteed income supplement, and by bringing these things into effect at age 60 instead of age 65.

The motion as you read it from the chair, Madam Speaker, proposes that the basic pension under the Old Age Security Act be raised to $200 a month. I draw your attention to the fact that the motion was filed on October 10, 1974. A lot has happened since then. I believe it was two weeks ago today that, under Standing Order 43, I tried to move a motion to raise the basic old age pension to $300 a month. If it were possible to amend this motion now before us I would amend it along those lines, because in the past few months since this motion was placed on the order paper we have spread money around lavishly and easily for certain other persons. It is also the fact, of course, that the rise in the cost of living has escalated old age security pensions and the guaranteed income supplement to the point that an individual who is drawing the full amount is now getting more than $200 a month, but it is still only $123.42 for the person who draws only old age security.

The time has come to raise that amount to a figure like $250 or $300 a month, and to see to it that it goes to everyone as a matter of right. A few moments ago one of the defences made in regard to higher salaries for judges, members of parliament and others was that they would pay a good chunk of it back to the Department of National Revenue in income tax. If that argument is good for judges and members of parliament, I submit it is also good for those who are in receipt of old age security.

What has always been the basic theory behind the universal program is that the most fair, the most dignified, and the most humane way of providing social benefits is to give them on a universal basis and let the income tax take care of those who, because of their other income, really do not need it. I know the same Liberal party which took nearly half a century to get to the point of being willing to go for universal old age security has now backed away from it and is preaching the gospel of selectivity. Like Arthur Meighen, and I had better bring a Conservative into the picture since I mentioned Mr. St. Laurent, I am unrevised and unrepentent about this. I still think the best way to provide benefits like old age security is to provide them on a universal basis without applying a means or income test beforehand, letting the income tax apply afterwards.

That is the reason why I argue that the basic pension should now be raised, as the motion says, to $200 or, as my motion of two weeks ago suggested, to $300, and that the guaranteed income supplement portion be paid to everyone, that there be no means or income test on it and that we get back to what we started out to do in the early 1950's, namely, bring to our older people the full measure of dignity that is their right.

I get teased around here sometimes for having been here for quite a while. I do not mind that teasing; I am proud of the fact that I have been here quite a few years. One of the things that is very prominent in my memory is the realization of the difference we have made in the lives of the older people. Some 30, 40 or 50 years ago they were kept in back rooms. They could not go anywhere as they did not have the clothes or the car fare. Now older people get out to all kinds of things. They have the clothes and they enjoy public transportation. Golden wedding anniversaries today are much more widely attended then they used to be because people can afford to get to them. We have made improvements. I am not only prepared to admit that, I assert it, and we have been able to do that to the extent we have practised the principle of universality.

I ask that this parliament continue that principle and that it do so along the lines I suggest in this motion; that is, that the basic amount of the pension be raised to a figure high enough that everybody gets more than is now being paid under both old age security and the guaranteed income supplement. I argue also that the age for that pension should be brought down to 60.

My motion refers not only to lowering the age for old age security but also to lowering the age in respect of the Canada Pension Plan. I attach to both of these pensions at age 60, and up to age 65, the requirement that a person be out of the labour market. That could be because of having left the labour market or of never having been in it. As hon. members are aware, I think this is a much better way to pay pensions at age 60 than what the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) will be proposing in a bill in which he will give it only to those between the ages of 60 and 65 who are spouses of one who is 65 or over. I think the time has come for the pension to be available on a voluntary basis to anyone at age 60 provided that person is out of the labour market.

Although life can be richly rewarding, we also know that life has become more difficult. The rat race in our industrial society today is such that many workers have great difficulty in trying to continue to age 65. I think one thing we could do that would most enhance life in later years is to permit people to retire when they are young enough to plan their future and their remaining years. That is the reason why in this motion I plead that there be a reduction of the age to 60 on a voluntary basis, and that it apply to both old age security and the Canada Pension Plan.

There is no point in telling a person he or she can receive the old age security at age 60 and expect that he or she will retire if they cannot pick up any other benefits which are available. If we can induce many people in this age group to retire this would incidentally open up many jobs for those who are younger and unemployed. So, I present the motion to the House this afternoon as earnestly as I can.

I suppose this motion epitomizes the type of thing I have worked on the hardest during the decades I have been in this place. I am aware of the needs of those in other age groups. I am very much aware that there is a move in the direction of having a guaranteed annual income to cover all our people. Indeed, I press for this to be done. I am aware of the arguments from the other side that if we are to start spending we should spend the money on the needs of single parents and people who cannot work. The difficulty, however, is that although we are told the money should be spent in this other place, it is not spent in either place.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

There is a whole broad spectrum about which we should be concerned, but I submit that our society is easily measured on the one hand in respect of what it does for our children and younger people, and on the other hand by what it does for our older people. I say we should take steps to make still better the life of the senior citizens in Canada and add to the glory that was Parliament's when it passed the Old Age Security Act in 1951, which became effective in 1952. Therefore I present this motion and hope that the House will agree with me, as I say in my motion, that the full benefits available to our people should be recognized as the established right of all our senior citizens.

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He has achieved a remarkable reputation in this House for fighting on behalf of Canada's old age pensioners. This motion is of interest to many Canadians, including the senior citizens of my constituency of Wellington.

At the very outset, Madam Speaker, I believe it is important to point out that the combination of old age security benefits and retirement pension now available to Canadians aged 65 and over, under the Canada Pension Plan and the Old Age Security Act, is one of the most advanced in the western world. These two acts form an integral part of the Canadian social security system. They enable millions of people to provide financially for themselves and their families during crucial periods, that is, when retirement arrives, when disability strikes, or when death takes away the breadwinner. It might be worthwhile taking a moment to consider the number of Canadians who are already receiving assistance under these acts.

Each month approximately half a million senior citizens and their families receive a benefit cheque under the Canada Pension Plan alone. In addition to this over 1.8 million Canadians, that is all long-standing residents of Canada 65 years of age and over, receive a monthly benefit under old age security. Of these over 1.1 million people receive a further payment each month under the guaranteed income supplement program.

This is a highly successful program which this motion proposes to change. In fact there are three parts to the hon. member's motion. The first advocates making old age security and Canada Pension Plan benefits available to all persons who retire at age 60. The second is aimed at increasing the benefits of the old age pension to $200 a month and indexing them to the standard of living. The third calls for the elimination of any income or means test for receipt of guaranteed income supplements. I would like to consider each of these parts in turn to show why, at this point in time, it would be unwise to adopt this motion.

There are sound economic reasons for not undertaking the first proposal to increase the old age pension and Canada Pension Plan rolls to include all those who retire at age 60. First of all, retirement at age 60 would reduce the productivity of this country at the very time when it is most important that everything be done to keep production at as high a level as possible.

All too often we forget that workers between the ages of 60 and 65 possess skills which took many years to develop.

This kind of an amendment could add another 800,000 people to the lists of those dependent on the government for their income, and deprive the community of the valuable energy and skills which these men and women can offer. This is becoming increasingly important with the changing age structure of our population.

At present 8 per cent of all Canadians are over 65. But by 1985 at least 13 per cent of our citizens will be over 65. This, combined with the trend to smaller families, means that we may well be facing a severe labour shortage in the coming years. Therefore the contribution that our senior citizens can make to the work force will be even more significant. As it is, these demographic changes mean that we will almost certainly have a smaller proportion of people in the labour force who will have to support a larger retired population. To accept this motion for the provision of retirement pensions at age 60 would make this situation even worse.

Secondly, let us consider the cost of providing pensions and guaranteed income supplements to those who retire between 60 and 65. It would be approximately $1.2 billion. This measure by itself would double the current federal contribution to Canadian public assistance. This money must come from somewhere. In fact it will come from the taxes paid by other Canadians and at the expense of other needs in society. In this as in every other instance of government spending we are talking about priorities.

Should our priority be to provide additional funds to a limited group of people in the population, many of whom already hold well paying jobs, before we tackle the more urgent problems of poverty in this country? If we are really concerned about fighting poverty in Canada we will aim our resources at those who are the worst off, not to broad groups across the board, but in a selective fashion to the poor, the disabled, and the needy.

The government is presently conducting a comprehensive review of its social security programs with a view to improving the distribution of income across the country. The reform which will follow should benefit Canada's senior citizens as well as others, but according to their need as individuals rather than as a group, regardless of need.

Finally, this resolution makes the assumption that the majority of people between the ages of 60 and 65 want to retire. This is by no means always the case. A number of cases have come to my attention of people who are being compulsorily retired at age 65, and who object to being pensioned off in this way with good working years ahead of them. To make Canada Pension Plan benefits available to people at age 60 would only encourage private industry to retire people earlier.

In the past businesses have tended to accept the age at which old age security or Canada pension payments begin as the normal age for compulsory retirement under their private plans. When the eligible age for social security payments dropped from 70 to 65 many private firms dropped their own age for compulsory retirement. To lower this age again to 60 would penalize many Canadians who are not happy to retire at that age, and who have productive years ahead of them.

Already more and more people here and in the United States are questioning the value of early retirement and the widespread policy of compulsory retirement. A Conference Board study reports, for instance, that in those companies which already offer early retirement plans, only 10 per cent of eligible employees actually take advantage of this option. There is a strong argument which suggests it may be preferable to reintroduce a system of optional retirement in view of the extended lifespan and productive capacity of many people over 65.

Too many of us in the past decade have been persuaded by advertisements and a media campaign which glorified the "Pepsi generation", those under 25, to the point where we assume that the world belongs exclusively to the young—where we assume that a man's or woman's productive years are finished at age 60 or even earlier. This is not so. For instance, were we to introduce compulsory retirement at age 65 in this House we would lose the valuable contributions of such colleagues, among others, as the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), as well as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Truly this would be a shame.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Maine: I am particularly concerned at the number of industrial firms who seem reluctant these days to hire older employees, who put so much emphasis on the bright young men around that they forget how much more experienced and older employees can offer. This is a subtle, but socially debilitating, form of discrimination. In my view we need less talk about lowering the age for pensions and more support for hiring and recognizing the contribution of older and experienced employees.

This government has deliberately been emphasizing that great potential to be found among Canada's senior citizens—a productive potential which is now being developed through such programs as New Horizons. There are good reasons why New Horizons has been one of the most successful and widely acclaimed programs ever launched by the federal government. This kind of project, which employs and funds the activity of senior citizens, must be considered a more productive utilization of funds than a simple extension of the pension.

Another good example of Canada's senior citizens working not only for their own country but also abroad, is the Canadian Executive Service Overseas. This is an agency funded by the federal government which, at the request of the developing nations, sends out over 200 retired Canadians a year—between the ages of 65 and 70 for the most part—who use their expertise and experience to help solve particular problems or challenges facing the developing nations. In this way older Canadians have helped in over 40 countries of the world. In the past year under this program, Canadian senior citizens have given voluntarily of their time in a wide variety of projects. Some have worked, for instance, to increase barley production in Sri Lanka, to improve car leasing in Thailand, and to modernize the hotels of Nigeria. These people are proving that not only Canadian young people, but also our senior citizens, can make a contribution to development around the world.

With the same goal, the government introduced amendments to the Canada Pension Plan last year which were designed to enable all pensioners, including those from 65 to 69, to continue to work full or part time and receive wages. Before these amendments were passed, contributors between 65 and 69 had to retire from regular employment before they could qualify for Canada Pension Plan benefits, and recipients of these pensions aged 65 to 69 faced the prospect of having their pensions reduced if they earned above a certain amount.

I am surprised that the hon. member's motion is designed to make a pension payable at age 60 only on condition that the individual retires. Surely this flies in the face of all recent moves to allow senior citizens to continue to work while receiving a pension. This may suit some professionals who can readily resume their work again at age 65, but surely it works to the detriment of the average working man.

The second substantive part of this motion calls for an increase in the old age pension to $200 a month. I do not think that this is unreasonable at all. But I want to point out that an individual who receives the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement at present already can receive $209.99 a month—as much, indeed more than the hon. member's motion calls for. I realize that it is the basic rate of pension, now at $123.42, that the hon. member wants to raise, but I feel it is worth noting that those who need the higher amount can already receive it under the existing plan.

We have indeed come a long way since 1926 when parliament first passed legislation giving senior citizens the magnificent sum of $20 a month at age 70. In the last two or three years alone the budget for social security, for old age pensions, has doubled from $2 billion to $4 billion, and income tax exemptions have been provided to allow a couple over 65 to earn an income as high as $8,000 a year before paying tax.

The key difference between the government's policy and the hon. member's proposal is basically that the hon. member would like to eliminate completely any pension dependent on an income test, so that $200 would be the basic amount received by all persons 65 and over, or those over 60 and retired. This means that the wealthiest businessman in Canada with substantial personal assets will receive as much as a widow with no other means of support. This is hardly fair. It is hardly just. The key advantage of our pension system as it now stands is that we can direct the resources to where they are most needed. That is to say, we can increase the pension payable to those individuals with little or no income in a way that this motion would not allow. This is both the most efficient and the most equitable use of the money available.

Therefore I am opposed to the motion put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It would not lead to an equitable use either of the resources of the country or of the resources devoted to the senior citizens of Canada.

Fairness is the goal at which old age security should aim, and that is precisely the goal of the present system. This is why old age security benefits are now fully indexed to the cost of living and payable quarterly to ensure that our senior citizens, who have worked hard all their lives, are protected from the damage of inflation. This is why we retain an income test in order to ensure that those who most need support receive it.

[Mr. Maine.]

There is an old Hasidic saying that the prosperity of a country is in accordance with its treatment of the aged. By this standard I believe that Canada can be judged among the most advanced and prosperous countries in the world. When compared, for instance, to the American schemes, the Canadian system comes out clearly ahead. Not only are Canadian pension payments higher, but they are available without retirement at age 65, whereas substantial retirement is required to receive a pension in the United States before the age of 72. All too often the United States sets the trend for Canada, but in this area Canada is among the leaders of the world.

We have an old age security and pension system in Canada of which we can be proud and which deserves our support.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to support the motion brought forward today by my neighbour from Winnipeg, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I will just take a few minutes to speak in support of this motion because I do not want to be accused of taking part in talking it out.

When one talks about lowering the pension age to 60 and increasing the pension up to $200 a month, people ask where the money will come from. I do not think I would have any trouble finding the money in the $30 billion budget of the Liberal government. There are hundreds of millions of dollars—and the Conservative Party has mentioned this many times—which would be available if some of the departments were to be phased out. For example, Information Canada is just duplicating what each government department has now, its own information offices. They are expanding, and we can certainly do away with Information Canada and find hundreds of millions of dollars there.

The government is expanding its expenditures on outside consultants, and that is reaching about $1 billion per year. We can certainly start phasing out outside consultants, and there we would find the money for increased pensions and for lowering the pension age. We had no trouble finding money for increases for members of parliament and judges, so I am sure the money can be found quite easily.

The Progressive Conservative Party has long supported an increase to about $200 a month and the lowering of the pension age, and I would like to quote from the position paper we presented in the last election:

> The Progressive Conservative Party pledges itself to ensure that our aging population lives in comfort and dignity.
> We refuse to engage in the kind of demeaning auction room bidding which has often been directed to our senior citizens. Recognizing what inflation has done to this deserving group, a Progressive Conservative government will provide a substantial increase in the basic old age security pension. We regard such an increase as a just and proper act to partially remedy the inflationary pressures that have so diminished the economic security of these Canadians who have given years of service to their country.

It is not our view that people of 60 years of age be compelled or urged to retire, but in a country like Canada citizens should be enabled to retire in comfort and dignity at 60 if they so desire. We would consider gradually lowering the age of benefit eligibility if an applicant is no longer employed.

A Progressive Conservative government would ensure that when a wife or husband reaches age 65 the spouse is deemed eligible for old age security and guaranteed income benefit if he or she is not employed and is more than 50 years of age.

I find that this is what the majority of Canadians want today, contrary to the remarks made by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Maine) that people do not want to retire at 60 today. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre put it very well when he said that with the rat race today in certain industries people are exhausted at 60, and that no contribution is made after 60.

Mr. Cullen: Come on!

Mr. McKenzie: In certain industries today one cannot make a contribution after 55, and I refer to the industry in which I was involved. That is communications, and I observed this because I was in that field for 30 years. I am speaking from some knowledge, not just something I pulled out of a hat.

The position paper goes on to say:

The withering away of savings has put in jeopardy the private pension plans of many Canadians. A Progressive Conservative government will encourage effective action to bring remedial justice to people whose financial security has been undermined by inflation.

I just do not agree that the answer to every problem is to pay people more money. The government also has an obligation in this field to do something about inflation. That would help senior citizens in two ways, and not just with an increase.

The position paper continues:

Far too many senior citizens are unable to find space in housing units. A Progressive Conservative government will make meaningful aid available so that the provinces will be able to accelerate the construction of senior citizens' housing.

We favour the expansion of the New Horizon program in order that the valuable resources resting in our old population may be drawn upon to their benefit and that of society as a whole.

I would like to give further support to this bill by reading from a speech made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in Gander, Newfoundland, on June 5, 1974. He stated:

Let's talk about the older folk; those who have been trying to get by these days on the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement. They know—and no one knows any better—what the cost of living has done to them. Every month—as prices go up for food, clothing, and shelter—the value of their pensions goes down.

Our party fought for a better deal for them in the last election and throughout the last parliament. And we still are. When we are elected, we will provide an immediate increase in the basic old age pension of $7 a month and for those in greatest need of assistance, we will provide an additional $15 a month.

That will bring the total of the basic pension and guaranteed income supplement up to $202 a month. I'm not saying that's the moon, but it's an attempt to provide a basic adjustment in pension income that relates to the rapid increase in the cost of living.

I will draw my remarks to a close by saying that I hope no more hon. members will rise to oppose this motion.

Mr. Cullen: Cut off debate?

Mr. McKenzie: Don't talk it out; just agree to this motion. You would really get a feather in your cap if you supported some private member's motion for a change. Maybe the hon. member has a surprise for us this afternoon. I hope he will support this motion to his fullest. I am quite sure that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Cullen) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) know of ways to find the money to support this motion today.

Mr. Béchard: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McKenzie: Oh yes, first time.

Mr. Béchard: I would like to ask the hon. member if he is aware that the Conservative Party in all its history since 1867 only gave $16 per month to the old people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1640)

Mr. McKenzie: I remind the hon. member that his party was tagged with the name "six-buck boys", and the people of Canada have not forgotten.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The figure should be $19, not $16.

Mr. Béchard: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine on a point of order.

Mr. Béchard: Madam Speaker, we have just been tagged "six-buck boys". I feel the hon. member is exaggerating. We gave around $209, that is $209 less $16.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hon. member is starting a debate. This is not a point of order. The hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on a most important motion introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The motion echoes similar motions unders Nos. 10, 26 and 23, including one by my colleague for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) to bring down pensionable age to 60.

It was my impression that during the last federal election a consensus was reached among the parties. It was my understanding it had been settled once and for all that if this government was re-elected, a bill would be passed to bring pensionable age down to 60.

An hon. Member: There was no commitment about that.

Mr. Fortin: Madam Speaker, somebody from the other side says there was no commitment. I could table in this House an advertisement by the Liberal government, the Liberal party, that were distributed from door to door in my constituency. It was even dropped from an airplane flying over the city of Victoriaville, to announce that the Liberal party was now in favour of the 60 year pensionable age. Indeed, this motion is almost identical to what was then published in the advertisement. We are now told this would not do, this would be too expensive, this is unacceptable, that pensionable age cannot be brought down to 60, that those people have to work, and so on.

But nonetheless, Madam Speaker, knowing members of parliament as well as I do, knowing as well as I do the political game, you must realize that some time soon the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) will hopefully be introducing a bill that would probably bring pensionable age down to 60 in cases where the other spouse already receives a pension at age 65. How amusing it will then be to see all members opposite support the legislation. They will have adequate funds. They will see no monetary problem. In other words, anything coming from them is reasonable, and they have all the money needed for it. But coming from the opposition, it is unacceptable. These are the only remarks I wish to make.

Considering the social turmoil, the social tragedy we are now going through, the social stresses we are witnessing, it is high time that people in public life had the decency to be true to their word and fulfill their commitments.

And the second thing I would like to emphasize, Madam Speaker, is the obvious social drama, and I think everyone will agree on that—people who reach the age of 50, 55 and who are threatened by an industrial disease, a heart attack or anything else, or who see their performance decrease even if they are not sick and who are looking foward to 60 in the hope of getting their pension at 60, who are confident to reach 65 but give up hope of ever getting to retirement age.

Madam Speaker, let us think about it for a moment. All members of this House often accept invitations to 50th, 35th wedding anniversaries, and what not. In fact, nearly a whole week is squeezed into two days. When we leave at night after a reception, a great party, who stays behind to pick up everything, dismantle and clean the tables? It is interesting to observe people's behaviour. It is not young people, it is people of 55, 60, whose spouse generally draws the pension but who do not get it because they are not 65.

And because they have an inadequate income to live on, the wife must wash dishes at those receptions, dancing or other parties, anniversaries, weddings, to try and make a little more money to live on.

I say, Madam Speaker, that it is time for us Canadians to have not only enough heart, but enough openness of mind to recognize that people who have reached the age of 55 are economically speaking those most vulnerable in our economy; they are the first ones to be laid off, the ones most likely to fall sick and the ones most irregular in the working world.

That is, and I quite agree with the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Maine), experienced labour, valuable labour, labour that wants to work, and I hope that one day the young will try to imitate older workers—that would surely improve the current working environment. The fact still remains, Madam Speaker, that those 60 years of age are precisely the group of people who have reached a critical standard of living, and I think that the first duty of this parliament, this majority government which has the capacity, the financial means and which undertook to accomplish it, since that is unanimously recognized in this House, is to grant the pension at 60 to anyone who has reached that age, so that we can not only help those people but also make sure that they have a decent old age with security.

In another connection, the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) calls for increased benefit payments. Of course, Madam Speaker, I did not calculate the effects of that, but it is obvious that in theory one can only be in favour of such an increase. When one fills out, as I often do at my office in Victoriaville, guaranteed income supplement applications, one realizes very often that because someone managed to get a little job to increase his pension it is reduced.

I will give you a typical example, and conclude on that. How many cases I got at my office every week the Lord brings! A man came to see me and told me that his old age pension is inadequate to live on. Then, in discussing with him in a friendly way, I learned that he found a temporary and part-time job with the school board to have the children cross the street and avoid unfortunate accidents. He thus earns an income during the week, the month or the year, but owing to a few other sources of income, his guaranteed income supplement is reduced.

I heard a while ago the argument raised by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Maine) who stated that many individuals between 60 and 65 years of age still want to work. Well, Madam Speaker, I think that is true and if we agree with that objective, the old age pension should be granted at 60 years of age, the present rates should be raised to enable those who are still healthy and who wish to have additional work even if they are pensioned, to keep busy and do something they like.

It is a wonderful thing for a person of 60 or 67 years of age to help children across the streets, to work, and chat as friends do, on a daily basis, with children of kindergarten, primary and elementary age. That is absolutely extraordinary. It is the meeting of the elders of the country with those who will build tomorrow. But because a person does so, the guaranteed income supplement is reduced; and that because our scales work on a "cent" basis; truly, those who would help themselves are being punished.

Madam Speaker, I feel we should be moved by a positive spirit in dealing with that legislation, and that we should, as one man, ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to see to it that all those who reach the age of 60 are not only encouraged to continue working but are guaranteed financial security; then, instead of looking as if we want to get rid of them, we will show them that we want to keep them within the ranks of our society. After all, they are the ones who built our country. If today's youth did as much as our fathers to build that country of ours, we would not have to worry about its future.

Mr. Béchard: I would like to correct a slight mistake I have just made, in all honesty towards the Progressive Conservative Party and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie). One of the most senior members in this House, the hon. member for Winnipeg

North Centre (Mr. Knowles), has just advised me of this mistake. It is not—

[English]

The figure I mentioned ought not to be $16, but $19. On the other hand, the Conservative party did not give one red cent in family allowances.

● (1650)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Madam Speaker, I think all hon. members in this House would like to discuss this very important question. Unfortunately, we will not have enough time. However, it is a little unfortunate to note that important subjects such as pension and the lowering of pensionable age cannot be debated, which would enable all hon. members to give their opinions. This subject is both important and complicated. However, it is not as simple as some hon. members claim.

There are ramifications to the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre which need readjusting, I think.

[English]

When the Canada Pension Plan was introduced in 1965, age 70 was retained as the eligible age, but provision was made for a gradual reduction over a five-year period to 65. Entitlement to benefits before the age of 70 was made provisional on retirement from employment. This reduction was extended to the universal old age security pension without the retirement test.

I find the recommendation in this motion that those who would be entitled to the pension would have to be out of the work market hard to accept. It goes against my personal feelings with regard to the old age security pension. As far as I am concerned, it also goes against the grain with regard to the guaranteed income supplement.

In 1965 when the government announced its intention to proceed with the Canada Assistance Plan, whereby the federal and provincial governments would share the cost of the social assistance program, administered by the provinces, assistance was to be made available on the determination of need. At the same time the old age assistance provisions for persons between 65 and 70 were to be phased out with the gradual lowering of the eligible age for the universal pensions.

For old age security pensioners with little or no other income, it was proposed that a program of supplementary payments based on an income test should be adopted. Legislation was introduced to bring the guaranteed income supplement into effect in January, 1967.

Expenditures on public pensions increased rapidly over this period under the combined impact of the progressive reduction of the age of eligibility, the introduction of the guaranteed income supplement, and the increases resulting from the escalation of benefits annually on the basis of a pension index related to the cost of living.

The adoption in 1972 of escalation based on the full increase in the cost of living, and in 1973 a quarterly escalation of benefits, added considerably to the expansion of costs. Expenditures in old age security and the guaranteed income supplement increased from just over $1 billion in 1965-66 to more than $3 billion in 1973-74.

The present proposal is to reduce the eligible age of old age security to 60, subject to retirement from the labour market. This gives rise, as I said before, to several questions. I think the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Maine) referred to a few of them.

I think particularly of the fact that we would be giving an example to the private sector in establishing age 60 as the normal retirement age. I think of the pride in Canada and our economy, of experience, qualified expertise, and people who have contributed immensely to the economy of this country.

One argument that can be made in favour of early retirement is that it will open job opportunities for younger workers. However, this would not necessarily follow. Retired persons may simply move into other employment. Some jobs may disappear through attrition, and vacancies would be fewer than expected. The trend toward an earlier compulsory retirement date could affect productivity by removing skilled workers from the labour force at a time when they are most productive and most needed. The increased cost to employers in paying retirement pensions would have to be paid by the consumers through increased prices.

The additional expense of reducing the old age security age to 60 has been estimated at between $1.2 billion and $1.7 billion at current rates. Increased costs of this magnitude over and above the current expenditure of $3.5 billion would undoubtedly lead to an increase in taxation. The imposition of a greater burden on Canadians in general must be weighed against the merits of providing additional benefits from one particular segment of society to another.

In addition to lowering the age to 60, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggests that the Canada Pension Plan retirement benefit would once again be conditional on an earnings test or for all retired pensioners. Hon. members will recall that these tests were eliminated recently under the Canada Pension Plan amendments. I doubt whether retired pensioners would appreciate the resumption of such tests. In my constituency, according to correspondence I receive—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Yes, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does the hon. member not realize that it specifically says in my motion that this applies only between the ages of 60 and 65?

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): I realize that, but it also says "who are not in or are prepared to withdraw from the labour market". This is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Go on to the phrase "to everyone at age 65".

Old Age Security

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): The motion reads:

—withdraw from the labour market, and also to provide for the basic amount of the pension payable under the Old Age Security Act, at age 60 for those not in the labour market—

I do not read anything into that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Read the next four or five words.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): It reads "and to everyone at age 65".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Precisely. "To everyone".

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): I see, but this is debate.

ISSUE OF STAMP TO COMMEMORATE MR. ALPHONSE DESJARDINS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to submit an extremely important motion.

Considering that the late Commander Alphonse Desjardins was an official French-language stenographer at the House of Commons for a quarter of a century;

Considering that in addition to numerous other achievements, he was the founder of the first caisse populaire in Quebec and in Canada;

Considering that Quebecers are especially proud of so great a Canadian, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House congratulate the Postmaster General of Canada for having authorized the issue of a postage stamp to commemorate so great a Canadian, and that this House express its wishes that his work continue to prosper throughout all of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion submitted by the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is such consent granted?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous consent, so the motion cannot be submitted.

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF PROGRAM CIRCULAR D-1 PENDING REVIEW BY STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that a number of statements made in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development program circular D-1 places Canada's status Indians in a non-workable economic position, and since in a letter to native peoples from the assistant deputy minister of Indian and Eskimo Affairs it is stated that the conditions are "non-negotiable" and that "these terms and conditions remain mandatory", I would, therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes):

That this House instruct the minister in charge of Indian Affairs to retract, in full, the implementation of program circular D-1 until this matter can be fully reviewed by the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion is proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

EFFECT OF STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN IN QUEBEC ON FEED GRAIN SUPPLY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since Montreal longshoremen have once again gone on strike and the port in this city is consequently closed, that as a result of the strike, grain delivery is partially disrupted which causes considerable harm to Quebec producers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That the House consider without delay the measures to take for the immediate return to work of the Montreal longshoremen to bring back to normal the operation of the Montreal harbour.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, it requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTION MINISTER OF FINANCE ASK BANKS TO EXERCISE RESTRAINT IN IMPOSITION OF SERVICE CHARGES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a motion under Standing Order 43, and it is one to which I believe the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) would be happy to agree. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That the Minister of Finance be asked to call on the chartered banks to exercise restraint with respect to the charges they impose on their customers, it being the view of this House that the amounts being charged for deposits, withdrawals and the writing of cheques have got out of hand, and that charges for transfers by customers from one account to another are beyond reason.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 and cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN IN QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO SETTLE AND RESTORE REPUTATION OF PORT OF MONTREAL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Labour or the Acting Minister of Justice, whichever may be the more appropriate. It refers to the reported withdrawal of their services by longshoremen in Montreal. Has the Minister of Labour verified this situation, and, if the reports are correct that the longshoremen have withdrawn their services and the port is closed down in that sense, what action has the government taken?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can verify to the Leader of the Official Opposition that it is correct that the longshoremen have withdrawn their services. I am advised that, subject to further amplification by the Solicitor General, appropriate legal remedies are now being looked into with a view to their institution.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Solicitor General, in his capacity as Acting Minister of Justice in the House, precisely what measures are being taken, whether the government is seeking an injunction as before, and does the minister feel it necessary to gather evidence or, on the other hand, does he feel that the report of the withdrawal of service and the vote not to work would be considered sufficient evidence in this case?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have been in contact with the Solicitor General and the Department of Justice on this matter, and I want to tell the House that we are preparing to take certain legal actions, but we are in the process now of gathering information to make those actions possible. At this time I cannot indicate what those specific actions will be. I would expect that by tomorrow I, or one of the ministers, will be able to inform the House in that regard.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, since the right hon. gentleman has volunteered to supply some information, I should like to ask him what additional measures this government has in mind to restore the reputation of Montreal as a world port? I understand that some 14 ships or so were abandoned unserviced in the port, which surely reflects on the port and its usefulness to Canada, particularly following the previous interruptions of service. I would ask the Prime Minister what measures, if any, his government proposes to take to help restore the reputation of Montreal for reliability.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is quite right in indicating the seriousness of the matter so far as the future of the port of Montreal is concerned. We indeed view it as a most serious situation which, beyond the immediate labour problems itself, could have very severe consequence for the harbour and therefore for the city of Montreal itself. Beyond the legal decisions I just referred to in reply to the previous question, I am trying to ensure that the responsible authorities in Quebec, and indeed public opinion itself, understand the seriousness of the situation and that we will have very strong public support in whatever action we take.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID STRIKES WHICH DISRUPT GRAIN TRAFFIC—MEASURES TO PROTECT PRODUCERS FROM FINANCIAL LOSS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Labour. In view of the statements made over the weekend by two leading delegates of the Japanese flour milling industry that Canada's prominence as a grain exporter is severely threatened by lengthy strikes which disrupt grain traffic, I should like to ask the minister if he is in a position to advise the House of what specific action the government is considering to alleviate those costly disruptions in this very important industry. I ask this question given the fact that the grain movement can be disrupted by any one of the more than 30 unions involved in the movement of grain.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may be aware of discussions initiated at the last presentation of the CLC to the government when there was discussion between the Prime Minister and the CLC with reference to consolidation of certain bargaining units. This discussion having been carried on, there are indications that it is possible that management and labour will get together in an effort to resolve matters of this kind, particularly in respect of the grain industry. The hon. member may have noticed, and the opposition referred to it last week, that the president of the CLC indicated he was looking into this particular area right now to see whether there could be some consolidation of the bargaining units which would reduce the incidence of work stoppages.

Mr. Mazankowski: I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the minister's statement is rather uncertain. In the interim, while the future of Canada's reputation as a reliable shipper is being severely undermined and while the effect ripples throughout the whole economy, the greatest hardship is imposed upon the producers of grain in that they have lost hundreds of millions of dollars. Could I ask the minister if any consideration is being given to developing ways and means in which the producers of grain may be shieled or insulated from the financial hardships that are caused by these frequently recurring strikes?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I think the most appropriate and positive action that can be taken in a situation such as this is for business and management, together with the government, to come together in an effort to find an appropriate solution. Without that type of co-operative effort I see no permanent solution.

ALLEGATION EXXON ENGAGES IN PRACTICE OF TRANSFER PRICING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In light of the information made public in a recent court case involving Imperial Oil reported in the press last Friday which suggested that the supply and pricing of oil imported by Imperial Oil are managed from the headquarters of Exxon Corporation in New York, and that Exxon has engaged extensively in the practice of transfer pricing between its subsidiaries in order to avoid the payment of Canadian taxes, has the government made any plans to modify its oil import compensation scheme to ensure that payments reflect real costs to the companies involved and not costs as disguised by transfer pricing between one company and another.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as a result of that report I want to consult with my colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and my colleague the Minister of National Revenue to see what substance there is in it.

ALLEGATION IMPERIAL OIL OPERATES DUMMY CORPORATION IN BERMUDA TO AVOID PAYMENT OF CANADIAN TAXES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a supplementary question for the same minister. In light of the further revelation in the same court case that Imperial Oil has operated a dummy corporation in Bermuda for the purpose of avoiding the payment of Canadian taxes, does the government view this as a problem and, if so, what does it plan to do about it?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Of course, the administration of the Income Tax Act is the responsibility of my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue. I will be talking to him.

Mr. Broadbent: While agreeing that the administration of the act is the responsibility of another minister, the act itself is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance. I should like to ask him whether the government is concerned about the creation of dummy corporations in Bermuda or elsewhere set up specifically for the purpose of avoiding paying Canadian taxes, and, if so, does the government intend to bring forward legislation to deal with the situation?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We are concerned but we have a duty to operate on the basis of facts rather than allegations and suppositions. We will look into it.

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF CANADIAN UNION FOR QUEBEC LONGSHOREMEN

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Labour.

Since Parliament passed legislation to put a little order in the St. Lawrence ports just over a month ago while the dispute is continuing and since it is increasingly evident that it is to the detriment not only of the Canadian economy but of the Canadian workers as well, will the minister consider the advisability of introducing legislation to promote the establishment of a purely Canadian union, thus enabling Canadian workers to receive orders from Canada and not from union leaders of a foreign country?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, so far as legal remedies being pursued now are concerned, I believe the Prime Minister has fully answered that question a few moments ago. I would advise the hon. member, on information which I just received from the Minister of Agriculture, that there have been no impediments to the grain movement in the province of Quebec.

INDUSTRY

DECLINE IN PRODUCTIVITY—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO STIMULATE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the latest figures show that industrial productivity in Canada has fallen during the present year at the same sharp pace it did during the past two years, is the minister planning in the very near future to announce measures to correct this very serious situation?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we are experiencing exactly the same situation as the United States, something which occurs periodically in the phases of business. The business cycle in Canada peaked last year and our productivity declined accordingly. I expect our productivity to start to pick up in the next few months.

Mr. Hees: Is it the view of the minister that if other industrial countries happen to be experiencing—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is argumentative, George.

Mr. Hees: —industrial troubles at the same time as we are, this makes it impossible for Canada to even consider doing something on its own?

Mr. Gillespie: On the contrary, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member knows, we have a large array of programs aimed at assisting Canadian industry to improve its productivity. I recited a number of these in the debate in the House last week. I can assure the hon. member that we will continue to offer these incentives to the Canadian enterprise system unrelentlessly.

Mr. Hees: I have a final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that industrial productivity has been declining sharply despite the programs which the minister has recited on so many occasions, is the minister not convinced that the time has now arrived to bring in innovative measures and stop pretending that everything is all right and that "business as usual" is satisfactory to his department?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I would be the last one to suggest that we should carry on a business as usual basis. I would agree with the hon. member that there is a large section of Canadian industry which is being hurt. It is being hurt because our customers are not able to import on the same basis as they did before. Their economies are not as strong as they were and not as strong, relatively, as the Canadian economy.

Mr. Hees: And the minister is not as strong as he should be.

Mr. Gillespie: Let me assure the hon. member that we will maintain our onward thrust in trade programs, in industrial programs and in incentive programs.

Mr. Hees: And keep on failing and failing and failing.

OLYMPIC GAMES

POSSIBILITY OF DIRECT FEDERAL AID—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Because of the fact that revenue from the Olympic coin program for the last six months to March 31 totalled a mere $1.5 million, at which rate less than one eighth of the expected $250 million will be realized by 1976, and acknowledging the fact that the cabinet will indeed introduce legislation permitting the minting of gold coins even at this late date, which may help the situation somewhat but certainly not enough, could it therefore be taken for granted that the government will not subsidize Montreal directly or indirectly other than through the coin—that is, both silver and gold coins—and stamp programs?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the government policy regarding the Olympic Games is well known. We have helped Montreal and the province of Quebec through the programs mentioned by the hon. member, but it is not the government's intention to finance them otherwise than by the self-financing program.

[English]

POSSIBILITY SEIGNIORAGE ON ALL COINS WILL GO TO OLYMPIC COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): I have a supplementary question for the Postmaster General. With planning under way at the Canadian Mint for the minting of all Canadian coins, such as nickels, dimes, quarters and others, to bear the Olympic logo, and with reports that the seigniorage from all these coins is to go to the Olympic Committee and not the Consolidated Revenue Fund where it belongs, could the minister on behalf of the government come clean with the Canadian public and tell this House that this will not be the case, or can it be assumed that a direct grant, which this can be taken for, will in fact be forthcoming through this means? I wish the government would stop trying to fool the public in this regard.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question, it would be preferable if his premise were accurate. There is no intention of diverting the regular seigniorage, which normally goes to the Canadian public through the Consolidated Revenue Fund, to the Olympic next year. I did read press reports about the possibility of there being abnormal high seigniorage due to the staging of the Olympics in Canada. That could be legitimately considered as part of the coin program, but as I said and as my colleague beside me said, there have been no firm decisions even on the gold coin at the present moment, so I think the question is based on an inaccurate premise. I can only repeat that if, theoretically, we were to consider the seigniorage route, then we would make it amply and abundantly clear that the normal seigniorage would not be diverted to financing the Olympics or helping it to meet any deficit, if one occurs.

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASING CANADA'S CONTRIBUTION TO NATO—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the right hon. gentleman's statement in which he pledged to maintain a NATO force level which is accepted by our allies as being adequate in size and effective in character, when does he plan to increase Canada's contribution, since our allies in general, and U.S. Defence Secretary Schlesinger in particular, feel that Canada's contribution is inadequate?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be making a statement on the subject later. Perhaps the hon. member would prefer to hold his question until then. I will certainly deal with this and other aspects of the NATO meetings.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I have already read the right hon. gentleman's statement, and it does not answer the question I had in mind.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister has indicated that he proposes to make a statement later this day. The subject should surely rest until then.

CANADIAN EGG MARKETING AGENCY—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON SUPPLY-MANAGEMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Last Tuesday in response to my question the minister informed the House that he was to get a report late on Tuesday regarding the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency's attempt to get its supply-management program in proper order. Would the minister take time today to tell the House the general nature of the report he received last Tuesday?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I received the report on Friday. After discussing it with my officials and the National Farm Products Marketing Council, we decided to call a meeting of the provincial ministers and signatories as soon as possible to go over the final position of the proposed agreement.

Mr. Jarvis: A supplementary question. Is the minister telling the House today that despite the optimistic reports received by him earlier last month, the agency has unfortunately not solved this one aspect of its problem, that is, the supply-management aspect?

Mr. Whelan: No, Mr. Speaker. I think if I were to say any more about the agreement before it is signed it would be that I am very optimistic that they are getting their house in order even better than I thought they were, and better than a lot of hon. members were aware. They have the problem under better control than it was before it seems to me, but there are some areas that need to be discussed further. We feel we can do that more quickly by bringing them all to Ottawa and discussing it here.

Mr. Jarvis: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Last Tuesday in reply to a question from the hon. member for Vegreville the minister indicated that he would check his records to determine which provinces have not been able to bring their numbers of birds into line. Has the minister had an opportunity to check the records and is he in a position to tell the House which, if any, provinces have been unsuccessful in bringing their numbers into proper order?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I do not think any province has been unsuccessful. Some provinces have been more successful than others.

EFFECT OF FOREIGN COMPETITION ON MANUFACTURERS OF HOME ENTERTAINMENT PRODUCTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that RCA Limited plans to divest itself of two of its five Ontario manufacturing plants by no later than the end of this year, and that other manufacturers of home entertainment products such as Canada Cabinet and Furniture are also seriously suffering from competition from foreign manufacturers, will the minister consider reviewing the situation in the hope of finding a solution to this important problem?

Mr. Hees: Just tell him everything is fine the way you usually do. It is the cycle—the fault of the United States—the weather.

An hon. Member: Read the brochure.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may we have order. I can understand that the opposition would not be interested in the question; they did not ask it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: How about the one he asked on Thursday?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, there are some concerned people on our side who are interested in policies which will deal with real problems—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: —and who are not just interested in tomorrow's headlines.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I met with the representatives of that industry a short while ago with the hon. member present—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: So it is a set up question.

POSSIBILITY MR. TAN DOI NGUYEN SEEKING ENTRY TO CANADA—SUGGESTION BACKGROUND OF ALL VIETNAMESE REFUGEES BE CHECKED

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the report that a Mr. Tan Doi Nguyen, a former South Vietnamese banker was in Saigon jail as late as April 14 on charges of fraud and narcotics smuggling and now has reportedly reapplied or is seeking re-entry into Canada, has the minister conducted an investigation into this man's activities or can he assure the House that he will conduct such an investigation?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are looking into all these allegations. When we have a clear picture on any of them that are pertinent we will be glad to give the information to the hon. member.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary. In view of the reports that a Mr. Trang Shi Tan a former chief of the special branch of the Saigon police, among other top Saigon officials, wishes to seek entry into Canada and in view of the fact that a Mr. Cochrane who reportedly worked closely while in Saigon with the chief of covert CIA activities in Viet Nam, a Colonel Lonsdale, is now the United States consul in Montreal, I must ask the minister to consider conducting a thorough and public investigation into the backgrounds of all South Vietnamese who seek entry into Canada and who held sensitive government or business posts in Saigon before the last regime?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, we will take the necessary precautions to protect the national interest. I want to say, however, that the nature of refugee movements is such that we have to operate without the total formalities that we do in ordinarily checking admission to Canada of people who apply for resident status. That is the nature of the movement. We are doing our best to ensure that the national interest is protected but there are risks to be taken in every refugee movement. I know of none that we have been involved in since the Hungarian refugee movement which did not have some cases which gave us difficulty. It is a question of doing our best under these circumstances.

MANPOWER

UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO COUNTERACT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that the minister's recent statement indicated that this year would show one of the highest unemployment figures that we have seen, is he contemplating some imaginative steps to ensure that the vast numbers of people seeking jobs this year will be accommodated and will he be making an announcement in this regard?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated, as have some of my colleagues, that we are conscious of and concerned about the level of unemployment this country faces in light of general international economic problems. We are now looking at the various options open to us.

ALLEGED DISSATISFACTION WITH SERVICES OF MANPOWER CENTRES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): A supplementary question on the same theme, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the minister is aware of two recent surveys of the business community, one in Vancouver and one in Montreal. Some 60 per cent of firms surveyed in Montreal were not satisfied with the services of Manpower centres and some 49 per cent of the firms surveyed in Vancouver were not satisfied.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Question.

Mr. Alexander: I will get to the question, Joe. Is the minister going to look into these surveys and see to it that Manpower services are made to work? It is common knowledge that they are not working in terms of acquiring the jobs and the employees required by employers.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member is just as diligent in bringing forth for hon. members of the House the complimentary comments made about the service.

POSSIBLE IMPOSITION OF TAX ON IMPORTED ELECTRONIC COMPONENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance which is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Wellington. Representations were made in the House by the hon. member for Vancouver South on January 27 and February 6 and a letter was sent to the Minister of Finance on February 17 inquiring whether there would be any relief under the provisions of Bill C-172 of the twenty-ninth parliament that would allow electronic components to be taxed rather than coming into Canada dutyfree and thus save jobs in the RCA plants in Renfrew and Owen Sound. Has the minister, further to the reply of April 8 in which he indicated he was considering the matter, given it further consideration, and will he take action?

OVERPAYMENTS TO UGANDAN REFUGEES—SUGGESTED ACTION TO RECOVER

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. As $188,500 of the total of $824,000 paid to Ugandan refugees represents overpayments made because of misrepresentation or fraud, and as two of the recipients of the money were able to purchase a motel in British Columbia costing $127,000, will the minister conduct a ministerial or judicial inquiry to establish ways and means to ensure the recovery of such overpayment?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I believe that is standard procedure, but I will look into the matter.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I may have inadvertently misled the House in the sense that I said to the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth that the answer to his question on the order paper had been given. Actually, that answer is in course of preparation.

POSSIBILITY OF FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO GENERAL QUANG

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the Ugandan refugee payments were made under the Immigration Adjustment Assistance Program, can the minister inform this House if General Quang, who is also a refugee and about whom the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich asked questions last week, received any financial assistance under such a program?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer is that he has not.

TRIPS OF MR. RICHARD DICERNI AND MR. DANIEL COATES—INQUIRY AS TO MINISTER'S AUTHORIZATION

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, may I return to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who set the record straight? Since the question I asked did not appear directly on the order paper, those questions having taken three months to be answered, may I ask the minister directly if he authorized the expenditure of public funds for the extensive trips taken by the two members concerned on his personal staff?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, of course I have authorized trips taken by members of my staff, in the same way as every other minister in this House and of other governments has. The details will be available to the hon. member when the question is answered. I have not seen the answer myself yet.

POST OFFICE

REFERENCE TO EPIDEMIC OF MACKASEY 'FLU

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question could have been directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. However, to begin the week right, I will address it to the Postmaster General. It is about the recent epidemic of Mackasey 'flu which assumed its most virulent form in Montreal. Is it connected with tainted meat, how is it spread and what efforts are being made to provide immunity to the general public?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Greenwood.

[Mr. Andras.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REJECTION BY SOUTH AFRICA OF UNITED NATIONS' ORDER TO END ADMINISTRATION OF NAMIBIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the time limit given to South Africa by the Security Council of the United Nations to end the illegal administration of South West Africa, now known as Namibia, has expired with a rejection by South Africa, what action does the government of Canada contemplate in order to induce South Africa to respect and accept the decisions of the United Nations?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the question of Namibia and the United Nations deadline is still before the Security Council. Once the Security Council deals with the question of the deadline and with the question of mandatory sanctions, it will be possible for the government of Canada to take note of that situation. In the meantime, we cannot take much action because the matter is before the Security Council.

OPERATIONS OF FALCONBRIDGE NICKEL COMPANY IN NAMIBIA—SUGGESTED ACTION TO END TAX CONCESSIONS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As Falconbridge Nickel Company, or some of its subsidiaries, are continuing to operate under the illegal authority of the government of South Africa in Namibia, and as Canadian tax concessions are being made to those companies which are operating without the consent of the legal authority, the Commissioner of the United Nations, what steps is the Canadian government taking to end such tax concessions and to require such companies to desist from all activities in Namibia not legally authorized?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to advise the hon. member in detail on the matter of tax concessions. In general, a number of departments of the government of Canada have been giving attention to the question of Canadian companies operating in Namibia. Of course, there is no way under Canadian law by which the government can force any mode of conduct on business operations of Canadian subsidiaries in other countries. Furthermore, as the hon. member knows, it is a principle of government policy not to interfere in the operations of Canadian companies abroad.

In a more general way the Canadian government, of course, does not recognize the authority of South Africa over Namibia. We have recognized the authority of the United Nations Commissioner and we regard the present situation as illegal. Corporations or subsidiaries operating in Namibia do so at their own risk and initiative. If they should be subject to nationalization or confiscation in Namibia, the government position would obviously accord with the acknowledgement that they are operating on their own initiative and at their own risk.

POSSIBILITY OF PROTEST TO FRANCE OVER RESUMPTION OF NUCLEAR TESTING

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On May 26 I asked the Acting Prime Minister if the government of Canada plans to make a protest to the government of France over the resumption of nuclear testing. The Acting Prime Minister said he would make inquiries. Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell the House if the government will make a protest to the government of France against the resumption of nuclear testing.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at the recent NPT conference in Geneva, the position of the Canadian government was made known on all forms of nuclear testing. At present, no protest along the lines suggested has been made directly to the government of France.

Mr. Gillies: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the position of the government of Canada that the resumption of nuclear testing does not deserve a protest on its part?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the position of the government of Canada on this question has been made clear frequently, and just recently at the conference in Geneva. That is the position. Its importance is very great indeed.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION TO ADD REHABILITATION PROJECTS TO HOUSING PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Following the unanimous recommendation of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs to the effect that minister should consider adding rehabilitation projects to the recently announced veterans housing program, has the minister reached any decision in consultation with his counterparts and, if so, what is that decision?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the veterans housing program was announced just a short while ago. We feel it will be beneficial to community groups, which have made representations, and to individual veterans. As I told the committee, I will be looking into the requests hon. members presented to the Veterans Affairs Committee and I will do that as soon as possible.

● (1450)

Mr. Marshall: Since many veterans will be denied the advantage of maintaining or upgrading their homes under the rehabilitation clause of the National Housing Act because they live outside the areas the provinces will designate, would the minister think seriously about this matter so that thousands of veterans living on fixed incomes who cannot afford to bring their homes up to a reasonable standard may obtain the benefit of this provision?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, the answer is, yes. We shall certainly give them every consideration.

TRANSPORT

SUGGESTION GRAIN SHIPMENTS BE DIRECTED TO CHURCHILL RATHER THAN MONTREAL

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In the light of constant labour problems at the Port of Montreal, will the minister take the necessary measures to direct increasing grain shipments to the Port of Churchill, which is not strike-prone, so that grain shipments will not be constantly help up?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I believe the ship owners decide which ports to use.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT ACTION THROUGH INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS TO PROTECT WHALES

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that 15,000 Canadians showed their support for the Green Peace Foundation by attending the send-off last month in my constituency of the latest Green Peace ship, this one protesting the near extinction of whales, and in view of the fact that Canada says it has done everything in its power domestically to preserve the whale population, may I ask what action on a world community basis the government plans to take to stop whaling by other countries in order that the whale population may have a chance to regenerate?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I take note of the hon. members's question and I wish to inform him that Canada has been associating itself with international efforts to protect all species of whales. We have undertaken internationally to pursue this course along the lines of the representation made by the hon. member.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON ACTION TO ELIMINATE CLAUSE BOYCOTTING ISRAEL

Mr. Peter Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On May 8, the hon. gentleman stated in this House that the board of directors of the Export Development Corporation would be meeting the following week to consider its practices relating the EDC involvement with export companies which have agreed to boycott Israel. Will the minister tell us whether as a result of this meeting any firm policy was agreed upon and has he now issued a directive in writing covering this important matter?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The board did review its policies and confirmed that it will not negotiate any contract which involved direct lending with respect to agreements containing an Arab boycott clause; it would not insure any investment involving an Arab boycott clause and with respect to insurance policies it would not insure a boycott clause within such a policy. This position has been made known to me and I am considering it together with other questions at the present time.

Mr. Bawden: Can the minister give the House a complete assurance that he will be issuing directives in writing to his department and to the EDC so that there may be no question about the policies being followed?

Mr. Gillespie: I think the government as a whole will be considering this matter in the very near future. The view of the government will be communicated, of course, to all departments and to the Crown corporation.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SHORTAGE OF MASON JAR LIDS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs? It arises from the answer given by the hon. gentleman in reply to a question by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay with regard to wide-mouth Mason jar lids. I quote: "I may remind the hon. member that one of the reasons for such a shortage was a strike in the company manufacturing these products in British Columbia." In view of the fact that there are no manufacturers of wide-mouth Mason jar lids in British Columbia, I ask the minister what he is doing about this shortage which is just as acute now as it was last year. When does the government intend to take this problem seriously?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that he is quite new in this record because discussions have been going on for months between the officials of my department, Canadian manufacturers and American manufacturers in order to encourage them to increase their production to meet demand, particularly in British Columbia. Officials of my department met manufacturers of British Columbia just for this reason. We are constantly in contact with provincial authorities to ensure that, as far as possible, there are enough products to meet demand.

UNITED STATES QUOTAS ON BEEF—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ELIMINATE

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): A question for the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Speaker. What progress has the government been making in its attempts to have United States quotas on beef lifted? What progress has been made in working out a solution satisfactory to both sides to end this dispute?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I think some progress has been made, but the discussions have not yet been completed.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE HEARINGS—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THOSE OPPOSED TO PIPELINE WILL BE GIVEN HEARING

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources I have a question for the Prime Minister; it relates to the Mackenzie Valley pipeline application by Canadian Arctic Gas and by Foothills. Can the right hon. gentleman assure the House that participation in any public hearings or pre-hearings held by the National Energy Board will be open to groups which oppose the construction of the pipeline as well as to representatives of the pipeline companies?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Might I ask the parliamentary secretary to the minister to answer that question?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the public announcement of these hearings to be held by the Board this fall made it clear that all intervenors can make presentations.

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE HEARINGS—POSSIBILITY JUSTICE DEPARTMENT WILL PRESENT BRIEF ON PUBLIC INTEREST

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Perhaps I should direct this question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister tell us which government departments intend to intervene in the hearings and in particular can he confirm reports that the Department of Justice will be setting out for the benefit of the NEB the Canadian public interest as it is affected by the pipeline proposals?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I will take notice of the question and get the answer for the hon. member.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ALLEGEDLY CONFLICTING VIEWS OF CABINET MINISTERS ON WHETHER WAGE SETTLEMENTS EXCESSIVE—POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether anyone has brought to his attention the fact that while he was away, the Minister of Labour, speaking in the House last week, referred to "the prevailing myth that wage settlements are running at double the average rise in wages in the United States" and stated they were eroding our competitive advantage over the Americans. Since this directly contradicts what the Prime Minister said at the first ministers' conference in April and is directly contrary to what the Minister of Finance has been saying I wonder if the right hon. gentleman has been able to restore a consensus with regard to this matter in his government since his return.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have not been called upon to restore a consensus. I was under the impression, and I am sure it is a correct one, that both ministers are following the same policy. I will read the speech to which the Leader of the Opposition has referred and if there is anything I can add I will be pleased to do so.

Mr. Stanfield: If the Prime Minister thinks that both ministers are going in the same direction it is not much wonder the country is in trouble.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Is he prepared to state publicly in the House this afternoon his support for the position being taken by the Minister of Finance that current wage settlements threaten our competitive advantage over the Americans? Is the Prime Minister prepared to give his support to the position taken by the Minister of Finance or does he prefer to leave him dangling on a string?

Mr. Trudeau: I have said the same thing myself, so certainly I support the Minister of Finance. I am sure the Minister of Labour also supports him.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

An hon. Member: Why don't you read the speech?

Mr. Trudeau: If there are some doubts over there, why not ask the minister concerned—I am sure he supports the Minister of Finance. There may be some disagreement regarding statistics and that often happens, but the policy of the government on financial matters is as stated by the Minister of Finance.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FIRTH—ORAL QUESTION ASKED LAST FRIDAY, MAY 30

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have notice of some questions of privilege to deal with. I have notice, first, of what ought to be a brief question of privilege by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth.)

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege concerning my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) last Friday, as reported in Hansard at page 6276.

During the preamble to my second question I mentioned that certain models of television sets had been banned by the department because they were hazardous. Specifically, I mentioned the brand name Sony. Upon review of the matter I found that I was in error and that Sony products were not placed in the hazardous category. I would like at this time to apologize to the makers of Sony for suggesting they were marketing inferior products, and to the House for placing misleading information on the record.

There was a brand of television set available in northern stores long after it had been banned by the department. However, I will not confuse the issue further by mentioning the name.

MR. DIEFENBAKER—SPEECH OF PRIME MINISTER ON PRIVY COUNCIL ESTIMATES

Mr. Speaker: I have notice of two other questions of privilege. On May 27 the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) indicated, by way of certain preliminary remarks, his intention to raise a question of privilege and then to conclude his remarks and put whatever motion might be attached thereto at the first opportunity upon which the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was in the House. In addition, I have received further notice from the right hon. member for Prince Albert indicating his intention to do this today.

I have also received notice of a question of privilege from the right hon. Prime Minister concerning those remarks by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I do not anticipate an easy time sorting out the results of the remarks. Indeed, my difficulty is beginning already in regard to whom I should call on first. However, since the right hon. member for Prince Albert is in the course of his remarks and has indicated that he will continue and conclude them to the point of putting a motion, I think for the sake of neatness, although it is an exception not to call upon the Prime Minister, I should call upon the right hon. member for Prince Albert. As I say, his remarks were commenced at an earlier date and it is appropriate to conclude them and to move whatever motion the right hon. member might want on the record. Then, in turn, I will recognize the Prime Minister. However, I am open to discussion about the order of priority.

Mr. Hees: Seconds out of the ring. Hold on to your hats!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to deprive the House, nor myself, of the privilege of hearing from the right hon. gentleman, but I might make his remarks simpler if I say this. I am, of course, prepared to cede to him right away, but it might make some of his remarks shorter and simpler if I concede at the outset that I did make one mistake of fact. On the question of fish, there is no doubt that the right hon. gentleman was right and I was wrong, but that is as far as I am prepared to go. I do regret that I misled the House in regard to that erroneous statement, and I withdraw it without equivocation. As for the rest, I will gladly cede the floor to the right hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: That clears up the question of the stocking of Harrington Lake, I presume, so far as it pertains to a potential question of privilege. However, it seems to me to leave in the balance a number of other questions that were raised by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I wonder whether the right hon. member for Prince Albert would want to continue and to conclude his remarks now and put whatever motion he has in mind, following which I propose to recognize the right hon. Prime Minister either in reply to those remarks, or alternatively—or perhaps in addition—allow him to put whatever question of privilege the right hon. Prime Minister wishes to put before the House.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, it is never too late to admit that one was wrong. I accept wholeheartedly the withdrawal of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the suggestion concerning fish.

Mr. Nowlan: He was fishing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to refer, however, to words that he used in the House concerning the fish. As recorded at page 6010 of Hansard, the Prime Minister said:

> The right hon. gentleman for Prince Albert liked fishing and had Harrington Lake stocked at public expense with fish for his enjoyment.

Then he went on to say:

> That was a shameful incident.

Mr. Trudeau: Read the interjection there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In the dictionary "shameful" means, in effect, disgraceful; subject to shame on the part of the person who committed the wrong; unworthy of consideration in any organization that has regard to truth and honour.

In face of that, I should have liked to hear a withdrawal of the word "shameful", which after all is the essence. Webster's dictionary makes its meaning clear: "conduct that brings to shame; disgraceful, scandalous conduct; injurious conduct that dishonours and offends decency; ignominious conduct". This was the word used by the Prime Minister to describe what he now admits had no basis in fact, and which certainly could not have justified use of that expression.

Some hon. Members: Shameful!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I go on from there, Mr. Speaker. Loose statements are sometimes made in this House in the course of debate and under provocation. Spontaneity ameliorates, if not excuses, a retort that is not fact if it is provoked in debate. But such was not the case with the speech delivered by the Prime Minister on the twenty-second day of this month: it was planned, programmed and premeditated. I am told that he read from a script which he had entirely before him.

He stated during the course of his speech that he has a staff that is honourable, responsible and objective. I know many of the members of that staff and I entirely concur with the Prime Minister's view. It is of interest that since the speech of the Prime Minister the press got in touch with the high officials of his office, or his two offices, and everyone with one accord has said, "I had nothing to do with it; it was somebody else". When the Prime Minister is replying, I wonder whether he would advise who was the inspiration for the various statements that he made which apparently were designed to be a smokescreen.

Certain arrangements had been made between the opposition and the government. Under normal circumstances, on that afternoon the opposition would have led off but arrangements were made whereby, because the Prime Minister was going to leave, he should speak first.

Some hon. Members: That is not so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If some of the interrupters over there continue, Mr. Speaker, I will have to tell them what the Prime Minister thinks of them. He said of many of the Liberal members that they were bums and nobodies.

● (1510)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: He was right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would not want those hon. gentlemen opposite to prove he was right in that regard. I am informed that the arrangement was made and there was no declaration that the Prime Minister should be restricted to 15 minutes. That is true because he had longer than that; but do not let anybody tell me that what he did was not done with the intent to deprive members of the opposition of the opportunity of questioning him—speaking for an hour and a half, on and on he went.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not like to interrupt the right hon. gentleman but, with respect, I would suggest his question of privilege pertains to the Prime Minister's remarks about him specifically and not so much about the Prime Minister's use of time, and I think the hon. member should confine himself to the earlier question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When the Prime Minister referred to a member of the opposition as fraudulent, apparently the person who occupied your position did not think that was unparliamentary. The Prime Minister made that statement with that disregard he has shown for parliament all through the years. I had expected that we were past the days when those in the opposition should be spoken of in that way. I had thought that we were past the days when the Prime Minister of Canada would speak to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), who asked a question, by saying, "What is your God damned question anyway?" That is recorded in Hansard, unchanged and unexpurgated. I had expected that we were past the situation in which opposition members were treated in that way.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The matter before you is one that concerns the integrity of parliament and the House of Commons. It is one that cannot be justified. I had hoped the Prime Minister would have followed the course he did six years ago when one morning he made a statement that there was no foundation at all for a question I asked concerning a letter, and that afternoon he rose and apologized and said he wished he had taken the admonition of the right hon. member for Prince Albert before denying the existence of the letter. He apologized to the House of Commons and to me. Has he forgotten that?

That would indicate exactly the point I am making. The Prime Minister, by tilting his head just now, has indicated that he has forgotten that, and that is the point I make. He has forgotten so many of the things that constitute parliament and for which parliament stands, and I am not at all surprised that he has forgotten the incident in question.

Parliament demands, on the part of all of us, the assurance that when a statement is made as a fact, it shall be true, unchangeable, and the consequences to follow that statement are the basis of all parliamentary argument. That is the essence of parliament. We do not hold the views of Machiavelli. He did not understand our system because, after all, the British parliamentary system was just being built in those days. He said:

> And a prince will never lack good excuses to colour his bad faith. One could give innumerable modern instances of this, showing how many pacts and promises have been made null and void by the bad faith of princes: those who have known best how to imitate the fox have come off best. But one must know how to colour one's actions and to be a great liar and deceiver. Men are so simple, and so much creatures of circumstance, that the deceiver will always find someone ready to be deceived.

That is not the parliamentary system. That is the idea of a dictatorship in which the dictator speaks. Throughout the years I have formed an admiration for the Prime Minister in many respects but I have never included veracity. I have had an admiration for his adroitness and his parliamentary—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would like some of those whom the Prime Minister calls non-entities to let us know who they are so they will appear in Hansard.

An hon. Member: Stand up, Joe.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I am one of them.

An hon. Member: That's the first one.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to repeat what I said, for the benefit of the right hon. gentleman. I said, and I quote, "I can take a joke", and that is the end of the quotation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman proves the truth of his own statement whenever he speaks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): This is a real farce.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have restricted my statements in regard to the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) because of the high esteem in which I have always held him.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Thank you.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Returning once again to the circumstances under which these statements were made by the Prime Minister, let me say they were made with utter disregard for the rights of parliament. That speech was intended to be delivered so that no one could answer it. When it was suggested that the opposition should speak first, the Leader of the Opposition, with his characteristic desire to live true to the parliamentary forum, took the stand, which was represented by a member of the opposition who discussed the matter with the House leader, that the Prime Minister should have the first opportunity.

I am not going over the facts, as I dealt with those at length on May 22. I do not know who misled the Prime Minister, but when I have regard for the facts, he seemed so anxious not to have Mr. Pitfield called before the committee or give evidence that I can only conclude that those two men sat down together and asked, "What can we say? What stories can we tell? How can we fill the hour and a half in order to prevent the opposition from speaking?" Under no circumstances would I have Mr. Pitfield give evidence concerning his position as Clerk of the Privy Council.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: For once we are in agreement. What I do object to is that this person is almost in the position of a Damon and Pythias relationship with the Prime Minister. His own staff did not produce this conglomeration of half-truths; it required somebody other than his staff to have brought forth this monstrosity.

● (1520)

I have already dealt with these various items. I shall not repeat what I said. To me they represent an endeavour to destroy a member of this House in respect of his credibility by spreading around, through the mouth of the Prime Minister, allegations that are not true. That is not parliament. The example of that is in the Profumo case. Profumo told parliament he had never been involved with the woman in question. That was not true. It was not because of his extramural activities that he was removed from office. I would have thought the Prime Minister would have kept in mind the case of Profumo and would have realized that to make statements that have no basis or inference in fact constitutes a degradation of the House of Commons and therefore represent a breach of privilege.

There are many works on this subject. Your Honour has them and I shall not quote the various items. I would refer, however, to Wilding and Laundy's "An Encyclopaedia of Parliament," where at page 597 it states that the rules——are concerned only with the protection of the reputation, the character and the good name of the House itself. It is in that respect only and for that limited purpose that they are concerned with imputations against the conduct of individual members.

That, I believe, is the general principle. There is no case in which a libellous statement made against a member of this House or of the British House of Commons has been treated other than as one of privilege, with the opportunity being given for the matter to be fully looked into by a committee of the House of Commons.

These were not loose statements made in the course of debate when one is agitated by the excitement of the debate; nor were they made in consequence of interruption and the like. Those statements were made when a man representing Her Majesty the Queen as First Minister stood up in the House of Commons and made such statements as the Prime Minister did. He is no greater and has no more authority and no more rights than any other member in this House of Commons. That is the essential fact. This is something he apparently has not learned.

Sir, at page 98 of Beauchesne's fourth edition these few words epitomize the conclusions arrived at:

—to constitute a breach of privilege they must concern the character or conduct of members—

It goes on to say, in their various capacities. What did the Prime Minister say? I do not want to requote what I have already placed before the House. The statements he made in connection with Harrington Lake have been construed by him as being true. He described it as the greatest land grab in history. A land grab does not mean the taking over of land by way of rental or otherwise. He referred to 4,800 acres. When he made that statement it was not true, because the only portion that was taken over was some 14 acres.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Only!

Mr. Diefenbaker: These hon. gentlemen will qualify ultimately for the view of the Prime Minister if I have to identify them.

That is the answer given by the National Capital Commission. When the prime minister took over, he took over everything out there. That is the situation which prevails. He left the impression, by the words he used, that I had in fact committed a wrong, that I had engaged in a land grab.

I do not have to deal with the other matter, the question of the so-called bomb-shelter. That was supposed to offset, I presume, the wasteful expenditures, the wanton expenditures of the government in purchasing two cars—dreadnoughts, I call them. What did the Prime Minister do? I have the figures from the department concerning the cost of the bomb-shelter, but lately I have found that the Prime Minister has lowered the roof by a couple of feet. I do not know what the purpose was.

An hon. Member: For a wine cellar.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would remind the Prime Minister of another circumstance which causes me more concern than anything mentioned heretofore. He referred to the most secret place in Canada. It is on the classified list. It has never been removed from that list during the term of three prime ministers. Two and a half years ago the security committee was asked to remove it from the list of things that cannot be given publicity, but this was not done.

Nothing is more serious than for a prime minister or anyone else, or the Privy Council to reveal a situation concerning a highly secret defence installation, as he did the other day. I will not refer to where it is. I will not join with the Prime Minister in identifying something in respect of which he committed an offence against the security of our country. He referred to a matter that has never been freed from its secrecy. He did this the other day in order to show how wasteful the expenditures on my part were in the few hundreds of dollars expended by the Department of Public Works to provide a shelter which was not asked for under any circumstances.

He tried, so far as the shelter is concerned, to compare it with the wanton expenditure around Sussex Street at the Prime Minister's home never before equalled in history. He compared an expenditure of a few hundred dollars with his pool.

Mr. Trudeau: That was a gift.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When he speaks, I will be glad to hear from him. Who were the philanthropists who made possible that pool and were so desirous of helping the country that they first got in touch with the Department of National Revenue to find out whether or not they could deduct whatever the expenditure was in the determination of their income tax? That would be something for him to reveal today. Why does he hide it?

I mentioned all the cases the other day. I pointed out that they do constitute an interference in the rights and privileges of members of the House. A while ago the Prime Minister indicated to me that he did not recall the time when he apologized because, after all, he does not have a very good memory. When you can forget your age, you can forget almost anything.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Here is the item. On November 28, 1969, the right hon. Prime Minister said:

Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a question of privilege. In reply to questions asked of me this morning by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), asking if I had received a letter from Mr. Saulnier with respect to the activities of the Company of Young Canadians, I replied in the negative. Notwithstanding the admonition of the right hon. gentleman that memories can be faulty, I nevertheless insisted that I knew of no such letter. I added, however, that "if there were such a letter, I would not hide it". Mr. Speaker, I should have heeded the wise counsel of the right hon. gentleman. On examination of my files I find that Mr. Saulnier did indeed write to me on March 17 of this year on this subject. I wish to apologize through you, Mr. Speaker, to the House and to the right hon. member for my erroneous reply. I have taken this earliest opportunity of correcting the record.

All I say to the Prime Minister now is this: Live up to what you did on November 28, 1969, and apologize to the House for a speech which as long as you live will constitute for you something that did not destroy my reputation. The right hon. member will not be able to say the same thing for himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I therefore move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition:

That the slanderous and libellous allegations made by the Prime Minister in a speech made in the committee of the whole House on Thursday, May 22, 1975, against the right hon. member for Prince Albert, particularly the false statements regarding expenditure of public funds alleged to have been made while the said member was the Prime Minister of Canada, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that the said committee be authorized to summon the right hon. Prime Minister as a witness.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the motion of the right hon. member for Prince Albert. Of course, I will want to consider the matter very carefully and take it into account in coming to a decision. The Prime Minister has already stated his intention to the Chair to raise a question of privilege, or alternatively the floor is open to him for his remarks in reply to the comments of the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the point of privilege I had to raise was raised in a few seconds at the outset and I will not speak any more on my question of privilege. But if you will allow me, I will respond to the one brought up by the right hon. gentleman, particularly because he has followed it with a motion which I believe you, sir, will have to judge and you will have to decide whether there is a prima facie question of privilege.

I will not refer in any detail to the rules, but I will point out that in my speech of May 22 I did make one mistake of fact which I have corrected today. I have withdrawn the error contained in that statement. Beyond that, I would merely want to say that I am prepared to live by the rest of my statement. Undoubtedly there was some rhetoric in some of the expressions I used. I would say that this is a sin that I share with the right hon. gentleman opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: But in regard to the case that I was putting before the House—in response, I emphasize, to a statement the right hon. gentleman made on April 30—the facts and the case I put before the House I am prepared, if you should so decide, to argue in front of whatever committee the House decides would want to hear me on this matter.

However, there are a few errors of fact the right hon. gentleman made this afternoon which I would like to set right so that we can go to the committee, if that is necessary, with a clear record. I will not refer to the errors of fact he made in his April 30 speech. There was certainly at least one error of fact, and perhaps a half-truth. Nor will I refer to the errors he made in his speech on May 27 when I was away. There were at least two errors and, I would say, two half-truths. I just mention them now so as to reserve my right to put these errors on the record if the House decides that it wants to pursue this matter in any greater detail.

In my speech I emphasized on several occasions that I found the whole matter rather petty, that I was attempting to respond to the accusations that had been made by the right hon. gentleman and other people at a level which I did not think is very germane to the conduct of the country. But, once again, if a debate is to ensue on that, I want to reserve my position perhaps to enumerate a few mistakes that the right hon. gentleman has made even this afternoon.

However, before doing so, I understand that the right hon. gentleman is alleging more than an error in fact. He is alleging that there is a question of privilege. I do not know in what way his privilege as a member of the House has been affected, except perhaps, as he alleged, in the word "shameful". If you, sir, judge that that word is non-parliamentary, I will tell you in advance that I will withdraw that statement. But I hasten to add that you will have a lot of work, because I have heard the word "shameful" at least 100 times—and that is a guess—shouted across the House or contained in speeches on many occasions. I would cite just one occasion: it is in the very text that the right hon. member just read. He said he skipped a line when he read it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is another of those statements that is not true.

Mr. Trudeau: He read from page 6010 of Hansard where I had said the right hon. gentleman had Harrington Lake stocked at public expense with fish for his enjoyment. Then he went on to quote me as saying that that was a shameful incident. Before I said that, some hon. member shouted "Shame!". I am quite certain, although I could not prove it, that the word "shame" came from the other side at that point and was obviously directed at the fact that I was making such a petty point. That is why I went on to say:

That was a shameful incident. It is, I repeat, a petty point; unfortunately it was brought out in the speech of the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

That is the only case that I would see for a question of privilege. The rest is made up of exaggerations, statements with some rhetorical emphasis, in his speeches as well as in mine. But on the basic case, I do not think it would be in the best of taste to repeat it here—

An hon. Member: Fuddle-duddle.

Mr. Trudeau: —but I will gladly do so if hon. members are interested. I would prefer to just enumerate a few of the mistakes he has made this afternoon. He said my statements were unprovoked. I just say that they were in answer not only to his own speech made on April, 30, to which I addressed myself directly, but to constant interruptions from the other side. So that is obviously getting off to a false start. He then indicated, and I noted his words, that I read entirely from a script before me. This is not true.

● (1540)

An hon. Member: Pretty close.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is this a spontaneous falsehood?

Mr. Trudeau: The right hon. gentleman asks, "Is this a spontaneous falsehood?" He is admitting he is making a mistake about my reading.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: If he wants to be gracious and say that he made a mistake in fact, then I will sit down now. The hon. member is shaking his head.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There was no mistake.

Mr. Trudeau: It is an erroneous statement to say that I read entirely from a script. It is true that in the last minutes of my speech I did read from a script, and hon. members opposite will remember that I galloped through it; but the whole of the first part was not read at all. There were a few notes I had gathered, not sentences. The right hon. member wanted to attack Mr. Pitfield, and I would say in a most disgraceful way for a former prime minister.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr.Trudeau: The former prime minister talked about the rights of parliament. He should have learned that civil servants have rights too, and that they should not be attacked.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I didn't. I simply said that he was your Damon or your Pythias.

Mr. Trudeau: The right hon. gentleman said that Mr. Pitfield had obviously inspired me to say these things. Nothing could be further from the fact. The things I had to say about the right hon. gentleman I thought up myself, and I still believe them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I say that because of the one error I did make. I want to made clear that it was my own, that I am responsible for it and that no one on my staff or anywhere in the government inspired me to make that mistake. The right hon. gentleman went on to say that I had broken an arrangement, presumably by speaking first—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That statement was never made by me.

Mr. Trudeau: —or by speaking too long.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You were allowed to speak first, out of courtesy because the Leader of the Opposition felt that as Prime Minister you should go first.

Mr. Trudeau: The right hon. gentleman says that statement was never made by him. Let me read, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): He doesn't remember.

Mr. Trudeau: —from Hansard of May 27, page 6152:

MR. DIEFENBAKER: On Thursday last it was understood between the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the government, in respect of the debate that was to take place, that 15 minutes would be allotted. The Prime Minister asked to go first.

Mr. Sharp: That is not true.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Trudeau: Not only is it not true, but a few minutes ago he said that he had never even made the statement I just read.

Mr. Goyer: Apologize.

Mr. Trudeau: The right hon. gentleman chides me because I do not remember things that happened 55 or 56 years ago, but he cannot remember what happened last week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not forget my age, though.

Mr. Trudeau: It is entirely wrong, therefore, to say that an arrangement was broken by me, as he said. There was no arrangement. The truth is that I, through the House leader, made it clear to the opposition that I preferred not to speak first because I wanted to know what they were going to attack me on or question me about. That is why at the outset of my speech I made it clear to the House that since they wanted me to speak first, since they were not taking that privilege, and since I did not know what they were going to ask, that is the reason I dealt with certain serious matters and some which were not serious and of a petty nature which were constantly brought up by hon. members opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: But where the matter becomes serious is, after alleging that I broke an arrangement, the right hon. gentleman said that it was with the intent of preventing the opposition from either speaking or taking time. I believe that in parliamentary language this is called imputing motives, and I raise my own question of privilege at this time. I would ask the right hon. gentleman to withdraw that statement in which he imputed to me the motive of trying to prevent the opposition from speaking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It is as a result of innumerable interruptions and points of order such as we saw when I was speaking that I did speak a great deal, and it is because I had no text in front of me that I was fairly lengthy in my speech and decided to stay on another 35 minutes beyond the time I said I would leave. I did not hear one single question during that time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: So, Mr. Speaker, I register with you this question of privilege and I ask the right hon. gentleman to withdraw this imputation of motives against me.

To go on, the right hon. gentleman then said that I said an hon. member was fraudulent. I did not say that. I said that an hon. gentleman had made fraudulent use of statistics and I hoped that it was not intentional. Even when he could have read last week's Hansard and even on a question of fact the right hon. gentleman cannot get the facts right, yet he complains that I made one mistake.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: With regard to Machiavelli, I am pleased that I at least forced the right hon. gentleman to read some of the classics. I think it would do him good if he read a bit more of Machiavelli and a bit less of Baron Munchausen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The remainder has to do with Harrington Lake and the bomb-shelter. I might say something about lowering the roof. This is the first I have heard of that. I do not know where he obtained this information. I am quite sure it is erroneous too, but I will check into whether the roof of the bomb-shelter was lowered. That sounds like another pure invention; but he may have heard of it, much as I heard about the fish, from people who talk too much. The advantage of making an accusation is that we are permitted to set the record straight. I certainly understand now why the right hon. gentleman was such a poor fisherman, when he did not have the number of fish I thought he had in the lake.

On the question of Carp, there may be another privilege involved; I am not sure. All I can say is that all I know about Carp—and I am not talking about fish; I am talking about the underground complex, or whatever it is—is what I read in Weekend magazine several months or years ago.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is where you get your information, is it?

Mr. Trudeau: The right hon. gentleman is chiding me for having obtained my information there, yet a moment ago he was saying that I was breaching security for saying something which was an official secret.

An hon. Member: Shameful!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I will stand by whatever decision you make. I do not mind going before a committee if it is necessary to carry this on. I am a little disappointed because I had been told that the right hon. gentleman had made a very forceful intervention last week and that he was pretty entertaining. I regret that I did not have the benefit of that. I must say that I am prepared to consider this whole matter as a humorous interlude. If the right hon. gentleman wants to make more of it, sir, I am in your hands.

● (1550)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I might indicate that, as is my usual practice, I would reserve judgment on the question of privilege. I see the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) both seeking the floor. The floor is, of course, open for discussion of the question of privilege, and I would recognize them and other hon. members who want to participate.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make this very brief intervention. Some of the comments made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) this afternoon would provoke a more restrained person than myself to reply. I would simply say, with regard to the understanding, that it was clearly understood that our position was that if the Prime Minister wished to go first, he was entitled to do so.

Mr. Sharp: Not his wish, no; that is not true.

Mr. Stanfield: There was no request, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister should go first. As to the matter of going on for an hour and 20 minutes, I do not rise to impute motives. I do not think there is any need for anybody who was present to impute any motives at all. The fact that the Prime Minister went on for an hour and 20 minutes in those circumstances speaks for itself, I think.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I wish to say one or two things about the question of privilege raised by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). The Prime Minister seemed to approach this question this afternoon as if it were a question of mistaken fact. He seemed to think that he had in fact terminated the whole question by admitting that he had made a mistake of fact. I was here in the House, Mr. Speaker; I heard the Prime Minister; I have read Hansard since then, and I rise to support the motion. It seems to me very clear, and I submit this to you, that the Prime Minister was reflecting upon the conduct of the right hon. member for Prince Albert when he was prime minister; that the Prime Minister was not only inferring, but stating, that the former prime minister, the right hon. member for Prince Albert, had taken advantage of his office for his own personal benefit.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what he meant.

Mr. Stanfield: That, Mr. Speaker, is the essence of the first two paragraphs or so on page 6010 when the Prime Minister discussed the land grab. He said the former prime minister, the right hon. member for Prince Albert, "was adding thousands of acres of land for his private enjoyment".

Mr. Trudeau: We will take it in committee if you want.

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister says we will take it to committee. The Prime Minister never withdrew that, Mr. Speaker. I am not sure what he meant this afternoon when he said that nobody else thought those things up for him and he thought them up himself.

Quite apart from that, I suggest it is very clear to anybody who heard the Prime Minister, or to anybody who reads Hansard, that this is not a question that can be straightened out simply by the Prime Minister rising in his place and admitting he made a mistake in fact, because the point the Prime Minister was trying to make was that by adding thousands of acres for his own private enjoyment and taking part in the biggest land grab—I think he said in Canadian history as far as a private citizen of Canada is concerned—the Prime Minister of Canada was accusing the right hon. member for Prince Albert of having taken advantage of the office for his own private gain and his own private purposes.

I think that is clearly a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. If the statement were made against me, I would expect that the Prime Minister would stand in his place and apologize if there were any such inference. But he cannot, with all due respect, Mr. Speaker, ask us and the people of Canada to forget about this whole thing by rising and saying this afternoon that he just made a simple mistake of fact on one matter.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, like the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), I believe this matter can be dealt with briefly. I also believe that the issue can be narrowed and made quite clear.

The first point I should like to make is that there does seem to be one area of common ground between the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). The right hon. member for Prince Albert has proposed a motion which would refer this matter to one of the standing committees. The Prime Minister says that he would be quite happy to see it go to a standing committee and to appear before it. I see Your Honour shaking your head; I think I know what that means. The fact that these two gentlemen agree to do that does not necessarily make it a question of privilege in parliamentary terms, but at least I think it simplifies the problem Your Honour has to face.

Let me move on and say that I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that what is before us is not just a dispute over facts. If that is all it is, Your Honour could say that is not a question of privilege; that goes on here every day, every hour—disputes over facts. What, it seems to me, is at stake is whether the Prime Minister, in what he said, damaged or sought to damage the reputation of the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friends over there can get into this debate if they like, but I suggest they do so by taking the floor. I draw Your Honour's attention to citation 108(3) on page 98 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which reads:

> Libels on members have also been constantly punished: but to constitute a breach of privilege they must concern the character or conduct of members in that capacity, and the libel must be based on matters arising in the actual transaction of the business of the House.

I thought I had better look into the Oxford English dictionary that is on the table for a definition of "libel". It is very clear; it is "a statement damaging to a person's reputation". I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the statement which the Leader of the Opposition has just quoted and which I should like to quote again is, if it is true, damaging to the reputation of the right hon. member for Prince Albert. The statement is in the paragraph near the top of the second column on page 6010 of Hansard for Thursday, May 22. It is in the paragraph in which the Prime Minister was talking about the alleged land grab at Harrington Lake, and he used these key words:

> He was adding thousands of acres of land for his private enjoyment.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this is not just a dispute over facts; this is an allegation that the right hon. member for Prince Albert, when he was prime minister, used his position as prime minister to do something for his private enjoyment, and of course if this had been done it was at considerable public expense.

The Prime Minister today has withdrawn the charges about the stocking of Harrington Lake with fish and he has withdrawn the use of the word "shameful", but the sentence which he uttered after he had made both the charges is still there, for he said:

> —the facts are as I have stated them, Mr. Chairman.

In other words, the Prime Minister stands by his assertion that the right hon. member for Prince Albert did add thousands of acres of land to the property at Harrington Lake and that he did this for his private enjoyment. I say again, it is not a dispute over facts; that would not constitute a question of privilege in the parliamentary sense. But a statement made by the Prime Minister of Canada that a former prime minister used his position to add to his private enjoyment at public expense has the effect—at least it would have the effect, if it were true—of damaging the character of the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

It is for this reason that I believe the matter should go before a committee, so that the Prime Minister and the right hon. member for Prince Albert can appear before that committee and get to the bottom of the facts, but more important, so that they can get to a position where the reputation of the right hon. member for Prince Albert is either left the way it is on the record, or cleared.

● (1600)

As I say, sir, I take very strongly the position that in essence we are not dealing with an argument over facts. We do that all the time and we frequently correct ourselves and correct each other. But in this instance we are dealing with a statement which, in the terms of the citation I read, is damaging to the character of a member of this House. I submit that that has the elements of a question of privilege. I hope, when you have considered the entire matter, that you will come to the position of putting the question to the House so that the matter can be voted on and sent to the appropriate standing committee.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, may I set the record straight about the arrangements which were made for the debate. As I recall my conversation with the House leader of the official opposition, I said that we were facing a situation which was almost without precedent, as it had been a long time since a prime minister had been called before the committee of the whole on his estimates, and we had to agree upon a procedure. I said the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would prefer to speak second, but, of course, he would be prepared to speak first if that was agreed upon. After some consultations, the House leader of the official opposition came back and said, "We think the Prime Minister should speak first. He is the Prime Minister." So this was the arrangement as I understood it. These comments are irrelevant to the question of privilege but are made to set the record straight.

Speaking on the question of privilege, I suggest that one has to look at the context in which the Prime Minister made his speech. He was under attack. It had been suggested that the Prime Minister had spent money for his private enjoyment as Prime Minister of Canada. This was the charge which had been made by the other side. It had been suggested, for example, that repairs to the Prime Minister's house were made for his private enjoyment as Prime Minister. Those were the kinds of statements which were made across the floor of the House. Surely, in these circumstances, the Prime Minister should be given the privilege of pointing out that when the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was prime minister, improvements were made which resulted in his private enjoyment while he occupied the position of prime minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not what he said.

Mr. Sharp: Therefore, I think this is a spurious point and I am surprised at the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for supporting it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the minister permit a question? Does it not make a difference as to whether the charges are true or—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rising on a point of order?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) who expressed amazement at the stand I had taken. He asked if it was not proper for that side to accuse this side of spending money, in the same way as this side accused that side. I know that the matter is equal between the two sides if it is true that the right hon. member for Prince Albert spent the money that way; but if it is not true, surely that makes a difference.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can explain, because I know the facts. The truth is the same for the right hon. gentleman and for myself. When we talk about private enjoyment, when we talk about thousands of acres and about using that space, he did it and I did it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not do it.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's Residence Act sets aside 17 acres. I'll bet you the right hon. gentleman used the lake, too. I'll bet you he went fishing in that lake. This is outside the 17 acres.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Childish!

Mr. Trudeau: The right hon. gentleman says it is childish. I quoted him—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the Prime Minister to be given the opportunity for a second speech?

Mr. Trudeau: I am answering a question. The truth embarrasses you.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked a question and the Prime Minister has been recognized solely for the purpose of answering.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I repeat, if he enjoyed the lake, so did I; and I said in my speech that I thought it was a good thing that this had been added for the enjoyment of the prime minister. The right hon. gentleman said that he only used 17 acres. I quoted him talking about me, Trudeau, when he said, "He took over everything over there".

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is exactly what happened. That is exactly what the National Capital Commission said.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I used the lake and he used the lake. The truth is the same on both sides. In the one case was I using it for my private enjoyment, and in the other was he using it while prime minister? I submit that both men, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the right hon. gentleman for Prince Albert, are preposterous.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Childish!

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I do not think much turns on the arrangements. Without question, the government House leader and I discussed whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) should speak first or not. When the government House leader telephoned me in the morning after the cabinet meeting, that was my first official notification that the Prime Minister would not be present in the House for the full day. In those circumstances, after consulting my colleagues I agreed that the right hon. gentleman should go first. But there was a clear understanding that the Prime Minister would make a statement which would not be lengthy and that he would hold himself ready for questioning. But that is beside the point and I will not press it.

I want to respond to what the government House leader said about the words that were used by the right hon. gentleman. This was not a case of the Prime Minister coming here during the heat of debate and responding to something which the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) had raised in debate. What was said by the right hon. member for Prince Albert had been said three weeks earlier, so this was not a case of statements being made in the heat of debate; it was a case of the Prime Minister's deliberately—

Mr. Stanfield: And premeditatedly.

Mr. Baldwin: —and premeditatedly saying something. There is no question about it; he did it in a considered way. He came here on May 22 and made those statements. He cannot be excused on the grounds that he made those statements in the heat of debate. There is a clear distinction to be made. This was, in my opinion—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): That is your opinion, not everybody's opinion.

Mr. Baldwin: —a cold, considered slander. We who sat here heard it. There was more than an innuendo contained in those remarks. They were a reflection upon the character of the right hon. member for Prince Albert in his discharging of functions as prime minister of the country.

It was a slander upon him and we so understood it on my side. If I misjudged the Prime Minister, if he did not so consider it, or if he did not intend his statements to be regarded in that light, he has the opportunity now to get up and say so.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise with some hesitation, not being a member of the front benches.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): It might take you a long time to get there.

Mr. Dick: Like you, Joe, after many years I might not make it. I have listened for over one hour to speeches made on this question of privilege. I have heard much rhetoric and many allegations, many of them provocative. I have seen a lot of smiling and a lot of people thinking they are cute, and we have taken up one hour and ten minutes of the time of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dick: I think this matter might best be clarified in committee. After all, we cannot brush it under the carpet, because not only must justice be done; it must appear to be done.

An hon. Member: What a cliché.

Mr. Dick: It may be a cliché, but it has been around for a long time because there is a great deal of truth to it. Instead of spending time on counteracting and conflicting statements, I suggest that we should send this matter to committee. Let us send it out of the House to the committee to be appropriately dealt with.

● (1610)

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I can conclude the intervention on this very interesting point by saying that for the first time I can fully understand why last fall I resisted when I was called to this chair. I shall reserve my ruling on the question of privilege and try to arrive at a judgment on it by tomorrow or not later than the next day.

[Translation]

REFERENCE TO MOTION CONCERNING ISSUE OF COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a question of privilege.

At the beginning of the sitting, I submitted a motion under Standing Order 43 requiring the unanimous consent of the House. Since the motion involved no political partisanship likely to lead to controversy, I was unpleasantly surprised that it was not unanimously accepted. Would the reason for it be that the motion was in memory of a French-speaking Canadian? I do not know. Yet it was simply a question for the House of honoring one of its former servants who, in addition, was the founder of an extremely important cooperative movement in Canada and to hope that his work would continue to prosper throughout Canada.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to the House the utmost importance of Standing Order 28. If the Standing Orders were taken more seriously, we would not have to submit to a unanimous refusal on such important questions, without the member who has risen to oppose the motion being recognized by the Chair and identified in Hansard, as was the case today, on a motion of national interest. Let us beware that such a habit of systematically refusing unanimous approval lead not one day to difficult and regretful situations. The public is always entitled to know the name of a member who submits or opposes a motion.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for rising on a very important question of privilege. I am sure he understands very well that the problem is not the adoption of the motion under Standing Order 43, but simply the unanimous consent to put the motion. In any case, each time, this afternoon, as usual, I have heard not only one voice, but several voices say no, although I am not certain whether there were English of French voices, and pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, it is completely impossible not only to ask for the adoption of the motion, but even to put the motion before the House.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT ON NATO SUMMIT MEETING

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish briefly to report to the House on the Nato summit meeting recently concluded in Brussels. This was only the third meeting of the Nato council conducted at a head of government level in the 26 years in which this organization has been in existence. Hon. members will recall that a brief summit session took place last year following the very successful twenty-fifth anniversary foreign ministers' meeting here in Ottawa. The Ottawa meeting produced the Ottawa Declaration. This declaration was signed by heads of government in Brussels a few days later. Because of competing events here in Canada which will be well remembered by all who engaged in them, and which culminated on July 8 of last year, I was unable to travel to Brussels for that signature occasion.

The council meeting this year took place on Thursday and Friday of last week and was attented by the heads of government of 14 of the 15 member countries. The occasion was a useful one, for it permitted heads of government to be briefed on the current political situation in Europe as well as on the state of military preparedness of NATO. The speeches to the council made by some of the heads of government were released to the press and are therefore familiar to hon. members. The communiqué reflecting the proceedings has also been made public, and I should like to take this opportunity to table a copy of it in each of the official languages.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Trudeau: This meeting, Mr. Speaker, gave me an opportunity to emphasize to our NATO allies that it is in the interest of the alliance and in the interest of Canadians that our political adherence to NATO remain firm and that our military contribution remain effective. By effective, I mean both cost-effective and military-effective. The purpose of the defence structure review is to ensure that those goals are met. I may say that the contribution of the Canadian armed forces in Europe is highly prized. The professionalism of our troops and airmen is recognized by each member of the alliance, and it was impressed upon me by some of my NATO colleagues how disappointed they would be should any Canadian government at any time take any steps to lessen the effectiveness of the Canadian military contribution.

During the course of the meeting I proposed that there be more frequent opportunities for heads of government to consult with one another and that this opportunity should permit consultations of an informal kind for these, in my experience, were of great value. I used the Commonwealth heads of government meeting experience as an example as I put forward this proposal.

I am happy to report, Mr. Speaker, that the suggestion was taken up in positive terms immediately by the President of the United States and by the Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany. During the ensuing discussion, by far the greater number of countries indicated their interest in the idea.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity in Brussels to meet on a bilateral basis with President Ford and several other heads of governments. The meeting also allowed me to meet the president and two of the vice-presidents of the European Community, with whom I talked rather extensively about the formal support the commission gave to the Canadian proposal on the establishment of a contract agreement with the European Community. With the same objective in view, I also went to Denmark and to Luxemburg. Both visits completed the series of discussions I had in the capitals with the heads of the governments of all the member countries of the European Economic Community. During these visits, I could explain that Canada was willing to negotiate the establishment of official relations with the community; in return, I received the assurance that the matter is being considered favourably. During my discussions with the chairman of the commission, I was informed that the community will open an office in Ottawa before the end of the year.

[English]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a very brief reply. If I am brief, let me add it is only because I am particularly well-informed on this subject that I can reply at all. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I understand, had some difficulty in deciding he would make any statement; it was only at 2.15, apparently, that he made up his mind and I received a copy. I am glad I received one at all.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just as well if you had not.

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister referred to the respect in which our troops are held in Europe. There can be no doubt about the respect for the quality of our personnel. Frankly, though, I think there is a good deal of doubt about the way in which our troops are equipped.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1620)

Mr. Stanfield: I must also say, not because of anything the Prime Minister said this afternoon but because of statements made recently by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson), that the government's position regarding our contribution to NATO is rather ambiguous. The Minister of National Defence, as I understood him, said that we have to consider the question of quality as well as quantity. I think there is a great deal of doubt in this country today about precisely what we are committed to do with respect to NATO, and I have to say to the right hon. gentleman that he did not do anything here this afternoon to clarify that doubt.

The Prime Minister said how disappointed our NATO colleagues would be should any Canadian government at any time take any steps to lessen the effectiveness of Canadian military contributions to NATO. I hope it is not unsporting of me to remind the right hon. gentleman that that is one of the first things he did after taking office.

I am also a little puzzled by the Prime Minister's reference to the desirability of more frequent opportunities for heads of government to consult with one another. That is another way of describing a summit meeeting, I would think. I understood the Prime Minister, a few weeks ago, to have very considerable doubt about whether a summit meeting, at that time at least, would be useful. I do not know whether the right hon. gentleman has been so impressed by what took place at this summit that he has changed his mind or quite what he is getting at. As I say, he seemed to be taking the position a few weeks ago that a NATO summit was something that should take place only under quite precise and propitious conditions. He is now suggesting summits as a continuing institution.

Athough he did not say so in this statement, in another statement the Prime Minister is reported as having said that NATO needs the continued support of the people. There can be no doubt about that. I would have to ask the right hon. gentleman how much he and his government have done to encourage the Canadian people in that regard. How much leadership have they given the Canadian people to enable them to appreciate and to support our role in the NATO alliance?

With regard to the missing link or the search for the link with the European Economic Community, I say this is good if it continues. The interest of the Prime Minister in the Common Market is a little late, but certainly it is better to be late than never. I for one would be grateful for some clarification as to what kind of contractual link the Prime Minister is seeking, because this has been a little fuzzy in the mind of the Prime Minister. Perhaps following his last trip to Europe the Prime Minister can be a little more precise. If I have the opportunity of asking him a question in a few minutes, I would ask him—and he might think about this—to clarify a little further, following his last visit, what he means by a contractual link.

The last thing I want to say concerns détente. I think the movement toward détente is something that we all support in principle. One thing that has disappointed me is that there does not seem to have been much success among the NATO countries, among the countries of western Europe, in getting any clearcut understanding from countries east of the Iron Curtain, the U.S.S.R. in particular, regarding the free movement of peoples, theirs and ours.

I have long felt that this is a matter of vital importance. I know the attitude of Russia, for example, toward other countries interfering in the internal affairs of their country or other countries, but I suggest it would be unfortunate if in fact something called détente is negotiated involving some limitation of troops as well as some approval of the status quo, if in fact by that implicit approval of the status quo we from the west are indeed saying we are prepared to go along with the very restricted movement of peoples which is now permitted in the U.S.S.R. and the countries associated with the U.S.S.R. In a moment, if I may, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a simple question on that point.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, like the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) I, too, until about 2.15 anticipated that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was not going to make a statement on his trip to Europe but would simply table some comments in the House. Having listened to his statement and having read it just prior to his getting to his feet, I can understand why there was some hesitation about using up the time of the House on the question of NATO and the role Canada is to play in NATO, we get absolutely nothing from the Prime Minister. It seems to me that if the government is committed to maintaining our country's membership in NATO, he had an obligation to produce some answers to our allies in Europe to the questions that they have been asking about the nature of our role, as well as to provide the House with the answers we should have given to our allies at a NATO meeting. The Prime Minister did none of these things.

The specific question is: Are we going to continue our somewhat mixed contribution by performing a role on the ground as well as in the air? If so, are we going to re-equip our troops on the ground? If not, what is to be Canada's contribution to the NATO defence of western Europe? None of these questions was dealt with in the slightest either in the communiqué that was attached to the Prime Minister's statement, which of course is issued by all members of NATO, or in his statement in the House. In view of what has been said here about the opposition taking up a lot of time in the House with gratuitous remarks, I think the same comment could be applied to the statement that the Prime Minister has made regarding the government's position on NATO.

At this time I should like to make it clear that the New Democratic Party believes that, if it was once appropriate for Canada to be playing a role in NATO, that time has since passed. I wish the Prime Minister would remove the government from its ambivalent position. On the one hand, it seems to me inclined to the view taken by our party—that it is no longer appropriate at this stage in history for us to take part in NATO—which might account for the lack of clearcut policy in terms of our military contribution. On the other hand, the Prime Minister makes the statement that the government does not take that position but that it is firmly committed.

We think we should be out of NATO. We think it is much more appropriate now to have a highly trained, professional military force for our country and that this force should be made ready for strengthening United Nations' peacekeeping forces when we think such course of action is appropriate, so the force is available for use in emergency relief operations.

I am not going to take the time of the House to elaborate on my reason for saying that; I simply conclude by telling the House that we expected much more from the Prime Minister in terms of clarifying the government's own view of NATO. We are going to continue, says the government, in our commitment, yet apparently the government has not made up its mind how it is going to continue in its commitment.

With reference to the meeting concerning the European Economic Community, I, like the Leader of the Opposition, welcome the announcement of the opening of an office. However, I would simply urge the government to come forward soon, primarily through the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) but also through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), with some imaginative programs to develop our secondary industry in particular.

● (1630)

Trade relationships are, of course, important in the western world. But by improving secondary industry in Canada in terms of efficiency we will be able to gain access to those markets as well as to many others. The real objective of a trade policy should not be one of looking for special concessions from the European Economic Community but one of developing a first-rate secondary industry in Canada. We need the kind of leadership from the government we have not yet received that would set out in clear terms how we are to go about achieving that, and if we achieve that I would argue we would not have to be preoccupied with looking for special concessions from the European Economic Community.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see the Prime Minister is back in good shape from his trip in Europe.

The Prime Minister told us how satisfied he is following the conference of the leaders of NATO countries. I believe such conferences complete others held by foreign affairs ministers who meet once or twice a year to discuss problems facing the NATO countries and the ways to solve them.

Since the inception of NATO, that is 25 or 26 years ago, we realize that Russia has been stopped for a while at least in its ambition to dominate Europe and perhaps several other areas of the world as well. In the past several years, we have seen the organization go through all kinds of problems. For instance, let us recall the dispute between England and Iceland with regard to fishing activities in the territorial waters of Iceland. Let us recall another problem not yet solved opposing Greece and Turkey, two countries members of NATO, about Cyprus. Let us not forget what is now happening in another country also a member of NATO, Portugal. All those are fairly recent problems that the organization must consider. We must therefore see to it that the organization does not crumble so that it will oppose the Warsaw Pact bloc which, in my opinion, has not quit pursuing its objectives to impose its rule all over Europe and perhaps others areas of the world.

Until now, NATO has assumed its responsibilities, and I feel it should continue to do so. On the other hand, after 25 or 26 years of protection in Europe, might the time not have come for the European countries to assume a greater part of their own defence by participating economically, for instance, in the number and quality of the troops and weapons needed to ensure the defence of Europe. Doubtless, the Canadian participation has its own objective, that of making as remote as possible the danger of a widespread conflict such as that of 1914 or 1939-45, which, if it were to recur in the future, could have much more serious consequences for America. Seen in that light, I feel that the countries of Europe that want to protect themselves should contribute to a greater extent to those defence organizations.

There is another problem which was mentioned before, that of modernizing our defence and surveillance equipment. We will soon have to make considerable improvements because we are becoming aware that our aircraft, for instance, are almost obsolete; they will have to be replaced in the relatively near future. Now, to do so will require astronomical expenditures and, as in all parliamentary democracies the government must submit its credits to Parliament and to the people, something that is not done on the other side of the barricade, at least not in the member countries of the other pact; one wonders if the U.S.S.R. is not thus in the process of winning a war of attrition.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I feel that those meetings can only help better understand the needs of that organization; what the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) proposes could complement what has been done in the past, and so give us a better overall view of the problems at hand, help us find the required solutions, to keep that group to face the other party which, to my mind, continues to constitute a threat.

I feel therefore that if we are to continue watching its activities closely, serious meetings must be held as often as possible.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman about the contractual link which I understand consists of a structure to be put in place making provisions for consultation between the EEC and Canada as questions arise from time to time. That was my understanding. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will correct me if I am wrong.

I should also like to ask whether his discussions with representatives of the EEC this time went beyond that point. Did he have the opportunity of discussing France's attitude with the President of France, or the attitude of the government of France toward such a contractual link between the European Economic Community and Canada? The Prime Minister has visited all the EEC countries now and has given us a good deal of information about the attitude of various governments, with the single exception, I think, of the attitude of the government of France.

Mr. Trudeau: On the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes, we did go beyond that. As the hon. gentleman knows, the commission has now agreed with us on the form of the term of reference which could be the basis of an agreement between the community and Canada giving form and substance to the contractual link. So in reality we did go beyond discussing the mere term of reference. That is already in the mill. The discussions I had with the president and the two vice-presidents of the commission were directed mainly to the accepted order on which the council of ministers would authorize the commission to negotiate the terms of reference, and what specific action Canada might take while waiting for the council of ministers to give that authorization.

I suppose that leads into the second question as to what specific action we took with France. I might first correct the hon. gentleman who has said I have not reported the attitude of the government of France. I did that after my meetings in Paris last October. At that time I had not yet been in Brussels, and I have not since then raised the question officially with the President or Prime Minister of France. As the hon. gentleman perhaps knows, the Prime Minister was not at the NATO meetings, nor was the President. However, he did come to the banquet on Thursday night, I believe. As far as I know, he arrived just for the banquet and left right after. Being the senior Prime Minister present, I guess, I was seated opposite the President of France. We did a bit of talking, but the table was at least ten feet wide and it was a bit difficult to get into any detail.

● (1640)

Mr. Stanfield: We have no difficulty communicating here.

Mr. Trudeau: That is correct, but we have microphones here. I might say that the King of Belgium did not think it was appropriate to set up telephone or telegraph assistance between the people invited to his table. I might add that I could not even kick him under the table as I would love to do if I were sitting opposite the hon. member for Peace River. I would kick him above the table, too, if I came that close.

The Government of Canada will very soon be receiving visits from the French minister of commerce and from one of the important ministers of state, Mr. Poniatowski, in the coming weeks. Of course, this is likely to be the kind of subject we will raise with them. Whether I will be able to report to the House on this is not known at this time.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have a question relating to détente. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he had any discussions with his NATO colleagues on the matter of détente, particularly in respect of the right of citizens to leave a country. My concern is that détente may be negotiated without anything effectively being determined in this connection and that the détente will, de facto at least, involve approval by us of the very limited movement which is now available to citizens of the U.S.S.R. and other countries. Can the Prime Minister give us any encouragement in this regard?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, the question of détente was raised by several of the heads of government as well as the question of the mutual and balanced forced reduction. I raised this myself in my remarks. I would point out that the meeting in Brussels was not so organized nor so convened in a way that would permit us to discuss in any detail the question of détente or MBFR. Timing itself was not set with those two objectives in mind. That is the reason the Canadian government, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and myself had some reservations about the date of the recent meeting. We thought that more progress might have been achieved had there been a greater period of preparedness.

That is not to argue that we were not prepared to go. In fact, we did go. We were just arguing on the most effective way of meeting. Indeed, that was also the substance of my interventions on the matter of more frequent heads of government meetings. I would not advocate such meetings if they were merely for the purpose of sitting around the table and reading speeches to each other. I believe more should go into these meetings. That is why I argued. This is linked, once again, to my proposal concerning more frequent meetings and my hesitation about going on a specific date to the one which just took place.

As to the substance of the détente discussions, the Secretary of State for External Affairs would certainly be prepared to answer in greater detail perhaps at another time. The Leader of the Opposition is really stating the policy which has been that of the Canadian government, for which we are well known. There is, in technical language, the third basket, the one in which we have insisted that détente must go hand in hand with the free movement of people and ideas and an exchange of information between the two blocs, and that merely a military détente would not be satisfactory. We insist on this third basket. I am told that progress is being made on that. I would remind the hon. gentleman that that has been the Canadian position from the outset. We have gained a great deal of support for it. That continues to be our position. I believe that covers the matters about which I was asked.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby pointed out, the Prime Minister in his statement on NATO did not deal with the type of military contribution Canada proposes to make. I should like to put this question to him: Is it contemplated that Canada will continue its role in the front line of the central front in Europe, which would clearly involve a very heavy expenditure for new equipment, or is it contemplated that Canada might contribute a mobile contingent for use on the flanks of NATO which are said to be particularly vulnerable at the present time?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the defence structure review to which I referred in my statement, and indeed at Brussels, is precisely to ensure that it is at the same time effective in military and in economic terms. As I told them quite candidly, our defence review is not terminated at the present time. I could not answer the type of question the hon. member is asking me.

I did receive representations from them concerning the kind of structure they would like to see. I pointed out to them that Canada had a whole set of priorities and would try to make its defence structure as effective as possible within all those priorities. But I did give them the assurance, which I understand is not supported by the New Democratic Party, that our political adherence to NATO remained firm and we had no intention of withdrawing in a political sense, and that in a military sense we have no intention either of reducing our contribution there. I realize that is not the position of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. I am sure it is not known to him that every socialist leader I met there argued on the contrary, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Prime Minister of The Netherlands—

Mr. Broadbent: Did you go to Sweden?

Mr. Trudeau: —the Prime Minister of the Federal Republic of West Germany. Indeed, this even appears to be the position of the Portuguese government in which I think the hon. member is hoping the socialists will play a not inconsiderable part. I will gladly go to Sweden. I suggest that the hon. member might perhaps take a little trip to see some of his socialist friends, too.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether at that meeting of heads of states of member countries of NATO the subject was raised of contributions not only by Canada but every member country of NATO, and did the Prime Minister himself make commitments for Canada and can he inform the House in that respect?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question as well as the seriousness of the comment he made at the beginning of this period, a seriousness that I think contrasts somehow with the attitude of the leaders of other parties. I would like to say in direct reply to his question that the specific discussion about which he is asking was not raised at the meeting I attended. Defence ministers of NATO countries had discussed this kind of problems in some detail one or two weeks before. In brief, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian position is that we are now conducting a study about the most efficient course for our contribution to NATO. So it is possible we may change the methods of participation. But in so far as the funds, our political and military involvement in NATO and in so far as our desire to make sure that our military participation is maintained, at least at the present level, I did not leave any doubts and I gave the assurance on behalf of the government of Canada that that would be our way of participating.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

AGREEMENT TO AMENDED ROYAL RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING BILL ON ORDER PAPER

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the recommendation appearing on today's order paper, under introduction of the bills, to amend the Old Age Security Act, to repeal the Old Age Assistance Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, is not in accord with the provisions of the bill and therefore a new recommendation will be required. As the House leader, may I suggest that the present recommendation be replaced by a new recommendation and that the introduction of the bill be delayed until tomorrow or Wednesday.

Mr. Speaker: Is there agreement to the suggestion of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,606, 1,733, 1,897, 2,212, 2,369, 2,427, 2,428, 2,447 and 2,454.

Mr. Speaker, if question No. 556 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

METRIC CONVERSION

Question No. 1,606—Mr. Schumacher:

1. Does the government have available an economic impact analysis of the effect of conversion to the metric system and (a) if so (i) on what date was this analysis done (ii) by whom (iii) from what areas was the data gathered (b) if not, for what reason?

2. What facts does the government have to ensure that metric conversion is the best interest of the Canadian economy during the current recession in North America?

3. (a) Will standardization benefit Canada in the long run (b) what information is available, and what analysis has been done, regarding the implication of our trade position in the short term?

4. What steps has the government taken, if any, to provide (a) low cost loans (b) technical assistance (c) education for small businesses?

5. What steps has the government taken, if any, to provide for protection for smaller manufacturing firms against the effects of the heavy financial outlay conversion will require from them in competing with imports from historically metric countries?

6. Has any data been gathered and, if so, what is its nature to ensure that conversion to metric will not broaden the gap between presently imported and exported finished products?

7. Will government purchasing policies maintain a viable level of goods from domestic firms over metric European goods and what form will such protection take?

8. What funds have been set aside and what plans have been made for public education?

9. What is the projected cost for conversion to metric system?

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. (a) The White Paper on Metric Conversion in Canada contains the government's analysis of the effect of conversion to the metric system. It states in part:

The Government accordingly accepts eventual conversion as a definite object of Canadian policy, and proposes means of study and consultation whereby the pace and methods of change may be determined in the national interest.

The White Paper on Metric Conversion in Canada of January, 1970, pointed out that "each industry sector must weigh the benefits of an internationally uniform and coherent system of measurement against the costs of changing from the existing system and that metric conversion consists of "a variety of programs extending over periods of years as determined by the needs and problems in different sectors of the economy. Therefore, the supporting data necessary for any additional analysis could only be compiled gradually at the industry and sector level. To attempt to integrate such data as may be made available by individual economic sectors would be relatively expensive in money and manpower resources and the ex post facto result would not be significant in the light of the conclusion of the White Paper that metric conversion in Canada should be acknowledged as inevitable and in the national interest. (i) This analysis was tabled in the House of Commons on January 16, 1970. (ii) The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. (iii) In the White Paper on Metric Conversion in Canada, representative national organizations put their views on metric matters before the government. Among those who expressed support for conversion were: The Consumers' Association of Canada, The Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Federation, The Agricultural Institute of Canada, The Canadian Chamber of Commerce, The Canadian Pharmaceutical Association, The Canadian Council of Professional Engineers, The Chemical Institute of Canada, The Engineering Institute of Canada, The Canadian Standards Association, The Canadian Hospital Association, The Canadian Construction Association.

2. The White Paper spoke of the "vital importance of foreign trade to Canada especially the need for growth in exports of manufactured goods." It specified "the overwhelming world trend to the metric system as a powerful argument for Canadian conversion." It stated that "there is no precise means of assessing the effects on trade of differences in the measurement practice of Canada and foreign buyers," but "it is the practical judgment of many of those concerned with Canadian trade in established metric regions that the unfamiliar standards significantly hinder Canada's penetration of the market." The eventual costs of not planning and scheduling in 1975 and 1976 for subsequent implementation could be large in terms of missed opportunities for rationalization and increased efficiency, as well as in terms of market opportunities foregone. The costs incidental to metric conversion in the Canadian economy will not reach their peak until the years 1977 and 1978 when world trade would be expected to have resumed a normal rate of growth.

3. (a) Yes. (b) The White Paper notes that "conversion of units during commercial negotiations (necessary now in world trade in primary commodities) may be a handicap and a source of error. In the case of exports by secondary industries the problem is with the differences in standards and therefore in the products themselves." Until such time as industries formulate their individual plans with respect to their timing and method of conversion it would not be possible to estimate the short term benefits of standardization on our trade position.

4. (a) Cabinet has approved a program of loans and loan guarantees to be available to small businesses, to be called the Small Business Metric Conversion Assistance Program. Such loan assistance would be available to businesses facing special financing difficulties resulting from metric conversion when such businesses were unable to obtain financing from commercial lending institutions. (b) and (c) Counselling services to small business will be available through the facilities of CASA (Counselling Assistance to Small Enterprises) or the Federal Business Development Bank when this takes over the responsibility for the work now performed by CASE.

5. The steps the government has taken to protect smaller manufacturing firms facing special financing difficulties are state in 4 above. There are no indications at the present time however that smaller manufacturing firms will incur heavy financial outlays for conversion or that imports from historically metric countries will be significantly affected by Canada's change to the use of metric units. As stated in the White Paper on Metric Conversion "Given a clear direction in which to go, many sectors of the nation will have few problems in conversion, provided the transitional process is wisely phased."

6. There is no evidence that conversion to metric units will adversely affect Canada's trade balance. The Government believes that Canadian entrepreneurs have at least equal ability with foreign competitors to take advantage of the change.

7. The Government would continue to respect the relevant provisions of GATT, particularly as it concerns non-tariff barriers.

8. Two general aspects may be distinguished when considering the subject of education as related to converting to the metric system: (1) matters affecting usage by the general public. In this respect, the amounts spent or allocated for the Information and Education Directorate of the Metric Commission have been as follows: 1973-73, $115,200; 1973-74, $672,300; 1974-75, $1,887,800. (2) matters relating to formal teaching in schools and similar institutions are the responsibility of the provinces.

9. Since metric conversion will proceed over a number of years in a way to be determined by the needs and opportunities in different sectors of the economy, the cost of conversion is, by that fact, undeterminable at this time. Its magnitude will depend on the pace and the phasing of conversion adopted within and without the respective sectors. As stated in the answer to Section 1 of the question the supporting data for any additional analysis do not at present exist. The White Paper states that conversion in any industrially advanced nation is a complex and costly process, but the costs are expected to be more than offset by the benefits arising from the simplicity in the use of the more rational system of units and from the improved ability to communicate both commercially and in other ways with the growing metric community. Given sufficient notice of the required conversion, costs for changes in measuring devices used in distributive trades dealing with consumer goods would not appear to be onerous for any one establishment. In a number of industry sectors the magnitude of costs will depend on the rate of conversion and could be minimized by phasing to coincide with cycles of tool design and equipment obsolescences. The experience of most countries that have already undertaken metric conversion is that actual costs have been very substantially less than estimates made by individual firms.

SHIPS UNDER CHARTER WITH CANADIAN NATIONAL

Question No. 1,733—Mr. Carter:

1. What are the names and number of ships under charter to Canadian National and operating in the Atlantic area?

2. What is the cost and duration of the charter in each case and the name of the company from whom they are chartered?

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE—USE OF HIGH GRADE HEAVY PAPER

Question No. 1,897—Mr. Neil:

1. With reference to rising costs, does the Department of National Health and Welfare use high grade heavy paper for news releases and covers for the Minister's speeches and, if so, for what reason?

2. What is the difference in unit costs between such paper used by the Department and the lighter grade paper used by other departments?

3. What was the increased cost to the Department in using the heavier paper in the 1974-75 fiscal year?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The Department of National Health and Welfare is currently using an average grade heavy paper for the heading page of news releases and covers for the Minister's speeches. When the current stock was ordered last spring, the more common lighter weights of paper were not available and the heavier weight paper was substituted to maintain good quality reproduction. A lighter weight paper will be used when present stocks are depleted.

2. The difference in costs between the heavier weight paper and that used by other departments varies depending on the weight of paper used and the quantities ordered.

3. The increased cost to the Department in the fiscal year 1974-75 for the heavier paper was $1,500. Since this purchase was unavoidable, a year's supply of paper was obtained and the departmental logos were printed at one time. The alternative would have been to pay a higher unit cost for a smaller quantity of heavier paper and the printing, and later in the year, again a higher unit cost for the lighter paper when it became available and for a second printing.

REASONS IN CANCELLATION OF PSC COMPETITION 74-AGR-CC-HA-19

Question No. 2,447—Mr. Lachance:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 2,278, will the Public Service Commission give the reasons why competition 74-AGR-CC-HA-19 was cancelled twice on the grounds of form?

2. Is the Commission considering taking corrective action in the form of selection tests to avoid a repetition of this situation?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: 1. Competition 74-AGR-CC-HA-19 has not been cancelled. On August 9, 1974, an Appeal Board allowed an appeal against the appointment proposed in the competition. As a result it was necessary to re-assess the candidates and to extend a second right of appeal. Several appeals were subsequently filed and they were allowed on December 17, 1974.

2. The case is currently before the Federal Court of Appeal (Case 75-A-16). Further action in the competition will be determined when the Federal Court issues a ruling on the case.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—SUGGESTED STRENGTHENING OF OFFICE OF AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River) moved:

That it is the opinion of this House that it is necessary to declare that the power of the executive has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished; and, in particular, that means must be found by this House to inquire into, prevent, and correct abuses in the expenditure of public money by the Government of Canada, including the immediate passage of laws to strengthen and improve the office of the Auditor General.

He said: Madam Speaker, now that the captains, some of the kings and the movers and shakers of questions of privilege have departed, this is a most attentive audience. Probably the House is at its best when it has a limited but highly intelligent group, as it has on this side. I hope hon. members have listened with care or have read the motion which I put before the House.

Any student of the parliamentary system who may be hidden away in the House would easily recognize the wording used in the motion which I founded on a resolution adopted in the House of Commons of the United Kingdom on April 6, 1780, which reads as follows. Perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) might advise us on this. But seriously, members on the government side might well listen with care to this motion passed nearly 200 years ago, which reads:

That it is the opinion of this committee, that it is necessary to declare, that the influence of the Crown has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished. That it is competent to this House, to examine into and correct, abuses in the expenditure of the civil list revenues, as well as in every other branch of the public revenue, whenever it shall appear expedient to the wisdom of this House so to do.

That is the famous Dunning resolution which was put forward at a time when, as is the case in Canada today, the then government held almost dictatorial powers and engaged in stupid and extravagant expenditures and foreign expeditions. It was just in the process of losing its American colonies. Domestically, the country was in disarray, with inflation and unemployment, with over-expenditure and extravagance, with waste and corruption. All those things took place under a government which had all the power in the world to do things about the situation, just as we have a government with the same power today.

I wish I had the time to put on the record some of the things said at that time in the House. After considerable research—I went back to 1780—I found that the mover of the resolution, Mr. Dunning, made the point that on that day a large number of petitions were brought to the House of Commons protesting against the situation which existed in the country. In the words of Mr. Dunning:

That day was destined, by a previous order, to the taking into consideration the petitions of the people of England; amounting to about forty in number; and conveying their sentiments and names in such an immense quantity of parchment, as seemed rather calculated to bury than to cover the speaker's table.

Mr. Dunning went on to say, as recorded in the Annual Register; they did not have Hansard at that time:

This was, the setting limits to the increased, dangerous, and unconstitutional influence of the Crown, and an economical expenditure of the public money.

It was a very good speech, and I just hope that hon. members who have some thought and care for the people of this country and for their constituents will read what was said 200 years ago and think of the shameful way—I use the word deliberately here—in which it is necessary for us in the House to remind the government and the people of Canada of the situation which faces us today and which parallels that of nearly 200 years ago. We thought that the powers of the progenitor or ancestor of this House were firmly fixed. We find that such was not the case.

It is also rather interesting to find that so important was the issue that at page 170 of the Annual Register of 1780 the following statement is to be found:

The speaker, on this day, took a decided part in support of the motion. He observed, that however irksome it was to him to take any part in their debates, and however cautious he was, and ought to be, of obtruding his own private opinions on the House, there were cases, and he considered the present as one of them, in which it would be criminal of him to remain silent. The question before them, he said, was of infinite consequence to that House.

Mr. Speaker went on to make a very good speech which I would recommend to hon. members on the government side. I am sure that if Madam Speaker or others in the chair were to see fit to adopt the sentiments of Mr. Speaker in those times, there would be no objection from this side of the House to their doing so. I point this out to call the attention of the House, through you, Madam Speaker, to a situation in which we find ourselves today, of being compelled to put before the House a motion of this kind in order to draw attention to the very dangerous condition in which we as parliament now find ourselves.

We have here a tacit alliance between the Liberals and the NDP. I heard my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, applaud heartily a while ago the motion that was read, and I may well have to withdraw the statement which I am now making. If so, I will be glad to do so after I hear his speech. However, I have always been under the impression that both these parties believe in big government and in some measure of complete executive control between elections.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

This has completely undermined the parliamentary system and destroyed any meaningful opportunity for the taxpayer, the consumer and the voter to exercise influence through his elected representative. This is particularly the case when that executive is composed mainly of a small group of wilful and arrogant people, either former bureaucrats or those who suffer from the same social, political and intellectual liabilities in attempting to deal with modern problems. Their motto is simple: the state is ours and we do what we want with it.

● (1700)

If we look about us, total government spending is up to almost 40 per cent of the gross national product. That is all-government spending in Canada. The fact is that for this fiscal year the total spending of the federal government will probably settle somewhere between $33 billion and $35 billion after all loans, investments, advances and supplementary estimates are brought in. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) may be very optimistic about the limitations on the supplementary estimates he is going to bring in, but I have been around here a little longer than he has. I have watched this happen and I have no doubt at all that before this fiscal year is over total government spending will reach at least $33 billion for all accounts.

Of this spending, approximately one-half is untouchable by this House. One-half is in the form of statutory estimates and it was held by Mr. Speaker in the last parliament that any attempt, in dealing with estimates in this House, to move to reduce them is not permissible. That is the ruling under which we are now operating. So the government can sit back complacently, knowing that some day in the month of June all of these estimates will be automatically passed. No matter what we want to do about them, there will be automatic approval and the ministers, deputy ministers and others, with the aid of their subservient majorities in the committees, can make a mockery of committees and set up all the roadblocks they wish to prevent the considered examination of estimates.

There is an energy crisis in this country, which is rich in energy but which is running 10 to 20 years behind schedule. There is a transportation mess, a lack of housing, high interest rates, problems in immigration and, of course, the black clouds of unemployment and inflation. Madam Speaker, despite the fact that this government holds very near dictatorial power, you name the problem and this country has it.

Before I go on to deal with the particular subject of the office of the Auditor General which concerns me to a very considerable extent—others of my hon. colleagues will deal with the question of the spending of the taxpayers' money, with the examination and scrutiny of the estimates in committee and in the House, with questions of secrecy and the refusal of the government to allow its civil servants to be cross-examined in committees—I would like to deal with a statement which to some extent is linked with what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said today in his statement.

I was intrigued by a statement attributed to the Prime Minister on his recent trip to Europe when he went over there to play with his new toy, the so-called contractual link. He was reported to have said that the people of Canada will decide with regard to our future relations with NATO. What unparallelled effrontery from this Prime Minister who bears almost sole responsibility for diminishing our association and influence with our partners in the Atlantic alliance! Canada did have influence and friendship after the last war, not because of our puny diplomacy but purchased solely with the blood and lives of Canadians.

Mr. Hees: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Not so long ago I had occasion to stand by the beautiful cemetery at Nijmegen, which the people of Holland keep green and trim in honour of the Canadians who lost their lives there, many of them my comrades, and as I thought of the extent to which our influence and prestige has been diminished it struck me that many of the people in those graves would be resting uneasily. This prestige has been dissipated by the perverse and personal decisions by those at the top. These are not the decisions of people of Canada, not the decisions of this House but the decisions of the Prime Minister and his immediate associates. Now we are treated to the ludicrous spectacle of the right hon. gentleman crawling around from capital to capital in Europe trying to repair the damage he did. I say it is almost obscene to suggest that the Canadian people had anything to do with either of these decisions. What was done was done at the very top of our power structure.

As I said, because of the tyranny of the clock I will leave to others the charges that this government has abused its great power by the stand it has taken in refusing to divulge information and making a secret society of executive government even more difficult to penetrate, its equally medieval attitude that civil servants are exempt from having to appear as witnesses at parliamentary committees at the arbitrary discretion of ministers, and the farce of the so-called examination and scrutiny of estimates.

I would like to take some time—a short time because we do not have too much time to spend on this today—to deal with the office of the Auditor General and what ought to be done when, after years of bickering about the powers, authority and effectiveness of this office, the government having been presented with a very objective and well buttressed series of recommendations by the independent committee for the review of the office of the Auditor General, has intimated that it has no intention of acting, certainly not in the near future, on these proposals, nor has it indicated if or when it will accept them. It has gone as far as refusing to allow a committee of this House or of parliament to study the report and to make recommendations.

This follows applications I made in this House under Standing Order 43 and questions I asked of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp). I understand that there are some hon. gentlemen opposite who are sensitive. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury), for many years president of the treasury board, is very sensitive indeed about the Auditor General and the powers of the Auditor General. I know that he was one of the ministers who led the fight and who is probably still leading the fight to see that this country and this parliament does not have an effective, useful and meaningful Auditor General's office and legislation to implement such a proposal.

Let us see what happened in this regard. As the power of this House has diminished with regard to meaningful examination and scrutiny of estimates, we are driven back to the final line of defence of the beleaguered taxpayer of Canada, the office of the Auditor General. Commencing some years ago in the late forties and fifties, the then Auditor General, Mr. Watson Sellar, considered that the limited provisions of the legislation found in the Financial Administration Act not only authorized but probably compelled him to examine what he ultimately defined as being non-productive payments.

I say to the House that the Auditor General is not just a financial auditor. He is a parliamentary auditor and he has the very high duty to examine payments which have been made by the executive and by civil servants to see that they follow precisely the limitations and the bases upon which they were passed by the House of Commons and by this parliament. Mr. Sellar felt that the wording of the terms of the Financial Administration Act justified him in going to the point of saying that there were certain payments which may well have followed the prescribed route which was set out by the parliament of Canada, but because they produced no obvious or apparent benefits to the people of Canada, they should be called non-productive payments and should be listed in the Auditor General's report to the House of Commons, and he suggested perhaps the government should take a look at them.

This practice was followed by Mr. Sellar's successor, Mr. Maxwell Henderson, who was appointed by the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I would point out to those hon. members who have said from time to time that Mr. Henderson was taking a biased and political stance that some of the first and most difficult decisions he had to make as Auditor General involved expenditures and problems which had been created and were arising out of the then Conservative government. I think some of my friends will remember the time when Mr. Henderson demanded three income tax files because he felt obliged to examine them for the purpose of his report.

I say to members of the House that in the course of his duties, Mr. Henderson was an officer of parliament in the highest traditions who carried out his task in the very best way possible on behalf of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Henderson raised this issue in 1960 and 1961 with the then public accounts committee on which there was a Conservative majority. It was headed by a chairman who later became Speaker of this House and who is now a senator—Senator Macnaughton. The committee made a finding that it was incumbent upon the Auditor General to examine all so-called payments of a non-productive nature; his duty was to report to the House in respect of such payments and in particular to ascertain if they were in fact payments which conferred any benefit or value to the people of Canada.

From that time Mr. Henderson followed that practice and in his annual report listed a great many instances of non-productive payments. In due course these began to hurt. Ministers of the present government and its immediate predecessor became very annoyed with Mr. Henderson and took it upon themselves to do what they could to cut Mr. Henderson and his office down to size. It was a deliberate tactic nourished and supported by certain members of the government.

In 1966, the then public accounts committee instructed Mr. Henderson to bring in a special bill for the consideration of the committee, to be known as the Auditor General Act. He did so, I believe in 1968-69, but at that time the government, alarmed at the implications of this legislation, packed the public accounts committee with its particular praetorian guard to make sure that the bill would not be approved by the committee. That proved to be the case; the bill was not accepted and we found that the next year the bill was brought in by the government.

Mr. Reid: Based on their recommendations.

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, based on the recommendations of the really biased, very prejudiced, very partisan public accounts committee. For the first time the government took upon itself the obligation of packing that committee for the purpose of dealing with attempts by the Auditor General to secure for himself the authority, power and prestige which his office needed. It was a very shameful thing that was done by the government as a whole. I am not referring to any particular individual.

Mr. Reid: An unanimous recommendation.

Mr. Baldwin: What was the next stage? In the bill brought in by the government, specifically the then president of the treasury board, direct aim was taken at the two measures which were so essential to the retention of authority in the hands of the Auditor General. In regard to the appointment of staff, an issue which had been controversial and difficult for some time, authority was taken away from the Auditor General. The right of the Auditor General to make comments on the so-called non-productive payments was completely ruled out. That was what the bill was all about; it was a bill brought in with great words of praise by the then president of the treasury board.

We all know what happened next. This blatant attempt to muzzle the Auditor General, to tie him down and in effect make him useless to conduct a proper scrutiny of public spending, was perceived by the people of Canada as an affront to them. There was a great outpouring of public indignation and wrath as a result of which the minister and the government had to abandon the bill. Subsequently the public accounts committee authorized an internal committee consisting of representatives of the Department of Justice, one of the legal counsel to the Auditor General and the parliamentary counsel of this House, and probably one other, to bring in a model bill in the public accounts committee.

The committee took some time, but after some delay did complete its studies and had an appropriate bill prepared. That bill was never made public, however. The government took it, ran for cover and hid it. It has been under cover ever since. Quite obviously, that must have been because the bill contained clauses which were repugnant to the government. Some people may have seen it but this House has not seen it. I think this is shocking. The public accounts committee is a creation of this House, and when that committee, acting on behalf of this House, requests that a bill be prepared, I think it is a grave impertinence on the part of the government to prevent the bill from coming into our hands. I believe that was the case.

The final act in this interesting drama took place in 1973 when Mr. Henderson retired or was replaced by the present Auditor General, Mr. Macdonnell. The latter gentleman reviewed the situation and, quite properly, decided that as he was new and would bring his own views and approach, he would like to advice of an independent and impartial committee. After discussion with officials and the chairman of the public accounts committee, three people outside government service were commissioned to make a report, which they did in March, 1975, under the title "Report of the Independent Review Committee on the Office of the Auditor General of Canada".

This was a very far reaching and objective study which contained 47 recommendations. Amongst them were these suggestions: that there should be separate legislation concerning the role and responsibilities and relationship of the Auditor General; the Auditor General should have authority to issue a special report on his own volition to the House of Commons on any matter of pressing importance or urgency that should not be deferred until his annual report; the Auditor General should audit the financial accounts of all Crown corporations whose expenditures directly affect the budgetary accounts of Canada; and the Auditor General should have the right of access to financial records and documents of all Crown corporations and the power to see if value was received for payments made.

I pause here to point out that people have sometimes asked me how it is that the Auditor General can find examples of waste, stupidity and even corruption at times when members of parliament cannot. The answer is that under the Financial Administration Act there is provision that the Auditor General may have access to information, to audit documents and to cross-examine witnesses as well as the power to administer oaths to witnesses. These are powers which a fearful government is loth to allow to members of this House, the committee and the press. If we had access to such information, we also could find examples. In any event, these were some of the sensible and rational conclusions proposed after a good many months of study and discussion with people in Canada and outside the country.

I appreciate the fact that the government might not have the opportunity and the time to introduce such a bill. It seems to have got its legislative schedule in a mess because of the conflict between the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) with regard to the introduction of a budget. The government House leader has my sympathy; when dealing with colleagues like that he does not need an opposition. In any event, I can understand why the government House leader is not able to bring in a bill at this time.

Why should not this House provide some input to legislation which we want to see passed? There ought to be legislation on the crucial issue involving the survey and state of the public accounts of Canada. Why should not a committee of the House have that report referred to it, with instructions to make a careful study of it and, if necessary, draft a model bill? The government is not bound to accept it. I realize that the government is the master of its own destiny and can do what it wants.

I remember not many years ago, when the government of the day had to deal with the difficult and sensitive subject of divorce, that a parliamentary committee was given wide terms of reference and studied that question for 1½ years. It brought in useful recommendations and annexed to its report a model bill which formed the basis of the bill introduced later by the minister of justice of the day who became the present Prime Minister. The Prime Minister, when acting as minister of justice, showed his conservatism. I spell that with a small "c" because I do not want my social standing to be impaired. Nevertheless, he introduced the bill. It was not as far reaching as it ought to have been. I cite this as an example to show what can be done usefully by a committee of this House in dealing with problems of the kind I have mentioned.

It is grossly wrong of the government House leader—this is part of my complaint—to refuse to discuss with myself, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the House leader of the Créditiste party terms of reference under which this matter could be considered by a parliamentary committee or by a committee of this House, as the case may be. The government, if it were to bring in legislation, would have the benefit of that review if there were such committee consideration. I think it is very wrong indeed of the government to refuse us the right to provide some input into those recommendations which the government will take into consideration when it decides to deal with that legislation.

It will not have escaped your notice, sir, that no vote is attached to this motion. If there were a vote, it would of course be defeated. The government whip would whistle up his honourable bodies and there would be no chance for our motion to pass. I think it is a waste of time calling some of these votes. I suggest, through you, Mr. Speaker, to members on the government side and to the people of Canada that the grave crisis and predicament which we find ourselves in at this time with regard to the public accounts of this country, with regard to the indications of gross mismanagement, over-expenditure, waste, extravagance and the government's dictatorial and tyrannical conduct call for the most careful consideration. Time is running against us and I should like to think that some consideration will be given to the proposition I have put before the House.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the opposition has given me the opportunity to keep in shape.

Mr. Stanfield: Penalty killing.

Mr. Chrétien: I am really amazed by the hon. member's motion. It is almost unbelievable. When I was practising as a country lawyer I never saw people pleading guilty in this manner. This is unbelievable. Hon. members opposite cannot do their job as an opposition criticizing the government, and now they want someone else to do their job. They want the Auditor General to do it. We have given the opposition 500 hours in committees to examine government expenditures. All they can do is come forward with a motion which reads:

> That it is the opinion of this House that it is necessary to declare that the power of the executive has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished—

The hon. member who spoke on the motion did not substantiate his case. I do not know what he means. I presume he spoke to take up time in the House. The motion continues:

> —and, in particular, that means must be found by this House to inquire into, prevent, and correct abuses in the expenditure of public money by the government of Canada, including the immediate passage of laws to strengthen and improve the office of the Auditor General.

Mr. Alexander: A very good motion.

Mr. Chrétien: Well, it is a motion, exactly what I was expecting. We are living in the twentieth century, not in the seventeenth or eighteenth centuries where the Conservative Party is. This motion takes us back 200 or 300 years. It could have been moved in England in 1780. You know, I was not very old then. I thought the opposition would come to grips with the difficulties modern governments must deal with in the twentieth century; instead, they move the sort of motion which belongs to 1780 and talk about Sir John A. Macdonald, and so on. They have not dealt with the realities of modern government. This is amazing. Yes, a report was prepared.

Mr. Baldwin: And you hid it.

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, we got it.

An hon. Member: And it was tabled in the House.

Mr. Chrétien: And it was tabled in the House.

Mr. Baldwin: You hid the bill.

Mr. Chrétien: We will have the bill. It is going to come. We received a report a couple of weeks ago, and the opposition wants us to table the bill today. We cannot do it. They want us to follow a procedure which will take months and months, and perhaps years. We cannot wait that long before coming to grips with the problem. We tabled the report and we have started to work. This government has started to act. We do not talk, as the opposition likes to do; we are willing to move and we have said in the House that we are preparing legislation.

Mr. Baldwin: You have not said that.

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. member uses strong words. I do not use them because I do not try to impress anyone. He talked about the committee preparing a bill and about wanting the Auditor General to be respected. We have great respect for the Auditor General. This bill was put aside at the request of the new Auditor General because he wanted time to look into the situation. He wanted to know what the situation was.

Mr. Baldwin: It was hidden several months before then.

Mr. Chrétien: It was put aside at his request. We think the new Auditor General was rational in wanting to look at the situation and at the report. Hon. members opposite want the Auditor General to do the work of the opposition, not to act like an Auditor General. I do not think it is proper to have an outside officer look at the expenditures of government to judge whether parliament sets the right priorities. The role of the Auditor General is that of a judge. He must look into government expenditures and determine if money was spent according to the laws of the land. The laws of the land are passed by parliament, and we follow the wishes of parliament.

The hon. member spoke about wasteful spending, but in his half-hour speech he did not raise a single instance of wasteful spending.

Mr. Baldwin: If the Auditor General were a judge, many people would be in jail.

Mr. Chrétien: I am President of the Treasury Board and have many friends in this House. I have yet to see a member of parliament, especially from the opposition, come to me and suggest that I should cut expenditures in his particular area. They all come to me and ask me to intercede with the Department of Public Works and see that a wharf or facility, and so on, is built in their area.

An hon. Member: You are talking about government members.

Mr. Chrétien: No; the opposition is exactly the same. It is amazing how they want you to spend money on this and that—

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, as I am entitled to, and point out to the minister that on two occasions recently we moved motions in this House to reduce government expenditures but the government voted them down.

Mr. Reid: The motions involved ministers' salaries.

● (1730)

Mr. Chrétien: The Conservative House leader made an unbelievable speech today. He did not make one single point on the basis of this report suggesting anything to the government on the basis of the Wilson report. He did not take a single one of the recommendations and suggest what should be done. He spoke only in generalities and never came near to being constructive, as an opposition should be.

That is why, when the great choice is put before the people of Canada, even though we are not perfect they take a gamble on us rather than try that other gang over there, because they know those people cannot put their minds to a problem and come up with a constructive proposition.

Of course the government spends a lot of money. Earlier today I listened to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) suggesting that the equipment in the hands of our men in Europe was no damned good. I am not an expert on these matters, but I am certain that if we took measures to buy new planes, or guns, or whatever, the opposition would accuse the government of wasting money. They should face the implications of their own speeches. However, because they are so much in contradiction with themselves, no one takes them seriously.

Today we are considering government expenditures. I would remind hon. members that the government has no control over most of these expenditures; it is the House of Commons which controls them. For example, if I wanted to cut one cent from the old age pension I could not do it. I wouldn't do it, of course. But don't let hon. members opposite blame me because I am not cutting such expenditures; there is not a single man on the opposition side who would vote for a reduction in the old age pension and all those other measures. The same goes for any other programs of that kind which have been passed into law. The so-called strong executive we hear so much about has no control over these expenditures which were voted by the House of Commons. So the opposition should stop this nonsense saying that the government is spending $28 billion. Yes, we are spending $28 billion, but the portion of that expenditures over which we have direct control is very small.

When people talk about the take of the federal government in relation to the share taken by others, there are a few things I should like to tell them. The national accounts show a totally different profile of federal government spending trends than the motion implies. In 1974 only 6.1 cents in every dollar was spent on the purchase of goods and services and capital formation, compared with 8.5 cents 20 years earlier. This hardly seems like the prescription of a power-hungry executive arm of government. In that same period when the rate of these types of expenditures was increasing by more than a quarter in relation to gross national product, the provinces were in the process of doubling their expenditures in these areas.

Mr. Baldwin: Prodded by you!

Mr. Chrétien: Since when are we running the provinces?

Mr. Baldwin: All the time.

An hon. Member: We wish we were.

Mr. Chrétien: Yet it is the federal government which is characterized as the villain by the opposition. This is precisely the area of federal expenditure—goods, services, and capital formation—which seems to be attacked day after day in this House as having gone wildly out of control.

But what, hon. members may ask, happens to all the rest of the money which is collected in taxes if only 6.1 cents of every dollar goes to direct federal expenditures like national defence, physical works of all kinds, public works, salaries and the like? Those items totalled only $8.3 billion in 1974, and the central government taxed Canadians over $29 billion. The simple answer is that this parliament and its predecessors have committed themselves in various ways to improving the degree of social justice and equity for all Canadians by guaranteeing certain minimum levels of resources to ensure, as far as possible, that none of us thrives unduly at the expense of a less fortunate neighbour. If you like, it is the price of being civilized, and it cannot be cut with impunity.

Mr. Baldwin: What a price!

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Chrétien: I am saying so, and there are a lot of people who subscribe to that thesis because we have won a lot of elections on that issue.

Mr. Baldwin: The price is not right.

Mr. Chrétien: The point I am making in the context of this motion is that the indirect expenditures to which I have referred are mainly parliamentary commitments by which the executive is bound, and they can be changed only by parliament. The executive does not have the power to alter such things as old age security payments at its own discretion.

Mr. Baldwin: What about the meat?

Mr. Chrétien: Since 1974 such transfer payments as those for old age security, guaranteed income supplement, unemployment insurance and family allowances—all amounts destined to be spent by individuals rather than by governments—accounted for more than $8.6 billion. Another $6 billion was collected by the federal government and turned over to the provinces to be redistributed by them to individuals, groups, and local governments.

Mr. Stanfield: I will read it in Hansard.

Mr. Chrétien: Bonjour, Mr. Stanfield. Add to this the fact that more than $2 billion was distributed in subsidies to farmers and by way of incentives to encourage business to locate in areas of high unemployment, and one wonders how the opposition can become so desperate as to claim the need for a reduction in the administrative capability required to remain fully accountable to parliament in carrying out its wishes.

I would remind hon. members that we spend 500 hours a year examining estimates in the standing committees. When one attends these committees one is amazed by the pettiness of the questions which are asked there.

The other day the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) spent a whole day talking about the potted plants we have in the Treasury Board offices. There is an old man, 87 years old, who read about that in Hansard. He happens to be my father. He took a trip from Montreal to see what the scandal was about. He went to the department for the first time and then he told me, as we say in French, "That was nothing à fouetter un chat. We have better than that in the old folks' home in which I am living." But it is the kind of petty politics which the opposition plays when we give them 500 hours in which to examine the expenditures of the government.

My father is a layman, a good Canadian who worked for 50 years in a factory. And he would not believe we could spend time on petty things like that.

Mr. Baldwin: Was he out on Harrington Lake?

Mr. Chrétien: Oh, the opposition has great fun speaking about the Prime Minister's house. I do not have to defend the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). But what beats me is the way they like to talk about that big Cadillac of his. I know that guy; I have known him for many years. That is the last thing he would travel in—a Cadillac. It's not his style! When we were both practising law he would go to work on a motor cycle, and people could not believe that a lawyer like the Prime Minister, defending unions, would come to Shawinigan from Montreal on a motor bike. But because he is now Prime Minister the RCMP has decided that he should travel in a car like that. I am sure he hates to be in that big car—he would like to drive that little quick one that he owns. That is more his style.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He should have the opportunity.

● (1740)

Mr. Chrétien: It is not wise to have debate and to spend hours or days in the House speaking about matters such as that. But because certain Canadians have put up money to build a swimming pool at the Prime Minister's residence, this is supposed to be a big scandal. It is not the Prime Minister's money, and this swimming pool will be used by future Prime Ministers. I should like to think that one day one of you guys over there will be able to take advantage of it, but the way you are handling yourselves in the House that will not happen for a very long time.

We like to have constructive criticism, but the motion before the House today is not that at all. I might tell hon. members that we are working on the Wilson report. We had two options with which to deal. We could have sent this report to a committee and then waited a year for a report back, study it in cabinet, then bring in a bill which we would send the committee, where it would be another year before it became law. But we have decided to take faster action, and I ask hon. members to judge that. The easiest solution for us would be to send the matter to committee and wait for a report back.

Mr. Alexander: Your front bench support has left.

Mr. Chrétien: Do not worry, they have confidence in me. They know there is no substance to these allegations. I do not understand why we spend so much time on this matter. We have stated our policy. If in the fall or during the next session the government does not bring in a bill, then hon. members will have a good point. Then will be the time to tell me I have not produced. I am doing my best right now.

Mr. Baldwin: Why could not we have some say about this? Why are you afraid of us?

Mr. Chrétien: This report was tabled a few weeks ago.

Mr. Baldwin: I do not have the time to wait another ten years.

Mr. Chrétien: We should go to the substance of the problem. Hon. members say the power of parliament has been removed. The House still had direct control over expenditures and budgets, but the point is that the House of Commons does not want to take action on these things.

Auditor General

Mr. Reid: Parliament has the power to reduce expenditure.

Mr. Baldwin: With that slavish majority over there, that is nonsense.

Mr. Chrétien: For a while we had a minority.

Mr. Alexander: You were good then. You behaved yourselves.

Mr. Chrétien: The people of Canada decided to put all their confidence in one party and they put an end to that situation. We would have been quite happy to share power with hon. members opposite at times, and at other times with the NDP. We were supported by the NDP more, because hon. members opposite were not smart enough. They could have used the situation to get a more conservative administration of sorts, but they kept on playing politics. They always play politics, Mr. Speaker, instead of coming to grips with problems and offering constructive solutions.

Hon. members opposite are always moving motions that produce nothing but a few speeches. I do not mind, of course, because I have to get in shape for the next election and I need the practice. However, I could use my time for other matters that are more meaningful. As I say, we will bring in a bill which will go to committee. If this takes a year, then hon. members opposite can get up and blame me for not delivering. We are here to be blamed if we fail, but we have not even started to take action yet.

Mr. Baldwin: You are afraid to debate the report.

Mr. Chrétien: We are not afraid, but we do not want to lose time. We want to implement some of the good points in the report as quickly as possible, and this is why I should like some constructive criticism from the opposition. Instead, Mr. Speaker, they have gone back to 1780 and governments of that day. Perhaps we would have had more entertainment by reading some of those ancient speeches than listening to the kind of nonsense we have had today.

We hope the opposition will address themselves to the serious problems facing this nation. In less than a month we will have a budget. This would have been a good occasion to tell the government whether to cut expenditure or increase it, and if we should spend more, where we should spend that money. Or they could tell us where to make cuts. Instead they sit back and wait until the decisions are made, and then complain because those decisions are not what they want. The people of Canada would like to know what the opposition feels is the best thing for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) to do.

Mr. Baldwin: He has not made up his own mind yet.

Mr. Chrétien: Of course he has not. He is waiting.

Mr. Baldwin: Waiting for us to advise him.

Mr. Chrétien: He is waiting to hear what hon. members think, but they do not offer any constructive proposals. They have three leaders in that party over there, four critics on economic policy, and so on. Perhaps one day they will all be able to get together.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Mr. Baldwin: Do you follow Munro or Turner?

Mr. Chrétien: We do not fight outside; that is one great quality of the Liberal party. We fight inside and have a lot of discussion, but we know that when the time comes for the good of the country we will stick together. The people of Canada want constructive leadership, and that is what they cannot find among members on the other side. We have our differences. We do not agree all the time. If ever an hon. member opposite becomes President of the Treasury Board, he will soon discover that very few members of the government agree with him. But when the time comes we unite because we know that in difficult times the people want leadership.

Mr. Baldwin: You unite because you love your jobs.

Mr. Chrétien: I will listen to what hon. members have to say, but so far I am not impressed by the motion. It seems to me this is one more day lost. We would have spent the time more constructively if we had debated a bill. We are losing many days by futile debate of irrelevant matters. We have stated our policy, that a bill will be brought forward in the fall or next session. If the bill is no good, then tell us at that time. If I do not bring forward a bill within a reasonable time, let hon. members opposite make a motion and tell me that I have not done my job.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We will remember that.

Mr. Chrétien: What burns me up, Mr. Speaker, is being criticized for nothing. I do not mind being criticized if there is substance to the criticism; but criticizing me for nothing, as hon. members are today, is a waste of parliamentary time. It may very well be that legislation that is good for Canada will not be passed because of this debate.

We hear all sorts of nonsense about so-called waste of expenditure. The opposition has a kind of Watergate syndrome, always thinking that there is something sinister about the government. I think our system in Canada is a good one, but if we continue to use these days to waste time like we are doing today the people will become even more cynical about this place.

● (1750)

Mr. Baldwin: Have you been reading the evidence in the Hamilton trial lately?

Mr. Chrétien: That is the kind of innuendo and so on I refer to. We have a parliamentary system in which we do not go on fishing, expeditions, but when there is a fish caught we fry him in court right away, and that is what we are doing. This kind of innuendo and so on is the sort of thing with which you can kill your mother or your wife. It is like meeting a friend who says that your wife was not home this afternoon and your neighbour was not home this afternoon. He does not say they were in the same bed, but this is the kind of thing that is implied. When you have an accusation, you should make it.

Mr. Baldwin: What do you do with a dredge, boil it or fry it?

Mr. Chrétien: Those guys are close to the stove now. We will see whether the judge decides to put them on the stove or not. That is not our function.

Mr. Baldwin: You hid it until after the 1972 election.

Mr. Chrétien: This is the system we use because we do not want to tarnish the reputation of people for no reason. We should not do that. We should respect the rights of people, but with all these rumours that circulate a lot of people become cynical about politicians.

I have been in this House for a long time, and let me tell you that there are very few guys who sit in this place who are crooked; but because of all this innuendo all politicians are put in the same basket. What we must have is respect for this House and the elected people in this country. In order to get this we must collectively stop this kind of nonsense.

When we have an accusation to make we should make it, and then stand by it. That used to be the rule in parliament, but the situation is no longer like that. This is why people are cynical about us as politicians. The people who come here to all parts of the House are members who want to serve, but people are cynical about members here because too many people play this little game to score political points.

As a result of the poll conducted in Quebec last week we are now right down in the last position. This is a result of these innuendoes and unsupported accusations, and I say this is unjust. Most members of parliament have lost a lot of money and have made many personal sacrifices in order to serve their constituents, no matter to what party they belong. By playing this little game we, as members of parliament, are destroying each other. We have reached the point that it is sometimes embarrassing to admit to being in public life. We should be very careful in trying to score political points at the expense of the other guy, because this is why our political reputations are going down the drain.

We should spend our time trying to be more constructive and attempting to pass good legislation. We should put our accusations on the table. This is what the government does, and then it stands on its own feet. Hon. members should make their accusations and the government will listen to them and then take action.

An hon. Member: The government never listens.

Mr. Alexander: You listen but you don't act.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think my time has expired so I will thank hon. members for giving me the opportunity to practice my bad English.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have had a pretty full and entertaining afternoon. Perhaps the House would consider calling it six o'clock now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we now call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At 5.55 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, the speeches made this afternoon by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Chrétien) are the kind of speeches one likes to follow in the sense of wanting to reply to some of the points that have been made. That is a temptation to which I may yield for a moment, but actually I take part in this debate because I have a suggestion I should like to make. It is not the kind of suggestion that will be acted on tonight or tomorrow morning. However, it is something I should like to throw into the discussion which takes place with regard to the question of parliamentary control over expenditures.

As I mentioned, before I get to the serious part of what I want to say or what I hope is a constructive suggestion, I wish to comment on one or two things that were said. Hon. members will not be surprised if I say I was wondering this afternoon, when the hon. member for Peace River on behalf of his party was complaining about excessive and extravagant expenditures of public money, where he and most of his friends were during the last few weeks when bills were being put through the House to increase salaries of members of parliament, senators, cabinet ministers, judges, lieutenant-governors and so on. If we are to preach restraint and speak against extravagance I believe the place to begin is right here.

Another comment I should like to make is in response to the remarks of the President of the Treasury Board. He referred to his efforts this afternoon as another practice session. I can assure him that he is becoming well practised in dealing with motions of this kind. It is always a delight to listen to him. I must say, however, that when he makes the assertion that the government is not exercising too much power, that is really all it is, just an assertion. When he stands up and says, "But we won the election", I tell him that has been the excuse of every government majority I have seen in this House of Commons.

It is perfectly true that the Liberal Party came out of the election in 1974 with an overwhelming majority. The President of the Treasury Board thinks that the people of Canada really wanted it that way. Maybe they did on July 8, 1974, but I suggest that the people of Canada have been thinking it over a good deal since then. I suggest they realize that governments which have overwhelming majorities sooner or later become arrogant. The trouble with this government is it is not later, it is sooner.

The appearance of having all the power and therefore being free to put off decisions about major issues is something that is annoying the people of Canada, and is expressing itself on the part of the people in the feeling that all they have today is a government with so much power that it can just sit there until the eve of the next election and not really try to cope with the problems facing the country. I think of such problems as housing, unemployment, inflation and pensions. What attention are these problems receiving? I contend that the thrust of the motion before us today, in its argument that the government is exercising too much power and is being careless in the spending of the people's money, does reflect the thinking of many Canadians today.

I hope that since every month we do get a little closer to the next election—it is probably a little more than three years away right now—the government will realize that time runs out and that if the attitude of arrogance is established for two or three years, or three and a half years, it will be in vain to try to dispel that attitude during the next election campaign.

However, I said that I did not want to get into the contest between the Liberals and the Conservatives over who was the blackest but rather that I had an idea that I would like to throw into the discussion of the problem of parliamentary control of expenditures. It is a very real problem. It is a problem not just because the Liberals or sometimes the Conservatives are in power.

The problem arises from the fact that the Government of Canada is a heavy spending operation—somewhere between $25 billion and $35 billion a year are spent. When one considers that that amount of money has to be collected and spent with some degree of propriety, it becomes a huge operation, and the possibility of its being done with adequate checks is somewhat slight, to say the least.

Through the years of parliamentary history in the United Kingdom and in this country we have tried to cope with this problem of controlling public expenditures by means of procedures surrounding the granting of supply. Way back in this House we had the practice, which was in vogue in Britain a few hundred years ago, to the effect that before any supply could be granted, grievances could be expressed, and so on. For a long time we had in the House the practice of taking all estimates, every last dollar, into a committee of supply, which was a committee of the whole House. I think it could be said that in those committees some decades ago we did a fairly good job of questioning those items dollar by dollar. But the fact is—and nobody is to blame for this—that the operation had grown so large that it became impossible to continue to deal with all the estimates here on the floor of the House and in committee of supply.

So we tried the idea of referring estimates to committees. We tried that some years ago. We even had a committee called the committee on estimates. But that did not seem to work very well. So then we tried the idea of limiting the number of days in which the estimates could be dealt with on the floor of the House. That soon became a frustrating experience because all the ministers had to do was to just wait until time ran out and then their estimates were passed.

Then we tried again the idea of referring the estimates to committees, and in effect that is the regime that is being practised now. But we find that to be not very satisfactory. Those who sit on the Standing Committee on Agriculture are not sitting there as accountants trying to save money; they are sitting there with an interest in agriculture, and they want money to be spent on agriculture. Those in the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs have the same approach, and so on. So we are really not getting a study of estimates with a view to checking or limiting expenses.

This very session we are trying an experiment to see if we can correct the situation by bringing the estimates of some of the departments back to the floor of the House for a day or two at a time. I think we have had some pretty good debates on some of these days, but again the efflux of time results in the estimates being passed. Let us be frank about it. With all the good will in the world and all the impartiality we can muster, we have not yet found a satisfactory way of controlling expenditures in any ongoing sense. Some will say that that is why we have an Auditor General.

The hon. member for Peace River is strongly in favour—and I agree with him—of the idea of strengthening the role of the Auditor General. We also have the Committee on Public Accounts. But so far as we in this House are concerned and so far as the public of Canada is concerned, the operations of the Auditor General and of the Committee on Public Accounts occur after the fact.

The Committee on Public Accounts gets as its terms of reference the public accounts after the financial year is closed, and sometimes it is a long time after the year is closed. And the report of the Auditor General is a report on mistakes that were made in the past. This has to be done and it is supposed to have a salutary effect, but in fact it does not provide for any checks on the expenditures while they are being made. I know that the Auditor General's operation is not only a post factum operation but that he has the authority to make ongoing checks in the departments to make sure the departments are not spending money for which there is no parliamentary authority.

What we have not come to grips with yet is the possibility of there being parliamentary control over the decisions as to how money is to be spent. We get the estimates, that Big Blue book, and by the time we get them, they are an accomplished fact. The Treasury Board has decided that these are the estimates. We can discuss them, we can try to reduce them, we can complain about them, but there they are. We in parliament have no part in deciding where that money is to be spent or how much money is to be spent.

I can imagine that some of my friends in the House who, like me, are interested in procedural matters will say that that is part of the way in which responsible government works. The government makes the decisions, it brings in bills or estimates, and then it stands or falls depending on whether the House supports what it does.

I have been around here a while; I am a traditionalist; I like the ways in which parliament is operated, and I suppose I could say, let us stick with the good old ways in which it used to be done. But I wonder if we should not do some hard thinking about this and come up with a way in which members of parliament of all parties in some appropriate committee can have a hand in the decision as to how the money will be spent before it goes into the Blue Book of estimates. Once the items are in that book, all of our discussion in committee of supply, in standing committee, or on the floor of the House, does not change it at all. I should not say that in absolute terms—I have seen one or two dollars changed in a few decades—but in reality nothing is changed.

All the discussion we have afterwards in the Committee on Public Accounts, or among the public on the basis of the Auditor General's report, does not change a thing except for drawing attention to some sins, the result of which is that some of those sins are not committed again for a little while.

What we really need is parliamentary participation in the decision as to how money is to be appropriated, where it should be spent, for what purposes it is to be appropriated, and so on.

As I say, Madam Speaker, I fully realize the conflict between this approach and the idea of responsible government, namely, that the government makes the decisions and all we can do is to say yes or no. But perhaps that idea needs to be considered carefully in light of the complexity of democratic government in a country like Canada today when we are spending $30 billion odd, when we have hundreds of thousands of persons who are working for the government, when we are involved in the lives of our people from the cradle to the grave, perhaps not as much as I would like it to be but certainly a lot more than was the case a few years ago.

Perhaps the sacred notion that only the government can produce that Blue Book and put it before us has to be revamped. Perhaps the sacred right of members of parliament, as the representatives of the people, to have some say about how the purse is distributed should prevail, and we should establish some kind of committee which could have some say in how the money is to be appropriated before it gets into that Blue Book.

I am a party to the experiment we are conducting in this very session. As I have already said, I think that some of the days we have spent on estimates have been worth while. I am prepared to go further and say that I think under our present system perhaps one or two departments per year should come before us without time limit, so that we can really hold the ministers at bay until we get satisfaction about their estimates. But even if we achieve that, we would still be dealing with proposals for expenditures after the fact. In that situation it is inevitable that most of the comments from the opposition side will be comments of criticism and complaint.

The President of the Treasury Board is quite right that members of the opposition complain about too much money being spent on one thing, and then they come along and want more money spent on something else. I will accept that criticism myself. There are things we spend money on around here which do not deserve it, and I think the poor, people on low incomes, those who need better health care and those who need better pensions deserve more money put their way. It is not satisfactory and it is really frustrating that all we are able to do is address ourselves to these things after the horse has been stolen from the public treasury, if I can produce an awfully mixed metaphor.

As I said when I began, I do not expect an idea like this to be approved tonight, tomorrow morning, or perhaps even in this session's Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, but I throw it out, and I throw it out as strongly as I can. I do so as a traditionalist in terms of parliamentary procedure who still likes it the way we did it when I first came here. Granted, we were spending so little money then that we had plenty of time to do it in the old way.

What we need is a new approach to the spending of money. Even if we do not make the same change with respect to legislation, even if the government has the say as to what bills it brings before parliament, surely in terms of the proposals for the spending of money there should be some input into the making of those decisions by members of parliament as a whole before the fact, rather than afterwards. I think if we had something like that, it might be tougher on us in the opposition—we might have to take more responsibility for the decisions—but I believe it would be a better and more responsible way of discharging our task as the guardians of the public purse.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to deal with the motion of the opposition:

> That it is the opinion of this House that it is necessary to declare that the power of the Executive has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished; and, in particular, that means must be found by this House to inquire into, prevent, and correct abuses in the expenditure of public money by the government of Canada, including the immediate passage of laws to strengthen and improve the office of the Auditor General.

Madam Speaker, I think the excessive powers of the present government is the cause of the financial dictatorship exercised by that government. Who is responsible for that dictatorship of the federal government over Canada as a whole which is extended to the provinces?

The federal government was certainly wily with the provinces when it took from them the taxation rights it has exercised for years.

Today, the government is blamed for its tremendous spending powers. I quite agree, but that situation did not originate with the present government. For over 30 years, succeeding federal governments have taken advantage of their sound economic situation to increase their expenses at the same rate as their tax revenues.

Municipalities and school boards complain that the provinces are infringing upon their fields. The provinces voice the same complaints with respect to the federal government which interferes increasingly every year into exclusively provincial fields. While everyone protests loudly against federal infringements, the government apologizes and even strengthens its hold, claiming that it is only trying to save the provinces. Indeed, the federal government, the great protector of the provinces!

It is to improve social justice, as the president of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) said this afternoon, and the same minister added that although the government doubled its expenditures, it is not any worse than the provinces which have doubled their expenditures also. But he forgot to indicate that the provinces are still directly responsible for matters of health, highways, agriculture and all the sectors devolved upon them by the constitution.

Madam Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board greatly disappointed me today all through his speech. I usually like to listen to him, for he is serious, but today, I do not know what sort of wind was blowing, I did not appreciate at all his speech.

● (2030)

I wondered: Is it possible that I could have travelled 500 miles to attend such a speaking contest. He said to the opposition members: If you really want us to work, make us serious proposals. But whose duty is it to make proposals, Madam Speaker?

Whose duty is it to bring forward legislation in this House? The minister seemed to forget that the government does have this authority. And the minister went on: We do not have any control because 50 per cent of the estimates are controlled by the House. The minister knows quite well that every budget is submitted by the government to the consideration of the House and, of course, the majority government always approves it by a majority vote.

If the minister lost control, it is certainly not due to the opposition, but perhaps to the excessive number of technocrats to whom he gave, not to say yielded, all his powers. When he says that expenditures have doubled, he should add that the number of those technocrats has also doubled. The minister also said that we have no time to lose, because we must live in the twentieth century.

The time has come to call the government to reason, to convince it that accumulated deficits will never produce real worth for the country. Even if we discuss government expenditures during 500 hours, we will have lost our time if a negative vote from the government and government members destroys the work of Parliament. This is not the time to play politics in expectation of forthcoming elections. This is the time to administer and save public funds.

We received the new Auditor General's report. I did not read it through, but had a quick look at it. I hope it will be taken seriously by the minister and implemented. I hope the report does not raise government's anger as did the one by the former Auditor General who was forced, although under cover, and I stress forced, to leave his post, because probably he was not looked upon favourably by the government. For this reason, I extend to the new auditor the wish not only that he remain in favour with the government, but also that he stand his ground, that he remain independent in his role. Because I believe that a country's Auditor General must not be influenced by government. The Auditor General's office must be permanent, independent and free to act.

Unfortunately this has not been the case in these last years, with very unfortunate disputes centering on the Auditor General. As long as everyone's function is not respected, as a group with responsibility is not garanteed the freedom to discharge that responsibility, the country will suffer. Everyone is now complaining that government expenditures are too high. That may be true! There certainly are oversights, because we see in the auditor's report eye-opening remarks. There is stated for instance, in paragraph 54, that the auditor recommends adequate control over the defence industry's productivity program.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

I do not wish to read all these data. I shall simply refer to the titles, for I do not have too much time and I simply wish to call the ministers' attention. Because he told us in his speech this afternoon that he would introduce the bill in connection with this report.

We are waiting for this famous legislation, but we are also waiting for the recommendations of the board to be included and not to be put aside.

There is another remark at paragraph 55, and I quote:

55. Internship Salaries Improperly Retained by Canadian Forces Medical Officers.

And paragraph 56 reads:

56. Shared Costs under Assistance Contracts not Verified.

These remarks are rather serious, Madam Speaker. I continue the quotation:

In our 1972 Report (paragraphs 105 and 107) two instances were given of the Audit Services Bureau of the Department of Supply and Services being unable to give an opinion as to the costs of contracts providing Crown assistance to Canadian manufacturers.

It is then recommended that in the future, the government submit these contracts to the auditor who will be entitled to inspect them.

Then, paragraph 57 says:

57. Unauthorized subsidizing of Non-Government Laboratory.

"Unauthorized subsidizing".

If in studying the law, we notice weaknesses in our own constituency concerning unauthorized contracts, and if the auditor and his office have the time to study each item seriously, they will find that action was often taken without the knowledge of the department. It would be appropriate to call the attention of the minister to these weaknesses.

Then, at paragraph 64, we can read:

64. Questionable Payment of Costs of Maintaining Leased Housing.

We may wonder if this concerns housing which was leased and for which the rent was subsequently increased without justification. In some measure, this is what the auditor wants to bring to the attention of the minister.

Paragraph 66 reads:

66. Lack of Authority to Credit Interest to Special Account.

67. Expenditures made Without Proper Authority.

Section 29 of the Post Office Act, R.S., chapter P-14, provides:

The Postmaster General may, without public advertisement, enter into a contract with any person operating a railway, air, bus or common carrier ship service, but no such contract involving an annual expenditure of more than five thousand dollars may be entered into without the approval of the Treasury Board.

Paragraph 68 deals with the duplicate payment of disability pensions. All mistakes done in the accounting, Madam Speaker—without the work of an auditor, an audit office, we could never know about them! I am sure it is like with unemployment insurance in those offices. Inevitably, the men who work in those offices are subject to mistakes like anyone else, and I think that is where you see the importance, the need of having an Auditor General's office that is absolutely free and can have access to all documents in order to inform Parliament on what is happening within the administration. Paragraph 69 deals with losses through the fraud, default or mistake of any person. That is again a human matter—there are some ten cases mentioned in respect of those losses. And there is defalcation at a Canada Manpower Centre. This has to do with employment offices, defalcation at a Canada Manpower Centre—it is serious enough—and I think that in a report such as this in which we see all departments screened they become interested and must keep that report in mind. I think that every department must read that report carefully, and when the legislation is introduced, there will be provisions to prevent such things from happening.

It also says:

> Other cases that the Auditor General considers should be brought to the notice of the House of Commons in accordance with section 61(1) of the Financial Administration Act
> 73. Weakening of parliamentary control.
> All estimates of expenditures submitted to Parliament shall be for the services coming in course of payment during the fiscal year.

I believe the minister is well aware of that. That is where the Auditor general gives notice to the government of the carrying over on the previous budget of several unspent amounts of money on the current year budget. I believe and I hope that the minister, as he said this afternoon, will take this report into serious consideration and will accept it as his own so as to introduce legislation. He asked the opposition party to make suggestions, proposals to him, but let him introduce the legislation. It is not the opposition that will introduce the legislation in this House; let him introduce it and we shall see what it contains. We shall examine it to see if it includes all the guarantees needed to ensure, on the part of the Auditor General, a free discharge of his duties and I believe that from that time on, we will work seriously in this House, Madam Speaker.

● (2040)

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, the part of the motion which concerns me is that part having to do with the power of the executive. I want to discuss accountability and secrecy in government, a perennial difficulty which might be seen in a different perspective, depending on where one sits in this chamber.

It seems to me that if the government could devise ways of being more open with parliament and the people, it would gain substantially in the passage of measures which it wishes to bring before parliament, and its measures would meet greater acceptance on the part of the public. I never understood this conflict between "we" and "they". It seems to me it would be better to use the word "us" when referring to this House.

We adhere a fair amount to the adversary system in public life. It is an important element, and essential. But it seems to me that it is important for members of parliament to have the opportunity to obtain some consensus from the various constituencies on public matters. This would involve not an adversary role for members, but a new role. We can only do this if there is frankness on the part of the government.

I want to compliment the government on one of its measures which has involved members of parliament and constituencies, and found a good deal of acceptance, after some pressure of course being exerted in the introductory phase of the program. I am referring, to the Local Initiatives Program. I am not now discussing individual projects. They have no part in this debate. The fact remains that there has been a major amount of consultation with constituency advisory groups and members of parliament, no matter whether they support the government or not. By and large, projects have been accepted in the constituencies. Some members have had to endure a certain amount of pressure and they could easily have said, "This is the government's program, and the government can take its lumps." But they did not say that. Because there has been a bit of sharing, a bit of openness—with some exceptions, I admit—the program was successful and remains an interesting illustration of what can be done when there is frankness in government.

Having said that, I turn to a side of government spending and government policy where there is no openness, where the reverse holds true. I am referring to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. The department is involved this week in a seminar in Halifax. The national conference on development incentives was called by the Nova Scotia government, held in Halifax, but closed to the public and press in order to permit full and frank discussion. A fair amount of government money is involved, and many of those present are DREE officials or their counterparts in provincial development departments. There will also be representations by organizations such as the Independent Businessmen, the Manufacturers' Association, and some chambers of commerce. I, for one, deplore this method of transacting public business. The meeting has obviously been called in an effort to direct or re-direct regional economic expansion policies which need inputs from the various private and public sectors.

I think it is wrong for the government to be part of any system which bears the imprimatur "secret" or "not open to the public." I forecast that the inevitable reaction will set in after such a conference, and its purpose will be frustrated because of the very shroud of secrecy which has been cast over it.

I have made these points because I want to contrast the LIP program and its openness with the DREE program, which is the very antithesis of openness and, for that reason, is in serious trouble.

In these days many people have been considering the whole aspect of government in democracies. Some have even convened seminars on the general topic of the governability of democracies. I hope that hon. members who are interested will take the opportunity to read an important series of lectures by Ralf Dahrendorf, who is now head of the London School of Economics. Mr. Dahrendorf's first lecture in 1974, which is part of the series of Reith lectures, begins by saying, "The elementary desire to be free is the force behind all liberties." After discussing the dilemmas facing the democratic governments of the western world, Dahrendorf says:

> The force of liberty, of the principles of a humane and open society, may be equally strong, but it needs explanation: moreover, such explanation may lead to different conclusions at different times.

He goes on to discuss the political economy of liberty in a changing socio-economic climate, and then says:

The new liberty which we can hope and work for is a liberal response to a world which is in a process of radical transformation.

He then discusses some of the pressures on governments. I listed some of them, taking my list from another speech which he made. There is a problem facing democracy because of the desire for participation. Governments have asked for participation. We use phrases such as "participatory democracy". I have wondered why democracy needs such a qualifying adjective. Then, once the concept is in operation, governments are confronted with problems because it is difficult to take certain decisions, some of the conflicts participation arouses being incapable of satisfactory resolution, and the government can only act as a mediator or as a referee and thus leave some areas of participation frustrated.

● (2050)

Then Dahrendorf talks about the fact that political spaces are too small and insufficient to reach some of the problems. We have heard, from two or three of our colleagues who have taken part in this debate, suggestions as to ways and means of improving the mechanics of this institution.

Then he says international agencies are not designed to cope. We pay, I presume, more than lip service to many of these agencies, but the fact is that many of the agencies to which we belong, the World Health Organization, UNESCO and some others, are so politicized that what I might call neutral decisions, that is, decisions not based on politics, are impossible to make. The World Health Organization is just about to exclude Israel. UNESCO, in a very cynical mood last November, did the same thing to Israel. So there are serious problems with international agencies. Such agencies, for instance, have no way of coping with the harvest of the sea bed; there are no mechanics other than national ones to decide what is to be done in this field.

Then again, and we are daily witnesses to this, there is the extra-parliamentary power held by giant corporations and giant trade unions, neither of which seem very amenable, I regret to say, to the sovereignty of parliament. I am not indicting anyone; I am stating as a fact that the Port of Montreal is now closed despite a law of this parliament; I am reminding hon. members that despite the efforts of a responsible minister of the government the mails of Canada are in a chaotic state, I cite this as an example of the problems facing the democratic process and there seems to be no way of effectively controlling these extra-parliamentary forces—I was about to use the phrase "bring to heel" but I did not mean that in the sense of interfering with the rights of individuals. But I am rather old-fashioned, in the same way that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) claims to be an old-fashioned person. I have an old-fashioned view as to the sovereignty of this institution and I am deeply grieved when the public becomes cynical about it. I therefore welcome my hon. friend's resolution because it gives us a chance to say some of these things.

Part of the problem, too, is that many of us feel uncomfortable about telling the truth. I think of a couple of people who were not afraid to tell the truth. One was George Orwell, surely one of the great writers in the English language during the present century. He was not taken in by rhetoric even though he was a Democratic Socialist. When his party in the thirties turned its back on what was obviously happening in the Soviet Union, he told the truth. As a result, he was out of favour with the left. He told the truth, too, about what went on later in the authoritarian states—Mussolini's Italy, Hitler's Germany, and so on. This time he fell out of favour with those who in the late thirties cozied up to these dictators and were prepared to accept them.

[Mr. Fairweather.]

These are days when it is well to examine our institutions and procedures and to think about openness in government. One of the senior people in the department of urban affairs had the temerity to discuss with the Indian people a policy decision affecting them. One would have thought the Russians were coming. The man was dismissed, although I notice recently, since those days, there has been a new wave in the department and the very issue for which that director was dismissed a year ago has become the in thing to discuss with the Indian people. I am willing and anxious to give the government credit for its turn-around, but the main thing here is that there should be an opportunity for openness. Nobody here would suggest for a moment that plans to house the Indian people of Canada have anything to do with the national security of the state.

It is my view that the only areas where governments are entitled to keep things secret are where the security of the state is involved, or the privacy of an individual in his dealings with the Crown, or the confidentiality of the Crown's dealings in connection with expropriations and so on. It is this propensity to secrecy which means that in so many instances we parliamentarians read in the newspapers from time to time that policies have been leaked. They are leaked because frustrated public servants are unable—presumably under the Thoreau doctrine of civil disobedience—to accept certain decisions or impending decisions; they feel there should be more public discussion.

I have never been able to accept the government's preoccupation with secrecy. I would have thought the AHOP incident would have shown to the ministry and to the executive that a little more openness, a little more consultation, a little more frankness, would lead to much more acceptance by the public of the issues involved.

The need for openness has been dealt with on many occasions. By curious coincidence, the Library of Parliament this very day sent members a useful check list of articles in leading publications dealing with some of these issues. I took the trouble to get several of them copied. I do not intend at this stage, when other members wish to speak, to load the record with them, but there is a series of articles which are worthy of attention, one, for instance, in the fall edition of The Public Interest by Daniel Bell, the prognosticator of the industrial revolution. His article discusses in a very apt metaphor, I think, "The Public Household—on 'Fiscal Sociology' and the Liberal Society." Might I be allowed to quote a few paragraphs because I think the analogy might find some acceptance on the part of ministers. Daniel Bell says:

● (2100)

In the classical tradition of economics, there are two realms of economic activity. There is the domestic household, including farms, whose products are not valued (a housewife is not paid; the produce consumed on the farm is not always measured in GNP) because they are not exchanged in the market. And there is the market economy, where the value of goods and services is measured by the relative prices registered in the exchange of money.

Here is the important sentence:

But there is also now, more important than the other two—

And I presume the very reason for my colleague's resolution.

—a third sector which has come to the fore in the last 25 years, and which in the next 25 will play an even more crucial role, the public household. For reasons that I seek to make clear below, I prefer the term "public household," with its sociological connotations of family problems and common living, to the more neutral terms such as "public finance" or "public sector."

Bell goes on in an interesting article to elaborate the need, in this whole area of the public household, to exchange views and ideas, and to have some control over the purse strings. I do not want to stretch this analogy any further. I look to the treasury benches tonight, in thinking about public households, and wonder exactly how these learned gentlemen would fit into the public household. I suggest to them that if there were some exchange of information with those who are part of that household in regard to spending and budgets, then the administration of public funds would be much more open and amenable to the scrutiny that this resolution seeks to make possible.

I think that should be enough from me, Madam Speaker, and I should like to conclude by making three points about democracy and its governability. The first is that I hope most hon. members are as nervous as I am about my feeling that there should be retrenchment in the field of education. Though there will soon be a time when fiscal arrangements will have to be made between Canada and the provinces, there cannot surely be, at this stage in Canada's history, any retrenchment in the field of post-secondary education, or any attempt made to tie it to the job market. If this should occur, and if this policy were found acceptable, then as far as I am concerned it is the end of free inquiry by our universities. Certainly I hope that will not happen.

Secondly—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Fairweather: Madam Speaker, may I finish two sentences?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It is agreed that the hon. member may complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fairweather: I am very sorry, Madam Speaker; I do not like to take more than 20 minutes but obviously I have. I was making my second point, which is that there cannot be by government any restriction of free play on the part of the media. I am uncomfortable with the word "media" but it is a convenient word to use. I am made nervous by those people in society who feel there should be some restriction on some aspects of the media. I think probably in the next two years what we will need will be protection, not restriction, of the media.

Lastly, I want to make the point that most of us within the next few years are going to be increasingly aware that we are members, in one way or another, of large organizations. We each have a whole series of organizations to which we owe loyalty.

Once again I go back to the Montreal analogy. The group will be more important to many people than the larger loyalty, and I think this has serious policy implications for governments. I hope this group loyalty will always take second place to the loyalty that we owe to our country.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, what we are discussing today is a breakdown in the operations of the House of Commons. It is quite clear from hon. members who have spoken that there is a great deal of disquiet about the way in which the House of Commons is operating and the way in which it discharges its duties.

I agree with the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), who has moved the motion, that the power of the executive has increased and is increasing. The reason for this is twofold. First of all, the House of Commons has taken many decisions over the last few years. In the ten years that I have been in the House of Commons I have seen parliament give the executive great power to do things on behalf of the Canadian people. Much of the power that the executive has acquired it has acquired because the parliament of Canada has given it that power. Along with that power and authority to do certain things, parliament has also provided spending power.

The executive is also increasing its power in another and very important way. In order to cope with the problems of the 1970's the executive has gone through a number of reorganizations. It has focused on the problems it has had in trying to deliver services. It has analysed those problems and come up with solutions to them. Consequently the executive, I believe, has been able to keep in touch and deliver services more in keeping with the changes in Canadian society that have taken place.

However, contrast this with the way in which the House of Commons operates. The House of Commons operates in a way that would be appropriate if society were at the level it was in about 1900, a time when society was quiet and the demands put upon its politicians and its legislative apparatus were much less. It was a time when there were practically no demands for the involvement of members of parliament and ministers in many of the operations with which they are now concerned. By being able to cope with these problems of supplying today's services and being able to reorganize itself, the executive arrogated a great amount of power unto itself, putting a greater distance between it and the House of Commons.

I believe the reason for this is that the House of Commons has never been able to focus upon what its relationship toward society at large should be. Because it has not attempted to focus upon this issue, it has not been able to cope as effectively with the changes going on in society as has the executive. What frightens me about this is the lack of respect in which parliament is held by many people outside the chamber. They feel that parliament, mainly the House of Commons, is not able to grapple properly with the problems of our society. They feel we are not only wasting our time but wasting their time. They feel we are not able to provide the kind of leadership that is required because the House of Commons is impotent.

In many respects what makes the House of Commons impotent is nothing more nor less than those of us who make up its membership. We have been unwilling and unprepared to give up the mythology about this place that so many of us have had bred into us when we enter this chamber. We have been unable to face the fact that the House of Commons no longer is equipped to do the kind of work that it did 100, 200, 300 years ago when the original forerunner of this motion was run for the first time in the British House of Commons.

We have a swiftly moving society in which changes take place rapidly. Yet we in the House of Commons are profligate with our time. We do not budget our time or attempt to distinguish between what is important and what is not important. We waste our time with trivia and do not focus upon the larger issues of our day. Consequently all one has to do if one wants to find proof of this statement is to observe the debates of the House of Commons on any bill that is before it. Even on many occasions of opposition day motions like this, to look for and find intelligent debate instead of a series of monologues is almost impossible. If one looks at the record of the proceedings before committees, unless there is some very constant whipping of the committee to focus on what it should be dealing with, members go off in all directions, and we do not pay attention to the subject before us. It seems to me that is one of the grave weaknesses of the House of Commons, and there are reasons for that.

When I go home to my constituency I am expected to know not only what is going on in every department of the federal government, but also what is going on in the provincial government and each of the municipalities. That is tremendous pressure that members of parliament have to bear. In the kind of work we do for the constituency we must deal not only with federal departments and agencies but also with other levels of government as well. Therefore it becomes very difficult for us to concentrate on one of two subjects.

Behind the reforms of 1965 and 1968 was an attempt to set up cadres of experts in committees made up of members of parliament who would stay with those committees and learn what the departments were doing and what they were about, and then be able to criticize effectively. We have few experts in the House of Commons. We have few people who have followed the operation of a committee or a department over a long period of time. So what happens is that, when a minister comes before a committee with civil servants and other outside witnesses brought in by the committee, members of parliament do not have the background necessary to ask the right questions, the tough questions to get the answers out.

In many cases the ministers and the civil servants sit there ready to provide a great deal of information, but the questions never come. Most of them are disappointed at the kind of grilling they get before a committee. This seems to be a failure not of the House of Commons but of the members who make it up, and of the lack to any attempt to focus on what really is important.

If we take a look at the way in which the House of Commons operates and read the debates in respect of any bill that you care to choose, we will find that the frightening thing is that most members do not focus on what the bill does. What they focus on is the speech that they happen to be making, and if they can attach to it a particular bill before the House, so much the better. The most fantastic reform that could be made in the House of Commons would be to force members to speak on the topic before them. That would completely destroy 95 per cent of the speeches made in the House of Commons.

One must be realistic, and one has to look at the people who make up the House of Commons and realize that we are not experts but generalists. We are not going to be able to do a job on the estimates, we are not going to be able to quarrel with the government about expenditures, because members are not interested in finding out how the government is administered. What the members of parliament are interested in is the policy of departments, what a department is doing, and in having a department expand its services, preferably in their own ridings. What they are not interested in doing is saying that we must cut back on this service which is going to affect their constituents, or we must cut back on another service because we cannot afford it.

What happens when we go into the committee is that members argue with the ministers to increase the amounts of money they are spending on programs, particularly in their ridings. I do not blame the members. I do this myself when I appear at the committees, and I make my representations to the ministers the way everybody else does.

It should be clear when we are trying to reform the House of Commons, and we should be precise in acknowledging this, that we are not interested in cutting back expenditures or in decreasing services to our constituents, but that what we are interested in is the policy of departments and the expansion of these services. That happens to be the way the House of Commons operates.

There are very few wealthy men in the House of Commons, if there are any, which means that most of us are looking for the expansion of government services rather than contractions. We are part of the average Canadian group, and that is what we are doing. When we look at reform of parliament let us take that into consideration and put together a structure that is going to make some sense.

As I said before, we are profligate with our time. It is quite true that we are taking longer to pass laws than we ever did before. We are sitting longer and producing less. The fact of the matter is, as pointed out by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien), that we are spending more time on the estimates than parliament ever did before, yet we are accomplishing less and feel less satisfaction with the work we are doing. We are spending more time on legislation yet we feel we understand it less.

A book was published this year called "The Canadian Legislative System", written by Robert Jackson and Michael Atkinson. In that book they deal with the amount of time and effort that goes into the passage of legislation. Let me quote from the book at page 157 as follows:

Allan Kornberg's research demonstrates clearly that Parliament has been working longer to achieve less in the twentieth than in the nineteenth century. Table 3 shows that the lengths of Parliaments and the number of sitting days have both increased while the percentage of bills introduced and passed has declined. The average number of bills passed per day between the first and eighth Parliaments was 1.39, but between the 19th and 27th Parliaments the performance ratio fell to .54.

That is a disgraceful record. They used a second example on page 162, Table 4, in which they gave the years of the session, the average number of sitting days, the average number of public bills enacted, the average number of days to pass a bill, the number of pages of enacted legislation and the average number of pages passed per sitting day. Let me take the latter statistics and run down the table for you.

The base period used was 1945-1947 when there was 4.3 pages of legislation passed per sitting day; in 1953-1957 it was 3.7; in 1964-1968 it was 3.5 and in 1968-1972 it went to 3.7. That is quite a decline from 4.3 in the 1945-47 period. Of course the number of pages does not give any idea of the quality of the legislation, but I think it is symptomatic to note that in this particular session it has taken us an average of three and one half sitting days to pass each bill that has gone through the House of Commons. Indeed, if one looks at the size and the complexity of the legislation, we would have to admit this is probably a disgraceful amount of time to spend in the House of Commons on average pieces of legislation.

What we should be focusing on in the House of Commons are those pieces of legislation which are clearly important, and we should be spending more time in committee on those pieces of legislation that are obviously more of regional and less of national interest.

One of the things we have to do is learn to examine our operations from the point of view of time. For example, we should have committees travelling more, but we cannot operate the committees and the House of Commons with the existing committee system if we have them travelling. The fact of the matter is that the machinery we have set up in the House of Commons requires a great number of members of parliament to be present, and when we send out a committee, and right now we have the committee on immigration travelling, we immediately see the very large holes in the ranks of all parties.

We should be re-examining the way in which we do our business so as to provide time for all committees to travel, so that the committee work can be done and members can get out to their constituencies. Right now those of us who have to go some distance to our constituencies find it is becoming impossible to keep in touch with our constituents as much as we would like to do that.

I do not believe this can be called one of the vintage sessions of parliament. I think the House of Commons has been relatively dull. It has not produced much in the way of debate. It is important to realize that the House of Commons is perhaps more of an opposition forum than it is a forum for backbenchers on the government side. Nonetheless, both sides have an obligation. But this House of Commons has not been good. I believe there are a number of reasons for that, and the first is that we have gone through two elections, four years of politics, and most of us are trying to recover from the experience. There are leadership problems and changes taking place in three of the four parties.

The economic problems we have to face are so overwhelming that few countries have been able to find a way out. Members are frustrated because there do not appear to be any easy nostrums available to solve the problems. The last reason is that there is a feeling that the House of Commons is not operating as an effective unit in itself.

I believe that the House of Commons has an important role to play as a deliberative and legislative body. As a deliberative body it should be discussing more often the issues of our times. We do not really do that at the present time very well because, with the nature of our parliamentary system, we tend to be dealing with legislation which is one or two years old. We just do not process the material in the proper way. It lies around and waits and waits, until finally it goes through after one or two sessions. We have bills that have been hanging around for two or three sessions which are still not passed.

The debates that take place in the House of Commons tend to be a farce. Why? Because as soon as a bill is introduced, the minister speaks, perhaps the parliamentary secretary speaks on this side, members on the opposite side speak, and we may have a debate which takes place for one or maybe two days. After that, the debate becomes a monologue because we on this side are told to sit down, not say anything, and try to get the bill through. That means that for the last four or five days of the debate on that particular issue very little is heard from the government side because, if we stand up and say something, members opposite tend to take that as a starting point to continue and go on and lengthen the debate. We must change that because if the House of Commons is to be meaningful there must be debate and not monologues. That means there will have to be an acceptance on the other side that debate ought to take place and that we ought not to have a series of monologues.

Members opposite complain bitterly that they are not reported on what they say in the House of Commons. Of course they do not get reported, because to get reported in the House of Commons there has to be clash. We do not have clash because members opposite do not want to accept any kind of programming or any kind of limitation that would in fact lead to the kind of clash, healthy debate and exchange of ideas that would be healthy and useful for this organization.

Before my time is up, Madam Speaker, I want to run through a series of other suggestions I have concerning possible changes. First of all I think we must focus on working on some kind of allocation of time procedure, not a guillotine but a method by which members opposite are brought into the final discussions when time is allocated on legislation. I believe this is essential if the House of Commons is to become a forum for debate and exchange of ideas, instead of witnessing the kind of sorry situation that debate now passes for in the House of Commons.

Second, we must re-examine the committee process radically. We must reduce the number of committees and the number of people serving on those committees. Right now, to make the committee system work we should have approximately 150 members. We actually have about 65 members from both sides of the House who make the committee system operate. We might as well accept that. We must accept the fact that members of parliament come down here on their own volition. They write their own job description. For some of them committees are a joy; for some they are a drag. Let us face up to this fact. Let us reduce the number of committees and the number of people on them.

We must examine the way chairmen of committees are elected. I would like to see more chairmen elected from the other side. I think this is a desirable reform so that members from all sides of the House can take their full responsibilities in holding offices in the House of Commons. I believe we should also re-examine the way in which we deal with estimates in the standing committees. We must provide more opportunity for the members to focus in on these.

I believe one of the major obstacles to the committees doing a good job on estimates is the fact that there are too many members on the committees. Because of the unreasonably high quorum requirements, there are members who are interested in some committees who cannot get in the amount of time they need in order to do an appropriate job. That means we must cut down on the size and on the numbers, and give them more time.

What the government should be thinking of doing is spreading out the time during which members can carry out an examination of the departmental picture over the full year, and not just have it concentrated in the period between March and the end of May. It would be more desirable if this were spread out over the whole of the year. What we could do is set up four of five departments in the first term, four or five in the second term and four or five in the third term. In this way we would not have the tremendous crunch of committees that now takes place when we consider all our estimates at the same time as the legislative program starts to move through the House of Commons. So, from the period beginning the end of February until the end of May the committees are totally overburdened.

The amount of sitting time committees can get in any given two-week period is about five slots of about an hour and one-half each. This simply is not enough time. We could organize our system better if we gave up the idea that in fact members of parliament are interested in the actual spending, the real dollar figures. What we have to do is see that members are interested in the departmental picture, and design a system where they can have the annual reports, the estimate figures, and whatever other information they require at their fingertips. In this way there would be more time to do the job. This means that many of the functions members now have in respect of the estimates and the way in which committees operate will have to be changed. I think that if we change them and acknowledge what really goes on, we can make reforms that would be worth while.

Another matter I think we should look at with great seriousness is the concept of members of parliament and the roles they play in their constituencies as an important part of the procedure of feed-back for government. Members of parliament complain bitterly that when they speak in the House no one listens to them, and that when they ask questions in a committee no one pays attention. My experience on this side is that indeed members of parliament are listened to in the committees and in the House of Commons by the bureaucrats, the ministers, and the people who assist the cabinet in making decisions.

The problem is that in many cases the members are not sufficiently well prepared in order to make the cases they want to make. However, they are the most valuable feedback system in many cases the ministers and the bureaucrats have in respect of the way in which their programs are actually operating in the constituencies. It seems to me that there really should be some forum, or some way in which members can organize and provide information to ministers and departments in a better manner than is now done through the medium of the estimates.

In many cases I believe there is a failure on the part of the members to actually go out, co-operate, and do the sort of thing the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) mentioned. I feel there are opportunities for us to make substantial changes in the way this House operates, and the sooner we do it the better for all of us.

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, when I first came to the House I suppose like all newcomers I had certain preconceptions of what was going on here. Perhaps the strongest of these was the belief that the executive arm of government was growing at an alarming rate to the point where we were moving in the direction of a presidential system and rapidly away from our traditional parliamentary system of government. After three years I have seen nothing to weaken this conception, and I have seen countless things to strengthen it.

It seems to me a delusion to believe that parliament is the completely effective governing body in Canada. While parliament should be supreme, its authority has been whittled down and carved up by a government that has little respect for the parliamentary process. The tone was set some years ago when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made his infamous remark that opposition members of parliament were nothing more than a bunch of nobodies. This belief has been carried right on through the entire apparatus of government to a point where parliament has been treated with disdain.

Executive power has been increased with fantastic speed. The expenditure of public money has risen with little restraint to levels undoubtedly believed impossible just a few short years ago. I doubt if even the cabinet has much control over this situation. We are being governed primarily from decisions in the Prime Minister's office, and parliament is being tolerated as an unfortunate constitutional nuisance.

A few days ago the Prime Minister came before the House to be questioned on the estimates of the Privy Council and the Prime Minister's offices. Supposedly he had come here to allow parliament to examine and question the gigantic increases in executive power in Canada, and it was to be a day when questions could be asked and presumably answers obtained. It certainly did not turn out to be the kind of day it was supposed to be. Instead, the House was treated to a rambling, filibustering, arrogant monologue, and in effect we were told that it was not our business to ask searching questions.

In effect we were told that the executive branch of the government was supreme and it could do what it liked to do without accountability to parliament, and therefore without accountability through parliament to the Canadian people themselves. The Prime Minister was not only demonstrating arrogance and his dislike of the rights of the democratic opposition but, what is far more important, he was demonstrating his obvious attitude that the government has some sort of God given right to do anything it wishes to do without being properly and adequately questioned about it. His performance was an indignant and almost sneering response on behalf of the government to those who dared to exercise their right on behalf of the people of Canada to examine the galloping rise in government expenditures since the Prime Minister came to office.

One need only look at what has happened to government expenditures since 1968. Then federal government expenditures were about $12.25 billion. This year they are over double this figure, $28 billion, or a little more. In the last year alone, the government has increased its expenditures by over $6 billion taken from the taxpayers' pockets. Years ago the late C. D. Howe made that now famous remark, which came back to haunt him years later, "What's a million?". Today, the government has brought that remark right up to date by saying in effect, "What is another six or seven billion dollars?"

If one works out the total government expenses right down into hours, the government is spending over $3.25 million an hour to carry out its operations. One can only imagine with horror the inevitable disaster to which such policies are taking the economy of the country, and what the inevitable result will be for a democratic parliament if we stand by and allow the power of the executive branch of the government to continue to run wild.

I realize that in using figures to illustrate the situation in Canada today one runs the severe risk of drawing from the Prime Minister a ridiculous statement, such as the one made in the House on Thursday, May 22, and I quote from page 6011 in Hansard. He said: "What I am pointing out is that the hon. member for Leeds is making fraudulent use of statistics". I can only presume that the Prime Minister was referring to figures which I have used in regard to the galloping increases in expenses in connection with the operation of his office, his official residence, his summer home, and the expenses of the Privy Council office. I suggest that if any of these figures are fraudulent, the guilt should be laid directly where it belongs, namely, at the feet of the Prime Minister of Canada, because any figures that I have quoted with regard to such expenses have been taken directly from answers given by the Prime Minister himself to questions asked in the House by me and other members of this party. If the figures are fraudulent, the Prime Minister himself must accept the blame.

In 1970 the cost of operating the Prime Minister's office was just over $1 million, and today, five years later, in 1975, the cost will be over $2 million. If such figures are fraudulent, they are taken directly from government records. The cost of operating the Privy Council office in 1970 was $5,800,000, and this year, just five years later, the figure has gone up to over $17 million. If such figures are fraudulent then the fraud has been committed by the Prime Minister and the government.

In his remarks on May 22 the Prime Minister made light of his own expenses by referring to his ashtrays and his chandeliers. He tried to make a joke of it all in the hope, I presume, that it would be simply swept aside or buried. The fact is that his chandeliers and ashtrays provide a very clear indication of the over-all champagne taste of the present government when it comes to spending public money. It starts at the top with the Prime Minister's emperor complex, it goes along to the royal style of living of the Prime Minister, and moves on without any restraint whatsoever through every department of government. Never was the champagne taste of the government more apparent than when one has examined the cost of the Prime Minister's residence itself, figures that show that the operating costs have increased 173 per cent since the present occupant of 24 Sussex Drive moved in.

If ever there was an example of increasing power of the executive branch, it was the refusal on the part of the Prime Minister to allow Michael Pitfield to appear before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee. In short, the committee and this House were told that certain people in the entourage of government are beyond questioning by the elected representatives of the people. It is almost as if Sussex Drive has become the emperor's palace where statements will be made when the emperor wishes to make them, and in the meantime those of us in parliament should behave by not asking questions.

The arguments advanced by the Prime Minister that Mr. Pitfield was in a position where, as secretary to the cabinet, he would undoubtedly know cabinet secrets and therefore could not testify because of this, are nothing more than sheer nonsense. If a question in this area had been asked, Mr. Pitfield could have declared that he could not answer it because of his attendance at cabinet meetings. There are other questions Mr. Pitfield could have been asked and could have answered. But he has been hidden away from examination. The Privy Council office grows in size to almost 400 people, with another 100 in the Prime Minister's office, and yet this group has been placed on some sort of pedestal beyond proper and adequate parliamentary control.

It might be appropriate to refer to words written by the Prime Minister himself in April of 1963 when he wrote of the Liberal party: "There is not remaining in this party one single man for whom principles mean more than power". It seems to me that the Prime Minister has been reading his own words to a point where he has now put them into practice himself, where it has become power for the sake of power on the part of the executive branch of the government, rather than power for the sake of solving the problems of the people of Canada.

Let me quote again words written by the Prime Minister appearing in Cité Libre with reference to his predecessor. He wrote:

Mr. Pearson must betray the program of his party as well as the principles. He had nothing to lose but his honour. He lost it. His whole party lost it too.

I would suggest that if any honour has been lost by those in the Liberal party, it is being lost by those who sit opposite and go along with the policies of the government which will inevitably destroy this country economically and which are downgrading rapidly the power of parliament.

The Prime Minister also wrote these words: "Pearson, Pickersgill, Lacoste, Gordon—all lousy idiots". I suggest that if there are any idiots at all in the House of Commons today, then they are those who are prepared to sit idly by as the government proceeds along its present disastrous path.

In the three years I have been a member, one of the things that has bothered me the most is the inability of the House to examine properly the estimates of various government departments. I recall, on occasions prior to coming here as a member, sitting in the gallery as a spectator and watching members examining the estimates of various departments. I recall that it seemed at that time that members had some say, some control, over what was going on. But along came this government in 1968 and changes were made that resulted in the operations of parliament being drastically curtailed to a point where members of the House do not have any effective control over the estimates of the government.

I think that the taxpayers of the country would be absolutely appalled if they could witness the shocking spectacle of hurried and inadequate examination of the estimates by the committees of the House in order that the estimates can be pushed through the House by a certain set date, regardless of whether or not members are satisfied with what they contain or with whether they have obtained answers to legitimate questions.

I firmly believe it would be better, and would serve the democratic process better if parliament were to revert to the system of the past where there were no fixed deadlines in existence for the passage of estimates through the House.

Something that should be of the greatest concern to members of the House has been the revelation that certain funds are often buried or hidden in the estimates so that they can not be properly discovered. We have seen examples uncovered recently of hidden votes for so called "security measures", and one wonders how parliament can properly examine expenditures of this country when things are hidden from its view.

I was surprised to learn, when raising certain questions before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee on the expenses of the Prime Minister's office, that expenses for the use made of government aircraft by the Prime Minister are not included in any way in the expenses and operations of his office.

[Mr. Cossitt.]

Since 1968 we have witnessed the Prime Minister travelling to all parts of the world, and when it is on government business I am sure Canadians have no argument with this whatsoever. Nevertheless, the expenses for such things should properly be charged to the operation of the Prime Minister's office, and perhaps the reason that this is not done is because it would also necessitate charging to the same budget the expenses involved in the Prime Minister's use of government aircraft for extensive pleasure and political trips. Surely it is time that the Canadian people knew of the thousands and thousands of dollars which have been spent in this regard by our Prime Minister and which have been buried in the costs of the Department of National Defence, or in the costs of the Department of Transport.

It is strange that if a minister of the Crown other than the Prime Minister uses a government aircraft, the cost of such operation is charged back to that minister's department and reflects in his expenditures, but that this procedure is not followed in regard to the Prime Minister himself. One can only conclude that placing the staggering travelling costs for pleasure and politics on the part of the Prime Minister under the costs of his office would be something more than parliament and the people of Canada would be prepared to swallow.

No one should really be surprised by the government hiding things because secrecy has been one of its main principles. It has been used to withhold from parliament what seems to me in many cases to be legitimate information. Many hon. members at one time or another have been refused answers to questions on the ground that the information fell into such categories "not in the national interest" or "not the established policy of the minister to reveal". Such phrases have been used in most cases for the sole purpose of preventing parliamentary examination of facts.

I suggest that the only reason for any information of any kind ever being withheld from this House should be that the answer, "made public, would be harmful to the national security" otherwise all information should be readily available to parliament. At the same time, of course, one can understand the hesitancy of the government in adopting such a policy because it would obviously make even clearer the encroachments made by the executive branch on the powers of parliament.

One would expect that the Auditor General would be able to dig out all the things which are wrong in the gigantic operation of government, to recommend that something be done about such things, and to expect that something would be done. This has obviously not been the case, and the fact is clearly illustrated by these words written by the former Auditor General, Maxwell Henderson:

Looking back across the years, I can see that the office of the Auditor General of Canada has been increasingly beleaguered. The attempts to hamper his staff and hamstring his investigations have come ever more dangerously close to fruition and today, for all my work, the office is in graver danger than ever before. I can see that unless this post is strengthened—strengthened substantially and soon—two results are bound to follow: first, the staggering toll of waste, fraud, duplicity and ordinary stupidity that costs the Canadian taxpayer millions of dollars every year will continue to climb. Secondly, the ultimate control that parliament wields over the purse strings of the nation will continue to diminish.

Those words not only told what was happening at the time they were spoken but provided a prophetic look into the future. Already that future has become all too visible as the control parliament wields over the purse strings of Canada goes ever downwards. If ever there was a time when parliament should take the bull by the horns and pass legislation to strengthen the office of the Auditor General, that time is now.

The problem seems to be that the government regards the Auditor General as it regards parliament itself, nothing more than a nuisance. When Maxwell Henderson wrote the following words about the then president of the treasury board, who is now the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury), he might just as well have been writing about the entire cabinet. This is what he said:

> Drury, by his own admission to me, never understood the function of the Auditor General; he could never comprehend why we reported all those non-productive expenditures in our reports and I had to explain to him that it was done by order of parliament.

The fact that the functions of the Auditor General had to be explained to a minister is bad enough, but it is even worse that the government should object to parliament being made aware of so-called non-productive expenditures. I recall one non-productive expenditure in my own constituency of Leeds where the government had moved in a water testing laboratory to the city of Brockville just prior to an election campaign. It moved it in with much suitable fanfare for local consumption, and supposedly Brockville had received a permanent establishment from the Department of Health and Welfare. Then when the election was over, the government moved the establishment out to another centre, but it remained stuck with the lease and continued to pay hundreds and hundreds of dollars rent for vacant space in a shopping centre until the lease expired some years later.

I would like to return just for a moment to the growth in the Privy Council office and in the Prime Minister's office, which provides an excellent example of the increasing power of the executive branch of government. What on earth do all these people do? On May 22 the Prime Minister tried to pass it off by saying that about half his staff existed to answer his mail, but a look beneath the surface clearly shows some of the things which have happened since 1968, and probably the most obvious indication of the increase in power of the executive branch appeared in the establishment shortly after the Prime Minister took office of regional desks in his office. No longer were the elected representatives to be the ones who reflected the opinions and views of the Canadian people. Instead, an addition was made to the bureaucracy, and further additions have been going on ever since.

Even these additions are not sufficient to satisfy the obvious lust for power on the part of the Prime Minister and some of his associates. They have found it necessary to engage all sorts of outside consultants, brought in for large fees, to perform services which could undoubtedly be performed by those already in senior positions in the public service. Among the vast personnel in the Prime Minister's office is a horde of administrative assistants, executive assistants, special assistants, and so on. I would like to refer briefly to one of these individuals, the principal secretary to the Prime Minister, Mr. Jack Austin. In particular I would like to refer to a recent Southam News story which stated in effect that he was using the facilities of the Prime Minister's office as an information gathering centre to fight a $70,000 personal tax case against the government.

This is a pretty serious allegation, and it is certainly serious enough that it should have been dealt with immediately by the Prime Minister. If the news story is not according to fact, this should have been stated publicly at once. However, a strange silence on the subject is the only thing coming from the government, and it seems to be yet another example indicating that the Prime Minister's office and the Privy Council office are some kind of inner sanctums beyond parliament, beyond criticism by the press, and beyond any accountability whatsoever to anyone.

I realize that I have only several minutes left, so I would like to conclude by saying that there are many unanswered questions. I think the Globe and Mail in an editorial a few days ago put it well when it said, in regard to the appearance of the Prime Minister before this House recently, the following:

> But what Mr. Trudeau forgets is that there are a great many Canadians who feel entitled to answers to the questions he dodged: why has the cost of running the Prime Minister's office and the Privy Council office increased 40 times over . . .

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has now expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the motion submitted today by the members of the official opposition refers to a bill with a view to increasing and reinforcing the office of the Auditor General of Canada.

I am all the more satisfied, considering that the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) is here and that, as member of the opposition, he is presiding over the work of such a committee. Being myself vice-chairman of the Public Accounts Committee and having had occasion since the beginning of Parliament to participate actively in the committee's tasks, one will readily understand, Mr. Speaker, that the motion submitted by the opposition today is not a matter of indifference to me. Indeed, since the publication of the Wilson report on March 27, 1975, I feel that there is not a single member in this House that is indifferent to the office and future of the Auditor General. But before mentioning anything directly about this report, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out the impartiality, neutrality and honesty with which the hon. member for South Shore is presiding over the destiny of the work of the Public Accounts Committee.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, ever since I have been attending the discussions of this committee, all members of Parliament who are on the committee, including members of the opposition, have noticed by themselves to what extent the hon. member has mastered the work of the committee and to what extent he is concerned about ensuring its effectiveness.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I should like to re-establish in the minds of Canadians the credibility of the Public Accounts Committee. It happens too often that one relies on the sayings of an Auditor General whose mandate has ended, and not enough attention is given to the work of the present Auditor General and that of the committee. It is a known fact, Mr. Speaker, that since the beginning of this Parliament, the Public Accounts Committee has already submitted a first report and is now drafting a second one. This second report, Mr. Speaker, is being drafted following submission of the second report of the Auditor General on March 31, 1974. Since the beginning of April, the committee for public accounts studied ten paragraphs of the report of the Auditor General for the financial year ending in 1974; I think it should be able to table its report within the next two weeks.

That is to say, then, Mr. Speaker, that since the start of the 30th Parliament, that committee has already brought the House two reports. If there was no agreement between the members of the committee to accelerate the work, to avoid partisan attacks, to attempt to diversify the work of the committee by bringing discussions to the table bearing on various subjects, I doubt that we could be as proud as we are today of the work of the committee.

Still, Mr. Speaker, I must point out that the attendance of the committee members during this Parliament is not what it should have been. For instance, I must mention to the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) that his party has failed completely to show up for the work of the committee since the opening of this Parliament.

I should also point out to the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that his party is very seldom represented. It is too bad, because each time we had to rely on a colleague of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, he always raised pertinent questions which could be included as recommendations in our report. I would therefore hope, Mr. Speaker, that this party will be more assiduous from now on.

I would also make the same comment, Mr. Speaker, about the two main parties in the House. The proceedings of this committee often cannot be immediately concretized in recommendations because we do not have quorum. Thus, for example, when we agreed with the Auditor General that a special meeting would be held on October 12, we had to wait to get a quorum while the whips went to fetch some of their colleagues who were sitting on different committees.

I deplore the fact, especially since the members opposite have loudly brought forward the issue of the credibility of the proceedings in the Public Accounts Committee. If they are so anxious to criticize the government administration, they should be the first ones to sit in majority on this committee. Well, I say so, Mr. Speaker, and without any partisan thought, that has never been the case since the beginning of this 30th Parliament. And I deplore it all the more so that the business of this committee is conducted, I think, as I said earlier, in a nonpartisan manner.

I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker—and this has been mentioned directly in the Wilson Commission Report—that the Auditor General's Office has experienced considerable changes since Mr. James Macdonell has been appointed. I want to point out also the excellent work accomplished by Mr. Macdonell in the public accounts committee.

You know, Mr. Speaker, in the Middle Ages there was a saying that when a new monarch was crowned in replacement of one who had died or had resigned, the palace had to be redecorated. Sometimes, that was done to the accompaniment of drums and trumpets, but some other times, it was done in a silent manner, but not less efficiently. I believe that is the course Mr. Macdonell has chosen to follow when he took up his duties.

For instance, when his predecessor, Mr. Henderson took office, 10 per cent of the staff in the Office of the Auditor General were professionals. When he left, half were professionals a quarter of which were chartered accountants, members of Canadian acknowledged institutions. On the other hand, the report of the Wilson Commission stated that out of 395 authorized positions in the office of the Auditor General, only 290 had been filled.

Of course, Mr. Macdonell could have assumed his post, made profound statements, awakened interest in mass media, solicited interviews with newspapers, radio and television stations and attempted to make a fuss about the lack of personnel in the Office of the Auditor General. Such was not the case, Mr. Speaker, he was rather efficient. I am surprised that members of the opposition failed to point this out.

Judging from what the previous speakers said, most of them did not read the Auditor General's report for the year ending March 31, 1975. The hon. member for Leeds in particular most certainly did not read paragraphs 70 and 71. Mr. Speaker, these paragraphs do not deal directly with shortcomings or breakdown in government administration. It is much more general. It is a study on financial administration and control.

This paragraph would authorize the Auditor General to carry out a thorough investigation into the financial administration and control of each and every department and Crown corporation. With his personnel of 290 people, the Auditor General would certainly have been unable to complete this study to which he refers in his report for March 31, 1975, without the assistance of additional personnel. What did he do? Did he call a press conference? Did he complain on TV or on the radio about his lack of personnel? No, Mr. Speaker, he was a lot more resourceful. What did he do? He met the Chairman of the Public Service Commission, as stated in his report on page 75, and asked to take part in the public service executive transfer program.

What is this program all about? It is quite simple. It is a program which permits a department or a Crown agency to call directly upon the private sector and request for the government the personnel who could be associated to an assignment or particular duties. The Chairman of the Public Service Commission agreed to the Auditor General's request, so that 19 accounting firms throughout Canada were called upon to provide the Auditor General with the additional personnel.

Mr. Speaker, although I realize time passes quickly, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to go on with my remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order, please. It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House, pursuant to Section 11 of Standing Order 58, that proceedings on the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

SOCIAL SECURITY—BLIND AND DISABLED ALLOWANCES—DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCES TO ALLEVIATE PROBLEMS OF RECIPIENTS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I find that I continue to make apologies to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) or his representative who is here tonight, for having to appear at the late show on a subject which he continually refers to as a provincial responsibility. I also find that changing conditions, primarily caused by inflation, demand leadership from the minister to deal with what I can only describe as a crisis in Canada. I refer to the crisis which exists in relation to the amount of assistance available to those citizens who suffer from disablement, particularly blindness.

On February 20 I asked the minister if in view of the fact that the introduction of a guaranteed annual income had to be postponed because of differences of opinion by the provincial welfare ministers, whether any discussion had taken place as to the plight of those citizens, the blind and disabled persons of Canada.

The minister correctly replied that most provinces had opted over the years to take over blind and disabled allowances, which are included in the various social assistance programs under the Canada Assistance Plan. But I have to say that at present, under existing conditions, this is not good enough, because conditions today dictate that these disabled citizens cannot under any circumstance cope with the cost of the bare necessities of life required to live even below acceptable standards. And I cannot accept the answer from the federal government that the problem is provincial in nature which, to my mind, is only passing the buck—as I do when I question the provincial authorities concerned.

The Blind Persons Act and the Disabled Persons Act are reported on each year by the federal department of National Health and Welfare since back in 1952. In 1963 the legislation was amended to set a maximum allowance of $75 per month; and later in 1966 was again amended to permit provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan to transfer the allowances under the provincial programs.

I asked the minister and the parliamentary secretary about this. Why this was agreed to by parliament I'll never know, when I try to reconcile it with the fact that the federal government at the same time retained jurisdiction over the Old Age Security Act. By so doing, at the present time the disabled and the blind are at the mercy of 10 or 11 different programs of the provinces which, to my mind, is a ridiculous situation and leaves much to be desired.

But the tragedy of the situation is this; Madam Speaker, and that is that the disabled and blind citizens of this country are at the mercy of the procrastination of both levels of government which, for some reason or other, cannot or will not realize the special needs of those citizens of Canada who, through no fault of their own, were born with or became victims of disablement. And they will continue to suffer and will deteriorate in their bodies and minds as a result of a lack of compassion on the part of those who are responsible.

And I ask the parliamentary secretary replying tonight, when will there be some realization of the need for attendant care that is necessary for the disabled citizens of our nation? Or when will there be some realization of the special nutritional needs of the disabled and the blind, not only the adults but children suffering from the various afflictions that Canada supposedly recognizes? Again I ask, when will there be some recognition of the needs of our own Canadian adult citizens who suffer through no fault of their own?

I know and recognize that the minister responsible on a federal basis is aware of the difficulties that have come to the fore as a result of the action taken by past governments ignoring the needs of Canadians who suffer through no fault of their own and, due to the stupidity and ignorance of past governments, recognizing that disabled citizens must be given some consideration as a result of the transfer of responsibility; but until he can come up with an agreement on a guaranteed annual income he must show some compassion to provide assistance to those who have little or no influence to present a case for themselves in their predicament.

I can only say, Madam Speaker, that the situation which exists has got to be criminal; that these citizens are allowed to exist under the financial assistance presently available in this supposedly affluent nation of ours. And yet the solutions are simple, Madam Speaker, if there is any compassion in the hearts and minds of those who govern, and that is to reverse the various orders in council that proclaimed the criteria for the chronically sick under the Disabled Persons Act of 1970 and the Blind Persons Act. This can be done by repealing that procedure to give the provinces the option I have expressed, and by introducing on a national basis an amount of assistance to allow those who are disabled or blind the basic benefits which Canada proclaims is in her interest to provide for Canadians.

The disabled of our country should be granted immediately an amount of assistance even related to the poverty line figures as established by Statistics Canada, or according to their established needs as related by the Senate Committee on Poverty, which the government chooses to ignore. Else let it ever remain on the conscience of every member of parliament that we have ignored those Canadians who have no voice in presenting their case to those who are elected to govern. I hope the parliamentary secretary will be able to provide an answer to this predicament which exists among those who are blind and disabled.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member so rightly indicated in his question of February 20, and again tonight, the provinces can provide more substantial benefits to the blind and disabled persons within their boundaries by opting to apply the more generous provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan instead of the Blind Persons Act and the Disabled Persons Act which sets a maximum benefit at $75 per month.

It was because of the limitations of the categorical programs which classified need into the categories of blind, disabled, unemployed, and so on, that it was decided that the federal government would cease to participate in these programs. Most provinces have decided to cease to accept applications under these programs and have transferred recipients to their more comprehensive assistance programs. Unfortunately, the province from which the hon. member comes has preferred to remain within the programs which limit allowances to $75 per month, rather than apply for blind and disabled provisions under the Canada Assistance Plan.

I must also correct the impression the hon. member would leave with the House when he implies that "the guaranteed income is a long way down the road." I would point out to hon. members that, at the most recent conference of ministers of welfare, it was reaffirmed that the social security system should incorporate income support for people who are unable to work or for whom employment cannot be found—those very people of whom the hon. member speaks, the blind and the disabled, as well as the aged. As the minister said in this House on May 7, 1975, "A guaranteed income program for those unable to work should be implemented as soon as possible, even as soon as 1976." I would refer the hon. member to the communiqué which was issued at the end of the conference and made available to all members of the House for more details in this respect.

I would also like to point out to the House that a major element of the new approach to social services and one which received unanimous approval from all the provinces was that people in receipt of support should be provided with the rehabilitation and employment services required to make it possible for them to take employment found or created for them. It was agreed that cost sharing for rehabilitation services to disabled persons would be substantially improved by adding a number of services not hitherto covered by shared cost agreement, including transportation services and the operative and capital costs of provincial rehabilitation facilities.

In addition, sharing would apply when such services are extended for the purpose of helping disabled people to become more self-dependent in their homes instead of only when the services relate to obtaining employment. Improved financing for support services for the aged and handicapped is intended to enable as many as possible to remain in their homes and communities rather than being sent to institutions. Such services could include homemaker services, meals on wheels, and day-care for the aged and the handicapped.

[Mr. Marshall.]

I have just stated what this government is doing for the blind and disabled and others for whom the government shows such deep concern.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—CREATION OF JOBS IN AEROSPACE INDUSTRY IN WINNIPEG—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on May 23, 1974, a great stage production reached Winnipeg, Manitoba. It was none other than the "Liberal travelling road show" with a list of goodies. The main actors in this road show were the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson), and the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay). It had an illustrious director, none other than the president of the Liberal party of Canada, Senator Molgat of Manitoba.

In this great ham production it was announced that there would be a $15 million hangar built in Winnipeg—one of the goodies. It was reminiscent of the 1972 campaign, the "goodies campaign". Well, we have seen no evidence of this $15 million hangar being built, and if it ever is built it will not be a political gift. It was announced as far back as 1968 as an Air Canada requirement for Winnipeg to look after the larger aircraft.

It was also said in this road show that 800 aerospace jobs would be created in Manitoba. We have seen no evidence of 800 jobs being created. There has been a decrease in the number of aerospace jobs in Winnipeg. Despite the announcement that the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) made last week that the Buffalo aircraft would be overhauled at the Bristol plant, this will mean no increase in staff whatsoever.

Shortly after this big show on May 23, 1974, the Liberals put out a paper called the "South Centre Focus". This paper states that 800 new jobs will be created for Winnipeg South Centre, and continues:

> It is estimated that 800 new jobs will be created as a result of James Richardson assigning all the Department of National Defence Boeing 707 work to the Winnipeg facility and as a result of the directions given Air Canada.

What does this mean to my riding of Winnipeg South Centre? A bunch of baloney. They are so concerned with my riding! It would mean the addition of 3,600 people into the community, based on a family unit of four. It is said that these jobs would mean an annual payroll addition of $10 million, based on an average wage of $12,500. I say that is completely false.

I now refer to some other election material put out by the Minister of National Defence:

> The latest and in some ways the most important achievement in Jim Richardson's six years as the federal member from Winnipeg South is the return of a major Air Canada overhaul base to Winnipeg.

Completely false. This election material goes on to say:

> That "something" has been achieved by Jim Richardson and the Air Canada overhaul base is back home again in Winnipeg.

Another complete and total fabrication. He is playing with people's lives; he is misleading people, and hon.

members opposite do not care. I hope they have a good answer; if so, I will apologize.

This material goes on to say that Air Canada's $15 million super hangar will overhaul the Boeing 727's. The 727's are going to be overhauled in Montreal, and the minister knows it.

Air Canada made a statement on December 5, 1974, under a heading in the Free Press "Air Canada hangar role 'conjecture'". The statement continues:

The type of work to be carried out in the new Air Canada line maintenance hangar which should be built by 1976 is still "conjecture", and Air Canada spokesman in Winnipeg said in a telephone interview Wednesday.

Then we have been told that more grants will be made available for CAE in Winnipeg. Under the heading "Richardson, Marchand consult on Winnipeg aircraft work", a Free Press report goes on to say:

A federal government capital grant of between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 is available for new equipment at the CAE aircraft repair base—

I guarantee that the whole thing will be closed down by the end of the year. In answer to a question of mine on May 23 about the creation of 800 aerospace jobs, the Minister of Supply and Services said that Bristol Aerospace engaged more workers than last year. I have checked into this and there has been no expansion whatsoever at Bristol Aerospace. The minister went on to say that the "general aeronautical situation in Winnipeg is much more advantageous than in any other region of Canada". If it is advantageous in Winnipeg, I should like to know what it is like in the rest of the country.

Another news release also from Boeing indicates there are layoffs rather than any expansion. In a news release dated May 29 from the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers of Winnipeg it is stated:

From the present total employment of 160 (98 union, 62 management), there will be continuous layoffs until the total employment target of 69 (48 union, 21 nonunion) is reached on August 1, 1975.

We are going down, Mr. Minister, we are not going up to the 800 figure, and we will never let you forget this in Manitoba. The press release continues as follows:

To reach this goal there will be 91 layoffs within the next two months.

In its future plans, C.A.E. finds it no longer good business sense to retain its Department of National Defence approval, therefore, will no longer be qualified to perform any sort of work for the Department of National Defence. It also means the elimination of all side shops such as welding, heat treating and plating.

The Company does intend to retain its M.O.T. approval which allows it to work on civilian aircraft; however, this type of work is of a very inconsistent nature.

The news release also states:

Air Canada still owes C.A.E. 100,000 man-hours of work for 1975, and D.N.D. owes 40,000 man-hours of work.

I hope the minister will be able to inform me tonight when this work is to come forward. The release continues as follows:

Supply and Services Minister Jean-Pierre Goyer stated that Winnipeg is a privileged city because of all the aerospace work being performed here; we question this statement. We also realize that the promise to create 800 new aerospace jobs in this city was a damn lie.

TransAir did absorb about 20 C.A.E. employees but since January 1, 1975, 130 employees have departed from C.A.E. Many former C.A.E. employees have been forced to accept low paying jobs, and you can be assured that they have considerable resentment toward the government because of its lies and neglect of the West.

I should like to point out that the aerospace industry—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to comment on the non-parliamentary words that have been used by my hon. friend, as I think we have had a lot of those comments today. Perhaps we can go to the substance of the matter.

Since January of this year my department has placed a total of $11,907,000 in contracts with the Manitoba aerospace industry. For the balance of this year I expect that an additional $4 million will be placed quite shortly, possibly rising to $6 million, depending on the timing of future government aircraft programs.

Of this work close to $6 million worth of contracts will be carried out by Standard Aero in the manufacture of engine components and the repair and overhaul of engines, while almost $8.9 million involving manufacture of aircraft components and the overhaul of aircraft will be performed by Bristol Aerospace Limited. As a matter of fact as recently as last week I announced a contract with Bristol in the amount of $1.64 million for the conversion of D.N.D. Buffalo aircraft to research and rescue machines.

These government contracts alone will provide jobs for over 700 people in the current year. I think it is important to recognize the substantial share of the federal government's aerospace requirements that is enjoyed by the Manitoba sector of the industry. For example, in the fiscal year 1974-75 the distribution of aircraft repair and overhaul contracts alone present the following interesting figures: In terms of dollars awarded the figures are Nova Scotia, $4.7 million; Quebec, $29.5 million; Ontario, $29.1 million; Manitoba, $13.8 million; Alberta, $2.4 million and British Columbia $262,000. In terms of dollars per head of population Manitoba is first with $13.67. Second is Nova Scotia with $5.79. Then Quebec follows with $4.89. The total for Manitoba is away out in front of all the provinces in its share of the repair and overhaul business.

I should further note in passing that while employment in the aerospace industry declined nationally from 35,000 to 25,400 people between the end of 1969 to the middle of 1974, it rose in Manitoba from 2,300 to 2,900 people in the same period. Definitely things could be improved, but I believe this proves that Manitoba is well ahead in terms of the aerospace industry.

In conclusion I should like to say that in respect of the Air Canada hangar the hon. member will see that the government will fulfil its promise. In the case of the DND-707 repair and overhaul facilities I hope that the strike at TransAir will come to an end in order that we may continue the work we promised in Manitoba.

Adjournment Debate

ENERGY—FUNDY TIDAL POWER PROJECT—INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF STUDIES

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, the problem of assuring an adequate production of low-cost power for the Atlantic seaboard is compounded by the lack of co-ordination between the federal and provincial governments, the lack of positive leadership and planning.

I made the suggestion to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) in committee and in the House that the greatest potential infrastructure dynamic in Atlantic Canada today is the Fundy tidal power project, which has been favourably endorsed and is to be the subject of a five-phase study. What I wish to do tonight is convince the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion that it is very important for his department to be directly involved in the Fundy tidal power project to ensure that its full impact as a development tool is recognized and realized. In other words, I want DREE to assume the leadership for this project and fill the vacuum which has existed too long. I feel that DREE has demonstrated the capability of being the vehicle to harness the input of all departments of government, the provincial governments and agencies, to move this project forward.

The Fundy tidal power project can have a tremendous impact on recreation, tourism, industry and commerce in Atlantic Canada. It could do for Atlantic Canada what the tar sands can do for western Canada. It is my hope that the minister would welcome the challenge. At the very least, DREE should be represented on the study board.

The Atlantic region of Canada has one of the greatest predictable energy potential developments in the world. At the head of the Bay of Fundy, between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, the tides rise and fall some 50 feet twice a day, and this phenomena will go on forever into the future. The energy which this volume of water could generate passing through turbines amounts to billions of kilowatt hours when converted into electric energy. A large-scale Fundy power development would save over 10 billion barrels of oil over a 75-year period.

The development of a Fundy tidal power project in the Atlantic region would be the first real infrastructure on which all manner of other industrial enterprises could be founded. It is only natural that enterprises consuming power will locate where the source of power is large and constant, not threatened by external factors such as world politics and resource shortages. There is a vast potential for electrochemical and electrometallurgical industries which are so dependent on the availability of large blocks of electrical energy. Moreover, there could be a tremendous surge in tourism which will have a great impact on employment growth rates within the related service industries.

Fundy tidal power development has many advantages. It can provide an independent energy source for Atlantic Canada while conserving oil for the rest of Canada. It can help to improve Canada's balance of payments. It would provide Atlantic Canada and the rest of Canada with greater security against the risk of rising energy costs. It becomes part of the solution to the basic problem of regional disparity, and it gives people of the Atlantic region a sense of pride and confidence, not only in their own region but in the knowledge that they can contribute significantly to the rest of Canada.

[Mr. Goyer.]

With all these advantages going for it, and a major energy crisis on our doorstep, now is the time for action on the Fundy tidal power project. It is time that the federal government, and in particular the Department of Regional Economic expansion, took the initiative and provided positive leadership in this field. With strong leadership we can have interprovincial support, and with strong direction and purpose we can have federal-provincial co-operation. The sooner these great sources of renewable wealth can be developed for the benefit of the citizens of Canada, the better.

I suggest that a start could soon be made on the Shepody Bay and possibly the Minas Basin project by forming a Crown corporation, with shares owned by New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in proportion to their investment and legal rights, and with financial input from the federal government. Strong leadership from the federal government could bring the provinces together to settle the many questions concerning the division of obligations and benefits from such a project.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to respond to the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie). He has spoken about federal leadership in energy matters relating to the Maritimes. I should like to point out to him some facts of life.

Let me point out, first of all, that the federal government in the past year has poured $1 billion worth of compensation payments into Quebec and the Atlantic provinces to provide a uniform price for crude oil. I should also like to point out the Point Lepreau nuclear generating station which will receive half of its funding from the federal government, as well as the hydro interconnections between various provinces and the value of that standing offer by the federal government.

The hon. member has quite rightly raised the matter of the five Fundy tidal power studies. Surely this is one of our great untapped power generating sources. I assume that the hon. member is referring to the recommendations of the Bay of Fundy Tidal Power Review Board. That board suggested that the 1967-1969 Atlantic Tidal Power Programming Board study be extended by a series of phased studies relating to the five following points: first, marketing of tidal power; second, transmission of tidal power; third, retiming or storage of tidal power; fourth, power system studies relating to utilization and marketing of tidal power; and fifth, environmental impact arising from development of tidal power in the Bay of Fundy area.

I am happy to indicate to the hon. member that arrangements have now been concluded whereby the federal government is authorized to meet 50 per cent of the cost of the recommended studies, and the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia will each pay 25 per cent of the cost, up to a maximum total cost $3 million.

Discussions have been and are currently taking place between federal and provincial officials on the setting up and management of the study program. A meeting of federal and provincial officials is currently scheduled to take place later this week so that they may allocate specific study work projects and arrange for their execution.

I think this will indicate to the hon. member that activity is going on between the two levels of government to see that these important studies related to the Bay of Fundy tidal power will be carried out.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY OF DELEGATES OF THE FRANCE-CANADA INTERPARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Speaker: Before the oral question period, I wish to mention the tenth anniversary of the France-Canada Interparliamentary Association. We are quite honoured in stressing the importance of the event to receive the French delegation.

I am pleased to draw to the attention of the House the presence in the Speaker's gallery of the members of the French delegation under its very distinguished president, Mr. Lucien Neuwirth. On behalf of hon. members I extend to our distinguished guests a very sincere welcome.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN IN QUEBEC—OUTLINE OF GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO DEAL WITH SITUATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister indicated yesterday that the government was preparing to take certain legal actions in respect of the withdrawal of the services of longshoremen in Montreal. He said he would expect that by "tomorrow", which is today, he or one of his ministers would be able to inform the House in this regard.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Justice or myself could indicate that contempt charges are being laid this afternoon—they may have already been laid—and that actions are being taken against a certain number of longshoremen. If the hon. Leader of the Opposition wants further details, perhaps the Minister of Labour might give them.

● (1410)

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Minister of Labour might try his hand at telling us what is going on.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would advise the Leader of the Opposition, as the Prime Minister indicated, that contempt proceedings are being initiated this afternoon against the union in question. I have also been advised that this afternoon there will be charges laid under the Criminal Code against the president and the vice-president of the union and other people. Also proceedings are being initiated for offences under the Canada Labour Code against certain individuals. Fourth, I would advise the Leader of the Opposition that evidence is being analysed concerning possible intimidation. After the analysis of that evidence, if it should appear to be sufficient, we will turn it over to the provincial authorities. In the meantime, so far as any possibility of intimidation being carried on on the premises to prevent workers turning up for work or other types of intimidation, the National Harbours police in co-operation with the Montreal police would prevent this form of conduct.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this question to the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Justice. Could either gentleman indicate the nature of the criminal charges being laid and tell us whether these charges are being laid under a general instruction of the Minister of Justice of Canada or under the auspices of the government of the province of Quebec.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the initial charges being proceeded with involve actions which constitute possible infractions under the Criminal Code and the Canada Labour Code, and accordingly those will be proceeded with by the agents who ordinarily are agents of the Attorney General of Canada, but insofar as they involve Criminal Code matters they will be acting as agents of the provincial attorney general. There may be certain other matters more clearly and ordinarily criminal in their nature, without any connection with the Labour Code as such, and these will be referred to the agents of the provincial attorney general.

STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN IN QUEBEC—NUMBER OF PEOPLE INVOLVED IN PROSECUTIONS—TYPE OF PROCEEDINGS AGAINST VICE-PRESIDENT AND PRESIDENT OF UNION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell the House how many individuals are involved in the series of prosecutions we have been hearing about in the last few minutes. Are we talking about half a dozen or are we talking about hundreds of people? What is the effect of this and what is the anticipated number of men who will be subject to charges, either contempt charges or charges under the Criminal Code or the Labour Code.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, so far as the reference to charges this afternoon is concerned, these charges are against the president, the vice-president and three or four others. That is my information as of this afternoon. With regard to the possibility of future charges, I cannot give any further information at this time.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary for the Minister of Justice. Could the minister tell the House whether the charges against the president and the vice-president of the union are being brought under the Criminal Code or whether these are contempt proceedings under the back-to-work legislation passed a few weeks ago in the House of Commons.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might clarify what the Minister of Labour said. We are planning to proceed with contempt proceedings arising out of the order of the Chief Justice made following proceedings under the special bill passed. That will go forward at once. There is in addition the matter of charging individuals for contravention of the special law in which cases charges will be laid under the Criminal Code. The same facts relate to sections of the Canada Labour Code. Some five individuals are involved in the immediate charges today.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, for clarification may I ask the minister, when he said there are contempt charges being laid now in connection with the refusal to obey an order involving the Quebec courts several weeks ago, could he tell the House now exactly how many people are involved in those particular proceedings. He mentioned the number five, and I am not sure whether he was referring to these particular proceedings when he mentioned that number.

Mr. Lang: The proceedings which came before Chief Justice Deschênes are against the union organizations as such and not against individuals.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER AND MR. TRUDEAU—DATE OF RULING

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before recognizing the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, may I take a second to say something I intended to say at the commencement of today's proceedings. With respect to the outstanding questions of privilege, I thought it might be possible to make my ruling today. I find I would prefer to make it tomorrow afternoon at three o'clock.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED STATEMENT OF SERGEANT LEDUC IMPLICATING GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES IN DRUG TRAFFICKING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. I should like to ask the minister whether a certain Sergeant John Leduc of the RCMP drug squad was acting with his knowledge or with his approval when he made certain statements to the press which implicate directly some 60 government employees and indirectly many more in the Montreal area concerning charges of illicit trading in drugs.

[Mr. Munro (Hamilton East).]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker, he was not, nor was he acting with the authority or knowledge of the commissioner or even of his commanding officer. As a matter of fact, we are not too sure whether the particular officers mentioned in the article did in fact make those statements because they are presently out of the country on a drug investigation. But it is being checked at present.

Mr. Broadbent: What steps is the minister taking concerning these very serious allegations? Does he intend to inform the House of the nature of the investigation that is taking place? I am asking the question knowing full well that the minister may not be able to give all the details if an investigation is underway, but I am concerned and the House is concerned not only about the potentially guilty people involved but also about the substantially greater number of innocent people who have been implicated by the revelation of this kind of information.

Mr. Allmand: I agree with the hon. member on that point. That is why we never say that an investigation is underway while it is still underway. I am meeting with the commissioner this afternoon and we will discuss this further. All we can say at present is that there has been an investigation into certain allegations of activities at the airport. I just cannot give any more information at the moment, but I will be ready to report further tomorrow.

ALLEGED RCMP REPORT CONTAINING ALLEGATIONS AGAINST EMPLOYEES AT MONTREAL AIRPORT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Revenue. Could he inform the House on whether an RCMP report—which I am informed was made to his department more than a year ago, that is prior to the time the present minister became minister of his department—was brought to his attention concerning certain allegations made about employees in his department at the Montreal airport and, if so, what action he has taken since he became minister to deal with that report?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as indicated by the Solicitor General, it is very difficult to comment on inquiries of this nature. In so far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned, we have co-operated fully with the RCMP in any investigations at that port in order to apprehend anyone who might be in violation of the law.

DATE WHEN MINISTER BECAME AWARE OF INVESTIGATION OF EMPLOYEES AT MONTREAL AIRPORT ALLEGEDLY INVOLVED IN DRUG TRAFFICKING

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Solicitor General, and it falls along the lines of the questions put by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. Can the minister tell the House when he was first aware of this alleged internal report of the RCMP and of the investigation?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): When a reporter approached me in the corridor this morning and asked me if I had read the article in the Globe and Mail.

NATIONAL REVENUE

POSSIBLE MINISTERIAL INQUIRY INTO ALLEGED INVOLVEMENT OF CUSTOMS OFFICIALS IN DRUG TRAFFICKING

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I must say that that is a most illuminating answer. I have a supplementary question which I should like to direct to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister at present conducting an internal ministerial inquiry to ascertain whether customs officials are directly involved in this alleged smuggling conspiracy?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, we are working with the Solicitor General's department and the RCMP to determine it.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

MEASURES TO PROTECT PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN INDIAN AND INNUIT VILLAGES AGAINST FIRE

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Has the minister been advised of a fire which could have resulted in loss of lives in Sand Park, Fort George, during the night of May 11, and can he tell us whether steps have been taken to inspect all federal public buildings in the Indian and Innuit villages to correct all deficiencies in the electric heating systems and others which could endanger the lives of citizens living in those buildings?

[English]

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice. I was not aware of the fire to which he referred. I do know that around Christmas of last year we received a report from the Dominion Fire Commissioner concerning the school to which the hon. member referred. All the measures recommended in that report dealing with public safety and the safety of the occupants were taken, including the installation of fire extinguishers, panic doors, alarm systems and so on. Next week further inspection of the electrical system is scheduled, and four new hydrants are to be installed in the near future.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Since this inquiry was conducted a year ago and this incident has just occurred, can the minister say whether he is in a position to take steps to have these public buildings rechecked and do whatever may be necessary to prevent any recurrence in the future?

[English]

Mr. Buchanan: As I said, most of the corrective measures suggested have already been taken. We are now in the process of taking the final measures, and there will be an additional inspection next week. A similar process of inspections is carried out in our buildings throughout Canada.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN IN QUEBEC—POSSIBLE MEETING BETWEEN UNION REPRESENTATIVES AND MINISTER—DATE OF RE-OPENING OF PORT OF MONTREAL

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Darmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to come back to the situation in Montreal for a moment and direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Leaving aside for one moment the area of charges, because I think the concern of the country is to see the port re-opened and the men back to work, could the minister advise the House whether he or any other members of the government are prepared to meet with representatives of the longshoremen's association who, I understand, are coming to Ottawa tomorrow for the purpose of airing their grievance? Could the minister give us some indication, first of all, whether he will meet with them; and second, whether he believes the port might be back in operation in a relatively short period of time?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, indications have been conveyed to the union in question that I would be prepared to meet with them. I will certainly not meet with them while they are in breach of a law passed by parliament. If they go back to work, I would be prepared to meet with them any time, of course, at their request.

With regard to the second part of the question as to my hopes that the port will be open and back to normal, I can only say that that is my hope and that we are trying to take all the actions necessary to see that that is the end result.

ENERGY

FUNDY TIDAL POWER PROJECT—COMPLAINTS OF NOVA SCOTIA OFFICIALS REGARDING DELAY OF STUDIES

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources which I asked the Acting Prime Minister on Friday. Have any complaints been directed to him or through him to the government regarding developments in connection with the new studies proposed relating to Fundy tidal power, in view of the fact that a number of complaints have been made by officials in the province of Nova Scotia regarding delays?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have had correspondence with the two premiers involved in this regard indicating their appointment of officials to the study, but I have not personally received complaints in this regard, although I have seen press stories to this effect.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention that I visited the tidal power station at La Rance, in France, last week, and I wish to express my thanks to the French government for their courtesy on this occasion.

FISHERIES

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND SEAFOOD PROCESSORS—REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE IN CARRYING STOCKS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State (Fisheries) and ask him if he is in a position to indicate the reply he made or will be making to the urgent request for financial assistance he received from the Prince Edward Island seafood processors. As the minister knows, they are forced to make this request because of the burden of carrying stocks of a very costly unsold product.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons the inventory of unsold products is fairly high is that in some areas the catch has been very good and we rejoice in that. As for the problem raised by the hon. member, I was contacted yesterday by the provincial minister of fisheries, Mr. Henderson, and I also had a word with my colleague, the Minister for Veterans Affairs. Today I discussed the problem with my officials. Tomorrow, one of my officials of the Fisheries Prices Support Board will go to Prince Edward Island. We are giving the matter priority.

LOSS OF LOBSTER GEAR—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF AREAS TO RECEIVE COMPENSATION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the same minister. Could the minister indicate to the House if he has had a chance to examine the ice condition reports that I sent to him some time ago and if the areas designated to receive compensation for the loss of lobster gear last year are to be taken under consideration again?

[Mr. Munro (Hamilton East).]

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I regret to inform the hon. member that I do not find it possible to positively review the matter a year after the decisions were made.

ENERGY

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF INTERNATIONAL ENERGY FUND—SUGGESTION FUTURE CONFERENCES OF PRODUCER-CONSUMER COUNTRIES CONSIDER QUOTAS ON OTHER COMMODITIES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Could the minister inform the House what position the government of Canada took at the recent meeting of the International Energy Agency in France with respect to the proposal of the Secretary of State of the United States for the development of an International Energy Fund? Did Canada agree to participate in such a fund and did Canada agree with the concept of limiting imports inter-domestic markets of foreign oil?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that question was not raised extensively at the International Energy Agency meeting although the propositions were discussed. In fact, at this point Canada has not agreed to the establishment of a fund or indeed to any limitation with regard to domestic action. Our principal attention at the conference was directed to the early completion of the allocation agreement in the event of any future international interruption of supply and also to support of the proposal that there should be more extensive international co-operation in the area of research and development.

Mr. Gillies: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What position did Canada take about the proposal that any future producer-consumer meeting with respect to oil should include a study of the possibilities of production quotas and so on in other commodities as has been proposed by third world countries?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we generally supported the initiative taken by the United States Secretary of State to have a resumed producer-consumer conference at which not only the question of energy but also the broader questions of manufactured products and other commodities could be discussed. We are waiting with interest to see the extent to which the other participants in the producer-consumer meeting, particularly the less developed countries and producers, would find the proposal of the Secretary of State a helpful step in getting the meeting going again. It is our general view that it would be useful to have a meeting and we would be quite prepared to discuss it on a broader basis.

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES—MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE PROBLEMS RESULTING FROM PROHIBITION OF IMPORTS OF POLYESTER FIBRES

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

What solution has the minister adopted to solve the problems caused to clothing manufacturers through the stoppage of polyester fibres imports from Hong Kong?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Canadian government the Hong Kong authorities restrained their exports due to representations made by the Canadian industry with respect to injury or threat of injury. Canadian fabric producers have stated that they can supply garment manufacturers with a substantial amount of the fabrics for delivery between now and mid-July. The Hong Kong authorities have also been authorized to release for immediate shipment the fabrics that were scheduled for shipment by the end of April. If there are cases where the type of fabrics offered by producers do not meet the quality standards, we will take a close look at those particular hardship cases.

STATUS OF VIETNAMESE ART TREASURES—POSSIBLE EXAMINATION BY EXPERT

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, on May 27 in response to a question concerning a shipment of Vietnamese art treasures to Canada the Minister of Immigration and Manpower stated as follows:

> . . . we will be continuing to follow this in light of suggestions which have been made through unofficial channels.

Can the Minister of National Revenue inform the House as to the present status of these art treasures?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): No, Mr. Speaker, in that they have not arrived in Canada. I have ensured that my officials are ready to receive them and deal with them under Canadian law should they arrive.

● (1430)

Mr. Blackburn: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In order to determine whether these art treasures are part of the Vietnamese national heritage, has the minister made any inquiries of the South Vietnamese government on their position on these artifacts and has the minister considered it necessary to ask an expert on traditional Vietnamese artifacts to inspect thoroughly these art treasures, if they should arrive at Montreal?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, if they should arrive in Montreal that would probably be the appropriate thing to do, but they have not arrived.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY WHETHER CANADA INFORMED UNITED STATES OF CONSEQUENCES OF SENDING OIL TANKERS THROUGH NORTHWEST PASSAGE

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence and has to do with the question asked last week concerning the fleet of icebreaking tankers which is being built in the United States to transport crude oil from Alaska through the Northwest Passage to east ports, and the complete surveillance of that area, as suggested by the minister. My question is this: has the minister informed United States authorities of this complete surveillance, of which they may be unaware, and of the dire consequences which could follow if a United States tanker fleet should carry this oil through the Northwest Passage in the manner indicated?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, our role is that of surveillance and I am certain that the United States authorities are fully aware of our capabilities of flying in the high Arctic and surveying ships passing through the Northwest Passage.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Minister of National Defence tell us whether he is aware of indications that the Americans have told the Canadian authorities that they will be carrying crude oil through waters which have been claimed under Canadian law as Canadian and which are subject to Canadian laws on pollution?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the substance of that question is the responsibility of my department.

Mr. A. D. Will the minister assure this House and the farmers and land owners of Ontario that the constructors and contractors of the Interprovincial pipeline running from Sarnia to Montreal will, after excavating and burying the pipe, replace the topsoil to its normal depth on the surface of the fields, in order that agricultural tillage can continue unimpeded?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture has made extensive representations to me along those lines, which I have passed on to the National Energy Board which has direct responsibility in this matter. I will be glad to pass on to the board and support the hon. member's representations and seek assurances that the topsoil and also natural water flow will not be disturbed by any pipeline construction.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RURAL DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF PUBLIC PARTICIPATION IN SECOND PHASE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and has to do with the recent decision involving the Rural Development Council and the next phase of the development plan of Prince Edward Island. As the minister indicated earlier that this decision came as a complete surprise to the federal government, I wonder if the minister can say what assurances he has received and what plans are being made with respect to public participation on the second phase aspect, particularly third party participation, as that, certainly, was a vital ingredient in the first plan of 1969 and will be important for the over-all success of phase two of the plan.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I called Premier Campbell, but he is out of the country and will be away for a week or so. I talked to the acting premier and suggested that our officials should, during the next ten days or two weeks, discuss the final stages of the implementation of the second phase of the plan. The timetable I anticipate is that in the next two weeks we will get that agreement in shape. A portion of that agreement will relate to the general question of the consultative process and public participation. When the premier returns, I will sit down with him to discuss the final document and the eventual signing.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RURAL DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL—REASON FOR CHANGE IN PLAN—DATE OF SIGNING OF AGREEMENT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder, since this decision came as a surprise to the minister, can he say if he has received indications showing why there was this major change in the plan after it had been worked out and was to be considered by the cabinet? Can he tell us briefly what those reasons are and, secondly, when will the second phase be signed and when will the details be made public, so that the people of P.E.I. and Canada will be aware of them?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, to answer the second part of the question, I do not expect that it will be much later than the middle of June, always assuming that the original discussions between our governments are embodied in the final documents. On the question of the rural development council, all I can say is that when the decision was taken by the government of Prince Edward Island I called, as I mentioned, to advise the premier of the representations which had been made to me, but, as he was not there, I was not able to pass them on.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Can he advise the House whether sufficient new funds have been made available to CMHC to meet the need in Quebec for single family dwelling construction?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have been checking with the corporation and the regional offices, and there are sufficient funds available to meet the applications which are coming forward now in encouraging numbers. The program is proving successful; so far, funds are holding up, and people should continue to apply.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister find out why the Chicoutimi office which serves the Saguenay-Lake St. John area claims it is lacking funds at the present time?

Also, does the government approve of this acquisition?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is of course a matter which we are looking into and which has already been looked into mainly by the CTC. HEALTH

ARSENIC LEVELS IN NATIVE POPULATION—SUGGESTED PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a double-barrelled question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It concerns his department's survey of arsenic levels in hair samples taken from residents of Yellowknife. Is the minister aware that the National Indian Brotherhood has conducted a similar survey which indicates a higher proportion of arsenic in people, especially in children. The survey shows arsenic at dangerous levels. Is the government prepared to introduce more strict regulations controlling emissions from the mine and to protect the workers in the mine, and is the minister prepared to have the mining companies compensate people who have been affected for the damage done to their health?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as regards the first part of the question, I have read in the press some references to a study conducted by the National Indian Brotherhood. I did not get any copy of that study. We have asked the Indian Brotherhood to get us a copy; my officials will surely look into it with great interest. Again, we will examine what precisely is the scientific base of that study and compare with the one already done by my department.

As for the second part, further studies are under way. I have already stated, following the publication of the first study, that more thorough studies have been launched, particularly on identified cases showing what appears to be a high arsenic rate; this applies particularly to workers of plants in that region, and it is in light of this second study that we will be able to assess the necessary measures.

HOUSING

INABILITY OF RURAL RESIDENTS TO OBTAIN LOANS FROM CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. As the minister knows, rural residents and those in small villages are not able to get CMHC approved loans. Has the minister made any progress at changing this stipulation in order that rural residents can have the same opportunity as urban dwellers to receiving government funding for housing?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, without accepting the full premise of the hon. member's question, there were some 40,000 CMHC loans made in rural areas in the past year. The majority of those were on properties with septic tanks. As to the substance of the question, the policy has been reviewed by CMHC. I am preparing a release for all members so that they will know the new status. Greater flexibility will be granted. There will be close co-operation with the provinces to establish more flexible guidelines for rural areas, rural communities and fringe areas of urban communities where the health standards of the province are met and undesirable development does not result.

RURAL AND NATIVE HOUSING PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE PROGRAM COVERS EVERY CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Can the minister assure the House that the program for rural and native housing does in fact cover every federal constituency in Canada?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that assurance. I do not think it applies to Toronto-Davenport or downtown Halifax. However, in those areas which are designated by the provinces as being eligible under those programs, it will apply. In most cases, rural constituencies will be eligible if an agreement is reached with the province. It is a matter of priorities established in co-operation with the provinces, which we enjoy in great measure.

In light of the fact that questions directed to the Minister of Supply and Services and the Minister of National Defence in order to ascertain whether the Canadian armed forces in Europe are eating Canadian beef have received non-committal answers, will the minister tell the House whether armed services personnel in Europe are eating Canadian beef?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, all I know is having eaten beef at the station in Europe once or twice, it was high quality, excellent beef.

Mr. Hurlburt: Will the minister inform the House whether the 707 trips to Lahr each week with cargo space for Canadian beef are being by-passed and we are buying our beef from the United States government?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we are always searching for ways of creating more order and control with regard to breaches of the law in this country or with regard to matters such as those to which the hon. member has just referred. It is not often recognized that we, in fact, have quite stringent gun control laws in this country with regard to restricted and prohibited weapons. We will certainly be looking at whether stiffer penalties or better procedures are in fact reasonable. It is a problem whether or not registration systems accomplish very much by themselves. It has been my stated view that we want to be sure they in fact do that and not simply impose unnecessary red tape upon the citizens of this country.

holding such a meeting. Can we now have some indication whether such a meeting is to be held and, if so, on what date? That question may be directed to the Minister of Finance since he is implicated. If not, I direct it to the Prime Minister. I am sorry, the Prime Minister was not involved. Will the Prime Minister advise whether a meeting of the first ministers is to be held some time this month prior to the date of the budget and, if so, on what date, the purpose of the meeting being to determine the price of crude oil in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. There is no plan for a federal-provincial meeting of first ministers. Of course, this does not preclude consultation on a bilateral basis with various first ministers.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED ACTION TO CONTROL POLLUTION OF LAKE TIMISKAMING AND UPPER OTTAWA RIVER

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the fact the cities of Ottawa and Hull, the provincial governments of both Quebec and Ontario and the federal government have co-operated in controlling pollution of the Ottawa River, will the minister consider extending the federal control to the environmental officials operating on the upper Ottawa or Lake Timiskaming so that some control can be exercised before raw sewage is dumped by some municipalities into the Ottawa system? That control only rests with the provincial governments and the area municipalities at the present time.

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, obviously, if the report of the task force I set up to study the problem of the Ottawa river pollution indicates that the causes of that pollution are found upstream, certainly solutions will have to be found to it; then we can find out what the municipalities can do for, as we know, they are responsible for the treatment of their sewage.

● (1450)

[English]

Mr. Peters: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister may or may not know of her responsibility because of the interprovincial nature of Lake Timiskaming, but when New Liskeard dumped all its lagoons into the river recently it caused considerable problems in the area, and this sewage will flow down into the Ottawa River as well. Secondly, an investigation is going on which indicates that a large amount of mercury and probably a large amount of arsenic as well is in that area. In view of the interprovincial nature of this problem, would the minister see that her officials participate with those now examining the situation?

[Translation]

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, that is the very reason for which I set up a task force. Several jurisdictions are involved. I repeat that, although the hon. member mentions the jurisdictions of the two provinces and the federal government, the fact remains that nothing can be done without the co-operation of those municipalities.

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE HEARINGS—POSSIBILITY GOVERNMENT WILL PRESENT BRIEF

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In questions addressed yesterday to the right hon. Prime Minister on the National Energy Board's preliminary hearing on the Mackenzie Valley pipeline application, the Prime Minister stated that he would take notice of the question and refer the matter to the minister. Can the minister respond today to the question: In view of the fact that the National Energy Board has scheduled a preliminary hearing on the Mackenzie Valley pipeline for July 8, 9 and 10, is the government contemplating presenting or does it intend to present a statement or brief to the board?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, so far as I know there is no intention of doing so. The normal course of action in this regard is to permit the private parties to make their presentations to the National Energy Board, which exercising its best judgment arrives at a decision. If the decision is affirmative it is referred to the executive, to the Governor in Council, for a final decision. It seems to me under those circumstances the advisable course is to await presentation of the evidence on both sides of the project, and then on the basis of the board's informed decision it will be for the government to arrive at a conclusion.

OIL—POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT ON WORLD PRICE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question along the lines of the questions asked by the hon. member for Don Valley and the hon. member for Edmonton West of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. At the world conference was price discussed, was it negotiated, and was there any agreement made at that conference as to the price of crude petroleum with reference to trade throughout the world?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there was a reference to the fact that the OPEC nations will be meeting at Libreville in Gabon during the course of this current month to decide on the pricing of petroleum in the world market after September 30 next. There was no agreement on an appropriate price between the consumer states who participate in the IEA on this question. There was some reference by Secretary Kissinger to the concept of a minimum guaranteed price in world marketing, but again there was no extensive discussion of this question and no agreement.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was the price that was discussed and which negotiations centred around the price of $8.50 a barrel?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the price that was referred to was the price that would be set by the OPEC nations at their meeting in Gabon, and presumably would be a price increase over the current level of around $11 to $12 per barrel. There was no discussion of specific figures in regard to a minimum guaranteed price.

AGRICULTURE

POTATOES—DATE OF COMPLETION OF ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Can he tell us today when the Agricultural Stabilization Board intends to end the program announced on April 1, which aims at assisting, and effectively assists, eastern potato producers, since, on the one hand, the existing terminology is relatively vague in that respect, and that, on the other hand, farmers would like to know the precise intentions of the government.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, at the end of the crop year, which normally is the end of June.

TRANSPORT

CROWSNEST PASS RATES—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO ALTERATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the number of answers that have been given of a rather fuzzy nature to the simple question whether or not the government intends in the new Transportation Act to alter, amend or in any way abridge the Crowsnest Pass rates on grain, would the minister give me the assurance that such course will not be followed?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I hope that very soon I will produce this new policy, and I can say to the right hon. gentleman that nothing changes anything about the Crowsnest Pass rates.

POST OFFICE

THREATENED STRIKE BY UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS—APPOINTMENT OF CONCILIATOR

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Now that the national president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers has consigned the public to the nether regions if they do not agree with the union's posture in current bargaining, can the Postmaster General give assurance that the public will be saved from this fate by the conciliation proceedings that are now getting underway?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, there is no particular reason why there should be a postal strike; the climate has improved tremendously, I think. I am sure the hon. gentleman would be the first who would be pleased to know that the backlog of 25 million pieces of mail in Montreal has been completedly eradicated and there is no longer a backlog.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: There is still about a week's delay in the parcels section but that should be cleaned up soon. We have agreed to a conciliation officer, and I think that if the president's freeze, shall I say, on the exchange of polite insults is maintained and both sides get down to bargaining before a competent conciliation officer, there is no reason why we should not arrive at a good collective agreement within the month.

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW POLICY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Transport who referred to his new policy coming out soon. Will it be coming out in the month of June, or if it is not coming out in the month of June will it be coming out before we recess, hopefully early in July?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that it will be before the House recesses.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF SECRETARY GENERAL OF UN CONFERENCE ON HUMAN SETTLEMENTS AND HABITAT '76

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that in 362 days the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements begins in Vancouver. I should like to draw to the attention of Your Honour and hon. members the presence in the gallery of the Secretary General of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements and Habitat '76, Dr. Enrique Penelosa.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. In response to my question during the question period concerning a report commissioned by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs with a private firm, the minister, I am sure inadvertently, is reported in Hansard as saying that the report has not yet been received by his department. My information is that indeed the report has been received by his department.

My concern is twofold. Firstly, the minister might wish to set the record straight and admit that the report has been received by his department. Secondly, if it has been received and he is not aware of it, then because of the importance of the survey that was conducted he might wish to correct this discrepancy within his department and bring the report to the attention of the House of Commons and the public.

EXPORT OF OCEAN TECHNOLOGY

Question No. 1,330—Mr. Forrestall:

1. (a) What was the dollar level of Canada's export of ocean technology-related commodities, physical or intellectual, since 1968 by year (b) what is the estimated value of such commodities for 1974?

2. What targets, if any, have been set for the next five years, further to the intention to "stimulate development and effective participation of Canadian industry in the plan to see that Canada controls the essential industrial and technological ingredients to exploit off-shore resources," announced July 12, 1973 in the "New Oceans Policy" of the Minister of State for Science and Technology?

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. (a) The following exports are for the ocean industry which consist of companies supplying equipment and services for marine scientific activities and for the exploration and exploitation of offshore non-renewable resources. These are very rough estimates based on departmental records.

	Year	Exports (in $ Million)
	1968	1.5
	1969	1.2
	1970	1.5
	1971	2.0
	1972	8.0
(b)	1974	55.0

2. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is preparing proposals for the development and support of the Canadian ocean industry. The main objectives of these proposals would be to encourage greater research and development of ocean technology in Canada, efficient production of ocean-related products on an internationally competitive basis, development of internationally competitive service contractors, higher degree of Canadian ownership and control, regional expansion of industrial activities and an increased level of professional and technical personnel with ocean-related capabilities.

POSTAL EQUIPMENT

Question No. 1,939—Mr. Reynolds:

1. On February 18, 1974, was a sub-contract let in the amount of $3.3 million to C.A.E. Electronics Limited, Saint-Laurent, Quebec, for postal equipment?

2. Were tenders called on this sub-contract?

3. What were the names of other companies tendering together with their proposed tender objectives?

4. Has C.A.E. Electronics ever marketed such a system before?

5. Did the Department of Supply and Services or any other department, provide financial incentives in this endeavour to provide Culler Facer Canceller?

6. Does the Department plan on purchasing further shipments of the Canceller?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Yes.

2. Not known. C.A.E. Electronics Ltd. was offered as a suh-contractor by the prime contractor in the latter's tender, which was in competition with several other possible suppliers. C.A.E. Electronics Ltd. was acceptable to the department as a sub-contractor for this work.

3. See 2.

4. No.

5. There was a premium paid for introducing C.A.E. Electronics Ltd. to this business. However, the amount of the premium is expected to be offset many times by the new opportunities, which have the potential to produce millions of high technology business, made available to C.A.E. Electronics Ltd. by the contractual arrangements concluded between the department and the prime contractor.

6. One additional machine has been purchased and there is a possibility that the Canada Post Office will require more of these machines over the next two or three years.

HYDROGRAPHIC SERVICE CONTRACT

Question No. 1,965—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Did the Department of Supply and Services award a contract valued at $109,542 to Canadian Engineering Survey Co. Ltd., Edmonton, Alberta for a hydrographic survey?

2. To what intent is the survey to be used?

3. For what reason was the survey requested?

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries): 1. Yes.

2. The results of the hydrographic survey are required for up-dating the nautical charts of Thunder Bay and approaches.

3. The accurate charting of navigable waters is essential to the development and maintenance of a viable, safe and efficient marine transportation system.

*CBC—ADVERTISING

Question No. 2,254—Mr. Korchinski:

1. On how many occasions and in what manner were the dramas "Ten Lost Years", "Jamie Boy" and "Baptizing" advertised by CBC?

2. Was this amount of advertising more than is customarily used for CBC drama and, if so, for what reason was it necessary.

Mr. Gustave Blouin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. Not all CBC locations keep records in such a way that the requested information is available. However, when the amount of air promotion on the entire network and on the ten CBC local stations for which a count can be made is combined, the breakdown is as follows: Baptizing—57 promotional announcements; Ten Lost Years—89 promotional announcements; You're Gonna Be Alright, Jamie Boy—79 promotional announcements. News releases were sent to newspapers and publications across the country. Ad mats for Ten Lost Years and You're Gonna Be Alright, Jamie Boy, were made available to individual stations for placement in local newspapers. The network placed advertisements as follows: Baptizing—TV Guide, Ten Lost Years—Daily newspapers in Toronto, Vancouver, Ottawa and Montreal; TV Guide, Chatelaine, Time, Financial Post; You're Gonna Be Alright, Jamie Boy—TV Guide, Financial Post.

*WOOD ISLANDS-CARIBOU FERRY SERVICE

Question No. 2,321—Mr. MacLean:

1. Has a programme of capital dredging been planned for the Wood Islands terminus of the Wood Islands-Caribou Ferry Service, in addition to the regular maintenance dredging for 1975?

2. Have funds been made available by the Department of Public Works or the Department of Transport for such capital dredging and, if not, will they be made available through a supplementary estimate or by some other means in order that this work can be done during the 1975 dredging season?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Public Works and Transport as follows: 1. No.

2. Funds have not been made available by the Department of Public Works for capital dredging. It is not expected that funds will be made available through Supplementary Estimates or other means during 1975. The Ministry of Transport does not have funds for dredging at Wood Islands and there are no plans to request money through Supplementary Estimates.

CANADIAN POLICE INFORMATION CENTRE

Question No. 2,344—Mr. Beatty:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 621 and Question No. 622, what is the full and correct information with respect to the Canadian Police Information Centre and the Unemployment Insurance Commission?

2. In each case, what was the reason for failure to reply to the Questions?

3. For each department, agency, board, commission and Crown corporation that did not reply fully to the Questions concerning federal databanks, what would be the full and correct reply?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Ministry of the Solicitor General (Royal Canadian Mounted Police) is concerned: 1 and 2. The Canadian Police Information Centre does not maintain an automated personal data system used exclusively for statistical report or research, nor does it maintain an administrative automated personal data system. The Canadian Police Information Centre is an operational information system and, as such, questions Nos. 621 and 622 do not apply.

FLIGHTS—MONCTON AIRPORT

Question No. 2,362—Mr. Jones:

1. How many (a) international flight (b) domestic flight arrivals and departures were handled at the Moncton Airport from March 13 to March 16, 1975?

2. How many passengers and how much baggage was handled in each of the flights?

3. Were any of the international flights and the domestic flights diverted to Moncton and, if so (a) for what reason (b) how many were regular flights (c) were customs and immigration services adequate?

4. Will the Airport be designated as an international airport with complete services and, if so, on what date?

5. What plans have been made for the expansion of passenger, baggage, terminal, runway and other facilities at the Airport?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. (a) There were seven arriving and 12 departing international flights. (b) There were 45 arriving and 55 departing domestic flights.

2. There is considerable detail regarding passengers and baggage handled on each of the 119 arriving and departing flights. In summary, the following pertains: domestic arrivals averaged 62 passengers per flight with an average of two pieces of baggage per passenger, international arrivals averaged 193 passengers per flight, with an average of 1.5 pieces of baggage per passenger. Domestic departures averaged 56 passengers per flight with an average of two pieces of baggage per passenger, international departures averaged 147 passengers per flight, with an average of slightly more than one piece of baggage per passenger.

3. Yes, some flights were diverted to Moncton. (a) Halifax International and Saint-John airports were closed due to the general labour strike and resultant snow accumulation. (b) None of the diverted flights were regular flights. (c) Since this airport is not a recognized international airport, facilities to handle large aircraft on international flights have not been provided, consistent with departmental policy.

4. The Ministry of Transport has no plans to support international status for Moncton airport at this time and we are not aware of any requests from the airlines to do so.

5. A master plan is now being developed for Moncton airport. Plans are now under review for passenger and baggage facilities. If approved, they will be provided as soon as availability of funds and national priorities permit. It is also planned to recap runway 11/29 in 1976-77.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT, 1972

AMENDMENTS TO CHANGE CALCULATION OF PROVINCIAL EQUALIZATION REVENUE RELATED TO OIL AND GAS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-57, to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1972, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should again like to express my thanks to the opposition parties for the courtesy extended to my minister and myself in permitting me to handle this bill at the second reading stage. This is the second or third occasion the opposition has extended that courtesy, and I want hon. members to know that it is much appreciated.

The purpose of the bill now before the House is to propose a number of amendments to the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1972. These amendments relate to two of the federal government's main policies for financial support for the provinces and, through them, for Canada's municipalities. One is the program of equalization payments provided for in part I of the act; the other is the revenue guarantee program covered by part IV of the act.

Hon. members will be familiar with the equalization payments program and the massive financial support it provides to the less wealthy provinces. The basic purpose of the program is to provide provinces whose revenue-raising capacity is below the national average with enough funds to enable them to provide national average levels of service without having to resort to excessive levels of taxation. There years ago when the present fiscal arrangements legislation was introduced in this chamber, it was estimated the program would be providing equalization payments beginning at $1 billion a year. The main estimates for 1975-76 provide for equalization payments of $1,985 million. In the space of three years, federal equalization payments to the provinces have doubled. The program is clearly one of the main pillars of our federal fiscal structure, but the rapid escalation of payments has been an important reason for the recent growth of total federal expenditures.

The revenue guarantee program was introduced at the time of tax reform with the enactment of the 1972 Fiscal Arrangements Act. The original purpose of this measure was to encourage provinces to bring their income tax legislation into conformity with the reformed federal law and thus to maintain the consistency of federal-provincial income tax structures across the country. In the years since tax reform, the government has voluntarily extended the program to cover tax changes resulting not only from the 1972 reforms of the tax system but also from subsequent changes in the federal tax law which tended to reduce the federal and provincial tax bases.

Under the program, if the equalized yield of the province's current personal and corporate income taxes, at tax rates equivalent to those prevailing prior to tax reform, yields less than the amount that the pre-tax reform system would have yielded if it had applied, the federal government will make up the difference. During the fiscal year 1974-75, payments of $475 million were made to the provinces under this program. The main estimates for 1975-76 provide for the payment of another $340 million. All ten provinces receive payments under this program.

Before turning to the specific amendments themselves, I should note that the fiscal arrangements program is a complicated one and the legislation is technically complex. The complexity results, in the case of equalization, from the extent to measure the relative fiscal capacities of the provinces with respect to all of the taxes provinces levy. In the case of the revenue guarantee, it results from the need to estimate tax yields of the pre-reform system. Of necessity, therefore, the amendments are highly technical.

The amendments dealing with the equalization program relate exclusively to the treatment of provincial revenues from oil and gas. They would do two things. First, they would carry out the proposal contained in the budget speech of November 18 last to equalize all oil and gas revenues that are not attributable to the international oil disturbance of 1973-74, plus one-third of the revenues that are attributable to this event. Second, they would provide for the reclassification of oil and gas revenues for the purpose of the equalization calculation. Both amendments would affect equalization for three fiscal years beginning with 1974-75 and ending with 1976-77 when the present fiscal arrangements expire.

The reason for the amendments respecting oil and gas revenues was explained at some length in the November 18 budget speech. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) indicated they would protect the basic equalization formula from distortions which would otherwise be created by the very large windfall revenues of the oil and gas producing provinces. While there is still uncertainty as to what these windfall revenues will be, it is clear they will run into many billions of dollars during the course of the present fiscal arrangements.

The potential cost of equalizing these revenues in full could be so large as to be beyond the capacity of Canadian taxpayers to finance. The minister expressed the fear that this result could undermine public acceptance of the fiscal equalization program and erode the basic principles on which the program is based. This was an eventuality the government wanted to avoid. The budget proposal would achieve this objective while at the same time permitting large but orderly increases in the equalization payments resulting from oil and gas revenues. This can be seen in the estimates of the portion of equalization payments that relate to oil and gas revenues. Assuming that the provisions of this bill are adopted by parliament, we estimate the cost of equalizing provincial oil and gas revenues, which in 1973-74 was $257 million, would be $380 million in 1974-75 and $415 million in 1975-76. The estimates are based on the prices prevailing at the time they were made, and on the prevailing royalty structures.

The bill would achieve the budget objective by dealing with oil and gas revenues in the following way. Those revenues which are not attributable to the international oil disturbance would be equalized in full. They are referred to as "basic revenues" in the bill. Those revenues which are attributable to the international oil disturbance would be equalized to the extent of one-third. They are referred to as "additional revenues." In the bill, "basic revenues" for each oil and gas revenue source are defined as the actual revenues of the provinces from that source in the 1973-74 fiscal year subject to an upward adjustment for any increase in the volume of production between the calendar year 1973 and the year for which equalization is being determined. Provision is made for a floor which protects provinces against a decline in "basic revenues" in the event that the volume of oil or gas production falls subsequent to 1973. "Additional revenues" are defined in the bill as being the difference between actual revenues and basic revenues.

The second group of changes in equalization consists of a reclassification of oil and gas revenues into fixed groups known as "revenue sources", instead of the four groups the act now provides for. The result of reclassifying oil and gas revenues, along with accompanying changes in the measures of fiscal capacity which are used in calculating equalization, is to produce equalization payments which more accurately reflect the relative fiscal positions of the provinces. The consequence of these changes is to increase the amount of equalization payable. As of 1974-75, the increase is estimated at approximately $30 million.

The proposed new revenue sources consist of Crown oil revenues—that is, revenues derived from lands for which the mineral rights are held by the Crown—freehold oil revenues, Crown gas revenues, freehold gas revenues, sale of Crown leases and reservations on oil and gas land and, finally, other oil and gas revenues. The main effect of this reclassification is to recognize freehold oil revenues and freehold gas revenues as separate categories, reflecting the new provincial practices of deriving revenue from these revenue sources. The purpose of reclassifying revenues in this way is to place them into relatively homogeneous groups, to each of which a measure of fiscal capacity can be fitted.

I now come to changes in part IV of the Fiscal Arrangements Act concerning the income tax revenue guarantee. This, too, is a technically complicated part of the legislation and I will have to go into some detail in order to explain the intended policy. Four changes are proposed in this program. The first change would clarify the situation respecting provincial revenue reductions resulting from the indexation of the personal income tax. Specifically, the legislation will make clear that the yield of the "actual" income tax system will not be calculated on the basis of personal exemptions and tax brackets being indexed.

The government's intent in this regard was made clear as long ago as May, 1973, at a federal-provincial meeting of finance ministers and treasurers. The Minister of Finance at that time indicated that the federal government viewed indexation as being a change which differed in substance from other tax changes made since 1972 which have been permitted to qualify for inclusion in the revenue guarantee. He emphasized that the only revenues which governments would forego as a result of indexation would be those arising from the effects of inflation on incomes. He stated that governments ought not to be in a position where they could finance additional expenditures out of inflation, and that it was inappropriate for the provinces to expect compensation for revenue reductions resulting from indexation. These remarks were made before the onset of the global inflation which has been experienced during the past year and one-half. They are even more relevant today.

Second, it is proposed that a new basis be used for calculating the revenue guarantee payment. The amount of such payment to a qualifying province for any given year is equal to the excess, if any, of the yield of the pre-reform income tax system, if it applied in that year, over the yield of the actual or post-reform income tax system in that year after making certain adjustments. As the act now reads, the actual yield from personal income taxes is determined on the basis of the provincial tax law, while corporation income taxes are based on the federal tax law. The bill proposes that all yields be determined with reference to the federal tax law.

This change is being proposed as a result of prospective divergences in federal and provincial income tax laws. Up to the present, differences between federal and provincial legislation have been very limited, particularly for provinces with tax collection agreements. Hon. members will recall that these are the agreements under which the federal government acts as the collector of provincial income taxes, provided the provincial tax law meets certain conditions respecting conformity with federal tax law.

At the December meeting of ministers of finance and provincial treasurers, the federal Minister of Finance announced that, while it was essential to preserve substantial uniformity between the federal and provincial tax systems, provinces with tax collection agreements could enjoy greater flexibility in modifying their systems and still have their taxes collected by the federal government. This offer was warmly received by the provinces. However, this greater flexibility will undoubtedly lead to various changes in provincial income tax laws during the remainder of the period to which the revenue guarantee applies which will move them out of line with the federal law.

A possible result of this offer is that a province which qualifies for a revenue guarantee payment could be in a position to initiate a tax change which would have the effect of reducing the yield of its "actual" tax system, as presently measured, and hence of producing a corresponding increase in the amount of revenue guarantee payments to which it is entitled. The revenue guarantee was not intended to provide compensation to a province for a revenue loss arising from its own initiative in changing the tax system. At the same time, provincial tax changes which increase provincial yields could, under existing legislation, result in a reduction in the guarantee payment to the province. The proposed amendment would forestall both such results.

A third change in the revenue guarantee meets a commitment the Minister of Finance gave to the provinces last December. It would define the "actual" yield of the corporation income tax in such a way as to exclude the amount of any provincial rebates to taxpayers of the additional provincial revenue derived as a consequence of the non-expensing of provincial levies on oil, gas and minerals. This change would prevent sharp reductions in the revenue guarantee payments to provinces which make such rebates—notably including Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia.

Finally, a fourth change would prevent provinces from receiving a larger revenue guarantee as a consequence of not having adopted federal tax changes made since 1972. This amendment is being proposed to meet situations where the federal government changes its own tax structure in such a way as to reduce its revenues and a particular province chooses not to follow suit. Such a province would not, in fact, lose any revenue and it would clearly be inappropriate to calculate the amount of its revenue guarantee payment as if it had. Accordingly, it is proposed that the yield of the "actual" system be adjusted in such a way as to prevent the making of a guarantee payment to a province for a revenue loss it did not sustain.

Mr. Speaker, that brings me to the end of my comments on this bill. The various policy issues in the bill have been taken up with the provinces and we have consulted with them fully on these changes. At the beginning of my remarks I noted that the purpose of the equalization program was to permit the less wealthy provinces in Canada to provide national average levels of service without having to resort to excessive levels of taxation. In this regard the program has been most successful. A look at the record will provide the necessary evidence of that fact.

Over the period of the present arrangements, equalization payments per capita, on a national basis, have increased by over 85 per cent, rising from $106 in 1972-73 to $197 in 1974-76. In Newfoundland, per capita payments rose from $215 in 1972-73 to $371 in 1974-75; in Prince Edward Island, from $224 to $410; in Nova Scotia, from $155 to $296; in New Brunswick, from $162 to $322; in Quebec, from $88 to $167; in Manitoba, from $68 to $122; and in Saskatchewan, from $112 to $127, notwithstanding the higher revenues that province now receives from oil and potash.

What contribution have these equalization payments made to the financing of provincial goods and services? In Newfoundland, equalization payments in the year 1974-75 represented over 58 per cent of all the revenues that province raised from its own tax sources; that is to say, for every $100 Newfoundland raised from its own sources, the federal government supplemented it by $58 in equalization payments. In Prince Edward Island the percentage was 57 per cent; in Nova Scotia it was 46 per cent; in New Brunswick it was 47 per cent; and in Quebec, Manitoba and Saskatchewan it was about 17 or 18 per cent. This is a substantial contribution to provincial treasuries. These very large transfers have permitted the less wealthy provinces to make per capita expenditures at a level that is almost as high as that in the wealthier provinces. The basic objective of this program is clearly being fulfilled.

Mr. Speaker, the amendments being proposed in this bill will continue and strengthen this important program. I commend it to all hon. members and urge its adoption.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Would the parliamentary secretary accept a question? Could he indicate to the House whether any province—if so, how many, and which provinces—has objected to the bill, particularly to the formula relating to the application of equalization to oil revenues?

Mr. Cullen: The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) did not give me an opportunity to file my caveat. I was going to remind him of the lawyer who told his students never to tell their clients that they did not know the answer. When a law student asked him, "what if you don't know the answer?" the law professor said, "you get the client to go out and get more facts, while you look up the law". With that in mind, I will try to get the information for the Leader of the Opposition and give it to him later in the day.

Mr. Stanfield: I thank the parliamentary secretary for his presentation and for his assurance that he will get the information that I sought from him. I think perhaps he understated the value of the equalization payments. He said that for every $100 raised by Newfoundland—it is important, in the interests of confederation, that the word "Newfoundland" be pronounced correctly—from its own sources, they get another $58 in equalization, whereas I thought he said previously that 58 per cent of all the revenue of Newfoundland came from equalization. Can the parliamentary secretary also clarify that for us a little later?

I do not intend to oppose this bill proceeding to the committee, but there are a few comments I would like to make in connection with it. First of all, I was deeply touched by the lecture which, the parliamentary secretary said, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) read to his provincial counterparts about what a terrible thing it was to live on the avails of inflation. I thought that was quite a lecture, coming from the Minister of Finance who not too long ago opposed the whole concept of indexation. It is interesting to see that in due course the minister not only reversed himself on that but is now lecturing the provinces about the sinfulness of their profiting from inflation in terms of having their revenues increased for that reason.

I rise this afternoon to direct a few comments to the parts of the bill that relate to equalization and, more particularly, to the equalization of oil revenues received by the provinces. As the parliamentary secretary explained, the approach to equalization of these revenues, under this bill, is to make a distinction between the revenues which the provinces receive on the basis of prices that were in effect before the so-called international oil disturbance—those revenues will be equalized just like any other revenues received by a province—and the revenues which provinces receive as a result of prices going up following the international oil disturbance, which would be equalized to the extent of one-third of such revenues.

As I rose, I was inclined to call that a phony distinction, but I think it would be more proper to call it an arbitrary decision. I understand, of course, why the government proposes to make such a distinction and why it finds it unacceptable to include in the equalization concept all the revenues that the provinces receive from petroleum. I understand that to do so would no doubt involve the government in very substantially increased expenditures under the heading of equalization. It would probably result in the imposition of additional taxation across the country for this purpose, which would mean that the people of Ontario, for example, would not only be paying higher oil prices but would be paying additional taxation in order to enable the federal government to meet its obligations under an equalization concept which involved the idea of the equalization of all petroleum revenues received from the provinces.

I presume it was for this reason that the Minister of Finance rejected the plea of the Premier of Nova Scotia, for example, that all petroleum revenues should be included for purposes of equalization. Having said that I understand the reason for this and the reason for the federal government taking the position that it is not prepared to go further—that is, it is not prepared to commit itself to equalization payments on a bigger scale than this—I repeat that this distinction in the bill is arbitrary.

If one were to take the view that the increase in oil prices is the result of an international disturbance of short duration, then one might be justified in feeling that this is not really an arbitrary decision; to recognize these higher oil prices for purposes of equalization would involve a great deal of confusion, inconvenience and hardship. But there is no indication that they are not going to last; in fact, the more appropriate assumption is that higher petroleum prices are here to stay or are here for a long time at least.

So the bill does involve a significant departure from a pretty fundamental principle of the concept of equalization as it has developed through the years, that is, that all provincial revenues be included for purposes of equalization. Therefore, any premier who argues against this bill can properly argue that it does represent a departure from the principle which has been established. The only answer anyone would have on behalf of the federal government is that he would have to admit it is arbitrary; but he would have to say it is necessary to make this arbitrary decision.

I say it is arbitrary. I think the original method the Government of Canada had of getting out of this difficulty was also arbitrary, because the suggestion was made a year or so ago that if the oil and gas producing provinces put the revenue from petroleum, not into the revenue account but into some kind of capital fund, that would not count for equalization purposes. Surely that is not only an arbitrary position to take but one which would be very difficult to defend, because revenue is revenue for a province and a province which receives revenue does not change it into something else by putting it into a particular account. It may not choose for its own purposes to regard it as revenue but it is, in fact, revenue.

As it turned out, while this seemed to be the line along which the various governments were working a year or so ago to avoid the equalization difficulty this bill is intended to take care of, that did not work; but if it had proved to be workable, it too would be pretty difficult to justify in terms of the principle upon which equalization concepts have been developed through the years.

One thing I find very strange about the present position of the federal government is that for many years the premier of Alberta, Premier Manning, used to argue at federal-provincial conferences which I attended—and perhaps long before I attended them—that the revenues which the provinces received from the sale of oil lands and rights, for example, and the revenues the province of Alberta received in the form of royalties from oil and gas ought not to be regarded as revenue—not in total, at least—because they come from a depleting asset. What is striking to me is that in the days when Premier Manning of Alberta was putting forward that kind of argument, he received absolutely no sympathy from the federal government; yet when it became not only inconvenient but a very serious matter for the federal government to regard all revenue from petroleum as provincial revenue, the federal government did not hesitate for a moment to completely reverse its position.

I think it is worth making that point, Mr. Speaker. Just as the Minister of Finance completely reversed himself on the subject of tax indexing when it suited his purposes, this government has completely reversed itself over a period of years with regard to provincial revenue from petroleum being regarded in fact as revenue. It really makes one wonder how seriously one should ever take any argument put forward by a federal minister of finance or any other federal minister on these concepts, because there have been very striking instances in which the federal government has completely reversed itself and the results flowing from these changes in the position taken by the federal government are of great significance to the country.

I do not know just what confidence the Minister of Finance in Canada can have today that any provincial treasurer or any provincial minister of finance is really going to take seriously any conceptual argument put forward by the Government of Canada. I do not know how a minister of finance of Canada can expect a provincial treasurer to have anything but skepticism at best, and cynicism at worst, about any conceptual argument put forward on behalf of the Government of Canada, because there are instances—I have mentioned two; no doubt I could dredge up others—where the federal government has reversed itself and completely changed its position when it has become convenient and profitable to do so.

I think these points are worth mentioning. This perhaps relates to morality to some extent. Perhaps the people should be as worldly as successive ministers of finance seem to be when it comes to looking after the interests of their own government. Perhaps I should not be surprised by this tendency of the Government of Canada to reverse itself, in view of some of the conditions which seem to exist in Canada where practically everyone is under investigation for one kind of fraud or another. I am not suggesting that the Minister of Finance is engaged in any such conduct, but I urge upon the minister—who is not here—and upon members of the government that if they expect the Government of Canada to be taken seriously, if they expect the financial concepts put forward by the government to be taken seriously, they have to pull up their socks and stop reversing themselves every time it suits their convenience to do so and every time it suits the federal treasury to do so.

● (1540)

In view of the vast increase in the revenues of the petroleum producing provinces and the consequential vast increase in federal expenditures that would take place in equalization unless the law were changed, I wonder whether it would not be more honest, more conceptually defensible, to review the traditional attitude toward provincial revenue as far as petroleum revenue is concerned. Would it still not be better to go back and look at some of the questions raised by Premier Manning at some of the meetings to which I referred?

I realize that that principle would not just be confined to oil but might also apply to other non-renewable resources. A year from now there may be a big increase in the price of a raw material which produces enormous revenue to a province, from a source other than petroleum. Is the Minister of Finance then going to introduce some other makeshift fiscal arrangement with that province in order to accommodate himself to the difficulty?

I am not going to oppose the bill, and perhaps there is not time now to do something like this, but I say in all seriousness that it might be far more honest, far more open and consistent with the principle of the equalization formula not to arbitrarily remove fractions of revenue for equalization purposes. It might be far more satisfactory to go back to the concepts developed by Premier Manning and to recognize that the revenue that comes from a non-renewable resource in a sense is quite different from provincial revenues derived from other sources: it is a wasting asset. This problem and others that might arise as a result of sharp increases in the price of raw materials and minerals might be avoided, without the necessity of makeshift legislation, by introducing a concept upon which the federal government and the provinces could agree as to what percentage of revenue from petroleum and what percentage from other minerals should really be considered revenue and what should be considered something to be put aside to cover a depleting asset for the provinces.

I do not want to take any more time, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to make the point that, while I do not oppose the bill going to committee and while I recognize the Minister of Finance has a problem that is a hardship not only for the treasury but for the people of Canada in the form of taxation, I suggest that the means he has chosen constitute a very sharp and sudden departure from the principles that the Government of Canada adhered to for years. It involves a departure from the principle of equalization as it has been developed. While something like this must be done, I suggest that a better way could be found, a way that would endure without the federal government and the Minister of Finance having to stand on their head every two or three years to meet some new development. The minister could avoid the necessity of having to reverse himself from time to time in the so-called national interest.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, members of the New Democratic Party in parliament have always supported a strong federal government; they have always taken the view that if the economic and social welfare of the people of all parts of Canada is to be improved, if there is to be any kind of equality among the various regions of the country, then the federal government must play a very important role. Through its economic policies and its tax policies, it must see that the people are treated equitably.

Over the years, federal-provincial tax-sharing agreements went a long way toward meeting these objectives. Until a year ago agreements were arrived at after a good deal of discussion and compromise on the part of both the federal and the provincial governments; they were not unilateral decisions made by the federal government and imposed on all the provincial governments. But here, Mr. Speaker, we have proposals which are being rammed down the throats of the people and the provinces. To the best of my information, every provincial government, Conservative, Liberal or NDP, has objected to the unilateral decisions made and being implemented in the minister's last budget and in this proposal.

We have been told by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) that the federal government could not afford to make equalization payments to the provinces on the same basis as it had until the recent sharp increase in the price of oil and natural gas internationally and the proposals by the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia to sharply increase the taxes or royalties they obtained from the sale of oil and natural gas, particularly for export.

We reject that argument, Mr. Speaker. It is a unilateral decision and we think it is unfair. We reject it because we know that the whole taxation policy of this government continues to be very unfair, continues to be inequitable and continues to press too severely on individual taxpayers, particularly those in the lower and middle income brackets. It continues to give great concessions to corporations, particularly those involved in the development and sale of natural gas, oil and minerals which are almost completely owned and controlled by multinational corporations.

I shall spend some minutes demonstrating the truth of my statements and showing how government tax policies have been of benefit to those in middle and upper income brackets. I shall consider the effects of indexing, a measure proposed by the official opposition and adopted by the Minister of Finance. According to the government's own figures, the benefits of indexing rise as income increases. For example, according to federal calculations the tax saving since 1973 accruing to a married taxpayer with two dependent children under 16 years old is under $10 if the taxpayer earns $4,000, about $200 if he earns $8,000, close to $600 if he earns $20,000, and about $1,300 if he earns $50,000. Clearly, indexing is of greater benefit to those in middle and upper income brackets.

The government apparently wants to preserve and protect the interests of large business. Let me quote part of the cogent analysis which the then minister of finance for the province of Manitoba, Mr. Cherniack made at the federal-provincial meeting of December 9 and 10 last year. He said:

> The two-year fast write-off for manufacturers has been extended—despite the fact that there is no substantive evidence of its impact as a job-creating measure, and despite the fact that, even before the extension was announced, capital expenditures in manufacturing—which the measure is designed to stimulate—were expected to increase by 38.6 per cent.
> Manufacturing and processing industries continue to pay tax at only a 40 per cent corporate income tax rate—a rate lower than that applied to individuals with taxable incomes of $12,000.
> Mining and petroleum corporations have their tax rates increased to 50 per cent under the budget proposals, and then effectively cut to 35 per cent if provinces do not take up the additional federal abatements. Yet, these industries, according to the latest available data, pay corporation income tax on under 15 per cent of their book profits—that is, profits determined in accordance with sound accounting principles. Although these figures pre-date the 1972 tax measures, we have seen no evidence to suggest any major change has taken place since that time.

The government's tax policy has led to increased corporate profits. For example, corporate profits increased by over 21 per cent in 1972, by 35.7 per cent in 1973 and by 33 per cent in the first three quarters of 1974 over the same period the previous year. Having permitted the corporations to make those fantastic profits, the minister met with groups in industry, business and farming and asked labour to show restraint. When the corporations were making their greatly increasing profits, the minister remained silent, but now that workers are trying to recoup some of their losses brought about by inflation, now that workers are saying to the corporations, "We want a share of your increased profits," the minister is saying to the workers, "Unless you show restraint, this country will be in great trouble." Why did the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) not lecture the corporations when they were making their dramatically increasing profits? Why did they not ask them to restrain price increases which led to the increased profits I have described?

We know that we need a strong federal government with power to bring about a more equitable distribution of income as between individuals and regions of Canada? We do not think the federal government should be excluded from the resource tax field. On the other hand, we also think the provinces which derive substantial revenues from their resources should be entitled to go on receiving such returns. We are selling vast quantities of oil, natural gas and minerals at high prices, and we think that provincial governments and the people of the provinces have the right to the major part of the benefit of those sales.

This country is governed by a federal system of government. No one has been a more eloquent supporter of our federal system and constitution than our Prime Minister. After all, under the federal system and constitution, natural resources belong to the provinces. We do not think, therefore, that the federal government has the moral or legal right to arrogate unto itself unilaterally the greater part of the benefits derived from the sale of resources. In addition, we see no evidence of the federal government's willingness to promote more balanced economic and industrial expansion in the have-not areas such as the Atlantic region and the western provinces. An analysis of the geographic distribution of industries such as the petrochemical, aerospace, steel and other industries indicates a definite regional imbalance favouring the central provinces. Federal policies are leading to further regional imbalance in favour of Quebec and Ontario, provinces which already contain the bulk of our manufacturing industries.

Since the days of the western economic opportunities conference, during which the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) made such glowing promises, we have seen little evidence of improvement in transportation. Inequitable transportation rates continue. The freight rate freeze has been lifted and the Crowsnest pass rates threatened. The Minister of Transport says one thing about the Crowsnest pass rates and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), who has responsibility for the Wheat Board, says another. The programs of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce continue to be weighted heavily in favour of central Canada. We say that major changes in policy are needed in all these fields, but there is little evidence to show that the federal government intends to change its policies. The promises which members of the government made at the western economic opportunities conference when the government was in a minority position are being ignored: the government now does not need to worry about being defeated.

I have raised matters which concern us. We are concerned about government proposals being brought forward against the opposition of every province of Canada. I contrast the government's present proposal with something the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) said when he was minister of finance. In 1967, when speaking on the subject we are now discussing, he said:

> We should seek in the future to measure the whole revenue or fiscal capacity of the provinces—to develop a comprehensive "prosperity index" if you will—in place of the partial measure now in use. Instead of selecting certain taxes and equalizing them to the level of the top two provinces, we should take into account all of a province's revenues and equalize them to the national average. This would be a good deal more expensive to the federal treasury, but far more equitable.

● (1600)

That was a very sound statement of principle. It seems to have been forgotten by the present Minister of Finance, but it is just as sound today as it was then. That kind of policy would not only help the western provinces, but the maritime provinces which have suffered the slowest rate of growth of any region in Canada almost since confederation, and very markedly in the past 20 to 25 years.

We were told by the Minister of Finance that if all the oil and gas revenues received by producing provinces were to be included in the equalization formula, as would have been done up to the time of the last proposals and policies being adopted unilaterally, the extra cost to the federal government for equalization could approach $2 billion, if not more. The government of Manitoba and the governments of the other western provinces completely rejected that calculation.

In December, 1974, the Manitoba minister of finance called on the federal minister of finance to put on record the assumptions which underlay his estimate, because their calculations did not produce such dramatic results. Their estimates suggested that for 1974-75, at least, the extra cost to the federal government of equalizing all provincial oil royalties would be about $200 million more than Ottawa proposed to pay under its plan to include only one-third of additional oil revenues in equalization. Of course, that $200 million figure did not include any allowance for cushioning the negative impact on Saskatchewan's equalization; nor did it include allowance for the addition of extra natural gas revenues, but these latter amounts did not appear to be as large as the totals for oil.

To my knowledge—I tried to check this with officials of the government of Manitoba—the federal minister of finance never took up that proposal of the Manitoba minister of finance. Without putting it into words, in effect he said, "I have the power. I have the authority. I am going to impose this unilaterally. There is nothing the provinces can do about it." It is for that reason and others that we intend to vote against this proposal. It is nothing more than a unilateral decision.

I say to the parliamentary secretary, as we have said to the Minister of Finance, that in implementing these proposals the government is overriding very simple, firm, plain commitments which the Prime Minister made to the provinces. Following the first ministers' conference in March, 1974, the Prime Minister made a statement in this chamber. He said on March 28, 1974:

An agreement reached yesterday which underlines the good will and national feeling that exist in all provinces and regions . . . which stands as a tribute to the vitality of our Canadian community. As I have said, yesterday was a great day for federalism . . .

The national oil agreement I have just described would surely not have been possible without the good will and deep commitment to Canada of the premiers of Alberta and Saskatchewan . . .

The House may wish to note that Saskatchewan intends to place most of its added oil revenues in a capital fund for energy development; Alberta proposes to handle a high proportion of its added revenues in the same manner . . .

While the revenues taken into those capital funds would not be subject to equalization, the federal government will, of course, pay equalization respecting any oil revenues that go into general funds.

There we have the Prime Minister saying that money which the provinces collected as a result of royalties or taxation on oil or natural gas because of the higher international price, which they put into a capital fund to be used for the development of energy resources, would not be deducted in calculating the equalization grants. It was a very fair statement. What happened when we got the budget? That statement of the Prime Minister was made at a time when there was a minority government. The Prime Minister had to think about the feelings, ideas and desires of the provincial governments as well as how he could face parliament. He made a very clear commitment, which was jettisoned six months later by the Minister of Finance and the government. There is no question that it was a commitment made by the federal government. In the last budget, and in the proposals before us today, that is completely ignored. We are now told that everything over one-third more which the provinces collect will be deducted in calculating the equalization payments.

If Ottawa feels that the people of Canada can benefit from the sharp increase in the international price of oil and natural gas, I agree with it. However, why does Ottawa not now increase the corporation taxes paid by the resource industries, the oil, gas and mineral industries? Instead, Ottawa does the exact reverse: it continues to expand the very favoured tax position of the resource industries in this country. Foreign capital came here in relatively small amounts. Because of our very generous tax laws for depreciation, fast write-offs and all the rest, the money made in this country by the multi-national corporations was plowed back into it. Almost 100 per cent of that money was paid for by the Canadian people either by the price they paid for oil, gas and minerals or by the tax concessions to the corporations.

These tax proposals are something else. Not only will provinces not get equalization payments on two-thirds of the money they get through increased royalties or increased taxes from the oil and gas companies, but taxes paid by these companies to the provinces by way of royalties will no longer be deductible for income tax purposes. How discriminatory can the federal government get? How much more can the federal government do for these corporations? If, for example, the CPR or the Hudson's Bay Company receive royalties from Imperial Oil, Shell or other oil and gas companies which have drilled on their property, these are deductible for income tax purposes. Why should royalties paid by Imperial Oil, Shell, Gulf or any other oil company that has drilled on land owned by the government of Manitoba, or the government of Saskatchewan, or the government of Alberta, or the government of British Columbia—or for that matter, if oil is found, as I hope it will be, in the eastern maritime provinces—not be deductible for income tax purposes? What justification can there be for this discrimination?

● (1610)

As I said a few moments ago, if Ottawa feels that the oil and gas companies are not paying their share, which we have claimed for years, why not tax them as any other corporation is taxed? But no, the government did not enter this field and would not enter it until the provinces did so. I simply cannot understand how this can be justified under any circumstances, unless the very simple explanation is that the government has always been the friend and defender of the large, multinational corporations, particularly the oil, gas and mining companies which have drained the lifeblood of this country, made exorbitant profits and which, thanks to the federal government, will continue to make exorbitant profits. We certainly intend to oppose this bill, and any bill like it, as hard as we can.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on Bill C-57, which is now on second reading.

As the parliamentary secretary has so well said in his speech, it is a very technical bill and, in my opinion it is not within a few minutes that a member of Parliament can succeed in getting to the bottom of things. A general idea can certainly be had, but in my opinion, it would be wise that the bill be referred to the committee and studied very carefully; as a result, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) could assure us of his intentions and of the federal government's intentions for the few years to come.

It is more than obvious that the government's duty is to ensure that the different areas in the country benefit from Canadian natural resources as a whole. Obviously one of the means to reach that goal is to ensure that each and every provincial government and, through them, each and every municipal government, obtain revenues enabling them to guarantee people in their areas services similar to those granted to less favoured area. But by what means? Since the beginning of Confederation, Mr. Speaker, the federal government and the provinces have never got along with regard to the sharing of revenues from natural and other resources. If one studies Canadian history, all successive governments in Ottawa have moved towards greater and greater centralization, which has always proven detrimental to the provinces. Such centralization became more obvious during the war years. During the World War I the federal government asked the provinces to grant it greater sources of income, alleging that wars were costly, and that universal freedom was at stake. "Well, once the revenues shall have been sacrificed and the war over, we shall attempt to return to the situation prevailing before the war."

Between World War I and World War II, about twenty years have gone by. During all that period, nothing but haggling prevailed to recuperate the sources of revenue that had been granted to the federal government for World War I.

And then we start all over again. There is the war of 1939-45. Again the federal government says to provincial governments, yield us some revenue sources. We need them badly to make our war effort. And since the province of Quebec is different from the others because of its French nature—the only province in Confederation to be French-speaking—necessarily it had to fight harder to keep and get back its revenue sources to be able to provide Quebec taxpayers with services and culture in line with the French culture, its traditions, its habits and customs which are necessary and an enrichment in a confederative country like Canada.

Just remember after the war of 1939-45 the great political battles of two outstanding statesmen, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent who was at that time Prime Minister of Canada and the Hon. Maurice Duplessis, premier of the province of Quebec. Quebec was passing legislation to recover the revenue sources yielded because of the war and Ottawa was opposing that on the pretence that it had an absolute need of all those revenues to administer Canada, and while this was going back and forth increased centralization was taking place; there was even encroachment upon the powers of the provinces and centralization was taking place year in and year out. Today, I think that if we want to ensure the survival of Confederation we will simply have to give the provinces more autonomy and respect their rights so they will be strong within Canada as a whole—not strong in one area and weak in another, but strong within Canada as a whole.

I think that is the best method to ensure the survival of Confederation so all Canada can benefit from those advantages, the natural resources that Providence was good enough to award us. And to do that concessions will have to be made. The provinces, admittedly, have very heavy responsibilities. They also have responsibilities vis-à-vis the municipalities, and people are expecting ever more services. That is absolutely normal and as far as possible the leaders must meet the quite legitimate and reasonable demands of the population, but to be able to meet them adequately it takes revenues to pay for expenditures.

Well, that is the ongoing problem. Ottawa needs money. The provinces need money, and so do the municipalities. The municipalities are lacking the revenues to meet their obligations. If we look at the financial reports of our municipalities, we see that most of them are so much in debt that more than 60 per cent of their revenues go to servicing that debt. They run into debt, they get ratepayers into debt today for 50 years to come. They get ratepayers not even born into debt. That is serious, because it is to pay services for today. Fifty years from now, these people will still need services. I think that is not a good financing method.

The Federation of Mayors of Canada is formed, I think, of intelligent people. They meet every year. What do they talk about during these meetings? I attended some of them; nothing has changed, it is still the same today. They talk of revenues, of demanding a better distribution of tax revenues from the governments to municipalities so that they can meet their obligations. That is what we are talking about today. Resolutions are passed, asking Ottawa to yield revenue to the provinces, and the provinces in turn will have to do the same. Everybody is fighting, all administrators are fighting for a better income, and we appear to persist in keeping the same financing methods of 50 or 100 years ago.

● (1620)

There has been no evolution, no change in the public sector. We keep on thinking in terms of sources of revenue, taxes on individuals and corporations in such a way that individuals are over burdened. Corporations are unable, to a reasonable extent, to develop natural resources to the benefit of all people simply because of that financing method of the public sector.

According to me—and I think of it very seriously—it would be time for the Canadian Parliament to make a decision, being the supreme authority. We know that provinces may not legislate in the monetary area: they cannot deal with it because they are not allowed by the Constitution.

To my mind, we could manage by granting the municipalities, the provinces, higher tax income. The federal government, which has the power to legislate in the field of finance, could find another source of revenue by using modern means, means that would correspond to our economic development, modern techniques, swift production, accelerated financing, by resorting to that financial institution of its very own, the Bank of Canada, by adopting amendments that would allow that institution to provide and loan it the sums of money required to finance part of the administration of the country. Not useless loans, but loans based on common sense, on reality, on the gross national product of our Canada,—although it may be declining now, but I trust that is only temporary—so that we can get back to normal and put to better use all our human resources, and increase the gross national product. That would enable the federal government to find sources of credit, loans from the Bank of Canada at a reasonable rate, comparable to administrative costs.

What is it that overburdens the municipalities, the provincial governments, the federal government in the field of finance? Rates of interest that are too high. That is absolutely senseless. Order must be put in that field, and the federal government has the authority to act.

I hope that when Bill C-57 goes to committee, we will have a chance to go into things in depth and very objectively in order to improve the situation in favour of the provinces and the municipalities, and thereby put an end to centralization.

This is provided the Canadian confederation remains strong and that throughout the country the people are satisfied. Thus the people could benefit from the same services throughout Canada because in short, we are all living on Canadian territory and the entire resources must be distributed for the benefit of all Canadian areas and people.

When the bill will be considered in committee, I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) will take note of the proposals and suggestions made to improve it and make it meet the requirements of the provinces, to respect further the provincial autonomy and pave the way for revamping the revenue sharing field and also to introduce changes in the financing of the public sector by accepting a reform of our monetary system which would considerably relieve the burden of interest.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. Before recognizing the parliamentary secretary, I would remind hon. members that he will close the debate when he speaks. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cullen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank hon. members for their interventions in this debate: I am sure some of them at least will be helpful to the minister when he appears before the committee which will study the bill clause by clause.

Once again the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) has indicated, not only here but in so many other areas, the main responsibility of the federal government for the fiscal management of the economy of the country. Although he and I disagree on the method or the way in which that might be done, he has indicated as a federalist on many occasions, for which I think he can be singularly proud, that we do have a main responsibility here to see that we keep our economy on the track, as it were. I know the suggestions made by the hon. member are valid because we have heard them in other speeches, particularly at budget time.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), I think strayed somewhat from second reading or from the principle of this bill, and we got once again into the question of taxation of natural resources and the stance taken by the respective provincial governments and federal government at budget time. I say, with respect, that it is probably a debate that will go on for some time in an effort to determine which is the chicken and which is the egg in the royalty taxation field.

The hon. member sees fit to place the blame on the federal government. The position of the federal government, in effect, was a reaction to a rather exorbitant increase in rates. In that case, had it not reacted to the situation we would have had an inconsistency. I think that if the hon. member studies the recent speeches of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) he will see that the anomalies and the inequities that were built in were such that if someone proposed to drill in the province of Saskatchewan, he would have found himself paying something like 17 times more in the way of taxes than he probably would have paid had the well been drilled in the province of Alberta. With a view to bringing some kind of sanity to the situation, the government was forced to react as it did.

I am happy to see that in the November budget there was a backing off from the position taken in the May budget and that the province of Alberta reacted in kind. It was particularly gratifying to the government to read the recent statements by Mr. Don Getty in his new portfolio, that many of the differences occurred in about 10 per cent of the area and that there is a tremendous amount of co-operation in 90 per cent of it. Perhaps we can work out the difficulties. There was no indication of a stance by the federal government that it would say anything other than that the natural resources are owned by the provinces, but here we are talking about a taxation field in which the federal government has some responsibility, as the hon. member for Bellechasse has indicated, to the national economy.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) raised two questions, one in respect of the 58 per cent figure which I mentioned in my opening remarks. I would indicate that the equalization payments to Newfoundland in 1974-75 represented over 58 per cent of the total revenues that Newfoundland raised from its own sources. In other words, equalization is not equal to 58 per cent of Newfoundland's total revenue from all sources; the percentage expressed in this way would be lower.

Second, the Leader of the Opposition wanted to know specifically what provinces opposed the provisions of the bill. My information is that there has been very little in the way of opposition in writing from the provinces in respect of the equalization provisions of the bill. I suppose a review of the correspondence would be necessary in order to read the recommendations, or objections, for that matter, that may have been made. The minister did discuss the provisions of the bill with his provincial colleagues at an in-camera meeting. With great respect, I think it would be inappropriate to go into the exchanges which took place at that time. Certainly, there was no hint that the provinces were not consulted; but in the final analysis the government must make a determination.

The Leader of the Opposition made much of the fact that the Minister of Finance and the government had seemed to reverse or change their stance. I say that in all probability that is true because it is necessary to meet new conditions. If conditions remained basically the same, there would be no necessity for any change. Equalization was never intended to cover the tax revenue explosion which occurred because of the international oil disturbance. What the federal government and the Minister of Finance were endeavouring to do was to protect the equalization program so that it would not lose the confidence of the Canadian public through the necessity of having to tax far beyond what I think the taxpayers would be prepared to pay. When this disturbance came, it was necessary to find some way around it so that the equalization program—which I think everyone agrees is necessary in order to equalize to some extent the differences in our country—could be effective; otherwise the program, in effect, would have been destroyed. The Minister of Finance indicated on more than one occasion, but particularly at the meeting of ministers of finance on December 9 and 10, the following:

> I would also like to say that I am conscious of the need to begin looking at the equalization arrangements for the 1977-82 period. As you know, the present program expires on March 31, 1977. There is no doubt in my mind that this program must be renewed. It is customary for the federal government and the provinces to sit down together and examine the program in order to consider any improvements which may be needed. A review will be particularly useful prior to 1977 in view of the recent, and totally unanticipated, disruption brought about by the international oil disturbance.

Here again, if the program and the formula are found to be unacceptable by the provinces, they will have occasions on which to put forward their views. This is not a permanent program; it is to be enforced only over the next two years.

I think the other questions probably would be more properly dealt with at the committee stage. The hon. member for Winnipeg North referred to the $2 billion figure. That did not relate to the 1974-75 or the 1975-76 period but, rather, to a year later when oil and gas revenues might rise to a substantially higher level than now exists. The hon. member will have an opportunity to direct questions to the minister on that specific part of the bill. With that, I would like to thank hon. members for their interventions and hope the bill will now receive second reading.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

TERRITORIAL LANDS ACT

CORPORATIONS IN WHICH GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES PROHIBITED FROM ACQUIRING INTEREST

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill S-20, to amend the Territorial Lands Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Buchanan moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to remove the excessive and arbitrary penalty contained in section 24(2) relating to contravention of the terms of section 24(1) of the Territorial Lands Act. It is intended to provide for a blanket order in council which would enable an employee of the Government of Canada to become a shareholder in a corporation owning or having a direct or indirect interest in territorial lands. The order in council would spell out the type of shares which could be held and would be retrospective to cover those already owning such shares.

● (1640)

The hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) expressed some concern in committee when this bill was being discussed in so far as the conflict of interest aspect was concerned. The order would further state that an employee of the Government of Canada would not be authorized to hold such interests as a shareholder where that interest would enable the derivation of any direct or indirect interest from government contracts over which he could influence decisions, or would create a conflict with his public duties.

It should be noted that an individual order in council would still be required to authorize the purchase or acquisition of territorial lands for, as an example, recreational or other personal use. The order would apply to shares acquired by an officer or an employee of the Government of Canada either before or after the making of the order. The amendment in the bill does not contravene the provision of the Treasury Board conflict of interest guidelines. Should an employee of the Government of Canada be clearly aware of a real or potential conflict of interest, he would be expected to declare it.

There is one other point that was made during the debate in the committee. The hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) expressed some concern about the use of the singular rather than the plural, and he was concerned that this would have the effect of still requiring individual orders in council rather than a blanket order in council. We pursued this concern with the Department of Justice and were informed that one should not read any significance into the use of the singular rather than the plural in a legislative sentence, unless the context would clearly provide or require the singular use only. The singular includes the plural, and vice versa in this case. In the present case, the difficulty does not revolve around this factor. The difficulty in enacting a general order under subsection 24 (1) as it now reads is that there are no guidelines given on the power to prescribe the interest in a corporation or the interest in a class or classes of corporations that may be authorized by the order, so that it is impractical to make a general order under subsection 24 (1) as it now stands.

The proposed new subsection 24 (2) contained in Bill S-20 would remove this difficulty and permit a general authority to be issued, which is the objective.

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations regarding Bill S-20 which in my opinion is being passed a little too quickly through the House and was passed through the committee a little too quickly. I was sorry that witnesses were not called from the Northwest Territories or the Yukon to make their views on this bill known. When the bill was introduced in the House on April 11, I mentioned the fact that I thought it was quite important to the north and that I would like to see witnesses from the Northwest Territories brought before the committee because a number of important things are happening in the north at this time. First, there is the possibility of granting the right-of-way for the proposed pipeline, there is the question of unsettled land claims of the native peoples, the expansion of communities there, and so on.

I find myself unable at this time to vote in support of this bill and I urge other hon. members not to vote for its passage. It contains certain provisions which I find not very satisfactory. It raises in my mind a question as to whether the bill applies to commissioner's land. In the Northwest Territories we have town or hamlet council land, municipality land, commissioner's land around the municipalities, and then Crown lands. I believe this bill would leave it open to federal civil servants to purchase commissioner's land. Should they be in a situation where they would have prior knowledge of the expansion of a municipality, they would know what land could become valuable in the future, thus making speculation and conflict of interest possible.

Another serious question that I have with regard to this bill is, who will police its regulations? The intent of the bill is good. However, if the department itself is to ensure that the provisions of the bill are put into effect, why bother passing it? Another question in my mind relates to clause 24 which makes this bill retroactive. Is this provision there to let someone off the hook who has acquired some land in the north?

These are some of the important questions which this bill raises in my mind. I am sorry that no witnesses from the north were called before the committee to make known their comments on this bill, and I am sorry that duty called me elsewhere when the bill was before the committee and I was unable to raise these questions at that time. For these reasons I find myself unable to vote for the bill as it is at present.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR DEFINITION OF AGRICULTURAL COMMODITY AND BASE PRICE

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-50, to amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. The chair has had an opportunity to look at the four motions which are introduced as amendments at the report stage of Bill C-50. Having looked at these amendments, I find there appears to be some procedural difficulty with regard to them as related to the royal recommendation.

The first motion, which is in the name of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), seeks to amend the bill in clause 1 by deleting line 11 at page 1 and substituting a new commodity, namely, wool. The second motion also seeks to alter in a significant way the royal prerogative by establishing a new base price; and with respect to motion No. 3 the period of five years is altered to two years.

On each of these motions, before making a final ruling the Chair is quite prepared to hear arguments from hon. members on the procedural acceptability of the amendments. We might begin by considering the first one, motion No. 1 in the name of the hon. member for Crowfoot.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the motion proposed—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I would remind him that the Chair is inviting comments from hon. members, not on the substance of motions 1, 2 or 3 but only on their procedural acceptability. If hon. members have contributions to make in that regard, the Chair is prepared to hear their arguments now.

Mr. Towers: May I ask you a question, Mr. Speaker? Do you propose that we deal with all the motions at this time, or are we to deal with them separately? Should we try to establish the basis of each amendment as it is presented, or are you prepared to accept our dealing with them all now?

● (1650)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): I would simply remind the House that with respect to motion No. 4 there seems to be no difficulty; it appears to be in order. However, with regard to motions Nos. 1 to 3, in the mind of the Chair there are some reservations as to procedural acceptability and I was asking, only with respect to motion No. 1, if hon. members wished to present argument as to whether it is procedurally acceptable.

Mr. Towers: In speaking to the procedural problem, I consider it is an omission on the minister's part in not having included that commodity originally in the bill. Personally, I am disappointed, as I am sure the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) is, that the minister did not see fit to include that commodity in the bill originally, and also that he did not bring in a bill or an amendment himself which would have covered it. It would seem to me that it is very important, in dealing with this stabilization bill, that that farm product be included along with other farm products and it would be discriminatory if we could not proceed on that basis at this time. I would hope, Your Honour, that you would allow this amendment to be debated at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): In order to facilitate the business of the House, perhaps hon. members would agree that for the purposes of debate we could proceed at this time to motion No. 4, which has no procedural obstacles in the way. We could return later this evening to the other motions, at which time hon. members would have had an opportunity to consider them more carefully and they may wish at that time to present procedural argument. If it is agreed, we can proceed now to motion No. 4. Is it agreed?

Mr. McKinley: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think your suggestion is agreeable but I would ask unanimous consent of the House to allow the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) to move motion No. 4 on behalf of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). Further to that, I wonder if the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has anything to say with regard to motion No. 1—it appears simply to add another commodity, namely, wool and it appears it was an oversight by the minister or the department—or if the minister would be prepared, if Your Honour suggests it is necessary, to obtain the necessary royal prerogative from the Governor General to look after that amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is it agreed that we proceed to motion No. 4?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Towers (for Mr. Horner) moved motion No. 4:

That Bill C-50, an act to amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act, be amended by deleting subclause 5 (2) being lines 10 to 18 at page 4.

Adjournment Motion

He said: Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this motion it is a matter of deleting, in clause 5(2), lines 10 to 18. The deletion is simply this:

The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after subsection 10(1) thereof, the following subsection:

"(1.1) For the purpose of stabilizing the price of an agricultural commodity, the Board may exercise such other powers as are prescribed by the Governor in Council, upon the recommendation of the Board, for that purpose."

In dealing with this motion, one of the main problems is that nowhere in the bill is there an explanation of what is constituted by the word "Board" that is in line 3 of (1.1). Certainly we would want an explanation of that to really understand what the minister is trying to get at with this stabilization bill. It would seem to me that we have to be very careful in the legislation we are passing, because of the fact that we have seen in time past the political manoeuvring which does take place, primarily before elections.

Going back a certain period of time to the last time there was a hog stabilization payment made, there was a stabilization payment made to the farmer and at the time it only required a dollar and some cents, I believe, for each hog affected by the legislation, but because of the fact it was just prior to an election—at least we have to assume this—the then minister of agriculture decided that it would be advisable to pay $5 per hog on 200 hogs, which meant that those people producing the maximum number of hogs could receive up to $1,000. I am sure that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) wants to establish a sound basis upon which these payments will be made and it will not just be at the whim of the minister of agriculture of the day or the governor in council.

We have to take a serious look at the legislation as it is being debated in this House to ensure that it will stabilize the agricultural industry in Canada. We have to realize that we are in competition with our neighbour to the south, and the fact that it is using its agricultural production to a large degree to counteract its deficiency in energy production will create a difficult period in our agriculture industry in the months and years which lie ahead.

Certainly we do not want the agricultural industry to have to rely on an election in order for it to obtain the proper income for its products. In view of that, we have to have the legislation tied down to a form which will not only be acceptable to the industry but also satisfactory to the consumer and ensure that there will be an adequate supply of whatever product we are dealing with.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

Mr. Reid: Yes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

PROVISION TO INCLUDE PERIOD ONE RECEIVES WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION AS PART OF QUALIFYING PERIOD FOR BENEFITS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved that Bill C-236 to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when the present Unemployment Insurance Act was proclaimed on June 23, 1971, it included several aspects which were commendable. It included, for example, a maternity benefit clause, a sickness benefit clause and a clause covering the period of qualification for contributions before one could collect unemployment insurance of at least eight weeks in the previous 52-week period.

The new act also eliminated some things that were commendable and some that were beneficial and useful to the working people of this country. That is what my bill, C-236, is trying to amend. One of the things the new act eliminated was provision for workers who were injured or became sick on the job and as a result received workmen's compensation while they were off work. For example, a worker may be off for 52 weeks during which time he collects partial workmen's compensation benefits. At the end of the 52 weeks he is deemed ready to go back to work, but his former employer tells him that he could not keep the job open and had to hire someone in his place.

This worker may have contributed to the unemployment insurance fund for many years. He meets all the conditions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. He is willing and able to take a job, so he goes to the unemployment insurance office and files for benefits. His records show that he has not worked in the last 52 weeks, however, so he has not the required eight weeks of contributions to the fund. My amendment would extend the qualifying period to include the time that the worker was off due to sickness or was in receipt of compensation benefits. For example, if he was off for 52 weeks, then the unemployment insurance office would go back over the past year and 52 weeks to get eight weeks of contribution so he would be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits until he could get back into the work force.

It is a very simple amendment and it is just. It deals with a condition that was recognized in the original Unemployment Insurance Act before it was amended in 1971. The reasons for having it in the act prior to 1971 are still relevant.

I know that private members' bills have as much chance of passing in this House as a snowball has in the nether world. I know there is the practice of talking out these amendments, but I appeal to all members of the House to let this one pass. It may not be used in urban ridings where most occupations are less hazardous than those in my own area, where mining predominates. Insurance companies recognize that miners have the most hazardous jobs in the country and demand a higher premium from them than from other citizens. The chance of workers in my area being affected by the act as it stands is much higher than, say, workers in the riding of my hon. friend from St. Catharines (Mr. Parent). I know that even though he is on the government side of the House, he will recognize the great need for this kind of amendment which would benefit workers in highly industrialized areas whose jobs entail a great degree of danger.

This is the kind of amendment that is supported by the trade union movement, Madam Speaker, which has consistently suggested it to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) who is responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Act. Other amendments could be brought in, but this one is very important to the worker. I checked with the trade unions in my area to find the extent to which this particular amendment would be used, and found that compared to other sections of the act such as the maternity section, it would be used very often. It is very important in industrialized areas where workers have hazardous occupations.

Someone who has worked for 20 or 25 years and finds that he does not qualify for unemployment insurance benefits is in a very difficult position. He can go to the welfare office and ask to be put on the welfare rolls, in effect going through a very dehumanizing process in order to keep himself and his family going until he can find a job. Surely this is no way to treat people who made their contributions to the fund when they were healthy and working. This amendment would maintain the dignity of the worker who finds himself in such a situation.

I therefore hope that other hon. members who speak on this amendment do not resort to the usual device of talking the bill out, but that they let it go to a vote. It is very important to the workers of this country that this bill is passed and that the act be amended in this fashion.

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Madam Speaker, it is not my intention to talk out this bill, but it seems to me so important that it will require 15 or 20 minutes of my time. I have done some research into the proposed amendment and have some ideas regarding its effect on the Unemployment Insurance Act. I should like, also, to deal with what is wrong with other sections of the act which pertain generally to the situation to which the hon. member referred.

● (1710)

In 1971 there were fundamental changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act which among other things reduced the minimum insurable weeks required for eligibility to eight in the previous 52. This feature, in conjunction with the payment of sickness benefits, significantly reduced the need to provide for extensions to the qualifying period. The significance of the reduction to the requirement for eight weeks of insurable employment was that claimants would be paid benefits on a combination of recent labour force attachment and the difficulty in finding employment at the particular time he or she was unemployed. This is in contrast to the previous act which was based almost solely on the number of insurable weeks worked in the qualifying period.

I understand that experience with the new act since 1971 indicates that extensions to the qualifying period could be useful to the following categories of claimants: extended sickness, workmen's compensation, imprisonment, labour disputes, courses of occupational-vocational instruction. Studies on the potential advantage to extend benefit periods in these circumstances are under way in the Unemployment Insurance Commission but are not yet complete. Completion is dependent upon other in-depth studies being carried out that might bear either directly or indirectly on the suitability of reintroducing the extension of the qualifying period concept. Therefore, to proceed independently with proposals for amended legislation in this regard would be premature.

Let us consider benefit period extension. A significant consideration that must be taken into account in dealing with this general subject is the parallel requirement to also study the need for extensions to existing benefit periods for similar categories of claimants. For example, an individual who initiates a claim for benefit and is then incarcerated for an extended period of time should be treated with the same advantages as the individual who was incarcerated before he had established a claim for benefit. This effect compounds the degree of study that must be entered into before extensions to the qualifying period can be agreed upon.

Let me now say a word concerning workmen's compensation. At this time, working level discussions are being undertaken with provincial workmen's compensation boards in order to determine the extent to which unemployment insurance should be co-ordinated with payments from these agencies. These interrelationships not only deal with eligibility for benefit but also with dissemination of information to potential claimants vis-à-vis their rights to unemployment insurance. Except for permanent settlements, any moneys received from workmen's compensation boards are considered to be earnings and therefore deductible from unemployment insurance benefits. At the same time, since these earnings are not from employment they do not constitute insurance earnings for unemployment insurance purposes. However, an individual would have to have a period of incapacity while in receipt of workmen's compensation benefits for a period in excess of 42 weeks before his eligibility for unemployment insurance had expired.

My first point on the motion, Madam Speaker, is that provincial governments are already involved in workmen's compensation. The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) raised an interesting point which strikes at the very heart of unemployment insurance. The question as I see it, having read his motion, is whether unemployment insurance benefits should be taken out of the realm of insurance and considered as being in the realm of or form of guaranteed income.

In my short time as a member for this House I have seen the shortcomings of unemployment insurance. I have seen the self-defeating aspects of unemployment insurance and I have also seen the real worth of unemployment insurance. Let me state emphatically that the federal government, rightly or wrongly, appears to me to be shouldering all the blame for what sometimes should be a provincial responsibility. For instance, I do not think the federal government should be held solely responsible for the housing crisis in this country. Neither should it be held solely responsible for the unemployment figures in this country. I am amazed to observe that in provinces of high unemployment, politicians blame the federal government, but in provinces of low unemployment politicians give credit to the provincial government.

This obvious lack of consistency is never attacked by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or the cabinet. They appear to accept the total responsibility for all wrong and accept no credit for what is right. That is an admirable trait, but its one shortcoming is that inevitably provincial elections are fought in the provincial arena and the federal government is the main issue. The same holds true of this motion.

Provincial governments have a clear mandate to augment federal policy. They have the right to introduce budgets and thus hold in their hands the key to success in such areas as workmen's compensation. Every year provinces, in bringing down provincial budgets, must decide on their social welfare policies. For instance, how much should someone on welfare get? How high should be the minimum wage? What provisions should be included in the provincial workmen's compensation act? How much money should be allocated to blind people's allowances? How much can the province spend on day-care centres? To what extent can the province make use of the federal government's 50-50 formula under the Canada Assistance Plan?

[Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate).]

Unemployment insurance is a blessing in some cases but a curse in others. The question which must always be asked is, "How far should we go?" It should not be, "How far can we go before we exhaust the public treasury or overtax the working man." There are areas in which the unemployment insurance scheme needs changing. If the hon. gentleman for Nickel Belt were suggesting that we should amend the act so that overpayments which are the fault of the interviewing process or of the computer are not charged to the recipient, I would wholeheartedly support it.

How you can ask a seasonally employed man to repay a $1,000 overpayment for which he was not responsible, I do not know. But that is the law, Madam Speaker. That is what the act we are discussing says must be done. How anyone can expect a person living in a rural area to commute 200 miles to work, to a job that pays the minimum wage, I do not know. The hon. member noted this point in his argument. Yet under the act, if a worker refuses work in the closest industrial centre, which could be hundreds of miles away, benefits are cut off immediately. That, too, is part of the act. At present the Unemployment Insurance Act discriminates against people in the outports of Newfoundland or in the rural areas of other provinces.

The hon. gentleman who proposed this motion is concerned perhaps about the same things I am concerned about, namely, that what is effective in Alberta may not be appropriate in Newfoundland; what may be a practical insurance scheme in a province which has high standards of social legislation may not be practical in a province which does not have those standards. To be truly effective, the Unemployment Insurance Act would need to stipulate different regulations for different parts of this country and for different classes of working men and women. Should the regulations for western Canada be the same as those for Newfoundland? In western Canada thousands of jobs remain unfilled, but in Newfoundland no jobs are vacant. I do not think they should be the same.

By the same token, provincial government policies must be different in different areas of Canada. Should we not consider the economic deprivation of Newfoundland? What should the policy of that provincial government be? Perhaps we could take a lesson from progressive areas of Liberal policy or from the professed policy of the party of the hon. gentleman who proposed this motion.

As far as I am concerned, unemployment insurance should only be used for someone who is looking for a job but cannot find one. He or she should be capable of working. The only exception I would make would be for cases of pregnancy. The unemployment insurance regulations should be open for those people who honestly cannot find work. The workmen's compensation acts should guarantee someone a salary in case of sickness or injury and it should be an adequate compensation. It should be part of the social legislaiton of each province. The working man who pays in to these insurance schemes deserves consideration.

I also believe that the provincial governments are responsible for their own social policy best suited to their province. They are also responsible for developing policies that will guarantee employment. In areas of high unemployment, government initiative may be the only answer for development and perhaps nationalization of industry should be considered. The federal government should stick to certain limits or it will eventually become so involved in provincial matters as to warrant the presently unjustified criticism it is experiencing with unemployment figures and housing.

I will agree with the hon. member on one point, that where a provincial government has been lax, where it has fallen down on social legislation, has got itself into serious trouble financially or is off base spending the hard earned money of the people, some mechanism should exist to make up for that inadequacy, for the sake of the people. Provincial and federal government are elected to protect the people with the workingman's hard earned money, but each government should shoulder its own responsibilities.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Madam Speaker, I am glad to associate with the sponsor of the bill, because I notice that his intentions are excellent. However, with regard to the administrative complications arising out of the present act. I believe that such a bill would further complicate the calculation of benefits owing to a person on unemployment insurance. The fact that a worker is victim of an accident on his job certainly deserves particular attention, so that he may not lose, on such an account, his right or privilege to benefits to which he may be entitled were he on unemployment insurance.

However, Bill C-236 obviously concerns sections 18 and 21 of the act. And section 18, concerning the qualifying period, is quite complicated. It reads:

> The qualifying period of an insured period is the shorter of (a) the period of fifty-two weeks that immediately precedes the commencement of an initial benefit period under subsection (1) of section 20, and
> (b) the period that begins on the commencement date of an immediately preceding initial benefit period and ends with the end of the week preceding the commencement of an initial benefit period under subsection (1) of section 20.

Sections 22, 24 are just as complicated.

I said earlier in this House, and the hon. member who just spoke also suggested that provisions of the act are contrary to amendments introduced by Bill C-236. I also repeated at every opportunity, especially when I gave my views on the acts involving workers, that the legislation is always worded in and almost unintelligible way, and certainly not readable by the workers. The position taken by the sponsors of the bill is very important. But concerning improvements to the unemployment Insurance Act, there should be proposed an amendment explaining clearly that changes proposed should be made part of the act, and be worded to take into account the fact that a worker lost certain benefits he could have been entitled if no accident had happened.

At any rate, the explanations supplied in the bill are pertinent. It is stated that the purpose of the bill is to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide that where an insured person is not working and is receiving total temporary workmen's compensation because of an industrial accident or illness, there shall be added to his qualifying period. The time spent off work and in receipt of the workmen's compensation.

I support the bill, and take this opportunity to suggest that when in due course the Unemployment Insurance Act is amended, which has long been overdue, undoubtedly because the act is too complicated, and therefore there is uncertainty as to how to amend or improve the various unintelligible parts in the act in order to avoid present complications.

And concerning the complexity involving illness, I will give a few examples. I could state hundreds of them, but I thought it would be in order to bring to this House's attention a few facts that occur in cases of illness, concerning qualifying periods, computations, exclusions. There is no end to the story!

• (1730)

I have here the case of a recipient who submitted a claim for sickness benefits on October 27, 1973. He provided the appropriate medical certificate establishing the duration of his disability to December 20, 1973, when he would be recovered, fit and available. On February 7, 1974, the claimant had not yet received any payments. As his claim had been lost, he had to start all over again. He had to file a new claim, provide new medical certificates, even if he had recovered since December 20, 1973. This happens regularly. It is an example of a bureaucracy paralyzed by a red tape avalanche, and the cost of all this must be paid by the Canadian taxpayers.

I have evidence that certain investigators insisted on obtaining a medical certificate from someone who had had a routine medical check-up. This is really astounding. This badly framed legislation has caused so many complications of all kinds that a great number of sections should be amended in accordance with the role of social legislation, and I hope that when they are, the suggestions of the hon. member will be considered.

I have here another case: On January 14, 1974, the commission advised a claimant that his uneligibility period from November 18 to January 5, 1974 was over. However, in another letter, dated February 7, 1974, he was advised that his uneligibility period applied to the complement and extension phases and that his payments were finished. This is all very complex. How can the poor unemployed man, who had a lot of difficulty during his employment period and who acquired by his contributions a right to payments when he becomes unemployed, understand all this? At certain times, there is pandemonium. Then, it is unavoidable that members of the House suggest solutions to try to ease the effects of an overly complex legislation.

I have here another case, a sickness benefit claim submitted on November 18. After completing the normal formalities, the commission paid the contributor $280 for four weeks. Then, the problem of medical certificates came up. He provided four of them. The commission advised him on January 24 that he will perhaps obtain another extension if he reports within the time allowed by the commission.

With the bill now under consideration, I am convinced that there would be problems of medical certificates, since the referral physicians who are considered as specialists would create problems. I know in certain cases that they are not, although they do give medical certificates to claimants referred to them. In the above-mentioned case of February 18, he is told that his claim which took effect on November 18 is considered as his initial claim and that up to now he has received five weeks of benefits.

At that time, he still had two weeks of sick benefits to receive and he is advised that he will get them in a fortnight. He is also told that since January 20, he is qualified to obtain the ordinary benefits, since the commission has received the authorization from his physician that he could perform some light work and that the claimant was available since January 25. One must not forget that this last letter is dated February 18 and that the person concerned received his benefits during five weeks, as of November 18, 1973.

I could give numerous other examples, but I do not wish to waste time in this regard. I agree with the sponsor of the bill. I also agree that it be passed. However, before concluding, I believe it to be in order to sum up the matter thus: as a result of the complicated legislation drafted by technocrats who have never known the difficulties of unemployed people, a confusing situation has arisen, with the following results; months of delay in the payment of benefits, overpayment of benefits, benefits twice-paid and, in some instances, no payments at all.

All of this due to all kinds of reasons, as insignificant as may be: compromised eligibility, for a start, because of complementary periods, qualifying periods, prolonged periods, to which one must add waiting periods, and leave credits considered as earnings. And to complete the picture, payment procedures were centralized by organizing a team of push-button civil servants fed with often erroneous statistics, who attempt to control the situation to the best of their ability, with more failures than success, by using computers that are out of order as a result of an overload due to income tax returns, so that mistakes mushroom, and unemployed persons suffer from the situation.

It is a sort of summary of the legislation's results. It has brought in certain benefits, I would say a lot of benefits, to many unemployed. But there is so much complications in the technicalities of the regulations that the legislation gives rise to great anxiety for the families of the unemployed who are waiting for unemployment benefits which are not coming.

So, I will conclude by saying that I support fully the proposed legislation, and I would appreciate a lot when time will come to bring forth changes to the legislation—which badly needs them—that the suggestion made today not be forgotten.

[English]

Mr. Gilbert Parent (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend from Nickel Belt and I have known each other for many years and, while we have not always been in agreement on the various issues that we have discussed, I must say that today we do stand shoulder to shoulder at least on this particular aspect of the bill he wishes to have passed. I would hope that the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) would not think I am simply helping to talk the bill out by giving him all this support which he so richly deserves.

[Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska).]

Mr. Rodriguez: I am watching the clock.

Mr. Parent: I might preface my remarks by suggesting that should this bill be talked out, which I hope it is not, the hon. member could perhaps come to the manpower committee, of which I am a member, where I am sure we would receive him and his suggestion with open arms.

The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) earlier mentioned that there could be an extension of one category which would be useful so far as unemployment insurance benefits were concerned; among others he said that long term illness could be taken into consideration. One aspect of workmen's compensation that I should like to see corrected is that when a man has to stay off work this is counted against him when he comes to draw unemployment insurance benefits. However, I hope we will not take a piecemeal approach to the problem but rather that the comments that have been made will be regarded as an overview of the problems sometimes faced in administering unemployment insurance benefits.

I read some time ago a book called "Future Shock" by Alvin Tofler, and in the book he said people will continue to go to school, not simply for a few years and then leave school never to return, but as an ongoing project right into adult years and beyond. It seems to me this is one aspect that the hon. member for Nickel Belt might also consider.

Having been a teacher, and I understand still being a teacher in good standing with the board, I know the hon. member will appreciate that people who try to better themselves, if you will by pursuing educational studies at school, should in no way be penalized for doing so. If people who have worked for a number of years wish to take a few months or even a few years off to further their education, when their educational term is over and if they are not immediately employable, then I think they should be eligible to draw benefits for which they have worked over the years, though I would not suggest they should draw unemployment insurance benefits while they are actually at school.

I should like to address myself specifically to the cost of unemployment insurance benefits and to pose a question and possibly answer it, though not necessarily for the enlightenment of my hon. friend who, I am sure, is aware of many of the facts and figures that I will be quoting.

Mr. Rodriguez: As long as my hon. friend is not wrong.

Mr. Parent: The hon. member knows that if I am wrong I will be the first to admit it. However, sometimes mistakes are made inadvertently and I am sure the hon. member will at least grant me a small error along the way if one is made.

To return to my remarks, Madam Speaker, what is the cost of UIC? There were changes made in unemployment insurance premiums recently. Maximum insurable earnings under the Canada Pension Plan were changed on January 1, and this means higher unemployment insurance payments for anyone earning over $8,840 a year, and higher Canada Pension Plan payments for anyone earning over $6,600. Moreover, certain salaried employees who have been paying unemployment insurance premiums at reduced rates will have to pay more because they will have to pay the full shot for the next year.

● (1740)

The hon. member for Nickel Belt will remember the discussion we had some years ago when we were asked to include teachers under the unemployment insurance fund. At that time there was a great furor as teachers felt they would not be among the unemployed because as far as they could see into the future there would always be a need, as indeed there is, for good teachers, since teachers were simply not turned out from our colleges of education without jobs being available. I am a bit sad to say that the prognosis they formed at the time has not held true. In the year 1973, 1,800 and some odd teachers were the beneficiaries of unemployment insurance. More and more people across the country are coming under this scheme, so I would hope again that this would be taken into consideration by hon. members.

Premiums under both these schemes I mentioned are determined by the individual's income level. Under the Canada Pension Plan, which applies to all Canadians other than Quebec residents, the charge is 1.8 per cent of gross income up to a maximum of $6,600. However, the first $700 of income is exempt, making the top premium 1.8 per cent of $5,900, or $106 a year. Next year the percentage and exemption remain the same, but the maximum pensionable earnings will increase from $6,600 to $7,400, so the maximum premium will go up from $106 to $120.

Under the unemployment insurance scheme Canadians at present are paying 1.4 per cent of their gross incomes up to $8,840, which makes the top premium $123 in 1974. This year the maximum insurable earnings will increase from $8,840 to $9,620, and the maximum premium, which the hon. member will no doubt make a note of, will go up from $123 to $134.68.

However, quite a few Canadians have been paying less than the 1.4 per cent, so the increase will be relatively larger for those people. Those are the people who were not covered by the unemployment insurance plan before the scheme was extended to cover everyone at the beginning of 1972. Such people were phased into the scheme gradually, paying reduced rates in 1972, 1973, and in 1974, unless they changed jobs. In each of those years the rate was moved closer to the standard percentage, and for 1975 the difference will be wiped out.

One might ask what the cost of unemployment insurance is to the country. Let me refer to a news release of May 28, 1975, in which it is stated:

> Manpower Minister Robert Andras has promised to study a proposal which could bring 18 more weeks of unemployment insurance benefits to jobless victims of the auto slump.

I draw attention to this because in many ways my constituency is affected just as is the constituency of the hon. member for Nickel Belt. We have many members of the United Auto Workers in St. Catharines, and this information was of particular interest to me.

The news release further states:

> —unemployment benefits for the first four months of this year totalled $1.2 billion, an increase of almost 50 per cent over the $830 million total for the first four months of 1974.

> If projected for the rest of the year at present jobless rates, the total benefit cost of the program this year would be about $3.5 billion—far more than the 1974 total of $2.116 billion.

I just wonder how the suggestion in this bill would fit into this scheme. We were not given any figures by the hon. member, but undoubtedly they would be forthcoming at a later time when this bill got to the committee. I give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt in that regard.

The news release further states:

> Increased unemployment this year with a resultant larger number of claims for benefits and a higher level of payments due to increased earnings are among factors that will push the total up.
> Manpower Minister Robert Andras told the MPs that in 1975 the country will face the highest level of unemployment in 14 years.

Again this prognosis saddens me, but it is one which we must consider and check to see how things develop.

The news article then states:

> For the Unemployment Insurance Commission this means substantially increased demands will be made on both its administrative and financial resources . . .
> In the first four months of the year, the jobless rate ranged from a low of 6.7 per cent in January to 7.2 per cent in both March and April.

It seems that the people who must apply for unemployment insurance benefits are affected in more ways than one. I have addressed myself to the problem, if you will, in respect of a man or a woman who has been employed for a long period of time and then has to apply for social benefits. To me it is a natural duty or responsibility of every able person to look after himself or herself, in so far as it is possible, and where this is not possible I feel it is incumbent upon society to look after its own.

If, through inadequate legislation, the ambitions of the unemployed person are removed, his dreams are shattered, and his strength is stifled, then we as a nation will have to pay the price, and a high price it will be, because we are depriving ourselves as a group of the many productive years such people would have as citizens, workers, and contributors to society.

What is the reaction of a person who is unemployed for an extended period of time, particularly to his physical makeup? Naturally there is worry about the support of the family, meeting financial commitments, and this is not conducive to quick recuperation or a desire to get out and on the job. Quite to the contrary, in some cases this can worsen the claimant's condition and bring about a series of other ailments including ulcers, stomach and nervous disorders, insomnia and low morale. We do not want any of these things among our citizens because these things can even affect the health of the immediate family.

An hon. Member: What was that about not talking it out?

Mr. Parent: My hon. friend asks about talking it out. I would hope he will bear with me for a few more minutes.

Mr. Rodriguez: About five seconds.

Mr. Parent: I have a few more points to make and I am sure they will be beneficial to you when you present the case to the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I would just like to remind the hon. member that his remarks should be addressed to the Chair and not to members on the opposite side of the House.

Mr. Parent: I apologize, Madam Speaker, and I will see to it that all my remarks are addressed to you or through you to hon. members opposite, and I hope you will accept that apology. I trust you will not put a stop watch on me.

How is a person affected emotionally when he is out of work for a long period of time? The traditional role of the man in our society, and I say this knowing that this is women's year and that a large number of wives work, is as the breadwinner and head of the family. A reversal of the roles, that is, the wife being responsible for the family and its upkeep for a long period of time, can in some cases seriously affect the emotional balance of the unemployment insurance claimant, particularly when benefits run out.

The only alternative is welfare, the latter being particularly applicable when the wife is unable for one reason or another to work. The loss of material goods in such cases is highly possible. It might involve the foreclosure of a mortgage or the loss of a car, a television set, or other items. In such cases starting over is a most demoralizing procedure.

Some people might never bring themselves back up to the level or standard of living which they once knew and which they worked so hard to achieve. How does this affect a person mentally? In some cases there is an extension of the emotional aspect. A good citizen in the society which surrounds him might become seriously warped in the face of non-existent benefits, particularly after illness, which quite conceivably might be followed by a loss of employment. This is basically what we are discussing today, the inability of a person to carry on his or her work because of illness. These people who may have been hard working taxpaying citizen contributors to our society sometimes because of illness end up as bitter persons devoid of any ambition or any desire to take care of their commitments.

I would hope that these few suggestions that I make in respect of the bill brought forward by the hon. member for Nickel Belt might be useful to him, and I would invite him to bring them to the attention of the Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. I would hope that this bill would not be left to die on the order paper or remain dormant. I should like to see it revitalized and discussed more fully.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, with his bill today the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has reminded the House of the necessity for more work on the existing Unemployment Insurance Act in order to improve it in some parts and to bring about some profound changes in other parts. His proposal of course is to be commended. We certainly agree with him on the substance of what he has put forward to the House.

If the hon. member had assiduously attended the meetings of the Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, as he did in the past, he might agree with some of us that to proceed piecemeal on this very important piece of legislation would not really be in the best interests of the country and the people who benefit from the legislation. As was mentioned by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) we would rather include this suggestion, since others that have been put forward by members in various parts of the House, as part of a total package that could be considered by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) in the hope that he will soon bring forward basic changes to the existing legislation.

I should like to give some examples of where there is need for improvement. There should be extensions in respect of the qualifying period as it affects people who aree in receipt of Workmen's Compensation Board payments. In that same category we should also look at the situation of people who suffer from extended illnesses. Amendments are also necessary there. Then there are those people who have been imprisoned, who had been employed before imprisonment and perhaps while in prison. Consideration should be given to these people so that it would be easier for them to enter the work force. Then in respect of people engaged in labour disputes we should consider an extension of the qualifying period. There are also those who are involved in occupational and vocational training courses.

There are also other examples one might give in relation to the initiative taken by the hon. member. It seems to me there should be rewards under the law for people in relation to their attachment to the labour force. In other words, the longer one has worked the longer one should be entitled to benefits. This kind of reward presently is absent from the legislation. Surely Canadians who have been working for a period of 20 or 30 years understandably feel they are entitled to a reward in proportion to the number of years they have worked. They should be rewarded for the continuity of their work so that when they happen to become unemployed this would be reflected in the legislation.

We should eliminate the practice of benefit control officers penalizing innocent people who really do not understand what they are asked to sign in the form of statements submitted to them by the benefit control officers. We should improve the language of the forms which people find extremely difficult to understand when they have to fill them out. We should also provide notice to claimants that they are about to run out of benefits in two or three weeks' time. This should be the procedure rather than the present system whereby someone receives a letter saying that he or she has run out of benefits, period.

Then there should be substantial amendments in respect of training allowances for people undergoing training so that they will have a better income while being trained for jobs. There should also be a rule that would permit the fund to create jobs in the public sector when there is a shortage of jobs in the private sector. I see it is six o'clock, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR DEFINITION OF AGRICULTURAL COMMODITY AND BASE PRICE

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-50, to amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there would be consent to reverting back to the procedural question that was raised about motions Nos. 1 and 3 standing in the name of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), and motion No. 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The suggestion is made that we deal with the first three motions to amend Bill C-50 at report stage at this point. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, on taking a look at these three motions I think it is quite clear that they all propose additional charges against the revenues of the Crown. I do not think it is necessary for me to read the royal recommendation. It is found on the page opposite page 1 of the bill. It lays down the limits beyond which parliament cannot proceed on the money that can be spent.

I direct the attention of the House to Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 246(3) on page 207, which reads:

> The guiding principle in determining the effect of an amendment upon the financial initiative of the Crown is that the communication, to which the royal demand of recommendation is attached, must be treated as laying down once for all (unless withdrawn and replaced) not only the amount of a charge, but also its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications. In relation to the standard thereby fixed, an amendment infringes the financial initiative of the Crown, not only if it increases the amount, but also if it extends the objections and purposes, or relaxes the conditions and qualifications expressed in the communication by which the Crown has demanded or recommended a charge.

I would point out that in the case of motion No. 1 an additional commodity is added. In motion No. 2 the conditions are changed so as to change substantially the base price upon which future payments are to be made, and in motion No. 3 the word "five" being changed to "two" is a significant change in the number of years over which the stabilization program is to take place. So I would argue that these three motions offend against the royal recommendation and the traditions and principles of the House of Commons, and therefore cannot be put.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I dealt with motion No. 1 and I suggested then that it corrects an omission by the minister. I had hoped that he would have included that commodity in the bill. I believe it is a very serious omission. However, in view of the argument presented by the parliamentary secretary, and in view of motions Nos. 2 and 3 which possibly could be dealt with together, you may wish to separate motion No. 1 from the other two. I want to point out that clause 3.8.2(1) reads:

> The prescribed price of an agricultural commodity in a year shall be,
> (a) in relation to a named commodity, the amount obtained by adjusting ninety per cent, or such higher percentage as the Governor in Council may prescribe, of the base price thereof for a year by an index calculated in such manner as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council to reflect the estimated production costs of the commodity in the year as compared with the average of production costs for the five years immediately preceding the year;

My point is that this expenditure has already been covered in the clause, and the purpose of motion No. 2 is merely to clarify exactly what is included in indexing. This was debated at considerable length, and the minister himself stated that he would take into consideration the cost of fertilizer, the cost of labour, the cost of gas, and all the input costs of a product. If he is going to include all the input costs—and I agree that he should—transportation costs should also be included, and so this amendment is needed for clarification. This does not necessarily mean that the amendment will cause a considerable increase in expenditure.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what is the transitory expense of an agricultural product? Should you consider its cost to a certain point only, from the combine to the bin, for instance, and disregard any other cost? I assume that the minister will consider the cost of transportation of grain sold outside the Canadian Wheat Board to market as part of the cost of production. This amendment is just for clarification. It could have been included as an encompassing clause, but since we are not sure about that, it was included for purposes of clarification.

With regard to motion No. 3 we find that deleting the word "five" and substituting therefor the word "two" will create no great expenditure of money. It just means that the averaging cost instead of being calculated over five years will be calculated over two years. In fact it could well be that as a result there will be a lesser expenditure if this amendment is adopted. The parliamentary secretary, in my opinion, is misleading the House when he states that an extra expenditure is involved here. By reducing the number of years to two we will be making the cost of production more realistic.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that you will seriously consider this amendment, and at least allow the second and third amendments to be debated because they are of fundamental importance. It is certainly a matter of clarification. It is tidying the whole bill up, and it does not necessarily mean that there will be a greater expenditure. It is just a matter of clarification so that the producer will know exactly what will be constituted as a cost of production.

● (2010)

As I said earlier, this is covered in the previous clause 3.8.(2), and I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will look favourably upon the reception of at least two of these amendments, if not all three.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to support the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers). The addition of wool in motion No. 1 as an agricultural product should not be denied, and I notice that industrial milk and industrial cream have been separated. I presume that had only the word "milk" been used, that would have meant both industrial milk and industrial cream, but for purposes of clarification and making sure that both are covered, I presume this wording was used.

I think wool should be added because that would signify that wool would come under the legislation. Wool is very much a product of sheep. Leaving wool out would be the same as saying that cowhides would not enter into the calculation of the returns from a cattle beast on the basis that it was separate. Therefore I think wool is very much part of this bill, and to leave it out would mean that the bill would not cover wool. Surely if it is to cover sheep, it really signifies that it covers sheep only as meat, whereas wool should be considered part of the product of sheep. It just so happens that wool is a major part of the return on sheep production. Therefore I do not see any point in not allowing the word "wool".

The bill does include sheep, and I think a good argument could be made, in figuring and assessing the returns from sheep, that one has to consider the value of the wool. All this amendment does is clarify something which has already been implied, that is, that sheep will be covered, and that wool is part of the return from the raising of sheep.

Turning to motion No. 2, it reads in part that:

> ... the base price the cost of transportation of such agricultural commodity from representative producer shipping centres to representative markets averaged for the said five years."

I think this is a very good point. After all, the cost of shipping produce from the general area where it is produced to the general area where it is consumed is substantial, and it makes all the difference in the world. For instance it is argued that western beef producers are being unduly discriminated against by virtue of the high cost of transporting beef carcasses versus live cattle. I think this is a major factor to be taken into account.

The way the legislation presently reads, those who live close to a consuming centre will get quite a lot more out of this base price than those who live far away. Adding the cost of transportation to this base price would remove some of these inequities and make a more representative bill. It does not necessarily mean that the cost would be higher, because the cost of shipping commodities is representative of the cost—

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would like to know if the hon. member is addressing himself to the substance of the bill and the motions, or whether he is dealing with the procedural aspects.

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, this does not change the money involved and what the treasury would be responsible for. Deleting the word "five" and substituting the word "two" merely underlines the fact that some number has to be used. It could be one year, two years, five years, 10 or 20 years. None of those figures would imply that the treasury would be responsible for any more costs. To say that substituting the word "two" would cost more than "five" only assumes that inflation will continue, and therefore the average of five years will be less than the average of two years. It could well be the other way. I think motion No. 3 does not in any way imply that the cost to the treasury will be any greater. It may well be less. I suggest that any number could be used, five, ten or twenty, but in a practical way two years does not necessarily increase the cost to the treasury. It may reduce it, and I therefore suggest that it should be allowed so that we might debate it.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, there are several reasons for urging that the amendments are in order. The first, of course, is that the parliamentary secretary has argued that they are out of order. That, by itself, is a major reason.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I can understand why the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) might have wandered a little, because he had the greatest difficulty following the parliamentary secretary in his very tortuous point of order.

I would point out to the Chair the wording of this royal recommendation, and if one were to follow with precision the argument advanced by the parliamentary secretary I must say that this would place great inhibitions upon an opposition which has grave problems trying to put forward proposals to alter bad legislation to make it better and to improve some of the proposals of the government. The difficulties are, of course, in the rules. The royal recommendation in this particular instance says:

> His Excellency the Governor General has recommended to the House of Commons the present measure to amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act to amend in the manner prescribed the definition "agricultural commodity" ...

I would suggest that if the words "the manner prescribed" are to be given the fullest, strictest and harshest interpretation, which the parliamentary secretary urges for them, it would mean that the use of those words in any other bill before this House, with a royal recommendation attached, would make it impossible for the opposition, or any hon. member, to move an amendment. Some day there may be a member of the government party with enough courage to move an amendment. I look forward to that. Some day I will see rising out of those ranks of statues opposite—

Mrs. Campagnolo: Oh, Jed!

Mr. Baldwin: —an hon. man or an hon. woman who will say, "I don't like what the government is doing; I'm going to try to amend it". I look forward to that day. I hope it will happen when I am still in this House. I do not have much hope, but one can wish. I hear them making noises occasionally, but that is as far as they go.

● (2020)

If I can get back to the point I was making, Mr. Speaker, that if these words "the manner prescribed" are to be given the very strict, harsh interpretation ascribed to them by the parliamentary secretary, it would be almost impossible, if the same words were used in the royal recommendation accompanying other legislation, for members of this House to move any sort of amendment at all. I submit to the Chair that "the manner prescribed" could be expanded to cover all aspects of the bill.

Most people realize that in the interpretation of a statute, the whole statute must be taken together in order to get the meaning. According to the rather absurd, argument advanced by the parliamentary secretary, that would mean that any attempt to amend a particular clause in a meaningful way would be an infraction, and would prohibit a member of the House or a party in this House from making a change.

I am rather shocked at the parliamentary secretary's attempt to do this. He is dredging back 200 years to a royal recommendation, the prerogative of Charles I, James I, Elizabeth I, and Henry VIII, that highly undomesticated monarch. Mr. Speaker, those were the rules that prevailed in those days—"the king can do no wrong"—so the Commons, struggling to do their job were confronted time after time with the fact that the king had brought in a bill and said to them, "You can proceed with this bill for these purposes, but our recommendation circumscribes you, so you are limited in what you do."

We are in the twentieth century, Mr. Speaker. We are a parliament struggling to deal with the tremendous problems which the group of hon. nonentities opposite have been unable to deal with. The parliamentary secretary is attempting to invoke this harsh and rigid rule which is founded on what was done 250 or 300 years ago. I am ashamed that the parliamentary secretary would try to urge Your Honour to delve into the mists of antiquity to call up that rule.

I know we find the rule in Beauchesne today, but if Your Honour were to do the research he would find its origin rests in the days of the kings. Remember, Mr. Speaker, kings lost their heads, and Speakers even lost their jobs from time to time.

Mr. Sharp: No threats now!

Mr. Baldwin: I cited a case yesterday where the Speaker was so incensed at what the government was trying to do that he got up and made a speech. I would not hold it against Your Honour if in making this decision you saw fit to censure the government. I would be prepared to sit down and listen if you were to find that what the parliamentary secretary is trying to do is wrong.

If Your Honour is not satisfied that the sound arguments of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) and the hon. member for Dauphin have demolished the rather trivial proposition of the hon. parliamentary secretary, I would call upon you to consider the consequences of a ruling of this kind which prohibits the opposition or a member from making an amendment. After all, it is only on a contingency basis that those royal revenues—which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) loves so well—will be in any way circumscribed. There is no certainty of it.

If one looks at the Public Accounts and examines the expenditures made under this bill it will be found that they were extremely limited in some cases—especially under a Conservative government which produced such a great degree of prosperity in the agricultural industry that it was not necessary for the government to be called upon to make good. It is only a contingency liability in this legislation; it does not have the effect of directly dealing with the revenues of the Crown.

I call upon Your Honour to rule with all your resources and advice in an attempt to put the parliamentary secretary back where he belongs.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take very long on this. In reference to motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3, I would refer Your Honour to Hansard for January 24, 1958, when a member of the opposition presented a motion to add another commodity. I would submit at this time that by order of the Governor in Council any commodity can be added to this bill at any time the need is found.

This is what was said at page 3790 of Hansard for the date I have mentioned:

> Mr. Chairman, in connection with this amendment, I would like to point out that it is clearly out of order. I think there is no question that if this amendment were accepted it would add to the general cost to the treasury and it is not within the competence of any private member to make an amendment which would have that effect. I therefore think there is no question that the amendment is out of order.

That statement was made by the then minister of agriculture, Mr. Harkness. The amendment was ruled out of order.

In regard to motion No. 2, when the hon. member talks about the present clause in the legislation he says it is already covered by clause 8.2(1). This is not so in terms of expenditure. He refers to the cost of transportation and not to cost of production of input items. We use that if we are figuring the cost of any product today. When costing beef, for example, we figure out the cost of the transportation of the animal and the cost of the transportation of the grain. This is the way it is done, whether some people want to recognize it or not.

In motion No. 3 there is reference to a two-year base. When the bill was first introduced into this House in 1958, the government changed the original period from three years to ten years because it thought it was better. There is no doubt that what members opposite are suggesting now would make it more costly to the government. We have tried all the different formulas, and we think the five-year base period is the most beneficial for the producer and the consumer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): I thank hon. members for their contributions to this procedural debate; they have been enlightening, and even at times entertaining.

I think it is quite correct to point out that the guiding principle with respect to the procedural acceptability of the motions before us is in Beauchesne's fourth edition at page 207. Citation 246(3) points out that the recommendation is in reference to:

> ... not only the amount of a charge, but also its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications.

The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) made the argument that this was only a cost, but I think the citation goes well beyond a charge alone.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) argued that there was an omission. I would respectfully point out that this is a point of debate.

The citation makes it clear in these words:

> ... the royal demand of recommendation ... must be treated as laying down once and for all (unless withdrawn and replaced) not only ...

If there were an omission it would be the prerogative of a minister of the Crown to withdraw and replace the recommendation, and that prerogative would rest with him alone.

● (2030)

In the case of motion No. 1, it appears clear that a commodity has been added which goes beyond the terms of the recommendation, and therefore it appears to offend section 3 of citation 246 of Beauchesne's fourth edition to which I referred. I therefore rule that motion No. 1 is unacceptable from the procedural point of view.

Motion No. 2 purports to add a new factor or condition in establishing the base price of an agricultural commodity. Therefore, it does, according to the passage I cited, fall into the prohibited category.

Motion No. 3 offends perhaps one of the most fundamental provisions of the recommendation, namely, the number of years needed to establish the base price.

I therefore rule that Motions Nos. 2 and 3 are not acceptable procedurally, and cannot be put.

Does the House wish to proceed with motion No. 4, which appears to be in order?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among House leaders and there is, I think, general agreement that, rather than proceed immediately with the bill now before the House, we should consider several other items on the order paper namely, item No. 15, coming under government business, dealing with the travel of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, then items S-25, S-17 and S-15. If we complete that business before ten o'clock, we would propose to revert to consideration of Bill C-50. I hope that there will be consent for this proposal.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to accept this proposal. We are always willing to accommodate the government. We look forward to anything which will improve our desperate economic situation. I do not know what the Explosives Act will do to the economy, but we are willing to discuss it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we also agree to this re-arrangement of our business. At least we will not get any less done this way.

Mr. Baldwin: Stanley, you are a cynic.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is it agreed that we proceed as suggested by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner).]

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

AUTHORITY FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development be empowered to adjourn from place to place in Quebec and Ontario on two separate occasions on June 8 to 10, 1975, and on June 15 to 17, 1975, or during the summer adjournment of the House, to study economic development on reserves and to inspect some historic sites and parks, and that the necessary supporting staff do accompany the committee.

PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES (INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS) ACT

PROVISIONS OF PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES TO EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES' OFFICIALS IN CANADA

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that Bill S-25, to amend the Privileges and Immunities (International Organizations) Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few comments about this short bill. Although it is relatively small in size, in terms of the number of clauses it contains it is an important bill.

As hon. members will have noted, the European communities will open a mission in Ottawa in the fall of 1975 and the purpose of this bill, which seeks to amend the Privileges and Immunities (International Organizations) Act, is to accord the mission legal capacities and immunities and to provide that the representatives of the communities shall be accorded privileges and immunities normally accorded to diplomatic envoys under international law.

I wish to underline the importance which Canada attaches to the forthcoming opening in Ottawa of this mission of the European communities. As hon. members know, an important thrust of Canadian foreign policy at present is to establish a contractual link with the European communities. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) mentioned in the House of Commons yesterday, I believe, the European commission is now seeking authorization from the Council of Ministers to commence negotiations with Canada for the development of a general framework agreement between the communities and Canada. That, of course, is an important development, and it is our expectation and belief that the Council of Ministers will authorize the commission to undertake these negotiations, which we hope will result in the establishment of that link. Obviously, because of the importance which we attach to this development in our relations with Europe, we consider the opening of a mission of the communities in Ottawa as a significant step. We welcome that development.

The purpose of this bill therefore is to grant to the mission and its representatives the privileges and immunities which are normally accorded to diplomatic envoys under international law, and this is to be achieved by a simple amendment to the Privileges and Immunities (International Organizations) Act.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we accept the proposition put forward by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen). We do not propose to discuss the bill at length now. We think there will be an opportunity in committee to examine the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or any civil servant whom he might allow to appear before the committee for examination. I made my opinion known yesterday during the debate; and any hon. members who did not hear me, may, if they are interested, read the report of what I said yesterday about the contractual link. I can only say that it is high time the government did something to restore the prestige, influence and status with European nations which it was so profligate in throwing away in earlier days.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether what I am about to say will qualify as a second reading speech.

Mr. MacEachen: Welcome to the diplomatic world, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we agree to the second reading of this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, hon. members really seem in a happy mood tonight and determined to proceed quickly to pass this piece of legislation. However I should like to point out to the House the importance of Bill S-25. Even though it has only two pages, it is of great importance on account of the privileges granted in the international organizations having relations with this country.

The bill's explanatory note reads thus:

> The purpose of this Bill is to allow the Governor in Council to provide, by order, the same privileges and immunities to the European Communities in respect of its organization and officials in Canada as he may provide in respect of other international organizations covered by the Act.

I agree entirely with those provisions but I believe certain reservations should be expressed about the order that may be issued by the Governor in Council to extend the same privileges to the European communities without the matter being referred to the House.

I believe we should trust the Governor in Council in the granting of those privileges but in some cases, those recommendations should be submitted to the House so that parliamentarians may be informed, may be aware of the intentions of those international organizations that wish to obtain the privileges intended in this bill.

EXPLOSIVES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE GREATER CONTROL OVER THE PURCHASE, POSSESSION AND TRANSPORTATION OF EXPLOSIVES

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill S-17, to amend the Explosives Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I would like an explanation of this bill because I am concerned with one aspect which affects cartridges and explosives. If the parliamentary secretary wishes to make a statement before I speak, I will be pleased to hear him.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to make a few brief comments concerning Bill S-17, to amend the Explosives Act. I want to thank the opposition for their courtesy in allowing me to steer this bill through on behalf of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald).

The general aims of Bill S-17 are to improve control over the distribution of explosives, to provide authority to regulate over the use of fireworks and certain blasting operations, and to update the act with respect to rapid technological changes in the industry. This is the first amendment to the act in 20 years. The last amendment was in 1954.

The high rate of accidents in the explosives industry in the early 1900's, many involving fatalities, emphasized the need for control over explosives. As a result, the first Explosives Act was drafted and introduced into the House of Commons in 1911, and was assented to be passed in 1914. Proclamation was delayed, by the way, until 1919 when the Department of Mines was assigned responsibility for the administration of the Explosives Act. This statute is primarily concerned with public safety and is designed to control the manufacture, testing, storage, sales and importation of explosives, and their transportation by road.

In the 55 years following proclamation of the act, numerous changes were made to the regulations by order in council. The act itself was amended in 1926, in 1946, and most recently in 1954. The amendment of 1946 brought the sale of explosives under the control of the act, allowed the seizure of unauthorized explosives and of all explosives used to commit an offence under the act. The amendment also authorized the minister to order the seizure and destruction of abandoned or deteriorated explosives which present a danger to the public.

The amendment of 1954 revised the whole act into the second consolidation of statutory orders and regulations. The same year, an order in council revised the regulations dealing with the transportation of explosives by road. The major significance of this change was to formalize the road transport of explosives under a permit system and to increase the amount of explosives that could be transported by road to a maximum of 10,000 pounds.

The value of the legislation has been clearly demonstrated during the last 50 years by a significant reduction in the number of accidents. For example, during the four years immediately prior to the introduction of the Explosives Act in 1911, there were 42 fatalities in the manufacture of an estimated 40,000 tons of explosives. By comparison, during the past four years there was only one fatal accident in the manufacture of approximately 900,000 tons of commercial blasting explosives, and the industry ranks high among the top ten safest industries in Canada. In addition, and despite the significant yearly increase in the amount of explosives being used, there has been a progressive reduction in the number of fatal accidents in construction and mining, due mainly to the power under the act to control, through testing, the authorization or certification of explosives.

In effect all explosives, either manufactured or imported for use in Canada, undergo stringent authorization tests to ensure that the most reliable, predictable and safest explosives are available to Canadian users.

There are now 68 factories licensed under the act to manufacture explosives. Fifty-eight factories manufacture commercial blasting explosives, for example, dynamite and blasting agents. Three manufacture blasting accessories including detonators, safety fuses, and detonating fuses. Another three manufacture ammunition, mainly sporting ammunition and industrial cartridges. One firm manufactures fireworks, and three others manufacture military explosives and pyrotechnics.

As I mentioned previously, this is the first amendment since 1954, and during the interval the explosives industry has undergone significant changes. Hence the act contains a number of obsolete terms and conditions which require modernization. In this same context changes are also required to improve administrative procedures and to make information, particularly regarding authorized explosives, more available to the public.

The bill also seeks to improve control over the distribution of explosives. Under the present act, the Governor in Council has the power to regulate over the sale of explosives and we are, by these amendments, seeking authority also to make regulations over the purchase and possession of blasting explosives.

Under existing legislation we have good control over the manufacturer and the vendor of blasting explosives, but insufficient control over the purchaser. We are convinced that we must achieve better control in order to remind the purchaser of his obligation to exercise a more responsible attitude and provide adequate safety and security for explosives in his possession.

This year we have dealt with over 150 incidents of abandoned explosives representing approximately 9,000 pounds of dynamite and 4,000 detonators. All of these incidents have been a direct result of carelessness.

Abandoned and deteriorated explosives pose a serious hazard to the public. Every year several are injured by explosives they find near construction sites. In another case three hunters lit a fire in the stove of an abandoned cabin and were killed when a cache of dynamite exploded. The owner of the property some years previously had ordered more dynamite than he needed for a drainage project, and had cached the explosives in the cabin and forgotten about them. An unfortunate incident, but one which we should be able to prevent under a system of more precise controls.

In future, by this bill the purchase of blasting explosives will be restricted to, first, a person with a valid provincial licence authorizing the storage and use of explosives in a mine or quarry operating under provincial or territorial jurisdiction; second, a person with a valid licence issued pursuant to the Explosives Act for the manufacture, sale or use of explosives; and third, a person with a valid purchase and possession permit.

Recommendations one and two will account for most of the explosives normally consumed, while the third recommendation will cover the balance of the explosives purchased, mainly by the small, intermittent user. The first two recommendations are already reasonably covered by existing federal and provincial licences, but recommendation number three is entirely new. In the latter case the purchaser will be required, pursuant to amendments to the regulations, to complete a form of application giving such personal general information as location, duration, and intended use of the explosives purchased. Provided the licensed distributor can positively identify the purchaser, he may then complete the transaction.

A purchase and possession permit will be valid for a specific period not exceeding 90 days, and will contain detailed requirements to be observed by the permittee for the secure storage and transportation of the explosives. For identification, the explosives will be marked with the permit number, and the purchaser will be required to retain the permit until he disposes of all the explosives. We also intend to recommend regulations which will place the onus of responsibility for the safety and security of explosives on the purchaser rather than on the distributor, as is presently the case. A proposal in this bill will also make it an offence to abandon an explosive.

I would like to emphasize that these additional controls will apply only to blasting explosives. We do not intend to alter significantly any of the present exemptions to the regulations applicable to fireworks, fusees, flares, signals, sporting ammunition, propellants, primers or industrial explosives. In fact, the present regulations, which have been in force for many years, virtually exempt safety cartridges from the manufacturing, storage, sale, importation and transportation restrictions normally applied to other explosives.

In March, 1972, when a similar bill, Bill C-7, was introduced to this House some hon. members misinterpreted the intent of the legislation. Despite assurances to the contrary, they felt we had in mind to restrict the sale, purchase and possession of sporting ammunition. This misinterpretation of the intent may have been related to a proposed change in the wording of the definition "explosive" and the proposal to delete the term "safety cartridge". However, these were both housekeeping changes and had no relationship to our general intent to introduce tighter controls over blasting explosives. If there is still any doubt concerning these two items we will be pleased to provide more specific information on the changes during hearings in committee.

Representation has also been made to remove such items as sporting ammunition, propellants, flares and fuses from the explosives classification, on the basis that these items are not really explosive in nature. We are the first to agree that a box of shot shells is not as hazardous, from the standpoint of a mass explosion, as a case of dynamite. However, the propellant used in ammunition is made up of high explosive such as nitrocellulose, often in combination with nitroglycerine, and the primers contain explosive ingredients common to detonators. So the manufacture of ammunition is obviously an explosives operation subject to control under the act.

I believe concern was also expressed that, as a result of provisions in this bill, the hand loading of ammunition would not be possible as it would be considered illegal manufacture. There is no change in this bill respecting manufacture, and the reloading of ammunition on private premises is already recognized and approved in the present regulations.

Another matter which prompted some discussion concerned ammonium nitrate. Of course this is a well known chemical which is widely used as a fertilizer. It is also a common ingredient in explosives. In fact some grades of dynamite, as well as many of the water gel and slurry explosives, contain over 60 per cent of ammonium nitrate. In addition, a common blasting agent used mainly in open pit mines and quarries is composed of approximately 94 per cent ammonium nitrate and 6 per cent fuel oil. However, despite its widespread use as an essential ingredient in explosives, ammonium nitrate is not classed as an explosive for the purposes of the Explosives Act unless it is (a) made, manufactured or used as an explosive, or (b) it is stored with other explosives. The reason for this latter requirement is that ammonium nitrate can be made to detonate under the stimulus of a suitable primer such as a stick of dynamite.

Finally, I would like to review the department's position in connection with the application and administration of the act and regulations. The Explosives Act is fundamentally concerned with public safety. The areas of responsibility include manufacture, authorization, storage, sale, importation, transportation by road, and by this bill will additionally include the purchase, possession and use of fireworks and blasting explosives.

The agency directly responsible for the administration of the act is the explosives division of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. The division is comprised of a small group of trained explosives specialists, including the chief inspector, his assistant and seven inspectors. This group attends to the administration of the act as it applies to approximately 68 factories which annually produce in excess of 250,000 tons of commercial blasting explosives, several million detonators, large quantities of blasting accessories, sporting ammunition, industrial explosives, fireworks and military explosives. The division is also involved in additional duties related to the storage, handling, sale and distribution of these explosives. The division is not staffed to police the industry but rather to advise and educate. The policy of the department as it applies to the administration of the act is to persuade those people who handle explosives that it is in their best interests to comply with the safety requirements.

This gives a general review of the proposed amendments to the act which, as I indicated, have been based primarily on a wish to tighten up the policing and control of industrial explosives and to tidy up certain aspects of the bill from a technical and legal standpoint. I shall look forward to the opportunity of hearing the comments of other hon. members on this bill, and to having a very full discussion of the proposed changes and hearing other comments when it goes before the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to indicate that we on this side certainly concur with this bill having second reading. We had some questions regarding the effects the bill might have on sportsmen and the use of ammunition. These have been answered by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Foster), but I would enter the caveat that we reserve the right to examine the bill in committee to ensure that in fact the law substantiates what the parliamentary secretary indicated to the House.

I also have some concern about the effect of some of the new regulations on farmers and their operations, and the fact that regulations might prevent the efficient use of explosives by farmers who may require to use them in their operations. But bearing in mind the fact that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) has demonstrated that he is always willing to listen to and accept positive amendments from the opposition, I am sure we can pass this bill through committee in short order.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the parliamentary secretary for his remarks and I express my appreciation to the government of the changes made in this bill which, in my opinion, make it much more acceptable than the previous bill.

One of the fears we had about the last bill was that by tightening control over the sale of safety cartridges and magazines we would in fact eliminate hunting in much of the country. I am pleased to note that the parliamentary secretary, who comes from the same part of Canada as I do, has taken that into consideration. I am more than pleased about the changes which are taking place. We were opposed to the previous bill and its deficiencies in respect of the handling of explosives.

● (2100)

I agree entirely with the parliamentary secretary when he says that for a long time we have had a great number of factories that have been able to produce sophisticated types of explosives without any major disaster or accident.

The explosives manufacturing industry in Canada has enjoyed a better safety factor than many others.

It is also gratifying to note that the parliamentary secretary has taken into consideration problems in relation to ammonium nitrate and the use of diesel fuel. The previous bill did not consider this aspect at all. This is probably the most common explosive used in the mining industry today, and because of the mixed condition of the explosive it has to be handled with a great deal of care. Many mining companies operating quarries were not handling this explosive carefully enough before the informative discussions that took place several years ago.

It has always been my opinion that we should make an extreme effort to clean up those messes which have been left for many years by mining companies at quarry sites, and by prospectors in various parts of the country. Years ago it was a simple procedure for a prospector to buy a couple of cases of dynamite, take it to a prospecting site which showed little promise after a relatively small amount of drilling, and then cache the dynamite with fuses and caps in an unprotected place, and move on to another site, repeating the same process.

I know of accidents that occurred in my own community around Kirkland Lake, Gowganda and Cobalt when children found dynamite or caps. Fortunately in most cases they have taken these to their parents before something serious has happened. This has always been a danger in developing areas where proper care has not been taken in the handling of explosives. This situation was brought forcefully to our attention regarding a quarry field where the FLQ found an almost unlimited and unprotected source of explosives.

I believe, like most hon. members, that we should strengthen our laws in respect of explosives. Explosives are very dangerous, particularly to the young and others who are unaware of the danger. For this reason explosives must be kept in protected locations. Producing mines have always followed this course by maintaining powder and cap houses under suitable control at a reasonable distance. This has certainly not been true of quarries operated by construction companies, and it has not been true of many farmers who in the past used limited amounts of explosives.

The government should be congratulated for tightening up this legislation. The provision in this bill in respect to the transportation of explosives by motor vehicle will prove to be of prime importance. I am sure that anyone who has travelled the northern highways has been surprised to see very large trucks with relatively small signs indicating they are carrying explosives. These trucks regularly travel in normal traffic, with no other safety precaution and only that one small sign on the front.

Star Transfer has for many years hauled explosives from Parry Sound on Highway No. 11, particularly on weekends in very heavy traffic. Fortunately, and mainly because of the competence of the drivers, no serious accident has occurred. I think everyone will agree that this practice is potentially hazardous. The government has done much to eliminate this hazard.

Another potentially dangerous situation is the use of agricultural fertilizers and fuel oil. This is mainly because many people are unaware of the danger. The product is being used for a different purpose, but there is always the danger of a small explosion setting off a larger one. This is particularly so when people without knowledge of the danger carelessly handle the materials. Once people have an indication of the potential danger, the danger itself is lessened. The last time we had a bill of this nature before us we provided for a warning to be placed on products stating that under certain circumstances with extreme force they would explode. That warning should be brought to the attention of all those who may be using such products and may not be aware of the potential danger.

I should again like to congratulate the government for having removed the words "safety cartridges" from the bill. I am violently opposed to the elimination of hunting rights in the northern parts of Canada. Had the previous bill been passed and enforced, no storekeeper would have been able to build the required facilities for storing ammunition. This would obviously have provided complete gun control, unless there was bootlegging of safety cartridges. The removal of those words does not seem to weaken the legislation. What the bill will now do is control explosives, but will leave the decision in respect of gun control in Canada to be made by the House in the form of other legislation. If we want what people refer to commonly as strong gun controls we should provide them by separate legislation rather than bringing in such controls by the back door, which is what the previous bill would have done.

I am very much in favour of the proposed changes to bring the act up to date. I do not see the date when the act was last amended, but I think the bill was originally proposed to control explosives in the mining industry in the Yukon and areas such as Cobalt. The situation has changed, and we require new regulations. I hope the parliamentary secretary keeps track of this legislation to see that it is not changed before it receives third reading, in order that it remains solely an explosives control act, rather than something many of us do not want to see in this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the parliamentary secretary for introducing the bill and for explaining it, because before reading the legislation I had fears about the question of safety cartridges being included.

I think that now we can profitably discuss the bill, concerning the safety of sales, possession and transport. In years passed anybody could own explosives, in my area at least. They were often kept in unlocked hangers, open day and night to anyone who wanted to get dynamite or detonators and so forth.

This is why we had so many accidents in my area. Sales permits were issued to general stores, or anyone for that matter so it seems. I do not know on what grounds they were issued, but I believe the act tolerated it, if there was an act to truly protect the people. I remember that logging companies, mining companies a few years ago were still carrying dynamite to work in automobiles or small trucks. Dynamite was left overnight on the site without supervision. Often 100 or 150 sticks of dynamite were missing. Nobody knew who had taken it. I believe, as the hon.

member mentioned earlier, that the FLQ crisis somewhat scared Quebec autorities and led them to amend the Explosives Act.

I believe that, for a good control, first if you want—It is not enough to say that you pass a legislation, it has to be respected, and I say "well respected". A reform has been initiated in my area. I think it had been realized that the regulations imposed had been disregarded and there is little care, I believe, about those things now. I do not know if it is because the act is not stringent enough, but it is probably for that reason that this bill is being introduced to make it even more stringent. If you do not have competent men to implement that legislation, it will be more or less void.

I am thinking of those who are responsible for explosives. The minister is talking about the premises in which the explosives will be stored, that is magazines. In our area we already started to establish a magazine according to government standards and under the supervision of the federal police, and I think the commerce of dynamite and all explosives throughout Canada should be kept out of stores, and each region should have its magazine and the owner of that magazine, the manager should have a degree in explosives. That is most important.

If you let anyone have a magazine, anyone who knows nothing about explosives, if you let him have a magazine just because he has enough money to build it, to establish it, you will miss the target. We have people throughout Canada with degrees in explosives. They are the people who should be responsible for those magazines. They may not often have the funds to establish those magazines. It is the government's duty to help those people who are ready to co-operate, but let them not be asked to assume everything, to assume establishment costs, because the government requires 100 per cent protection. I am glad that we are dealing with this bill so that the attention of the minister can be drawn to that question. Magazine managers are required to do a lot of things, but the government never takes a step, never lends one dollar to try and help them have 100 per cent safe premises, for we know that magazine owners have to deliver dynamite to working sites, and should never leave near the building sites the remaing explosives, but should bring back to protected magazines the unused explosives every night. And I believe it is only at that condition that no dynamite stick, no explosive will be left astray, and that they will all be stored in safe places, that we will have people respect that bill which we will pass in a few days.

If we do not take the means to make people respect the legislation, we shall pass a law which will have no result. And I believe that we must first of all pay attention to marketing and transport because today, for someone who owns a powder magazine and wants to transport dynamite, the requirements are very strict. I know something about this, because I worked with those responsible for the powder magazine in our area. The authorities are very strict, and rightly so, but when the man responsible for the powder magazine has cancelled—if I may use this word—has cancelled boxes of dynamite, these authorities should not allow these boxes to be placed on the black market when the man qualified to do so has decided that they were unusable, that they must be burned and rejected, when they can be sold in little political side-jobs.

This is not the way to make people respect the law. I believe that when a group or a man is given some responsibilities, it is the duty of the department to help him because the department is the supreme authority in this matter and it must help him when things like this happen. I remember that letters were written on the subject to two or three places, but the real culprit was not found; everything was hidden.

As concerns explosives, we must act directly and in full daylight to put a stop to little political games and plots with such dangerous arms. I believe that it is only if we do this, if we take all necessary safety measures concerning storage, transport and sales of explosives, that we shall start to live a bit more safely, and I believe that everyone will be glad about it.

Once again, I congratulate the sponsor of this bill and give him my assurance that we support the bill and are happy that it was introduced.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Madam Speaker, I would like to add just a few relevant considerations to what my colleague for Roberval has just said.

During my life, I had to use explosives very often. At that time, they were called "dynamiters"—I do not know if it is still the word used today. I was then a professional dynamiter for a big mining company, and I had the responsibility of the use of explosives and also the 24 hour control over the explosives used. The existing law was not as strict as the present one. It requested mostly from the dynamiter a much greater responsibility than today. And fortunately I never had to deplore any accident, because we had a sense of responsibilities at that time, unlike the time we live in now. We knew how to use dangerous things with discrimination, and we could accept with great caution all the responsibilities that were given us. We knew that these things were dangerous but also very useful. Recently in 1975, Madam Speaker, I went to my son's farm. While I was there, there came a time when a few sticks of dynamite would have been very useful to destroy a piece of rock and increase the effectiveness of the drain system on part of the land. This task could have been carried out within minutes with dynamite, but I was amazed to learn that one could under no circumstances obtain anywhere in the whole area the few sticks of dynamite and detonators necessary for this job.

Some people got scared all of sudden when were discovered in a number of Canadian centres a few sticks of dynamite which could have been used for all sorts of unfortunate and unsavory jobs, and under the guise of protecting the public, private property and society, much too stringent rules and regulations were established, without considering that in private undertakings, on farms, explosives are often needed for improvements.

I would like to suggest to the parliamentary secretary who introduced this legislation earlier to pay attention to the drafting of the regulations which will follow enactment. In fact, I often said in the House, Madam Speaker, that legislation is voted by parliamentarians, but that regulations are made by technocrats, and that such regulations are often more important than the law. We experience it every day in the enforcement of the Unemployment Insurance Act which is about one quarter inch thick; the regulations are now three quarters of an inch thick.

They are regulations unknown to parliamentarians and they are often enacted against the legislator's intent. Now I think that in the case which is concerning us, the situation is most important. After enactment of this legislation the minister responsible should follow very closely the making of the regulations. These should come back if necessary not only before the cabinet, but sometimes also before the committee of the House so that the House may be sure that the regulations issued following the adoption of the act are consistent with the wishes and the conception of the legislators.

If we proceeded that way, we would not have unpleasant surprises afterwards. We must at least admit that in the daily economic life, explosives will always be necessary. We must not think that when we talk about explosives it is always in terms of disaster and destruction. I think we must first regard explosives as a means to assist man in controlling nature and destroying obstacles, thus allowing mankind and society to achieve with less effort projects that exceed human forces.

This, Madam Speaker, is my way of understanding the use of explosives, and I agree that we should have stricter controls. The regulations would also have to be flexible enough in our rural areas to enable a responsible person capable of maintaining an explosive depot to have control over the depot and be competent enough to go and help farm or industrial organizations that may need help. We should not have stranglehold regulations to the extent that no one be allowed to use this discovery, this essential economic force, thus depriving everyone of its advantages.

Madam Speaker, that is why I suggest that the people involved in drafting regulations have enough foresight and flexibility so that the regulations, once applied, be in accordance with the intent of the legislator.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR DISCLOSURE OF CUSTOMS DOCUMENTS TO MINISTER

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill S-15, to amend the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Madam Speaker, this is a bill which when approved will allow the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to perform more effectively an important industrial development function.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Through analysis of imports, Canadian entrepreneurs, particularly those in smaller businesses, are made more aware of market opportunities. They are thus in a much better position to make informed decisions which can and have resulted in new investment, production and employment. The use of import analyses, therefore, is complementary to the department's other programs to encourage the expansion of efficient Canadian industry. We have been providing these services for many years, but have had to operate in a rather cumbersome manner. The proposed amendments will make our operations more effective.

Detailed analysis of import information is required in order to produce these services, because Statistics Canada data is sometimes inadequate for this purpose since it is compiled to provide information for general use. For instance, the single import classification used by Statistics Canada for "surface active agents, compounded" includes no less than 40 products. This kind of more detailed information only comes to light by means of an examination through our import analysis. Such detail is a basic prerequisite to most feasibility studies carried out by entrepreneurs contemplating establishment or expansion of production facilities. Yet if Statistics Canada were to publish this detail for all items at all times, each publication would fill a room, not to mention costs, delays, and other problems.

In brief, then, the essential difference is that in contrast to Statistics Canada's broad assembly of data from customs documents into predetermined general classifications, the import analysis division of the department researches the precise identification of selected items and compiles them into more finite descriptive product categories.

Such information has already stimulated considerable development of industries in Canada, measured in terms of expanded production, increased exports and, particularly, additional employment. Opportunities frequently lead to the establishment and expansion of small businesses. Furthermore, these analyses, by identifying potential opportunities, can make a valuable contribution to resource upgrading by adding value through processing prior to export. At the same time these analyses are of value in the formulation of commercial policy and in tariff negotiations, particularly in highly complex product sectors. I do not need to remind the House of the important negotiations presently under way in Geneva.

The value of import analysis as an industrial development tool has been exemplified tangibly many times. Recent unsolicited feedback from industry indicated that the department's import analyses have played an important role in decisions to establish a number of new manufacturing operations as well as in numerous expansions of existing operations. Also based on the same voluntary information—and I emphasize the voluntary aspect of the information—these expansions and new operations resulted in several thousand new jobs with a capital investment of at least $150 million. Inasmuch as this information was unsolicited, the data should be regarded as a minimum indication only.

The uses to which the import analyses are put make it essential that the basic data be as detailed and precise as possible, and that it be available in time to permit effective action. The only source documents which meet these needs are customs invoices and import entries.

Import analyses are currently conducted by staff of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce having access to customs documents and sworn under the Statistics Act, in order that the confidentiality of transactions of individual importers be protected.

Under section 5(e) of the Industry, Trade and Commerce Act the minister is required to undertake import analysis for industrial development. The act does not provide, however, the authority necessary for the minister to carry out this mandate. The proposed amendment will make it possible to facilitate and otherwise improve the ability of the department to carry out this valuable service for Canadian business.

Finally, it can be stressed that only those employees of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce who are specifically designated by the minister and who have taken the prescribed oath will have access to such documents and information. This is clearly outlined in section 6.1(2) of this bill. Furthermore, the essentiality of maintaining the privacy of information which might otherwise identify the business activity of an individual importer, his agent or his customer, is fully recognized and safeguarded by the provisions of this bill.

These safeguards, which are comparable to those embodied in the Statistics Act, were closely examined and strengthened in the bill's passage through the other place. I believe that I have made clear what the benefits of import analyses are. I think they have been clearly demonstrated. I believe that improved access to source documents will increase their impact on industrial development in Canada.

I hope the House can move rapidly forward to the consideration of this bill at committee stage.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, this bill gives the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) the right to obtain from the Department of National Revenue invoices of goods imported into the country.

We in the opposition agree with any proposal which will enable the minister to improve on the very inadequate job he is doing to protect the jobs of Canadian workers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Don't get political.

Mr. Hees: This bill would enable the minister to become better acquainted with the goods being imported into the country. It is particularly desirable that he be better acquainted with the volume of manufactured products, those which produce jobs, which are entering the country in steadily increasing quantities, taking jobs away from Canadians and causing unemployment to rise.

For instance, last year imports of manufactured products into Canada increased by no less than 13 per cent over the previous year. When the minister is asked what he plans to do to slow down these rapidly escalating imports of manufactured goods and to stop the stealing of the Canadian market away from our producers and our workers, he simply refuses to answer. Instead he describes the programs that have been employed by his department for a number of years—programs which have recently proved to be totally inadequate to meet the situation—and which have allowed a steadily increasing proportion of the market to slip through the country's fingers.

As an example, Madam Speaker, last week I outlined specific incentives which the government should introduce to induce greater productivity, research, and development and, by lowering costs and prices and increasing quality and design, enable Canadian producers and workers to regain the sales and jobs which the government's negligence in this regard is losing every day. As he always does, however, the minister simply continued to refuse to even consider practical suggestions made to him. With the passage of this bill I hope that perhaps at long last the actual figures on the imports of these manufactured goods that are pouring into the country every day in increasing quantities will finally be brought to the minister's understanding.

I hope that the sight of the actual invoices showing the quantities which are increasing every day, taking jobs away from Canadian workers, will convince the minister that the situation is very serious indeed. This was agreed by one of his backbenchers the other day, who had the guts to get up when I asked a question and ask the minister if he would bring my sensible suggestions to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner).

I hope that at long last the sight of these invoices will bring a little sense and action into the minister's comprehension. It is for that reason, and that reason alone, that we in the official opposition are very pleased to allow this bill to go forward.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, I was of the opinion that this would not have a great deal of effect except that it would probably legalize something that takes place now, but after listening to the previous speaker I think that if the bill is as important as he makes out, then we had better look at it again.

It seems to me the minister should give an explanation of why he needs this information. Surely the information should be fairly familiar to his department already. They must know what is available in this country, and the reasons why what is not available must be imported. If they do not know this, then I agree with the previous speaker that they are not going to provide the type of information that will enable the minister to decide what should or should not be developed in Canada.

I should like to ask the minister if the bill will solve a small problem that I raised about a year ago. A small company was manufacturing a product and found it necessary to import an adhesive it needed from the United States. It had discussed its needs with senior officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and tried the adhesives that the department recommended but none was satisfactory. It then applied for a permit to import the adhesive free for excise tax so that it would be competitive.

It was told—and, Madam Speaker, I did not believe it but I have a copy of the letter—that Shell Canada said they were aware that the product was not manufactured in Canada, that they had patents in the United States for it, and they might consider doing something about it in the distant future. Because of this situation the tax could not be removed. This leads me to wonder if the one hand knows what the other is doing. This seems to be a pretty piddling little bill to provide such a vast amount of knowledge that is obviously necessary.

It would seem to me that if you prove the commodity is not made in Canada, that there is the potential for making it here, then the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce should either agree to reduce the tariff or to assist somebody in the development of the product.

The company in question was a small one, in the flakeboard field—but flakeboard is important in Northern Ontario. The product is shipped to New York, and part of the raw material comes from Portland, Oregon, because there are not the resources in Northern Ontario to meet the demand. I was not able to persuade the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, however, to ask for a remission of the tariff so that the glue could be imported.

The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) indicated that the bill would create a lot of new jobs. I hope he is right, but my small dealings with the department indicate that the bill will have to be much enlarged. It will have to have a lot more information in it than the present bill. From a quick reading all this bill says is that the information from the Department of National Revenue, which is privileged information and cannot be divulged because it is the private knowledge of a specific company, under certain circumstances can be divulged to the minister or an official of his department. For what purpose, Madam Speaker? The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings believes it is going to produce a great rash of industries. I do not believe it is even going to solve the little problem I had about an adhesive that is not made in Canada. Because Shell Canada could make it if they wanted to, the 17 per cent tariff is not removed. This does not allow a small company in Northern Ontario to have at least a reasonable advantage in the marketplace, so I do not think it matters a tinker's dam whether the bill passes or not. In the first place it comes from the Senate, which makes it suspect because they are not in touch with things anyway.

It is a pious hope to believe that this is going to make the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce more valuable. I would suggest they give some consideration to the small problems brought to their attention. I am sure every member of the House who brings a problem to the department can provide the information on the company and all the input and invoices, or whatever is required.

It is my belief that when a company wants an advantage it is willing to provide the information, and it is not necessary to go to the Department of National Revenue for it. That department is sacrosanct; the information it has is not supposed to be leaked to anyone. Some businessmen do not think that protection is any great advantage. We live in the age of thievery by computer. If all you have to do is ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford) for some secret information, this measure will not do what the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings expects.

I listened to the minister and listened to the former minister of trade and commerce expressing the pious hope that this bill will help to solve some difficulties. The fact remains that most of our raw materials flow south and finished goods flow north, and releasing or not releasing a limited number of industrial secrets will not reverse the trend. Instead of spending our time in the House and committee discussing the passing of secrets between two ministers of the same government, we could better spend our time exhorting the department, in the words of the former minister of trade and commerce, to get off its fanny and sell and tell every other department to help our industry compete in the market place.

I, for one, think this bill does little except tinker with the present situation. It will not solve the problem of the entrepreneur who wants to sell. As it is, businessmen are inundated with paper work, but their problems persist and do not go away. I think our time could be better spent considering measures which will enable Canadian businessmen to compete in the marketplace. We should not waste time discussing silly bills like this which deal with the exchange of confidential information between two cabinet ministers.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Madam Speaker, this is another very interesting bill which, if implemented, might enable the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) to provide greater protection to Canadian producers, more particularly in the area of textile and production of meat, specially poultry.

I wonder whether that legislation will be likely to really protect textile workers who for a few weeks now have been losing their jobs by the thousands. I often drew the attention of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) on the serious problem of textile product imports. Several members made representations to the minister so appropriate action could be implemented to protect jobs in the textile area and also our Canadian textile industries.

Recently, the minister answered a question by a member, saying that steps will be taken within a few months to ensure the efficiency of a truly appropriate protection. But God knows whether in a few months, the way things are going now, it will not be too late to really ensure the survival of that industry in Canada on which thousands of heads of families depend to provide for the needs of their families.

The situation is the same with respect to meat imports. I also drew the attention of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a few weeks ago on the fact that poultry is imported from the south while quotas are imposed on our domestic producers. And that is going on under the benignant look at our Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who should I think always be in close cooperation with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) who is putting up enormous efforts—I recognize it and I say so—to ensure a certain profitability for the operations of Canadian farm producers.

Under the legislation before us—Bill S-15—I feel there are far too many possibilities to get round the act. At one point, it is said in clause 5:

(5) The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce may, by order, authorize the following information to be disclosed:

(a) information relating to a person or organization in respect of which disclosure is consented to in writing by the person or organization concerned;

Imagine! If I simply had to give my consent in writing as to whether I am willing to pay my taxes or not, I would give my consent in writing to not paying them. I think the taxpayer might do the same. Secondly:

(b) information relating to a business in respect of which disclosure is consented to in writing by the owner for the time being of the business;

First, they are asked if they consent to give us the information required for their protection. If they refuse, if there are minor offences, petty offences, a fine of $1,000 or six months imprisonment is imposed, perhaps both if it is a little more serious. But have we really considered the fact that a $1,000 fine for a violation of that law has allowed benefits, profits, in the hundreds of thousands of dollars? It is not even a tithe. I feel that penalty is not adequate. We should be far more categorical, far more strict if we really want that act to be efficient and achieve the hoped for results.

Madam Speaker, I see you are about to call it ten o'clock. So I shall do so myself, but I do not want to speak on this bill again tomorrow; therefore, I am willing to see the bill deferred to the committee.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

IMMIGRATION—NEED FOR FARM WORKERS IN NOVA SCOTIA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Madam Speaker, over the past two summers the Agricultural School in Sneek, The Netherlands, has provided from 14 to 16 young students who have come to central Nova Scotia and worked on the farms in my constituency and in two adjoining constituencies. These have been good, young farmers indeed. Some of the farms they worked on are now owned by people who originally came from The Netherlands to Canada. I think I can safely say without too much contradiction, at least from my Nova Scotia colleagues, that Dutch immigrants as farmers are the most cherished possessions we have. Dutch people really know how to farm.

When the time came for the farmers of Nova Scotia to get their help this year, they found that a quota of 50 had been applied on Dutch students coming to Canada, partly because of economic conditions, I suppose. In any event, when the Nova Scotia farmers got near the scene, the 50 had been spoken for. They had gone somewhere else. It is because of the fact that they have gone somewhere else that I rise to make my complaint this evening.

I really do not want to go into the minutiae as to when the Nova Scotia farmers approached the Manpower offices this year, whether they approached them in time or not. However, I understand that some kind of approach was made three months ago. The farmers were told there were restrictions or quotas applied only at the beginning of April. It appeared that whoever got the 50 Dutch farmers coming to Canada had by that time made their wishes known and had snaffled the whole lot, leaving my cupboard, so to speak, bare. I do not want to get into that sort of argument.

My main concern is that there be farm help available to the farmers in my constituency and the adjoining constituencies. I am advised by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) that all efforts will be made through something known as farm labour pools across Canada to help meet the labour needs in agriculture. Unfortunately, when I talked to my source in the farming community tonight, and that was just a couple of hours before I came to take part in this debate, he advised me that not one of his farmer friends or himself had been given any kind of a lead as to farm help available.

Despite Herculean efforts by Manpower offices across Canada to provide farm help in central Nova Scotia, something that has been known for at least three months is needed, not one person has been referred to those farmers. Under those rather incredible conditions and considering the fact that no one from Mexico or the Caribbean, where I gather we have an agreement to get most of our help—and I do not quarrel with that—is available to work on the farms of Nova Scotia, I want to make a simple representation to the minister.

There is still time to contact that agricultural school in Sneek, The Netherlands. There is still time to contact the Canadian embassy at The Hague to say that there are farmers in Nova Scotia who are prepared to pay air passage for Dutch farmers. They are prepared to pay the minimum wage of $2.25 an hour. These people will work in pleasant surroundings. As a farm area, there is nothing nicer than central Nova Scotia. I hope that some common sense will prevail and this matter will be solved.

Mr. Charles Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I wish to inform the hon. member that we have authorized up to 50 students from agricultural schools in The Netherlands to take summer employment on farms in Canada. Officials of the department in The Hague have advised that the maximum number of students has already been reached for participation in the 1975 program. Unfortunately, due to current economic conditions in Canada we have found it preferable to restrict the number of foreign students and young workers who are authorized to take temporary employment in Canada this year.

If the farmers in the hon. member's constituency will make their labour needs known to their local Canada manpower centres, I am confident that Canadian students will be provided with equitable wages and working conditions and can meet the needs of these farmers.

HEALTH—MEDICARE—ALLEGED SETTING OF TIME LIMITS FOR MEDICAL EXAMINATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I just want to refer to a question I put to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), as reported at page 4934 of Hansard. I brought to the minister's attention the fact that there was interference with doctors and their examinations in the province of Quebec. In his reply the minister said:

I have sufficient confidence in the ability of my provincial counterparts and in the spokesmen for the medical profession in this country to deal with this matter.

I should like to make a few comments on the minister's answer. First of all, I really wonder whether he does have sufficient confidence in his provincial counterparts. Although he says he has, he never reached any agreement on the sharing of costs. He wanted to give them the same sum year after year plus 6 per cent, but this was turned down. There was to be no more cost sharing for the minister. For a man who has so much confidence, he really oozes cautiousness regarding new programs until he knows what they are all about and are going to cost. He would like to run away from mounting costs, but finds he cannot do so.

Although it was his party and not the minister who brought in the relevent bill, the government is responsible for the quality of medical care and its standards across Canada under the Medical Care Act passed on December 21, 1966. Federal contributions were to be about one half the actual cost, not including administration which was to be carried by the provinces. However, very soon after the enactment of the legislation costs rose and have been going up and up ever since.

It is always easy to blame somebody else. Modern care hospital beds were going out of sight due to rising costs. Then it was discovered that there were no chronic care beds or chronic care homes. This is typical of the way the state does things. It is now in a dilemma and wants to close some of the wards in hospitals, but overhead costs are such that the government would only save 20 per cent. Then people complain about the costs of the medical profession.

The government would like to cut down on the cost of doctors, but if it quit paying the doctors entirely all that the state would save would be another 20 per cent. Now the state has hit on a scheme—the doctors must take only 10 minutes for a check-up. A little more extensive check-up, such as a gynaecological examination must take 15 minutes, and so on.

[Mr. Turner (London East).]

Doctors cannot be time clocked. When you tell doctors they must allot time and take ten minutes for one patient and 15 minutes for a gynaecological patient, no doctor who practises medicine would tolerate such orders. It would be only one short step until the state would tell the doctors how many patients per day they could see. Our doctors must never forget the central fact that always remains, and that is the care of the patient.

● (2210)

The minister is an intelligent man. How does he even tolerate the suggestion of time limits for examinations when this involves the health and treatment of 30 per cent of the poor in this country?

We have an aging population, with a dropping birth rate. This means we will have more and more patients 50 years of age and over. These are geriatric patients who often have one or more illnesses, and the key to better medicine is the prevention of disease in these older people, particularly chronic diseases and diseases of a disabling type. Only by preventing these chronic diseases as long as possible will we cut medical expenses. To do this geriatric research studies should be going full steam ahead in order to prevent or avoid multi-care programs for the aged, at least controlling some of this runaway expenditure.

I hope the parliamentary secretary will convey to the minister the idea that he better take a serious look at this suggestion of interference with the conscience of the doctor and the patient. This will have a very serious effect in this country by placing the state in complete control of the conscience of the patient and the doctor.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has brought up the point about the care provided by doctors.

I should like to point out that each province has considerable leeway in determining a number of important matters relating to the operation of its medical care insurance plan without jeopardizing its entitlement to receive federal financial support in respect of its plan under the Medical Care Act. For example, each province can decide how its share of the cost of its plan will be financed (that is, through premiums, sales tax, other provincial revenues or by a combination of methods), whether coverage will be on a voluntary basis or not, and whether services additional to those of the national program will or will not be included in the provincial plan.

This prerogative also extends to methods of physician remuneration. Remuneration of doctors is, by and large, on a fee for service basis and has been for many years. Physicians' fee schedules were established by the various provincial medical associations to be used as a guide by their members in determining what fees will be charged for their services. The fee schedules also have been used as a basis for payment by governmental and private insurance arrangements for many years.

The Medical Care Act requires that the medical care insurance plans of participating provinces provide a reasonable level of payment for insured services. Generally speaking, provincial medical care insurance plans provide for some measure of consultation and in some cases formal negotiation at periodic intervals between the medical profession and the responsible authority before payment from the plan will be revised.

The federal legislation permits the medical care insurance plans of participating provinces to remunerate doctors by other methods, such as by full-time or part-time salaries, sessional fees or various combinations of contractual arrangements, but the prevailing method of payment to date has been on a fee for service basis.

With respect to the matter of establishing a relationship between time and particular medical services, this is certainly not a new phenomenom. For many years various provincial medical associations have elected to base professional remuneration on the time required to perform a particular kind or amount of service. Although the time factor is often recognized in these areas of care, generally speaking existing fee schedules are marked by a lack of differentiation according to the time taken by a doctor to render services especially in the case of office visit services.

In the case of Quebec I am informed that the question of inserting in a contract the amount of time the doctor is required to spend with his patient refers to the minimum of time, not the maximum. As the minister pointed out in the House on April 17, "There does not appear to be any intention of restricting the time spent with patients". I trust this adequately outlines to the hon. member the federal government's responsibility in this area.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—POSSIBILITY OF MEETING MR. FITZSIMMONS, PRESIDENT OF TEAMSTERS' UNION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Madam Speaker, I want to use my time tonight talking about a great boycott, about which a lot of Canadians have heard, but about which very few Canadians know very much.

I was shocked last week when I read a letter the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) sent the labour critic of our party inviting him to join the minister in a handshaking ceremony with Mr. Cesar Chavez at the front doors of parliament. I have not been here very long but I do not think this type of thing has happened very often, that is, ministers of the Crown meeting people, especially foreign dignitaries, at the front door of this House in a public ceremony, especially the leader of a union which does not have any representatives in Canada.

My question to the minister last week was whether he would accord the president of the Teamsters' Union, the competing union in this great boycott in the United States, the same treatment. I have seen Mr. Fitzsimmons up in our parliamentary restaurant on different occasions when he was with the president of the Teamsters' Union in Canada, who happens to be one of the hon. members of that place next door. Yet I do not believe there has been any move to have the Minister of Labour meet Mr. Fitzsimmons at the front door.

I was also surprised to learn that the Minister of Labour was hosting a luncheon for Mr. Chavez and some of his people. I will admit that the minister, when he recognized my interest, was kind enough to invite me to the luncheon, which I did attend and at which I listened to Mr. Chavez. I also believe it is very important that this House makes sure that Canadians know exactly what is going on in respect of the grape boycott by having Mr. Fitzsimmons up here to explain the teamsters' side on the subject of this boycott in the United States.

Because I had an interest in this subject I made a trip down to California over a year and half ago, on which occasion I spoke to many of the farmers in the area who were very concerned. To my amazement I found out that at one time Mr. Chavez's union controlled a large number of the farm workers. As of this time the teamsters have about 400 contracts in California and Mr. Chavez has only about 14. The teamsters represent between 25,000 and 30,000 workers, while Mr. Chavez represents around 5,000.

A few weeks ago I took a trip down to this area in order to check into some of the things I had discovered a year previously. I called on a man by the name of K. K. Larsen, who own a large grape farm near the area of Indio, California. I went to see him because he has a unique farm. It is one that was under the control of Mr. Chavez's union, the United Farm Workers. He had a free vote of the workers that was conducted by a Father Humphreys. Mr. Chavez goes around the country saying that he has a lot of support from the Catholic Church and other churches, but Father Humphreys happens to be a Catholic priest in the area and he volunteered to hold a free vote of the workers on that farm. The workers on that farm voted 66 to 22 to have the Teamsters' Union come back in.

I visited that farm for the prime purpose of speaking to the farm workers there, because I wanted to determine why they preferred the teamsters over Mr. Chavez. I heard many stories of the same kind I heard from Mr. Chavez about people being beaten up. There was even some talk about murder and the burning down of some buildings. I heard the same thing about Mr. Chavez from people who do not like him. I would admit that some of these stories are possibly true and that there have been some rough-housing tactics, but they have been done by both sides. They have been done under provocation, and I believe they would have happened no matter what anyone did in an attempt to stop them.

In talking to these workers I discovered that they were very happy to be under the Teamsters' Union. They had medical care benefits much better than those under Mr. Chavez. They were quite pleased, as are most farm workers in California, that Governor Brown brought in a bill in the legislature of the State of California which would call for elections in the State of California for all farm workers. Mr. Chavez has been going around the country saying that the Teamsters did not want a vote and that they preferred the situation the way it was. In any contact I have had with members of the Teamsters Union I was told they would agree to a vote, that they wanted a vote. They wanted their conditions, as did Mr. Chavez. Now they have finally got most of their points together and the bill is passing through the California legislature. We will see free votes.

Part of what really disturbs me about seeing Mr. Chavez coming here and receiving support from the Canadian government is that I will guarantee to the government that the picture of Mr. Chavez and of our Minister of Labour will be all across California in a very short period of time, with a statement that the Canadian government supports Mr. Chavez. I think that is wrong, and we should bring the teamsters up here so that they may avail themselves of the same publicity so that the people in that area will not be misled by Mr. Chavez, as I believe they have been misled by him a number of times. It is time now for a free vote. I am sure, from the information I obtained from the farms I visited, that a free vote will see the teamsters have their union in this area.

I asked them why they are continuing the boycott since they have the legislation and there will be a vote. I asked them why Canadians are being asked not to buy Californian grapes any more, and I was told that the boycott has really worked, that it has given them what they really wanted.

I checked into the situation when I was in California and I have some statistics that I should like to quote:

> Table grape growers and shippers in California are completing one of their largest volume seasons. Shipments are expected to total approximately 20,000 rail cars (1,250 packages per car, mostly 23-pound boxes), which will make this the heaviest volume since 1969 when 20,761 cars were shipped. The 1974 crop is expected to be 4 per cent larger then 1973, or approximately 800 cars.

● (2220)

I think that points out that Mr. Chavez's boycott has not worked, that it has been a real nuisance to many people, and that it has affected many workers.

Another paragraph in the same document reads:

> The boycott by the United Farm Workers of America has been a nuisance to grape shippers, especially since their workers predominately are union members.

This is something Canadians must understand. This is not a fight between unions and workers and management; it is a jurisdictional dispute between unions, and the Canadian government should take no part in it.

The document goes on to read:

> The nuisance value and the inconvenience to consumers, the major economic significance of the boycott seems to be the increase in the retail price of grapes in some markets. Retailers intimidated by the noise and disruption attending boycott demonstrations sometimes choose not to advertise and promote grapes. This reduces the volume they sell, but the natural reaction is to compensate by increasing the retail price. As a result, consumers in the few market areas where the boycotters have been most active are paying higher prices for grapes than consumers in most other areas of the country.

So all this boycott by Mr. Chavez has increased, in Canada especially, the cost of grapes to the Canadian consumer, and it has also affected honest and sincere union workers in California who want to do their job and to pick grapes so that people who own the farms can sell them and can have a good living.

I hope the government makes sure to invite Mr. Fitzsimmons so that his union may get equal publicity over something that I insist is a straight union squabble and has nothing to do with letting Canadians buy what produce they want, but has a lot to do with putting picket signs in front of stores telling us what we should or should not buy.

Mr. Charles Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make the following points to help clarify this situation and provide some perspective. First, the Canadian Labour Congress, as well as other groups, has given and continues to give very full support to Mr. Cesar Chavez of the United Farm Workers. In this respect the federal Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) considers it most appropriate for his office at least to extend some visible recognition to Mr. Chavez and to the cause which he espouses.

The Minister of Labour has always had close empathy with the legitimate aspirations and objectives of working people, particularly in cases involving basic rights. Indeed, the minister considers this involvement as being not only reasonable in the circumstances but democratically desirable in terms of responsiveness to the feelings of concern evinced by numerous labour groups throughout Canada.

I am informed that the minister did not invite Mr. Chavez to Canada. A committee of Canadians, including many church groups, invited Mr. Chavez to Canada. The minister held an all party reception for the guest, including representatives of the Canadian Labour Congress, the Progressive Conservative Party, the NDP, the Liberal party, and, I understand two farm workers, for the purpose of meeting Mr. Chavez.

The minister supports what Mr. Chavez is trying to do in raising the standard of living of farm workers. Certainly if Mr. Fitzsimmons, the president of the Teamsters Union, who represents 85 per cent of farm workers in California, requests a meeting with the Minister of Labour, the minister will be pleased to meet him at any time if he is approached.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND SHRIMP—DIFFERENCE BETWEEN PRICE FISHERMEN RECEIVE AND THAT PAID BY CONSUMER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The Newfoundland shrimp for which the fishermen receive 24 cents per pound from the fish plants sell to the consumer in Ontario for 25 cents an ounce, or $1.49 for a six-ounce package or $4 per pound, a difference of 1,666 per cent. In view of this alarming difference from the fishermen to the consumer, I move, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That the matter be a cause for investigation to determine whether the fishermen are being exploited, or the consumer is being ripped off, and that the matter be referred to a joint committee of fisheries and forestry and consumer affairs.

Mr. Speaker: This motion proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 cannot be presented to the House without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

HEALTH

SUGGESTED MEASURES TO RESTRICT USE OF TOBACCO BY CHILDREN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that smoking is the leading cause of death in North America, that it leads to the largest number of illnesses, disabilities and premature deaths and owing to the persistency, the increasingly generalized and deeply rooted habit of smoking among children who are not yet over 20, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the Committee on Health should consider a preventive program now carried out in Sweden to avoid smoking among children and that the said committee report to the House so that it may see to the implementation of such a program in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent, therefore the motion cannot be put.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGED INVOLVEMENT OF EMPLOYEE WITH REFUSAL TO ALLOW SOVIET JOURNALIST KONSTANTIN GEIVANDOV TO ENTER CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion arising from current information that a CBC employee was involved in the government's refusal to permit Soviet journalist Konstantin Geivandov to enter Canada. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates):

That the House requests the Prime Minister to make a statement giving full details of any involvement with Soviet journalist Konstantin Geivandov by a senior CBC employee including the name and position of that employee, the names of members of this House and of the press gallery on whom the employee allegedly compiled files in return for large sums of money and a full explanation as to why this employee under the circumstances should continue to hold a sensitive CBC position where public opinion can be influenced.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PROPOSED MINISTERIAL INTERVENTION IN MORGENTALER CASE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that at least 140 doctors in Quebec have recently admitted aiding in illegal abortions, and in view of the fact that the evidence in the Morgentaler trial was that he had performed 5,000 abortions most of which had been referred by qualified doctors, and in view of the unusual and unique legal procedure that prevailed in Dr. Morgentaler's case, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That the Minister of Justice immediately intercede with the Minister of Justice in Quebec with regard to the treatment of Dr. Morgentaler while in prison; with regard to the decision of the Quebec Minister of Justice to continue the prosecution of Dr. Morgentaler on further counts arising at the same time; and with regard to the reasons why other doctors have not been charged despite the overwhelming evidence now available.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF WORKABILITY OF PROGRAM CIRCULAR D-1—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to raise a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that it is extremely unlikely that native peoples in communities such as Fort Chipewyan or any other remote community can be expected to even receive responses from companies on tenders for amounts as small as $100, and since requiring tenders on all items that cost in excess of $100 imposes an extreme rigidity on the native people, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development make a statement to this House to explain the workability of Program Circular D-1.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

TRANSPORT

DREDGING CONTRACT FOR NORTH TRAVERSE—REASON GOVERNMENT IS NOW CHARGING SUCCESSFUL BIDDER WITH COLLUSION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport arising out of his statement in the committee of the whole on May 13 as reported at page 5749 of Hansard where he said he could give no explanation for the successful dredging bid in connection with the so-called north traverse, this bid being the same as the estimate made by his own department as to what the cost should be. I quote the minister. He said:

But how can I explain it if the RCMP and the courts cannot explain it? . . . They searched everywhere.

● (1410)

Would the minister indicate to the House why the government is now claiming that there was collusion and that the successful dredging company had prior knowledge of the estimate made for the contract by the minister's department? What has happened since May 13?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I understand that this case is before the court now.

Mr. Woolliams: Oh, yes.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, it is. I think that the government estimate was about $18 million and the contract was awarded for $20 million. I think I have a letter ready to be sent to the hon. member for South Shore. The hon. member can read it, and if he has another question I can answer it.

Mr. Stanfield: I have another question right now, Mr. Speaker. The successful bid was, I believe, $20,860,000, which was exactly the estimate made by the minister's department as to what the cost should be. I should like to ask the minister why the government is now claiming, in a counterclaim against the dredging company that is suing for payment, that the successful bidder on that contract knew at the time he bid what the departmental estimate was. What has happened since the thirteenth day of May? The minister said that there has been no indication that a civil servant was involved in this. Who was involved? Was a politician involved? How did the successful dredging company find out, as the government now claims what the department's own estimate was?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I think that the answer will come from the courts. I do not see how the court, which is aware of all this, is not going to try to clarify the situation.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the minister having said in the committee of the whole House that nobody knew whether or not there was collusion and the government having now asserted in a public document that there was collusion, I suggest with all respect that the House is entitled to some information, statement or indication from the minister as to what has happened since the minister made his statement on May 13 and why the government is now claiming that in fact there was collusion and is defending itself against this dredging company by making that assertion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I do not see why it is so complicated. The inquiry was started in Hamilton after a charge was made by the city of Hamilton and after the RCMP decided to look into some other contracts. They discovered certain facts which were not known by anyone at that time. At no time was I informed by the RCMP or the Attorney General that any civil servant was accused or charged with anything in this matter. I personally have made no inquiry in order to find out if there was a civil servant involved. I think that it is not my job.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: My supplementary is for the Prime Minister since the Minister of Justice is not in the House. In view of the remarks made here this afternoon by the Minister of Transport, why is the government, in defence of a suit for payment by this dredging company, counterclaiming that the deposit being withheld is not owing because the dredging company before the bid was privy to information in the Department of Transport as to what its estimates were? As we charged, in connection with the minister's statements, the successful bid was exactly what the department was estimating, and the government is now apparently defending itself against the claim on that basis.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to unduly restrict the questioning on this very important subject, but it is a clear rule that matters before the courts ought not to be raised in the House, and the question which indicates that the government is defending itself upon those grounds before the court at this very moment, certainly makes it clear that the questions are directed very pointedly at an issue which is before the courts. There may have been questions to which there might have been some desire to give an answer, but the matter certainly appears to be before the courts.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, with respect, the question of collusion is not before the courts, and the question as to what transpired since the minister made his statement in the House on May 13 is not before the Courts. In the light of these new developments if the Prime Minister cannot answer, we will pursue the matter on another day.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, on May 13 I just told the truth, and that is all. The police are doing their job and doing research. They are not in contact with me, but they are in contact with the Crown attorney. This case is discussed between them and this is where you are going to get your answer.

Mr. Nowlan: The counterclaim isn't the place.

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think it is very clear that the Minister of Transport is being quite honest when he says he does not know what is going on. We will have to try to find out who does know what is going on.

DREDGING CONTRACT FOR NORTH TRAVERSE—INQUIRY WHETHER ENGINEERING CERTIFICATES ON WHICH QUANTITIES DREDGED WERE PAID FOR WERE ASSESSED

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of Transport. In evaluating this contract and the payment of the amount of some $20,860,000, would the minister inform the House if an assessment was made of the engineering certificates on which the quantities dredged were paid for. Was this undertaken by him or any officials in his department?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will consider this matter and answer later on.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED NARCOTICS SMUGGLING RING AT MONTREAL AIRPORT—POSSIBLE EXISTENCE OF INTERNAL REPORT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Solicitor General. Yesterday the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby asked about an alleged internal report dealing with a big narcotic smuggling ring at the Montreal airport involving some 60 people working at the airport. Can the minister now tell the House whether such a report exists, when it was made and whether it was brought to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Transport, whose departments' employees were allegedly involved?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, yesterday there was no question about a report. I was asked whether I had given an authorization or whether the commissioner had given an authorization to a member of the RCMP to make certain statements about a police investigation, but there was no question about a report. As far as I know there was no such report. I did not state yesterday that I would look into such a thing. If the hon. member wishes, I could look into that, but I do not know of any, and I did discuss this case at great length with the commissioner of the RCMP yesterday afternoon.

REASON REPORT CONCERNING ALLEGED NARCOTICS SMUGGLING RING IN MONTREAL NOT BROUGHT TO ATTENTION OF MINISTER

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): When the minister is looking into this matter will he also be prepared to give some explanation to the House as to why the contents of this report or its subject matter involving a highly important matter were apparently not called to his attention until the story was given to a Globe and Mail reporter and made public by that newspaper?

● (1420)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know there is no such report. There was an investigation. I do not know what report the hon. member is talking about. As a matter of fact, there was not even an allegation that there was such a report until right now. I should point out to the House that it is not usual for the RCMP to discuss every investigation that is going on with me; there are thousands going on in the country at any one time. If a matter is raised in committee or the House of Commons, of course I approach the RCMP for information or if an investigation is at such a level that questions might be asked I would be informed; but I was not informed about this investigation. It is not usual to give details of an investigation while it is under way.

Mr. Brewin: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister agree that a question involving government employees involved in huge narcotics rings is of sufficient importance that it ought to have been reported to him, even if it were not?

Mr. Allmand: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that necessarily should have been reported to me. The RCMP investigate and when they have enough proof they bring it to the attention of the Crown prosecutor and charges are laid. Unfortunately, in this case the report appeared in the newspaper in the middle of an investigation. The investigation is well under way so I do not feel I should say anything further about it at the present time.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Rimouski.

Mr. Nowlan: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Annapolis Valley on a point of order.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is this: the hon. minister just said that he was not asked about a report yesterday. I asked him a very direct question about that which is recorded at page 6375 of Hansard as follows:

> Can the minister tell the House when he was first aware of this alleged internal report of the RCMP and of the investigation.

That is as clear as the Queen's English can be, and I cannot understand the minister's answer to the hon. member for Greenwood today. I was amazed at his answer to me yesterday that he was first aware of this internal report when a Globe and Mail reporter told him. I have some questions that will come later, Mr. Speaker. My point of order is that the minister was questioned about an internal report and while his answer was not completely responsive, he certainly was questioned directly about it. I should like to know why he answered the hon. member for Greenwood the way he did today, and why he could not answer my question yesterday.

Mr. Allmand: Unfortunately, there has been some misunderstanding, Mr. Speaker. I thought the hon. member was asking yesterday about a report of the investigation, merely meaning a report in the general sense of the report that was given to me. That is the situation. I never had any information about that investigation until yesterday. It is not customary for the RCMP to inform ministers, either at the provincial or the federal level, of every investigation that is under way.

Mr. Speaker: I propose to recognize the hon. member for Annapolis Valley in just a moment. The hon. member for Rimouski.

[Mr. Allmand.]

HEALTH

SUGGESTED MEASURES TO RESTRICT USE OF TOBACCO BY CHILDREN

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley, I regret, but unless I am mistaken I think his intervention was out of order because when I rose you had recognized me.

Now, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but in his absence I shall put it to his parliamentary secretary. Can the hon. lady tell the House whether she is aware of a program being applied in Sweden to prevent children from starting to smoke? If so, does Canada intend to take similar steps?

REPORT CONCERNING ALLEGED NARCOTICS SMUGGLING RING IN MONTREAL—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. In the question period yesterday the minister said that he was going to have a discussion with the commissioner of the RCMP yesterday. That is why I thought the question of the hon. member for Greenwood was relevant. Can the minister tell the House now if he knows anything more about the internal report of the RCMP on the alleged drug smuggling activities in the Montreal airport and if not, why not?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, yes, I discussed this matter yesterday afternoon with the commissioner and deputy commissioner. After the discussion we decided that it would not be in the public interest to say more about the matter at present.

POSSIBLE INVOLVEMENT OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES IN ALLEGED NARCOTICS SMUGGLING RING IN MONTREAL

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question? I appreciate, as every member of the House does, the problems involved in an investigation of such alleged magnitude and sensitivity. Since the story did appear in the national press, since officials of various departments are alleged to have been involved and since the Minister of National Revenue yesterday said he is working with the Solicitor General on this matter, can the Solicitor General tell the House, without compromising the investigation, if officials or personnel either of the Solicitor General's department or of the Department of National Revenue are implicated, and is a ministerial in-House inquiry being undertaken, in addition to what the RCMP are doing?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, for reasons which the hon. member mentioned at the beginning of his question, we considered yesterday whether we should make more information available; but, on balance, having considered all the alternatives and possibilities, we felt that, for the time being, it would not be in the public interest to say more about this investigation. I can only say that a police investigation is under way; it has been under way and is continuing, and I cannot say any more at the moment.

STATEMENTS BY SERGEANT LEDUC CONCERNING ALLEGED NARCOTICS SMUGGLING RING IN MONTREAL—REASON FOR MAKING STATEMENTS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a final supplementary question? The House may be interested to know that the hon. member for Central Nova also wishes to ask a supplementary question on this topic. Has the minister been in touch with Sergeant Leduc who is on another investigation, or on an investigation outside the country, and with any other police officer whose name appeared in the report, to find out why so many "statements" appeared in the national press?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have not tried to get in touch with those men. The Commissioner of the RCMP and officers of the force are attempting to get in touch with them as soon as possible. They were out of the country yesterday and will return shortly.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I would not want the House to miss my supplementary question. Can the Solicitor General tell the House what prompted members of the RCMP to divulge, apparently prematurely, details of this investigation? Was the reason their sense of frustration at the way the investigation was being handled? May I also ask the minister if any private security or guard agencies were involved?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, at present we are not even certain if the officers mentioned in the article actually gave that information. Until other officers of the force have had a chance to speak to them, we will not know the full story, and I cannot say any more about it at present.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN ROYAL RECOMMENDATION TO BILL C-62

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the government House leader? I ask it pursuant to my duty to facilitate the smooth operation of the House. It arises from the fact that yesterday the hon. gentleman brought in a changed royal recommendation pertaining to Bill C-62. Although the recommendation has been changed it still provides that the bill is to cover only those people who are married to and living with pensioners. As the bill appears to cover people who are living together in illicit relationships, including incestuous relationships, something that is clearly contrary to the royal recommendation, does the government intend to secure a new recommendation from the Crown, and was what I just raised made known to the representative of the Crown before he was asked for that particular recommendation.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to change the royal recommendation. Indeed, I intend to call the bill on Friday.

Mr. Baldwin: You are in trouble. You had better read the bill.

REASON FOR DELAY IN SHIPMENT OF WHEAT TO ETHIOPIA AND SOMALIA

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1430)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. On one previous occasion when the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi asked for order to present his question, I indicated in criticism of him that he ought to get to his question quickly. On this occasion he ought to be given the opportunity to get to his question quickly.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Apart from the normal considerations involved in the dockers' strike in the port of Montreal, can the minister inform the House the reason for the excessive delay in the shipment of 10,000 tons of bagged wheat from that port to the countries of Ethiopia and Somalia?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, but I will make inquiries.

Mr. Grafftey: Can the minister advise whether in fact much of this bagged shipment became destroyed during storage in the port of Montreal and, at great cost to the Canadian taxpayer, is now being reopened bag by bag?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will ascertain that information and give it to the hon. member.

INDUSTRY

PRATT AND WHITNEY—PROPOSED GOVERNMENT TAKEOVER OF COMPANY IN VIEW OF FAILURE TO SETTLE STRIKE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago I asked the Prime Minister whether the government would take action in the very long and difficult Pratt and Whitney strike, a company in which the government of Canada invested some $60 million. In view of the refusal by the company to accept the recommendations made by the arbitrator appointed by the provincial government and the announcement today that that company now says it did not make a commitment to Premier Bourassa that it will re-hire 1,000 people on strike immediately, will the government consider taking over that company as it has taken over or proposes to take over two other very large aero-space companies as a government corporation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): That is not being considered, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: I said it was not being considered, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Orlikow: Two weeks ago the Prime Minister would not answer my question because it was hypothetical. The company has now indicated very clearly that it still refuses to follow the Canadian law and customs. Will the government now give consideration to taking over that company so that Canadian workers can work and work in peace?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that is a repetition of the question in a non-hypothetical way. We are not considering taking it over.

FISHERIES

POSSIBLE APPLICATION OF NEW MEAT INSPECTION REGULATIONS IN QUEBEC TO FISH

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Fisheries.

Following the controversy in Quebec about the "Quebec Approved" seal and the provincial government's intentions of revamping the meat inspection system, will amendments to regulations also apply to fish inspection in Gaspé and Îles-de-la-Madeleine?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec passed complementary legislation to federal laws on fish inspection. Since 1959, if I remember well, federal inspectors have been checking all fish for consumption within and without Quebec. Shying away from entering the present debate on another kind of food, I would strongly advise hon. members to use mackerel when baking pizzas in the future.

AIR TRANSPORT

FAILURE OF UNITED STATES TO APPROVE PACIFIC WESTERN AIRLINES ROUTE FROM VANCOUVER TO SEATTLE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. As President Ford has not signed the necessary documents to allow Pacific Western Airlines to fly a direct route from Vancouver to Seattle, has the minister protested this delay by the president of the United States? If not, when will he protest?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I did not understand the route; between Vancouver and—

Mr. Reynolds: Seattle.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I know it is in the agreement, but I do not know if the airline has decided to fly it. However, I will inquire and advise the hon. member.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the airline has tried to fly and has had to announce a cancellation of the schedule because the United States president has not signed the necessary documents, if this is not done within a three or four day period from now, will the minister take unilateral action against United States airlines already flying the routes given to them to come into Canada?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, if I get from the company the same information which the hon. member has—

Mr. Reynolds: It has been in every newspaper.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): That may be, but I have not read those newspapers. If the hon. member will send them to me, I will obtain an answer.

INQUIRY WHETHER MR. PRATTE WILL APPEAR BEFORE ESTEY COMMISSION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. As Judge Estey is nearing the end of his hearing and in order to clear up all situations relating to Air Canada that have arisen, does the minister know if and when Mr. Pratte will appear before Judge Estey?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is up to the judge and Mr. Pratte to decide, not to me. I do not know why the hon. member is asking me.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR RESCINDING OF CIRCULAR D-1 PENDING CONSULTATION WITH NATIVE ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is the minister aware of a directive sent by the assistant deputy minister to regional directors on February 17 of this year regarding local government programs?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not clear whether that is the directive dealing with local government guidelines. I am aware of that, yes. There was a whole series.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): In view of the fact the directive indicates program circular D-1 is the cornerstone of Indian local government policy and contains non-negotiable conditions which terms and conditions remain mandatory, will the minister now indicate if the directive is government policy or will he confirm his previous statements concerning consultation with the native people by rescinding the present guidelines until such consultations are complete?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated in this House on several occasions that they are negotiable in the sense we regard them as being of an interim nature. We are prepared to make changes. In fact, if I could refer to the Standing Order 43 motion put by the hon. member for Battle River, the tender figure has been changed from $100 to $500.

PROVISION IN CIRCULAR D-1 FOR TENDERS FOR ITEMS OVER $100—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, the minister stated, and it is recorded in Hansard, that that review would take place following one year. He might explain to the House the workability of this example in program circular D-1 of asking for a tender on all items of Indian money in excess of $100. How is that going to be workable in places like Fort Chipewyan and other remote areas where they will not even receive a response to tenders?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, that has been changed from $100 to $500. It is no longer $100.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGATION MEAT FROM DEAD HORSES SOLD IN ONTARIO—INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION BY FORCE

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. It arises from the statement by Mr. Wally Koegler of Kitchener, Ontario, the former chief inspector of the Ontario Humane Society that long before the establishment of the Quebec inquiry into organized crime, the RCMP had been investigating a ring with possible organized crime connections that had been selling meat from dead and dying horses in Ontario for years. Is that correct? If so, are such investigations continuing and are charges expected to be laid in connection with this in the near future?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not know about the individual named by the hon. member. However, the RCMP told me they had investigated allegations of bad meat in Ontario as far back as 1969. On each occasion that an allegation of this nature was brought to their attention, they did not find sufficient evidence to lay charges or to prosecute.

Mr. Beatty: Has the minister any knowledge of the case mentioned by Mr. Koegler? According to Mr. Koegler, prosecutions were dropped after a key witness changed his story following a threat by a man with a revolver.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that particular case, but I will check it. When I asked the RCMP about these stories, I was given an answer in a general way. I will check that situation in more detail.

POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration a question in order to clear up a fuzzy answer he gave me the other day. Has the minister developed any contingency plan to deal with this worsening situation? Can he take the House into his confidence and tell us just what options he is looking at?

● (1440)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): If and when a decision is made on such a program the information will certainly be conveyed to the House.

Mr. Alexander: In the light of the fact that the LIP program is about to expire, can the minister assure us that those who will be unemployed this summer will be able to find employment?

Mr. Andras: I do not think I can add to my previous answer.

SOCIAL SECURITY

EFFECT OF DEATH OF PENSIONER AGED 65 ON ELIGIBILITY OF SURVIVING SPOUSE UNDER BILL C-62

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare being away, I shall direct my question to his parliamentary secretary.

After the tabling of Bill C-62 yesterday by the Minister of National Health and Welfare concerning the possible payment of a pension to the spouse of a person in respect of whom payment of a pension has already been authorized under the Old Age Security Act, may I ask the parliamentary secretary whether, once this bill has been adopted and should the older of the spouses happen to die, the surviving spouse will automatically lose his or her pension entitlement under Bill C-62?

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member, but since the President of the Privy Council has already indicated that this bill will be introduced in the House later this week, presumably on Friday, perhaps the hon. member for Bellechasse would wait until then to ask his questions about Bill C-62.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for advising me that Bill C-62 will come this week before the House.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—SANCTIONS IN SAFEGUARD AGREEMENT

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It arises from the announcement on May 28 that Canada had signed a contract for the sale of a CANDU reactor to South Korea and that the negotiations have been completed for a $380 million loan. Would the minister advise the House whether his department embarked on any reassessment of the safety of this sale following the surrender of the Thieu forces in South Viet Nam? Has he been advised that the strategic situation in South Korea remains the same or is there an increased risk in the sale of this reactor?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): At the present time we are continuing negotiations with respect to the conclusion of a bilateral safeguard agreement with South Korea. As the hon. member knows, South Korea has ratified the non-proliferation treaty with the result that the total nuclear system within that country will be under internationally inspected safeguards—the maximum possible safeguard system which can be devised at the present time. This, combined with the Canadian bilateral agreement will be adequate in the circumstances. To reply more directly to the political aspects, we have not reached a conclusion that the political situation has changed to warrant a change in our position.

Mr. Leggatt: Perhaps the minister would table the proposed agreement, or the agreement, in the event one is reached. Would the minister tell us what sanctions are contained in the proposed agreement? What penalty would be imposed on the government of South Korea in the event that South Korea diverted plutonium from its reactor and joined the nuclear club as India has done? I ask this question in the light of a report that the South Korean ambassador has stated that safeguards were an interference with South Korea's affairs. What sanctions would be imposed and how would they be enforced? Would we send Canadian troops into Korea?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member will be glad to know we are not proposing to send Canadian troops to South Korea. The safeguards are under international inspection, under an international agency, and any contemplated or active diversion of plutonium for non-peaceful purposes would quickly become apparent to the inspectors and the devices they install. That, of course, is the purpose of the overall inspection system.

An hon. Member: And then what?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member realizes that ours is a bilateral agreement and that the NPT is a multilateral agreement; we count, as does the international community, on member states adhering to their commitments.

SALE OF URANIUM TO JAPAN—GUARANTEE OF PEACEFUL USE—SANCTIONS IN SAFEGUARD AGREEMENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): With reference to the contract with Japan which I understand calls for delivery of 2,000 tons of uranium, may I ask what guarantees there are that this material will be used for peaceful purposes? Is there really any form of guarantee, when we make these deals, that the material we provide will be used for commercial and peaceful purposes?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The inspection system is entirely focused upon the objective of ensuring that this material and this technology are not diverted for non-peaceful purposes. That is the objective, and it is secured within these safeguard agreements.

Mr. Woolliams: What penalty or sanction would Canada impose if it were found after inspection that there had been improper use of this material—that it had been turned to use as a weapon rather than applied to a commercial purpose?

Mr. MacEachen: In the case of the particular country which has been mentioned, the sanction would be the withholding of further sales.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member will realize that in the case of India, when an explosion took place against the understanding which the Canadian government had reached with the government of India, a number of sanctions were employed—some of them are still in place. It is much to the regret of the Canadian government that this should have happened and we are presently negotiating with the government of India in the hope that we may restore normal relations as they previously existed. I can assure the hon. member that India, as well as Canada, is quite unhappy about the present situation.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ALLEGED COERCION OF JAMES SMITH BAND TO ACCEPT LOCAL GOVERNMENT GUIDELINES—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question arises out of questions addressed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development by the hon. member for Battle River. In the course of his reply the minister stated that the local government guideline system was subject to further negotiation. Has there been brought to his attention the very serious situation in the James Smith band in the immediate vicinity of Prince Albert, one of the oldest reserves in our provinces, where the Indian band council has complained to him that the operation and maintenance of its programs are being held back because the band is being coerced into accepting the guidelines to which I have referred. The result of which is that these Indians, by reason of the dictatorial and stubborn attitude taken by the department, find themselves in the position of having to lay off staff and terminate programs, with the consequence that many Indians who would otherwise be self-supporting are now obliged to fall back on welfare? In giving that answer would he also assure me and these Indians, who after all are wards of the Queen, or believe themselves to be, that an investigation will be immediately entered into by his department to the end that if coercion is being practised it will end here and now?

● (1450)

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the suggestion that coercion is being practised. These guidelines went out and, as the right hon. gentleman is aware, there has been considerable discussion and opposition to them on the part of some of the bands in Saskatchewan, and in particular by the Federation of Saskatchewan Indians. I have stated in this House on several occasions that they are of an interim nature and we are prepared to change them. As I would like to indicate in reply to the hon. member for Battle River, we have in fact changed the figures as far as the tender amount is concerned and we are prepared to look at other aspects as well, but they have gone into force as of the first of June.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In addition to changing the figures, Mr. Speaker, has the minister received a complaint from one of the most distinguished chiefs in the province, Chief Sanderson, concerning the fact that so anxious is the Department of Indian Affairs to obtain acquisition to these guidelines the services of the Indian Affairs staff have been terminated, and because this particular band will not accept Mr. J. Wright in an official position? This is a serious matter and one that deserves attention, and I would ask the minister whether he would have these particular complaints looked into because there is a grave injustice being done here if the Indians are being forced or coerced into the position of accepting something they do not want?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I will state again that I do not accept the suggestion that they are being forced or coerced. I have had several complaints from Chief Solomon Sanderson of the reserve on this subject. As I indicated, we are prepared to make changes. As to the question of Jim Wright, the Acting Regional Director, this was put to me the other day as well, and I have indicated that his appointment is of an acting nature. When the permanent appointment comes up this summer the Indian people will have their representative sitting on the board which will pass on that appointment.

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF PROVINCIAL BANK IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTITUTIONALITY

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Finance had an opportunity to review the Barrett bank proposal in British Columbia which is contained in a bill now introduced to that legislature to incorporate a new financial institution which is to be 90 per cent owned by the province, and is to have almost all the powers of a regular bank? If so, does the minister agree with Premier Barrett that such a new institution comes within provincial constitutional rights?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are reviewing the situation but it does not become other than hypothetical until the bill is passed.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, as the present government House leader, when Minister of Finance, adamantly opposed Premier Barrett's attempt to establish a provincially-owned bank of British Columbia, and in fact amended the Bank Act to ensure that this would not happen, will the minister indicate why he appears to have such little concern in respect of the proposed incorporation in that province?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Simply because, Mr. Speaker, until the bill becomes law it is not a proposition I would have to consider, but any precedent invoked in favour of the House leader is a weighty precedent I would have to consider.

POSSIBLE PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION TO TRUCKING INDUSTRY AS RESULT OF FREIGHT RATE FREEZE—DATE OF DECISION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, on May 23 I asked the Minister of Transport whether the government had finalized a decision in respect of the payment of compensation to the trucking industry for the losses which were incurred as the result of the imposition of the railway freight freeze. He indicated that the matter was going before Cabinet very rapidly, and I wonder if he is now in a position to give an indication to the House whether a payment is to be made to the trucking industry and, if so, in what amount?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is on its way to the proper committee.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the Canadian Trucking Association is holding its annual conference in Calgary on June 13, would the minister indicate whether a decision will be announced before that date?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I cannot give any promise, Mr. Speaker. This has to go to the committee and then to the Cabinet. I cannot tell the hon. member at what moment the Cabinet is going to decide something.

THE POSSIBILITY OF ISSUING GOLD COINS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the President of the Treasury Board, I would like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Last Friday, answering one of my colleagues, the President of the Treasury Board stated:

> The government is considering the requests of COJO to find procedures to increase revenues. As soon as the decision of the cabinet is taken, we will probably be introducing legislation in the House in the near future.

Given that answer may I ask the right hon. Prime Minister if the government is trying to establish a new way of financing, and if so what measure does the government intend to bring forward in the House to help the Olympic Games?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to answer that question. I will very gladly take notice of it and get in touch with the President of the Treasury Board.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are continuing to compile and analyze the information on General Quang. OIL—POSSIBLE PRICE ADJUSTMENT IN VIEW OF REDUCTION IN EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, given the fact that the apparent volume of exports of oil to the United States is falling below the amount approved, could the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicate whether the government is exploring a series of adjustments in the price so the market will be cleared?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman may recall that the National Energy Board recommended a price adjustment last month, which is a clear anticipation that there will be a slight increase in the volume of exports. I think one can say that the volume of exports has been affected as much by the rather soft market for crude oil in the United States during this period, not unrelated to the performance of the United States economy.

EFFECT OF DECLINE IN EXPORTS OF OIL TO UNITED STATES ON FUND TO EQUALIZE PRICES

Can he just give rough figures?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): It is throwing that account into deficit.

AGRICULTURE

ALLEGED LACK OF FUNDS FOR RESEARCH—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, since there appears to be a very serious lack of funds for agricultural research, especially at the university level, and in light of the fact there has been a statement calling for more funds and staff to prevent the by-passing of important research projects in the agricultural field, will the Minister of Agriculture indicate what action he is going to take to correct what is potentially a very serious situation?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have done some checking and we find that the amount of research money we put in at the university level compares favourably with that of any nation with a standard of living comparable to ours, and is better than most. We do research as well in our own department. We are concerned about this situation and we are looking at it very closely.

POSSIBLE ANNOUNCEMENT OF AGRICULTURAL POLICY BY FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, the minister really did not answer my question. The fact is that there has been some reduction and it could be very serious. Noting the statement that Canada must develop a fully articulated set of national agricultural policies, and taking into account the fact that the Food Prices Review Board is planning to come up with a statement of new agricultural policies by the end of this year, I would ask the Minister of Agriculture what action his department is taking, or is the Food Prices Review Board slowly moving into the area of formulating agricultural policy under the Minister of Agriculture?

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER AND MR. TRUDEAU—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: As I indicated yesterday, I have given some consideration to the extremely difficult questions of privilege that have been put before us over the last few days. I think hon. members will understand it is not without some difficulty that I will try to resolve the matter.

In view of all the disagreement that has come about in the discussion of these various questions, perhaps it might be wise to start with as much agreement as does exist and in fact, that is considerable. The first is that the definition of privilege is one that has been strictly adhered to and narrowly interpreted constantly. This has been said many times by my distinguished predecessor whose words I have had a number of occasions to refer to in this parliament:

> On a number of occasions I have defined what I consider to be parliamentary privilege. Privilege is that which sets hon. members apart from other citizens, giving them rights which the public do not possess. I suggest we should be careful in construing any particular circumstance which might add to the privileges which have been recognized over the years, and perhaps over the centuries, as belonging to members of the House of Commons. In my view parliamentary privilege does not go much beyond the right of free speech in the House of Commons and the right of a member to discharge his duties in the House as a member of the House of Commons.

The second thing that seems to be agreed upon is the way in which privilege should be interpreted and that we ought not extend it lightly. It was suggested during the course of the discussion by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that because there was an indication by both principals in this matter that perhaps they would be agreeable to having the matter aired before the committee, and if I thought that should be done or if I thought there was a prima facie case of privilege, it certainly might be a welcome and easy way to attempt to encourage the House to come to that view. It seems to me, however, that would be shirking the fundamental part of my duty, which is to make those findings I have been asked to make. Whether or not it is of particular joy, it does seem that that is my responsibility and therefore I will set out on that course now.

The third point on which there is agreement is that a dispute as to facts, a dispute as to opinions and a dispute as to conclusions to be drawn from an allegation of fact is a matter of debate and not a question of privilege. The fourth thing that then becomes germane to the case involved is, can an attack by one member of this House upon another, in respect of his conduct as a member of the House of Commons either now or in the past, constitute a question of privilege? That is a very serious consideration.

I might indicate to hon. members at the outset that there are indeed some clear and forceful precedents which indicate that it is almost impossible that an attack of that sort can be made to constitute a question of privilege. I would refer hon. members to a very clear and explicit decision enunciated on December 17, 1964, by Mr. Speaker MacNaughton. That is reported at page 1011 of the Journals of the House of Commons for December 17, 1964. It concerned, at the time, a question of privilege raised by the then member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. I am sorry; perhaps I have misled the House. The ruling I am about to read is from an earlier ruling by Mr. Speaker Michener. In any case, it has the same effect:

> In my view, simple justice requires that no honourable member should have to submit to investigation of his conduct by the House or a Committee until he has been charged with an offence.

There are clear reasons for the wisdom of that process to be followed, that if one member seeks to complain about the remarks of another he ought to put it in the form of a charge and take those members before a committee, for the very simple reason that in that circumstance the proponent of the charge or complaint then is saddled with the onus of proving the case before the committee. Often, the difficulty when one member complains about remarks by another is that if it were to be accepted as a prima facie case of privilege and voted to the committee, when the committee assembles, in fact no one clearly has the onus of proof upon him and no one has the responsibility of carrying the specific case or charge before that committee, and accordingly if any hon. member concerned desires not to appear there as a witness the function of the committee becomes a nullity and a bit of a farce.

Accordingly, there is some wisdom in the process that if one wishes to complain about what another member has done or said, it should be done in the form of a complete charge rather than by way of an alleged question of privilege. That, however, is a very strict view but, again, I might be tempted not to set aside the proposed question of privilege in those circumstances and rely on the precedents to say that if it is not in the form of a charge, it ought not to be considered at this time. However, citations were cited, notably citation 108(3) of Beauchesne which says that libels upon members have been considered as questions of privilege or grounds for them. The fact of the matter is that in looking behind that citation, it turns out to be a situation in which a member of the United Kingdom Parliament placed placards around the county of another member decrying him and calling his conduct degrading and inhuman. That, thankfully, is different to the situation we have here today.

I must also indicate that citation 113 of Beauchesne says that libels upon members and aspersions upon them in relation to parliament have been considered questions of privilege. In light of that, I have, I believe, to address myself to the question of whether or not that is the case now. I certainly do not pretend to speculate on what sort of remarks might constitute a question of privilege or get into a hypothesis of what they may be, but I refer directly to the particular instance that is before us at the present time.

It seems to me that in this particular instance the complaint that is sought to be made the subject of a question of privilege would need to be at least, as a minimum, an allegation of some wrongful conduct or some wrongdoing on the part of the member complaining. That is why the allegation in this case would have to be specifically that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in describing the conduct of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in his former capacity as prime minister, had accused him of doing something wrongful.

Surely, the motion of the right hon. member which is before me now indicates that slanderous and libellous remarks or allegations were made by the right hon. Prime Minister, and surely slanderous remarks would have to refer to some wrongdoing. That is, of course, the essence of the difference of opinion that is before the House. The right hon. member for Prince Albert says that is exactly what was implied, if not said, by the right hon. Prime Minister; but the right hon. Prime Minister, on the other hand, said it was a criticism or reference to the conduct of the former prime minister but not in any way an allegation of wrongdoing.

In order to come to a conclusion about that, I have to look at the context. The fact of the matter is that the context of the remarks involved an exchange, not only the second but perhaps, if one goes back far enough, the third instalment of a continuing debate which has continued over several weeks in the House between those very distinguished and prominent members. Unfortunately, on the particular occasion when these remarks were made, a direct confrontation between the two of them could not be carried on. I say that very seriously and wish to make it absolutely clear that I do not say it in criticism of either member. All members of this House realize that both right hon. members involved have tremendous obligations about the country, on behalf of this country, in their capacity as leading and prominent members and it simply is not possible for them to be here confronting each other every day, much, I am sure, to the chagrin of the press gallery and other hon. members who find it entertaining.

In any event, I am convinced, in looking at the context of the case, that had that confrontation taken place, probably the remarks upon which I am asked to deliberate now would have been the subject of questions, of points of order, of rebuttal, of reply and the kind of cut and thrust of debate that has made this chamber the very distinguished place it is. Unfortunately, however, that did not take place.

The remarks involved fall into three categories. The first had to do with the stocking of fish in Harrington Lake. The result of that intervention has caused the Prime Minister to come before the House to apologize to the House and withdraw the remark. That obviously had its effect. Surely, now, there can be nothing to go to the committee in that regard. Another dealt with the bomb-shelter at 24 Sussex Drive. It has been pointed out that there is a considerable dispute as to the extent of the expense. The significance of that whole issue is a matter of opinion; it is a subject of a debate in which the listener should judge.

In the final analysis, the remarks that are the most significant have to do with the acquisition of Harrington Lake. In that regard, I think it is not appropriate to listen now to the words of those who say that the words were not intended this way or that way; I think that would be extending leniency beyond the point to which I should go. If I were to accept only now the expression that these words were intended to suggest wrongdoing, it might be better for me to put the question to the House and let the House decide. Instead of doing that, I have gone back to the original remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister, which I will now quote. The Prime Minister said:

> In the same speech, the right hon. gentleman talked about Harrington Lake. I think that was another unfortunate reference, because I suppose he made the largest land grab when he was in office that was ever made by any private citizen of Canada. He did so when he decided that Harrington Lake and the buildings on it should be the country residence of the prime minister. I do not think anybody then sitting on my party's side of the House criticized that decision. He was adding thousands of acres of land for his private enjoyment. I think it was a justifiable gesture, one from which I personally have benefited. In the same way I hope the next prime minister will benefit from the swimming pool at 24 Sussex Drive.

It is for the House and for the public to judge, in so far as they are interested, the wisdom or nicety of those remarks but that is not the question which is before me: the sole question before me is whether those remarks intended to cast aspersions upon the character of the right hon. member for Prince Albert. In view of the admission or expression contained therein, that whatever action was taken at that time was taken with the support of the whole House of Commons without a contrary voice—and if there was any doubt about that, the Prime Minister added that in retrospect, in his personal opinion, that action was proper and appropriate at the time—I cannot reconcile those public expressions of approval of the action that was taken with a finding that there is an allegation of some impropriety or misconduct on the part of the right hon. gentleman.

I therefore find, in examining them—and I have to come to a decision one way or another—that there is a serious dispute and disagreement as to what the facts were, and there is a further dispute and disagreement as to what implications or significance should be taken from those facts. Those are ingredients for debate and not ingredients for a question of privilege. Therefore, that is my view and it is my hope that the matter will end there.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes. (a) Yes. (b) A summary of the investigation was forwarded to Training Command Headquarters.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—NON-RECOVERABLE EXPENSES

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): 1. The Department of National Defence maintains records of recoverable costs on a case by case basis.

METRIC SYSTEM ADVERTISING

Question No. 2,350—Mr. Howie:

How much money was paid and to whom, from March 1 to March 31, 1975 to advertise promotion of the metric system in Canada?

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): $125,494.97 was spent to advertise promotion of the metric system in Canada from March 1 to March 31, 1975; the advertising agency was Maclaren Advertising Co. Ltd.

*PASSPORT OFFICE, WINNIPEG—PROCESSING OF APPLICATIONS

Question No. 2,470—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Does the passport office in Winnipeg process applications by mail and, if not, for what reason?

2. What facilities are available to residents of Manitoba outside Winnipeg where there is urgency in processing an application?

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is no. The six Regional Passport Offices were established to bring a personalized service to as large a segment of the Canadian population as is economically feasible. They were not intended to duplicate the mail service in Ottawa which is centralized for reasons of efficiency and economy. The difference in mailing time between Ottawa and Winnipeg or other locations in Canada is not a significant factor in the overall period of passport processsing time requested on the application form of two weeks plus mailing time.

2. The answer to the second part follows. Emergency service is available at any of the six Regional Offices or at Ottawa. All Regional Offices are located in cities with major Canadian international airports from which travellers going abroad can be expected to leave Canada. This was one of the considerations in the planning of the locations of the Regional Offices which are and should be used for urgent service.

REMOVAL OF PROVISION ALLOWING DEDUCTION OF EXPENSES FOR ADVERTISING IN NON-CANADIAN PERIODICALS

The House resumed, from Monday, May 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-58, to amend the Income Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, it is my particular pleasure to speak on this bill today. I wish to indicate to the House that I have received over 200 letters opposing the bill and possibly only ten letters in favour of it. Thus far, that is the input of my riding of Kootenay West.

On examining the bill and hearing the genuine concern expressed in the contributions to the debate by members on both sides of the House, I find it very difficult to come to any other conclusion than that this bill is both foolish and a pack of nonsense. The minister is demonstrating no concern for the facts and no concern for the Canadian employees of Reader's Digest. He is not really concerned about the tax dollars which will be generated; he is concerned about the tax shelters which he would supposedly remove.

Mr. Paproski: He is not even here today.

Mr. Brisco: I noticed that, and that happens frequently. He has not concerned himself, nor has he indicated to the House any concern about the revenue generated by Reader's Digest for the Post Office—and the Post Office needs all the revenue it can get nowadays. The minister has not said anything about freedom of the press, unless it is the Heritage press. What has happened to the Bill of Rights? What is the minister trying to do for the Canadian magazine industry? The Toronto-based Liberal mandarins and eggheads want to build their left wing empire on the backs of Canadian taxpayers, and if not by government grant then the minister will build it by grant of government legislation.

What does the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) have against Reader's Digest? He was not satisfied just to introduce Bill C-58. As an interesting aside, it should be noted that he had to tangle his department in a web of confusion and intrigue with the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada, and he showed not a shred of conscience over the creditors of this bankrupt, so-called non-profit society. Not only has the Secretary of State not demonstrated any concern for these creditors, but neither has the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford), the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan), the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), and so on. But what has that to do with Reader's Digest? There is an organization in France called the Foreign Study League. The Foreign Study League is a creditor of the Society for the Study of the Heritage of Canada, to the tune of $106,000, and the Foreign Study League just happens to be a subsidiary of Reader's Digest.

I wonder what else the Secretary of State can dabble in besides this mess. He talks about 80 per cent Canadian content. I can only imagine that about 40 per cent of this Canadian content will be heifer dust cranked out by a mindless amateur in the office of the Secretary of State. Let us go back to the very basics of the Reader's Digest confrontation. Let us go back to the people who really demonstrate some concern, the average citizen, more particularly the senior citizen and his $3 per year subscription to pleasure. One of the beauties of this particular magazine is its variety of content and the contributions by authors and writers from around the world. Some say it is not very factual and there are times when the medical profession finds Reader's Digest to be the bane of its existence, when patients come in with a new set of symptoms which they have diagnosed from the pages of "Joe's Liver" taken out of Reader's Digest. But beyond that it is a gentle magazine which is easily read and thoroughly enjoyed, particularly by senior citizens.

It probably is of no consequence at all to the heartless Secretary of State, but I wonder how many senior citizens across Canada buy a subcription for a grandchild, son or daughter. It is an inexpensive Christmas gift, and God knows senior citizens can ill-afford anything but an inexpensive gift. I wonder why the minister is so concerned when all the senior citizen wishes to demonstrate is a monthly reminder of love and affection.

This fiasco of Bill C-58 reminds me very much—sickeningly so—of the attempt of the British Columbia government to grab a so-called educational television channel for its own use. I cannot help but feel that with this bill the federal government seeks to impose itself again upon the public, against the will of the public, leading them blindly down the garden path with soft chatter, vague innuendos and platitudes and saying that everything is all right, but that the government wants to be damned sure it knows what we are going to read and it has to be something of which the government approves.

I wonder why the government does not demonstrate the same concern with regard to Playboy magazine and magazines of similar type. We have not heard anything from the Secretary of State about those. I wonder if he considers them to be highly educational. I am awaiting the suggestion by the minister that we remove sex instruction from the schools and buy all the students subscriptions to Playboy. That seems to be a very liberal proposal.

I would also like to draw the attention of the House to the intelligent Liberal opposition to this bill—the only Liberal speeches which, in my view, have made any sense. Obviously, those hon. members are demonstrating their concern that the new philosophy and the new policy is porno first and intellect last. What an epitaph for a government! Next week I suspect that a magazine which is now on the stands, Nous magazine, with the blessing of the Secretary of State will lift the maple leaf from the nether regions of that full page fold-out of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I saw an hon. member over here who was smiling but concerned. He was shuddering to think what would happen and what would be revealed upon the lifting of the maple leaf. I am not going to address myself to that, nor will I suggest, as one hon. member did, that we might find there the presence of Michael Pitfield. Indeed, I will not say that. I shudder to think what would happen to the National Geographic magazine if it were to publish in Canada. I can just see the Secretary of State insisting upon a full page fold-out of his own anatomy.

● (1530)

I have heard very little about the French issue which is now heavily in debt and operating at a loss. On the one hand, the minister says no subsidies by tax benefits, but if the Digest is to subsidize the French Canadian issue that is different. A government subsidy, fine; a Digest subsidy, never.

Some ridiculous and restrictive legislation has been introduced by this government and I feel that this bill is a classic example of the type of legislation that is drafted from time to time in a blundering, unthinking fashion. Mr. Speaker, I am having this bill framed, to hang it in my office as an example of how this government serves Canadians, especially our senior citizens.

Has the Secretary of State really addressed himself to the effect that this bill will have on other magazines—magazines such as MD of Canada? What does this bill impose upon that and other professional magazines? Let us just deal with MD of Canada. This is a controlled-circulation magazine without an assured subscription revenue. Paid circulation magazines might have the alternative of sending non-Canadian editions into Canada for sale to readers. MD of Canada does not have that choice, yet it is affected by this bill. Its only source of revenue is advertising. If MD of Canada, which is an important medical publication that has been sent to physicians in this country for more than 15 years, ceases to publish in Canada as a result of Bill C-58, the MD concept behind this magazine, the purpose and thrust of it, will be lost and will not be replaced. I say that the Secretary of State has not addressed himself to this concern, Mr. Speaker. He probably has never heard of the magazine.

MD of Canada is not a Canadian edition of a parent magazine; it is neither a split-run edition nor the result of overflow circulation of a parent magazine. It is a fully integrated Canadian medical publication whose editorial content is based upon the MD concept. MD of Canada has always purchased all of its mechanical production from Canadian suppliers, typesetting, printing and labelling, mailing—more revenues for the Post Office—and yet what concern, what mention has been made of it by the Secretary of State and those who would support Bill C-58?

By definition, MD of Canada is a magazine of medical culture and of cultural medicine. It carries a completely Canadian medical news section. It prepares original features which, when researched, appear along with Canadian medical news in MD, the medical news magazine in the U.S.A., MD en Espanol and MD Pacific. This magazine reworks editorial material prepared internationally before it appears in MD of Canada. It publishes an English edition and a combined English-French edition at no subscription fee; the advertisers pay for this fine magazine.

Physician readers identify strongly with MD of Canada for a variety of reasons, not the least of which is the fact that the magazine is researched, written and edited for them. Another reason is that MD of Canada is always responsive to the requests of its readers. Thousands of reprints of essays which have appeared in the magazine have been distributed to physicians who requested them, free of charge, yet the Secretary of State would have the magazine expunged from the Canadian market.

The contents of MD of Canada are not the same as any other edition of MD, the U.S. edition, the Latin American edition or the edition for the Far East. There is no simultaneous publication of contents in any of the four magazines; all items published in this magazine are especially scheduled and edited for that edition. The magazine plays an important role by serving a numerically small but professional, highly dedicated and important segment of the population and responds to the full range of physicians' interests. Surely it should have imposed upon it this silly, indeed this ridiculous, little bill, C-58.

In the busy, nay, hectic life of a member of parliament, I find that one of my few moments of rest and repose is on the occasion when nature makes certain normal demands upon the nether regions of the digestive tract. It is at those times that I digest the Digest and pause and reflect upon the multitudinous follies of the Secretary of State. Surely this government is not—indeed it must not—denying me and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford) and thousands like us the former condition while aggravating the latter. Mr. Speaker, I unequivocally reject the bill and the premise of the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to have the floor on Bill C-58 because, in my opinion, it is a bill that could have very serious implications for Canadian publications, if passed unchanged.

The bill attacks a magazine that I have been reading for numerous years. I know little about Time but I am very familiar with Reader's Digest. I feel it is a magazine that is within everyone's reach and that meets very well the requirements of readers, be they English or French Canadians.

● (1540)

Where the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) announced his intention to amend section 19 of the Income Tax Act, I thought it would be a good thing to seek the opinion of my constituents to know what they thought of the bill and the possibility of having Reader's Digest cease publishing, because I knew that it was being read by a great many persons.

As a result, I received several replies to the letters that I had sent out. Several of my constituents read the magazine, and 36 per cent replied that they were in favour of it, and consequently against Bill C-58. Only one letter was in favour of Bill C-58, and I realized that the person concerned was ill-informed, since she believed that Reader's Digest did not pay any taxes to the Canadian Government or that of Quebec. This is completely false, Reader's Digest and Time or any other magazine must pay their taxes.

Mr. Speaker, among the letters which I received, I would like to quote a few to the House. The first comes from La Reine, Abitibi:

> Having read the documents which you sent me, I feel that we must keep our magazine even if we have to pay something.
> I have based my opinion on three points:
>
> Contribution of Reader's Digest to the Canadian economy.
>
> Number of jobs created by the magazine.
> And finally Reader's Digest has served to unite the Canadian people.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that those are very important facts which sum up quite well the word of Reader's Digest.

From another letter from La Sarre, I quote:

> Needless to say that like most French Canadians, I presume, I would be very unhappy to witness the demise of this monthly magazine of high literary, curtural and moral quality. I just cannot believe there are no other means to favour Canadian publications. In any trade, competition usually serves to improve service and quality and has always been an excellent incentive.

There is another very interesting thought and much to the point.

In another letter coming, this time, from Amos, I read the following comment:

Really, I deplore this gesture on the part of our governments, because this magazine is very well written, in a clean language. Why would we deprive ourselves of good reading suitable to all ages? Does the government prefer dirty magazines filled with photos of the same quality, which make us feel ashamed only by looking at them on newstands.

Now, this person from Amos is concerned because of the possible disappearance of a magazine like Reader's Digest which features articles that can be put in the hands of almost any member of the family, while other Canadian magazines which make us ashamed just by looking at them on the newsstands are allowed to be published. The disappearance of an honest and well written magazine worries those people.

In another letter coming from a Mont-Brun resident, I find another version, another interesting viewpoint:

Here is what I think. Reader's Digest is perhaps the only magazine giving almost complete information on sensible issues. Its articles are not solely devoted to murder, rape, violence, sex, etc., and many other wrong food for the mind. As far as we are concerned, we have been receiving the magazine for 22 years. The children read it and we are not worried about leaving that publication in their hands. I know the time spent reading it is not lost.

Mr. Speaker, that is the general tone of the letters I received from my constituents in favour of the continued existence of Reader's Digest and against Bill C-58. Indeed, it is an interesting publication that can be read by all members of the family. In many families, the young people find interesting articles and material that help them in their studies. As we know, many of them cannot afford more expensive books. Mr. Speaker, this again is something we must preserve because this publication is useful to both Canadian families and students.

A number of the letters I have received mention that the articles in this publication are so interesting that current issues of Reader's Digest are kept for reference, along with past issues which may date back many years.

Well, Mr. Speaker, not only because of the adverse reaction I have received from my constituents, but also for personal reasons, I am against Bill C-58 which I feel would not benefit Canadian publications in any way, but would only serve to jeopardize the cases of a couple of publications which have received, as has been fully demonstrated, the seal of approval from their Canadian readership.

With regard to the figures which have been quoted, I think that we must keep in mind what they mean in terms of the Canadian economy. Let us consider what the contribution of a publication such Reader's Digest is. An annual turnover of $30 million—in Canada, not the United States—90 cents out of every revenue dollar being spent in Canada, with a capital investment of $8 million. Land: $557,000; buildings: $2,729,000; and over $4.5 million in machinery and equipment.

We know also that nearly 500 employees in Canada are working at publishing Reader's Digest. That magazine patronizes mostly Canadian suppliers, even if some materials or services could be imported from elsewhere more cheaply.

Such an input in the Canadian economy is therefore significant. Perhaps we could find in Canada, if we took trouble to analyse the financial assets of every magazine, some Canadian corporations which are more foreign than Reader's Digest is.

As for the contribution to Canadian culture, first of all, the choice, editing or writing of the full content of every issue is done in Canada, whether in English or French. Second, about 80 writers, artists and graphists are working at the preparation of magazines and books published by Reader's Digest. We know that Reader's Digest does not produce only a monthly magazine, it markets and has marketed a variety of quite interesting, quite instructive and quite well prepared books. And those 80 writers, artists and graphists put out those magazines and books.

Furthermore, 80-odd free-lance writers work for Reader's Digest and some 140 Canadian authors saw their articles published in Canadian magazines since 1960 and for some it was the first time a magazine published their work. That too is important.

Mr. Speaker, we know that articles written in Canada by Canadian authors were published in Reader's Digest magazines in other countries of the world, and that allowed articles of Canadian origin to be translated into 13 languages and be exported, if I may put it that way, all over the world.

For Canadian authors that too is very significant indeed. So, I think that wanting to deprive Canadian readers, wanting to deprive Canadian authors and workers of a very lucrative source of income, and an equally very eloquent means of expression, goes against the whole Canadian interest.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I must say that Reader's Digest—the one I know best of the two magazines involved in that legislation—is very well presented. Again I repeat that it may be put into the hands of all members of the family. With respect to other Canadian publications, I perused a few of them to realize that in a magazine containing barely some twenty pages I found at least 15 pictures of 40-ouncers alongside a glass with ice praising the merits of alcohol coming from English distilleries or imported wines from France, Italy or elsewhere.

Mr. Speaker, considering the quality of a magazine like that I think one must oppose Bill C-58, and allow magazines which proved themselves to continue to exist and serve the Canadian reader.

[English]

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I was in this House the day the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) brought in this bill to rescind section 19(2) of the Income Tax Act. Unfortunately, obligations of extreme urgency in Vancouver prevented me from being here to speak earlier. I feel very strongly about the publishing business in Canada since I am a writer and have been involved in it throughout my whole career.

It is a comparatively small industry. It is not strong, except for the newspapers, Maclean-Hunter, publisher of two majors general interest magazines and numerous trade magazines and a book publisher who I do not think cares for anyone outside of Toronto, certainly not outside the Ontario region. I have experienced this personally. I do not see why members opposite feel it is essential, in this important debate, to attack the Secretary of State personally or his party. This is not a question of personalities or of politics. It is a matter of general public interest, of public concern. The Secretary of State may have misinterpreted the powerful vocal minority out of Toronto as public opinion. That group controls the media and is mistakenly believed to be the voice of Canada. They have tried to dictate public interest to achieve action that will enhance their vested interests, at the cost of two strong and valuable publications. Members on this side, members opposite, and all Canadians in other words, have misinterpreted public opinion because of that vocal minority. Too many Canadians misinterpret this as the voice of Canada. Actually, it is the opinion of a few people who control publishing in this country.

Newspaper publishing in Canada is controlled by three major publishers—FP Publications, Southam, and Lord Thomson who has taken to himself a British title. The publishing of books in Canada seems to be controlled by one or two people who started the organization called Committee for an Independent Canada which has been distorted into a anti-American clarion in this country. It is an embarrassment to me because I do not hate my neighbour who was my friend.

I regret that the Secretary of State is carrying this bill through despite what is really public opinion, the opinion of the people. There are those who claim, in this House, that we who are opposed to Bill C-58 are reacting to "one of the most powerful lobbies" in Canadian parliamentary history. I maintain, conversely, that this bill is here because of a small elitist voice, albeit a very powerful group with great influence—talented—but who would dictate culture for all Canadians out of the east.

An hon. Member: The Secretary of State.

Mrs. Holt: It is not the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State was hearing a voice that is very loud in eastern Canada. We do not hear it as well in the west. In fact, we ignore it in the west because the only national news that many of us get is in Time magazine; in other words, objective reporting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: Toronto in no way reflects the public interest, but the private vested interest of a small group. They are an impressive group that has done good things for Canada. Maclean-Hunter had the money some years ago to put out a news magazine. Why didn't they? I was very much involved in a magazine which started out of Montreal, called Canada Month. We worked very hard. We donated our material. I got writers from across Canada. I even found advertisers to try to keep the magazine alive. But it died. The massive advertising that Maclean's, Chatelaine, the newspaper could have shared did not go to Canada Month, a good young magazine, because the advertisers—in a free enterprise country—chose strong, established vehicles through which to sell their product.

There are two major newspapers in Vancouver. There were three, but the monopoly shared the pot and one was killed. We learned very early in Vancouver that in order to build a new newspaper—and I take it this applies to any city in Canada—you have to be prepared to spend $25 million or more, without return, before becoming viable and getting fully supportive advertising revenue.

Of the vast amount of mail I received, only four letters out of approximately 800 to 1,000—I never counted them—were opposed to the bill. It is apparent that some people think this is a lobby being carried on by the magazines. It is a lobby by Canada's citizens. I must admit it was not until Reader's Digest and Time told what it meant in simple terms that the public was aware of the meaning of Bill C-58 and what could happen to two very popular publications. They responded. However, I was receiving letters before that.

I read the reports of the Gallup poll released in January. Less than 1 per cent of the Canadian public wants Reader's Digest to lose equality with other magazines in this country. Reader's Digest and Time have been landed immigrants in Canada for 31 years. It is rather strange that after that period the rules of the game are being changed. It is similar to the situation of an immigrant in this country who has developed some roots here, built a home and felt secure as a Canadian, suddenly being told he cannot live here under the same terms.

Reader's Digest, and Time to a lesser degree, are the only vehicles for Canadian subjects and Canadian writers to be aired internationally. This gives Canadian writers a chance of a job in an extremely small market. In other words, it is not as easy for Canadians in the publications and allied trades to find a job with Newsweek, U.S. News, World Report or other American magazines. If you are an established writer, you might very well find work. It has not been a problem for me in recent years. However, for young people just starting out, they get their first chance from magazines like Reader's Digest.

There are those who compare Reader's Digest with other American magazines like Playboy, which does not have any Canadian content—unless there was one Canadian girl who posed for the centrefold. Those who compare Reader's Digest with Playboy, Newsweek, U.S. News, World Report and all the others sent here from outside forget that those publications did not offer to set up business in Canada, to provide jobs for Canadian writers, or to recognize Canadian subjects as significant enough for their attention. Reader's Digest and Time did come here; they did provide jobs, set up plants and send stories by Canadians, on Canadian subjects, around the world. Despite what anyone says, Reader's Digest does not have a tax privilege. It is on the same footing as other publications. In a free enterprise country, the advertiser should have the right of choice. I looked at one issue of Maclean's magazine. It had about 70 per cent advertising content, this means they are pretty fat and sassy; they do not need any more.

If anyone thinks that advertising lost to Reader's Digest and Time will go to start other magazines, they are wrong. It will go to these already overstuffed magazines and newspapers. While I was grateful that the newspapers were rich because they could pay me a good salary, they are not suffering. In addition to the newspapers, the advertising will go to television and radio. On some television and radio stations which have top-flight commentators you cannot even buy time.

● (1600)

The story about dumping is rather an interesting one. Why do we not look at the material which is dumped by way of so-called syndicated material in newspapers—comics, Marmaduke, Ann Landers, and all the rest. It is very cheap to buy these syndicated columns. It is dumping. Despite this, there are thoughtful journalists and some publishers I know who have stated strongly that these two healthy magazines should stay in the country in order that the rest of the magazine industry shall stay strong. It is like bringing in a great department store in the middle of a dying business neighbourhood; it strengthens the whole neighbourhood. The day we build only on the weak and destroy the strong, whether it is people or whether it is the magazine industry, is the day we are doomed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: I do not hear many Liberals applaud.

Mrs. Holt: What difference does it make whether it is Liberal or Conservative? Aren't we all here as members of parliament?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: As a matter of fact, I am very tired of this whole concept that speech here is simply a matter of toeing a line. If the only reason you are talking against this bill is because of your politics, then shame on you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: You should be talking because you care; because you care about the right of the people of Canada to have freedom to read what they want, to advertise where they want.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: I, personally, do not want all-Canadian content. I don't want to see this country one in which we are narrow and uneducated to what is happening in the rest of the world. I am very grateful for the five pages of Canadian news in Time and the many human, well researched features in Reader's Digest drawn from all parts of Canada. We live on the other side of the mountains, and I believe that if the people from central Canada lived there they would understand what I mean. We don't hear in depth about Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island or Manitoba. We hear a great deal about Ontario and Quebec. All the news across this great country, we do not hear it except in the very condensed, tight, objective reporting that comes to us in Time. One column in Time is worth a whole page of what is called depth reporting in most newspapers. I am not going to name names. In either case I know, as a journalist, that quantity isn't always quality, nor is it depth reporting.

An hon. Member: Then just sit down.

Mrs. Holt: Oh, you're going to get it! You people have been talking for a long time. I know you did a great deal of talking when I was away—out of necessity.

I love Canada very deeply and I consider myself a patriot. I am not a narrow nationalist, though. I will quote someone who wrote better than I do, because his work survived for the century.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Holt: Speaking culturally. Aldington said, "Nationalism is a silly cock crowing on its own dunghill." Or to quote Einstein, he described it as an infantile disease. Let us hope, like the measles of the world, this will just go away.

But let me talk about money going to Reader's Digest and Time, and the threat to the life of the magazine industry. Since this tax equality—I call it tax equality because it isn't a tax benefit; there is no special tax benefit given to these magazines—came in, 88 new Canadian magazines have been born and are flourishing with a circulation of over 10,000 each. They have been established in the last ten years. Seventy of them are in English and 18 in French. They have 209 million circulation annually.

The magazine industry throughout the world is a struggling industry. Even John Bull, the great British magazine, died. Look died in the United States. Life died. Why should we, in Canada, contribute to the death of our strong magazines?

Reader's Digest offers opportunities to young writers who will never get a chance to write for a great magazine or get international exposure. Those who write for it do get international exposure. Digest receives 6,000 manuscripts a year. They do not return a manuscript without reading it and giving advice to the writer. There are two readers for every manuscript. Thus, they have nurtured young Canadian writers. This is a great public service to one profession in this country.

I can read off this list of magazines which have come into being since tax equality with other Canadian magazines was given to Reader's Digest and Time ten years ago. It is propaganda to say that the industry has been killed. It is misinformation which is bandied about that the two magazines, Time and Digest, cream off advertising money which is taking the place of advertising which would be placed in Canadian magazines. People who have the statistics have already admitted this, so I don't need to repeat it other than to say that the information is simply not true and that I can—if necessary—put the statistics on record.

As for the corporate behaviour of the two magazines, I think it has been excellent. I think they have set a high standard. Maybe it is too pure for the swingers in this country, but I feel very strongly that these two magazines have been good corporate citizens; they have followed every guideline of corporate conduct set out by the federal government. In the simplest terms, I would say that Digest has done this by having more than 30 per cent of its shares owned by Canadians. Four out of five of its directors are Canadians. What is most important to me is its full-time Canadian staff numbering 455 people.

I worked with the associate editor, Charles Smith, one of the best editors of any magazine anywhere, in my opinion; and Charles Smith is a Canadian. Reader's Digest has already lost one editor because of the job insecurity created by this bill. These Canadians are suffering great trepidation over this whole debate. They do not know whether they are going to have a job when this is done. Reader's Digest owns its own presses in Montreal and has done so since 1948. It is now investing $3 million in new printing equipment. Incidentally, in first-class mail revenue alone, Canada will lose $3 million from Digest's operation. It has an editorial, art and production staff of 76 people. In a comparatively small industry, as it is in this country, that number is a good size.

Every word which appears in the French and English issues of Digest is edited by Canadians. Articles about Canadian go out from here to 26 international editions, in 13 languages, with a potential readership of over 105 million. I can tell hon. members that long before I came to this place, I worked for them; I made a bit of a living out of writing, and Reader's Digest was one market I occasionally used. One story I wrote is one about a Canadian subject, a Canadian man, a western man who this month was named a Good Citizen of British Columbia for 1975 by the Native Sons. He is Ben Wosk, an immigrant who came here and helped to build a great corner of this country. He performed many humanitarian acts. Now he is rich enough to be called a great philanthropist—once he was a humanitarian. In either case, that story has now been printed in three countries, Canada, Holland and Japan.

There was one about Canadian leadership in prison reform started in 1960. The subject, the prison reformer, was Allen J. MacLeod, Q.C. commissioner of Canadian penitentiaries from 1960 to 1969—a non-political person. This story is published in at least two countries this year—Canada and France. The story on Ralph Bunche by Lester Pearson, a great writer and statesman, has been circulated throughout the world. "A Whale for the Killing", by Farley Mowat, has been printed in about 15 countries. Only "One Earth", by Noel F. Bush, has as many printings. These are only a few of the opportunities for Canadians and Canadian subjects. Lester Person's "Golden Opportunity" of August, 1963, was printed in the U.S. and French Canadian editions. That would have gone around the world, I am sure, because of its greatness, except for the fact that there was some contractual limitation.

Time and Reader's Digest are very important to westerners. We do not feel out there that Maclean's, that alleged national magazine, is truly national. Nor do we feel that Maclean-Hunter Publishing, which is the national publishing company that seems to be giving strong support to this bill, is serving the whole country. It is serving the country in a token way. They deign to give one page to British Columbia. Sometimes they include accounts of westerners in what we call their wrap-up news or features. On occasion they even have one or two British Columbians as special subjects for their magazines.

Maclean's magazine seems to be overly saturated with advertising. If this company had an obligation to this country, it would cut back on editorial advertising to the 35 to 40 per cent limit Reader's Digest has imposed on itself. Also, I wish Maclean's, the "national magazine", could be a little more honest and objective in its reporting. I suggest that its editorials are slanted. Many of us here, I'm sure, would prefer honest and objective reporting. I know they will probably be annoyed at me and I will never get a chance to write for Maclean's magazine again, but that is fine.

An hon. Member: I will see to it.

Mrs. Holt: You are going to see to it; that is fine. As members of parliament—and I do not care whether you sit over there or over here—you know as well as I do that the whole system of parliament has been deliberately held in disrepute. No one knows better than the people in Toronto how parliament works, because they are closer to it. Has anyone ever really seen an objective report in that national magazine about this job, or how hard and conscientiously members of parliament work, or even what they do?

I do not see this matter as a partisan thing at all. I wrote a letter to Charles Smith, who I knew before I came here, a senior Digest editor, a Canadian and a very good man, asking him about Canadian content. I like a balance of content or a mixed content. I like to know what is happening all over the world. Reader's Digest contains general interest articles on issues that affect us all. Many of them are of universal interest. These articles do not have to be simply Canadian or relate to Toronto or Montreal. Their accuracy in recording universal human issues, touching subjects of interest to people of many parts of this world, is the reason for Digest's success. This is the type of thing we should all be interested in, because we are the people they write about.

I wrote and asked Charles Smith last fall about Canadian content—since it seems to be important—and he wrote back suggesting I look at the October current issue, then, of the United States and Canadian editions of Reader's Digest. I may say that there is quite a difference, and Mr. Smith admitted that. He stated that our edition contained eight Canadian stories, and he pointed out that four were written by women. That was just to make me feel good, I think. Out of eight Canadian stories there were four written by women. These women were Michele Landsberg, June Callwood, Carolyn Katariya and Lois Neely.

Mr. Smith also pointed out that additional Canadian information had been inserted in articles "Natural Childbirth Comes of Age," "A Breath of Hope for Asthmatic Youngsters," and "How to Make Houseplants Behave." I suppose the latter explains how much Canadians love their houseplants and can make them grow better. I guess that was what he meant by that injection. He pointed out that there were pure American interest subjects that were pitched out, as he said, including "Labor Drives for a Veto-Proof Congress," and Barry Goldwater's "Second Wind," and others. These U.S. interest articles did not get into the Canadian issue, whereas the universal ones did.

The Institute of Canadian Advertising has suggested that we should note that the news and entertainment media are to a large degree international in scope. I cannot understand the great striving for cultural nationalism, especially in a world where we have satellite communication and we are going to the moon, and where we have international conflicts and international co-operation. Why in the cultural field must we keep ourselves in a corner and cut back on our own associations with the rest of society?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Holt: I ask those questions because you are making this a partisan thing. I am not filibustering, but I do want members to know how I feel about this. I want people here to know that I wish somehow this situation had not occurred; that this bill had not been introduced. Now that it has occurred, I must say I have still a great respect for the parliamentary committee system because it is less partisan than this place. We work on the rules, the laws and the regulations of this country, and we serve our country best through our committees.

I am opposed to this bill and I have made no secret about it. Since it is inevitable that it will go to the committee, I will vote for it on second reading and then do everything in my power—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Holt: I am not going to be a party to any filibuster, but if anything has turned me against this whole thing it is the fact that hon. members opposite have made it such a partisan thing. I am going to join the committee today, and when we study this bill I hope we will together do our best to change it, kill it or do whatever is necessary in committee. I respect the committees of parliament but I do not respect what has happened in this House on many issues.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Holt: This is not the worst; this is one of the minor ones. What worries me most about the situation is that one of the weak parties in this House—so I do not worry too much—has made this into an anti-American thing. They think this is a good way to get at the Americans. Let me repeat what I have heard said; "If we little budgies go after the great American eagle, we are in trouble because she," or he, "can turn"—whichever you want; there is no sexist selectivity in that regard.

This is a time when we are seeing our free democracy being gradually eroded. We are becoming more and more isolated in our freedom. We have seen South Viet Nam go to the communists, and I am sure we will soon see South Korea follow. The Arab states could be picked off just like Czechoslovakia by the Russians. Many European countries and African states have been lost, to totalitarianism. Therefore, we stand alone in our freedom with the United States on this continent.

In conclusion, let me quote from a greater writer and a greater contributor to international literature than myself. That is a man named Shakespeare. In repeating this quotation I have in mind our friends to the south. Shakespeare wrote:

Those friends thou hast, and their adoption tried,
Grapple them to thy soul with hoops of steel—

With those words, I hope we can get on with the work of this House.

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate today. At the outset, let me say I am of the opinion that this bill must properly be considered in two parts. Firstly, we have before us the provisions pertaining to television. Allow me to say a few brief words on that subject. The government's plan to disallow advertising write-offs for television when that advertising is shown on American station aimed at Canadians is one that should and must be applauded.

A limited number of Canadian advertising dollars are allotted for television, and to see many of those dollars going to United States border stations in preference to our own Canadian stations has been and is cause for concern. Television stations in southern Ontario, for example, have been adversely affected by the loss of potential advertising revenues for many years due to the unchecked continuance of this most undesirable practice. There is no guarantee, of course, that Canadian advertisers will cease advertising on American stations. Let us hope that it will become and will remain unprofitable for them to do so. I must give the government credit for attempting to adopt a positive approach with respect to this aspect of the legislation. One only wishes the Secretary of State had acted sooner and with more vigour in this regard.

The same positive approach is not evident in the other provisions of this bill; that is, those relating to the tax exemptions now enjoyed by Time and Reader's Digest. Once again, the government has chosen to tackle a serious problem in a negative manner instead of offering positive assistance to the Canadian publishing industry, particularly to the smaller periodical and book publishers who really need it. The government has, regrettably, chosen to take a backward step and remove privileges from two established magazines, one of which, Reader's Digest, has contributed much to the Canadian way of life, and if left to its own devices would surely continue to contribute in a worth-while and responsible manner.

The report of the Royal Commission on Publications emphasized that in an area as vital and sensitive as that of the press, whatever is done should be positive rather than negative, with the goal the promotion of the Canadian periodical, not the suppression of the foreign. We are discussing here solely an amendment to the Income Tax Act. According to a survey of advertising executives in an objective survey conducted, as other hon. members have mentioned, by Canadian Facts Inc., it was determined that the Canadian publishing industry will not benefit substantially from the removal of tax advantages for advertising in Time and Reader's Digest. Advertisers and their agencies explain that they advertise in search of an audience, not to support a magazine industry. Most of the money diverted from Time and Reader's Digest would likely go to newspapers, radio and television, they say. A magazine would only receive advertising dollars if and when it could deliver a substantial readership.

In fact, it is estimated that at most only 25 per cent of the revenue taken away from these two publications will find its way into other Canadian periodicals. Of this amount, more than half—or closer to 60 per cent—will go to one publication chain, Maclean-Hunter, which can well exist and prosper as it is now, without it. Indeed, half the advertising revenue in Canada would be controlled by Maclean-Hunter—not exactly a healthy situation in an industry that can only prosper in an atmosphere of free enterprise and competition.

If the purpose of this bill is for the most part to provide unnecessary assistance to one already established and indeed dominant publication chain, then one could reasonably argue that the bill is to be a successful one. If the change in the law regarding tax amendments is meant to assist the little magazines, those which are struggling to eke out a mere existence, then it is destined to be a dismal failure. The minister has admitted that the smaller, special interest magazines constitute the real problem area. Why, then, does the minister not bring forth legislation that would be of some benefit to them; for they will certainly receive an insignificant amount of dividend from the provisions of this bill, certainly not enough to justify the unfair treatment the government is imposing upon Reader's Digest which for many years has been one of our finest and most respected corporate citizens. Reader's Digest has contributed much to Canada during the years it has been resident here. It is much to its credit that it will attempt to keep its Canadian operation intact despite the undue hardship that is now being thrust upon it by the terms of this bill.

Every word of the Reader's Digest editorial material is edited in Canada by Canadians. The Canadian content of the magazine is about 25 per cent, and rising. This, admittedly, is not an overly imposing figure, but when it is taken into consideration that this material can reach the world's largest periodical audience of some 100 million readers in 13 languages, located in some 100 nations, it can surely be understood that its contribution to the over-all cause of Canadian culture is a positive one. Almost 500 Canadians—496, to be exact—are directly employed with Reader's Digest. Over 80 of these are employed in the editorial, graphic arts and illustrative side of the operation, while over 1,000 are indirectly employed through its suppliers. Its operations put more than $11 million into the Canadian economy each year.

Reader's Digest, as well, has done some Canadianizing in recent years. Since 1968 it has sold 32.6 per cent of its shares publicly in Canada and is vigorously striving for a greater proportion of Canadian ownership year by year. The Digest does approximately $31 million worth of business annually in Canada and spends at least 90 per cent of each dollar in this country. It has published the work of more than 150 appreciative Canadian writers since 1960, many of whom were appearing in print for the first time. This popular magazine is now faced with a potential loss of two-thirds of its advertising revenue.

If, in spite of their good efforts to continue, the Canadian edition of Digest is forced to close down operations, the United States edition will be all that is available to Canadians. This will neither be an effective nor a suitable substitute. French Canadians will be deprived of an edition in their own language, edited by French Canadians, while English Canadians will lose an edition containing some high-quality Canadian content, which—I make this point again—is selected and edited by Canadian editors.

The government has often been brought to task for its failure to respond to the wishes of the Canadian public. On this account it is painfully obvious that this criticism is valid. A Gallup poll released on January 25 showed that less than 1 per cent of the Canadian public wanted Reader's Digest to lose its present position in Canada. I believe it is time for the Canadian government to float down from the clouds and realize that because Time and Reader's Digest make up such a hefty proportion of the Canadian consumer magazine industry, the whole medium would become considerably less attractive if they were to disappear.

It would be far less economical for advertisers to produce ads for the smaller industry. Terminating the exemption as is now suggested could discriminate against Canadian agencies. Both Time and Reader's Digest depend heavily on advertising from large international companies. If the Canadian editions were to be discontinued, these firms could still advertise in the magazines from their U.S. parents. Since the two magazines would still circulate in Canada, the advertising would spill over to the benefit of Canadian subsidiaries. The U.S. parent would be able to deduct the expense for tax purposes, whereas Canadian firms would not be able to do this. Consequently, foreign-owned companies would benefit from the new advertising rules, thus placing many of their Canadian competitors at a distinct disadvantage.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of this House that this legislation pertaining to Time and Reader's Digest is a foolish, misguided and immature attempts at cultural nationalism. What it really amounts to is anti-Americanism more than Canadian nationalism and, even worse, anti-Americanism at the expense of the rights of Canadians. Recent guidelines announced by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford) that would allow Time and Reader's Digest a continuance of the tax exemption can only be viewed as an unwarranted and unnecessary use of the power of censorship.

There are many more avenues the government could well travel that would be of much more direct and useful assistance to the Canadian magazine industry than the course upon which it has now embarked. What is required is positive leadership: leadership that would first of all undertake the initiation of data collection in order that publications policy can be formulated on a rational basis as opposed to the "groping blindly in the dark" approach that is so evident from examination of this particular piece of legislation.

Why does Statistics Canada, for example, not collect and collate data related to the publishing field? Perhaps, had the government sufficient information on just what it was becoming involved in, and perhaps were it more aware of the many negative consequences that may result if this legislation is passed, we might not now be considering certain aspects of this bill. Some of the more acute problem areas within the publications industry are readily identified. One is the distribution system wherein 13 of the 14 national magazine distribution firms are American owned and, as such, Canadian newsstands are inundated with overflow American copy. Walk into any drugstore or smoke shop and examine the magazine racks. With the exception of two or three popular Maclean-Hunter publications such as Maclean's and Chatelaine, precious few, if any, Canadian periodicals will be found against the thickly-stacked rows of American publications, most of them of an extremely low literary calibre, such as movie and other scandal magazines.

● (1630)

If one turns one's attention to the paperback section of novels, one will again find an almost exclusive American selection of generally low calibre. At least the situation in speciality book stores is somewhat of an improvement. The quality of some American issues is of a somewhat higher calibre, and European and other foreign publications can usually be found as well. Canadian books and magazines are displayed also, but generally in fewer quantities and with little promotion or fanfare.

I am not for one minute suggesting that American and other foreign publications should be prevented from coming into Canada. What I am saying is that a positive stimulus should be introduced to encourage the display, promotion and sale of Canadian books, periodicals and magazines. Why does the government not aid in the organization of a national distribution company in order to ensure the promotion and circulation of Canadian publications? Why is a grant program not introduced that would recognize the peculiar needs of this sensitive industry? Why is more advertising space not purchased in small, speciality periodicals, by the federal government and its agencies? Why cannot the Canada Council's present book purchase program be expanded to include Canadian magazine subscriptions for public and school libraries? Madam Speaker, these questions are crying for answers. Legislation introduced to fill any one of these needs would certainly create a more positive impact on the over-all well-being of the Canadian magazine industry that the misguided provisions of this bill could possibly hope to achieve.

I have one further recommendation to make; one recommendation that I hope the government will see fit to consider. It has to do with the very much to be desired improvement of the postal system today; but I will not linger on that point at this time. I cannot be accused, Madam Speaker, of not offering anything in the way of alternatives to the government. There exists an unlimited number of positive avenues that the government could well choose to travel. Instead, this government and in particular this minister have chosen to negate many of the worth-while contributions of the Canadian edition of Reader's Digest and the actual advertising advantages of Time Canada in favour of the interests of one particular pressure group.

This legislation will not lighten the load of those who are heavily burdened, the small and struggling magazine and book companies, the dedicated and little published writers who desperately seek avenues of expression for their work. This legislation, Madam Speaker, is another step in the abrogation of the rights of Canadians. It is unfortunate that this bill has been divided into two separate entities, for while I sympathize with the provisions relating to advertising on foreign television, I cannot and will not support the loss of the tax exemption for advertising in Time and Reader's Digest.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, since the start of this issue—it has been around since I became a parliamentarian in 1968, and before—I must admit that I have had some grave reservations in connection with our particular approach to Time and Reader's Digest. I have already mentioned my reservations publicly. I must admit that subsequent to my initial reservations I looked into the question more thoroughly than I had a chance to do in the earlier stages, and the background work that I did led me to the conclusion even more firmly that my initial reaction was right. I believe that the bill before us is founded upon very good motivation, namely, a desire to help the Canadian magazine and periodicals industry. I subscribe to anything we could do that would be productive toward that end.

However, I am not one who is in favour of the position that we would adopt which appears to be doing something that I do not think it will achieve and that has some real beneficial result to the Canadian magazine industry. I do not think any loss of revenue that would occur to Reader's Digest, Time and others would be directed to Canadian publications, and I feel that way quite strongly. I am not prepared to see what I think are perfectly good institutions in this country which may have originated in another country, go down the drain for the sake of some hypothetical principle which in my view will not serve any useful function toward the advancement of Canadian industry or the enlightenment and well-being of Canadians.

So, basically, I have grave reservations. I am prepared, because of my confidence in the over-all committee system of our parliament, to see the bill go to committee. I hope that I will have the opportunity of being a member of that committee, because I intend to do everything within my power to propose amendments to this legislation so it will not have the adverse effects that I fear will occur if the bill goes forward in its present form.

I would like to talk about two or three aspects of this problem. One is in relation to two magazines that I have not heard too much about. One is Modern Medicine and the other is MD of Canada. Both magazines relate to the medical profession. They are affected by the legislation before us in a way that is totally unacceptable to me. It seems to me that people in the medical profession have the right to information, from whatever source it may come, which would enlighten them and increase their skill and knowledge of the profession. We should encourage that to the maximum extent. I do not think we need some kind of cultural nationalism which would insulate Canadians against the benefits and technological changes and advances, in terms of medical research and practice, that take place around the world. I believe that one of the provisions of this act would very adversely affect these two magazines. I gather that there may even be more magazines affected, but I have only been acquainted with the two I have mentioned. I do not think it is in the national interest, in the interest of the profession or of Canadians generally to see these magazines adversely affected in this way.

The other aspect that I wish to speak about concerns Reader's Digest. I know that many hon. members have spoken about Reader's Digest in connection with this bill. I feel more strongly about the legislation in relation to that publication than I do in relation to Time magazine, because I think they present different problems. Reader's Digest is unique in the sense that it is primarily concerned with the republication of articles that appear around the world. Its very function is the condensation of articles of interest and general enlightenment to people anywhere, and I think the magazine does an excellent job in this respect. But what is important is that I do not think the magazine can meet one of the provisions in the bill, that is, the provision which speaks about being substantially the same as some other publication or periodical that has been published, in order to comply with this legislation.

● (1640)

In this respect, I think there is a great deal of confusion. I have a vague feeling that many members of parliament think that the provision which deals with "substantially the same as" another publication means that a certain issue of Reader's Digest, Canada, must relate to a certain issue of Reader's Digest, U.S.A., or whatever other part of the world it may be, and if they are not substantially the same for that particular edition, they are substantially different and therefore they could get around this particular provision. In my view, that is not the case because the "substantially the same as "provision, in effect, means substantially the same as any other article published in a multiplicity of magazines, newspapers or periodicals throughout the world. This means that one could take 50 articles out of the December issue of Reader's Digest and relate them to 50 other articles in 50 different publications—not by Reader's Digest—anywhere in the world, and one would have to conclude, under this legislation, that in fact Reader's Digest, Canada, is producing a periodical which is substantially the same as something published elsewhere. In my view, that is an absolute absurdity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: It has been argued by some—with or without sufficient knowledge, I do not know—that this is not the intent of the legislation. If that is the case, then we should change the legislation to say what we mean and mean what we say, because anyone who knows anything about the British system of justice knows one simple point: the law stands or falls on its own feet and the disposition of the minister or of parliament itself means nothing in terms of the application of the law.

The law must be interpreted by its own words and in no other way. That means the wording of this particular clause of the bill is couched in such a way that in my view no court would have any choice in the matter but to conclude as I have concluded, that "substantially the same as" refers not to an individual publication but to a multiplicity of publications at any point in time. I say that that is not acceptable.

In the same way, a medical journal or any number of other journals could also be caught. Are we in effect saying that we, the Canadian people, have access to all the scientific knowledge in that area? Is it not appropriate that we allow Canadian magazines and publications to reprint articles from Russia which would be of scientific value to our doctors, or from Germany, Britain, the United States or elsewhere? If someone published a publication which was a compendium of all the excellent articles which would be useful to those in the field of medicine, effectively it would be ruled that the edition which contained those articles was in fact substantially the same as the multiplicity of articles which had appeared anywhere in this country or anywhere in the world. I think that is a bad clause and it must be amended.

An hon. Member: Or done away with.

Mr. Cafik: Or done away with if it cannot be amended in order to correct it. Let us for a moment look specifically at another aspect of the Reader's Digest question. I think this aspect refers more specifically to Reader's Digest itself. I hold no brief for Reader's Digest as a corporation per se, except for one thing: I think it has been a good corporate citizen of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: I do not think there is any doubt about that, and surely we ought at least to recognize that good corporate behaviour. Across our country we find many foreign-owned and controlled corporations which could learn a great deal from Reader's Digest with respect to the responsibility it has shown and the co-operation it has tried to give to the Parliament of Canada and to the laws of Canada to meet the regulations laid down a few years ago. It has complied with them without any difficulty.

According to statistics, Reader's Digest is a fairly significant employer in Canada. It employs 467 people directly in this country. About 1,000 people are indirectly employed on payrolls of other companies doing work for Reader's Digest. Their direct payroll is about $4 million per year; the indirect payroll is about $18 million. I hear from people from time to time who are concerned about employment, employment opportunities, and so on. Therefore I do not see why we should dismiss that argument in relation to this particular question because it does affect the livelihood of a considerable number of Canadian citizens. Many of these employees are illustrators, graphic specialists, control specialists, authors, writers, editors, and so on—the kind of people we are trying to protect with this legislation. I think we would be wiping out a great number of them if we were to close down Reader's Digest by some arbitrary action of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: In terms of straight capital investment, that magazine has invested over $8 million in plant and equipment. About $3 million of that is comprised of materials or machinery supplied to their suppliers in this country. I think this is quite important. In terms of the Reader's Digest English edition here in Canada, the Canadian content, which is composed of articles written by Canadians or about Canada, is now about 25 per cent of each of their magazine publications. That is a pretty significant amount, and I understand that that particular element will be increased to about 30 per cent in 1976 if the magazine is allowed to continue. Canadian content of this amount would match that of Canada's two leading consumer magazines, Maclean's and Chatelaine, put together. I do not think we should take advantage of Reader's Digest because of its willingness to do that kind of thing in this country.

The next point is that 70 per cent of its articles are reprints from other articles either at home or abroad. Only between 40 per cent and 45 per cent of those articles are about the U.S.A. or written by Americans, which means that 55 per cent to 60 per cent of all the articles appearing in the Canadian edition are either on Canadian or international subjects.

I think another point should be made. Reader's Digest is not a news magazine like Time. In my view it is a magazine which does not in a significant way direct itself to political or news issues but to issues which are people-to-people oriented. They are related to the uplifting of the spirit and perhaps the well-being of man by articles of good example and a whole series of things which in my view are quite wholesome. I see no objection to that, and it would not be in the interests of Canadians for any of us, or all of us collectively, to try to insulate ourselves culturally from that which takes place throughout the world, not in a news sense but in a very human sense. I think we ought to have that kind of opportunity, and any step by a government to limit our access to that kind of international flavour is not really in the best interests of ourselves as a nation or as a cultural people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: There are many arguments about nationalism which make a great deal of sense, but in terms of cultural or intellectual nationalism they are just a lot of nonsense. I do not accept the principle that because Aristotle was not born in Pickering, where I come from, I should not be reading his works or someone should not be publishing them. I think that intelligence, rational thinking, philosophy, music and art and that sort of thing do not have national boundaries: these are the common heritage of all mankind from wherever they might come.

● (1650)

I should like to consider Reader's Digest a little further, Mr. Speaker. On a monthly comparative basis, the Canadian edition of Reader's Digest would be approximately 40 per cent different from the American edition. That ought to take it around one of the provisions of the act but, as I pointed out earlier, it does not. There is a significant difference between the Canadian edition in a given month and the American edition in a given month, or in any of the 27 editions of Reader's Digest published around the world.

In excess of 50 per cent of the articles written by Canadians or about Canada which appear in the Reader's Digest appear in international editions of the Digest. I think that is very important because it provides an opportunity for Canadians to have a window on the world or for the world to look into Canada.

One sees articles in Reader's Digest about Toronto, Expo, Vancouver, or individuals. I think of one written by an hon. member of this House about a man in Vancouver, Ben Wosk, I found it very stimulating. I suppose I can use the name of the author rather than the name of the riding: Simma Holt has written for this magazine and some of her articles have appeared around the world. I see nothing objectionable in that; I think it is commendable.

Non-Canadian Publications

There is another aspect of the Reader's Digest question. It publishes two Canadian magazines, one in English and one in French. In terms of national unity and the development of our nation, I think that type of thing should be commended. Many publishers in this country who are applying pressure to have this legislation passed have not bothered to publish in both languages. I think this is something they ought to practice before they come to the Government of Canada seeking special dispensation from legitimate competition in this country.

When one speaks of competition it raises a question that I think a lot of Canadians do not understand. Some people seem to think that the present law gives preferential treatment to Reader's Digest, Time, Modern Medicine and a couple of other publications that is not available to Canadian publishers. As we all know, that is not true, but it is the impression that people have. They want to get rid of the special status of Time, Reader's Digest and the others. But that special status has no relationship to anybody who is publishing in Canada. As a matter of fact, they are treated in exactly the same way as anybody else who publishes in Canada, because Reader's Digest and the others publish under the conditions laid down for them a few years ago. I think it is important for people to understand that what this bill is trying to do is make sure that they do not have an opportunity to compete in a normal competitive way against Canadian publishers, with the same rules and regulations under which they operate.

The last point I want to make is primarily addressed to the committee that will consider this bill. I suggest they consider some amendments so that the bill does not have the adverse effect that I have mentioned. I think it is not inappropriate that we ask Reader's Digest, Time and these other publications to have a majority Canadian ownership. I think at the moment the ownership of Reader's Digest is 33 per cent Canadian, and I see no reason why we should not ask them to increase that to 50 per cent or 51 per cent. I think they could live up to that kind of commitment.

The committee should consider asking that we allow an exemption under certain conditions, one being that the firm be majority Canadian-controlled. If a publication is published by a Canadian corporation which is incorporated and registered under federal or provincial law, and is majority-controlled by Canadians, I think it is appropriate that such things as typesetting, plate-making, printing, circulation, advertising, and so on, be carried on in Canada. That should be made a condition for continuing to publish in this country, and they then should have the same tax advantages as any Canadian publisher.

The policies of such publishing corporations must be controlled from Canada, I believe, and I am sure that Reader's Digest could conform to this. Editorial direction should be Canadian, although there is one problem here in relation to the copyright law. In light of the fact that Reader's Digest is largely a reprint operation, we should make sure that they are allowed to conform to the copyright law in order to protect the authors. At the present time there is a licensing arrangement which is a violation of one of the provisions of the bill before us, and I think we should make sure that the publications are allowed to conform to the normal copyright laws.

In summary, Madam Speaker, I believe that Reader's Digest has been a good corporate citizen and a good employer. They have a great deal of Canadian content and are involved in a unique type of publishing, an almost exclusively reprint operation. They could not, therefore, conform to this regulation as it stands, and I believe that should be taken into account. I believe we can impose stricter controls; we can impose ownership requirements, but we must not take the negative step of imposing cultural controls which would deny Canadians access to international information, access to genuine human stories from around the world, in the name of Canadianism. If there is one kind of Canadianism that appeals to me more than another, it is to be found in our heritage, our diversity, our ethnic background. I allude to those things which make up the Canadian spirit. I do not think we will fortify that spirit if we look inward. Rather, let us develop a healthy attitude to things of the mind and spirit, and these are international in character.

● (1700)

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Madam Speaker, being aware of how things are done in the House of Commons and of complaints about the poor quality of debate in this House, I am particularly pleased to participate this afternoon in the debate on the bill before the House. Although Canadians are sometimes under the impression that the standard of debate in this chamber is not high, let me say that speeches made this afternoon should correct that impression. They have made clear what Canadians are, who they are and why this country is unique.

I am impressed by the speeches which have been made today, impressed by speeches my colleagues have made, impressed by the earlier contribution of the Social Credit member, and particularly impressed by the speeches of the two Liberal members who spoke this afternoon. I am particularly impressed by their contribution because I know how difficult it is for government supporters, who are expected to support measures brought forward by their party, to differ from their party. At times it is difficult for Liberal supporters to be as honest and forthright as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) and the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) were this afternoon. That members who are under special constraint should stand up and speak their minds, as those two hon. members did this afternoon, speaks well for parliament. They both deserve the commendation of this House for what they said.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: We must thank the government for bringing forward a bill which allows members to speak in this forum about Canada, about what it means to us and how we are to make it a better place in which to live. When you talk about publications and support for the arts, you are talking about culture. Surely our Canadian culture makes us unique, makes us different from those with whom we share the North American continent: it is our culture which makes us different as a people, which makes each and every one of us proud to be Canadian.

[Mr. Cafik.]

If the constituents of the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway and the hon. member for Ontario had been in the House to hear their elected representatives, they would have been proud of them. No doubt the people in those two constituencies feel much the same as the people in my constituency do on this subject. I can judge my constituents' feelings by the letters they send me. This debate is also good for parliament. It is good to hear members of parliament discussing in a reasoned, realistic, unemotional way something as important to Canadians as this bill, especially, when our credibility has been stretched almost as far as it will go.

About six million Canadians read Reader's Digest. That fact alone shows how many people in this country this piece of legislation will affect. This bill, if passed, will endanger the present form of Reader's Digest. I, and many who have participated in this debate or will participate, consider this legislation as a danger to the future of Reader's Digest. We say that Reader's Digest has been a good corporate citizen of Canada since 1943 when it first began its existence in this country. During its existence it has tried to improve its image and become a better corporate citizen. This bill endangers its life, which should concern not only its readers but its contributors. For example, if it were solely a Canadian magazine, contributors might expect a fee between $300 and $400; but when they contribute to an international publication with an international readership, they can expect a fee four or five times greater.

Already a substantial proportion of the Reader's Digest sold in this country is Canadian content. Considering the numbers who subscribe to and read the magazine, it touches the lives of more Canadians every month than any other magazine, and, touches them in a wholesome way. Reader's Digest is not a sensational magazine; it has not built its reputation on sensationalism but on good, factual reporting and on good writing, which is a worth-while addition to the literature of Canada and the culture of the world.

I shall repeat a number of points already made four or five times by previous participants in the debate. Some things need to be said again and again so that Canadians who read Hansard and government members who read Hansard will know the effects of the proposed legislation. Let me quote from "Facts about the Digest's status in Canada," an article which appeared in May, 1975. It says, among other things:

> The effect of section 19(2) has been to put the Digest on exactly the same footing as other publications in Canada by allowing companies that advertise with us to deduct the cost of their advertising on the same basis as any other business expense when computing income taxes. The Digest pays corporate income tax at the same rate as other companies; it has no tax advantages that other magazines printed and published in Canada do not have.

Further on, the article says that if section 19(2) is rescinded—

> —it will not remove "special tax privileges" since they do not exist. Instead it will create special penalties which apply to no other Digest edition in the world.

We must consider the last point seriously. Let me put on record some other facts concerning Reader's Digest. Its economic contribution to Canada is significant. It does $30 million worth of business annually in Canada. At least 90 per cent of every revenue dollar stays in Canada. It employs directly, in its Canadian operation, between 460 and 490 people and provides employment for 1,000 others through suppliers. I could go on and on. The point is that ever since 1943 the magazine here has made a positive contribution to this country. It has become a good Canadian corporate citizen. The Reader's Digest Association of Canada says in a news release:

● (1710)

We are proud of the fact that:

—five out of a board of six Digest directors are Canadian

—all of the officers of the company are Canadian citizens

—all 500 of our employees are permanent residents of Canada and the company gives work indirectly to at least 1,000 other Canadians

—our two magazines are fully edited in Canada for Canadians

—we employ some 80 editors, graphic and production staff on our books and magazines

—both magazines have substantial Canadian content, amounting to an annual average of 24 per cent English and almost 15 per cent French —almost 80 Canadian freelance writers, researchers and artists look to our books and magazines as a market for their work . . .

We have respected Canadians' expressed wishes in many ways. One has been to make some 32 per cent of our common stock available to Canadians through a public issue, the only Digest company in the world to do so. Shareholders, of course, bought their stock with the understanding that the company's operations were not under any threat. At the time the stock was issued, we had that assurance from the government.

Surely we are not going to break a commitment we gave this company when they endeavoured to release their stock so that Canadians could purchase it. However, that could well be the effect of this legislation if it is passed in its present form. I again quote:

Despite our record of good Canadian corporate citizenship, we apparently have been tried by the government and found wanting. Surely we can expect to be told what further standards we should meet, with at least a fair opportunity to meet them.

As the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) pointed out, when this bill is before the committee it should be given a fair opportunity to meet whatever conditions are possible to allow the company to remain in existence as a Canadian entity with a Canadian edition in both English and French. It is not only important that we give our point of view and that of Reader's Digest. We should also put on record what some of our constituents have said to us regarding this legislation. It has been suggested that because Reader's Digest wrote their subscribers and asked them to write their members of parliament to make them aware of their personal views about the magazine, this was unfair and should not have been done because it was an endeavour to promote the writing of letters to members of parliament.

Quite often I write my constituents asking their views about various things happening in this country. I only wish that on every occasion I write my constituents I could get a response as overwhelming as was the case with my constituents writing about Reader's Digest. I would be very impressed if on some other proposition my constituents wrote in the same way they have written to me about Reader's Digest. If the subscribers had not been written to by Reader's Digest, many of them would not appreciate how dangerous the situation is, as far as the magazine's existence is concerned, if this legislation is passed in its present form.

I wish to put on record what some of my constituents have written to me. I will not take up too much time of the House. I have some very bright constituents, not just because they have elected me on eight separate occasions but because they produced the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) whom I consider to be the finest man in this nation at the present time, from the leadership point of view. This is what some of my constituents have written to me:

We have always felt that the Reader's Digest has had the interests of Canada at heart, has been fair and conservative and a bastion against communism.

For the past 42 years I have been a subscriber to the Digest and it is like a friend who keeps me in touch . . .

I am writing on behalf of the magazine that I have taken and read for over 30 years.

We really enjoy this book.

I always look forward to the Reader's Digest: I think it should be left alone.

I, too, think it should be left alone.

This is to voice a protest, as loudly and clearly as I can, the government's announced intention that threatens to deny me the enjoyment, relaxation and education which the Reader's Digest has provided me over a period of many, many years.

If I lose it, I'll be losing a friend.

To a great many Canadians, that is exactly what will happen. I believe the Canadian people want parliament to guarantee that Reader's Digest will be allowed to continue to exist in this nation. They want us to do that in no uncertain terms. Maybe we will have to go down the road a way to find the right set of rules and regulations to govern publications in this nation. Personally, I am not happy about any kind of censorship, and that is what will occur in one way or another: by way of legislation we are determining what people may or may not have a right to read.

I believe there has to be a spirit of compromise on the part of this parliament and the committee that considers this legislation. Amendments will have to be accepted before this legislation is credible. I sincerely hope that all members will look at the legislation, especially with regard to Reader's Digest, with this thought in mind: we must be careful not to endanger a Canadian magazine that, as far as I am concerned, is as Canadian as any magazine in this nation. It provides tremendous enjoyment to at least six million people in this country. If that were to happen, it would be a very serious loss. It is something for which parliament will not be forgiven if we act in the wrong way as far as Reader's Digest is concerned.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill C-32, an act to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade, with amendments, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

INCOME TAX ACT

REMOVAL OF PROVISION ALLOWING DEDUCTION OF EXPENSES FOR ADVERTISING IN NON-CANADIAN PERIODICALS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-58, to amend the Income Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Madam Speaker, may I preface my remarks by supporting the sentiments expressed by my colleague, the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates), when he discussed the quality of the debate and those who have participated in it. I, too, wish to compliment those who have spoken. In particular, I wish to direct my compliments to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) and the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik).

I will be completely frank with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I was somewhat affronted when she referred in her opening remarks to a filibuster. I say to you, Madam Speaker, that when we as members are recipients of an outpouring of genuine emotion from our constituents, a concern which is not prompted by bigotry or anything else of that kind, and when in consequence we participate in debate at some length, I do not like to think that this falls within the category of a filibuster. Possibly the hon. lady did not intend it that way, and I do not accept that we were filibustering.

This legislation, Bill C-58, will apparently have the effect of preventing Time, Reader's Digest and other lesser known magazines from publishing Canadian editions. I know the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) and other government spokesmen have said this is not the effect of the measure. In a technical and legal sense they may be right. However, I prefer to look at the practical rather that the legal or technical results which will flow from this proposal. I have concluded, as I have said, that the result will be the loss of the Canadian editions of Time and Reader's Digest. Therefore, Madam Speaker, I oppose the bill and will vote against it on second reading as will, I am sure, many other members.

I wish to say at the outset that I am among those who could have been persuaded to support sending this legislation to the standing committee for detailed examination if I had found or if I had been convinced that this new law was necessary, or even desirable, to support certain principles. Again, I would have done so, if there had been more evidence of flexibility on the part of the minister in following a course which in my view is certain prevent the publication of these Canadian editions.

[The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin).]

For example, I believe in and would support reasonable measures which would develop and nurture a distinct Canadian culture and identity. I believe in the principle that we should strive for a tax policy regarding periodicals which applies equally to all. Again, I support the principle that the benefits of Canadian advertising revenue should, generally speaking, go to Canadian media. In this area I would add one word of caution, however. I would not want to be a party to legislation which would discourage Canadian industry altogether from advertising in foreign or foreign-owned periodicals, since I can conceive of situations in which advertising in such periodicals might be the only way in which Canadians could reach the audience they needed—in developing new export markets, for example. In general, though, I believe most members support the principle that Canadian tax law should provide an incentive to Canadian business to spend its advertising dollars in Canadian media.

I said a few moments ago that I would not support this legislation. The basis of my disagreement with the Secretary of State concerns the tests or standards imposed to determine whether magazines such as Time and Reader's Digest qualify to receive the benefits of such incentives. I wish to discuss these tests and standards a little later, but before I do so, and while I am discussing principles, I believe it is only fair to state my opposition to other principles inherent in this legislation.

First, I reject the notion that I must be anti-American in order to be pro-Canadian. I reject the principle that we must punish Americans in order to encourage Canadians. Any bill which is penal or negative in its very nature, such as the one before us, must be subjected to the closest scrutiny. I reject the principle that we should enact this piece of legislation in the abstract without knowing in some detail the nature of the government's over-all publications policy for Canada. All we have to date are some vague hints of what is to come: the use of Canada Council grants, financial assistance for a national distribution service for Canadian periodicals, possible increased advertising spending by government, and so on. This is not good enough; it is too vague and uncertain.

I reject the principle that officials of the Department of National Revenue are best suited to judge what is Canadian content and what is not. I am not prepared to go so far as to say that our tax department would become censors under Bill C-58, but there have been suggestions to this effect from responsible individuals and groups, and considering the source of these suggestions I believe we should be wary of the legislation before us.

Finally, I reject the proposition that in order to guarantee the publication of a Canadian news magazine we must eliminate the Canadian edition of Time and that to guarantee the publication of a Canadian news magazine we must eliminate the Canadian edition of Time and that to accomplish the latter we must throw Reader's Digest. out of the country as well. I have not reached the stage of accusing the minister of this yet The minister seems obsessed, or at least preoccupied, with attending at the birth of a Canadian news magazine or, more properly, of at least two such magazines for it is evident to me that he expects Maclean-Hunter will publish one; and certainly whoever purchases Time Canada's mailing list, at whatever astronomical cost, would publish a second. I need only refer to some of the speeches made recently by the Secretary of State. On January 24, speaking at Trent University, he said:

Discussions I have had with several people in the magazine industry have led me to believe that if the intent and purpose of section 19 were restored, a Canadian news magazine would follow. I now expect that to happen.

On the previous day, in a statement on motions the minister said:

It is my hope and expectation that this decision of the government will result in the creation of a Canadian news magazine.

At an address given at White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia, the hon. gentleman declared:

No Canadian news weekly could even be born, let alone live, in the face of that kind of overwhelming occupation by a magazine which is produced almost free as far as the Canadian market is concerned.

I would not argue that a Canadian news magazine is not a good thing: it would likely make a significant addition to Canadian literature. I am not yet prepared to say that two Canadian news magazines are twice as good as one. What I do question is the use of tax legislation to accomplish this purpose. I also question the integrity of suppressing two existing periodicals, Time and Reader's Digest, to accomplish this purpose.

I spoke earlier of examining the tests or standards by which it can be judged whether Time and Reader's Digest are entitled to continue to enjoy the benefits or incentives afforded Canadian publications. The minister himself has given us some assistance as to which factors to consider in judging whether a periodical is Canadian or not. In an article submitted to Canadian Weekly Newspapers on March 26, 1975, the minister had this to say:

Criteria were established whose purpose was to ensure that only Canadian magazines and newspapers could benefit from special tax advantages allowed to advertizers who use them to publicize their products. The criteria relate to ownership, management, editorial control, printing, typesetting and possible conditions of licensing.

Some of these criteria are, in my opinion, quite acceptable but others do not go far enough in their emphasis on Canadianization. With respect to ownership, the government talks about a figure of 75 per cent. This is simply an arbitrary figure, I suppose—there is no magic in it. I suggest to the Secretary of State that there are other tests of ownership even within the Income Tax Act, and I would be pleased to take part in a discussion of this aspect should the bill reach committee state.

With respect to management, I support substantial control by Canadians at board of director level, though here again I should have thought the measure would have gone further and talked about executive management, not just the members of the board, and required that all of them be resident in Canada. That is the kind of thing I support. General statements about management being Canadian are not sufficient.

● (1730)

Again, I support editorial control but I think it is a great deal more important to support editorial freedom. I am amazed that the Secretary of State has not taken it upon himself to emphasize the independence of editing rather than just the fact that it is Canadian controlled.

The minister talked about printing and typesetting as tests 4 and 5, and this is one area in which I suggest the minister has not gone nearly far enough. Printing and typesetting are two of a number of production functions. What about other production functions in the publishing industry and, what is more important, what about other business functions of the typical commercial enterprise? I think immediately of a circulation department, a payroll department, a bookkeeping department and an advertising department. I am sure there are many others. Surely it is as important to Canadianize these as it is the two small operations of the production department.

In respect of conditions of licencing, which was the final criterion, I have no comment and claim no expertise whatsoever in this area. There is no indication of some other factors which I regard as equally important. I refer to those aspects of editing and publishing which should be independently Canadian as well, devoted to encouragement, not censorship of Canadian content, particularly the export of Canadian content to foreign countries as Reader's Digest is so ideally able to do. Let me now say a word about Reader's Digest. The Secretary of State and, indeed, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) and others have noted the need for a tax policy regarding periodicals which applies equally to all. This is a desirable aim, as I have said before, but in establishing such a uniform policy we must first set standards by which it can be decided who will qualify.

These standards should, I submit, not be so rigid as to exclude categorically publications which have been published here in good faith, which have acted as good corporate citizens and which have hitherto met all standards and guidelines laid down by previous governments. One standard that should be applied is the extent of the corporation's economic and cultural contributions to our country; in short, its worthiness to be considered or to become a full-fledged Canadian citizen.

Of those publications affected, may I join others who have said that it is clear that Reader's Digest has advanced furthest along the road to Canadian citizenship, whether the criterion is employment, whether it is public ownership, whether it is Canadian control and direction, whether it is the dollar contribution to the Canadian economy or whether it is the content of the magazine itself.

Other speakers have discussed the economic benefits that accrue to Canada through the Reader's Digest Canadian business. I do not minimize this in any way, but I should like to spend a few minutes dealing with the cultural and content aspects. This magazine is essentially a selection of articles from a variety of published and other sources on subjects of wide interest to many people. The articles are acknowledged to be accurate, professionally edited and condensed to a point where they are highly readable, designed so that they will appeal to exceptionally large and diverse audiences and so they will stand the test of time.

These articles, many of them of a consumer or factual nature, others reflecting a variety of viewpoints, do not and cannot represent a unified editorial policy. Nor do they represent news. It is hard to see how such articles, many of them designed to help people with the problems they encounter in their everyday lives or to provide information on subjects as diverse as the pyramids and the Stanley Cup, can be regarded as harmful to Canadian culture. Moreover, the evidence shows that the Digest is making an actual contribution to the dissemination of information about Canadian affairs, accomplishments and ideas. First, it condenses and republishes articles from Canadian magazines and books, helping to give these articles and their authors a wider audience in Canada. Second, it publishes many Canadian authors of note and many lesser known writers who are making their debut in magazine journalism in this country. Both its fee scales and its reputation with the writers themselves seems to be high. I am reminded here of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway this afternoon.

Let us consider a few of the people who have written for or been published in the Digest: they include Pierre Berton, Senator David Croll, Morley Callaghan, W. Earle McLaughlin, John W. Holmes, Norman Ward, Trent Frayne, Farley Mowat, June Callwood, Stephen Leacock, Bruce Hutchison and Hugh McLennan.

Third, the majority of these articles are circulated to other Digest editions and many subsequently appear in these 26 editions in as many as 13 languages. The example given by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway was excellent. The article written by former Prime Minister Lester Pearson about his United Nations colleague, Ralph Bunche, appeared in 16 foreign editions of the Digest and was read by almost 100 million people. No other Canadian communications medium, except perhaps the CBC or the National Film Board, could deliver such a worldwide audience for Canadian matters. If the government had to buy advertising space equivalent to that provided by the Digest for its articles on Expo '67, I am informed it would have cost more than $6 million.

There is a fourth and lesser known cultural benefit from the Digest magazine activities, which is that the Canadian editions of the Digest serve not only Canada but also the English and French-speaking peoples of the Caribbean and a spill-over French-speaking audience in the United States. Any decision taken by this House, therefore, directly or indirectly affects readers in these countries and the Canadian material included in their editions.

Finally, there is a cultural benefit from the book publications of the Digest. In the last six years the Digest has published such highly praised books as "The Canadians at War", "Canada—This Land", "These People", "In Search of Canada", "You and the Law", and "Explore Canada", the latter being an illustrated travel book describing 1,200 places and communites throughout Canada, published in collaboration with the Canadian Automobile Association.

In sum, these activities add up to substantial value for Canadian cultural enrichment which, I would argue, should be encouraged rather than restricted. It is interesting to note that the standard applied by the foreign ownership review board in assessing what foreign investments are in the national interest is whether the investment is of "significant benefit" to Canada. If this were one of the qualifications for Canadian advertising status established in section 19 of the Income Tax Act, I submit to this House the Digest would pass with flying colours.

Finally, I should like to deal with one other aspect of the legislation which causes me more concern than any other single factor. It has also been touched upon by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal and others. Indeed, I thought it was touched upon in principle in a very fair manner by the hon. member for Ontario. This is the sensitive question of government regulation of content. The Secretary of State has said there was no intention of introducing a new Canadian content rule or formula for deciding how substantially different a magazine published in Canada must be from one published abroad in order to qualify for section 19. Such a criterion, he said, has been in the act since 1965.

This is true, and I do not question the Secretary of State's desire to stay away from any measure that might smack of government control. But to my knowledge this criterion or clause has not been applied to any major magazine in the ten years since the act was passed. There has, in fact, been no reason to apply it since all the major Canadian magazines concerned already qualify under the act. Now, however, a very different situation prevails. Two major magazines and a number of smaller publications, including some newspapers, may lose their status under the act. Suddenly this clause, in my opinion, takes on new importance.

It is clear that this clause disturbs not only members of this House but a great many other people. The Toronto Globe and Mail has repeated several times that such a clause is unacceptable to Canadians. In the May 10 editorial, for example, it was stated:

> Ottawa has a right to define, for income tax purposes, Canadian ownership of a publication, down to the last share if it likes. But once a publication has qualified as Canadian-owned, there the government's power should end, apart from enforcement of laws against libel, breach of copyright and obscenity . . . If no "editorial interference" is to have any meaning it must mean that the editor is free to put whatever he likes between his magazine covers, subject to no restraints or directions of any kind from the government, that no magazine can be ruled un-Canadian because the government finds its contents unsatisfactory.

In the Financial Times of Canada, and I hesitate to quote from that because the minister takes great umbrage about whatever it might have to say, we find this comment in the May 12 publication:

> In practice, virtually no publication could have "Canadian" tax status without carrying mostly Canadian content, unless it could afford the astronomical cost of commissioning a lot of foreign material for its exclusive use. And the rest of Mr. Faulkner's speech indicates that is just what he is after. He wants, among other things, to make it harder for "the world view of Canadian readers" to be "influenced by American periodicals." No censor could have put it better.

● (1740)

These are harsh words. But they have been echoed in a dozen or more newspapers across Canada in recent months, from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald to the Montreal Le Devoir and the Calgary Albertan. We cannot, we must not, ignore such comment for it concerns one of the very fundamentals on which this nation's press is based.

I have read many articles, editorials and speeches which deal with the "substantially the same" clause. Regardless of what the Secretary of State has said, surely we must acknowledge that this is a content test, and he who knows it best in the world is the Minister of National Revenue. He knows that if a publication is 80 per cent different there is no problem. He knows, as well, that if it is less than 60 per cent different from its United States counterpart it will fail to qualify under the act. The Minister of National Revenue knows, finally, that if it is between 60 per cent and 80 per cent different his tax department people will have to examine it very carefully.

I submit that the tax collectors of our country have many other things to do than measure the content of our periodicals. I was interested to hear the hon. member for Ontario agree today that substantially the same clause, in his interpretation of the way it is contained in this legislation, would apply the Canadian edition against all other foreign editions. If I chose to disagree with him, as I believe the Secretary of State disagrees, I would not say we must match the Canadian edition against its United States counterpart. I cannot accept that clause as having any basis whatsoever. I suggest that the servants in our tax departments are not editors or censors, if one prefers to use that name, by their very nature, background, inclination or expertise.

The Secretary of State says this is not a content test. I do not agree. I suggest the Minister of National Revenue does not agree either. I suggest the Minister of National Revenue is very well aware of a decision in our courts in respect of a test concerning words that are very similar. As a matter of fact, if I recall the words correctly, they were "substantially different", which is just the reverse of "substantially the same." I am informed that the conclusion from that particular judicial decision is simply that if it is 80 per cent it is substantially different, and if it is less than 60 per cent it is not substantially different. If it is between 60 per cent and 80 per cent, then one should have a hard look at it. I do not wish to be a party to asking our tax collectors in respect of about 28 publications to see whether they fall below the 60 per cent mark. I think that is an absolutely ridiculous exercise in futility and has nothing to do with the enhancement or preservation of Canada culture.

This test leads to the opportunity of ridiculous editorial decisions. For example, if I were the editor of Reader's Digest I would run three or four stories on the 1976 Olympics in the March, 1976, Canadian edition and let the same stories run a month or two later in other editions around the world. Surely this does nothing for Canadian culture or Canadian content. Those stories should run simultaneously in 26 editions of Reader's Digest around the world to encourage those readers to come to Canada. I want them to read these articles at a time when they are planning their holidays for 1976. For an editor to have to go through this exercise of holding back stories from editions so that he can escape the 60 per cent or 80 per cent Canadian content test is simply ridiculous. I do not think any party in this House would support that.

The hon. member for Ontario suggested that this provision could be amended in committee. I am not that optimistic. One of the main reasons I shall vote against this bill on second reading is I do not believe this test is capable of being amended. The only thing that should happen to it, in my opinion, is that it be deleted. I do not think the Secretary of State and the Minister of National Revenue know just what is meant by "substantially the same".

To sum up, I suggest that two considerations should be uppermost in our concerns when examining this bill. First, we should consider whether the publications affected by it have proved themselves of significant cultural and economic benefit to Canada, and whether it is just a consequence of the bill that the ground rules under which they operate are changed; changed, moreover, in such a way that they are classed overnight in the same category as foreign publications who have made no attempt nor shown any desire to serve the Canadian purpose. Second, we should be clear in our minds that no Canadian government and no Canadian law should even hint at control or interference in editorial content. The "substantially the same" clause which contains this implied threat should be deleted from the act.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, even though it would appear that everything has been said that can be said about this shabby attack on the Canadian edition of Reader's Digest, I feel that I should make some comments on this bill. I am still getting letters from constituents, all of which support Reader's Digest, and I must say that some of the writers have some most uncomplimentary remarks to make about the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner). I am sure the minister has been getting letters from his own constituents, and I know he has been getting letters on the subject from most other ridings as well.

Looking over some of the speeches that were made in 1965 when the government of that time brought in the bill to give Reader's Digest and Time magazine status as Canadian publications, I find that Liberal governments can be pretty inconsistent—not that that is any secret. Member after member on the Liberal side of the House, and some ministers as well, stood in this House and defended the government's move to exempt Reader's Digest and Time from the bill that removed the special tax status enjoyed up to that time by foreign magazines published in Canada.

At that time Reader's Digest and Time were called good Canadian corporate citizens. In the ten years since then, both magazines have become even better Canadian corporate citizens, especially Reader's Digest. It has been stated over and over again that Reader's Digest has an enormous payroll, something in the order of $4 million or $5 million per year, and that the magazine has about 500 Canadians on its payroll. What has not been said, and I have been waiting for the Secretary of State to tell us, is who is going to hire all those writers, editors and artists who will be put out of jobs if this bill is approved by this House.

It is no good saying that Maclean's, Saturday Night or any of the other Canadian publications will hire them. Saturday Night is on the verge of going under again, and right now that magazine is being held together with public subscriptions and donations. Saturday Night might be putting even more writers and editors on the labour market, rather than hiring those displaced by the scuttling of Reader's Digest.

● (1750)

I think it is interesting to note that on June 15, 1965, as recorded at page 2429 of Hansard, Mr. Steven Otto said that Maclean's, Saturday Night and the Star Weekly magazines were in serious financial difficulties. According to some comments that have been made in debate on this bill, it seems that nothing has changed, in spite of the fact that the tax bill in 1965 was supposed to make everything rosy for those magazines. It was pointed out at that time, and it has been pointed out in recent debates, that freezing out all the quality publications in Canada will not ensure the financial health of any of the publications that will be left. I think Canadians know what they want to read, and I think Canadian advertisers know where they want to advertise.

It is also interesting to note that back in 1965 the government was deluged with letters and telegrams from publishers of Canadian newspapers and other publications, objecting to the government's bill to remove the tax exempt status on advertising on all except Canadian-owned publications. They considered it unwarranted interference by the government into the realm of free enterprise and of freedom of speech and the press. Again I have to say that nothing has changed. The hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) was active in the debate on the tax bill in 1965 and I think that one of his comments at that time is worth repeating. In Hansard of June 17, 1965, the hon. member said, and I quote from page 2550 of Hansard of that date:

> No one in his right mind would bring this kind of legislation before the House unless he had an ulterior motive.

I have to agree with that assessment, Mr. Speaker. We have been waiting throughout the debate on this bill for the Secretary of State to tell us just why he brought in a bill to reverse a decision of a previous Liberal government respecting Time and Reader's Digest. Many of us on this side of the House, and some members of the minister's own party, cannot help wondering if it is simply a move to get revenge for some real or imagined slight. I know that the minister has been accused by some segments of the press of being a do-nothing minister, but this is certainly not the way to prove them wrong. The real victims will be those who want to continue to read the English and French editions of Reader's Digest and those people who now work for Time and Reader's Digest. With the permission of the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North I would like to read another of his comments into the record from Hansard of June 17, 1965. The hon. member closed his remarks by saying:

> Smarten up; take this legislation off the order paper, and let us get on with the business of the country.

Madam Speaker, many of the other speakers here this afternoon voiced their opinions as well as the opinions of the ordinary constituents who have written them. I have received many interesting letters from people residing in the great riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka. I should like to read one letter from an elderly widow who writes regarding Reader's Digest. It reads:

> I believe the time of parliamentarians and our money could be better spent by encouraging Canadian publishers to look for Canadian writers to create text books for all the grades in our school system.
> It is beyond belief that any government would be sniping at a magazine of the high quality and excellent content as is the Canadian edition of the Reader's Digest. Published in Canada with many Canadian employees, do leave the content to the editors who are doing a superb job. Ignorance of other parts of our world is not bliss but a danger. One has only to look at the results of the long years of suppression of good and wide scope of educational material in the province of Quebec to be appalled at the possibility of so good a magazine as the Reader's Digest being put out of business in Canada.

That was from a lady in my own village of Burks Falls. A teacher from Gravenhurst writes:

> To the degree that you can fight this measure to throttle the Reader's Digest's availability in Canada you will be expressing my opinion.

I wrote the Secretary of State and included many excerpts from these letters because I could not begin to combine them all, but certainly some of them bear repeating and I think will be well worth reading in Hansard. Here are few of them. One person wrote:

> Maybe one day when there is a Canadian publication that can favourably compete with this magazine, there will no longer be a need for Reader's Digest.

Another wrote:

> We think it is the best and most reading in it of any magazine that comes to our house.

Another wrote:

> I first became an ardent reader of this fine magazine when I was a soldier overseas in World War II and have received it monthly ever since and never would like to see the day when Reader's Digest is no longer available in our home.

Another constituent wrote:

> It is a way of life—one of the few decent, sound publications left in existence.

Then:

> It has been in our home for over 30 years; without it I would feel I had lost a friend.

Another reader wrote:

> None of the "slush and dirt" you read in so many of the magazines today.

Another wrote:

> I don't see much chance of another being produced to its equal, so I'll just quit buying magazines.

Then I received this letter:

> Invaluable to the busy Canadian. Also clean.

Another wrote:

> Why the government would be taking any kind of action to take this material out of our homes is beyond my understanding.

Madam Speaker, I do not know how many of the letters that I have received keep repeating that it is good, clean reading. One reader wrote:

> Hopefully, you could rid us of other trash instead.

Another reader wrote:

> We Canadians in Canada would be poorer in consequence.

And another:

> An influence for good in Canada.

An old age pensioner wrote:

> I am a pensioner and Reader's Digest and their books are the only ones I can afford.

Madam Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

SUGGESTION PRIME MINISTER NOT USE GOVERNMENT-OWNED HELICOPTERS TO ATTEND POLITICAL EVENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion of a most serious nature arising from a widely circulated advertisement stating that there will be a breathtaking display of aerial wizardry at a political picnic on Saturday with the Prime Minister in attendance. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk):

That the House requests the Prime Minister to state whether or not the advertised "breathtaking display of aerial wizardry" to occur at a political picnic on the farm of Ontario Liberal leader Robert Nixon on Saturday will consist of the Prime Minister's descent from the sky with three government-owned helicopters at an estimated expense to the taxpayers of $20,000 and, if so, the House requests the Prime Minister in the interests of the proper expenditure of public funds to cancel his tax paid arrival from the heavens in favour of a more proper and worldly procedure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PROPOSAL GOVERNMENT MEMBERS CEASE USING GOVERNMENT AIRCRAFT TO ATTEND POLITICAL EVENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I too rise on a matter pursuant to the previous one of urgent and the pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of a reported plan to use federal government aircraft to take the Prime Minister to southern Ontario for the express purpose of politicking on behalf of the Ontario Liberal party, and in view of the fact that special arrangements were recently made to detour a government aircraft carrying entertainers for the Canadian armed forces to attend and entertain at a party given by the brother-in-law of the Minister of Justice, who is a candidate in the upcoming provincial election in Saskatchewan, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That the Prime Minister and other government members be instructed to cease immediately the practice of using government aircraft for partisan political purposes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I owe the hon. member for Leeds an apology. On hearing his preamble to the proposed motion I did not take it as a serious suggestion regarding the use of government aircraft. The motion before us does bring into perspective both motions which contain a serious element about the use of aircraft. Therefore, regardless of the gravity or otherwise of the matter, the matter is one on which both hon. members enjoy the right to have the question put to the House as to whether or not the House gives unanimous consent. Therefore I should like it to be considered that I am putting the same question to the House on both motions. Since both motions are put pursuant to Standing Order 43, they cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Beatty: Otto said no.

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES—SUGGESTED RESTRICTION OF IMPORTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I seek the unanimous consent of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to solve an important and urgent problem.

Considering the uncertainty of the small manufacturing industry in the clothing sector, and I have in mind the glove factories of my riding in particular;

Considering it is a labour intensive industry and plays a leading role in the Quebec economy;

Considering that massive imports in the field are slowly destroying the industry and raising the number of unemployed at an alarming rate, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House order the discontinuance of manufactured products imports that are directly competing with our own production.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, it requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion cannot be put.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—POSSIBLE SUSPENSION OF SALE—ARRANGEMENTS TO ASSURE PEACEFUL USE OF NUCLEAR MATERIAL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who yesterday indicated that the political and military situation in South Korea today did not warrant a change in the position of the government with regard to the sale of the CANDU reactor. In the face of growing concern about possible renewed military conflict in Korea, is the government prepared to suspend the CANDU sale independently of what kind of assurances can be negotiated on a bilateral basis?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: Will the minister tell the House just what safeguards the government is proposing to South Korea, and will he admit that while arrangements may be made which will provide adequate inspection, these arrangements will provide no means of preventing South Korea from using, for non-peaceful purposes, plutonium and techniques provided by Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: As I mentioned yesterday, the safeguards which are provided for in the case of South Korea, in a sense, fall into two categories. The ratification of the non-proliferation Treaty by South Korea which stipulates that the total nuclear system of the country will be subjected to international inspection under the international agency. Second, we are negotiating a bilateral agreement with South Korea putting into effect the total range of safeguards which were announced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I believe, last December 20. This is the most complete possible range of safeguards available at the present time. The diversion of plutonium or material for non-peaceful purposes is, of course, subject to the examination and inspection system of the international agency, and I am sure it is clear to the Leader of the Opposition that if that occurred, it would be instantly known to the international inspectors.

Obviously a new situation would be created at that point in which the international community would be alerted to this diversion which might be taking place. That is about the best answer I can give to the hon. member, and in reply to the hon. member for Calgary North, it is the best the international community has devised up to the present time. Perhaps the hon. member will be able to improve it at a later date.

[Mr. Speaker.]

SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—PROPOSED DEBATE ON SALE OF NUCLEAR MATERIAL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): The Secretary of State for External Affairs has, in effect, conceded that the government of Canada does not contemplate making any arrangements with South Korea which would prevent South Korea from using plutonium and techniques for other than peaceful purposes. All these measures would do would be to assure that this arrangement would become known if the government did that. I put it to the Prime Minister, in light of what took place in India and in light of the moral responsibility that any government has in a field like this, is the government of Canada prepared to proceed with the sale of CANDU reactors in these circumstances with no way of preventing the use of such techniques and plutonium for non-peaceful purposes? Why will the Prime Minister not put this whole matter before the House and the country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will gladly put the whole matter in front of the House and the country. Here again, there are seven opposition days before the end of the month and if hon. members find this important enough I will gladly undertake to have all our side participate in debate. I will gladly join in it myself. I think there is a very serious moral problem which is raised by the Leader of the Opposition but there are two sides to it. The other side is whether we can sit on this technology and not share it with the developing countries who have no energy—

Mr. Fairweather: South Korea?

Mr. Trudeau: —and who have an extremely low standard of living. No, I am not talking about South Korea; I am talking about the moral problem of sitting on our technology or sharing it and the rules for sharing it which will be the same whether it is South Korea or an advanced country or a developing country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: Then why not give it away?

Mr. Trudeau: These rules that Canada is announcing unilaterally, which were announced by the minister, are the most strict rules of any of the members of the international community.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I have personally been raising this subject with every nuclear country or near-nuclear country I have been visiting, asking them to be as strict as we are so that if the hypothesis that is feared by the opposition does occur and we have to cut off our co-operation, then the country that is cut off will not turn around and get it from some other country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—POSSIBILITY OF UNITED STATES REASSESSING DEFENCE COMMITMENT IF USED FOR NON-PEACEFUL PURPOSES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am sure everybody in this House would agree with what the Prime Minister said about the moral dilemma.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: The moral dilemma it seems to me, however, would have to be backed up by specific action on an issue as important as this. I should like to ask the minister if in trying to work out an appropriate sanction situation with respect to the sale of the CANDU reactor to South Korea this government has had conversations with the government of the United States, for example, to see whether it would reassess its defence commitments in Korea if it turns out that the government of South Korea does not abide by the bilateral rules on which we are putting so much emphasis and hope in this country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the United States has precisely the same situation as we have in Korea with respect to their reactor.

Mr. Gillies: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I think perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not hear my question. Has there been any discussion between this country and the United States about the sort of bilateral safeguards that we are putting on? If there is a violation of our bilateral safeguards, do we know whether the United States would be concerned about their defence commitment in that country? Has there been any such discussion between our Department of External Affairs and the state department in the United States?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we are constantly in touch with other suppliers in this field, but I am sure we have not contemplated the possibility or raised formally with the United States the possibility that South Korea would denounce its bilateral agreement with the United States and with Canada and denounce its adherence to the NPT, all of which is implied in the hon. member's question.

Mr. Gillies: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that the government takes a very cavalier attitude.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—POSSIBILITY OF IMPOSING ECONOMIC SANCTIONS IF SAFEGUARD AGREEMENT VIOLATED

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): May I ask the minister if the government of Canada has made it very clear to the government of South Korea that if there is a violation of our bilateral agreement we will apply specific economic sanctions to that country?

● (1420)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that what the government of Canada did in the case of India ought to be instructive to the hon. member and to all other countries to whom we may supply nuclear materials.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORT OF NARCOTICS SMUGGLING RING IN MONTREAL—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Solicitor General. Yesterday, in answering questions about an alleged internal report concerning a narcotics ring operating in the Montreal airport with the alleged assistance of 60 members of the public service, the minister said that he knew of no such report. I am now asking whether he or others on his behalf have communicated with the RCMP officers who are reported to have given a very detailed account of such a report to members of the press, in order to ascertain if there is such a report; and, if so, can he now tell the House if there is such a report?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the two RCMP officers the hon. member referred to are still out of the country, but expected back shortly, and the commissioner intends to communicate with them as soon as possible. Until he has, we do not wish to make further statements on this matter.

An hon. Member: Has the minister not heard of the telephone?

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the commissioner, with whom, as I understand, the minister conferred either yesterday or the day before, know of such a report?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, until we have all the details of this matter, we do not intend to make further statements.

Mr. Brewin: May I ask a final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker? In view of the great importance of this matter will the minister seek to expedite either the publication of the report or the inquiry and to announce to this House what action is to be taken by way of discipline, if the report was made public prematurely, or by way of prosecution and prevention of this extremely serious organized criminal operation, if that is indicated?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I have already taken steps to expedite the inquiry. As soon as it is completed, I will see what can be said to the House. As I said yesterday, I discussed this matter with the Commissioner of the RCMP and it was felt that for the time being, it would not be in the public interest to say more about this case or the investigation.

HEALTH SERVICES

PROVISION OF PUBLIC SERVICE NURSES AT VAL-D'OR HOSPITAL

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Some years ago, a new hospital was built, larger than the previous one, as requested by the people in Val-d'Or, a community within my constituency. Now that the construction work is over, two floors of the hospital have been closed after the armed forces departure because a number of nurses, the wives of military personnel, had to leave the area. Can the minister advise the House whether the government could lend nurses who are on its payroll to remedy this situation?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The reply is no, Mr. Speaker.

REPORT OF NARCOTICS SMUGGLING RING IN MONTREAL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ALLEGATIONS AGAINST DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I address a supplementary question to the Solicitor General? As we said yesterday, we appreciate that, normally, investigations of such a serious nature are obviously carried out in strict confidence; however, as a story has been printed implicating various officials of various departments, will the minister undertake to make a statement in this House within the next day, and certainly by Monday at the latest, and say either that there are substantive allegations against different officials of various departments, or not, so that if there are no such allegations the cloud hanging over them can be removed?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I agree that this is a serious matter and that it should be cleared up as soon as possible. As I said to the House, certain key figures in this inquiry are still out of the country and the commissioner has not been able to get in touch with them, according to my last notice. As soon as he does, we will make available—

An hon. Member: Is there no telephone?

Mr. Allmand: Apparently some people here know more about the RCMP than the commissioner does. As soon as we get more information, we will give it to the House, if we can.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is recognized for a final supplementary question.

[Mr. Allmand.]

REPORT OF NARCOTICS SMUGGLING RING IN MONTREAL—POSSIBLE INVOLVEMENT OF SECURITY AGENCY CALLED SECUREX

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): If it is a final supplementary, Mr. Speaker, it may come in two parts. When the minister reports to the House, hopefully in the very near future, will he advise whether part of the investigation involves a private security agency, I think known as Securex, which was given a contract for security operations at the Montreal airport against the recommendation of the RCMP, although with the personal consent of the then Solicitor General? While I am on my feet, may I ask the Minister of National Revenue how he could state to the House on Tuesday that he was co-operating with the Solicitor General and his officials when obviously the Solicitor General knew nothing about the report?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, when I do report to the House, I will give as much detail as possible. I should point out, and I have done this before, that when there is a criminal investigation underway, if there is enough evidence, charges are laid. If there is not, the matter is kept private to protect those people who might have been under suspicion but against whom there is no evidence in order to protect their civil liberties. We have to respect those guidelines when giving any information to this House.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE LEGAL IMPEDIMENT TO MINTING OF $100 GOLD COIN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Bearing in mind we now have a floating dollar, will the minister indicate if there are any legal impediments to the minting of $100 gold coins, as some have suggested might be done to assist in financing the 1976 olympics?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was not authorized to give a legal opinion to the House even when I was Attorney General.

Mr. Stevens: Without requesting a legal opinion, but for clarification, will the minister indicate whether, without further legislation and without changing our floating dollar, the governor-in-council is now empowered to authorize the issue of $100 gold coins.

Mr. Speaker: Notwithstanding the change in phraseology, surely the hon. member realizes he is seeking the same kind of information.

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT

ALLEGED REPORT CONCERNING MINTING OF $100 GOLD COIN

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I will shift my supplementary question to the Minister of Supply and Services. Has the government received a report from the Royal Canadian Mint in which they review the possibility of minting new Olympic coins which will become part of the regular coinage of the land and, if so, does the report indicate such a scheme will be virtually impossible?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this question concerns policy and should have been directed to the Minister of Finance.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

USE OF DEPARTMENTAL AIRCRAFT BY PRIME MINISTER TO ATTEND POLITICAL EVENTS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. What arrangements have been made providing for the use of National Defence aircraft to the Prime Minister for meetings such as those described by the Prime Minister's special assistant, Peter McGuire, as an old fashioned political picnic at Bob Nixon's farm where the Prime Minister will be demonstrating his support for Bob Nixon?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if National Defence or any other department can save the time of the Prime Minister, we will be very pleased to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1430)

Mr. Speaker: Because of the particularly sensitive nature of the hon. member's questions, I do not want to restrict them but the House knows that the estimates of the Department of National Defence will be before us, beginning at three o'clock and rather than ask one or two questions the opportunity for extensive questioning about the very subject which the hon. member has raised could be taken; I think hon. members will agree that questioning on this subject ought to be reserved until then.

Mr. Coates: I am sure hon. members will be assisted materially if we can get some factual information from the minister concerning this matter. I think we should know whether the minister endorses the involvement of national defence forces and their equipment in the area of partisan political endeavours. Also, we should know who is going to pay the bill for such endeavours. I suggest that members of this House do not particularly care whether this form of transport is saving the Prime Minister's time or not when he is involved in partisan political affairs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It might be fair if I were to attempt to answer this question instead of the minister, Mr. Speaker. The fact is that I am leaving tomorrow morning for two days of travel around Ontario, including a lot of smaller centres which do not have airports at which I would land if I were using the Jetstar as is normally done. Like previous prime ministers I will use public transport to take me to these events.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

An hon. Member: Tell us about the picnic!

Mr. Trudeau: I had better hear the supplementaries, Mr. Speaker, and then I shall attempt to deal with them.

Mr. Coates: I should like to ask the Prime Minister this question: if he endorses the use of government aircraft, especially National Defence aircraft, for political meanderings around the Province of Ontario, is he prepared to make such aircraft available to all party leaders in the House so that they can do the same thing and save themselves time?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Not only do I endorse that suggestion but I am practising it—I am practising a custom endorsed by prime ministers long before me, who when they travelled around the country, used public conveyances. It used to be trains and boats; later on it was airplanes, and then helicopters were invented and it was helicopters. I make no apologies for this. If I am expected to visit parts of Canada which are not just big cities with airports, I shall use this means of conveyance.

An hon. Member: To visit Nixon's farm?

An hon. Member: You are breaking our hearts!

Mr. Trudeau: I don't think it is a question of breaking their hearts, Mr. Speaker; I think it is a matter of the votes involved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: An old-fashioned picnic!

Mr. Trudeau: If hon. members opposite would look at the trip which is planned, they will find that I am meeting citizens of Canada in many circumstances—in schools, public meetings and shipyards. If I take a few of my lunches with some Liberals I shall be pleased to do so and I make no apologies for that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): The response of the government members indicates that they are worried that the truth will hurt. The Prime Minister has stated that previous prime ministers used aircraft at the expense of the people of Canada when travelling to political meetings. Mr. Speaker, that did not happen under Mr. Pearson, it did not happen under me and it did not happen—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The issue is simply this: shall the people of Canada pay for partisan activity on the part of the Prime Minister of shall they not? There is nothing wrong with attending meetings but the expense should be borne by the Liberal Party of Canada, not by the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the right hon. member misunderstood what I was saying. I had pointed out that the events I am attending are mostly public events open to the people of Canada. I repeat, I am having a few private meetings with Liberals—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the picnic? Is that not a partisan thing?

Mr. Trudeau: The picnic is open to all citizens of Ontario.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: As long as they have a ticket from the Liberal party.

Mr. Trudeau: And to show the spirit in which this trip is conceived, I would invite the right hon. gentleman to travel with me—not in my helicopter, but there are two other helicopters carrying the press. I hope the right hon. gentleman will feel free to come along to the picnic if he wishes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the Prime Minister for the generosity with which he uses the things of Canada as though they were his own.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST OF UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS FOR APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR TO DEAL WITH EMPLOYEE SUSPENSIONS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. It arises from the request put forward by the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, through Professor Finkelman, for the appointment of a special mediator to deal with the question of disciplinary measures taken in relation to casual workers. In view of the minister's statements to the press about his desire to bargain in good faith, will he now demonstrate his own good faith and tell the House whether he intends to agree to the appointment of a special mediator? If so, will he communicate his agreement on the matter immediately to Professor Finkelman?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): I believe the hon. member, whose opinions on industrial relations I respect, is, unintentionally, I am sure, confusing two issues. In the area of collective bargaining on the national level we gladly agreed to the use of a conciliation officer, hoping, of course, that both sides would drop any prerequisites before they began bargaining. The other issue of disciplinary measures in Montreal is a local matter, one which does not require mediation but simply the application of the relevant provision in the collective agreement. This would permit the application of the grievance procedure and the problem would eventually get to Mr. Finkelman or the PSSRB through the logical grievance channels. If this had been done three months ago it would, no doubt, have resolved many of these difficulties.

Mr. Rodriguez: I have always held the minister in great respect and honour, and he knows that well. But these disciplinary measures which he describes as being local to Montreal are not, in fact, local to Montreal; they also affect Fredericton and the Lakehead. The normal grievance procedure is set up to handle disciplinary problems as they arise in the life of the contract and in view of the fact there are more than 1,000 such disciplinary measures being implemented, does the minister not agree they should be considered separately from the present contract negotiations? Would the minister not reconsider his decision and appoint a special mediator to deal with the cases of nearly 1,000 suspended postal workers?

● (1440)

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to lose the respect of the hon. gentleman, and I say that sincerely. I do feel once again that the suspensions in Montreal have nothing to do with the current bargaining. My only desire is to see that Canadians in this country obtain the type of postal service to which they are entitled, and I am afraid that I would lose his respect far more quickly if I were to bow to blackmail, which I do not intend to do.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would be good enough to assure me that on the political trip that he is taking this week-end he will call in on my riding and make an appearance, since his last appearance there a year ago added 1,000 votes to my majority?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am not surprised, Mr. Speaker. If you check the record you will see that in every picture I was in, there was the hon. member crowding the background.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, it is quite right that I was predominant in all the pictures, and this was because all the people in Prince Edward-Hastings were calling me forward to talk to them instead of the Prime Minister.

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING COUNCIL

DATE OF APPOINTMENT OF CONSUMER REPRESENTATIVE

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and is on a subject matter that is different from the one on which he has just been questioned. The Minister of Agriculture stated in the House on October 3, 1974 that a consumer representative and two other representatives of non-farm groups would shortly be appointed by the government to the Farm Products Marketing Council. Last November 14 the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs told a parliamentary committee that he was hoping for a cabinet decision on this within three weeks. Some eight months have gone by since the government's intentions were first stated. Can the Prime Minister now say when these appointments will be announced by the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think the point is well taken, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the hon. member for jogging my memory on this. I remember that that was the government's stated policy and I will be discussing with the minister to make sure we pursue it as soon as possible.

ALLEGED DISTRIBUTION TO PRIVATE AGENCIES OF CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION ON CANADIANS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Solicitor General a question.

Following the answers to questions No. 238 dated October 3, 1974, where it was admitted that confidential information was given by the Royal Mounted Police to private police agencies on Canadians declared not guilty before the courts, is the minister prepared to forbid the RCMP from releasing such information to private police agencies on citizens who have not yet been found guilty before the courts?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, very often there are people involved in organized crime who have not been convicted before the court, and police forces exchange information on such people if suspicion is very strong but there is not enough evidence for conviction. I cannot promise the hon. member that I will change this policy.

REQUEST OF SURREY FOR SIXTEEN ADDITIONAL OFFICERS—POSSIBLE FORMATION OF PROVINCIAL FORCE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Solicitor General. Recently the municipality of Surrey requested 16 additional RCMP officers be granted to its jurisdiction. Only four additional officers were granted. It is reported that the RCMP is hesitant about sending more officers to British Columbia because the report is that the provincial government is planning its own provincial police force. May I ask the Solicitor General about this report, whether the information is correct, and if it is, what the target date is? If it is not, in view of the fact that Surrey's police force is undermanned on a per capita basis, would the Solicitor General look into and reconsider this request and grant the 16 officers requested by the municipality?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, to begin with, the deployment of RCMP personnel in British Columbia comes under the jurisdiction of the attorney general of British Columbia. With respect to the other question, we have had no indication that British Columbia is planning its own provincial police force. As a matter of fact, I had some discussions with the attorney general, the deputy attorney general and other legal officers from British Columbia a week or so ago. We are presently negotiating a new contract for the RCMP in British Columbia and in other provinces, and British Columbia gave no indication that they did not want the RCMP. How they use the number of men out there and the number they want to sign a contract for is up to them.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

REFUSAL OF LOANS TO CERTAIN FARMERS—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF POLICY

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. It has recently come to my attention that the Farm Credit Corporation has been refusing applications for loans by successful farmers on the basis that they do not need the loans. I would ask the minister whether he will have this policy of the Farm Credit Corporation reassessed, because it should be obvious to the minister that decreasing farm incomes coupled with increasing input costs make it necessary for many farmers to expand their operation in order to maintain their income.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the intent of the Farm Credit Corporation legislation is to lend money to those people who cannot get money any place else. I specifically instructed the Farm Credit Corporation to adhere to the legislation. Those people whose net worth allows them to get money from trust companies and private lending sources should get money in that way. Farm Credit Corporation money should go to those farmers whose financial position is such that they cannot borrow money any place else; these are the farmers we should be helping.

Mr. McKinley: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me from my discussions with Farm Credit Corporation officials that most applications that come in are from those who either do not have enough equity, in which case they are turned down, or from those whom the minister says probably have too much and do not need a loan. What good is the Farm Credit Corporation if they are not going to do anything for any of the farmers?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the Farm Credit Corporation, since I have been minister, has doubled the amount of money that it has lent and has almost doubled the number of farmers to whom it has lent money per year. It has done a good job. The recent legislation that was passed was specially geared to young farmers between the ages of 18 and 35, and 50 per cent of the loans went to these farmers last year. More than 50 per cent will be lent to them this year; so far 54 per cent of our budget has been lent.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MR. GÉRIN-LAJOIE CONCERNING PUBLIC ACCOUNT OF CIDA OPERATIONS—PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of Mr. Gérin-Lajoie's statement yesterday that CIDA will have to give an account of its actions to the public in greater detail and more often, would the Prime Minister inform us whether or not this means that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be tabling the Price-Waterhouse study on CIDA management, all correspondence between Ottawa and Kenya involving the Kenyan technical teachers college and the $2 million loan, and confirmation of the information regarding CIDA's loan to Cuba? Was Mr. Gérin-Lajoie announcing policy and will the minister table these matters in the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, not having heard the statement I cannot say whether Mr. Gérin-Lajoie had those particular points in mind, but I will ask him to look at it. Perhaps he was thinking of all those exact points.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I direct to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I assume that the minister has in fact seen the statement by Mr. Gérin-Lajoie. Because of those statements and by reason of them, can we assume that the minister will now recommend or support the establishment of a committee or sub-committee to study the affairs of CIDA, and in particular foreign aid?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I know that the Standing Committee on National Defence and External Affairs did suggest that it be given a further reference to deal with the general question of international development. I hope that if any such reference is to be forthcoming it will be broad enough to include a consideration of the economic relations between the developing and developed world. It is in light of that particular request that I am considering a reference. I should like the committee to have the opportunity to discuss, consider and report upon the policies that Canada is following in the field of international development, and indeed, if possible, to make proposals on how we can develop a policy with respect to our economic relations with the developing world.

REGIONAL WAGE POLICY IN ATLANTIC REGION—SATIRICAL SKIT BY CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, is the President of the Treasury Board aware of a recent program or skit by the CBC in the Atlantic region portraying in a satirical but truthful manner the regional wage disparity policy being followed by the federal government in respect of certain federal employees in the Atlantic region?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I did not see that CBC skit.

[English]

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, will the minister arrange then to get a copy of the tape of this program and listen to it, and after he does will he indicate whether it is his intention to take steps to eliminate the present discriminatory regional wage disparity philosophy followed by the federal government?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have already explained the government's policy in that respect. In certain sectors, some prefer to have regional policies, while in other sectors some would prefer national rates, but I shall ask the CBC for its viewpoint and study it.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF DECISION NOT TO TEST FOR MERCURY POISONING AMONG NATIVES

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, the last time I questioned the Minister of National Health and Welfare we had a discussion about arsenic, but today I want to talk about mercury. In view of the fact the National Indian Brotherhood survey of hair samples in Yellowknife showed one reading of 180 parts per million of mercury in the hair of a ten year old girl, and in view of the fact the minister's department has called 60 parts per million of mercury the "dangerous level", will the minister reconsider his decision not to do further tests for mercury?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I missed the last part of the question and I wonder if I could hear it again.

Mr. Speaker: Would the minister reconsider his decision not to conduct further tests?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I never said there would be no further tests. I said further examinations would be carried out in cases which appeared to be above that level, or where there is any cause for further tests to be carried out.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF OIL REFINERY AT EASTPORT, MAINE—POSSIBLE CONSULTATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, according to a news release the New York based Pittston Company on Wednesday received state approval for a proposed $500 million coastal oil refinery complex on the northernmost Maine coast at the fishing village of Eastport. In view of the fact Canadian territorial waters will have to be used to get to this fogbound deep-water port, and the possibility of oil spills which could damage the fishing industry of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicate whether there has been any consultation between the minister and his United States counterpart in respect of this particular matter, and has he agreed with U.S. officials to the movement through Canadian waters in order to service this proposed plant?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has taken a very strong attitude in opposition to the movement of such tankers through the Head Harbour passage. The hon. member refers to a decision that is pending from the Maine environmental board. I understand that decision is due in the middle of June. There is some preliminary indication as to what the decision may be. We have already declared our opposition to any such movement of materials, for environmental reasons, but we would want to wait until we see the actual decision before we make further comment.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

POSSIBLE USE OF GOVERNMENT AIRCRAFT BY PRIME MINISTER'S STAFF IN PREPARING FOR POLITICAL EVENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister and is supplementary to an earlier range of questions in respect of which the Prime Minister indicated his intention to use government aircraft for Liberal party purposes. I should like to ask whether government helicopters or other aircraft were used by advance men of the Prime Minister in arranging this particular partisan trip this week-end, or for any of his other recent trips involving partisan functions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As to the question itself, Mr. Speaker, I would have to inquire, but on the qualifications of the trip I wish to remind the hon. member that, as I said in an answer a few minutes ago, the trip involves many events including a visit to a shipyard at Collingwood, a visit to a senior citizens recreational centre in Waterloo, and a question and answer session with students of a high school, I believe in Barrie, as well as a fish fry in Port Dover, to which the right. hon. gentleman from Prince Albert is invited. I think it is quite unfair to ask this type of question based on false premises when all I am attempting to do is bring government a bit closer to the people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister seems to have missed the display of aerial wizardry, political impediments and other activities at the farm of the Liberal leader in Ontario. I should like to ask him a question regarding policy. Is it the policy of the Prime Minister that his staff should have access to government helicopters or government aircraft to advance trips of his which include on the itinerary activities such as the Nixon picnic, which are clearly and simply partisan political events? Is that the policy of the government of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in so far as the hon. member is so interested in the picnic, I want to tell him that I understand Mr. Nixon is a good farmer in Ontario and I am interested in the farming problems of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: In a less serious vein, Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear, and I hope it is not libellous, that I do not know if there is a swimming pool, but I am going there anyhow.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: He has a manure pile that's for sure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: On the question of the advance, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Be serious.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN ROYAL RECOMMENDATION TO BILL C-62

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question similar to one asked yesterday by the hon. member for Peace River regarding a problem we find in respect of Bill C-62 and a royal proclamation reference to marriage, whereas in the definition section of the bill there is reference to other than marriage. Has the government extricated itself from this very peculiar situation and, if so, what is its intention?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, when the House leader of the opposition raised the question I thought he was being humorous, but I find he was not. The problem is that while it would be possible to justify the terms of the royal recommendation in English, since "marriage" has many meanings, including legal marriage and other kinds of cohabitation, I find when I look at the French version it states "conjoint", which almost surely means legal marriage. My intention, therefore, is to ask unanimous consent tomorrow when the bill is called to an amended version of the recommendation.

TRANSPORT

REFUSAL OF CANADIAN PACIFIC TO ENTER INTO CONTRACT WITH CANADIAN STEAMSHIP LINES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Transport consider a strong request to the CNR to enter into a unilateral contract with the CSL to continue the packet steamship business on the Great Lakes in view of the reported refusal of the CPR to continue this vital service, and would he consider a subsidy if necessary to keep the service going in view of its importance and the fact that if the service disappears the Minister of Transport will be forced to supplement the revenue received by several harbour commissions from this vital service?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would surely, as I have already, support an understanding between CSL and the railways. As far as subsidies are concerned, I think the CTC is the proper organization to decide this. I am very worried about this problem and I am trying to solve it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants rises on a question of privilege.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the government House leader if he could give us the business of the House for the balance of this week and perhaps as far into the future as he might be able to see.

Mr. Nowlan: Beyond three o'clock.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, may I first of all designate the remaining allotted days. I should like to designate June 9, 12, 13, 17, 18 and 19 as allotted days, pursuant to Standing Order 58.

Tomorrow we intend to call Bill C-62, having satisfied the hon. member that the recommendation will be in good order. Then on Tuesday and Wednesday I would like, if possible, to deal with certain matters that are of considerable urgency. I gather that the Senate has now submitted its amendments to the petroleum administration act. We wish to call that act so as to get it approved quickly. I also hope that in due course we will get the Petro-Can bill out of committee because it is equally urgent.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): May I ask a further question with respect to government business? In view of the statement in the early part of the question period, by the Prime Minister, that he would be prepared to take part in a debate on the question of nuclear proliferation and perhaps other aspects of our foreign policy in government time, would the government House leader consider entering into discussion with the other House leaders and taking whatever steps might be necessary so that we could discuss the matter on a day during government business?

Mr. Sharp: As I understood the Prime Minister, he did say that if the opposition would call this business on one of the allotted days, he would be present and so would all those ministers whom the opposition would like to have present, and I stand by that offer.

FINANCE

TABLING OF FINAL REPORT OF TAX MEASURES REVIEW COMMITTEE

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 41(2), and in accordance with my undertaking given to the House on February 19, 1973, I wish to table the final report on corporate tax measures of the Tax Measures Review Committee, in both official languages.

IMMIGRATION POLICY

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. T. Lefebvre (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move the motion on behalf of the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell). As chairman of the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy, he is travelling in the maritimes with his committee.

Mr. Lefebvre (for Mr. O'Connell) moved that the first report of the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy, presented to the House on Monday, June 2, 1975, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the spokesman for our party on immigration matters is not here; he is also travelling with the committee. I do not wish to hold up this matter, but I think it should be on the record that we earlier pointed out this particular problem to the minister and said that more than likely we will be running into trouble. At that time the minister did not think we would be running into trouble, but I am pleased to note he has reversed himself and now appreciates the fact that this matter is of some significance. It would be impossible to reach a decision by July 31. Accordingly, I am sure that the chairman, for whom I speak, would give unanimous consent for us to proceed, keeping in mind a subsequent date.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there has been sufficient study of this report for it to be accepted unanimously.

Mr. Speaker: There is no question of accepting the report unanimously. A motion is made for concurrence in the report. It is a debatable motion and the debate may ensue forthwith; otherwise, the question is put. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE TO BE FOLLOWED ON GOVERNMENT ORDERS TODAY

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, you will recall the confusion that ensued at the conclusion of the consideration of the estimates of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I wonder whether we might avoid that confusion this evening if an order of the House is made that after the votes on the items of the Department of National Defence are taken, the remainder of the time be devoted to the expression of grievances, on condition that no more than half the time be taken in the statement of the grievance.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, that is quite agreeable to us. I assure you that if any member on this side of the House raises a question of privilege and tries to speak for too long, we will be just as anxious as the government House leader to stop him. We are very anxious to see gentlemen's agreements established in the House and always carried out as agreed upon, which unfortunately has not always been the case.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I rise on the same point, Mr. Speaker. As I understand the discussions which we had, this arrangement was to be for this evening alone. We might consider something else at a later time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are party to this arrangement. I have spoken with my friends further down the aisle and we all agree to it.

Mr. Reid: Do I understand the arrangement to be that half the time will be taken by someone raising a grievance, and the government having the remainder of the time to reply to the grievance?

Mr. Speaker: Can it be taken as agreed that at 9.45 p.m. all necessary questions pursuant to the Standing Order will be put to dispose of the items examined in committee of the whole, and half the time remaining between then and ten o'clock will be used for whatever grievance is raised, while the other half will be absorbed by the response of the government? Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,255, 2,425, 2,426, 2,472, 2,497, 2,508, 2,509, 2,510, 2,511, 2,512, 2,513, 2,514, 2,515, 2,516 and 2,517.

Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call starred question No. 2,486?

I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Order Paper Questions

● (1510)

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order somewhat similar to one I have raised on two or three occasions without any response whatsoever from the parliamentary secretary. Therefor I think I am justified and it is appropriate that I raise it again. I refer, first, to question No. 32 placed on the order paper on September 30 in this parliament and standing on the order paper in the previous parliament back to a little over one year ago. It is still unanswered. This question asks for information regarding the use of government helicopters by the Prime Minister to travel on April 25, 1974, to the Ontario Liberal Party annual meeting in Sudbury. It is a very simple and straightforward question asking for facts withheld for a year.

The other question I speak about is No. 69, also on the order paper for approximately one year in this parliament and the last, asking for a list of all trips made by the Prime Minister which in any way included political or pleasure trips. This question has also been unanswered for a year.

I think that having now risen three or four times to ask why these questions have not been answered, I am owed an answer by the parliamentary secretary or by the President of the Privy Council, because it is utterly ridiculous when someone asks for legitimate information that a year should go by, and that it should be raised three or four times with absolutely no response from the government. I can, therefore, only say that if these questions are not answered, or if I cannot receive some assurance that answers will be forthcoming, it is a pure and simple case of the Prime Minister trying to hide the number of times he has put his hand into the public cash register.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, on a similar point of order, I would like to bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary my question No. 1,283 which was placed on the order paper on January 24. It is a straight forward question simply asking which areas of government make available lists which can be used by commercial firms for direct mail campaigns. I do not think there is anything complicated about it and I am wondering what the reason for the delay in getting an answer might be.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. Pursuant to Standing Order 54, I do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of the whole.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58

House in committee of supply to consider a certain item for the year ending March 31, 1976, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 58(9)—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Resolved that a sum not exceeding $2,055,173,000 be granted to Her Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1976 (less the amount voted in interim supply) as follows:

Vote 1—Defence Services—Operating expenditures and authority for total commitments, subject to allotment by the Treasury Board, of $6,452,513,000 for the purposes of Votes 1, 5, 10 and 15 of the Department regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $3,834,333,352 will come due for payment in future years), authority to make payments from any of the said Votes to Provinces or Municipalities as contributions toward construction done by those bodies, authority, subject to the direction of the Treasury Board, to make recoverable expenditures or advances from any of the said Votes in respect of materiels supplied to or services performed on behalf of individuals, corporations, outside agencies, other government departments and agencies and other governments and authority to spend revenue, as authorized by Treasury Board, received during the year for the purposes of any of the said Votes—$2,055,173,000.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, most of my opposite numbers seem to have disappeared, but I wonder if there have been any arrangements made regarding the time for questions and answers in today's discussion, similar to those made on other occasions.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that we are to revert to a form of procedure where hon. members have 20 minutes each and are able to rise again if seen by the Chair. These are the arrangements for today only.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask whether the 20 minutes allotted to each member includes time for answers from the minister, or what is the plan?

Mr. McKinnon: I would be quite agreeable to that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, my understanding was that we were to have 15-minute speeches and that there would be time within those 15 minutes for questions. It would be a matter of choice for those speaking as to whether they wished to use the full time to talk, or to have questions answered, but either or both would be included within the 15 minutes.

The Chairman: Order, please. Considering what has just been said, I think it might be worth while for hon. members concerned perhaps to get together and come to some agreement, because the interpretations of what has been said by the hon. member for Victoria and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre may not correspond.

If we proceed without any agreement and follow the 20-minute rule, every time an hon. member rises after an answer, he is allowed another 20 minutes. I would like the committee, if an agreement is made, to let the Chair know when an hon. member will be entitled to seek the floor for the second time. The previous agreement allowed an hon. member to speak a second time if other members from his party yielded to him at one time or another. Otherwise this will be difficult to apply if we have to follow the general rule as laid down in the Standing Orders.

Mr. Paproski: I think the House leaders could meet in this regard while the hon. member for Victoria carries on with his speech. I think that would be the proper way to do it, so that we will not waste any time. I wonder if that is agreeable to all hon. members.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, I cannot accept the proposal the minister has put forward, that we have a total of 15 minutes for asking questions and being provided with answers. That would only indicate that the minister does not want a proper examination of his estimates. I hope that when the House leaders meet they will at least allow half an hour for hon. members to make partial speeches and to have proper exchanges with the minister. It cannot be done in 15 minutes.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, I was reflecting the practice as outlined to me by the House leader. It is not an invention of mine but it has been the practice previously when estimates have been considered in this way in committee of the whole.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, we could, of course, go out and have a meeting, but that takes time and perhaps one or two of the House leaders would have to be found. Since there seems to be resistance to the idea of cutting it to 15 minutes, and since 20 minutes is the time set out in the rules, I wonder if we could agree on the 20-minute formula, which is 20 minutes to a member, with each member being free to speak for the whole 20 minutes or to divide it between himself and the minister for the purpose of answering questions; in other words, the same practice that we followed last time, except that the allotment would be 20 minutes instead of 15 minutes.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I presume that as far as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is concerned, he is saying that the committee procedure mentioned by Your Honour could still be followed and that an hon. member could yield to another member of his own party. I think that is quite reasonable. As we all know, hon. members do have the opportunity to speak more than once during proceedings in committee of the whole and I think that would be agreeable.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Chairman, to avoid discussing this matter of procedure until dinner time, I believe it would be better to favour a 20-minute period for each speaker. During this 20-minute period, if answers are required of the minister, they will be included within that time. But if a speaker wishes to keep the floor to himself during those twenty minutes, he will be free to do so.

[English]

The Chairman: There seems to be at least some agreement at this stage which I will try to sum up and clarify. It appears to be unanimously agreed that an hon. member will be entitled to have the floor for 20 minutes either to make a speech or for the purpose of asking questions. If a member does ask questions, the time used by the minister will be included in his 20 minutes, but the use of this 20-minute time limit will not preclude hon. members from speaking again if their party colleagues yield to them. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Chairman, having heeded the Prime Minister's admonition of this past Monday to read Machiavelli, I should like to begin today's debate with a quote from that source as follows:

> There is nothing more true than that if there are no soldiers where there are men it is not owing to any natural or local defect but is solely the fault of the prince.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: Let us remember this, for indeed the current state of affairs which finds the forces undermanned, overtasked, ill-directed and armed with obsolete equipment is the result of a decade of neglect by the government. Given neither thoughtful direction by cabinet nor the resources needed to maintain an effective, modern force, the Department of National Defence has been allowed to drift to its present state of near chaos.

Canada is not a militarist state. We do not seek to be awesome and feared. Yet an ability to defend one's sovereignty and to fulfil one's international obligations is necessary: it is a prerequisite for even a "just society". Perhaps the Prime Minister would prefer this to be couched in the terms of the classics, and for this I turn once more to Machiavelli, who said:

> Neither abundance of money nor natural strength of the country will suffice, nor will the loyalty and goodwill of his subjects endure. For these cannot remain faithful to a prince who is incapable of defending them. Neither mountains nor lakes nor inaccessible places will present any difficulties to an enemy where there is a lack of brave defenders.

It is tempting, Mr. Chairman, to discuss once again some of the specific problems which plague the armed forces; indeed, such an exposition could be continued for days. However, I will instead discuss broader policy questions for I was particularly struck by a statement which the Prime Minister is reported to have made—a statement to the effect that democratic governments cannot expect the people they represent to support defence policies automatically and without question, and that a continuous challenging of tactics and strategies was necessary for the government to be convinced of their worth and, in turn, for it to be able to convince parliament and the people of the worth of those policies.

It was, therefore, with some eagerness that I awaited the Prime Minister's statement on the NATO conference, for major changes are taking place and extremely important decisions are being made within the alliance. I thought he would perhaps outline the government's position and, at the very least, he would surely acquaint us with the issues as he saw them and encourage a dialogue. I was to be disappointed. I use the words of the member for Oshawa-Whitby, who said:

On the question of NATO and the role Canada is to play in NATO, we got absolutely nothing from the Prime Minister.

Given that the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence are unwilling to discuss the current strategic and military situation internationally or within NATO, I feel that it is my duty to give the report that the Prime Minister should have given on Monday and raise this subject in the hope that it will provoke greater discussion of the decision which Canada must make soon with respect to its defence policy.

The past two years have brought great changes in the military situation in many areas of the world. The Yom Kippur war, the ensuing oil embargo and price rise, all have drastically altered the economic situation and consequently the military situation in the Middle East. The seemingly eternal war in Viet Nam seems now to be over. Cyprus has been invaded by Turkey, bringing Turkey and Greece to the brink of war. Finally, Portugal has begun to divest herself of African colonies. These events have not been without their internal causes and repercussions, but more of that later.

The diplomatic scene, too, has been far from quiet. The Strategic Arms Limitations Talks—SALT—have resulted in an initial agreement; the conference on security and co-operation in Europe seems about to produce some accords; talks between Arabs and Israelis continue sporadically. While the age of détente may seem to be upon us, let us not delude ourselves that the world is as we might wish it to be. Consider, for example, this assessment by the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute:

SALT and certain other arms control measures have, of course, had very important, far reaching political consequences. In particular, they have significantly contributed to the improvement of relations between some states. But, in general, they have not produced any actual disarmament, nor have they even stopped the arms race.

There are two observations to be emphasized from this statement: firstly, we are in, and are likely to remain in, an era of a balance of terror, one of mutual assured destruction capabilities; secondly, the relations between states and their perceptions of each other's intentions are very important. On this latter point, let me give an example from the structure of forces in Europe. On the NATO side there is widespread concern over the very offensive disposition of the Warsaw Pact troops, a concern heightened by the latter's overwhelming superiority in armoured forces. On the other hand, the Warsaw Pact must be concerned with NATO's reliance on quick reaction aircraft as they are very vulnerable to a pre-emptive attack and, therefore, must be perceived as rather offensive weapons themselves. This intense interest with intentions and capabilities may seem abstract and academic, but in our nervous world it is, quite literally, of deadly importance.

Let us now turn for a moment to see just what the specific outcomes of the strategic agreements have been. The first meeting, the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks—SALT I—resulted in an interim agreement signed in 1972. Generally speaking, it froze the holdings of intercontinental missiles, but not warheads, at 1,054 for the United States and 1,618 for the U.S.S.R. The number of submarine-launched ballistic missiles, or SLBMs, was likewise frozen at 656 for the United States and 740 for Russia. You will notice that Russia was higher in both cases. The SLBM levels were raised later, however, owing to an ongoing U.S.S.R. submarine building program, to 710 missiles on 44 submarines for the Americans and 950 missiles for the U.S.S.R., on 62 submarines.

[Mr. McKinnon.]

In brief, the United States agreed to superior numbers of heavier missiles for the Russians; this was because the United States held a technological lead in the production of multiple independently-targeted re-entry vehicles, or MIRVs, which in plain language means a missile with several warheads.

The next agreement was the Vladivostok agreement of last November. This new agreement limits each side to 2,400 missiles or heavy bombers, of which 1,320 can carry MIRVs. It is my feeling that the Vladivostok agreement, while it sets numerical ceilings on the strategic arms levels, has several serious faults: first, the restriction is on numbers and not on qualitative developments; second, the limits are too high by far. Moreover, many major problems were ignored: for example, the identification of MIRV missiles cannot be done with current surveillance methods. No one will be able to tell whether any country has exceeded the limit of their MIRV missiles. Finally, the omission of the Russian "backfire" bomber, cruise missiles, strike aircraft, bomber standoff missiles and IRBMs from the list indicates how much further the negotiations must go.

Due to the lack of a qualitative ceiling, the Russians are at present flight testing four new missiles. The U.S.S.R. has always had an advantage in weight per missile, and it is estimated that if the new missiles are all deployed the U.S.S.R. would have a "throw weight" advantage of five or six to one; that is, ten million to twelve million pounds for the Russians to two million pounds for the United States. This possible imbalance caused President Ford to indicate that they might try to develop a new rocket motor technology in an attempt to catch up.

I believe that civilization's best chance for survival is for these two superpowers to remain fairly equally balanced militarily. In the short term and over the intermediate term perhaps we can talk them down from the over-arming of the recent past. The limitations imposed by SALT I and Vladivostok are, at best, only a start.

Turning from the global strategic situation, let us now look at the European theatre and in particular at the political pressures within NATO. Over the course of the past few years the relations between NATO states have shifted dramatically. The most obvious example is that of Turkey and Greece; set off by the events on Cyprus and fueled by disagrcement in the Aegean, the discord between the two has reached a point where it threatens the very existence of NATO's so-called "southern flank".

● (1530)

There has also arisen a basic difference in attitude between the United States and France. President Giscard seeks to be a bridgebuilder between industrialized, oil consuming Europe and the OPEC group as well as other third world producers. President Ford, in contrast, has sought a common front of industrialized oil consumers to exert joint pressures on the producers. In this pursuit, the Americans have tended to see NATO as an economic as well as a military alliance that should strengthen the western position.

Tensions and uncertainties have also arisen because of changes within certain countries. Perhaps the most important changes are being made within the United States where, occasioned by the collapse of the South Vietnamese régime, a reassessment and debate on basic external policy issues seems to be starting. This debate will certainly be important to NATO simply because of the predominant role which the U.S. plays in the alliance.

Forced to do so by her economic plight, Britain has decided upon a substantial reduction in her armed forces and on a withdrawal from the Mediterranean. This will, like the Turkey-Greece dispute, seriously affect the southern flank, although a recent Italian decision to strengthen her navy may offset the British action to some degree.

Finally, and again on the southern flank, there is Portugal. After decades under a right-wing dictatorship, the majority of the Portuguese people are now trying to establish a functioning democracy. We who have been blessed with democracy for a century—I consider that 1867 to 1975 is more than a century—may not realize how difficult this is. There is the very real possibility that the attempt at democracy will fail and end in left-wing dictatorship. This would be tragic, just as a lapse back to right-wing dictatorship would be tragic.

I was pleased to see that the government has invited a Portuguese mission to Ottawa to discuss bilateral trade arrangements. Anything which Canada can do to strengthen the democratic forces in Portugal is to the good. While in narrow military terms the changes in Portugal add uncertainty to the NATO picture, we must accept this and try to show to the Portuguese people that NATO can be a beneficial economic as well as military organization and that it encourages democracy. In summing up the Portuguese situation, I will quote from an editorial in the Edmonton Journal: It says:

> Let Portugal sort out her own internal affairs and work out her own destiny. NATO will be better off with a healthy relationship with whatever new Portugal emerges from the present upheavals, than tied to the forces of reaction and repression that have inevitably provoked their own unpopularity and downfall.

With the conclusion of this brief examination of some of the recent political trends in NATO, I will now turn, Mr. Chairman, to more direct military questions. Just at the time when the developments on the southern flank threaten the viability of NATO as a regional alliance, an unprecedented and particularly worrisome disparity in armoured strength has developed between NATO and the Warsaw Pact countries. According to the International Institute for Strategic Studies, while the figures for northern and central Europe are, NATO 620,000 troops versus Warsaw Pact 910,000, in main battle tanks the figures are, NATO 7,000 versus Warsaw Pact 20,000.

It has been the custom over the past three decades to console ourselves in the face of these odds by remembering the nuclear deterrent; that is, if the U.S.S.R. attacked our numerically inferior forces on the ground in western Europe, then we would use tactical nuclear battlefield weapons. This has always seemed to me to be a very unsatisfactory answer. I have never been able to convince myself that the use of atomic weapons can be restricted to narrow military battlefields. While the first nuclear weapon might be used on a troop concentration, the next one is as likely to be used on a staging area, and so on, until within hours Washington and Moscow are targets and the holocaust is upon us.

I am certain that I have not been alone in my concern about the practicality or sanity of the atomic deterrent being our only deterrent in western Europe. We have seen NATO progress from the original "trip-wire" theory to the "flexible response", and to "selective targeting" where the targets would be military installations rather than cities. This is supposed to give the President of the United States a broader range of options than existed previously, provided of course that he is still around after the other side exercises its option.

The use of battlefield nuclear weapons has become an important issue of debate within NATO itself. Senator Nunn's amendment in the U.S. Senate requested the U.S. department of defence to examine and justify the 7,000 nuclear warheads in western Europe—the U.S.S.R. in comparison, is thought to have between 3,500 and 7,000. The basic quandary remains unchanged, however. A strong deterrent position on the part of the United States gives their NATO allies a false sense of security and they immediately react by reducing their conventional forces. On the other hand, any evident lack of resolve to use the deterrent encourages the only possible enemy and arouses European fears that the strategic support of the United States would evaporate under the pressure of all-out nuclear confrontation.

Mr. Schlesinger is a strong supporter of "essential equivalence." He has pointed out:

> Deterrence is not a substitute for defence: defensive capabilities, representing the potential for offensive counteraction are the essential conditions of deterrence. This simple truth becomes especially evident in a crisis, when forces designed only for "deterrence" are increasingly found to be lacking in credibility both to opponents and to potential users.

This question of the credibility of the deterrence is crucial. As long as we rely solely upon a nuclear deterrent, any aggressor whose objectives are limited can delude himself that his aggression will not provoke a nuclear response. A capability for a balanced and suitable reaction to a wide range of situations is the keystone of any reasonable defence policy.

Given that an effective NATO capable of responding to many different situations is a necessary part of western European stability and, hence, of Canadian security, two questions should be asked of the Canadian involvement. First, are we doing our share in NATO? Second, is the money Canada is spending being used wisely? Our share in NATO, it would seem to a fairminded person, should be based on our resources and our ability to commit them. On examination one finds that our military budget, based on percentage of our GNP, comes in twelfth out of 13, being ahead of tiny Luxembourg only. We are seen to be a wealthy nation acting as the cheapest skate in NATO.

As for the wisdom with which the money is spent, NATO as a whole leaves much to be desired in the way of economic husbanding of funds. A recent study commissioned by the U.S. Senate, the Callaghan report, points out that NATO has wasted something over $20 billion by failure to standardize equipment or to co-ordinate research. A lack of standardization in communications equipment can be dangerous as well as expensive. During a recent NATO exercise in the north Atlantic, the simulator read-out at the end of the exercise showed that NATO forces had shot down 30 of about 60 of their own aircraft deployed for combat, patrol and interdiction, largely due to the communications problem.

The cost of nationalism can be high. Britain decided to buy the U.S. Phantom but to put a Rolls-Royce engine in it. According to the chairman of the British House of Commons public accounts committee, if the development costs amounting to some £100 million are taken into account, the unit cost of the 170 United Kingdom Phantom aircraft becomes nearly double that of the U.S. version and does not perform as well.

Canada must assume her share of the responsibility for decision-making in NATO. Canada researched and developed the Arrow, the Bobcat and the Bras d'Or without a production run on any of them, which exemplifies the lack of careful selection of projects and the lack of direction and resolve that characterizies this government's approach to defence policy.

Mr. Chairman, I have, as I stated at the beginning, attempted to present to the House and to the Canadian people, as a background for debate, the current strategic situation as it faces NATO and Canada. It is the government's unwillingness to take the people of Canada into their confidence on any but the most parochial of military matters that has caused me on this occasion to assume what should be a government responsibility. In closing for this round, Mr. Chairman, may I for the minister's benefit make one final quote from Machiavelli:

Those who rise from private citizens to be princes merely by fortune have little trouble in rising, but very much in maintaining their position.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the hon. member for Victoria for bringing before this House the subject of defence, a subject which is not particularly popular with the press or with the general public. Yet no one who thinks about the subject can doubt its importance. Our sovereignty depends upon our defence. The maintenance of a stable world and stable peace depends upon methods of defence such as peacekeeping. The economic consequence of an expenditure of more than $2 billion a year of our budget makes it a subject that we have an obligation to consider.

● (1540)

I am afraid that what I am going to say will not very much interest the Minister of National Defence. I am going to discuss a subject which I have previously discussed with him and the House. I do not think the minister will find very much that is new. I believe the major decision that has been made in the field of defence is a wrong decision. I refer to the decision to renew the agreement known as NORAD. I know that the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence has made a majority report recommending such action. I want to take this opportunity to say that a minority of that committee, and I do not know whether it consisted of other than myself and the hon. member for New Westminster—

[Mr. McKinnon.]

Mr. Leggatt: And the hon. member for Fraser Valley West.

Mr. Brewin: The three of us had a different view. I shall briefly try to state that view. We thought the result of the recommendation should be that our government should confer at an early date with the government of the United States, with a view to working out a new, effective means of co-operation in the fields of early warning, detection, surveillance and, where necessary, interception with regard to any invasions of North American air space.

I want to point out again to this House that the stated purpose of NORAD has long been obsolete. That stated purpose was defence against the manned bomber. Although there is lip service paid from time to time, including the majority report of the committee and the minister's statements, to the diminishing, de-emphasized, reduced threat of manned bombers, we continue to say that although that is no longer the principal objective of NORAD it is, in a somewhat reduced form, one of the major objectives. When speaking to the committee on February 27, the minister said:

The first factor to be considered is the bomber threat.

He went on to say that as the Soviet Union has built up its strategic missile forces, the relative importance of manned bombers has continued to decline. The Soviet Union, nonetheless, continues to maintain a sizeable force of longrange bombers, and as long as it does he believes the security interests of this country necessitate our continuing this defence against manned bombers. I am not quoting the minister exactly. Precisely the same view was expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. While he admitted that the bomber threat was of a lesser degree than the missile threat, he still thought that Canada should co-operate with the United States in the maintenance of some form of defence against the bomber threat.

In our view, the time has come to bury this hoary myth and fallacy once and for all, clearly and unequivocally. There is no longer a realistic threat of the use of Soviet bombers in an all-out attack on North America. Expert opinion, common sense and the actions of the U.S.S.R. confirm this opinion. In 1968, the then United States Secretary of Defence, Mr. McNamara, was asked this question in a committee of the Senate, by Senator Miller:

Looking down the road, is it not feasible that they—

That is referring to the U.S.S.R.

—might have as an option the use of selective targets with their bombers and no resort to missiles at least in the early stages of the war?

Secretary McNamara replied:

Completely inconceivable, I think. The reason is that by launching these bombers against our warning systems, they would give us the opportunity to retaliate before they hit us.

I wish to put on record a more recent quotation from James Schlesinger, the United States Secretary of Defence. I am not quoting obscure, theoretical men, but the people responsible for the defence of North America as a whole under the treaty, and certainly of the United States. He said, in 1974:

> Without an effective anti-missile defence precluded to both the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. by ABM (SALT) treaty of 1972, a defence against Soviet bombers is of little practical value.

General Guy Simonds, formerly chief of staff in this country, when speaking to the defence committee of this House as long ago as 1964 said that the two or three hours warning of an impending manned bomber attack afforded by the early warning and detection system eliminated the possibility of such an attack unless the Russians were crazy. He said they clearly were not crazy then, and they are not crazy now. Those who continue to speak of the continuing, albeit diminishing threat of a manned bomber attack on North America—as the committee report does, and the minister from time to time—refuse to assess the continued reality of such a threat. They refuse to attribute any degree of rationality to their opponents. Their refusal to meet this argument head-on suggests that it is unanswerable. As a last resort, they state that reality of the threat of the bombers rests in the fact that the U.S.S.R. has continued to maintain some 140 aging intercontinental bombers. It has not increased the number and did not even at the time it was substantially expanding its missiles armoury.

In the Vladivostok understanding arising out of the SALT agreement, the two great nuclear powers set a limit on their delivery systems for nuclear weapons. They included both missiles and manned bombers within the limit. It seems absolutely clear that the U.S.S.R. has no intention of embarking once again on an expanded international manned bomber program. The minister might ask why, then, the U.S.S.R. continues to maintain the present stock of manned bombers. The answer seems to have been given to our committee by Professor David Cox of Queen's University, and I quote:

> It is equally plausible for the Soviet Union to take the view that by maintaining a bomber force at however low level a capacity, they can also force the United States and Canada to maintain anti-bomber defences at a much greater rate of financial attrition.

In other words, they maintain them to induce us to continue what we have been doing without any sense for years, that is, maintain under NORAD a substantial means of meeting a threat they would not carry out, as General Simonds said, unless they were crazy. I suggest the survival of the theory of defence against a manned bomber threat is not just a matter of academic interest; it justifies a mentality that diverts Canadian defence from its essential roles. The essence of a sound defence policy, particularly in an era of inflation and the diminishing value of the defence dollar, is to concentrate on essential roles and to provide effective means and equipment to combat real threats. We must discard the mentality that continues to meet threats which, if they ever were real, have long since become obsolete.

I think the real choice before the committee and before the government was, not whether we should renew NORAD or completely repudiate co-operation in defence matters, especially affecting air space, with the United States but whether a better approach might have been to say to the United States: We face a new situation. The main purpose of the old treaty has disappeared. We want to negotiate new means of dealing with the threat to our common air space. We no longer believe that joint control is an essential part of these arrangements and we want to see whether we can operate these things on our own with an exchange of information and quite possibly an exchange of weapons. We think that would be a better way of handling this situation.

However, it appears the minister did not even address his mind to this alternative. For him, it was NORAD or nothing. He closed his mind to the alternative which was available, a new arrangement of a different type. He did not ask his staff or his military advisers about it; he told us so in committee. He did not discuss this matter with the United States. Mr. Chairman, we have never questioned the proposition that we should co-operate with the United States in many of these areas. What was questioned was whether we should continue this particular form of co-operation when in our view it is no longer necessary.

The main argument used by the Minister of National Defence and by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in favour of the continuation of NORAD was that to do so was essential to satisfactory relations with the United States. We pressed the minister on this contention. We asked him who told him that this was the case. He could think of nothing but vague conversations a long time ago with Mr. Schlesinger.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs assured us that the United States wanted this agreement continued. When we pressed him for reasons, conversations, letters, articles or anything which showed this view to have substance, we drew a complete blank. So the main argument in favour of the renewal of NORAD, the impact or the alleged impact of non-renewal on Canadian-United States relations, was not supported by evidence and the government's automatic willingness to accept the renewal of NORAD without question is an example of mental subservience, an example of the lack of an independent will to make decisions for ourselves.

Given the view which I believe most people share—though not all, I admit—that the NORAD agreement is no longer of military value, why must we defer to the possibly imaginary view that failure to renew it might irritate the United States? The sovereignty of our air space is important and it should not lightly be sacrificed. But even more important is independence of thought in policy-making. This is a basic element of sovereignty and independence. The government tells us from time to time, in foreign policy papers and elsewhere, that this is one of the goals of Canadian foreign policy.

Sometimes we hear talk about the cost element in any new arrangement. We are told it would cost much more to "go it alone" in defending our sovereignty than if there were a joint agreement with the United States. This view is based upon the simplistic reasoning that we would need to duplicate everything that has been done under NORAD before any new approach could be successful. I refer to the defence of our sovereignty, the surveillance of our air space, measures against interception, and so on. As far as I know, the minister and others speaking for him have totally failed to indicate precisely what is necessary in these areas.

After all, we are not trying to defend ourselves militarily against aggression from the United States, even if we feared it. What sort of attack on our sovereignty do we expect? What are the weapons required to deal with such an attack? What would they cost? If this information were given us in a clear form, we might be able to arrive at a sensible answer to these questions. I should like the minister to tell us at some stage in this debate just what is required in this so-called surveillance role. It could be an unlimited commitment or it could be a limited, rational commitment which will meet our needs.

The renewal of the NORAD agreement was said by some to be a justified symbol of good relations between Canada and the United States. My view is that failure to renew NORAD would have been viewed by many people as a symbol of Canadian determination and Canadian sovereignty and it would have been not inconsistent with the closest co-operation between ourselves and the United States. I am glad, however, that the committee and the minister did move some way from arguments in justification of NORAD which have made no sense in the past.

I see I have a minute or two in which to discuss NATO. Here again, we are left in limbo. The Prime Minister came back last Tuesday, I think it was, and made a statement to the House that we would continue our support of NATO and we would not diminish our military contribution. But since he added that some review was in progress, he left the nature of that contribution wide open. Shall we be contributing to the central force, which will require us to buy a whole lot of new tanks, for instance, if ground warfare is contemplated, or new aircraft, as the case may be? Or would it not be better for us to contribute a light, mobile force to be available on the flanks? It is on the flanks that the experts seem to think NATO is most vulnerable. I cannot imagine why we should continue a role inappropriate to our defence capability and means, a role which involves us in extraordinarily heavy expenditures.

I conclude by saying that when this defence structure review, as it is called, becomes available, I hope the minister will ensure that it is sent in good time, before it is finally accepted, to the committee on defence. I am tired of finding that decisions have been made and announced—as was the case in the decision respecting NORAD—before these matters are referred to the committee. "You can look into it if you like", they tell us; but we all know what the answer will be in circumstances of that kind.

The hon. member for Victoria mentioned Portugal. I have had the good fortune to be in Portugal, and I take this opportunity of expressing my conviction of the democratic concern of the people of Portugal. I believe they are willing to co-operate with the western world in any reasonable way that is required. I think the talk we have heard about communist takeovers, and so on, is completely without foundation and I hope it will never be a basis for our policy.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt that the choice made by the Progressive Conservative party and the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) to discuss the estimates of the Department of National Defence is one which meets the approval of the House. We have rarely, I think, had a discussion on this subject in the committee of the whole in recent years.

These estimates have of course been discussed in committee, but we had got out of the habit of debating them in the committee of the whole, and the new procedure allows us to discuss the estimates of a department, those estimates we feel are the most important. Yet our discussion of the problems of this department this afternoon has shown us that there is something to be said about both sides.

Having heard the speech made by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), I wonder what Canada would become if the country was run by his party. Perhaps there would be some savings in national defence, but I wonder if those savings would be worthwhile in the short or long run. Yet, Mr. Chairman, we know that any country wishing to have its sovereignty respected must have an army, even a token one. In the present situation, judging by the way roles are played in the world, we have witnessed for some decades the establishment of blocs on both sides. It is a well known fact that every country's military expenses take a large part of governmental budgets. It has practically become inevitable.

We know it is a very costly proposition for a country like Canada which has vast boundaries to defend and a population of barely 22 million inhabitants. Maintaining adequate defence forces is quite an expense.

In the last few years, we have seen the government, mainly in response to pressures from the Canadian public, try to limit its defence budget, with the result we see today. By restricting expenditures, replacement of obsolete equipment has been neglected. Now, today, we are faced with the situation where land equipment, some trucks, are older than the troops that drive them. A few years ago, I visited a military base and saw trucks burning out their fourth engine. At that point, drivers hesitate to venture any distance from camp, for fear they might have to walk back.

Mr. Chairman, when a situation reaches that point, one can have qualified troops, well trained troops, but I wonder how we could defend ourselves with such equipment if we really had to use it one day.

The same applies to heavy artillary. And what about our planes? Our maritime patrol and search planes such as the Argus are already obsolete, and we are told it would cost some $400 to $700 million to replace them.

Of course, this will not be in this year's nor in next year's; I imagine the amount will have to be spread over several years. On the other hand, if we want to go on patrolling our coastline, we will have to provide for the replacement of this plane and for the amounts required in the estimates of the Department of National Defence.

Our fighters are also very old, and we wonder if they would still be effective in case of conflict. They can still be used to train our pilots but, then again, they train on planes which are easy to handle, it is true, but sometimes they must use blank ammunition for their training.

In that sense, our soldiers also complain about not having the necessary equipment to complete their training adequately. Mr. Chairman, generally we have to support the enemy or opponent with regard to the maintenance of a defence army, a well-equiped army. It is a known fact that at the Aeronautics Show in France, big manufacturers vie with one another in selling the most sophisticated aircrafts to NATO. Now if Canada lags behind, it will quickly be out distanced. Those are the facts that face us.

According to press reports today, the U.S.S.R. has just launched what is called a string of satellites. Indeed, they have put into orbit around the earth eight Cosmos satellites, probably for the purposes of setting up a world communication network for Soviet navy units. We also know how fast the USSR is building boats of all kinds, military or other, which are sent to sea all over the world, and I do not think they are playing that game for the tourist trade.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as long as Russia will keep in action and develop a conventional striking force, we shall have to take the same means to defend ourselves. If the Warsaw Pact bloc had only nuclear weapons, NORAD and NATO could also have an all-nuclear defence. But as long as the Warsaw Pact nations, led by Russia, will maintain, for instance, conventional bombers—and we know that it still has the most sophisticated long-range bombers—we never know when Russia will use them to launch a conventional attack on the North American continent or elsewhere. So, as long as Russia will maintain that kind of weapons, I think we must do the same.

Given these facts, the problem is this: Since on the communist side, be it Russia or its satellites, when they need funds to make weapons, they do not care much about what the Russians, the Poles, the Turks or the Hungarians think, they just go ahead. If they have to call in engineers and technicians, to use the smelting works and the plants to manufacture these war weapons, they do, whereas on the side of democracies it is not the same thing, not the same tune.

If the Canadian government, for instance, makes any mention of increasing its national defence budget, cries are heard throughout Canada. Newspapers get hold of the story, especially those that support the kind of speech heard before mine and want Canada and the United States, or any other country, to get rid of their armies. I wonder why. They probably know why, but if we were to do that, we would probably be in difficulty. There lies the question. Must we restrain our military expenses, or must we equip ourselves with arms, or with what I would call good quality tools, capable of being used by our servicemen? Such is the choice we are faced with.

Another very important point must also be brought out. Notwithstanding the nature or size of the national defence budget, be it at the top, or in fourth, fifth or sixth position in the overall Canadian budget, everyone knows there is always some waste. That seems anchored in the minds of our citizens, of our industrialists, of our businessmen and even of our civil servants. When it comes to spending for national defence, there is no hesitating. There are no reduced costs. It seems that such a business has no competition. Full prices are charged, and no thought is given to any reduction, because there is no competition; on the contrary, prices are inflated. It is mostly with that in mind that I want to draw the minister's attention, and I ask him to be very careful, to make several checks and to be demanding towards all officials and divisions of his department, in order to prevent that wasting we are aware of, especially during certain periods.

Mr. Chairman, I would not like anyone to say I favour undue expenditures for defence. Neither would I like our defence system to be in danger and within easy grasp by just about anybody. That is, I think, the target every Canadian should have when dealing with expenditures and estimates in a democratic country.

[English]

Mr. Dupras: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity given us by the Conservative Party and the first speaker of that party, the hon. member for Victoria, to speak on the subject of defence. I agree to a certain extent with the suggestion that perhaps here in Canada defence is not a popular subject. There are reasons for this. I am sure there are other activities in our lives that would not win popularity contests. But if you spoke to the people of France, Germany, Poland or Russia you would find that defence is a popular subject. Perhaps it is not popular here because those of us with the experience of living through the second world war and the Korean war are in a minority today.

Canadians do not have a strong instinct to protect themselves from wars. That is why it is much more difficult for us to sell the idea of defence in Canada than it is in France, Germany or Britain where the people have experienced war once, and some even twice. To them defence is a very vivid and popular subject.

[Translation]

Most of all Mr. Chairman, I want to seize this opportunity to join others who have already paid homage to the members of the Canadian armed forces and I welcome this new opportunity to do so. I indicated earlier that I also served in the Canadian armed forces, as several of my colleagues. But we are now a minority which does not belong to the medium age group of members of the House of Commons or the Senate.

Indeed, we are a minority in two different ways, only, the Canadian armed forces have for very many years, surely since the 40's and even before, greatly contributed in building Canada's and the Canadians' reputation. They are a Canadian presence in Europe as well and in Egypt and elsewhere. Every time the Canadian armed forces were called to serve or help, they performed with the greatest distinction. To refer to statements often made about the members of the Canadian army, I should like for instance to recall what NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns sais following a tour of our armed forces in Europe. He mentioned how himself and the council members were impressed by the ability and competence of Canadian troops, also the excellent condition of their equipment and their typical flexibility in combining with our allies's forces.

I heard similar comments, Mr. Chairman, during the symposium on defence which I attended last February. The ministers of defence and the parliamentary delegates who attended were constantly repeating how the members of the Canadian armed forces had distinguished themselves by their abilities, their merits, their eagerness in their profession and their devotion.

I do not wish to deal more particularly with this issue, but it is the first opportunity given to me to recall also how valuable for the Canadian people of my province in 1970 was the support of the excellent members of the Canadian armed forces.

You have seen the films which are being distributed throughout the world showing the reactions in Canada and in Quebec to the 1970 events. Most of those who distribute those films are criticized, the government and those who took that decision. Surely this is because they were not witnesses. Those who make that insidious propaganda did not witness what happened in 1970. After the event, it is indeed very easy to claim that we had overestimated the gravity of the situation. It is like the manager of a baseball club who must decide whether the runner should try to steal home. When the play fails, 15,000 spectators can stand up and say: "Well, I could have told him that it would fail". In retrospective it is very easy to express an opinion and criticize the decision taken.

However, when we refer to the situation as it existed in October 1970, very few people, as far as I know, came forward voluntarily to give information as to the number of revolutionaries and their intention. I suggest that all those who criticize the government should say so. If someone had the information, why did he not reveal that this small group of hot heads wanted only to call the attention of the world on a situation which existed in the minds of a few people who have hang ups and who are living in a very special kind of anguish. There were a few enlightened people who could have informed us at the end of September or in early October and who ventured, came forward and volunteered information, saying it was a small group. And thanks to the federal government's action, and especially that of the Canadian Armed Forces, members of the armed forces very ably performed that awkward work. And I am referring here especially to the Canadian Armed Forces members who did not speak French and who were on duty in the province of Quebec facing the problems I just mentioned.

Therefore there were no regrettable incidents and those people deserve our congratulations, and against the whole world, those who are trying to spread false impressions as to what happened in the province of Quebec are making a mistake. I can say that as I lived through it and in a much more intense way, Mr. Chairman. One may recall that it was at the time of my election campaign to replace my predecessor, the Hon. Léo Cadieux, who was then Minister of National Defence. Therefore being a candidate in a federal election during September and October 1970, travelling through a constituency where people were known for hiding revolutionaries, one can be sure that I have a good idea of what happened and I am convinced that the Canadian government did not overreact to the situation existing then.

But those are not the remarks I wished to make, Mr. Chairman. What I wished to point out mainly is the Canadian troops' participation in NATO and also in NORAD. My colleague from Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) recalled the renewal of the NORAD agreement with our neighbours to the south. Others will surely want to deal with that particular aspect of national defence activities. As for me, I should like to say a few words on NATO and point out that as much as the Marshall Plan was the cornerstone of the economic reconstruction in Europe after the war or immediately after, so did NATO contribute to ensure the military security that led to Europe's unification. And the role of NATO troops. The current situation in the world is such that it is absolutely essential to maintain some stability in Europe, a balance of forces between the two superpowers.

I do not mean here to question the intentions of the Soviets and the allies of member countries of the Warsaw Pack vis-à-vis western Europe; but we know the policy, and it is not a mere question of morality or good intentions. I feel there cannot be true, peaceful security and co-existence in the most positive sense without some equality of military forces, or—and it is utopia to think about it—total disarmament.

We have the responsibility to make sure with our European allies that any attempt to score by a surprise attack in Europe or America is checked by the second strike—that of response. So, if by that strike, that threat, the second strike, we eliminate any possibility of war, then we are maintaining a deterrent force that checks those who would have any intentions of attacking Europe and North America.

And it is that equality of forces that must be absolutely maintained, and on the basis of the information we have on purchases of equipment by member countries of the Warsaw Pact, equipment that is being built, the striking power of that equipment, the size and the number of the troops stationed in central Europe, it is absolutely unthinkable to consider the possibility of withdrawing from the commitment made with our allies and it is absolutely essential that NATO participation be maintained. Such was the intention of the right hon. Prime Minister when he went to Brussels recently. He stated unequivocally that Canada intended to remain present and active within the NATO alliance, and did not intend to reduce the effectiveness of its contribution.

I will give you my interpretation of what in my opinion the Prime Minister meant, and I will also tell you how I would imagine the Canadian contribution in Europe. I believe our Prime Minister first wanted to reassure our allies and those who criticised the Canadian participation. I do not think the expression "part-time partners" of NATO was an allusion to us. But our "unobstrusiveness" in Europe has often been criticized. Of course, when considering the distribution of troops, you realize that we have an important air force. Although I do not want to minimize the importance of the air force—which I belonged to in 1942, 1943, 1944 and 1945—I think that if we are to reassess the contribution of Canada in the light of the recent statements of the Prime Minister, our first aim, considering the vast territory under our care, should be to protect that vast territory whose sovereignty is to be upheld. Maybe the activities and efforts of the air force should be maintained precisely to protect our country, supervise our land, and also meet the engagements we are about to enter into under an agreement which is expected to be signed very soon with respect to the limits of the territory which will be placed under our surveillance on the eastern, northern and western coasts of Canada.

● (1620)

In view of this responsibility, of that vast tract of territory that we have to control and protect, given the changes brought about in the NORAD agreement so that the surveillance of the western sector of Canada be assured exclusively by Canadian forces, I believe that we should rather seriously think of limiting our participation in Europe to land forces, which would require less investment and could be achieved by an increase in our forces and in our visibility in terms of equipment, movement and also in terms of Canadian presence. We know that there are no fewer than 16,000 or 18,000 Canadians now living in West Germany. That figure might be increased.

Thus we could contribute to the acknowledgment of the fact that Canada already belongs to the European community. If it is true militarily speaking, if we are a member of the European military community, there only one step more to convince our allies that we should also be part of the economic, political and social community. I believe that a greater presence of Canadians in Europe could largely contribute to the achievement of that purpose. There is also the matter of the rationalization of equipment. In a symposium which took place in Munich last February, we dealt at great length with the use of the dollar that every country must spend for its defence. We know quite well that it is not easier here than it is in Europe to convince taxpayers that an important part of the budget must be devoted to defence. Here this share amounts to 10 per cent in England, it is 14 per cent. In France it is more for the reasons I mentioned earlier.

If only Canadians could be convinced of all the advantages that an intense presence in Europe can represent! We do not have to give lengthy explanations, for I think that Canadians can understand as well as we do the advantages of such a campaign to convince people that we are already part of the political and military community of Europe, why not make the last step and join the economic community?

As for equipment it might be visible but less expensive. The possibility has been and will be considered, hopefully not for too long, of repeating Israel's experience and modernizing our existing tanks. I am told the upgrading of one tank, the Centurion type, with modern diesel engine and armament to our allies' standards, and with heavier track to carry the equipment, might cost from $200,000 to $250,000. With the number of tanks we already have, and considering that we would have to buy new units as replacement, the investment would be lighter than if we were to buy modern tanks, as the American type now selling between $500,000 and $600,000 apiece. We are assured by experts that an updated, modernized Centurion tank might very well meet central Europe's present needs.

For these reasons, I feel it is urgent that Canada's participation be converted to ground participation. Considering the intentions stated by defence ministers of many European countries at the symposium, where the accent was on equipment rationalization, I believe we will not experience too much difficulty convincing our allies of the importance for Canada to keep mainly our air activities, for the reasons I already submitted, and develop ground activity expertise.

I am convinced that if we have a good case to put to our allies, if it is well put and if the members of the committee share my views on the direction that might be given to our participation in Europe, I believe this could contribute to promote both in the cabinet and among our allies the idea that the Canadian participation could very well be a land participation.

Mr. Chairman, those are the comments I wanted to make. There is often mention of reduction as concerns the cost of maintaining forces in Europe by our allies and by Canada. People often talk about reduction and I was astounded to find that the word reduction seems to have hypnotized people. There are some who have a strange conception or definition of the word reduction. If we look at what is going on around us, in my opinion, the word reduction is outdated. Let us look at what happened in Asia. People may condemn and judge our American neighbours for not having kept their word when they had made an official commitment to protect South Vietnam.

The word reduction was perhaps used excessively and we, who have responsibilities, may also have been hypnotized by this word. In my opinion, it was used abusively. I consider that reduction is a thing of the past. We should be much more careful and ensure that the events of last April and May in Asia will not have a domino effect, like some are saying, and that Africa and other countries will not suffer the consequences.

Mr. Chairman, those are the comments I wanted to make, and I am very happy to have been able to make some contribution in clarifying somewhat Canada's participation in the NATO forces.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I, along with other hon. members, wish to participate in this debate which is basically, in theory anyway, on the estimates of the Department of National Defence. It gives an opportunity to hon. members interested in defence to either question or to make statements on this very large subject. I share the general feeling not only of my colleague from Victoria who led off for the loyal opposition, but also my hon. friend from Greenwood with whom I quite often differ on specific points. Often he goes one way and I go the other. But that does not detract from his sincerity and conviction, even though I sometimes think there is a lot of wool wrapped around his arguments.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Labelle. He is the very distinguished chairman of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, and as such he is somewhat handicapped in advocating any views. That is why I found it most delightful to listen to some of his views on the overseas situation. I say without hesitation that I hope I do not have to eat those words if we ever find ourselves in confrontation on the hustings. I think he is a worthy successor of his very illustrious predecessor who I think was minister of defence back in 1968 and 1969 and has now gone on to greener pastures and larger challenges as the ambassador to France. I wish the Prime Minister had been in the chamber this afternoon to hear the hon. member for Labelle. I hope he will read the report of this debate in Hansard so that some of the very cogent thoughts of the hon. member for Labelle can somehow percolate through the inner crustation of the Prime Minister.

I do not intend to be too provocative this afternoon. After all, it is a day in June. We welcome on the floor of the House the new deputy minister of the Department of National Defence, with his minister. The minister has been before the committee many, many times. I am glad the hon. member for Victoria brought on this debate and I welcome the Minister of National Defence, for whom in a personal way I have great fondness and affection, though sometimes in a parliamentary sense we do differ.

I was most pleased when I picked up the paper, long before the Prime Minister returned from his trip overseas, to read what he said when he left Brussels last week at a press conference he held after the NATO summit meeting. He said something which I have been advocating to the Minister of National Defence since I have been involved in the committee, and that goes back several years. Actually, I was involved in the committee before the minister became Minister of National Defence.

There is a former minister of defence sitting in this House. Part of my story goes back to 1968 and 1969, because we have had five ministers of defence in eight years under this government. No wonder there are real problems and questions up in the air about the direction in which we are going and what our objectives are. I read with interest that the Prime Minister said, quite properly, that our democracy is quite different from the countries behind the Iron Curtain which have a monolithic approach to defence. In those countries the leaders or the chairmen of socialist republic committees do not have to worry about public opinion. Any massive contribution to defence or offence is made by a highly organized monolithic group and there is no necessity to inform and educate the public.

I agree with the hon. member for Greenwood, the hon. member for Labelle and the hon. member for Victoria that in peacetime defence is not the most popular subject. Even in wartime when there may be patriotism, marching bands and national fervor because of the instincts of self-preservation which are prevalent, it is only a necessary subject.

I sympathize with the Minister of National Defence today, as I have for some time even though I am getting quite cross with him. How can anyone in this world who reads newpapers think there is the blissful peace of Christmas lore or the goodwill on earth toward all men after what has just happened in Southeast Asia and the tinderbox of the Middle East?

It has never ceased to amaze me that some in this House wonder if we should support the North American Defence Agreement, NORAD, or whether we should stay in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, NATO. I am too young to have served in any theatre of war, but I was a cadet in one of the wars. It is the success of some of the defence pacts such as NORAD and NATO which gives members of parliament and the scribes and pundits outside this House the luxury of pontificating about whether we need a treaty or defence pact.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Look at the reality of the world today. Even though we would love to be able to say that we do not need to spend a dollar on defence, we know that is not possible in view of what is happening in Southeast Asia and what is going on in the Middle East, which the Secretary of State for External Affairs has just visited, or in Africa. We know the situation is not stable. There was the SEATO pact in Southeast Asia which did not stabilize the situation there. Because of decisions taken by North Atlantic countries in the late 1940s and 1950s, a former prime minister, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, once said of NATO that it was long overdue. The government had no conviction before that and no commitment to defence.

The Prime Minister has said that there should be, and has to be dialogue and debate with the Canadian public to get support for alliances. I was pleased to hear that. As the Minister of Defence knows, I have been trying to get him to go across this country and talk about defence. I do not mean just to the inner circles, to the messes and the base tours—which of course are necessary—but to go on the Canadian Club circuit, the Rotary Club circuit, and so on. He should be able to talk about defence in an intelligent way, recounting the dilemmas that confront him, without trespassing on the sacrosanct area of security. He could speak about the options that confront him although not, of course, about the recommendations that he makes to cabinet. I am not going to overstress the minister's role today, however.

There is an irony in the statement that the Prime Minister made in Brussels about how you need debate and dialogue with the people in a democracy in order to get support for any alliance. Since the first major overt act of the governement in 1968 when the NATO forces were cut in half, the Prime Minister has had nothing to say. I have looked very quickly through some of the research offices of this House to find when the Prime Minister next spoke on defence, in terms of a substantive contribution to any debate in this House or across the country, and I have yet to find anything. Granted, there was the NATO meeting here last year when he spoke in general terms, there was the Commonwealth conference in Singapore when he pledged allegiance to the Commonwealth, and at Brussels he said we were committed to the NATO concept. Obviously, on his tours of the capital, he has spoken the odd sentence about Canada's role and what our concept is in terms of defence. In terms of any meaningful debate or dialogue, however, there has been nothing.

Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman—I could make a speech on this, and some day I may in this chamber or outside—the paradox of this Prime Minister in so many areas of policy is almost beyond belief. If he really believed what he said in Brussels last week about informing, educating and dialoguing with the people, why is he absent when the question of defence is being discussed and such large areas of policy have to be defined? Almost every year since 1968-69 there has been a white paper on defence. The minister knows that those papers have been changed almost before the ink was dry. In the white papers of 1971, 1972, 1973 and 1974 there was a brand new physical formula for defence. Not a year goes by without an inflation factor and the whole thing has to be checked and reworked. The forces in Canada and overseas have been crippled because of the new, dynamic formula that had been developed!

I am not pretending that there have not been semantic statements on defence. The priority which evidently the Prime Minister agreed to in 1968-69 was sovereignty first, NATO second, NORAD third and peacekeeping fourth. Those are the priorities set out in the white paper. Since 1968 there have been five ministers of defence who have had something to say about the subject in debate. There has only been one prime minister since 1968, however. In 1968-69 he made a statement in the House on the changing role of NATO, justifying the change and slicing in half our NATO commitment overseas at that time.

● (1650)

Perhaps the minister or his officials can confront me with a meaningful statement on defence which has been made by a minister in this House. I suggest meaningful statements have not been made; the Prime Minister has not seen fit to become involved in any dialogue on defence and that has made the role of the minister more difficult. I do not want to excuse the minister. Granted, we face economic difficulties; granted, we live in times of pseudo peace; granted, the Prime Minister says many contradictory things: nevertheless, the Canadian people are entitled to be told the government's position on defence. There should be some dialogue on defence, and the lack of dialogue has made the minister's position difficult.

The Minister of National Defence should not be content merely to react, merely to acquiesce in the restraints which have been placed upon him. He should go out to the people and carry the message. He should take a leaf from the book of other ministers and do as they did when they carried their message to the Canadian people. The people are entitled to know what the government's conception is of our role in NATO. The hon. member for Labelle was glad the Prime Minister said there is some commitment to NATO. But, Mr. Chairman, admirable though that sentiment may be, hon. members want to know the specific form of that commitment.

At the recent meeting of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, certain members asked the Minister of National Defence what he means by "level of commitment." For example, we want to know what it means in terms of aircraft, men, tanks, destroyers, and so on. Of course, the minister said, as his predecessors in office and the Prime Minister had said, "These things are under review." This reminds me of Alice in Wonderland. I think Alice asked the caterpillar what a word meant and the caterpillar said, "It means anything I want it to mean." Alice said, "Good gracious, what happens if two words mean the same thing?" The caterpillar answered, "If they mean the same thing, I pay double for them." That just about sums up what has been happening in this House and what happened last week before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. We asked the minister to define our commitment in a meaningful way; so far, we do not have an answer.

Believing that one should say in this House what one has raised in the press—although one is motivated by sentiments of rhetoric when writing in the press, which may be of advantage from a political standpoint—I say to the minister that in this country there is consternation arising from policy decisions the government has taken in the field of defence. That being so, I consider it the minister's duty to go across this country and tell the people of Canada what the government's point of view is, and to put that point of view across. Let him imitate the Minister of Finance.

For several months after the election, the Minister of Finance was invisible; he was like a shadow. He was everywhere, trying to explain how the economy works and trying to sell something which he called consensus, even though my leader had raised the subject during the election campaign. The Minister of Finance accepted speaking invitations. I say nothing as to how successful he was and how much wiser we are for all his effort to sell the illusive concept of consensus. Perhaps we know a little more about it today. I say nothing of what happened in the election campaign, because my leader, if you remember, was in favour of a consensus and of a 90-day period after which laws would be passed. No, I will not talk about election dishonesty which involves the Prime Minister.

I am talking about our defence commitment. I do not understand why the minister cannot come clean with the people of Canada and explain exactly what our commitment is. What are the various factors we must consider, apart from money? How many aircraft does the commitment involve, how big a force, what supply machinery, and so on? These factors need to be worked out and we should be aware of the results.

Let me ask another question. When will the government make up its mind on a replacement long-range patrol aircraft—LRPA? We have been asking this question for years and it has been under study for years. Away back on March 16 and 17, 1969, the then minister of national defence, Mr. Cadieux, said that the question of a replacement was being considered. Good heavens, it took us less time to fight and win the second world war, which lasted about 5½ years, than it will take to find a replacement LRPA. After spending $14 million in trying to decide between two prime contractors for the long-range patrol aircraft, the minister injects the Phoenix proposal into our discussion but does not tell the Canadian people what this involves. How many departments will it involve? Will it involve Defence, Fisheries, the Department of the Environment? I see you are about to rise, Mr. Chairman, and I have hardly begun.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Before proceeding further, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton—Bilingualism—Possible reference of Quebec's Bill-22 to Supreme Court—Government position; the hon. member for Northwest Territories—Health—Request for reconsideration not to test for mercury poisoning among natives; the hon. member for Vancouver South—Finance—Excise tax on private aircraft and pleasure boats—request for report on effectiveness in limiting consumption of petroleum products.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Chairman, defence is an important subject. Since we are debating an opposition motion moved on an opposition day, I am disturbed to note that there are only nine members of the official opposition in the chamber. I expected to see more opposition members here. I am sorry the hon. member for Greenwood is no longer present because my comments on defence will centre mainly on the NORAD agreement. If the hon. member were here, I would say to him that unfortunately we live in an imperfect world. In a perfect world we would not need defence commitments, the NORAD agreement or NATO. Since we live in a world beset with dangers, it behooves the Government of Canada to take all necessary steps to protect the sovereignty of our land.

The hon. member for Greenwood discussed one aspect of NORAD, defence against Russian bombers. He contends that as that threat no longer exists, we should end our commitment under the NORAD agreement. I suggest the hon. member dealt with only one small aspect of that agreement. He singled out one aspect, said it no longer applies and suggested, in so many words, that we should throw the agreement in the garbage can, so to speak. I am afraid the hon. member was being one-sided because he referred to only one minor part of the agreement.

I wish to go into a bit of the history of the NORAD agreement and bring it up to date. The original NORAD agreement, signed in 1958 between Canada and the U.S.A., involved an extension of the air defence co-operation that had developed between the two countries since the end of the second world war. Hon. members will recall, I am sure, that during this period the world tensions arising out of the cold war and the continuing growth of an already formidable Soviet bomber force underlined a North American need for protection. It was not something that Canada and the United States dreamed up. They did not just decide it was good to sign a few agreements. There was a threat that existed in 1948 and in 1958 which Canada and the United States realized. Defence planners in both Canada and the United States were convinced that the only strategic threat to North America lay in the possibility of attack from manned Soviet nuclear bombers. That was some years ago.

The NORAD agreement, setting up an integrated command structure for American and Canadian air defence, was thus a natural outgrowth of the times. In simple terms, it established a co-operative defence against Soviet bombers and at the same time provided protection for the United States strategic air command, the western world's main cold war deterrent. The agreement did not commit either country to allocation of military forces, leaving each government to determine the size and nature of its contribution.

The Canadian contribution to NORAD has always appeared minuscule when compared with that of our giant neighbour to the south, even though we have always striven to maintain our proper proportional commitment. Even if Canada supplied 10 per cent of the total interceptors available to the commander-in-chief of NORAD to meet this requirement, it would not fulfil our purely national interests. It was evident, in fact, even in 1958 when our armed forces had reached their post-war peak in terms of numbers, that we were unable to span the breadth of the country with interceptor aircraft. United States' interceptors were, and are, effectively carrying out what we now recognize as protection of our national sovereignty.

The original ten-year agreement, renewed in 1968 for five years and extended in 1973 for two years, was obviously aimed at defence against the manned bomber threat. However, North American air defence policy has been under constant review during past years, and mainly as a result of missile development and strategic arms limitation talks between the United States and the Soviet Union has undergone a dramatic change in priorities. Defence against the manned bomber has been de-emphasized in favour of surveillance and control of each country's sovereign airspace. I submit it is a radical change which the hon. member for Greenwood has not noticed. I hope he has, because it is a radical change in NORAD'S commitment.

Since this matter has been raised, I would also like to mention a few facts about the manned bomber threat as it exists today. While, with the growth of missile inventories, the relative importance of the manned bomber as an intercontinental threat has declined, it remains a potent weapons system. Compared to the ICBM, the bomber is more flexible and accurate and is capable of carrying a larger payload. Despite contrary opinion, the number of heavy bombers in the U.S.S.R. inventory has not significantly declined. Moreover, the capability of the Soviet fleet has been improved with the introduction of air-to-surface stand-off missiles and in-flight refuelling.

For the past several years we have been following the development of the new Soviet supersonic swing-wing bomber, nicknamed the "backfire". Several squadrons are in operational service with long-range aircraft and numbers are likely to increase with the phase-out of obsolete types. Even though the major strategic threat is from missiles, we cannot afford to let the strategic balance be upset by ignoring the bomber. We must prepare our defences against what the potential enemy is capable of doing, not against what our analysts assess his intentions to be. It should be stressed that the capability is there. They have introduced new supersonic bombers. We can only assume that these are being brought in as part of their reservoir of weapons, and not merely for show. Because we have analysed the problem as one of supersonic missiles, we still must take into account that this is in their inventory.

To take our defence apart because we analysed it as a missile threat would be leaving our gate partly open. The hon. member for Greenwood is correct that this is not the major impact of the U.S.S.R. Nor, as the old cliché goes, should we ever consider giving them a free ride. The best incentive to Soviet bomber development would be the disbandment of NORAD air defence forces. Small though they may be, and in Canada's case relatively ineffective against bombers such as the "backfire", NORAD's air defence squadrons provide a counterbalance to a known threat.

With regard to nuclear weapons, it is probably in the context of air defence that I should put the question of nuclear weapons to rest. There have been many discussions in this House and elsewhere about the fact that we still have nuclear weapons on the CF-101. The minister has stated on several occasions that we have a replacement for it. It will more than likely have conventional weapons. Because of the age of the CF-101, it would be impractical at this time to spend many millions of dollars converting it from nuclear to standard weaponry. We will see the day in Canada where we will not have nuclear weapons. The day of the Bomarc is over. The day of the CF-101 will be over in five years. We will soon see a new generation of fighters which will be equipped with standard weaponry.

I also wish to discuss Canadian sovereignty and independence with regard to the NORAD agreement. While Canadians should appreciate the large American contribution to Canadian defence, our inability to "go it alone" has to some extent raised questions as to Canadian sovereignty. There is little doubt that Canada's participation in NORAD has enhanced our ability to ensure surveillance and control of Canada's airspace. On the other hand, most of the forces required to exercise sovereignty control are American, which to some extent compromises Canadian independence. However, the minister has announced that the western sector of NORAD in Canada will come under Canadian control with the establishment of new headquarters in Alberta.

One of NORAD's long-term objectives has been for us to acquire the ability unilaterally to carry out our own detection and identification functions. I welcome the minister's statement. I welcome it in the context that it will give Canada sovereignty over its own airspace in the foreseeable future. With regard to the renewal of the agreement, it is significant to note that the new agreement indicates the changing emphasis on sovereignty and air defence by according precedence to national sovereignty. In future, the primary objective of NORAD will be to assist each country to safeguard the sovereignty of its airspace, to contribute to the deterrence of attack on North America by providing capabilities for warning of attack and for defence against air attack and, should deterrence fail, to ensure an appropriate response against attack by providing for the effective use of the forces of the two countries available for air defence.

The priorities as set out here have been under study ever since publication of the white paper "Defence in the '70s". In essence, some of the proposals put forth as a result of the study suggested that the surveillance requirements of MOT and DND be integrated into a single national system and that our interceptor force be redistributed to provide an interceptor capability throughout the whole of Canada, rather than the limited areas now protected. Over a year ago DND entered into an agreement with MOT for joint acquisition and use of new, three-dimensional radars. These radars would replace current DND heavy radars, and with complementary MOT terminal radars would stretch across the country to provide surveillance and control for both military and domestic air traffic.

At the same time, and in conjunction with this requirement program, Canada and the United States are reconfiguring the present NORAD regions to emphasize the sovereignty role spelled out in the NORAD agreement. Four regional operations control centres will be established in the U.S.A. and two in Canada, one in the east at North Bay and one in the west at Edmonton. The ROCCs will replace the present NORAD regional control centres, processing all the radar detection data and controlling NORAD interceptors. The basic difference between the present regional set-up and the proposed ROCC plan is in the areas controlled. For the first time, control of Canadian airspace will rest solely with Canadians. I like that change.

As to the interceptor force, I have already addressed to some degree the inadequacies of the CF-101. We now rely on the U.S.A to provide interceptor aircraft to prosecute sovereignty violations between British Columbia and Sault Ste. Marie, but with the establishment of purely national ROCCs we will not have the same easy access to U.S resources. I might say, without being parochial, that the 409 does a fine job on the west coast of B.C.

Since the white paper recommendations were made, we have also been forced to reduce the size of our CF-101 fleet, both for reasons of economy and to enable us to stretch the life of this aircraft to 1980. However, it is no secret that our fleet of 36 operational Voodoo aircraft is now outdated and worn out. In fact, at the moment we have only a fraction of them serviceable due to engine fatigue breakdowns. These aircraft, at the best of times, can patrol only a small portion of Canadian airspace and though still possessing a capability for limited surveillance and control, will have to be replaced in the near future. I believe a lead-up time of three or four years is needed, and I sincerely hope the minister will give active consideration to the replacement of the 101 within the very near future because there is no question that the 101 has a very limited number of years of service left.

What particularly concerns me is that the breakdown of parts of the engine, caused by fatigue, has caused numerous fires in the past several years, and as a former member of Air Defence Command I consider it behooves the government to provide equipment which at least does not expose our personnel to unnecessary danger. The aircraft has served very well to this point, but we could very soon be running into serious problems associated with its age.

Looking to the future, what do we foresee for NORAD? It is likely that the integration of the civil and military radar and data assessment items will continue. The data will continue to feed into the NORAD computers as command control facilities are updated with the establishment of the ROCCs. This is simply a warning system which can be used in an emergency because of the nature of the ground installation being open to attack. It is something which the United States has studied, and perhaps in the future we shall have to look at the same thing. The extent to which Canada will be involved in this program or in the use of these facilities has not so far been determined, to the best of my knowledge.

Unfortunately, the high cost of defence is something which is extremely difficult to justify to the public in times of peace. I am speaking of peace in our own area; we all know that somewhere or other wars have been going on for a generation or so. It is very hard for the military to justify the expenditure of many millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money even for such an object as the preservation of the sovereignty of Canada. The Canadian people have shown in many ways that they want additional housing, improved medicare benefits, and so on. All these things are important, of course, but as a member of the committee on defence I am conscious of a moral tug-of-war between the need for expenditure to protect the sovereignty of Canada and the desirability of spending money in areas of social need.

Looking toward the Arctic, for instance, it is obvious we need to establish surveillance arrangements in this region, one which I regard as an increasingly important part of Canada. This is necessary if we are to claim sovereignty over the Arctic, but, as I say, we are dealing with intangible propositions and it is not always easy to convince Canadians that the heavy expenditures involved are justified. Nevertheless, it is surely our responsibility to see to it that a highly effective surveillance capacity exists and that measures can be taken to deal with aircraft entering our airspace. In opposition to the hon. member for Greenwood, I do not believe Canada should abandon its role of establishing sovereignty over its airspace.

Mr. Brewin: I never suggested any such thing.

Mr. Anderson: I am glad to see the hon. member back in his place. I am sorry I missed his earlier remarks.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Crouse: Madam Chairman, as a member of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak this afternoon in this debate on the 1975-76 estimates of the Department of National Defence. In the estimates for 1975-76 there is listed under the words "Currently estimated total cost" the sum of $53,200,000 covering the cost of Canada's experimental hydrofoil, HMCS Bras D'Or. In the next column is an estimate of $230,000 which will be set aside to cover the maintenance costs of this mothballed ship during this fiscal year. When I questioned this figure before the committee as being excessive, I was informed that only $70,000 would be required for maintenance, while the balance of $160,000 is to provide for studies related to the possible application of hydrofoils in future ship construction programs.

● (1720)

This reply brings into question the research and development policies of the present government, especially as they apply to Canada's defence department. Obviously, if suitable studies had been made prior to the construction of the hydrofoil Bras D'Or, the $53 million spent on this experimental ship could well have been utilized in a more productive manner. It seems to me that from the very beginning we Canadians have been sold a bill of goods by the government on the value of fixed hydrofoils, and the fact that it has not been possible to date to sell this concept to any—and I emphasize "any"—of our NATO partners would indicate there is something radically wrong with this particular ship.

In light of the tremendous original cost of this project to Canada and its continuing cost even though the Bras D'Or is in mothballs, I think it is advisable to review the facts leading up to its construction. The idea for this type of ship is, of course, not new. Half a century ago, on Cape Breton's Bras D'Or Lake, Alexander Graham Bell and F. W. Casey Baldwin were experimenting with one of their projects which they called Hydrodrome 4. When it rose from the water, supported by finlike devices attached by struts to its hull, it zoomed to 61.5 knots and established a world water speed record. Hydrodrome 4 was an early version of the present day hydrofoil, the flying ship that achieves remarkable speeds when the hull rises above the surface, reducing the friction of the vessel's contact with the water.

The present Canadian hydrofoil, Bras D'Or, named in honour of two pioneering Canadian scientists, was to be constructed for $9 million when the keel was laid at Sorel, Quebec, in 1963. However, a fire during construction added $6,500,000 to the cost and expenses skyrocketed upward from that point in time. Other setbacks occurred during construction, and the ship was finally commissioned around July, 1968. During sea trials in July, 1969, the ship reached a speed of 62 knots, which made her the fastest submarine chaser in the world. However, after a record performance near the mouth of Halifax harbour, a small crack in the foil put the ship out of commission for a year while a new centre foil was built. Following further tests, other hairline cracks developed, with serious ones occurring in the horizontal cross-member in the main hydrofoil located at the rear of the flying ship. Tenders were called for replacements costing in the vicinity of $500,000, while less serious cracks were repaired by welding.

All of these problems caused the government to decide in the fall of 1971 to put the Bras D'Or in mothballs for five years because, in the view of the then minister of national defence, the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, "There appears to be no market for that type of ship". When expressing that viewpoint, the minister was obviously unaware of the opinions expressed by leading navy spokesmen concerning ships in the hydrofoil category. Commander G. L. Edwards, skipper of the Bras D'Or at that time, stated that three hydrofoils could be built for the price of one destroyer; and although the ship is designed for anti-submarine operations, he said; "You can name almost any mission for it—put missiles on it, search and rescue, fisheries protection or area surveillance. There's no way a torpedo is going to hit it when foilborne, and it goes so fast a torpedo couldn't catch it".

With all of these well founded opinions by highly placed navy personnel in favour of the hydrofoil, I cannot help but ask the question: Where did we go wrong? Obviously, officials in the defence research establishment were so keenly interested in the development of the Bras D'Or that they turned a blind eye and a deaf ear to all previous hydrofoil developments. For example, a 110-ton experimental hydrofoil, 115 feet long, with retractable foils—and I emphasize retractable foils, not fixed foils—was built by Boeing Aircraft Corporation and JM Martinac at Martinac's Tacoma yard, and launched on August 17, 1962.

It was completed, named Flagstaff and placed in service on September 3, 1963, with sonar equipment installed, two guns and four 21-inch torpedo launchers, at a cost of $3,700,000. It had a forward speed of 48 knots. All of this, I point out to the committee this afternoon, was accomplished in the United States at a period of time before we ever started our experiment. That is why I say, Madam Chairman, that we have been misled by our government in regard to this particular project. When you compare the costs and date of completion with the track record of the builders of the Bras D'Or, you begin to understand why our NATO partners are reluctant to get involved with purchasing this type of ship in Canada.

Other models followed the Flagstaff, and the concept of a common fast patrol boat was studied by NATO officials. In September, 1970, it was decided that a retractable submerged foil craft of 140 tons, known as the PHM, as proposed by the United States navy was the vessel most suited to NATO mission requirements. In October, 1971, the U. S. indicated it would proceed at its own expense with the design of the vessel and share the results of the studies with those nations wishing to purchase PHM's. It also offered to conduct all aspects of design and development, contracting and management in co-operation with governments entering into project membership.

Since Canada is a NATO country, the results of all this research would have been freely made available to us and, what is more important, the hydrofoils developed by the United States are in constant service since the foils are retractable. The benefits are obvious, for a ship with fixed foils like the Bras D'Or draws too much water when in shallow harbours and is highly vulnerable, as the minister and his officials have found out, when it is cruising in the North Atlantic and happens to come in contact with ice pans or other obstructions.

The Boeing PHM is an all-weather, high-speed, highly-manœuvrable, missile-firing patrol craft whose development was undertaken jointly by the United States, the Federal Republic of Germany, and Italy. The construction of two lead ships was provided for by Boeing's $46.5 million design and development contract with the naval sea systems command. The American navy plans originally called for funding a total of 30 of these vessels through fiscal year 1977. Germany is planning to initiate a ten-ship procurement next summer and has awarded Boeing a contract for the phase 1 development of the German variant of the PHM. Italy has announced its intention to procure four PHM's but has not yet awarded a design contract for its distinctive version.

It should be pointed out that the Boeing PHM became an authorized NATO program project under a memorandum of understanding signed in 1972 by the three nations currently sponsoring the ship. I think that is an important fact, a point that has never been brought to the attention of this House by the government or the minister. We are still being told, "Let us wait; let us wait". While we are waiting the cost to Canadians is skyrocketing.

In view of all these facts, I believe there will be hydrofoils in our future, for we have vast areas of oceans to patrol and surveillance will have to be maintained over foreign fishing fleets. However, we cannot carry out this work with a ship like the Bras D'Or and its fixed foils. The government should face up to the fact that it has blundered badly in pursuing this type of design, and co-operate with our NATO partners in providing our navy with a hydrofoil that has been proven and operational under almost any conditions. The time and money presently being wasted can never be regained, and the opinions of our leading navy men concerning the need for operational high-speed hydrofoils should be given every consideration.

From my studies on hydrofoils, I learned that the biggest share of the hydrofoil market is military, and the biggest share of the military market is overseas. However, Boeing is moulding its hydrofoil marketing and production plans to an emerging market dominated by international military requirements, but which also involves passenger-carrying ships and those in the utility class. Admittedly, without the military programs, Boeing's commercial jet foil program could not continue, since the two programs share personnel and facilities for greater efficiency and economy.

It is difficult at this stage to predict the market for commercial hydrofoils. Some of the people in the hydrofoil industry talk of a market of a couple of hundred ships over the next ten years, but this market will have to be developed. Obviously, it is a matter of getting the boat's capabilities into areas where they are really needed and can be fully utilized. A major segment of the market will be high speed hydrofoil utility vessels to serve offshore marine operations. As this phase of offshore activity develops, non-passenger utility ships could ultimately account for as much as 90 per cent of all commercial sales.

What is Boeing doing at the present time? It is promoting the concept of regional final assembly centres around the world as a means of assuring itself a profitable production base, while meeting the worldwide sentiment for greater participation in industrial programs. The centres, which would not be owned or operated by Boeing, would purchase basic hulls from Boeing and then complete the ships for local customers.

The major prospects for these regional centres include Greece, Iran, Japan, Taiwan, Scandinavia, and the Caribbean. You will note that I did not mention Canada. It seems that everyone in every part of the world is aware of the technology that has been developed, that is, everyone except Canada and this minister who sits opposite me with his oficials.

For these reasons it seems to me that Canada is missing the boat when it comes to hydrofoil development. It is missing the boat if it continues to pin its hopes on its expensive but obsolete prototype called the Bras d'Or.

I have a couple of questions I should like to ask before I sit down, and I hope there will be a few minutes left in which the minister can answer. I should like to ask the minister why we continue to spend hundreds of thousands of tax dollars, money which I submit could urgently be used in other areas on other projects, on this Bras d'Or project? Why have we not taken advantage of the experimental work done by our NATO partner, the United States? In that way we could participate in a workable hydrofoil like the PHM, because the hydrofoil will be required for surveillance of our economic zones and for the protection of our sovereignty and our marine resources. This is a program which would in addition provide an opportunity for all our shipyards to begin production of these highly technical and versatile craft. Why have these things not been done?

Mr. Richardson: Madam Chairman, I should like to thank the hon. member for South Shore for his comments, and congratulate him on his personal knowledge and information about the hydrofoil. I think he has divided his presentation into two parts; first, the failure we encountered many years ago with the Bras d'Or, long before I had any responsibility in this department I might say; and second, he is looking to the future.

In answer to the first part I should like to point out, as he did in part himself, that the high costs in respect of the Bras d'Or were partly due to the fire he described, and partly due to the fact that this was an experiment. It was new and we were trying to achieve new technology in Canada. I would agree with the hon. member that in looking to the future we should work with our NATO partners and use the technology that has been developed.

I personally find attractive the idea he has raised of a regional assembly center which is being developed by the Boeing company. In view of his remarks, and the remarks he has made along these lines earlier, I will be following this matter with greater attention as I think the hydrofoil concept has great merit. I thank the hon. member again for bringing this to the attention of the House.

Mr. Crouse: May I just say that I was referring to the retractable hydrofoil concept which has great merit, not the fixed concept because it is not truly operational in all seasons in the north Atlantic.

Mr. Richardson: Yes, I had noted particularly the reference to the retractable hydrofoil and its advantages. I did not use the word in my reply but I did make note of it in the notes I made while the hon. member for South Shore was speaking.

Mr. Turner (London East): Madam Chairman, I trust that all members will agree that the realization of the Canadian aims of political independence and prosperity depends on a state of international peace and security. It is assumed, therefore, that it is in Canada's direct interest that war be prevented but, if unavoidable, that it should be halted before it can escalate into a broader conflict. I also believe that hon. members will agree that large scale hostilities in any nuclear context would mean very serious results beyond our wildest imagination.

As we know, the maintenance of peace remains a United Nations' priority. It is also our belief, however, that this cannot be entrusted solely to the super powers but that other countries, including Canada, must accept and share some of the responsibility.

Canada has come to be widely respected as a country having not only the capability but, equally important, the trust and goodwill of others, which enables us to play an effective role in the maintenance of peace. No matter where our forces travel in this world the Canadian soldier is highly respected, highly trained, and a highly relied on person because of this trust. The Canadian forces military role in international peacekeeping is a vital and important aspect of the total Canadian effort.

During recent world events it has been demonstrated that this Canadian role of peacekeeping can involve a high price. However, imperfect as peacekeeping may appear to be at many times, we must realize that as long as men are prepared to resort to force to settle disputes, Canadians must, especially in today's world, stand by to restore and maintain peace between nations.

The humanitarian role of Canada's peacekeeping forces in many areas of conflict, in alleviating suffering, and providing assistance and protection to the unfortunate innocents caught in the conflict, must also be appreciated. This Canadian role has been played very effectively in Cyprus where the United Nations force is actively involved in keeping the peace. All Canadians are deeply concerned for the safety and security of our Canadian troops and, therefore, our Canadian peacekeepers are instructed never to take chances with their lives.

Canada's experience has provided us with considerable insight into peacekeeping operations. Governments of Canada since 1946 have accepted every request the United Nations has made in this field. In addition, we have responded to requests to participate in peacekeeping type missions outside the United Nations; two in Indo China and one in Nigeria. Our 1971 white paper on defence, and the government's foreign policy review with regard to peacekeeping emphasize the continuing objective of the government to co-operate with other United Nations member countries in efforts to improve the effectiveness of peacekeeping operations, and to continue to contribute to those in which Canada can play a useful role, preferably under UN auspices.

The responsibility of carrying out these peacekeeping tasks has fallen, in the main, to our armed forces. They have served us well and have earned us an international reputation par excellence as peacekeepers. Their experience has ranged from large scale operations such as those in Korea and the Congo, down through the whole range of the peacekeeping spectrum to small United Nations observer missions. Their work has often been uncomfortable and dangerous, and some have failed to return.

I know all hon. members are proud of the troops representing Canada under the flag of the United Nations. Every member in this House today probably has constituents serving with United Nations forces in the Middle East and Cyprus, or with the UN missions in Korea, India or Pakistan. As you know, these are drawn from bases all across Canada and reflect at the same time the diversity and unity of our country. For example, a unit from my constituency, the first battalion of the Royal Canadian Regiment, 1 RCR, based in London, Ontario and commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Phil Spencer, returns tomorrow from Cyprus, having completed a six month tour. The battalion replaced the Canadian Airborne Regiment from Edmonton last December, and was replaced in turn this week by a unit from Quebec City, the second battalion of the Royal Twenty-Second Regiment.

Although the events of the past six months on Cyprus made fewer headlines than the crisis situation faced by the Canadian Airborne Regiment last summer, the tasks assumed by 1 RCR last December were no less demanding. The battalion was required to man 24 observation posts between the belligerents in Nicosia, in addition to carrying out numerous patrols in jeeps and armoured personnel carriers. Their area of responsibility included the capital city of Nicosia and the nearby Nicosia airport.

It was no easy task to try to maintain a ceasefire between two armed forces whose positions are in such close proximity, while coping with such hazards as poorly marked minefields. The battalion also provided humanitarian relief to many thousands of refugees made homeless by the fighting. Their efforts during the period were successful but, unfortunately, at the cost of the lives of two members of the regiment, Captain Ian Patten and Private Steven Kohlman.

The work of 1 RCR was typical of many other Canadian units on UN service. The Canadian public has come to expect that its troops will always perform in a manner which brings credit to Canada, often without thinking why this should be so. I think one of the main reasons why our troops do so well is that they are dedicated professionals, organized, trained and disciplined to carry out conventional military operations. Their high standards allow them to adapt quickly and competently to, such operations as peacekeeping activities, or giving aid to the civil authorities in areas where natural disasters have occurred, or search and rescue operations. We would do well to maintain this professionalism, not only in peacekeeping, as history has shown that our forces are often called upon to perform tasks unidentified in advance by either political or military planners. I think it important, therefore, to maintain a well trained, balanced, conventional force capable not only of meeting our current defence priorities but also any other unforeseen commitments which may arise.

In summary, peacekeeping is a difficult and often frustrating task, with results that are often not readily apparent. The value of peacekeeping has been and will continue to be questioned. It must be acknowledged, however, that both peacekeeping forces and missions have been able to calm troubled waters in situations which otherwise might have escalated into uncontrolled hostilities. We hope this has been a significant contribution to world peace.

I have always stated that Canadian soldiers, indeed Canadian veterans, policemen and firemen, are entitled to receive more money because they never know when they will run into trouble in their line of duty. We all know that this is part of their job, but I still say that they are entitled to a little extra share out of our affluence.

Furthermore, I believe that the retirement benefits of our soldiers and widows should be thoroughly updated so that they reflect the true cost of today's standard of living. At present pensions are too low, and after a soldier has served his 25 years he finds that he cannot survive on his pension and therefore is forced to seek other employment immediately. We should either allow him to stay in the service for a longer period of time or pay him a higher pension.

Canadian soldiers receive excellent training in the services, but when they are retired we have no system whereby a man could be given full credit for his training in any trade, such as by being awarded a trade certificate upon retirement. We train the man, give him expert supervision, but when we retire him we allow him to go into a no man's land, with all the knowledge he has gained in the services but with no certificate which would allow him to make a living and to compete in the private sector.

We should have agreements with provincial governments across Canada which would take into account the many years of schooling and training which soldiers have undergone so that they can receive trade licences upon retirement.

All Londoners, and in fact all Canadians, welcome back the first battalion of the Royal Canadian Regiment to their base in London, Ontario, after a well done job of six months' duration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (London East): A new mandate in international peacekeeping and supervision undertaken by the Canadian forces in 1974 was their participation in the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force, UNDOF, in the Golan Heights area on the border between Israel and Syria. Recently this mandate has been extended in Egypt until July 24, 1975, and for UNDOF until November 30, 1975. A major increase of the contingent in Cyprus was also carried out at the request of the United Nations' Secretary General following the Turkish military intervention in July. There were no changes in other supervisory or peacekeeping operations by Canadians elsewhere during the year.

Currently Canada participates in the following operations: In the UN Truce Supervisory Organization in Palestine we have 20 officers. Their role, established in 1948, is to observe the ceasefire and to assist the parties in the application and observance of the agreements concluded between Egypt, Lebanon, Jordan, Syria and Israel. Canada has provided personnel for this operation since 1954. Also, this group provided an early United Nations presence during the October, 1973, war and assisted in the establishment of the UN Emergency Force, subsequently deployed in the Suez Canal area. Since the establishment of UNDOF in June of 1974, 90 TSO observers, including six Canadians, have been placed under the temporary operational control of UNDOF.

In the United Nations military observer group in India-Pakistan, nine Canadian forces officers were on the staff which was established in 1949 to supervise the implementation of terms of the ceasefire agreement in Kashmir between India and Pakistan. Canada also provided an air detachment of one Twin Otter aircraft, three officers and five men of other ranks.

In the United Nations Command Mixed Armistice Commission, one officer represents Canada. He is also the assistant Canadian liaison officer to the commander in chief, UN command. A sergeant assists him in his duties.

With regard to the United Nations Emergency Force in the Middle East, on October 6, 1973, renewed hostilities broke out between the Arabs and the Israelis. On October 22 the United Nations Security Council passed a joint USA-USSR resolution calling for a ceasefire. A similar resolution sponsored by the non-alligned countries was passed on October 25, 1973, and a ceasefire was established between Israel and Egypt.

Planning then began for the formation of a UN emergency force numbering 7,000 personnel to be deployed in the ceasefire area. Canada and Poland were requested to provide the logistics support for the force. In early November of 1973 Canada provided a signals unit and Poland an engineer unit. Negotiations over the division of the remainder of the responsibilities continued in New York.

On November 23, 1973, it was agreed that Canada would provide a supply company, a maintenance company, a postal detachment, a military police detachment, a movement control unit, and an air transport unit consisting of two Buffalo aircraft. These elements were all in the action area by January of 1974. Poland, in addition to the engineer unit, provided a road transport company and a field hospital.

In June of 1974 the United Nations requested that Canada supply a third Buffalo aircraft to add to the two already serving with the air unit. The Canadian government agreed that additional aircraft be put into service in the Middle East, as was done in mid June. On August 9, 1974, one of the aircraft was shot down near the Syrian-Lebanese border killing nine persons on board, all members of the Canadian forces.

● (1750)

During July and August the headquarters of both UNEF and the Canadian contingent were moved east from Cairo to Ismailia on the Suez Canal. The majority of the Canadian forces personnel serving with UNEF are now located in this Suez location.

The present strength of the Canadian contingent which continues to provide support for the force, numbers over 900, all ranks. In the United Disengagement Observer Force until the end of May, 1974, the operations of UNEF were limited to the border area between Israel and Egypt.

Although UNDOF was established as a separate force, to date it has operated largely as an extension of UNEF. The current over-all strength of UNDOF is 1,100 with Canada providing 130 personnel from UNEF and six observers from UNTSO.

I think the armed forces are doing a wonderful job. God bless them!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: Madam Chairman, there are a few questions I would like to ask the minister. Prior to the July 8 election there was a Liberal political document put out in my riding and in it was stated:

> It is estimated that 800 new jobs will be created as a result of James Richardson assigning all the Department of National Defence Boeing 707 work to the Winnipeg facility . . .

I wonder if the minister could explain how he arrived at the figure of 800 in regard to overhauling the Boeings. In this document it says 800 new jobs.

Mr. Richardson: Madam Chairman, the figure of 800 jobs was arrived at because that was approximately the number of employees in the former Air Canada base in Winnipeg. That figure was not related in any way to the Boeing 707 work, although the sending of the 707 to Winnipeg was in part to meet the commitment of strengthening the aerospace industry. That work, incidentally, is going ahead, as the hon. member knows.

[Mr. Turner (London East).]

The figure of 800 jobs was also stated by the Prime Minister and by me as an objective, and it has been confirmed since that time by my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, as an objective which we still have. It has not been given up or changed in any way, but there was not and could not be any time frame or any date by which we would achieve that objective.

Mr. McKenzie: In this document there is no mention of time frames. It just mentions that there will be 800 new jobs created, and I do not know what the minister means by that. Some existing aerospace employees will continue working because the Boeings are going to Winnipeg; they are going to Transair, as we now know, and all Transair is doing is taking on 20 additional employees from CAE to work on the Boeings. We are getting nowhere near this 800 figure.

I would like to read from a press release, issued by the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, which says:

> From the present total employment of 160 (98 union, 62 management), there will be continuous layoffs until the total employment target of 69 (48 union, 21 nonunion) is reached on August 1, 1975. To reach this goal there will be 91 layoffs within the next two months.

We are not reaching an additional 800 jobs. We are continually dropping, and these men were told they would get the Boeings to overhaul and that there would be work for them. The majority of them have stayed on at CAE, and now they are being laid off. If they had not had these endless promises that there were going to be government contracts, and if there had been some honesty from the government in regard to statements to CAE telling them that the government would do its best to get them jobs but without definite promises, many of them would have left a long time ago and taken jobs elsewhere. The government will have to be much more careful in the next election because it does not appreciate the effect of such loose statements as that 800 new jobs will be created.

In a letter from the Minister of Transport dated—

Mr. Richardson: On a point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is referring to documents or statements which he apparently saw during the election, but he should observe statements which are made by the government or by me as distinct from whatever it is he is referring to now. In the election there were three distinct and clear promises in this area, all of which are in the process of being fulfilled. There was a commitment to build a new Air Canada hangar. There was a commitment to have the 707 major repair and overhaul work done in Winnipeg. There was an objective to build up to 800 additional aerospace jobs. We are still continuing to achieve all of those political promises.

Mr. McKenzie: I do not understand how the minister is achieving the additional 800 jobs since there are continual lay-offs. We are discussing statements made during an election. The minister made a number of statements during the election. For example, "Mr. Richardson has achieved something. He is going to be bringing back the Air Canada overhaul base." These statements appeared often in election material, and completely misled people. As far as I am concerned, it is false information.

I will go back to the letter dated March 26, 1969. It is from the Minister of Transport, and it was sent to the president of CAE Industries. May I call it six o'clock, Madam Chairman?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At 6 p.m. the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Chairman, the minister is missing. Is he not returning this evening? I want to continue with my questioning, Mr. Chairman, and the minister is required to be here while his estimates are being examined. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary can enlighten us as to whether the minister will be returning this evening.

Mr. Hopkins: The minister is on his way and will be here shortly, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member would like to proceed with his questions. They could be noted by the parliamentary secretary and the minister could respond as soon as he arrives.

Mr. McKenzie: That does not sound too good, Mr. Chairman. I spoke to the parliamentary secretary this afternoon regarding the safety amnual, the document which the Department of National Defence uses. I wonder if he was able to obtain that.

Mr. Hopkins: Perhaps the hon. member should carry on with his questions and I will take note of them.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon we were discussing the creation of 800 new jobs in Winnipeg as a result of the Boeing 707s being overhauled there. That is not really the problem facing us today, however. What we are trying to do now is save the CAE plant in Winnipeg from being completely closed down. I have a copy of a letter from the Minister of Transport dated March 26, 1969, which is addressed to Mr. Reekie, President of CAE Industires Ltd., at that time. The letter states as follows:

> The Department of Defence Production can guarantee no more than 40,000 to 50,000 direct labour man hours per year in the period 1971-1976—

In a news release issued by the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers from which I quoted this afternoon, it is claimed that this commitment has not been met. I wonder if the minister can tell us this evening whether these 40,000 man-hours of work will be provided to CAE in Winnipeg?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, I think the most appropriate answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre would be to refer him to Hansard for June 2, 1975, page 6369, where my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, gave a very complete answer to his question. I could read it back into the record but I think a reference to it would be all that is required. It is very complete and tells in clear terms the volume of aerospace work being directed to Winnipeg and the number of jobs being created. I am sure it answers fully the matter about which the hon. member is concerned.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Chairman, apparently the minister did not understand my question. I am referring to this letter from the Minister of Transport in 1969 which claimed that 40,000 hours of man-work would be provided to CAE in Winnipeg. This was a commitment to keep the plant going. I should like to know when these 40,000 hours of work are going to be provided to CAE because, if they are not provided in the very near future the plant is going to be closed. Can the minister tell us when he is going to live up to this? That is my question. It has nothing to do with any other firm in Winnipeg; it specifically refers to the CAE plant in Winnipeg.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, I have the letter that the hon. member refers to in front of me. It is the Department of Defence Production that is referred to in paragraph (c). That department was taken over by the new Department of Supply and Services. The responsibility for following the matter up lies with that department. It is not related to the responsibilities of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Chairman, does the minister have no other knowledge of work being provided for CAE? Is he making any intervention to see that work will be provided to CAE before it folds up? Does he have any defence contracts, or knowledge of defence contracts that can be directed to CAE in Winnipeg?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, I am always interested in defence contracts but they are let by the Department of Supply and Services, not by the Department of National Defence.

An hon. Member: What about the old home town—Winnipeg?

• (2010)

Mr. Richardson: A lot of aerospace work, as my colleague made clear, will be going to a number of companies in Winnipeg and Manitoba. CAE is capable of bidding on this work. It has bid on some, although unsuccessfully I believe. I cannot assume responsibility for this. I do not think anyone in the government should assume responsibility for the success of any company's bid. Those bids are assessed by the Department of Supply and Services.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Minister, it is interesting to note the promises made to CAE prior to the July 8 election. As you will remember, their business agent was your seconder at your nomination meeting. I guarantee that no member of that union will nominate you in the next election. I gather from comments made this evening that you are not going to intervene. You cannot supply any information about what is to happen to the CAE plant in Winnipeg. As far as you are concerned, it can fold up.

Mr. Paproski: They will be waiting for you next time, Jim.

Mr. McKenzie: I want to discuss outside consultants whom the Department of National Defence hires, despite all the expertise available in the department and the department's limited working budget. I ask this of the minister: are you intervening directly in this matter? Are you considering why all this money should be pouring out to outside consultants? Do you agree that this money ought to be directed to outside consultants, and is there an actual need for their services? In other words, have you, yourself, investigated whether all these consultant studies are required? Could you give me some explanation?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, yes I have. I look at every submission which comes forward to me concerning outside consultants. I examine each one and have asked myself exactly the same questions the hon. member is asking me. I want to know if we can do the work within the Department of National Defence for which we are engaging consultants. I ask these questions, at least, on every major contract. I believe we should be able to do more "in-house" than we have in the past. In fact, we have tried to do any work for which we are competent "in-house" rather than go to outside consultants.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon I gave notice that I should be asking questions about a certain national defence safety manual which is allegedly a bilingual one, or will be. Has anyone been able to obtain a copy of this document?

Mr. Richardson: Yes, Mr. Chairman, we did obtain the document. What is the question?

Mr. McKenzie: My question is this: is this document being withdrawn from the armed forces? It has to do with explosives, and apparently you are experiencing difficulties with the translation into French. I hear that the French version does not give the same information as the English version. Can you tell me if this document has been withdrawn from the forces, and did it have anything to do with the tragedy at Val Cartier, Quebec, in which some young cadets died as a result of hand grenades exploding?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, the document has to do with the handling of explosives. It has been written in English and it is in the process of being translated into French, but the French version is not yet in use.

Mr. McKenzie: Do you intend to withdraw the document, and did that particular safety manual have anything to do with the tragedy at Val Cartier in which hand grenades killed some cadets?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, the document has not been withdrawn. It is being revised from time to time and is, as I said, in the process of translation. To my knowledge it was not related in any way, directly or indirectly, to the tragic accident, to which you referred, which took place at Val Cartier.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Minister, are you experiencing many difficulties in translating technical documents from English into French? Is this a problem in the Department of National Defence?

[Mr. Paproski.]

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, I do not translate technical documents myself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Richardson: There are understandably some difficulties in translating documents of a technical nature. We are making progress and increasing each week, and each month, the number of technical publications available in both languages.

Mr. McKenzie: May I ask one final question, Mr. Chairman. It was announced some time ago that the minister, who is responsible for the status of women, will bring forward Bill C-16, which will amend the national defence legislation and allow girls to be enrolled officially in the cadet movement. As this year, 1975, is International Women's Year, can the minister say if the government will bring forward Bill C-16 this year?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, that is a question for the House leader. Certainly the government gives that bill high priority. I think the government House leader will try to move Bill C-16 forward as quickly as the pressure of other legislation allows. We have made other provision, quite apart from Bill C-16, to meet the point to which the hon. member referred. We will, as a result, be able to pay girl cadets at the same rate as we pay boy cadets. Also girl cadets will be able to attend summer camp this year.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Before I recognize the next hon. member I should draw to the attention of members of the committee that there seems to be a lapse on the part of some hon. members, making comments or asking questions, in observing the rules, in that they are addressing the minister directly instead of making their comments to the Chair. I am sure that hon. members will agree that, in committee of the whole, we ought to maintain proper decorum. I am merely reminding hon. members gently of how we ought to proceed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks to direct to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) on Vote 1 of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Chairman, I think this day is very instructive for us and it will provide information to the people of this country because they will have an opportunity to know the views of parliamentarians on the defence system of this country, the amounts invested, because the national defence estimates now amount to over $2.5 billion. It is an important department from a monetary and social standpoint.

When we talk of defence we think in terms of security and peace for all citizens of this country and if we want peace at home it must be effective elsewhere as well. If we had no potential aggressors there would be no need for us to talk of defence, armament, but such is not the case in the world. So we must accept the world as it is and stop hiding our heads in the sand to detect the enemy where he is to be found and not be afraid to point him out. That is why tonight I will be very clear. I will deal first with NORAD and then say a few words about NATO.

After listening to the speeches made this afternoon and among others the NDP member I realized that one must really be misinformed about the intentions of the Soviet Union or be among its accomplices to talk like the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) did this afternoon, when he candidly admitted that the NORAD agreement no longer served any purpose because the U.S.S.R. is no longer threatening today. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that the U.S.S.R. is more threatening than ever in all North America. For example, we know that the quieter the U.S.S.R. is, the more it presents a velvet paw, the more it is preparing to jump on its unsuspecting victim. When we think of its conquests of slavic countries which led to the Warsaw Pact, when we visit Germany and walk along the 35-mile long Berlin wall cutting the city in two, with only one door, and that is taking place in the 29th century, in the era of astronautics and electronic transportation systems, it is unimaginable for someone who has not seen it. Today, not daring to attack North America as it did its satellite countries for fear of the United States, it fights a psychological and tactical war faking to come to the rescue of countries surrounding North America. You have seen them in Cuba, China, Vietnam, Egypt, and you will see them again elsewhere in the hope that one day all its missiles will be pointed towards America in all directions.

I do not mean to make any prophecies, Mr. Chairman, I am just witnessing what I have under my eyes and what every member may check for himself. Hon. members who read papers have heard of the series of Russian Cosmos satellites launched by just one rocket, as announced by the TASS Agency. Those rockets circle the world in 115 minutes. I think we should be more careful than ever to protect efficiently not only Canada, by the North American continent as a whole.

I read with deep interest the statement of the Minister of National Defence to the Standing Committee on National Defence on May 1, 1975 with respect to the new territorial limits of NORAD. Part of it reads as follows:

> The establishment of new territorial limits for NORAD in Canada and the United States would result in each country controlling its own air space.
>
> Since the implementation of NORAD in 1958, the limits of air defence areas overlapped the international border; surveillance and control were exercised by both member countries.
>
> Under the new agreement, Canada will be divided into two geographic areas of fairly equal size, each with a regional operations control centre established in Canada. A new control centre which will cost $25 million once equipped, is to be established near Edmonton, Alberta. The other one is already in operation in North Bay, Ontario.
> Each of those control centres will have a staff of some 250 people. Work at the Edmonton centre will start next year, and the equipment of both centres will be chosen next year too. Computers will be used to detect, identify and control aircraft that would enter the Canadian airspace.

Since 1958, and particularly during the 60s, when I visited with the committee the general headquarters of NORAD in Colorado Springs, the crux of our whole continental defence, I had been somewhat concerned that the U.S. military authorities had supreme control over our defence system. After 17 years, the minister decided to assume greater responsibilities and to have Canada behave more as an independent country vis-à-vis its American partner.

An addition to the new control centre in Alberta, we will have near Chatham, New Brunswick, a Baker-Nunn photographic facility. This will supply information to NORAD's detection and tracking system in Colorado Springs. I believe this is a step forward in North America's air protection.

Coming now to NATO, which was created to counter the Warsaw Pact, a number of my fellow citizens wonder why we should still be keeping over 3,000 troops in Europe. Obviously, our constituents do not see the point in maintaining that European force at the same level as the domestic one, and a number of them do not understand why we should keep forces in Cyprus, in Corea and elsewhere.

I am happy that we should go on cooperating with nations requiring our participation, in the interest of peace. But I am forced to ask questions in the face of France's position. That country took its troops out of NATO. It may be argued that she is still a member in principle. But surely, if every country were to rely only on principles for its defence, we would be engulfed in principals. We are told the French government will not act as a buffer to any new attack anymore, that it will rather defend itself. These are serious enough suggestions that invite reflection.

Looking back, I would not condemn the French authorities. They did more than their part during World War II. And I wonder whether the delay by allied countries to help France is not one reason for the withdrawal. Therefore, it may be because of delays in NATO decisions that France is losing some of its confidence. In fact, in some araes, even if we maintain our forces, a great part of the arms or military equipment used belongs in another age.

At certain times, especially when I went there for a visit, I wondered if our men were not there to serve a museum caretakers. Fortunately, the minister in his statement has brought new hope of modernization, without which our army would be nothing but Canadian folklore in Europe. The minister said that the defence budget has increased, but I would like him to note that the major part of the increase if due mostly to salary increase. The minister also talks about the quality of our men; we never doubted their quality. But it is useless to proclaim that one Canadian soldiers is worth five Russian soldiers; the most important thing is that he should be as well equipped as the Russians.

It is about the same situation as in hockey; we are constantly repeating that we have the best athletes in the world, but this does not prevent us from taking humiliating beatings at the hands of the Russians. We should profit from this lesson at least in the military area.

I would also like to call the attention of the minister on useless spendings, when the money is not simply thrown away, as my colleague from Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) mentioned. I know that this is a delicate subject for the minister and that it is his major source of concern. But this should not stop him from being even more careful. Our military forces, whether at sea, on land or in the air, which have the duty to protect Canadian sovereignty, to help civilian authorities to ensure the control and the security of our national territory, to cooperate with the American forces in the joint defence of North America, in maintaining peace in Europe and elsewhere, have no right to disappoint Canadian taxpayers by taking part in schemes which are unworthy of their mission.

Those, Mr. Chairman, are the few comments I wanted to make tonight.

● (2030)

[English]

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Chairman, during this debate on the Department of National Defence estimates the question of the requirement to safeguard Canada's sovereign interests must be kept in the forefront of our deliberations. Of great interest in this respect is the government's current review of the need for a new long range patrol aircraft. I would like to comment briefly on this subject which will have such a major impact on DND expenditures.

The potential for challenges to Canada's sovereignty and security take both non-military and military forms and arise principally from Canada's vast size and relatively small population, her abundance of natural resources, the length of her shores, the size of the water areas which are of direct concern to her and the fact that historically we have identified and allied ourselves politically and militarily with those nations which share our perceptions of individual freedom and justice and our way of life.

One important component of the military and civilian resources devoted to monitoring and defending against both military and non-military threats has been the Argus aircraft of Maritime Command of the Canadian forces.

The Argus was introduced into service in 1958 and was a good maritime patrol aircraft in its day; its equipment was among the best available at that time, and its range made it possible to conduct long patrols over the far reaches of the Atlantic and North Pacific Oceans. Over the years, more modern and effective surveillance equipment has been developed and the Argus is now limited in capability compared with other aircraft in this role. The capability of its surveillance devices is relatively limited, the aircraft is slow, and the long flight times required for patrols results in high crew fatigue because of noise and vibration. The aircraft engines, and installed equipment are getting old and are expensive to maintain. The standard fuel used by the aircraft is now available at only four locations in Canada.

Therefore, on the basis of the policy outlined in the government white paper "Defence in the Seventies", extensive studies of maritime force capabilities conducted within the Department of National Defence, and the fact that continued operation of the Argus was not cost effective, the Minister of National Defence obtained cabinet approval in May, 1972, to examine in detail the possibility of obtaining suitable replacement aircraft. An interdepartmental office was established in September, 1972, and initial studies were concluded with five aircraft companies, including Canadair.

Upon receipt and evaluation of the proposals received, it was recommended that studies be continued with the two most suitable contractors, Boeing and Lockheed, and cabinet agreed. The studies are in their final stage at this time and it is expected that a submission to cabinet will be made in the near future. It is now timely to review the challenges facing Canada which the government must weigh in arriving at its final decision on the LRPA proposal.

With respect to non-military challenges to Canadian sovereignty, of paramount interest is the enforcement of Canadian laws and the ability of Canada to maintain its sovereignty and jurisdiction over land and sea areas of Canadian interest. The challenge, therefore, lies in any attempt to infringe upon these laws, particularly as such infringements would affect the resources of the sea and the seabed, and as they would affect the marine environment in waters of Canadian interest, including the Arctic, coastal and continental shelf areas.

While other government departments are charged with the task of policing violations of Canadian law in Canadian waters of interest, DND has the ultimate responsibility to ensure that Canadian sovereignty and jurisdiction are maintained. With respect to these challenges, therefore, it is necessary for DND to conduct surveillance of these areas, to assist other departments in their surveillance tasks, and to provide a control capability to back up other departments in their enforcement of Canadian laws.

The potential for external, non-military challenges to Canada's maritime and Arctic sovereignty and jurisdiction is very real and recent developments have heightened awareness of this potential. The U.S. decision to proceed with construction of a pipe line across Alaska and to ship North Slope oil from Alaska to U.S. West Coast ports in supertankers has increased the prospect of major oil spills off the coast of British Columbia. Current and prospective shortages of energy and other basic world commodities have heightened national and international interest in the resource potential of the Canadian Arctic and the continental margin.

The basic concern, nevertheless, remains that of the possibility of foreign infringements of Canadian laws establishing the extent and governing the use of Canada's territorial sea, internal waters, enclosed fishing zones, pollution control zones, and regulating exploration for and exploitation of the resources of the seabed subject to Canadian jurisdiction, and of Canada's Arctic territories.

Infringements of this kind are most likely to occur in areas where Canada's right to exercise jurisdiction is not fully accepted internationally and, at least at the outset, would probably be non-military in character. They would, therefore, be of primary concern to those civil departments and agencies of the federal government to which, under Canadian law, responsibility for regulation and enforcement has been assigned. The possibility, however, cannot be excluded that a determined challenge could be supported by the display or limited use of military force, as occurred in the recent fisheries dispute between Britain and Iceland.

These concerns are growing, as evidenced during the recent Law of the Sea Conference, as a consequence of the concept of an exclusive economic zone or patrimonial sea extending not less that 200 miles off a state's coast. Within this zone the state would exercise the sole responsibility for resource management, and enjoy either exclusive or preferential rights in the exploitation of both living and inanimate resources. The implications for Canada of such a broadening of its rights and responsibilities as a coastal state are important. Law is seldom self-enforcing; it is for consideration whether the greater range of interests and greater geographical extent of the areas subject to Canadian jurisdiction would lead to a larger requirement than at present for surveillance capabilities to detect infringements of Canada's legal rights, and also for control capabilities to ensure that those rights were respected.

An area which must be considered as a special case when discussing challenges to Canadian sovereignty is the Arctic. At first glance there appears to be little possibility of direct threats in Canada's Arctic; far more concern is expressed over the possible unauthorized exploitation of the resources of this area, and of the possibility of pollution which is far more damaging in its ecological effects in the Arctic than it would be elsewhere. The non-military challenge in the Arctic includes such things as the unauthorized drilling of oil wells and the unauthorized use of Canadian waters by foreign vessels.

Although a number of federal agencies are on the ground throughout Canada's Arctic, a military force, showing its presence in that area on a regular basis, does much to re-affirm Canada's sovereignty. Further precise definition of the various challenges in Canada's Arctic will evolve in time, but it is evident that a possibility exists for a variety of challenges in this area, and a capability is required to meet these challenges as they arise.

Turning to the essentially military challenges to Canadian sovereignty, the government has outlined four objectives for the Department of National Defence. In order of priority, these are the defence of Canada, the defence of North America, contributions to the NATO alliance, and contributions to international peacekeeping operations.

During discussions on the requirement for an LRPA, much has been said of the ability of this aircraft to support national development by doing tasks for other government departments. However, Canada's armed forces provide, to the extent possible in this interdependent world, the means by which Canada can assert its sovereignty through an ability to defend itself. In addition, through representation on international military councils and contributions to international military forces, the armed forces also contribute to the defence of a wider area, and make it possible for Canada to influence the decisions, military, political and economic, of her allies. It is also true, in a military context, that providing for the defence of North America and contributing to the NATO alliance are the most effective ways of ensuring we can fulfill the first priority task, the defence of Canada.

The balance of forces between the U.S.S.R. and the United States is predicted to act as a stable deterrent to major war because both nations possess the capability to inflict upon the other an unacceptable level of destruction in retaliation for a first strike attack. Various agreements have been made, and negotiations are now being conducted which are designed to preserve this balance of power and to ensure that neither nation believes it necessary to enter into further expensive arms build-ups.

A Canadian long range maritime patrol aircraft would contribute to the stability of this situation, because for a deterrent to be credible its military components must be effective. An LRPA would also give Canada the capability to maintain its national security posture by enabling her to detect potentially hostile subsurface activity of any kind in the water approaches to her shores, including the very large continental shelf area.

Canada must continue to review its requirement for maritime forces to act as a deterrent against threats to its security and challenges to maritime jurisdiction and sovereignty. The fundamental need is for maritime surface and air forces possessing a range of capabilities and the degree of flexibility in employment which will permit them to respond promptly to sudden changes in the intensity or magnitude of particular threats or challenges. Because of its speed, range, and equipment capabilities it would appear that an LRPA would form a most important part of the air element of this force. Its speed would permit it to respond quickly to detected or suspected challenges, its range would permit it to reach any part of the vast areas which are of national interest, and its equipment would permit it to detect and, if the government decided, to control activities which are not acceptable to the government.

It is also clear that such an aircraft would have an inherent capability to contribute effectively to the support activities of other departments by the addition of a few specialized sensors for a wide range of activities, such as ice reconnaissance, wildlife determinations, and special agricultural problems. Thus there is great flexibility in such an aircraft.

Finally, I wish to say a word about industrial benefits. It is apparent that if the government is to spend the large sums of money required for a new long range patrol aircraft, such a purchase must be arranged so as to maximize the benefit to Canadian industry,—in particular the Canadian aerospace industry for which the government continues to express concern. We on this side of the House will continue to give full support to the ministers during their deliberations on this very expensive program, because it will have such an impact on Canada's long term capabilities to ensure that we do retain the control of our resources, our sovereignty, and our way of life.

Canada has been blessed with many very capable leaders within the ranks of our armed forces. I would be remiss in this debate if, as an example, I did not mention people such as General Donald Holmes, his officers, and men and women of all ranks who are giving Canada an outstanding image throughout the Middle East. They are held in the highest esteem by all parties in the present dispute in that area. They are respected and looked up to by all other United Nations contingents present in the Middle East. Their expertise, discipline, and fairness tempered with firmness, have won for them the respect of all.

General Holmes is a soldier, a statesman, a diplomat, a politician in a sense, and a gentleman all wrapped up in one man. As commanding officer of our United Nations contingent in the Middle East, he is setting the pace for his personnel. He is setting an example for everyone, and above all he and our military personnel have done more than any other government department could possibly do to promote the image of Canada abroad and to give Canada a tremendously favourable rapport with all national groups. It is my hope that when General Holmes returns next fall we will be able to invite him into the Speaker's gallery and have parliament give him the recognition he deserves.

Many people have told me, both Israelis and Egyptians as well as members of other United Nations contingents, that without our 1,037 military personnel in the Middle East the United Nations would not be able to operate nearly as effectively as it does. There are 37 women in that number. Dedication is also the name of the business of our armed forces. One has only to think of men like General Clay Beattie in Cyprus who, with the loyalty and integrity of all those who have served under him, has given so much of his life to bring about peace on that troubled island.

No matter where our armed forces go in the world they retain their excellent discipline, perform their jobs effectively, put their expertise to work, exercise common sense, and keep cool heads. This can be largely attributed to the fact that we have a volunteer force, that our personnel are in the armed forces because they want to be there and because they are interested in what they are doing. In Europe our NATO forces are respected by all NATO partners and are well received by the local people. Military attaches in capitals around the world form another group who uphold Canada and build a constructive image. This parliament owes the members of our armed forces our sincere plaudits and a wealth of national gratitude.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I might ask the parliamentary secretary one question. I listened to his treatise with great care. Does he really think, in view of the background that commenced in 1968 when the Prime Minister first became Prime Minister of this country and said he had decided to withdraw from NATO—in fact, at one time we thought there was going to be a complete withdrawal in view of the way the armed forces have been downgraded—that we have any chance of defending ourselves by air, land or water?

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Chairman, if I may answer the hon. gentleman's question, we do not intend to downgrade the forces. We have exceptional expertise in our armed forces in this country. Contrary to the unbalanced thinking that some people have been expressing, new equipment has been ordered for our armed forces to help them do the job, and more is on order. I have just discussed one of these major programs. I am not a pessimist when it comes to the Canadian armed forces. I am a strong supporter of them, as are many people on the benches of this party over here. I know I am speaking for many members on these benches when I say they have our full support.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words about a matter which is not easily computed in terms of dollars and cents, or specifically included in any vote or even allowed for in the estimates. I want to talk for a few minutes about the reduction in the morale of our armed forces, and to ask a few questions about how it can be restored to the high level which used to be an integral characteristic of the military.

We have heard discussions as to whether the major roles of our armed forces are as valid today as when they were first enunciated and, indeed, whether the troops we have, greatly reduced in strength, are adequate to the tasking. These are not new questions. I have heard them raised many times by members of the armed forces, certainly during the time I was a member of the National Defence College, and subsequently. Obvious to me on a recent visit to our bases in Lahr and Baden-Solingen were the unease and anxiety felt by many in the forces as Canada's role in NATO undergoes another of its perennial reviews—anxiety and unease about the maintenance of our NATO contingent and its possible reconfiguration.

I want to suggest that lack of information and inadequate communications significantly undermine morale, but much can be done to correct this problem without increasing expenditures from the public purse.

People in the military, and in military communities, are anxious and uneasy mainly because they do not know what is going on, where they are headed, and if things will improve, change radically, or further deteriorate in the months ahead. What is being looked for is not information of a highly classified nature vital to the security of the country, but day to day routine explanations that would make day to day living much easier.

I just want to mention a few of these agents that attack morale in armed forces communities. When departmental expenditures are reduced, or when there is no growth in real dollar terms as at the present time, the first area to be short changed is the maintenance of living quarters.

Time and again I have heard and seen legitimate complaints about living standards in PMQs' homes which, because of their shortcomings, cannot help but depress the occupants. These are not very happy homes for wives and children when they are much below the standard of other living accommodations in the general area. I know this to be particularly true at the Kingston base. Painting and refurbishing of homes, the fixing of appliances, and general improvements to property may seem like small items when compared with the acquisition of new LRPA or tanks, but from the over-all point of morale they are vitally important.

I would suggest that the minister should be in a position to let people know, certainly well in advance of steep rent increases, when they can expect some improvement in their living quarters. What about future plans for PMQs?

An armed forces base and the inter-relationship it has with its neighbouring community or communities have a very direct bearing on morale. Let me cite an example. A few months ago in an effort to economize on what was obviously considered peripheral and superfluous by the minister and his staff, the order was given to reduce the number of regular armed forces bands from nine to five. This was done with little or no thought to the incalculable value that accrues to the armed forces because of the high esteem in which these bands are held by men, women and children throughout neighbouring communities. Fortunately, after sufficient pressure was brought to bear, and sufficient reasoned argument was put forward, the minister saw the light and reversed the decision, enabling the bands to remain to contribute to the military and cultural life of Canada. Once again the intervening months of uncertainty, procrastination, and lack of communication added to morale problems among the forces.

The military educational establishments are another example where the future is uncertain and cloudy. It is estimated that it costs five times as much to send a student through Royal Military College as through Queen's University. Anyone who has had any exposure to RMC will know it is a fine institution with proud history and tradition. Nevertheless, one must wonder if it will continue to be operational at a cost five times that of public universities.

The people in these military institutions, staff, students and civilians, are all understandably uneasy. Perhaps there are those in the inner circle who know the long-range plans for these educational institutions, but how much better it would be to communicate that knowledge to the community at large, thus avoiding speculation and rumour which can so easily lead to distortion of the real objectives. It would not take much in the way of public expenditure to supply that information, but it would net incalculable benefits in public understanding and support, and in strengthening of morale. So I would ask, what about the future for military educational institutions?

Primarily because of the reduction in the strength of our armed forces over the years our military hospitals are not being fully utilized. For the most part these are well equipped facilities capable of handling much more traffic than they presently bear. Because of under-utilization the future of some of these hospitals is in doubt.

I am not unaware of the difficulties that arise in working out federal-provincial fiscal relations to make these hospitals available for the needs of dependents of members of the armed forces, but through you, sir, I would urge the minister to press ahead with this kind of arrangement. In any event, I would urge that he make the civic officials in neighbouring communities aware of all the facts so that adequate advanced planning can be carried out jointly with DND to make the most effective use of these hospitals in the future. Open lines of communication would dispel a lot of the doubt and uncertainty that surround the future of these hospitals. So, I would ask, what about the future of our military hospitals?

Better communications, better programming, and better reporting to our armed forces abroad on what is taking place in Canada would do a great deal to boost the morale of people in the service. I know we have CBC outlets in Lahr and Baden-Solingen and elsewhere, but I am surprised that the amount of programming from Canada is so limited. Better mail service, if such a thing were possible, and distribution of Canadian newspapers and magazines would work wonders. It all seems so obvious that it should not need saying. The same is true for the students in our schools on bases abroad. They are interested in what is taking place currently in Canada. They are thirsty for information and keen to get up-to-date material, something which they so consistently lack. So I would ask the minister about better communications to our armed forces personnel overseas.

These things, I have mentioned do not require elaborate redirection of huge sums in these estimates, but homes, hospitals, educational institutions, and communications are just as important to the members of our armed forces and their dependants as they are to other Canadians. I hope that when the minister speaks he will have something to say on how the maintenance and operations of these facilities can be improved because the outcome has such a bearing on the improvement of morale.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, there are just two subjects on which I should like to make a few comments. If I gave the minister a dozen guesses, I am sure he would guess correctly on the first two.

As I am sure he realizes, I listened with interest to the conversation between the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and the Minister of National Defence with respect to certain promises that were made in Winnipeg during May and June of 1974.

I think what I enjoyed most tonight was hearing the minister make so many references to the Department of Supply and Services. I have a fairly good memory of what goes on in election campaigns, but I do not remember the Department of Supply and Services being mentioned in Winnipeg last summer. It was the Minister of National Defence, with the assistance of course of the right hon. Prime Minister, who was going to protect and restore the aerospace industry in Manitoba. As the minister realizes, he is not only the only minister in the cabinet from Manitoba but he is also the Minister of National Defence, and he is in a position to try to do something about those promises that were made last summer.

I should like to emphasize in particular that in those tragic days when we were losing the Air Canada overhaul base from Winnipeg, we were assured that there would be certain replacements. One of the replacements was the work to be given to CAE Industries. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is quite right in protesting about the way in which CAE Industries are being allowed to phase out of the picture, for it looks as though that is what will happen because of the direction in which the government is moving.

I ask, therefore, that the Minister of National Defence recover some of that enthusiasm for strengthening the position of the aerospace workers in Winnipeg that was so evident in May and June of 1974.

Mr. Stanfield: We need another election.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Leader of the Opposition has a suggestion which I think many people in this country would welcome. Many are wondering whether the vote went the right way last July 8.

When I speak of the minister's enthusiasm for the promises that he and the Prime Minister made, I am doing this not just from what I read in the papers, saw on television, and heard on the radio, but it is also based on the fact that he and I were on the same program one night in a television studio and I sensed close at hand that he really believed that if he got re-elected, and the Liberals with him, the aero industry in Winnipeg would be in a much better position.

Mr. Richardson: It is.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister says that these things are being achieved. The trouble is that it is a long, slow process, and I am afraid that we will not really get the enthusiasm back until the next election, and then of course it will depend on who nominates the Minister of National Defence in Winnipeg South.

The other item about which I wish to have another word with the minister—and he knows it very well—is the question of the pensions of retired members of the armed forces.

I was pleased to hear the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works say this afternoon that this is an area in which we should do a lot better for the members of the armed forces. I was pleased to hear the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence say more or less the same thing in the speech that he made this evening. I suspect that in the armed forces in pension matters probably the most prevalent grievance is the fact that when members of the armed forces go on retirement and draw their pensions, if they are not yet 60 years of age there is no annual cost of living supplement for them as there are for public servants and for many other persons in receipt of pensions.

This is a subject that I have raised repeatedly. I also raise it with respect to retired members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I receive from the ministers responsible for both of these departments the assertion that these things have to be kept in line with other pension plans, and therefore they have to discuss the whole matter with the President of the Treasury Board. I also get the assurance every time from the Minister of National Defence or from his parliamentary secretary when he answers my questions on "late shows" that the matter is still being studied.

Perhaps this was not as serious an issue some years ago when inflation was not quite so rampant, and I understand the argument, about retired members of the armed forces being in an age bracket when perchance they can get other employment if it is available to them, but in these times of rapid inflation when most of the pensions which come under the aegis of the government are escalated in accordance with the rise in the cost of living—it is significant that in most cases they lag behind it—there is nothing for the retired armed forces individuals who are not yet 60 years of age. The minister writes letters to these people, and then we get copies of the letters, in which he points out that when such an individual reaches the age of 60, he may have five or ten years of percentage points to collect and by that time he may, in the year in which he is 60, pick up an escalation of 30 per cent or 40 per cent. But it is "the meantime" that bothers the retired armed forces individual when inflation is rising so rapidly.

I wonder tonight if the minister can say anything that is more hopeful about this matter than he has said on previous occasions when all he has told me the matter is still under study.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, I welcome this opportunity to respond to some of the statements—

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Victoria wishes to rise on a point or order.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a little misunderstanding. I wonder if the minister would be good enough to delay his remarks for another five minutes, unless he plans to answer the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre at present. In that way, we will have more time in which to put questions. Two members of my party have been waiting patiently all day to ask some questions. I would be appreciative if we could squeeze them in.

● (2110)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I sat down leaving some of my time, hoping that the minister would answer me. He is on my time.

Mr. Woolliams: I think he has to speak.

Mr. Richardson: I will answer as many hon. members as I can, but I would be pleased, pursuant to the understanding I reached earlier with the hon. member for Victoria, to wait until 9.15 to begin my remarks.

Mr. Stanfield: Let's get the Winnipeg picture.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just give me an answer about the pensions.

Mr. Stanfield: And Winnipeg too, Jim.

The Chairman: Order, please. I have to recognize hon. members who stand up, and I will recognize the hon. member for Medicine Hat at this time, unless the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who had not completed his time, wishes to pursue the matter.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): From the understanding we had earlier I thought that any of us who did not use our full 20 minutes could ask for a reply, and all the minister has to do is stand up and say yes.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That was my understanding as well.

The Chairman: It is my impression that the minister did not hear the point raised by the hon. member at the end because the parliamentary secretary was talking to him. I believe it was about pensions and inflation.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked me about the aerospace industry and indicated that statements had been made during the election to the effect that, if the Liberal government was re-elected, the aerospace industry would be strengthened and enlarged in Manitoba, and I can assure him that that commitment has been achieved. So that we do not take more time, I refer him to the answer given a few days ago by my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, in which he outlined, at some length in a late show here in the House, all of the figures on the creation of jobs and volume of work which is now being placed in Manitoba.

Concerning the armed forces pensions I can only say to the hon. member, as I have on other occasions, that these pensions are at the maximum we are able to achieve at the present time. It is a subject, however because of the representations which he and others make, which is always before us. If more can be done, it will be done.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the minister discussing the matter of escalating pensions, beginning the year after retirement, with his colleague, the Solicitor General, who is responsible for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and with his colleague the President of the Treasury Board, who is involved in these matters? If he is having discussions with those two colleagues, how is he getting on with them?

Mr. Richardson: We do have those discussions, but there is no encouraging answer other than that which I gave to the more general question.

Mr. Hargrave: Mr. Chairman, I have a very brief comment to make, and it relates specifically to a question to the Minister of National Defence. I refer to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence hearing of last May 6 when the minister was a witness, and I raised certain matters relating to the Suffield Defence Research station. I am sure the minister is well aware of this matter. I asked him if he would give me a written reply to a rather detailed letter I wrote to him last October 31. To date I have not received an answer, and I thought it was significant that at the following committee meeting the acting deputy minister led off in his opening statement and made reference to my request for that answer, which has still not been received. I just want to focus attention on this matter by reading one short paragraph out of that letter, and I think this will bring to light my special concern. It reads as follows:

> I would like to now ask you to very seriously consider the possibility of allowing the Suffield Research Establishment to continue in its traditional and "new look" type of operations indefinitely. Such an announcement would do much to restore confidence, morale and esprit de corps to a very dedicated and able staff, who sincerely want to continue doing a top job at Suffield and remain in the Medicine Hat-Redcliff community and eventually retire there.

That is just one paragraph, and I would appreciate it if the minister would respond.

Mr. Richardson: The hon. member for Medicine Hat and I have discussed this matter many times, both privately and in committee, and I can assure him that the detailed and very thoughtful letter he has addressed to the department is under consideration. My reply is being prepared in the department, and he will receive answers to the questions raised in his letter very shortly.

As I was saying a few moments ago when I thought I could have the floor, I welcome the opportunity to respond to the statements which have been made on both sides of the House today and to answer some of the questions to which I have not been able to reply while hon. members were addressing them to me.

First, I would like to say that I particularly welcome the very keen interest in national defence which has been evidenced on both sides of the House. It was clear to me this afternoon, and again this evening, that whatever deficiencies there may be in our equipment or in the amount of money available to the Department of National Defence, there is one matter on which all hon. members seem to be agreed, and that is the quality of service and the dedication to Canada provided by the men and women of the Canadian armed forces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: I was particularly pleased to hear the hon. member for London East, who is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works, when he said earlier today that members of the Canadian armed forces on peacekeeping duties are men who can be trusted:—those were his words—by all. This thought, and the high degree of professionalism which the Canadian armed forces possess, is something which has been evident to me and which I have seen whenever I have visited the Canadian forces on peacekeeping duties, on their NATO responsibilities in Germany, on basis or across Canada. I am pleased that this was reflected in the debate today.

In opening the debate the hon. member for Victoria referred to the obsolete equipment of the Canadian forces. This is a subject to which there is reference quite often, both in the media and by members of the House, and I think there is a good deal of misinformation about the standard of our equipment. For that reason I would like to name just a few items on the approved capital program. Out of a list which I have here of some 33 major capital programs, I will mention only the following to indicate the very considerable extent of our new equipment purchases.

In the sea element we have approved the Sea King helicopter, improvement and modernization, for some $41,600,000. We have purchased a diving tender for some $6,600,000.

In the land element there are a number of major purchases. I think those hon. members interested in the land forces will want to know the extent of the modernization of our equipment. The program includes some 2,848 1¼ ton trucks for a total cost of $69,960,000; 489 5-ton trucks for $27,353,000; heavy anti-armoured weapons, the TOW missile for $30,097,000; the Blowpipe air defence system $38 million; very high frequency radio $9 million, and high frequency radios $6 million.

I am not going to read the whole list, Mr. Chairman, but for those such as the hon. member for Victoria who say our equipment is obsolete I ask them to look at these figures. They will then realize that although some of our equipment is getting old we have a lot of new equipment which members of our armed forces are using in an increasingly effective way.

In the air element we have added five Hercules aircraft, the C-130, at a cost of $30 million, and eight Chinook medium helicopters for $42 million. Replacement of LORAN navigation system for selected aircraft is $6,800,000. In a more general category the Samson system, the strategic communications system, will cost $45 million. This is what is going on week by week and month by month in National Defence to improve the standard of our equipment.

As I said in committee the other day, I am disappointed that hon. members keep talking about obsolete equipment. Certainly there is some, but from now on we should keep a more balanced outlook. If we talk about the old, let us also talk about the new.

I should also like to point out that we are continuously endeavouring to increase the proportion of the budget going to capital expenditures. The proportion for new equipment and construction in 1974-75 was 10.55 per cent, and in 1975-76 we estimate it will be 12.3 per cent, or some $346 million.

In relative terms, although our over-all defence expenditures are slated to increase by 11.6 per cent, the capital expenditures will be boosted by some 31 per cent over last year. I would ask hon. members to think about that figure when talking about capital expenditures. It is up 31 per cent over last year. I particularly want to point out that a large portion of the capital expenditures, about 72 per cent, will go to the purchase of new equipment.

We have approved major capital equipment programs amounting to some $530 million over the next few years, and over 43 per cent of this will be to re-equip the land forces; sea will receive 16 per cent; air 29 per cent, and capital equipment programs common to all will amount to 12 per cent.

The hon. member for Victoria made reference to the Callaghan report. I should like to point out that where allied military trade and co-operation are concerned, the Callaghan report recommends using the United States-Canada defence production sharing program as a model.

We should all be proud of the fact that Canada has been a leader when it comes to NATO industrial co-operation and standardization. For example, we are acquiring the TOW anti-tank missile from the United States and the Blowpipe anti-aircraft missile from the United Kingdom. Both these purchases were made against offsetting sales of Canadian equipment to our NATO allies.

Our allies are increasingly using Canadian manufactured equipment, mainly in the field of electronics, such as aircraft simulators, sonars and sonobuoys, crash position indicators, and computing equipment, a significant proportion of which was developed by and for the Department of National Defence.

I should like to make a brief reference to the comment of the hon. member for Greenwood. He asked me for a definition of surveillance. I would say in brief reply that airspace surveillance is the means of determining what is going on in Canadian air space. It is accomplished primarily through the use of radars. Positive identification in abnormal circumstances can only be achieved by visual observation by a pilot in a high performance aircraft.

I should also like to say to the hon. member for Greenwood, who expressed concern about the number of our interceptors, that we are now using 44 101 Voodoos, a reduction of 12 from the 56 that were in use last year.

I should like to thank the hon. member for Abitibi for his very obvious understanding of the needs of national defence and his recognition of the importance of the armed forces to Canada.

[Mr. Richardson.]

I want to turn to the remarks made by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I have had only a few moments to obtain information and to think about the questions, which are of very great importance to the armed forces. I would agree with her that the subject of morale is perhaps one of the most important matters that all of us who are concerned with the armed forces should be thinking about. In the widest sense I believe that morale is achieved by having a sense of purpose, a sense of the importance of the work that has to be done. Personally I hope to be able to convey to the armed forces, if they do not already realize it, that their work is doubly important—not only in their duty of protecting Canada but also as I have said many times, their work in a number of other ways—in improving Canada and bringing out all of the hidden benefits of their training and education, and their development of the north, assistance to youth, and so on.

Looking at the rather narrower but still important areas mentioned by the hon. member, I think she has raised very valid questions. The first is housing our PMQs. I am able to say that we have a program for improving and renovating PMQs which will amount to some $4,758,000.

It would take me too long to go into each item in detail, but military colleges were also mentioned. I have been aware of the fact that the cost per student is much higher at RMC, Collège Militaire Royal de Saint-Jean or Royal Roads than at Queen's University or other universities. I think the answer partly is that universities do not provide military and academic training, but that military colleges provide everything which universities provide and a lot more, including board and living accommodation. It is really not possible to compare what it costs to train a cadet at RMC, a cadet who is provided with meals, housing, and athletic and military training, with what it costs to educate a student at Queen's, a student who attends lectures from 9 to 5, or 10 to 3, or whatever the time may be, but who pays for everything else outside. We must consider these differences.

In addition, we must look at the quality of instruction at military colleges and realize that the quality of training, and the training in leadership, cannot be measured in terms of dollars per student. Therefore, to answer the question, I think that military colleges have an important place and a good future, as we have confirmed by our dollar commitment. We will be spending on the three military colleges some $17,376,000.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands mentioned hospitals. I realize they are underutilized and we must examine their best uses in Kingston and other locations. I can only say that our belief in the usefulness of the hospitals is demonstrated by our commitment to spend some $9,445,000 on improving military hospitals.

I think the hon. member's last question concerned communications. I am proud of how Air Transport Command provides mail, parcels and communications of all kinds to our personnel in NATO and on peacekeeping duty. That is the report I usually receive, although there may be isolated instances of complaint. As I have said before, I think the mail service we provide is perhaps better than that provided to civilians in the rest of Canada.

I am afraid I will not have time to answer all hon. members who have spoken. Earlier today the hon. member for Annapolis Valley said that it is necessary to build a momentum of public opinion behind national defence and in support of national defence. I agree with him on that point. In a democracy such as ours, public opinion in the long run determines the size of our defence budget. As an example I should like the Canadian public to be far more aware than it is of the growth of the number of weapons and armaments in the Warsaw Pact countries. A number of hon. members touched on this point today. I want the Canadian public to be as aware as we are of that growth in military capability, which is well beyond that needed for defence needs. Only if the public becomes aware of this can we generate the kind of public support needed for a larger defence budget. I agree with what was said in this respect.

The suggestion of the hon. member for Annapolis Valley that we have not made our defence options known is not correct. We have made a number of defence options clearly known. They have been reported in the press. I have talked about the options in Europe and said that we would either maintain land forces and an air capability, or an all-air, or an all-land capability. We are studying those options in the structure review which is now before the cabinet. We have not been reluctant to discuss our options.

I see that my time has nearly run out. I think it would be appropriate for me to conclude with the statement made earlier this year by the Chief of the Defence Staff, General Dextraze. It is a statement with which I wholeheartedly agree, and which I believe describes the Canadian armed forces.

General Dextraze said:

The Canadian forces continue to meet their assigned commitments in a highly professional manner. The operational readiness of the Canadian forces continues to be maintained at a high level; morale is good; we have effectively met all the challenges presented to us. Our forces, whether serving in Canada, with NATO in Europe, or with the United Nations around the globe continue to contribute to the maintenance of world peace and stability.

To conclude in my own words, I want the Canadian armed forces not only to respect their heritage, which I know they do, but also to be convinced in their own minds that the tasks which they perform today and the responsibilities that they accept today are of vital importance to Canada and to all Canadians. I should like all Canadians to be convinced, as I am, that the armed forces are important and, in fact, essential not only to the protection but also to the improvement of our Canadian way of life.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Chairman, I wish to express my appreciation to those members who participated in today's debate, which was long overdue. It is good that we came out of our secret committee rooms, and said in public what we think about defence. Perhaps we can create some interest on the part of the population or on the part of members.

First, I should like to reply to the Minister of National Defence, who criticized me for saying that we use obsolete equipment. I can tell him why I said our equipment is obsolete. Take the Centurion tank, which was first produced in 1946, but is still our main battle tank in Europe. When I was thinking of obsolete equipment I was thinking of the Bofors gun which forms our perimeter defence at our airfield at Lahr. The Bofors was not a good gun in 1942.

I was also thinking of the Voodoo aircraft which, according to another hon. member who spoke, has been grounded. The Voodoo, or CF-101, is our first line of defence at home. It is not in use with the United States regular forces, but is used by the national guard. They are going to drop the aircraft next year, because it is obsolete. The minister told us in committee that it would go out of Canadian use some time in the early 1980s, at least five years after the United States National Guard considered it too obsolete to be used. That is why I used the word obsolete when talking about our equipment.

Also, I was thinking of the Argus aircraft, which has been flying faithfully and well, but for far too many years. Right now, in the estimates we are considering, not one dime has been set aside for the new LRPA. The long-range patrol aircraft is a long way off.

I was also thinking of our naval forces when I talked about obsolete equipment. Although our navy has four very sophisticated new DDH 280s, it has no other ships under construction. As the lead time for new ship construction is between five and six years, I assume that within five or six years we may, if we start now, equip our naval forces with new equipment. That is why I said that our present equipment is obsolete.

The minister boasts that we are increasing our equipment from 10 per cent to 13 per cent, which he translates arithmetically to be an increase of 30 per cent. That is correct. The equipment budget is up from 10 per cent to 13 per cent, as he said.

Let me read one paragraph from the Thomas A. Callaghan report to which the minister referred. It says:

● (2140)

The percentage of the British defence budget spent on equipment has fallen from 42 per cent in 1965-66 to 37 per cent in 1973-74. The German defence budget shows a steady decline in the investment ratio, from a peak of 46.2 per cent in 1967 to a low of 29.0 per cent in 1972, with only slight improvement to 29.3 per cent in 1973. The American investment ratio has fallen almost 20 percentage points, to 29.8 per cent in the 20 years from FY '54 to FY '74—

This is the reason our equipment is obsolete. We are in the 8, 9, 10, 11 per cent bracket. In order to keep a modern force, the others are in the 30 to 40 per cent bracket. Moving from 10 per cent to 13 per cent is nothing to boast about.

Today we covered in general terms a lot of the problems of defence. We did not go into great detail because we have done that in committee. I would like the general public to know that we have asked questions in committee. We have had eight committee meetings on these estimates. They were noted for our inability to get the information we requested from the department.

We do not yet know where the Falcon aircraft are; or the terms of reference for our senior officials at NORAD. We do not know if we are going to sign a contract for LRPA or not. We do not know what the minister or Prime Minister means, but they say we will keep up our commitment. The commitment will be what they think it will be. They reserve the right to translate that word, and will give their meaning of it at some later date.

When we ask point blank if our manpower and soldiers in Germany are going to be reduced, we cannot get an answer yes or no. We get the weasely answer that we will keep up our commitment to suit our allies.

I see my time is almost up. I want to thank again those who participated. I want at this time to thank the distinguished chairman of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, the hon. member for Labelle, who has done a great job. He capped it today by contributing positive suggestions. I personally thank him, and those members on my side who did so much work preparing for and participating in the debate today.

The Chairman: Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 9(a) of Standing Order 58, to interrupt these proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the proceedings.

Shall National Defence—Vote 1 carry?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On division.

National Defence—Vote 1 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall I report the resolution?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution reported and concurred in, on division.

ADMISSION FEES TO LOWER FORT GARRY—RIDEAU CANAL TOLLS—TERRA NOVA PARK TRAVEL

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I hear someone across the way saying this is new members' night. In accordance with the agreement that was reached this afternoon, I wish to raise a grievance. The understanding is that I shall take not more than half the time between now and ten o'clock, leaving the other half for a response by a representative of the government.

There are times when I wish it were possible to put on Hansard something other than words, some appropriate picture or, perhaps even better, an appropriate cartoon. There is no question but that the Printing Bureau could do this, but of course it would take unanimous consent or an amendment to the British North America Act to make it possible.

At least I can describe the cartoon which I have in my hand. It appeared some weeks ago in the Winnipeg Tribune. The cartoon shows the wall of Lower Fort Garry down the Red River from the city of Winnipeg. There is a Canadian flag flying from it. Standing on guard in a uniform of some decades ago is an officer. Across his chest are the words "Judd Buchanan".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On his officer's cap there is a dollar sign.

An hon. Member: How many?

[Mr. McKinnon.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is only one dollar sign, but it stands for quite a few dollars. The caption on the cartoon reads as follows: "Let's all salute history! That will be two bucks, please!"

My grievance with respect to the fee or fees being charged for admission to Lower Fort Garry was underlined this afternoon when the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mrs. Campagnolo) gave an oral answer to my question No. 2,486, which has been on the order paper since May 16.

The question had several parts to it having to do with when the Government of Canada became the owner of Lower Fort Garry, and so on. In particular, I asked from whom the Government of Canada obtained the property known as Lower Fort Garry. The answer was that it was obtained from the Hudson's Bay Company. I asked how much the Hudson's Bay Company charged the Government of Canada for the acres that comprise Lower Fort Garry. The answer given this afternoon was that there was no charge at all, that it was a gift.

Although this piece of property that is important in the history of Manitoba was given to the government free of any charge, and even though the government says that it wants Canadians to appreciate and salute our history, it is now imposing charges for admission to Lower Fort Garry which work against any appreciation of that historic site.

The figures vary. There is a $2 fee for a single admission for any person who is 16 years of age or over. There is a 50 cent fee for persons below that age. There is a $10 annual fee. That is not a very realistic proposition. There are some fees for student groups, families and so on. The point we do not seem able to get across to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan) is that Lower Fort Garry is not a national park like Banff or Cape Breton Highlands; it is an historic site of limited area somewhat like Parliament Hill. We do not charge people two dollars to get on to Parliament Hill.

● (2150)

An hon. Member: We shall pretty soon!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps the hon. member is warning me that I should not suggest such a thing because the government might go for it.

I see my time is almost up. I plead with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development that in line with the view he has expressed that we should salute history, he withdraw the admission fees to Lower Fort Garry.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I share the hon. member's regret, Madam Speaker, that he cannot put cartoons in Hansard. That is one of the kindest cartoons I have seen of myself. I share his concern in that area as well.

As to the question of the property being a gift, as I have drawn to the attention of the House on several occasions this is irrelevant since, as far as these fees are concerned, they represent only approximately 18 per cent of the operating costs and contribute nothing whatsoever toward the capital costs.

We find that only 5 per cent of the Canadian people visit our historic sites and national parks, yet 100 per cent of the capital costs and approximately 80 per cent of the operating costs are borne by the other 95 per cent which do not go near our parks at all. The feeling was that some contribution should be made by the users of the parks.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But you don't apply that to visitors to Parliament Hill.

Mr. Buchanan: No, but I do not have responsibility for Parliament Hill. The hon. member will have to take that matter up with Mr. Speaker.

Basically our feeling was that some contribution should be made by those who use the parks. It is a minimal contribution. In the case of the canals it works out at only 7 per cent, and in the case of the parks and historic sites it works out to approximately 18 per cent, so we feel it is not exorbitant or unreasonable.

We have endeavoured, in the case of Lower Fort Garry, to respond in a positive fashion to concern raised in that area. As the hon. member mentioned, we set an annual rate of $10 for families who go fairly frequently to Lower Fort Garry. We have introduced a special $2 fee for buses which transport students or other special groups. A family consisting, say, of a mother, father and three or four offspring, will not pay the sum of the regular charges but a maximum of $4. Thus we have endeavoured to respond to some of the concerns of the hon. member.

As I say, however, we do not feel it is unreasonable to expect the users of our canals, historic sites and national parks to make a contribution. They enjoy the good fortune in many cases to be near them, so they have the advantage of proximity which is not shared by the majority of Canadian people, as shown by the fact that only 5 per cent of them visit our historic sites and canals.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The minister referred to the canals. One of them is the Rideau Canal. He and I have corresponded about the tolls on this canal which came into effect on June 1, 1975. There has been marked public reaction to these tolls. I have heard the minister state his case and I have questions to ask about the attitude he takes, particularly in terms of the effect on those who live on the Rideau system and those who use it regularly.

If the minister could remove these tolls immediately, I think his action would be appreciated. This would allow time for further consultation with the Rideau Lakes and Thousand Islands tourist councils, the government of Ontario, and the people generally who are interested in this matter.

If the minister cannot withdraw these tolls—and I wish he would, at least to allow these long range consultations to take place—would he consider gathering the facts and figures with respect to them and meet with those tourist councils and others so there could be an exchange of views? This is an important matter, particularly for those who live along the Rideau Canal, and I am sure there are others who are equally affected.

Mr. Buchanan: I would be happy to take a look at the situation after the first year. Arguments have been put forward that we should give special consideration to the people who live on the canals in the sense that we already give special consideration to those who live in the parks. For instance, the residents of Banff and Jasper do get special consideration. This is an idea which I am prepared to consider.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I should like to put a question to the minister with respect to national parks through which the trans-Canada highway passes. I am thinking specifically of Terra Nova Park and those who use it in the sense that they travel over the trans-Canada highway. Madam Speaker, those who have occasion to pass through the park in such circumstances should not be made to pay. Indeed, they should be permitted to stop if they wish to enjoy the beauties of the park and perhaps take a picnic lunch without having to pay these tariffs.

Mr. Buchanan: I am very receptive to the first part of the question. We are now in the process of arranging the road passing through Terra Nova so that resident traffic can go down one lane in such a fashion that they will not be called upon to pay any charge.

Mr. McGrath: There is only one lane now.

Mr. Buchanan: There are two lanes being put there, or under construction now, so that the through traffic will not have to stop.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

BILINGUALISM—POSSIBLE REFERENCE OF QUEBEC'S BILL 22 TO SUPREME COURT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, on May 9 last I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) some questions. One was this: had he received the brief of the Quebec Association of Protestant School Boards and others dealing with Bill 22, the Quebec Official Language Act, and would he refer it to the Supreme Court of Canada? Secondly, how could he, who is supposed to be so committed to bilingualism, continue to ignore a bill so committed to a contrary view? He said he would not refer it, and then he tried to slide out of his dilemma by saying that he had no jurisdiction to do so, that his government only had jurisdiction with respect to areas under the authority of the federal government.

● (2200)

Such an answer is patent constitutional nonsense, and one cannot be more direct than that. If he meant that it was clear that Bill 22 did not encroach into the federal jurisdiction, then with respect he is equally wrong.

I want to draw your attention to a few sections of that bill. Section 1, which makes French the sole official language of Quebec, violates section 133 of the British North America Act, which makes both French and English official languages in Quebec for the legislature and courts. Section 2, which makes the French text of Quebec laws prevail over the English text in case of conflict, also violates section 133 of the British North America Act.

The sections dealing with the language of instruction in education violate section 93 of the BNA Act, which prohibits any provincial law that "prejudicially affects any right or privilege with respect to denominational education which any class of person had by law in the province" at confederation. All Quebec public schools are denominational. Pre-confederation provincial acts vested the "management and control" of denominational schools and the right to "choose the language of instruction" and to "regulate the course of study" in the denominational school boards. This right, therefore, the province cannot take away. Eleven other sections, in so far as they apply to schools, also violate section 93 of the British North America Act.

The sections dealing with the language of communications with other governments of Canada, language of labour relations, and language of business contracts, are unconstitutional in so far as they purport to apply to the federal government or its institutions, or to any other employers covered by the federal Official Languages Act, or to interprovincial trade and commerce.

The sections dealing with the language of public utilities are unconstitutional in so far as they purport to apply to interprovincial telephone, telegraph, air, ship, railway, gas pipeline and autobus operations, since all such operations come under exclusive federal jurisdiction.

The sections requiring the use of French in company names are unconstitutional in so far as they purport to apply to federally incorporated companies.

The section requiring the use of French labels on products is unconstitutional in so far as food and drugs are concerned, because it conflicts with the federal Food and Drugs Act. It is also unconstitutional in so far as it purports to control the import or export of products without French labels, or their sale.

The sections requiring the use of French in advertising and public signs are unconstitutional in so far as they purport to apply to television, and to interprovincial and international trade and commerce, which are under exclusively federal jurisdiction.

The next question that arises is whether the government ought to disallow the bill. The national interest calls for the promotion of our two principal cultures, French and English, on a basis of equality. This is accepted by all federal political parties. The Official Languages Act of Quebec undermines the whole concept of two equal cultures, and employs coercive measures to impose the French language on, and government control over, some of the chief institutions of English culture in the province.

English is the language most often spoken in the home by some 900,000 Quebecers, and by some 700,000 in metropolitan Montreal alone. Quebec is the fourth largest English-speaking province, and Montreal the third largest English-speaking city, in Canada. Of the 112 provincial acts disallowed since confederation, 32 have been disallowed partly because they were considered contrary to the public interest of Canada as a whole.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Second, the act is contrary to constitutional principles and sound principles of legislation. It reaches down into the minutest details of daily life, as none of the legislation designed to limit the use of French in other provinces in the past has ever done. It vests in the provincial government and its agencies an unparalleled degree of discretionary power, and makes their decisions, in many vital matters, absolute and uncontrollable, denying to the citizen recourse to the courts.

Third, the act is contrary to reason, justice, and natural equity, a ground given for disallowing five acts of other provinces.

Fourth, it is contrary to federal policy as set forth in the federal Official Languages Act. Fourteen provincial acts have been disallowed partly for this reason.

Fifth, it is discriminatory. It discriminates against members of the professions who do not have what the provincial government considers an adequate knowledge of French; against business firms which, in the opinion of the provincial government, have not "francisized" themselves; against the English language universities. Its educational sections discriminate against the ethnic groups, and against French Canadians who may wish to send their children to English language schools. Fourteen acts have been disallowed partly because they are discriminatory. Ten acts have been disallowed because of the vagueness of their terms, and this bill is certainly vague. Madam Speaker, this is a burning ember in the fabric of our national unity, and for that reason alone this bill ought to be referred or disallowed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Match that last sentence, if you can!

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I would like to accept the challenge offered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but I regret that my oratorical ability does not come anywhere near that of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

Mr. Fraser: That's right.

Mr. Reid: One can only sit, listen and marvel at his felicity with words, and the way he is able to argue the form without having the substance underneath.

I should say that the hon. member has given us his legal opinion of the impact of Bill 22, and he quoted extensively from a brief which the Protestant School Boards as well as nine other signatories submitted to the government. Fortunately, however, the document was received and immediately referred to the legal advisers of the government for a legal opinion. Their judgment has not yet been received by the Cabinet. I am told it will be received imminently.

The original petition is some 200 pages in length, and the synopsis of it runs in the order of 30 pages. In preparation for tonight I had the opportunity to read it briefly. I agree with the hon. member that it is a complex document and requires a great deal of work before the government will be able to make a decision.

I can say that the document will be referred to the Cabinet imminently, probably by the end of the month of June, at which time the Cabinet will consider it and make a judgment as to what position it will take.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton gave a précis, as much as one can give a précis of the document in respect of government activities. It basically argues that the official languages act of Quebec is unconstitutional on a number of grounds in those areas where it is alleged to violate the British North America Act and a number of statutes of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What is the date you said for referral to the Cabinet?

Mr. Reid: It ought to be before the Cabinet by the end of June. Presumably at that time discussions will take place and the Cabinet will come to a conclusion in the ordinary way.

On an issue of this nature I do not think we can look forward to an easy answer, because the issues in this particular reference are complex, delicate, and have to do with the over-all position of legislative powers in our system. For example, I can think of a number of premiers who would be very upset if the government were to use its powers of disallowance—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please.

HEALTH—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION NOT TO TEST FOR MERCURY POISONING AMONG NATIVES

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Madam Speaker, I have asked for this time to clarify for myself and for many other people who are involved just exactly what the position of the government is in relation to the question of arsenic and mercury pollution in Yellowknife.

Several times in press releases and in speeches the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has indicated that the survey results released last week by his department represented only a part of the testing program. He said, as reported at page 6379 of Hansard, that "more thorough studies have been launched, particularly on established cases showing what appears to be a high arsenic rate."

The only source the government has of finding high arsenic rates is its own study, and frankly I find that study suspect. The difficulty lies with the sample on which that study is based. I believe 700 people volunteered for the survey. Roughly speaking, less than 20 per cent of the samples were from mine and mill workers, and only 8 per cent were from native people. By my calculation that means only 28 per cent of the samples were from people most directly connected with arsenic.

It is the workers, for obvious reasons, and the native people who are most directly connected with arsenic because many of them have been using Back Bay in Yellowknife as their source of drinking water, and Back Bay is polluted with arsenic and mercury. The point I am trying to make, Madam Speaker, is that if the minister is going to base his next round of tests on his first study, then he is going to miss a lot of people who potentially have high readings of arsenic in their bodies.

Let me illustrate this with an example. You have heard mention of a study commissioned by the Indian Brotherhood. The testing for this survey was conducted by the University of Toronto. Their sample is suspect because it only contained 18 individuals. However, they did find two children with mercury readings. One had a reading of 180, the other of 90.

The minister's study also found some examples of mercury, but they were very low. Let me quote from a department press release dated May 27:

> Since the presently accepted maximum safety level for mercury is 60 parts per million it is not considered necessary to do any follow-up studies on the mercury levels at this time.

One of the two children I mentioned had a reading three times what the minister's department calls the maximum safety level. Because his first survey was not relevant to the matter at hand, his department missed this one example. And because they missed the one example, they are not going to test for mercury.

My worry is for the other ten year olds and their families whom the minister's survey did not find, and I think that the life and health of these people are worth any effort the minister might have made to design and carry out a survey that will give a more accurate picture of the situation in Yellowknife. Armed with relevant data, he should then proceed with further studies.

The second point I would like the minister to take to heart concerns the attitude of some of his staff, and the staff of other departments, when they are dealing with the public in these matters.

As I remember it, last January when the CBC made public the allegedly secret document which revealed the levels of arsenic present in the environment of Yellowknife, a great number of attacks and counter-attacks were made about whether the document was indeed secret. The upshot of the whole thing was the announcement of the survey that came out last week, and what appeared to be a pledge that every pertinent fact on the subject of arsenic would be made available to the public.

I have a memo, dated February 6—a time when the commotion had died down somewhat. It is from Mr. H. Veldhuizen of the air pollution control section of the Environmental Protection Service. It went to Mr. C. A. Lewis of the EPS in Yellowknife. Copies went to Dr. R. D. P. Eaton in Edmonton, who is an employee of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

It deals with the recommendation of a body in the United States charged with evaluating standards for health in working environments. It seems that this body now recommends that the industrial hygiene standards for in-plant environmental conditions be lowered from 500 micrograms per cubic metre to 4 micrograms per cubic metre. Mr. Veldhuizen explains this change to Mr. Lewis in some detail. Then he says:

It would be advisable not to release this information to the public as it may cause undue concern at this time.

I would like to ask the minister to justify that kind of attitude in a person hired with public money to protect the public.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, in response to the question of the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) put to the minister this afternoon on the National Indian Brotherhood survey, I would like to say the following.

During the survey on arsenic levels in hair samples of residents of the Yellowknife area which was carried out in February of 1975 by the department, tests for mercury were also done on 20 per cent of the hair samples. These tests were done because a study carried out by researchers of the University of Iowa some time ago had indicated the possibility of mercury contamination also occurring as a result of the processing of gold ore at Yellowknife. The study of arsenic levels provided an opportunity to obtain up to date information on the possibility of a mercury problem, since the presence of mercury in human hair is a good indication of whether, and to what extent, it is present in the body.

All the hair samples tested for mercury revealed levels of less than 10 parts per million (ppm) with one exception, which was 25 ppm. Since the presently accepted maximum safety level for mercury is 60 ppm, it was concluded that further follow up studies on mercury levels were not necessary at that time. This conclusion was the one made known in the press release of May 27, 1975.

Since that time officials of the National Indian Brotherhood have contacted officials of the department to inform them of the results of a survey carried out for the NIB on arsenic and mercury levels in some hair samples of residents of two native communities very near Yellowknife. As reported to the department, this survey was of 18 hair samples, but levels of mercury were reported on only two of the samples. Both of these samples are reported to have revealed significantly elevated levels of mercury.

When told of these results, the department immediately requested the National Indian Brotherhood to provide it with a full report on the survey because it wished to follow up with further tests on any individuals found by the NIB to have significant arsenic or mercury hair levels. We have not yet received the report from NIB, and are therefore not yet able to draw any conclusions about the two mercury levels reported, or on the methodology used in the tests.

In the meantime, however, the results reported by NIB have already been reported to the northern health services with the instructions that they are to contact the individuals concerned and ask them to have clinical examinations during phase II of the Yellowknife survey which will start on June 9.

Whether still further tests or surveys should be conducted at this time in connection with mercury is something which will be assessed when the department has had an opportunity to study the full report of the NIB survey and these clinical examinations have been done. The fact remains that the much larger survey carried out by the department did not reveal any mercury levels of significance, and the two high levels reported from the NIB survey must be examined in that light.

Despite this fact, I want to assure the hon. member and the House that in addition to the immediate steps I have described, the department will follow up with whatever further work we find to be necessary to monitor the health of the residents in the area and to enable us to take measures to protect it.

[Mr. Firth.]

FINANCE—EXCISE TAX ON PRIVATE AIRCRAFT AND PLEASURE BOATS—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON EFFECTIVENESS IN LIMITING CONSUMPTION OF PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, in Hansard for May 30 at page 6280 is recorded the question I asked of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), as follows:

With respect to the 10 per cent excise tax on privately owned aircraft and motor driven pleasure boats, which was part of the November budget, will the minister now advise as to what degree this tax has limited oil consumption in Canada?

The Minister of Finance replied:

—I will have to consult with my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but I would hope it had some result.

On January 9 I wrote to the Minister of Finance, and I quote from that letter:

Regarding the 10% tax on non-commercial aircraft and pleasure boats I am forced to ask whether anyone really believes this is the way to cut down on the consumption of oil. Surely this move is unnecessary and, for that matter, not based on any real programme for energy conservation. Ration gas, tax gas, or let the price rise, if you really want to cut down on consumption, but why try and pretend that this tax is going to help to maintain Canadian self-sufficiency in energy?

On February 19 the Minister of Finance replied, and wrote the following:

The special excise taxes on energy-consuming vehicles constitute one of several programs the government has introduced to deal with the critical question of conserving Canada's energy resources.

In the following paragraph it is stated that:

... the government is aware that the impact of the new taxes on industries directly affected will result in some short-term dislocations in those industries. However, it must be emphasized that disruptions in industries directly related to the consumption of petroleum products will inevitably occur, and the government must take action now to encourage such industries and consumers to adjust their production and consumption in the direction of more conservative energy-consuming products if even greater dislocations are to be avoided.

I want to say quite frankly that if that is the result of this tax, then of course the public must have some sympathy with it, but I wish to record tonight my own severe doubts that that tax has had any effect on the consumption of oil in Canada.

I want to quote from some letters which I have received, as a member of parliament, from people operating in the marine industry in my own province. I quote from a letter dated May 12, 1975, from Leo Edwards Sons, Ltd. as follows:

● (2220)

The imposition of the tax has resulted in decreased sales, lay-offs and has contributed to inflation rather than otherwise.

The letter also says:

I would like to point out that less than ½ of 1 per cent of the total fuel used in Canada is used for boating.

I have a copy of a letter sent to the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Raines), a member on the government side, on April 16, 1975, by Taylor Pearson & Carson (B.C.). It reads in part:

We feel that the discriminatory additional 10 per cent tax is having a bad effect on the profitability of our independent marine dealers in British Columbia.

I should also like to quote from a letter from Capstan Marine of Richmond, British Columbia, dated May 14, 1975, as follows:

This new policy has been very detrimental to the marine industry. The excise tax is not the type of lavement our industry needed.

May I quote again, this time from a letter dated April 29, 1975, from Allied Boating-Canada which is located in Ontario. The letter reads in part:

It is estimated that gasoline sold through retail outlets in Canada is well in excess of five billion gallons (no penalty).

It is estimated that gasoline for the use of snowmobiles in Canada is 57 million gallons (no penalty).

It is estimated that gasoline sold for the use of small boats in Canada is 77 million gallons (penalized).

When you add in industrial, farm, aircraft and heating fuels, it is estimated that the small boat consumption of fuel is less than ½ of 1 per cent of the Canadian fuel consumption.

This can hardly be classed as an area of high energy consumption!

A letter dated May 14 from Simpson Power Products, Ltd. reads as follows:

The subject tax has now been in effect for approximately six months, and, from our company's own experience, if your goal was to kill the pleasure boat industry in Canada, you have succeeded 100 per cent.

We know this was not your intention. You stated it was a fuel conservation measure, but you chose to pick on an industry that is the smallest in the luxury market, and, due to competition from the large mass producers in the U.S.A., has always had a struggle to keep out of the red.

I want to say to the minister that there are plenty more letters along these lines. I hope the minister can satisfy us tonight that this tax has had a degree of success in conservation of the total amount of oil consumed in Canada. If that were so then I would say to all hon. members and to the public that we have to look upon it sympathetically.

I put on the record as early as January, Madam Speaker, that I doubted the real conservation effects of this tax. I ask the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Cullen) to tell us tonight whether the tax has had any appreciable effect on reducing the consumption of oil based fuels in this country. I ask him also to tell us exactly the amount of that reduction, and if the figures are not available I would ask him to give an estimate.

Unless it has some significance this tax is not only foolish, it is clearly discriminatory against owners of boats and airplanes in relation to a great many other users of gasoline products in this country. There is no justification whatsoever for visiting a tax on one particular industry unless it has a very significant effect in terms of conservation. Unless it can be clearly justified, this is a discriminatory tax and ought to be removed in the coming budget.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the introduction of special excise taxes on privately owned aircraft and boat motors in excess of 20 horsepower is only one measure in the government's over-all program to conserve energy. You will recall that at the time of the introduction of these measures, special excise taxes on other high energy—

Mr. Fraser: You are not answering the question.

Mr. Cullen: —the hon. member read his letters, and I listened quietly. I think he can do me that courtesy—consuming vehicles were also introduced, specifically on large cars and motorcycles. In addition, the government has made significant changes in taxation of the petroleum industries, and a phased reduction in the exports of oil has been initiated.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacDonald) introduced a comprehensive package of energy conservation proposals in February. These will be found in Hansard, page 3005. Included were specific proposals for energy conservation both within the government and in the private sector.

The combined effect of these measures has been to indicate to industries and consumers the urgent need to adjust production and consumption in the direction of products which consume less energy. Although the excise taxes referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) constitute a modest step in this direction, the effect of these taxes has been to make both consumers and producers more conscious of the need to conserve energy.

It is difficult to isolate the precise effects of these special excise taxes. The government is satisfied that its over-all policies to encourage energy conservation will have the desired results. I should like to assure the hon. member for Vancouver South that the government will continue to monitor developments in the field of energy conservation very carefully.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

AIR CANADA

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGATIONS OF INEFFICIENT MANAGEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Manzankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise to propose a motion for immediate and serious consideration. In light of the Air Canada advertisements carried in major newspapers announcing the deliberate intention to keep one third of passenger seats unsold on DC-8 airliners with the addition of extraneous gratuities, and in view of the CTC decision denying charges of inefficient management giving rise to under utilization of fleet resulting in lost available revenues or avoidable increases in expenditures, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport to carry out a thorough and independent investigation of the evidence presented during the CTC public hearings before a final decision is given on the appeal of the CTC decision currently before cabinet.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion is proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 and cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED INQUIRY INTO SALE OF TAINTED MEAT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to submit a motion concerning an extremely current problem which is very important as a matter of interest and urgency.

Considering the sensational and sickening revelations made to the Commission of Inquiry into Organized Crime sitting in Quebec that at least one other province is involved in the trade of tainted meat and the possibility that such traffic could extend to the whole country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the House order the government to set up an interprovincial inquiry into the illicit trade of tainted meat.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. It requires unanimous consent of the House under Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous consent, so the motion cannot be submitted.

SUGGESTED DEPARTMENTAL INVESTIGATION OF ALL DREDGING CONTRACTS LET SINCE 1970—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the government has now asserted in a public document that there was collusion in a venture to dredge the main ship channel of the St. Lawrence river and that the successful dredging company had prior knowledge of the estimate made for the contract by the Department of Transport, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the Minister of Transport be ordered to conduct an immediate departmental inquiry into all dredging contracts let by that department since 1970.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—POSSIBLE STUDY OF CURRENT POLITICAL SITUATION PRIOR TO DECISION—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF STUDY

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister tell us whether in the decision making process with respect to selling a reactor to Korea the department made a special study of the current political situation in that country to help in coming to that decision?

● (1110)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at the time the matter was considered the department provided the government with all the information at its disposal with respect to the political situation.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Will the minister table in this House that special report, that information, on the political stability of Korea which the government used in making this decision about the sale?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows that advice to the cabinet is not normally tabled in the House of Commons.

SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF SAFEGUARD AGREEMENT

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, a final supplementary for the minister. Given the enormous significance and importance of this matter, and given the fact that there seems to be some feeling that the meetings in Europe on proliferation were not very successful, given the fact that we do not have any understanding now for an on site inspection by the government of Canada, will the minister table the specific terms of the bilateral agreement between Canada and Korea governing the inspection and controls that we are going to have if this sale does in fact go ahead?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I dispute one premise of the hon. member's statement, that is with respect to the inadequacy or lack of proposed safeguards and inspection system. When such bilateral agreement is completed and when negotiations have been completed on the safeguards aspect, then I will consider the possibility of tabling such an agreement in the House of Commons.

GENEVA CONFERENCE ON NUCLEAR NON-PROLIFERATION TREATY—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister undertake to table in the House a report or make a statement on the Geneva conference which I understand issued a statement on the developments in the field of non-proliferation that is highly relevant to the question of the reactor in Korea mentioned by the hon. member for Don Valley?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows I did participate at the review conference in Geneva because of the importance that Canada attached to the success of that conference. I believe I was the only foreign minister of member countries who did participate in the debate. That was done deliberately to underline the importance that Canada attached to the outcome of the conference. The hon. member has made a very useful suggestion which I will follow up, either by tabling a report in the House on the conference or alternatively I will consider the possibility of making a statement.

SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—REASON FOR DECISION PRIOR TO CLARIFICATION OF INSPECTION ARRANGEMENTS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I also have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since the minister does not appear to be clear on what the actual inspection arrangements for the nuclear site are or will be, will he please explain to the House why the government has seen fit to go ahead with the CANDU sale to South Korea?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are perfectly clear as to the nature of the safeguards we expect from those who purchase these materials or technology. The nature of the safeguards was fully explained by my colleague last December and these safeguards, of course, will be reflected in a bilateral agreement. No such bilateral agreement will be undertaken by Canada, however, unless these safeguards are adequately provided for. There is no uncertainty on the Canadian side as to the nature of the safeguards.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ESTABLISHMENT OF FRENCH COMPANY IN GRANBY—INQUIRY WHETHER SUBSIDY GRANTED

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

The French company Le Roy-Sommer having decided to invest $10 million in Granby, the largest French investment ever in Canada, can the minister say how much his department awarded in subsidy to assist that project in Granby, the jewel of the Eastern Townships?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. The amount of the grant was $1,987,000.

FINANCE

ALLEGED INEFFECTIVENESS OF TAX CONCESSIONS AND FAST WRITE-OFFS TO MANUFACTURING AND PROCESSING INDUSTRIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance but in the minister's absence—and I do not blame him for being absent today in view of that damnable report that was tabled yesterday—I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. As, of the firms surveyed, only 26 per cent indicated that the tax measures would have any effect on employment, only 15 per cent indicated that they would have an important or very important effect on their ability to restrain prices, only 32 per cent indicated that there would be an effect on investment and almost half indicated that the tax measures would have any impact at all on any aspect of their company operations—this is a remarkably frank return from business, on which they are to be congratulated—is the Acting Prime Minister now prepared to acknowledge the abject failure of these measures to achieve the effects intended, and will the government be taking this failure into account when the budget is prepared?

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am looking across the floor of the House and it seems to me that many opposition members accepted the Prime Minister's invitation to attend the picnic. Without accepting the premise of the hon. member's question, I am wondering if we read the same report. There is an excellent report on business in the Globe and Mail this morning which spells out the significant success of the tax measures introduced by this government. I wonder through what end of the telescope the hon. member is looking.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

COST OF CREATING A JOB IN DESIGNATED AREA—EFFECT OF CORPORATION TAX MEASURES ON PROGRAM

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that telescopes are relevant to what we are talking about. The government side seems to be looking through special glasses which show everything as rosy when disaster is in sight. May I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, because these tax measures have serious implications for the program for which he is responsible? As the report acknowledges that about $1.8 billion has been spent on the minister's program during the period the report covers, that amount of money having created some 73,000 jobs, at roughly $25,000 per job, mostly in central Canada where there is already heavy industrial activity, can the minister indicate how much it cost to create a job in the designated areas. Is this kind of program working to the detriment of his own program, and is it perhaps destructive to his own program?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, in all that argument there was one specific question, how much did it cost to create a job under the Regional Development Incentives Plan. The cost, on that score, would average perhaps between $5,000 and $7,000 per job created; that is the actual grant; but one would also need to calculate the incentive in relation to the fixed capital cost of the project, and that could go as high as 25 per cent. I will be glad to make that calculation for the hon. member and provide it to him next week.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister has probably given us the important information. Does he not consider that spending $25,000 per job created in central Canada, that being the cost in most cases, when he is spending only $5,000 to create a job in the depressed areas of Canada, is destructive of everything his department is trying to do?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, with respect, I think the hon. member misunderstood. I said that the job portion of the incentive grant would range from $5,000 to $7,000; but there is also, in addition to that, a grant which might go as high as 25 per cent of the fixed capital costs. Therefore, the cost of creating a job is not $5,000. I will have to calculate exactly what it is. I suspect, on balance, that it is not significantly different from the $25,000 the hon. member mentioned. I need to look at the figures, to see whether his calculation is correct and whether the deductions he has made from the report are correct.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO INCREASE PENALTY FOR USE OF FIREARMS DURING COMMISSION OF OFFENCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Solicitor General. I read in the press a report of the minister's statement to the effect that he has come to the conclusion that the registration of firearms is not the solution to the problem we face in this nation. Every day, and yesterday was an example, a plethora of gun-toting criminals commit crimes in this country. While the government waits for the purpose of finally arriving at a consensus as to the nature of the legislation that should be brought in, registration or not, will the minister give immediate consideration to bringing in interim legislation, permanent of course in its nature. Anyone engaged in the commission of a crime, by participation or endeavouring in any way to have a firearm for any improper purpose, should be liable, in addition to every other penalty, to a minimum of five years imprisonment without that sentence running concurrently with other sentences and without the sentence being subject to parole. I suggest this to the minister in all seriousness because police officers across the country have given support to the private bill that I introduced some months ago, but which will not of course come up for a long time, a bill to amend the Criminal Code, C-329.

● (1120)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the story in the press that I have rejected registration as a means of gun control was incorrect. What I said was that we were looking at many alternatives for gun control and that, while we were still looking at registration as a means of gun control, we were looking at other means as well, means which might be more effective for gun control than registration. I might say we are also looking at the alternative of increasing the sentence, such as was suggested by the right hon. member. However, the work we are doing in our department is from an operational point of view. The responsibility for introducing any legislation, of course, will be with the Minister of Justice and we are working together on this. When we complete our work, our studies, we will hand the results on to the Department of Justice and legislation might or might not be introduced after that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I directed the question to the Solicitor General because the Minister of Justice has been engaged in some political gun shooting, unsuccessfully, in Saskatchewan in the past few days. I knew the Solicitor General would have the answer.

Mr. Lang: I'm glad you came back.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What did the minister say? I would like to know.

Mr. Lang: I said I'm glad you came back.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am here all the time. That interruption indicates that the minister has been away. I ask this in all seriousness. While the departments examine, consider, measure and weigh various alternatives, why not bring in immediate legislation effective at once so that those people who carry guns will find that it is a serious matter and one that means immediate imprisonment if found guilty, instead of playing around with this problem. While you play, Canadians are being murdered on every hand.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I should point out that the only reform in gun control we have had in many, many years took place under the Prime Minister when he was Minister of Justice. There was none at all when the right hon. member for Prince Albert was Prime Minister. The first meeting of gun registrars ever held in this country was held last week under my authority. A lot of work is now being done to bring about better control of guns and reduce the amount of crime with guns. I expect a report from the working group under my authority during the summer. I hope we will have action during the fall session.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman mentions that such legislation was not brought in during my administration but it is under the present administration that there has been a multiplication of murders on every hand and, in particular, hold-ups.

[Mr. Allmand.]

DREDGING CONTRACTS—ALLEGATION OF IMPROPRIETY WITHIN PUBLIC SERVICE IN CONNECTION WITH TENDERS—SUGGESTED DEPARTMENTAL INVESTIGATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the government's counterclaim in the dredging affair against the three dredging companies carries with it very serious implications of impropriety within the public service, betrayal of public trust, and, indeed, suggestions of bribery, may I ask the minister whether, as a result of the laying of this counterclaim, he has caused an investigation to take place within his own department and whether he intends to take disciplinary action?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I am sure that had we decided to make this just an in-House inquiry we would have been accused of hiding something. We decided that a real case should be made so that we might know what happened. What happened was this: there was an estimate made by the department. There were three tenders, one at $8 million, another at $30 million and a third at $20 million. The department's estimate was a little over $18 million—there was a 10 per cent difference between them. However, considering what is going on in this field we thought the matter was serious enough to have the whole thing looked into by the court. This is the best way of doing it and I think the hon. member should be satisfied that we acted in that way.

Mr. McGrath: Since the new question raised is completely different from the matter now before the courts in that it raises suggestions of grave improprieties within the minister's department, has the hon. gentleman taken any action whatsoever to ensure that the public interest will be protected by those responsible for supervising these contracts? If the minister has not done so, perhaps he can explain why.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I believe there are four branches within the government which are awarding contracts as a result of the bidding—the Ministry of Transport, the Seaway Authority, the National Harbours Board and the Department of Public Works. So we established a committee of the four to make rules in order to be sure that in the future there will not be this kind of confusion. So do not say we have taken no action. With regard to the case the hon. member mentioned, I believe it is one for the court to decide. I shall await the decision of the court and if it indicates there was any wrongdoing we intend to act, and act rapidly.

ALLEGATIONS OF IMPROPRIETY IN PUBLIC SERVICE IN CONNECTION WITH DREDGING CONTRACTS—RECOMMENDATION OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): My final supplementary is to the Minister of Justice. In preparing this counterclaim as Attorney General of Canada, did the Minister of Justice, especially since this matter concerned a particular contract exclusively under the jurisdiction of his colleague, the Minister of Transport, recommend to his colleague that disciplinary or legal action be taken against those in his department who are responsible for these contracts bearing in mind that the question of collusion was raised by the Minister of Justice when preparing the counter suit?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): In preparing any documents as legal adviser to the government my officials are, of course, in consultation with the department or departments involved. It would be quite improper for me to comment on a question such as the hon. member has raised, appearing to join the hon. member in any form of unsubstantiated innuendo. As far as the matter before the court is concerned, it would be equally improper for me to comment on that while the case is under consideration. We should simply await the outcome of those proceedings.

PICKERING—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF MINISTER'S STATEMENT CONCERNING FURTHER DEVELOPMENT AND TABLING OF LONG-RANGE PLAN

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, on February 20 the Minister of Transport told reporters outside the House that he personally thought there would be further development after the first stage of the construction of Pickering Airport had been completed. Is the minister in a position today to say what he meant by that statement, and will he table the government's potential proposals regarding long-range plans for the Pickering airport?

● (1130)

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I met with the premier of Ontario and the minister of roads either last week or ten days ago, and the premier asked us what exactly we intended to do in Pickering, since the province is affected, depending on the kind of airport that we build there. I am now preparing a letter to the premier telling him exactly what we want to do, and after that a decision will be made.

Mr. Schumacher: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister would advise the House and the country what he will be advising the Premier of Ontario. Would he also take us into his confidence at the same time as he advises the Premier of Ontario what the plans are for the potential development of that airport?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I hope I can do that next week.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PEACEKEEPING FORCE IN MIDDLE EAST—STEPS TO IMPROVE SUPPLY PROCEDURE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. What steps has the minister been able to take to unravel the complicated supply procedures which are frustrating the Canadian peacekeeping force in the Middle East and which apparently originate in New York?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we have no difficulty supplying our own personnel because they are supplied directly from Canada. We do have some difficulty with the supply of troops of other countries because that supply procedure comes under the United Nations. In order to try to improve the supply, we have had a number of meetings. We have had experts from the Canadian forces travel to New York and talk with UN officials. We are making progress in improving the system, which is essentially one that is beyond our control because it is a United Nations procedure.

Mr. Fairweather: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would it not be an idea to make a better supply system a condition of Canadian participation? We had other conditions for participation which were very helpful and this might be an idea that the minister could consider.

Mr. Richardson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is what we are doing. We are trying to improve the system and are providing our expertise to the United Nations in order to achieve that purpose.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGATION OF POLITICAL KICKBACKS IN NEW BRUNSWICK—PERSON INITIATING INVESTIGATION

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General of which I have given him notice. In view of allegations of political kickbacks in New Brunswick reported in a Financial Post article on November 9, 1974, and the request of the leader of the opposition in New Brunswick for a royal commission inquiry, would the Solicitor General inform the House whether RCMP investigations into the allegations are being actively pursued in New Brunswick at this time and, if so, were these investigations initiated by the RCMP at the Solicitor General's request or at the direct request of the minister of justice for New Brunswick?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is correct that the RCMP have investigated those particular allegations which were set out or referred to in the Financial Post article some time ago. They did not undertake an investigation at my request. I am not too sure what led to the investigation but I could check that out.

With respect to the royal commission, I think it should be clear that the request for a royal commission was made to the government of New Brunswick, not to the government of Canada.

ENERGY

OIL—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF REDUCTION IN CONSUMPTION RESULTING FROM EXCISE TAX ON SMALL BOATS AND PRIVATE AIRCRAFT

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister advise whether his department has any figures to show what limitation on oil consumption has resulted from the special 10 per cent excise tax on small boats and privately owned aircraft?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check and see.

Mr. Fraser: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. A week ago when this question was put to the Minister of Finance, he said he would have to consult with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Did such consultation take place, and did the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources give any estimated or precise figures to the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have not had an opportunity to talk to my colleague about this. I would have to see whether at the departmental level there has been an exchange.

Mr. Fraser: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister advise whether the actual effect of this tax will be forwarded to the Minister of Finance before the budget is presented later this month?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, if indeed at this point we have been able to develop any figures on this, I think they obviously should be before the minister. As I said in response to a rather more general question put by the hon. member for Don Valley, it is, of course, very difficult to get a very precise reading on the impact of conservation measures, particularly in light of the increase in the petroleum price that has occurred within the last year.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

SUGGESTION MEMBERS BE SHOWN REPORT OF COMMISSIONERS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the President of the Privy Council.

I have examined a report by three academics on the redistribution of electoral boundaries and in that report there are weighty considerations which directly affect the area I represent. Can the minister tell the House whether hon. members will be consulted or see the preliminary report made by the individuals responsible for drafting that redistribution of electoral boundaries before the matter is formally referred to the House?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am not certain of the answer to that question. I do not think the act would require the commissioners to reveal that study, but of course they may do so in their own discretion. It is not a report that has been brought to my personal attention; however, I will make inquiries. I agree with the hon. gentleman that, so far as possible, members of parliament should have a say in decisions to rewrite the electoral map.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the President of the Privy Council.

Even though the law does not provide this obligation on the part of the commissioner, since we are after all living in a very democratic system, would it possible, without departing from the law, to allow consultation in order that hon. members who would want to see this preliminary project may make their recommendations on this subject?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think that would lie within the discretion of the commissioners. I will draw this exchange to their attention.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

RURAL DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF PARTICIPATION IN SECOND PHASE OF DEVELOPMENT PLAN

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Since the federal-provincial agreement covering the comprehensive development plan for Prince Edward Island specifically decrees, that "direct support is to be provided to voluntary organizations for the conduct of community services and developmental activities in local areas throughout the province" and "the organizational function will be carried out by the voluntary associations, especially the Rural Development Council", can the minister assure the House that a similar clause will be operative in the second phase of the development plan when it is agreed to?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that assurance to the hon. member, for reasons that he will understand. The negotiations are presently underway, as I indicated in the House a few days ago. We would only put in a clause of that sort if it were in fact accepted by the province. I have no way of knowing at the moment whether or not that matter is part of the current negotiations, so I am afraid I cannot give a definite answer to the hon. member. We will, of course, as I also mentioned in the House, continue to encourage participation of local groups in the implementation of the second phase of the plan.

Whether specific groups will be identified in the agreement or not is something that can only await the outcome of the negotiations.

Mr. MacLean: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister allegedly believes in participatory democracy, will he do his best to see that such a clause is included in the agreement; and, on the assumption that it is, what action does he propose to take to assure that such agreements are not abrogated unilaterally by the government of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure of the legal grounds that might lead to a claim that there was an abrogation. However, I would think that the mere fact that this action took place only within the last few weeks, after the expiry of the first phase of the agreement, does not constitute an abrogation of the previous agreement.

● (1140)

On the first part of my hon. friend's question, since undoubtedly the negotiations presently underway will be based to some degree on the initial agreement to determine what changes will be necessary, this matter will come up for discussion and I undertake with my hon. friend that I will raise the matter with the premier when he returns and I have an opportunity to discuss it with him.

IMMIGRATION

MEASURES TO IMPROVE PROCEDURE FOR ADMITTING VIETNAMESE REFUGEES—POSSIBLE GRANTING OF FOOD VOUCHER TO GENERAL QUANG

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration but in his absence I shall direct it to the acting minister. In view of the fact that Tran Van Quang was given clearance to enter Canada after a two-minute interview by a Canadian immigration official at Port Chaffey on May 14, and in view of the fact that on the same morning this immigration official processed Quang he also processed 200 other Vietnamese refugees, what measures has the government taken to vastly improve our whole immigration procedure with regard to admitting refugees into Canada? I should also like to know whether General Quang was given a $10 food voucher for his trip to Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to check the various allegations the hon. member has either made or indicated by way of his question. Of course, in processing application for entry to Canada a good deal of attention is paid to all the questions involving eligibility for entrance. In the case of refugees these issues are sometimes handled in a slightly different way in order to expedite entry, but matters such as health and security are always looked into. I shall be glad to report to the hon. member.

REASON FOR HASTE IN PROCESSING VIETNAMESE REFUGEES

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, could the Acting Prime Minister inform the House, since these refugees were safe in the United States why there was so much haste in getting these 200 across our borders. General Quang had been there only 11 days. Why was there only one Canadian official at that port to process all those refugees?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will refer this question to the minister. I am sure he will provide all the necessary answers. I would remind the hon. gentleman that the government was under the very greatest pressure from time to time to admit refugees into this country from many countries including Viet Nam. I recall, since I was Acting Prime Minister at the time, the very serious criticism made of the Canadian government for not expediting these entries.

PROPOSED IMPROVEMENT OF PORT SYSTEM—INQUIRY AS TO IMPLEMENTATION

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. The throne speech indicated that the government was prepared to undertake a number of new initiatives immediately to improve transport services in Canada which would not in any way prejudice the review of basic transportation policy which is to come. One of these new measures was the introduction of legislation to provide for the most efficient port system for Canada compatible with local, regional and national interests. In light of recent statistics reporting lower tonnage for the first four months of 1975 and for the year earlier for the Port of Vancouver, may I ask the minister when this particular throne speech promise of legislation providing the most efficient port system will be introduced?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will make a list for the hon. gentleman of what we have done up to this point as soon as I can supply it to the House. I know we worked with the province of New Brunswick, for example, we run the terminal. We worked with the government of British Columbia and we worked with the government of Manitoba in respect of a certain aircraft, the name of which I do not recall. If the hon. member will give me a chance to compile a list I will supply it to him.

ALLEGATION STEVEDORES AT MONTREAL DAMAGED BAGS OF WHEAT DESTINED FOR ETHIOPIA AND SOMALIA—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, would the minister have an investigation initiated into the allegations by a spokesman of CIDA that stevedores at the Port of Montreal wilfully damaged bags of wheat destined for Ethiopia and Somalia?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; would the hon. member please repeat his question because I did not exactly understand it.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, will the minister have an investigation initiated into the allegations by a spokesman of CIDA that stevedores at the Port of Montreal wilfully damaged bags of wheat destined for Ethiopia and Somalia and will he tell us who will underwrite the cost?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I will inquire, Mr. Speaker. This is the first time I have heard about it. CIDA never got in touch with me about this. I will check into it and try to determine what it is all about.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON EFFORTS TO RELEASE MISSIONARIES HELD CAPTIVE IN VIET NAM

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister and also in his capacity as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the Canadian embassy in Paris has now entered into negotiations with the PRG in Viet Nam, can the minister advise whether any representations have been made on behalf of missionaries held captive as prisoners of war including Canadians Norman and Joan Johnson? Can the minister report any progress in securing the release of those held captive contrary to all the previous promises and commitments of the communist forces?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will pass on this inquiry to the minister and to the department. I know they have been following these cases very closely. As you know, we have not yet been able to re-establish diplomatic relations with the government of South Viet Nam although we have recognized that government.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that these missionaries have now been held for two and a half or almost three months, and in view of the fact that the minister replied in the House on May 7 that he could assure us that the government would do everything possible to secure their release, would the minister tell us what is "everything possible"?

Mr. Sharp: That is a very difficult term to define, Mr. Speaker. It is whatever is possible under the prevailing circumstances.

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN RESEARCH GRANTS TO UNIVERSITIES AND STUDY OF DUPLICATION

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Will the minister consider allocating more of his funds under the Department of Agriculture to universities, and will he study the matter of the duplication of facilities and grants under this program?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, our programs in respect of universities are as good as those of any developed country in the world and better than most. I think there are only two countries in the world which surpass us in so far as government research is concerned.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

An hon. Member: You do not know what you are talking about. Give us some figures.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo.

MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF ALLEGED INVOLVEMENT OF MR. NICHOL AND MR. WYLIE IN PURCHASE OF "TIME" CANADA

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. What involvement if any is the minister aware of by Mr. John Nichol and Mr. Toerrance Wylie with respect to the purchase of Time Canada if the government's legislation concerning Time and Reader's Digest should become law, and when did he first become aware of this involvement if they, in fact, are involved?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any involvement at all.

HOUSING

DATE OF MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS—REQUEST OF ONTARIO FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS TO STIMULATE HOUSE CONSTRUCTION

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the urbane Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact that the minister has been unable to fulfill his past commitments to meet with the provincial ministers responsible for housing, does he have any plans to meet with these ministers in the near future, and if so, when?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful that there will be continuing consultation. As I said at the Housing Ministers' Conference in January there will be meetings this year. We will be meeting on Tuesday. It will be an informal meeting of the other housing ministers.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, what moves has the government made to meet the informal request of the Ontario government to supply additional funding in order that the stagnating housing industry may be stimulated?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, indications are that the stagnating housing industry has been stimulated and is moving along quite quickly. I hope to have new figures in the early part of next week which give every indication of being very encouraging.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL CONTRIBUTE TO FINANCING

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the President of the Treasury Board and the Postmaster General.

The President of the Treasury Board having stated last Friday that the government is considering requests from COJO for additional sources of revenues and the Postmaster General having said yesterday that a bill will soon be introduced regarding financing, can the President of the Treasury Board or the Postmaster General say what is the exact nature of the measure, whether it will help increase COJO revenues, which I think would be quite normal? I would like them to tell the House what is the exact nature of the bill to be introduced.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, obviously any legislation we would bring before the House would be to help COJO get more revenues. That is the very nature of the bill. However, we are not ready yet to introduce it and I hope, as my distinguished colleague the Postmaster General said, that we shall be able to do so in the next few days.

CENTENNIAL PROPERTIES SENIOR CITIZENS PROJECT IN HALIFAX—PAYMENT OF SUBCONTRACTORS—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. A week ago I asked the minister to investigate the construction of a senior citizens project in the city of Halifax, funds for which have been advanced by CMHC, by the Centennial Properties, a firm of questionable reputation. The minister said he would look into it. Has he any report to make on his investigation?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I have looked into it, Mr. Speaker. There have been some difficulties with labour relations and other problems of which the hon. member may be aware. I am advised by CMHC that the first property will be opened about the middle of this month and the second about the middle of July. I was in Halifax on Wednesday and discussed this with the local office and with the premier. I hope we can meet those deadlines. Frankly, I am not that confident at this moment, but I am working toward it.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I was also advised that some of the subcontractors on the projects have not been paid since the month of December. Have those subcontractors been paid so that they may proceed with the job?

Mr. Danson: No, Mr. Speaker, not to my knowledge. I do not know about all the subcontractors but my understanding is that some have not yet been paid.

SPRUCE BUDWORM CONTROL PROGRAM—SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF DEPARTMENTAL DECISION NOT TO PARTICIPATE

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow up on my previous questions to the Minister of the Environment and ask the parliamentary secretary to the minister if the department has reconsidered its earlier decision not to participate in spruce budworm control programs which is related to other ecological and environmental considerations, especially in New Brunswick where millions of evergreens are being chewed up right now.

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check with the department to see if in fact the program is being reconsidered. I know that so far as research in the control of budworm is concerned, the department is certainly participating, but I will be happy to make representations.

An hon. Member: When the trees are gone, you will know how to control it.

ROCHDALE COLLEGE—REASON FOR DELAY IN IMPLEMENTING PLANS FOR USE

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the government's takeover some time ago of the complex in Toronto referred to as Rochdale College and known in Toronto as the drug haven, and considering that these premises are now almost vacant and as such a burden to the taxpayer, can the minister explain his plans for this complex? Can he advise the House why it is taking so long to implement plans, particularly in light of the critical housing shortage and shortage of accommodation in metropolitan Toronto?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, today is D day at Rochdale when the trustees are supposed to give CMHC vacant possession. As the hon. member knows, CMHC simply held the mortgage and until this time they did not have ownership of the building. Ownership should become effective today. The plan is to make arrangements with other levels of government or with private groups with whom we are in consultation to make certain the building is put to the best social use. I am biased towards making it into a senior citizens home because the building lends itself to it. But a considerable amount of repairs will have to be carried out to put the building into shape. We want to make the maximum social use of it as early as possible.

VOODOO CF-101 AIRCRAFT—POSSIBILITY OF CONTINUED USE AS FIGHTER

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The Voodoo CF-101, described yesterday by a Liberal backbencher with some accuracy as being outdated and worn out, has not been operational in the U.S. regular air force for years and has not been used by the U.S. national guard for years, except as a rescue plane. Does the minister still claim that it is good enough for another five years as a first-line fighter aircraft in the Canadian armed forces?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Voodoo 101 is still a very capable intercepter aircraft. We intend to continue its use in the Canadian armed forces.

An hon. Member: It is great for aerial acrobatics.

WESTERN CANADIAN AIR DEFENCE CONTROL CENTRE—DATE WHEN OPERATIONAL

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): As a balance to the disastrous Voodoo story, the minister boasted that Canada is taking over control of our air defence in western Canada. I think the time frame is important in this regard. Can the minister inform the House when the Western Canadian Control Centre will be in full operation? Would four or five years from now be a likely date?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): The construction of the Western Canadian Control Centre is scheduled to start next year, and the acquisition of the equipment with which it will be equipped will also be started next year. I do not think a date for its completion has as yet been established.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR ATHLETES PARTICIPATING IN OLYMPICS

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the report that our Olympic athletes are broke and embittered, can the minister say if the additional financial assistance which he announced last week is considered adequate to meet the needs that have been illustrated, and, if not, whether other speedy remedial action is contemplated to assist those of our Canadian Olympic athletes who find themselves in financial difficulties resulting from their devotion to rigorous training schedules?

[Mr. Danson.]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have read with some interest a series of articles in a daily newspaper this week which did not seem to have been aware of the press release issued last week by my department announcing substantial increases in the funding for Canadian athletes who are of international standards. I will have copies of that press release sent to the particular newspaper to make sure that they are made aware of the situation, since they do not seem to read those papers in which these things are reported.

So far as the second part of the question is concerned, the Canadian Olympic Association has announced it would take the responsibility for the non-students among our Olympic athletes. I expect them to be in a position to make an announcement very shortly on this subject; there is every indication that they will be in a position to meet the needs that have been expressed in this area. So far as my own area of responsibility is concerned which we have divided with the Canadian Olympic Association, as I indicated previously in the House, we have made an individual review of all the cases of apparent hardship, and special steps have been taken to take care of those particular cases.

ENTRANCE FEES—COMPLAINTS FROM RADIUM AND INVERMERE REGARDING REDUCED BUSINESS REVENUE—HONOUR SYSTEM FOR THROUGH TRAFFIC

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and it follows on the grievance expressed last night at the conclusion of the debate by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Has the minister replied as yet to the representations made from Radium and Invermere concerning problems following the imposition of a complex and increased fee schedule for Canada's national parks, both with regard to confusion at the gates and to the sharply reduced revenue reported by businesses operating within the parks?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know, I have not received representations from Radium. But generally, the system we are using, particularly in the western parks, regarding the fee schedule has not been changed for many years. There has only been a change in the amount of fees. So far as visitation to the parks is concerned, the number of visitors was down in April but it was up substantially in March, which we think is a reflection of the fact that Easter was in March this year rather than in April. Figures show an increase of 12.24 per cent for Revelstoke and slightly over 4 per cent growth for Banff during the month of May. So we do not think this reflects a diminution in visitation.

Mr. Johnston: Has the honour system for the through traffic broken down?

● (1200)

Mr. Buchanan: We hope not, but this is something that we may well encounter difficulties with because there are several other parks, particularly in the Atlantic provinces, where we will have to be relying on the honesty of the person passing through when he or she states that that is all they are doing. We are simply going to have to work with it.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I must take a moment to reply to the cheap political remark made by the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), for which he has become well known recently in this House, when he called attention to some of the empty seats on the opposition benches. I simply want to advise him that the occupants of some of those seats have already left for what appears to be a very successful caucus in Halifax. That is where the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has gone. He left at about eleven o'clock, and I would also like to advise the hon. member that he travelled on Air Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I offended the sensitivity of the hon. member, I am sorry. It is shameful that someone in this House should speak in a political way.

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. (a) and (b). 2. (a) See reply to part 1. (b) Testing is carried out only if an employee is to be given language training. Seven hundred and sixty seven employees have undergone such training since 1969.

*MONEY SUPPLY IN CANADA FOR EACH YEAR 1970 TO 1975

Question No. 2,455—Mr. Diefenbaker:

What was the total amount of the money supply in Canada on the lst day of January in each of the years 1970 to 1975, inclusive?

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this question was placed by the Right Hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the answer is somewhat lengthy. I have given him a written copy. In light of that I wonder if the answer could be taken as read and it could appear in Hansard as if it had been read?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the answer should be tabled and printed in Hansard as if read.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The answer to the above question is as follows:]

Data on the money supply in Canada are not available as at January 1, unless that date falls on a Wednesday as happened in 1975. The following table therefore shows information as at the last Wednesday of each year from 1969 to 1973.

The total money supply is usually defined to include currency outside banks and Canadian dollar chartered bank deposits, net of estimated Canadian dollar items in transit. Two other frequently used definitions of the money supply are shown below for comparative purposes: Currency and privately-held Canadian dollar deposits, defined as currency outside banks plus total Canadian dollar chartered bank deposits less Government of Canada deposits. Currency and demand deposits—currency outside banks plus chartered bank demand deposits. This narrow definition concentrates on the forms of money that are most readily usable for making payments.

Currency and Canadian Dollar Chartered Bank Deposits
(Outstanding Amounts, Millions of Dollars)

	Currency and Total Canadian Dollar Deposits	Currency and Privately-Held Canadian Dollar Deposits	Currency and Demand Deposits
December 31, 1969	29,214	27,906	9,342
December 30, 1970	32,161	30,795	9,811
December 29, 1971	38,296	35,837	11,763
December 27, 1972	43,564	41,024	13,142
December 26, 1973	51,227	48,859	14,843
January 1, 1975	62,124	57,442	15,772

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR PAYMENT OF SPOUSE'S ALLOWANCE TO PERSONS SIXTY TO SIXTY-FOUR

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-62, to amend the Old Age Security Act, to repeal the Old Age Assistance Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, you will recall that a question was raised by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) about the adequacy of the royal recommendation, and it was raised again by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). I think I could have argued that the recommendation was adequate, particularly since in a case like this the executive is responsible both for the legislation and for the recommendation, which was meant to be a general description of what was included in the bill.

However, so that the passage of this bill, which I think will command general support, is not impeded I have arranged for a substitute recommendation which I gather, Mr. Speaker, is in your hands. I would ask leave to have this new recommendation printed and to have it taken as the effective recommendation.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not share the sanguine view of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) with respect to the original royal recommendation. I must say that I am rather happy this has happened. I do not want Your Honour or the President of the Privy Council to take that expression of mine as an indication that we are completely happy with the bill as it stands; it does have certain discriminatory aspects, which will be dealt with in detail by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). But we are anxious to get this bill on, and on that basis we are prepared to give our consent.

However, I think it is very important that in future the President of the Privy Council is rather careful about documents to which he puts his pen, because it could cause confusion and some difficulty later if legislation happened to slip through with that kind of inadequacy in it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are, of course, dealing with a technicality and not with the substance of the bill. We have no objection to a substitute royal recommendation which would more directly reflect what is in the bill. But I am concerned about the reference made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) to the pen of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp). If it is a new royal recommendation, I hope it is signed by the Governor General.

Mr. Speaker: The fact of the matter is that it is signed by both of them, I am given to understand.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to make one point. I am not here to argue with the government House leader, but I just wonder whether he can assure us that the royal recommendation is now in conformity with the intent of the bill. I think this is extremely important. After all, he has had two kicks at the cat in this regard.

If I recall correctly, on June 2 the recommendation referred to married persons; there is no doubt about that. On June 3 it referred to married persons; there is no question about that. At that particular time the minister changed the ages from 59, I think, to another age, to 60 to 64.

But not having seen the recommendation and not being in a position to determine that the government is not still making boobs, particularly when we notice that the bill refers to spouses and there is no reference to marriage whatsoever—it is only by way of implication—I hope the minister has not made another mistake. I do not know whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) is reading the recommendation without seeing the bill, or reading the bill without seeing the recommendation. We are very concerned about the sloppiness which has occurred with respect to this particular bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How about reading it?

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, that is my point. I think the substitute royal recommendation should be read either by Your Honour or by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) so that we will know to what we are agreeing.

Mr. Speaker: For the benefit of hon. members, I have here a letter of transmission from the office of His Excellency and it makes reference to the following recommendation:

His Excellency the Governor General recommends to the House of Commons a measure to amend the Old Age Security Act to provide that payments of benefits under the act be made out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund as a statutory appropriation; to authorize an agreement upon prescribed terms with a province where benefits payable in that province similar to or supplementary to those payable under this act may be combined with payments to recipients under this act and paid on behalf of that province; to define "spouse" in the manner prescribed; and in the manner prescribed, to provide after September, 1975, for the payment of spouse's allowances to persons 60 to 64 inclusive.

Is there unanimous consent to the filing of the amended recommendation?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

● (1210)

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am quite surprised that the minister has not attempted to make a statement in this regard.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I point out to hon. members that at the moment I called for the adoption of the motion I noticed the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) rising on my left and the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) turning to his right. He was engaged in a conversation of some kind and I did not know whether he intended to rise and speak on the bill first. Is it agreed that the minister shall proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I did not rise immediately in my place because I thought the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) was rising once again on one of his numerous points of order, questions of privilege and the type of question that he raises on all matters. I felt that, with due deference, I would give him first chance to have a crack at whatever he wanted to say.

It gives me great pleasure to open debate today on Bill C-62 which would amend the Old Age Security Act and repeal the Old Age Assistance Act as well as amending all related acts. As hon. members are aware, the main feature of this bill is to provide income-tested allowances to spouses aged 60 to 64 of old age security recipients, to become effective October 1 of this year. This measure, which was announced in the Speech from the Throne of this thirtieth parliament, will permit the government to pay a monthly allowance to some 65,000 to 90,000 spouses of old age security pensioners who are in the most need of income.

Such a step, Madam Speaker, is in the tradition which Liberal governments have established in their treatment of our senior citizens and I should like to outline briefly the steps which have led to this latest measure. Since 1927, when parliament approved the old age pension act under which the federal government paid 50 per cent of the cost of a means-tested pension administered by the provinces, the improvements have been such that the federal government has assumed total responsibility for old age pensions. The means test gave way, on the recommendation of the 1950 joint parliamentary committee, to a universal flat-rate type of pension with eligibility based solely on age and residence. The same criteria remain in force today.

The next fundamental step was the establishment, in 1966, of the guaranteed income supplement, which was initially intended to be a transitional program for those who had little or no opportunity to participate in the Canada or Quebec pension plans established at the same time. In 1970, however, it was converted to a continuing program to guarantee a minimum level of income to Canada's pensioners. Such a move, Madam Speaker, is in keeping with a traditional value in our society which couples a benefit of right with a supplemental payment for those who most need it.

Two years later, in 1968, both the OAS and GIS payments were increased annually, with a 2 per cent ceiling accounting for rises in the consumer price index; the ceiling was removed in May, 1972, to allow for full escalation. As most members are aware, such escalation was changed to a quarterly base in October of 1973 to allow for even more rapid response to changes in the consumer price index on behalf of our senior citizens.

A short look back to 1967, when the GIS payments began, shows that the basic pension was then $75 per month, with a supplement of $30. The figures for July of this year stand at $125.76 for the basic pension, with a GIS of $88.21 for single pensioners giving a total per month of $213.97; and a GIS of $78.34 each at the married rate, giving a total income of $408 per month for a couple. It does not require much of a mathematician, Madam Speaker, to see that in those eight years the guaranteed minimum payment for Canada's pensioners has doubled and is now payable at age 65 rather than 68 as was the case in 1967.

The bill which is before us today represents one more fundamental step in improving the income security of Canada's old age security recipients. The plight of a couple, one of whom receives the old age pension and one who does not, is often brought to our attention. The spouse is, in most cases, not a member of the work force and highly unlikely to be employed in any case. Indeed, in these days of a call for earlier retirement, about which many serious reservations have been expressed, it can and does happen that employees are retired from work earlier than they would choose and when they could still have years of productive work ahead of them.

We tend to forget, Madam Speaker, that while the professional person—the doctor, dentist, lawyer, etc.—can choose his retirement age, those on salary or wages, usually considerably less than those of the professional, are retired at an age to be specified by a union, employer or other outside and totally arbitrary force. Such cases can and do present hardships and it is for this reason that the Liberal Party, during the 1974 election campaign, committed itself to easing the burden on such couples by instituting this income-tested allowance for spouses in order to provide for those who most need it in our society a monthly income which would allow them to live in the dignity which they deserve.

I repeat, this measure is aimed at the couple which, at present, is expected to live on the pension of one. It does all that, but nothing more and in that sense is an interim measure. Indeed, I should like to assure hon. members that the others in the same age group, such as widowed, divorced or single people, are not forgotten in the light of measures outlined in the bill we are debating today.

I have been engaged, since April of 1973, in a review of Canada's social security plans and programs with my provincial counterparts. Basic propositions of that review read as follows:

That a guaranteed income should be available to people whose incomes are insufficient because they are unable to or are not expected to work and that the incomes of those who are working but whose incomes are inadequate should be supplemented under a single, general income supplementation plan with built-in work incentives.

These were propositions Nos. 6 and 7 of the working document tabled in this House in April, 1973.

[Translation]

I alluded previously to the income support and supplement program. In February 1975, the federal and provincial ministers of welfare reached an agreement on a two-fold program, that is income support and income supplement. Income support applies to all persons who are unable to work, who should not work, or who cannot find employment under provincial labour standards.

The income supplement would extend to persons who work but whose income is inadequate for a number of reasons. My officials are in the process of drawing up the mode of application of the income support and supplement programs. Those procedures will be studied at the next federal and provincial welfare ministers' conference. It is hoped that shortly thereafter, the federal and provincial governments can reach an agreement, and that an income support program can be implemented sometime next year.

I would point out that, in the meantime, the needy who are not eligible for the spouse's allowance can get financial assistance through provincial and municipal welfare programs. The federal government shares half the cost of those programs through the Canada Pension Plan. I wish to point out another important factor: the introduction of the spouse's allowance should result in the elimination of a number of welfare cases and thus enable the provinces to save money that can then be applied to other areas of welfare.

I would like now to take a few moments of the time of the House to outline the provisions of this measure as well as to explain briefly the other provisions of Bill C-62. As I have already mentioned, the basic pension and the supplement for the spouse aged 60 to 64 will all be subject to an income test, the same test as is now applied to the GIS portion of pensions now payable. This will ensure that payments go to those who most need them, and are not granted on a universal basis. We estimate that this plan will provide a further $100 million in benefits to older Canadians and I am sure that the Canadian people would not expect us to do less. The pensions will be paid individually to each recipient; that is, the spouse who is not a pensioner will receive a cheque each month in his or her own right. Proof of age and residence will be required from the spouse, just as in the case of persons aged 65 and over, and proof of marital status will also be required.

In order to ensure consistency in federal programs, the same criteria which now apply to common law couples under the old age security and Canada Pension Plan will be used in the case of the spouse's allowance. That is, couples who have been living together in a common law relationship and publicly representing themselves as man and wife will be accepted, though the relationship must have lasted for a minimum period of one year on the last day of the preceding fiscal year if neither partner has a legal spouse, or three years if either partner has a legal spouse. My department will be sending application forms for this spouse's allowance in time for the program to come into effect on October 1, and therefore the onus is not on the pensioner or spouse to seek out such forms.

Turning now to the other provisions of the bill, Madam Speaker, I am particularly pleased to be able to introduce at this time a bill which seeks to authorize the governor in council to make a regulation whereby certain periods of absence from Canada can be counted as presence in Canada in determining eligibility for old age security. As hon. members know, "residence" and "presence in Canada" are not identical in the regulations of the Old Age Security Act and because of this some people have been penalized because of absences from Canada while serving in the Canadian armed forces, while employed by the federal or provincial governments, or while engaged as a missionary, for example. Some such cases have been brought to my attention, and hon. members may remember that on January 10, 1974, I gave a commitment in this House that power to make such a regulation would be sought from the House. We agree that it is untenable that persons serving abroad for their country, either as armed forces personnel or as civilians, should be so penalized and I am particularly pleased to include this amendment with Bill C-62 today.

Another significant provision is the one which gives to the Minister of National Health and Welfare authority to declare overpayments uncollectable in order to ease financial hardships. We all know how easy it is to make minor mistakes in calculations—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We know how easy it is to make mistakes in the royal recommendation.

Mr. Lalonde: —and it frequently happens that through oversight or misunderstanding a pensioner may understate "income" when applying for the guaranteed income supplement, and thereby receive an overpayment. Under the present law, this results in a reduction in the supplement, coupled with a further reduction to recover the amount of overpayment, which frequently means financial hardship for the pensioner. I feel that if pensioners have so little income that they qualify for the GIS, they should not be penalized by having it reduced for honest and minor mathematical errors, and I am sure all hon. members will welcome this move to give the Minister of National Health and Welfare discretion to waive the collection of such overpayments.

[Translation]

Here are three other aspects of the bill: any provincial benefit payable under the provisions of the Old Age Security Act may be added to the OAS pension cheque, subject to an agreement between the province concerned and the federal administration. In such case, every three months the provincial government would reimburse to the federal government the costs arising out of that agreement. Such an agreement already exists with Prince Edward Island where family allowances are included every month in the federal government's allowance cheque.

The Old Age Security Fund will be eliminated and the benefits will be taken directly out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. At the present time, there is no money left in the Old Age Security Fund and the deficits have therefore been made up through temporary loans from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. With the implementation of fiscal reforms in 1971, the former tax rates relative to old age security, 4 per cent on personal income, 3 per cent on corporate income and 3 per cent on sales, were united within the regular tax structure and tied up at those levels. There now exists no means to increase those rates to replenish the Old Age Security Fund. The present act stipulates that the fund must reimburse loans made out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, without however, providing any source of revenue to make such reimbursement. To remedy the situation, the OAS Fund will be eliminated and all benefits under the legislation will be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Finally, the Old Age Assistance Act will be repealed. The act provided for the payment of an allowance, subject to a means test, to persons 65 to 70 years old. The program was administered by the provinces and the federal government took part in its financing. The act has been inoperative since 1969 as a result of amendments to the OAS Act that reduced the age of eligibility for the pension from 70 to 65 between 1966 and 1970, which reduction gradually eliminated the Old Age Assistance Act.

Madam Speaker, I do not wish to delay any further the debate on Bill C-62. I am sure that all hon. members will be receptive to the improvements that we shall bring to old age security pensions in Canada, and I request their cooperation so that these amendments be made effective as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I would have thought the minister would have done this House and the country the courtesy of indicating that he misled us when he released the expensive-looking press release of June 3. I cannot understand what the government is doing. The minister's press release came after two royal recommendations had been brought before the House. The first recommendation used the word "married". The second recommendation also used the word "married" and attempted to correct the mistakes of the first recommendation. The age limitations in the first recommendation were wrong. The government said benefits would be paid to spouses between 60 and 64 years of age; however, when they thought they had everything fixed up, the minister then rushed to the media and indicated that this bill, C-62, would apply to persons aged 60 to 64 who are married to old age security pensioners. On the second or third page of his press release he became even more specific. I quote:

● (1230)

All persons applying for the GIS and the spouse's allowance for the first time will be required to submit a certificate of marriage.

All I am trying to put before this House is the fact that the minister and the government really do not know what they are doing. It has been a conglomeration of mix-up designed to confuse our senior citizens, let alone the opposition. We now have an entirely different principle. What bothers me is that I do not know what the ratio is all about. On page 1 of the minister's statement, he said:

The purpose of this amendment is to provide relief in situations where two persons would otherwise have to live on the pension of one. The income needs of the other groups such as singles, widows, etc., are being examined under the income support and supplementation proposals of the Federal-Provincial Social Security Review. It is hoped that agreement can be reached to implement the income support part of the system next year.

What sort of nonsense is this? There are many questions that have to be answered with respect to those who have been excluded. I will mention this in detail a little later because there are many questions that have to be answered in terms of this federal-provincial conference. I quote from an undated article in the Globe and Mail:

—what the cost of the new system is likely to be to each province; which level of government will administer the parts of the new welfare system; what will be defined as income for the purposes of deciding who is eligible for benefits; the period of time over which income will be counted; the rate at which people receiving benefits will be taxed for their earned income; who will be included in the family unit for purposes of determining the level of benefits and the level of income; what assets owned by a prospective client will be taken into account.

Until these practical questions are answered, the provincial ministers will not be asked to give their approval—

What disturbs me is that there is no time limit to look after those who the minister purposely left out. I will get to that shortly. The government has emphasized the inflation problem, the unemployment problem, the problem of immigration, of the economy, of the energy crisis. While these are understandably pressing problems, the result has been that the aged and disadvantaged have suffered at the hands of other government preoccupations. At the same time, the government has coveted, rationalized and justified extravagant and frivolous spending on items which there was no indication that the public needed or desired.

Since 1961, the total cost of operating the PCO and PMO has increased by 1,148 per cent. Government expenditures on professional and special services have increased by 509.1 per cent. This spending extravagance directed toward the executive's personal self-glorification goes on and on and need not be repeated here. The point is that now we are confronted with a half-baked, half-thought out, incremental attempt at bettering the lot of some of our senior citizens.

The government has been gracious enough to index these allowances quarterly. This will be done, we presume, on the basis of the consumer price index. Yet we know that the aged and those in financial need spend an inordinate amount of their income on housing, food and health services, components of the CPI that are markedly higher than the aggregate index that will be used. Why has the government not implemented an old persons or disadvantaged index so that indexing can truly meet the needs of those it is meant to serve? In short, we have said that Canada's senior citizens have different needs and expenses than the average Canadian family of four and as a result new measures must be devised to meet these unique needs of the aged.

The minister has promised Canadians for some time that he will introduce legislation directed toward optimal change in the field of income maintenance and security. He has been meeting with provincial ministers and telling us that certain areas of his policy have been agreed upon. I have raised many questions to indicate that certain areas have not been agreed upon. Many questions have to be answered. In his infinite wisdom, the minister has not told us what problems the federal and provincial governments now face. He said they are studying them. His bill indicates that he hopes something will occur next year. While the reforms very reluctantly offered under Bill C-62, particularly with regard to two or three matters which I will point out later, are much needed, they are nonetheless stop-gap and fall far short of the needs of Canada's aged. Mr. Lalonde has indicated—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order.

Mr. Alexander: I am sorry; I mean the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). You can always tell when the NDP House leader is here: he will not allow me to make a mistake, whether it is with respect to grammar or mentioning a person's name. I appreciate the assistance he has been giving me.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not like my hon. friend to make any boobs.

Mr. Lalonde: We are used to your mistakes.

Mr. Alexander: The minister says they are used to my mistakes. If we took our job in the same way, in terms of seriousness, as the government does, Lord have mercy on this country!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: We are well protected by a practised opposition.

Mr. Alexander: What concerns me is this government's showing no action to remedy the inflationary pressures that have so diminished the economic security of those Canadians who have given years of service to their country. Our senior citizens continually write to members of parliament regarding the problem of escalating rents. That is a very serious problem. However, there is no direction coming from this government with regard to this important matter in terms of some sort of consensus regarding voluntary guidelines as to what can be done to relieve the suffering of these people.

There are not enough houses. I am sure members on all sides of the House receive letter after letter from senior citizens asking for help in finding accommodation. All the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) does is refer to AHOP. Surely there is a need that must be recognized immediately. The senior citizens' dollar is being eroded because of the archaic fiscal and monetary policies of this government and because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is in a quandary, not knowing what he is going to do.

We on this side of the House at least put before the Canadian people a policy, which we hoped would have been acceptable, in order to solve the longsuffering of millions of Canadians who have suffered at the hands of this government. I understand the government has now stolen that policy; they in fact have an incomes policy. It was not politically acceptable, but it is now intellectually acceptable. An incomes policy is now continuously being brought up to date.

Mr. Chrétien: Are you in agreement with your leader?

Mr. Alexander: I am always in agreement with my leader, unlike those on the treasury benches who are in continual disagreement with their leader.

Mr. Anderson: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. To what leader is the hon. member referring?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Dry up!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please.

● (1240)

Mr. Alexander: As I was about to say when I was rudely interrupted through ignorance, the government is fighting inflation on the backs of our senior citizens.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: The government's aim is to see to it that our aging population continues to live in discomfort and without dignity; and now we see another callous and Draconian approach to the aged.

On the face of it, the bill looks as though we could jump for joy. But we want to say it is most unfortunate the minister did not mention the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) who has been attempting to see to it that authority is given under an order in council by virtue of which certain periods of absence from Canada could be counted as presence in Canada for purposes of determining eligibility for OAS. I should like the minister to know that the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary has been pursuing that matter and he should be given all the credit for it, not the Minister of National Health and Welfare who sits on his fanny and steals our policies.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Alexander: Listen to them over there when we speak the truth. Of course, Madam Speaker, one would hardly complain of another admirable step which is contained in the bill. I quote from page 2 of the minister's press release. I might add that this release is inaccurate when it comes to the most important parts. But according to this part on page 2, the minister would be given authority to write off small or uncollectable overpayments of benefit at his discretion, to ease financial hardship. What the minister did not say was that most of those overpayment were the result of a bureaucracy which was not working; it was because of bureaucratic inefficiency. I say this with a great deal of respect, that hundreds, if not thousands of senior citizens were forced to scratch and dig in order to make repayments.

When I talk about a callous and Draconian approach, we find that the bill is talking about spouses, which I cannot understand because the word "spouse" as defined includes incestuous relationships, illicit relationships and common law marriages. These are the people the minister is so concerned about. He is sitting over there, smiling, talking with the other one who is hanging on, who is the other bagman in the party in terms of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Chrétien: I'm the bagman of the country.

Mr. Alexander: You'd better believe it, the bagman of the country. You had better look after it because our job is not only to see that the government behaves—and it is getting almost impossible—but also to be the watchdog of the public purse. So be careful.

Mr. Chrétien: That is what I am doing.

Mr. Alexander: I like it when you get to the hearts of those two ministers. They know I am telling the truth, and they haven't heard half of it yet. Let me tell you what the minister is doing, Madam Speaker. He favours illicit relations.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Alexander: Hon. members over there haven't read the bill yet. When they get to the definition of "spouse" they will see what I am talking about. All this is at the expense of—guess who, Madam Speaker. It is at the expense of our widows, our widowers, our spinsters, our bachelors, our divorced persons and even persons close to 59. All these persons have been completely ignored by the minister. I cannot understand his thinking. He says, "We are going to look after them shortly." But when, in heaven's name, is shortly? What we see here is a very unfair, illogical and blatantly discriminatory approach to a very serious subject. I say this with all due respect.

An hon. Member: Are you going to vote against it?

Mr. Alexander: One never votes against motherhood, my dear, dumb-dumb friend.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: There can be no hesitation on our part in saying we shall vote for the bill; but we who sit on these benches have a responsibility to draw attention to the inadequacies of the measure before us, and that is what I am trying to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: So many backbenchers come in here for 15 minutes and all of a sudden, speaking from the back because they can't get to the front, they have all the words of wisdom. I say to them that now and again one has to sit back, listen, learn and be prepared to stand up and make a significant contribution to debate, rather than hide behind the curtain uttering foolish remarks from the back benches.

I find it extremely offensive to lump legitimately married people in with those I have just described. I wonder what the thinking of the government is. I cannot understand it. Getting into the bill a little more deeply, we find that "spouse" is defined as follows:

"Spouse" in relation to a pensioner includes a person of the opposite sex who has lived with the pensioner—

Thank God there has been forethought to think of those words, anyway

—for three or more years where there is a bar to their marriage—

I cannot understand that. To me, as a lawyer, a bar to a marriage means that you are perhaps living with your daughter, or your son, in a way which is not acceptable by society. Is this allowed? The minister does not explain it.

—where there is a bar to their marriage or at least one year where there is no such bar and the pensioner and that person have publicly represented themselves as man and wife.

The minister does not even have the decency to say this includes those who are married according to the accepted form of our society. The bill does not even talk about marriage. This is the part that disturbs me, because the people I spoke about earlier, the widows, the single persons, the divorced are excluded in favour of this other gang.

I turn, now, to another provision in the bill, one that really disturbs me. I refer to section 17.3 which states:

(1) Where the beneficiary of a spouse's allowance has been convicted of an offence and sentenced to a term of imprisonment exceeding ninety days, payment of the spouse's allowance shall be suspended for any period the spouse continues to be imprisoned.

What are we being asked to do here? We are talking about people who are between 60 and 64 years of age. I want to know the statistics which give the minister cause for such concern that he is prepared to remove the bread and the milk from the tables of the aged. I do not know what is going on here that we should be asked to approve the suspension of allowances for those who are in the age bracket between 60 and 64.

What about this other provision in clause 17—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. At this point we are supposed to be discussing the general principle of the bill, not the details.

● (1250)

Mr. Alexander: With respect, Madam Speaker, either I am a little confused—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: —or there is some misunderstanding. I can refer to matters I dislike without referring to the bill. This is all within the general principle of the bill. This is the first time I have ever heard it said that on second reading a member has to refer to the bill. I have been here practically every day, but perhaps I have missed something. I am pointing out matters to which we take objection.

For example, I find out, Madam Speaker, that no payment will be made to the so-called spouse if the other dies or if the spouse ceases to be eligible. For example, if the husband dies and his widow is 62, she is cut off from any payment. I do not understand this. It is unfair. Words fail me in trying to determine the thinking of this government. Another point that also bothers me is that we have moved away from the principle of universality because we are now introducing a means test.

Mr. Lalonde: No, an income test.

Mr. Alexander: Don't mince words; it is the same thing. The minister can look in his black book and find out what is going on, so let him not play games. I want to make reference to an article in the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Lalonde: Surely you have a better authority than that.

Mr. Alexander: It is dealing with what it calls an unfair pension proposal. The minister did a flip-flop in talking one day about people who were married and then talking about spouses. If they also include married people—and I hope they do—then another editorial will have to come out shortly. I quote from the editorial in the Globe and Mail of May 26:

> Wait just a minute. Health and welfare minister Marc Lalonde is being unassailably kind and sensitive in saying he will bring in legislation extending the old age pension (on a means test basis) to persons aged 60 to 65 who are married to pensioners. We know the hardship that exists for many of these couples, trying to scrape through on one pension and guaranteed income supplement. But how equitable is Mr. Lalonde being? He is in fact saying the old age pension is no longer universal at age 65—he is saying that one class of people, pensioners' spouses of a certain age, are to be singled out for special treatment.

I hope, Madam Speaker, that those who are supposed to tell us what is going on around here give the minister some big headlines as to what is going on, because the article goes on to ask this question:

> How happy is that going to make spinsters or bachelors in that age group who must exist on welfare until they reach 65? Or widows and widowers under pensionable age (the old age pension that might have gone to their spouses has no survivor benefits)? Or the spouses of pensioners who are, say, 59? Do they not eat as much?

The last question in the editorial is:

> Is Mr. Lalonde's tinkering really necessary—or fair?

When you introduce a means test, a program is no longer universal. I suggest to the minister that if he wants to do something significant he should gradually reduce the age from 65 to 60 a year at a time. This would make some sense out of the program. But no, the minister says he wants to give us old age security. I do not care whether he calls it a spouses' allowance or not, because the same amount of money is involved. The government is going to pay old age security plus GIS, but those entitled to it will be subjected to a means test if they are under 65. Those who are over 65 are not subjected to the means test. This is why I cannot understand the government's thinking. Either you give them the money because you are thinking of reducing the age, without any encumbrance, or you are just playing footsy with this question of the tax that is involved. The minister has statistics showing how much money will be paid people between 60 and 64. Little special advantage is given this group that is not yet 65. In other words, what is put in one hand will likely be taken out of the other and go back into government coffers.

Others of my colleagues will be bringing to bear matters that we believe are extremely important in respect of this bill. Although I have additional points to make, I notice my time is running out, so in closing may I call it one o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take very much longer. I think I have made my point.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I hear hon. members over there shouting. All I can say to them at this point is that they are lucky I am not seeking the leadership of this party, because something tells me they would catch hell. In closing, I wish to state that here we have a nation faced with a gross national product of about $150 billion, while the government spent in the order of $150 million in 1973-74 on bilingualism and while we have the Petro-Can bill in respect of which we will spend some $500 million and there is the suggestion that it will amount to $1 billion.

At the same time, we have the CBC spending millions of dollars while the Canadian people take issue with its particular interest in sex, violence and vulgarity. In addition, we have many outside consultants in respect of whom the government spends something in the order of $750 million. We also have the OFY and the LIP programs which are supposed to look after our people, at the expense of our senior citizens. Last, but not least, there is the UIC in respect of which we are spending something like $3.5 billion. In the face of all this, the government has the unmitigated gall to come before this House—

Mr. Stollery: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to bring to the attention of the House that on such an important issue as this there are only four or five members of the opposition party present, and there is no one present in the press gallery.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I merely wish to bring to the attention of the hon. member that all that is required in this House is a quorum of 20 members. Those 20 members do not have to be on one side or the other. The Chair does not keep a record of who is or is not here. It is the duty of members to be here at all times, and we operate as if they were all here.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had been in attendance earlier, he would have heard one of his colleagues refer to the same matter. The reason many members of this party are not here is that our caucus is meeting in Halifax to determine policies as alternatives to the rotten policies this country faces under this government.

I understand that the minister wishes this bill to pass today. I have a piece of advice to give him. If he wants it to pass today, he should sit over there, read his mail and be quiet while I make my observations. I mentioned a little earlier the policy of this government in respect of hiring outside consultants and its other policies involving OFY, LIP, unemployment insurance, and so on. Yet it has the unmitigated gall to bring in a bill which excludes widows, widowers, spinsters, bachelors and divorced persons. It would certainly seem to me that this government is mixed up in its priorities.

We will let this bill go through. We certainly shall not vote against it. But we would like to know what are the priorities of this government. We feel this bill is unjust, illogical and discriminatory. It shows that this government has callously forgotten the great contribution our senior citizens have made to the development of this country. The government has forgotten that the need of these people who have been excluded is just as important as the need of others, and should be recognized.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, for about half my life—and I am afraid that is literally true—I have been in the position of having to deal with proposals regarding old age pensions which fail to go far enough but which are steps in the right direction. It has always been my practice to point out the shortcomings and deficiencies, but nevertheless to vote for and give my support to anything that represents progress. That, sir, will be my position again today. I shall in fact be pointing out some of the shortcomings and deficiencies of Bill C-62, but it is a step in the direction I want us to move and I intend to give it my support, and I hope that it will be possible for us to give this bill second reading this afternoon and to refer it to the standing committee where it can be studied carefully.

It was my intention to deal directly with the bill and some of the things that were said about it this morning by the minister. In other words, I did not intend to comment on any speeches that might be made between the time the minister had the floor and the time I got it. I must say, however, that some of the things that were said by my good friend from Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) prompt me to give him two or three minutes.

I happen to agree with him strongly and forcefully that this bill is discriminatory in that it provides pensions for only a limited number of persons between age 60 and age 65. It is discriminatory in that it forgets spinsters, widows, bachelors and widowers. I think anyone who has followed the old age pension debates will confirm that throughout the piece I have argued, not just for the payment of pensions to spouses but for lowering the eligibility age and for making the only test below age 65 whether or not one is in the labour market. I contend, therefore, that I have every right to stand today and complain about this bill.

I find it difficult, however, to sit and listen to the complaints of my friend from Hamilton West in view of the fact that the bill follows exactly the principle his party advocated in the last election campaign.

An hon. Member: Oh, Stanley!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is my name, yes.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We know your name.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have in my hand a copy of a Conservative Party commitment to old age pensioners that has on it the picture of Robert Stanfield—"the one who cares". This particular Conservative Party campaign leaflet from the last election is devoted entirely to what the Conservative Party would do for the pensioners. Listen to this sentence:

> We will ensure that the wife or husband of a pensioner aged 65 or more becomes eligible for the old age security and guaranteed income benefits at 55, if he or she is not employed.

There are two differences between that sentence and the bill now before us. One is that the spouse's pension should begin at 55 instead of 60. The other difference is that the Progressive Conservatives made no reference to marital relations other than those that are strictly legal. But that sentence and the position of the Progressive Conservative Party throughout these discussions has been one that has ignored the spinsters, the widows, the bachelors and the widowers.

The Progressive Conservatives never argued for paying a pension to everyone in the lower age brackets. Their position was that they would pay it to the spouse of a pensioner; in other words, the spouse of one already 65 or over. I point out that earlier in this session, on one or more occasions, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) welcomed the proposal being advanced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and urged the minister to bring it in soon and make it effective earlier. There is such a thing as standing by what you have stood for. The Progressive Conservatives have asked, in principle, for the very thing the minister has brought in today. Why, then, does my friend, the hon. member for Hamilton West, spend half of his speech condemning the very thing in this bill that the Progressive Conservatives have endorsed?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Lest anyone think I did not take the precaution to look up our own election literature to see whether we had made that mistake—I was sure we had not, because I usually have something to say about our pension policy—this is what we said in our election literature for 1974:

> We must... make old age security pensions and Canada Pension Plan benefits available to all who are voluntarily off the labour market after reaching the age of sixty.

We did not limit the pensions we should pay to those below the age of 65 who meet a marriage test. The Progressive Conservatives did, the Liberals do, so why do the two of them have to fight about it? I said I would give my hon.

friend two or three minutes and now I think we had better get back to the bill.

I welcome any progress in the field of old age pensions. As I said earlier, I have been arguing for a long time—about half my life—for improvements of this kind, and I dearly want to see pensions paid to all those who are 60 and are out of the labour market. Therefore, when a bill comes in that pays it to some persons at the age of 60, I will support it. But it is discriminatory along the very lines that the hon. member for Hamilton West has pointed out.

The figures I have been able to collect—perhaps they are subject to correction, but I am sure they are not very far out—are that there are about 770,000 Canadians between the ages of 60 and 65. I understand that this bill will provide pensions to about 85,000 of those 770,000. That leaves 685,000 Canadians between the ages of 60 and 65 who will not qualify under this bill. That includes many single persons, be they spinsters, widows, bachelors, widowers or persons who are divorced, and there is no doubt in the world that many of those single persons, particularly single women, are in greater need than many of those who happen to have spouses. For the government at this time to say no to all of those others is, I think, most unfair.

I do not intend to spend any time on the points raised by my friends to my right about the provisions for spouses' pensions in the case of common law relationships. I am not shocked by this. This kind of provision is in a number of pieces of our legislation. But I do think it is a bit hard to take when a single woman between 60 and 65 cannot have a pension, whereas some other woman who is living common law can have the pension.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish the government would make up its mind what it wants to encourage in terms of marital relations. It goes both ways. Let us take the case where both man and wife are over 65: each of them would get more if they separated, because the total under OAS and GIS for a couple is less than twice that for a single person. So in that area the government is encouraging married couples over 65 to break up so that they get a little more. On the other hand, they are saying to single persons between 60 and 65, "If you want a pension, shack up with somebody over 65 who has a pension".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: Is it worth it? I don't think it would be worth it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Such things from you, Stanley, on a Friday! You will have to move from our street.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The sense of shock being displayed around here is somewhat synthetic. My point is that this is an example of the unfairness of this piece of legislation. I urge very strongly that the government consider more seriously the position of those who are single, whether they be spinsters, widows, bachelors, widowers or divorced persons, and that they should be covered by this legislation. Again I say that in so far as it goes, it is good. For the first time we will be paying pensions under the Old Age Security Act to some persons who are below 65 years of age.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I have been here long enough and I have seen enough progress in old age security legislation to know that it is only a matter of time until 60 will be the pensionable age under both old age security legislation and the Canada Pension Plan. But why do we have to wait for it so long? Why do we have to make so many speeches? Why do we have to have so many elections to get progress in a direction that is clearly one we all want to take? So in the name of the 685,000 Canadians between the ages of 60 and 65 who will not be covered by this bill, I plead that when we get into committee the minister will give serious consideration to improving the bill to cover them all.

I also welcome the references made this morning by my friend, the hon. member for Hamilton West, to the further departure from universality that is involved in this bill. It is not the first departure, as I thought he was suggesting this morning, because the guaranteed income supplement is already a case of non-universality. In this bill we are moving, as I say, into the 60 to 65 area but we are applying, again, a means test—the government calls it an income test—which will mean that many of these people will not get the pension. Indeed, this is going to come as a shock to many couples. The minister can say it is the same income test that applies to two persons both of whom are over 65, but in my view he is wrong there as well. I listened with great interest to the minister's efforts this morning to tell us how great is the history of the Liberal Party in terms of pensions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have lived through most of that history. In fact, my colleagues and I have had a good deal to do with prompting or provoking Liberal governments to move in the direction of better pensions. I notice that the ministers moved rather quickly over the point at which the government, having finally accepted universality, when back to so-called selectivity.

That is another thing that I do not like about this bill; it is that it provides a further move away from the principle of universality. So I call, again, for pensions for all persons who are 60 years of age and not yet 65 who are out of the labour market. I believe in universality; therefore I do not like means tests or income tests, but I understand them. They have been applied to persons over 65. They are applied to persons under the War Veterans Allowance Act. They have been applied under other legislation in the past and they are part of our social fabric.

I understand work tests as well. We had one for a number of years under the Canada Pension Plan and I would be happy to have one that would apply between 60 and 65. But this marriage test is something new in social legislation. One receives the pension not because of age or need but because it can be shown that one is married to someone who is of pensionable age. It is a departure which I think is a mistake.

I know that many people in this House, including many Progressive Conservatives, have called for pensions for spouses for a long time. I think that we have been asking for the right thing in our insistence that it should be a pension based on age, and that in the case of those who are 60 but not yet 65 the only test should be whether they are in the labour market.

While I am on my feet, there are two or three other things I should like to call for with regard to pensions; then I would like to comment on some of the things in the bill other than its main provision for spouses' pensions. On a Friday morning two or three weeks ago I tried to present a motion under Standing Order 43. Oddly enough, it did not receive the necessary unanimous consent. However, I came right out and proposed that it was time to raise the basic old age security pension to $300 a month. I make this plea again this afternoon. Some may think it is a bit high, but I can remember when I was told I was asking too much when I asked for $30 per month.

Mr. Gillies: That was in 1935.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But I suggest that with inflation running as it is, with the principle of universality being still much better than the principle of selectivity, and with all the other increases this House has passed for those on high salaries, this is what we ought to be going for, a pension of $300 per month across the board. Let it take the place of the guaranteed income supplement, and let us achieve some of that equality the Minister of National Health and Welfare talks about in his speeches before various service clubs and some of that equality he talked about in this House when he was presenting Bill C-16.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Some of those $1,900 speeches.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend is referring to the cost of having some of those speeches written. They would be worth that cost if they were implemented into legislation.

Mr. Gillies: Little chance.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend says, "Little chance." I sat in the back row some 30 years ago and called for the pension to be raised to $30 per month, for the means test to be removed and for a lower age, and there were Conservatives sitting behind the curtains saying, "Stanley, you have a good idea but it will never come about." Well, it has come about.

An hon. Member: Who made it happen?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend would like to know who made it happen. He knows the answer. The answer is that our prodding and our provoking caused the Liberals to do it.

Mrs. Campagnolo: It must have been you, Stanley, because there is nobody behind you today. Don't be so modest.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo) is saying something very nice; but these things came about with the backing of my colleagues, my party and the people across the country who believe in this sort of thing.

An hon. Member: Where are your colleagues?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is something else which is not in this bill and which ought to be there. I refer to the escalation formula. The minister hardly ever makes a speech in which he does not boast of the fact that old age security pensions and guaranteed income supplement payments are escalated according to the rise in the cost of living, and that they are now escalated quarterly instead of annually. As I have pointed out times without number, that is an escalation which is always several months behind, so that pensioners never receive the increase when they need it to meet the current increase in the cost of living. In this age of computers and that sort of thing, it would not be impossible to provide escalation on a current basis and I feel very strongly that that should be done.

Something else which is long overdue in the Old Age Security Act has to do with the position of people who come to this country, and Canadians who leave this country and go elsewhere. We have a rather strange rule about old age security. One either receives all of it or none of it. If one is here at age 55 and stays until age 65, one receives all of it; but one might live here from birth until age 55 or 56, go somewhere else and not receive the pension at all. There are problems with regard to people who move from one country to another. It is time there was some kind of formula which would involve reciprocity between this country and others so that wherever people move or live they will receive the best possible pension.

I am not asking for the rules to be changed so that individuals can receive two full pensions from two separate countries. That happens now in some cases. But as opposed to those who manage to obtain full old age security in Canada and full social security in the United States, there are others who get lost between two stools and do not receive either. I mention this because, as the minister knows, I asked him one day in the standing committee whether he would put his high-powered research people to work on this question, and he was happy to tell me that he had already done so and there was some hope that something in this line might be done in this session. He told us the last time this matter came up in committee that it would not be in Bill C-62. I regret that, but I push for proper provisions so that people do not lose their pensions entirely because they came here too late, or do not lose their Canadian pensions because for family, health or other reasons they go somewhere else to live.

I am proud of what we have done with old age security. We have made tremendous improvements. We have taken care of many of these details, but that is no reason for us to stop when, as we move along, we still further improvements we could make.

Mr. Speaker, I said that in addition to the things I wanted to call for today I would like to comment briefly on some of the other things this bill does I welcome the provision in the bill which will allow absence from Canada to be counted as presence here in the case of persons serving in the armed forces, or doing certain other things abroad, when it comes to making up for time they lost in trying to qualify for old age security. This is a matter which has been debated in the House several times, and a private member's resolution by one of the Progressive Conservatives on this matter was passed. It probably does not cover a great many people, but it is an unfairness which is being corrected by this bill and I am glad that is being done.

I am interested in the provision which will make it possible for provincial pension supplements to be included in the federal old age security cheque. In these days, when banks are increasing their charges and charging people every time they write a cheque, make a deposit or walk in or out of the bank, I think it is a good ideal to reduce the number of cheques old age pensioners have to handle, so long as there is no reduction in the total amount. I believe this is an appropriate change. I assume it is up to the provinces whether they include in their agreement with the federal government some arrangement under which the name of the province appears on the cheque as well. I can hardly imagine any province letting Ottawa write the cheque and claim it is a federal cheque without the name of the province appearing there with it. I think this is a commendable move.

It also sets out in this bill that the minister will have the authority to cancel uncollectable debts in those cases where hardship would ensue and where the mistake that was made, whether by the pensioner or the department, was clearly unintentional.

Then I come to what might seem just a clean-up matter in this bill, but it is one thing that I welcome as warmly as I can. It will make no monetary difference at the moment, but in principle it is terribly important. I refer to the fact that the old age security fund is being wiped out and any reference to any special tax, whether direct or by transfer from the Department of National Revenue to the old age security fund, is being done away with. The minister explained in his press release and again this morning that this change is being made because it has become mathematically or administratively impossible to keep up with the changes. In my view, it is more than that.

When we first considered the Old Age Security Act—a committee recommended it in 1950, the bill was brought in in 1951 and it became law on January 1, 1952—when we first brought it in, it was such a far reaching proposal, to pay pensions to everyone aged 70 and over, as was the case then, that in order to sell the idea we had to put on this special tax, and establish a special fund. We had a 2-2-2 tax in those days for the special fund and after a time this tax went up a bit.

What did it mean, Mr. Speaker? If the fund was short, the minister of finance, by law, had to lend money to it so that pensioners could be paid. If the fund was in surplus, we tried to argue that some of the surplus should be used for an increase in pensions but we were told it could not be done and we had to follow the act. It really had no meaning. Those taxes were a regressive form of taxation which meant that the wealthy person paid the same amount as the person who did not earn very much.

We have done away with that and are finalizing it in this bill. We now say that old age pensions are paid in their entirety out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund; in other words, the total cost of old age pensions is coming out of the fund which gets its resources on the basis of ability to pay. This means that those with greater incomes pay more toward old age security than those with little or no income. Although this may seem like a technical or administrative change, it is an important one.

The other day I was reading a book on the history of pensions. I noticed that the author referred to this regressive type of taxation and expressed the hope that some day it would be done away with. It has been done away with in this bill. We are establishing the fact that old age pensions are a matter of right because people who reach pensionable age are part of our society and have played their part in building up the economy. No special tax is necessary, therefore, or no special fund is necessary to operate the whole proposition.

I point out also—and I want to come back and say something about both of these changes—that this bill abolishes the Old Age Assistance Act. It has been dead for a number of years, anyway. This act was introduced in 1951 to provide for pensions between ages 65 and 70 on a means test basis, paid partly by Ottawa and partly by the provinces. That has been replaced by old age security being paid at age 65, so there is no point in keeping that statute on the books any longer.

I hope you will pardon me for going back to what some of us have said in the past, Mr. Speaker, but in 1950 and 1951 we wanted the pension to be paid at age 65 on a universal basis, and we wanted it paid out of consolidated revenue and not on the basis of a special tax. We wanted it to be paid as a matter of right. It has taken us a long time to get that principle through but we are getting there by this bill. I think there is a moral to that. If one can be here for a few years and see that some of the things one has stood and fought for, because they are right, have been accepted, then one can hope that the same thing will happen again.

Just as we wrote our old age security fund into the act to sell the idea of getting it started, I hope that today, when we are putting in pensions at 60 on a limited basis only for spouses, it is just the beginning too. I hope it will not be very long until some of us can stand in this House and say we have won that point as well—that we have pensions across the board at age 60 for all those who are out of the labour market.

I welcome this opportunity to give my support to this bill, Mr. Speaker. I do so without question. I shall be voting for it and in committee I shall be supporting it. I hope we can get it through soon so that the 80,000-odd people who would benefit by it in October will have no doubt about it. However, I hope it has been evident that my greater concern at this time is to point out the things that are yet to be done.

We have come a long way since I stood in my place in the back row and pleaded for the pension to go up to $30 a month and for the means test to be removed. Today we are paying $125 or so across the board to everyone aged 65 or over, we are paying over $200 a month to those individuals who get the full supplement, and we are paying over $400 a month to a couple, both of whom are on the supplement. In some of the provinces the pensions are even higher, but with inflation running as it is and with it being established that our people have not only the right to keep up with the cost of living but to share in the standard of living, and with the increased productivity of our country, I contend the time has come for us to talk in terms of pensions across the board of $300 a month.

To get back to this bill, Mr. Speaker, I also contend that the time has come to pay pensions, not just to spouses between ages 60 and 65 but to all people between ages 60 and 65 provided they meet just one test—that they are out of the labour market. That would cover all the people this bill covers, but it would also cover the spinsters, widows, bachelors and widowers, those who never married or are no longer married. I contend that the complaints that these people will be making in the months and years ahead—I hope it is only months, and not years—will be more than justified.

The hon. member of Hamilton West and one of my friends further down the aisle dealt with this matter in a question the other day and raised one point which I think really brings this bill to the test. Take the case of a woman aged 62 who is married to a man aged 65 or over. They have no income, so they qualify for the double pension. Next year he dies, when she is 63. What happens to the woman then? Is the Government of Canada going to be so inhuman as to take away the pension she was getting?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Under this bill it would.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend is correct; under this bill the government will have to take it away. I suppose it will say it will have to take it away because if it did not, one widow would be getting it while thousands of other widows would not. I submit that test by itself shows that the thinking about this bill has not been adequate and that we need to make real improvements when we get it into committee.

Mr. Speaker, I welcome any bill that moves in the right direction, and this one does. I also welcome the opportunity to argue for further improvements in our old age pension legislation so that we may soon reach the day when our senior citizens have the rights and security to which they are entitled.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I want to take part in this debate on Bill C-62, a bill we had been awaiting impatiently because we had noted that the government—the Liberal party rather—had promised as early as during the last election campaign of 1974 that this legislation would be passed as soon as the Liberal party would be reelected. Well, Mr. Speaker, this legislation will be implemented only a year and a half after the Liberal party's reelection. So, the minister should not be surprised if during its consideration either in committee or on second reading amendments are introduced to implement that election promise made by the Liberal party in 1974.

There is another point that was just raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), namely the case of those people who would momentarily be covered by this bill, that is spouses between the ages of 60 and 65. In the event the older spouse should die—a question raised by my colleague from Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) a few days ago—the younger spouse would automatically be disentitled to his or her pension. That is another subject on which we are considering moving an amendment to improve this bill.

Generally speaking, the principle of the bill is quite acceptable, and I am one of the first to welcome it since as early as 1966 I was I think the first member in the history of Canadian parliamentarism to place a motion on the order paper of this House asking precisely that the spouse receive the pension, no matter what the age.

In every ensuing session I tabled the same motion since I was not entitled to introduce a bill to that effect and I had the opportunity a few times to debate that motion during private members' hour. On every occasion, as strange as it seems, government members always opposed such a move saying that it was nonsense, that it was going to be extremely expensive, that the people of Canada could not afford such a luxury. And still, on the last occasion, March 24, 1975, there was a perceptible change in attitude since at that time the government had already made public its intention of implementing this bill.

Now that this bill is being introduced, Liberal members and the government all agree. And that measure no longer is nonsense, on the contrary it makes sense. Just have a look at the memo or release which was handed to us on June 3, which says that, for instance, this new bill might benefit from 65,000 to 90,000 spouses. You will admit it makes quite a difference whether it is 65,000 or 90,000 spouses. Apparently, the department officials were unable to come up with a more precise figure. And yet, when costs are mentioned, they are said to amount to $100 million. Therefore, whether the number of spouses who will qualify is 65,000 or 90,000, the overall cost will be $100 million.

So I do not quite understand the figures of the minister's officials which leave such a wide gap between the estimate of the number of spouses who might qualify under the new act and the estimate of the costs. I think this calls for some explanation.

Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit Party has long called for improvements to the Old Age Security Act. In his statement this morning, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) said that when only one of the spouses is in receipt of the Old Age Security Pension, they have financial problems, and his attention was drawn many times to that.

And indeed we drew his attention to that problem many times. On December 3, 1974, I once again raised that matter in this House on the occasion of a debate on the business of supply, and I proposed:

That this House regrets that the government neglected to make all those who reached the age of 60, as well as their spouses although such spouses may not have reached pensionable age, eligible for the Old Age Pension.

Once again, the motion was negatived, and even a representative of the Liberal party, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, said:

Mr. Speaker, today I speak on behalf of the government against the motion proposed by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) who has advocated that the old age security pension be given to any person who has reached the age of 60, as well as to the spouse even if the spouse has not reached pensionable age.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is it not a bit strange that hardly a few months ago they would have nothing to do with it, and today they are accepting that proposal. Of course we are extremely pleased that they do. But as I mentioned earlier, even if we have reasons to be satisfied with the principle of that bill, there nevertheless remains some obscure points which will have to be made clearer. The Social Credit Party has long claimed that the Old Age Pension should be granted anyone over 60. When I say anyone, I have reasons to say, as Social Credit and other hon. members in fact did, that the inquiries made with respect to applications of old people respecting their pension should be withheld. I believe that principle should apply to every field, whether social security or other fields of social welfare now available.

When the Guaranteed Income Supplement Act, added to the Old Age Security Act, was discussed in 1966, and I have here the Hansard for December 5, 1966, the then Minister of National Health and Welfare stated the following when introducing the bill, as reported on page 10711:

In some instances the pensioner may wish to revise his initial statement of income because of more detailed information obtained later. If this is done, an adjustment of the supplement will be made to take into account this change. Information supplied on income can be checked against income tax returns and third party information supplied to the Department of National Revenue on T-3, T-4, T-5 and other returns.

That, Mr. Speaker, is all the mystery behind the investigation system imposed upon older citizens applying for the guaranteed income supplement. We all know the difficulties experienced by the aged, especially during the spring when they must file the famous guaranteed income supplement application form. This was especially true last spring, with the total mess of the post office and letters accumulating at the Montreal postal centre. In my constituency, pensioners filled up to three forms that were left about on some counter. Without the competency and good will shown by the Quebec old age security office director, Mr. Turbide, a very understanding gentleman, I believe some of our older citizens would have lost their guaranteed income supplement.

I intervened each time and was so able to have the supplement reinstated at the right level, but at the cost of numerous complications and fears for those concerned, who do not know which way to turn when the time comes to have the supplement accepted.

We can also imagine the number of extra people needed to hold these investigations. If there were no means test, as we have been requesting, all that would be needed is a few people to prepare the application cards for the computer. When a pensioner died, all that would be needed is to take the card away. But with the present system, everything has to be done anew each year, and even a number of times each year as is often the case, in order to check whether a pensioner's revenue status changed.

What is even worse, when a person applies in mid-year, a projected income statement is required. As it is rather difficult to project one's revenues, errors will happen. And the following year, when the exact details are known, errors have to be corrected. The OAS director advises the pensioner that due to his first declaration being inaccurate, an overpayment must be repaid.

To my great pleasure, the minister recognized the big difficulties that exist and will try to eliminate them in the future. I hope I did not mistakenly understand that the provision the minister dealt with will apply not only to the spouse not yet 65 years old, but to any old age security applicant.

Mr. Speaker, if we abolished the present test, we would at the same time free those who apply for the old age security from many worries and headaches.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): We would save $50 million.

Mr. Laprise: As my colleague from Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) says, we could save several million dollars that could be paid to those people.

In the notes we received when the bill was introduced and which accompanied the minister's release, we find a table outlining what the pensioner's spouse would be entitled to. It is said that now, according to the provisions of the act regarding those aged 65, for each dollar, we deduct one dollar from the guaranteed income supplement. We deduct $1 for each $4 of family income, that is 25 per cent. In the case of the spouse of a pensioner aged 65, we shall deduct $3 out of every $4, which represents a 75 per cent reduction. I wonder why there is such a difference. Why should we not grant to the spouse whose age varies between 60 and 64 the same benefits and privileges we have already granted to all those who are 65 years of age and over?

Mr. Speaker, this is also a point about which we shall question the minister when the committee meets to consider this bill. I think this is a situation which is very important and which deserves being fully explored. I leave it to my hon. colleagues to look into the principle of this bill more attentively. There are a great many other issues which may be raised and which I feel the minister has not sufficiently taken in to account. However, it is a great step in the right direction to improve this social legislation.

The minister stated that he is having conversations with the provinces to find ways to help spinsters and bachelors, widows and widowers 60 to 65 years old, people who would not be covered by this legislation. Being aware of the position of a number of provinces, I am quite worried about the outcome. In my opinion, the minister should insist that this legislation universally apply to people who reach age 60, in order to prevent discrimination against those who were not legally married.

Generally speaking, Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied with this bill, because it is a great improvement over the existing legislation. But because we want marked improvements to be made to this bill, we shall certainly propose amendements likely to improve it, either at committee stage or on second reading.

[English]

Mr. Joe Flynn (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to follow the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in the discussion on this important subject. The hon. member has been talking about this subject for many more years than I care to remember, and in fact more than some of us will ever get the chance to remember.

Mr. Paproski: Over 100 years!

Mr. Flynn: His having been able to contribute to this government for over 100 years has certainly enhanced the government's position. Perhaps it is his nurturing and feeding of information that has allowed this government to become far wiser and a far better listener.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Even if you do listen from a helicopter.

Mr. Flynn: With the big blades whirling around, it would be very comfortable. I want to direct some of my remarks to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). I rather empathize with him. He touched on some points which have certainly caused a great deal of concern. It must be remembered that Bill C-62 is the result of an agreement at the federal-provincial level. Out of those meetings have come suggestions for better legislation, certainly for the aged.

The hon. member for Hamilton West said that most of the Conservatives were not here because they were attending caucus. I thought perhaps they were down in Halifax in caucus choosing a leader, and choosing one as capable as the man from Hamilton West could mean an addition to the strength of the party and a great contribution to this country.

● (1500)

The particular point the hon. member for Hamilton West brought out was the fact that this bill does suggest we are only paying attention to the spouses and, of necessity, unmarried spouses. But I do not think that is particularly true. I think we should not fall into that danger. We should remember compassion and the compassion this government has shown all along for those who are in need.

I think the Old Age Security Act, with this income test and allowance, is a guaranteed minimum for the level of income that we want to reach particularly in this group. I might remind the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that if these two people had nothing at all they would start out with $408, and that is considerable, considering that they now have nothing. I think that in this group, and in the group he particularly alluded to, the danger arises in the area of the spinster, the widower, the bachelor, the single person, the lonely person, the person who has nobody to lean on, no crutch, no assistance at all at this age level. The latter, particularly, might become a victim of early retirement, and I think we have to be very careful of the early retirement situation to which this could lead.

Early retirement has a ring to it for hard-working Canadians during moments of heavy job pressure, and it may sound like the promised land. But the visions of pleasant leisure have proven mirages to many people who have had to face the many problems that retirement brings.

One crucial factor which must be taken into account in deciding the lower age of eligibility for government pensions under Old Age Security or the Canada Pension Plan is the effect this may have on the mandatory retirement age in the general work force. Certainly the last lowering of the age from 70 to 65 drastically reduced labour force participation by people over 65 by one third.

When such earlier retirement is voluntary this is one matter, although as will be seen not all who voluntarily retire wish to remain in retirement, especially after a year or two. But when retirement is involuntary, when it becomes automatic at a certain age regardless of a worker's wishes to stay on, then the question becomes more complex. Is it desirable to move toward a lower eligibility age, which may drastically affect the normal retirement age throughout the economy, before the desire for and the capacity to live with early retirement are determined for the working population aged from 55 to 65?

I am reminded that this may come quickly. Today my secretary turned 50 and pretty soon she will be up to that 55 to 60 bracket, and while not being able to wish her a happy birthday from this seat we wish her well and know she will eventually, as the mother of eight, go into retirement, and to a good one. Happily she will know the government is looking after her retirement, and that people like her will be looked after the same way.

It is not inconceivable that employers could use the availability of government pensions to get rid of older workers they feel are redundant or less than fully productive; they could ensure that these people could qualify for the government pension by the simple expedient of removing them from the labour force or by firing them. Yet these men and women may have no wish to leave work at all. Many people do wish to continue working until they are 65, as can be seen in many instances. For example, despite the excellent pension plan available to qualified federal government employees who retire before the age of 65, only about 15 per cent of those eligible exercise their option to do so.

Aside from the effects of early retirement on the workers themselves, there is also the general economic impact to consider. Even if almost all retirements are voluntary, what would happen if due to the impact of lowering the old age security and the Canada Pension Plan eligibility age, a large number of highly skilled and highly productive workers decided to leave their jobs? We must not underestimate our older workers. Less and less work is manual where the premium is on youth and on strength. Speaking of youth, I know of somebody else who is going into retirement tomorrow. When the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemount (Mr. Lachance) goes up to the altar and takes unto himself a bride. I think he is to be congratulated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flynn: More and more, long years of experience and technical training pay extra dividends which cannot easily be replaced. How much poorer the world would be if people like George Bernard Shaw, Albert Einstein or Albert Schweitzer, to say nothing of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, were to have ceased their labours at 60. I do not think he has ceased. I don't know when he is ever going to cease. I think he's going to go on forever.

An hon. Member: Just like Moses.

Mr. Flynn: That's right. I think he could be wound up by the hon. member for Edmonton who could keep him going just by pushing. He is like Moses, he keeps going and adds to our legislation.

An hon. Member: Where was he when the lights went out?

Mr. Flynn: It cannot be determined by any reliable method that younger workers are more productive than older ones even in highly technological enterprises. Mr. Speaker, I think the biggest and most important thing to keep in mind is this Bill C-62 and many of the bills like it in the old age category.

We must be careful and think of the people who are, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, the spinsters, the widows, the widowers, the bachelors, those who are apparently unloved or untouched by the government. We are compassionate, and in the ruling as made by this bill to change the provision for spouses we show compassion in a big way. I hope the government goes on with its leadership for a long time and allows people to live a decent, honourable, and capable life within this community.

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): It is a pleasure to speak on this bill today, Mr. Speaker, and to do so with the understanding that the bill will receive fairly speedy second reading.

I listened to the remarks of the speakers who preceded me with interest. I must pay tribute to the honourable and venerable member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for his unremitting efforts on behalf of the pensioners of Canada. I have yet to hear a bill introduced into this House which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has spoken to without getting on to pensions sooner or later. It is a remarkable feat of parliamentary magic. No matter what the subject is, the hon. member can introduce the topic of pensions and speak of the plight of pensioners. To my unending surprise and pleasure he was able to speak on pensions during the debate on national defence.

An hon. Member: When you have been here 80 years you will be able to do the same thing.

● (1510)

Mr. McKinnon: It is a remarkable attribute and I intend it as a compliment to him. I assure him, coming from the retirement centre of Canada as I do, that he is held in high regard among the pensioners of Canada as well as by myself. This does not prevent me from pointing out that the hon. member, in his remarks this afternoon, seemed to me to be a little unfair when he likened the position of the Conservative Party to the position of the Liberal Party.

[Mr. Flynn.]

We in the Conservative Party consider this a bit of an insult.

I bear in mind that there was a minority government situation in 1972. Having fought in that campaign, I heard a great deal about the position of the NDP on old age pensions. They campaigned on a basic pension of $150. This substantial raise would, they insisted, be one of the first terms for their support of the Liberal Party in a minority goverment position, yet they caved in far too easily when there was a relatively miserly raise of $12, bringing the pension up to $100.

I remember sitting in the House the night when the budget came in. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had been insisting on the $150 figure; I thought it would be about $130; and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) announced $100. I turned to my seatmate and said, "That's the end of this parliament; the NDP would never support such a miserly raise". But they swallowed their protestations and principles and voted with the Liberal Party on that occasion. I am only saying this because of what the hon. member said about the Liberals and the Conservatives.

I should like to take a look for a little while at the bill which is before us. I know that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) is noted for having speechwriters, but I think he should let his speechwriters write the bills, and have the people who write the bills write his speeches, or at least try to do something different so that the two can agree.

Mr. Paproski: A $300 speech of a $600 speech?

Mr. McKinnon: I thought that today's was a $700 or $800 speech. I thought it was one of the better ones his writers had provided him with, and I hope I do not create any dissension among his speechwriters if I suggest that he should go up to $700 or $800 for that one. This bill appears to me to be partly written by speechwriters. As for the other part, it looks as if he has given a different page to each section of his department and said, "Write the page and pay no attention to what the other pages say; we will put it together and throw it in front of parliament".

This bill is one of the most confusing and contradictory pieces of paper ever put in front of us, and perhaps I can point to some of the contradictions.

The definition of a spouse is the first thing that creates concern and puzzlement. The first page clearly defines the meaning of "spouse". It says:

> "spouse" in relation to a pensioner includes a person of the opposite sex who has lived with the pensioner for three or more years where there is a bar to their marriage or at least one year where there is no such bar and the pensioner and that person have publicly represented themselves as man and wife;

That sounds quite simple, except for the fact that one of the minister's speechwriters put out a news release the same day saying that persons applying for the guaranteed income supplement and spouse's allowance for the first time will be required to submit a certificate of marriage. There is no way on earth that you can have both of those things, and I say that a bill of parliament should take precedence over the minister's press release. So when we come to consider the meaning of "spouse" we will take it that it means what the bill says it means, not what his hired speechwriters and pressmen say.

Page three of the bill talks of separation. This is part of my general complaint about the bill—it is such a mean bill. It is a mean, small-minded bill that goes out of its way to see where it can cut people out. Under the side-note "Eligible spouse of pensioner" the bill provides:

For the purposes of this Part, a spouse of a pensioner is an eligible spouse if the spouse

(a) is not separated from the pensioner;

What makes the minister think that a person will not need an allowance if they are separated from their partner? It is obvious that they will need money more than if they were both living together. Perhaps the minister is trying to keep families together and is saying they will suffer a financial loss if they separate. I believe that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was on the right wicket when he said that the government has no business in the bedrooms of the nation. Yet here is the minister insisting that in order to retain their allowance they must continue to live together even if there are several reasons why they should not.

Clause 5 has an explanatory note, and there we find a definition that is different from the definition of "spouse". This note reads:

The purpose of this amendment is to provide after September 1975 for the payment of spouse's allowances to persons 60 to 64 inclusive who are married to and living with pensioners.

The phrase used there is "married to", yet according to the definition of "spouse" they do not have to be married. In fact it is clearly spelt out how they are to be treated if they are not married.

On page four of the bill there is a residence requirement. While I am pleased about some of the things said about residence requirements in the speech of the minister, quite a bit of this is due to the prodding and the unbelievable success of the Conservative member for Okanagan-Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) in getting a resolution through this House providing that service in the armed forces of Canada overseas would be counted as residence in Canada. The bill provides that a person is eligible if he——has resided in Canada after attaining eighteen years of age and prior to the day on which the application is approved for an aggregate period of at least forty years.

In other words, a person who is 18 has to reside in Canada another 40 years, which takes him to the age of 58, allowing him only two years out of Canada. That is very little time, and I suggest many of us spend two years out of Canada on holidays during a lifetime.

The minister listed several exempted categories this morning, including servicemen and people in government service. But there was one category he missed, and I hope it is an omission that can be corrected in committee. I refer to students. Students often spend two years outside Canada. If they are 18 and they go to a post-graduate school in the United States or elswhere for three years, when they reach 60 they will discover they do not qualify because they will not have an aggregate period in Canada of 40 years. I think the minister should exempt students along with the others he mentioned.

The bill also provides that there must be a joint application for a spouse's allowance. It is not every couple that will sign a joint application, and I fail to see why there must be a joint application. The assumption is that the couple are getting along well together and are not on opposite sides of the house refraining from co-habitation. It seems to me that this is an invitation to a pensioner to withhold the allowance from his spouse if he feels mean enough.

There is a provision on page 5 that hits widows above all others. I refer to the cessation of allowance provision. This applies to those who cease to be a spouse or an eligible spouse. Most speakers today have mentioned the case of the woman of 62 who has a husband who is 66, each of whom draws half of the pension. Then the husband dies, and suddenly all of the pension ceases and the widow is left destitute. This seems to me to be about as mean as you can get with government money, particularly when spent the way this government spends it.

Then on page six of the bill provision is made for a means test. Speaking for myself, I am one of those who have never believed that a means test is necessary. It is a disincentive to people to prepare for their old age. It is a disincentive to save. It is also a disincentive for those who are in a pension plan. I suggest it only exaggerates the current problem.

If a couple are in middle age, 45 and 40, and they look forward to the day when they will be 65 and 60, at the present time they will get $400 a month, or a little more, if they arrive at those ages penniless, having made no preparation for their retirement. If these people have prepared for their old age they will receive from the government $100 a month, or one-quarter of the money they would otherwise receive. They will be making a sacrifice if they prepare for old age to the extent of taking out a private pension plan, or buying into a deferred payment plan or a registered retirement saving's plan, or if they should belong to a union. They can look at the pension and say that the first $300 will be funny money and will not be of any use to them. They can say that if they did not have it they would receive it from the government.

The worker can say that the first $300 of a pension plan is not worth anything to him and that the plan should start above that point so that it would be a good pension. I think we will end up with more people taking the view that it would be stupid to arrive at retirement age with any income, because otherwise they would receive $400 a month. I think this is bad for the country especially at a time when it is hoped that we can buy back our own industry from a foreign country.

There is one final point I should like to make concerning the cancellation of the Old Age Assistance Act which is being repealed by this legislation. This concerns me. I am not a lawyer, but I notice that in the original Old Age Assistance Act it states that payments to a province pursuant to this section—referring to Section 3—shall be made only in respect of a recipient who fulfils certain conditions.

Section 3(2)(c) of the Old Age Assistance Act refers to an unmarried person whose income, inclusive of assistance, is not more than $1,260 a year. If the Old Age Assistance Act is cancelled it seems to me this would mean we would be taking away the rights with regard to unmarried persons. Since this bill does not refer to unmarried persons it would seem that some people will lose out.

Section 7 of the Old Age Assistance Act states that in every agreement the province shall, subject to section 3, specify the minimum age of a recipient and any other conditions of eligibility set forth in the provincial law. I should like to give credit to the government of the province of British Columbia for its thinking in this regard. It has specified the minimum age of a recipient at below age 65. It would seem to me that by cancelling the Old Age Assistance Act we may be cancelling the provision which enables the provinces to pay pensions to people under age 65 and have the federal government share in this.

I hope that this matter will be discussed in the committee so that I may be reassured no harm will be done by the cancellation of the Old Age Assistance Act. I am more reassured when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) tells me that it will not hurt anyone than I am by the press releases of the federal government at this time.

I shall not take any more of the time of the House because I realize other members wish to speak. I, like others who have spoken, will support this bill because it covers 80,000 people in need. I think the faults in the bill are obvious to all members. A re-writing of the bill would seem to be necessary. We will support the bill at this stage in the hope that it will come back from the committee in an improved state.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to take part in this debate. I share the sentiments expressed by my colleagues on this side of the House, with which I know the minister agrees, that this matter should proceed today to the appropriate standing committee so that it might be dealt with as expeditiously as possible.

I listened with great interest, if I may say so, to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Quite frankly I felt a little badly that he, particularly in the context of this type of legislation, should have been pilloried for being the only member of his party present in the House. I thought that was most unfair, particularly by reason of the fact that most of the members who were doing the pilloring know that he is better than any five of them put together when it comes to the matter of pensions and in terms of his contribution to this House. This does not take away in any way from those who chose to castigate him and his party because he was the only person here; it is merely putting them in their proper place and order in the scheme of things.

I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has a reputation in Canada for being one of the advocates of justice for senior citizens and for the disadvantaged. I think it is a reputation many members in this House would like to have at the end of their parliamentary career. Notwithstanding the fact that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is a recipient of old age security he is one of the more youthful members of this House, and is perhaps only half way through his parliamentary career.

[Mr. McKinnon.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am just getting started.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am glad the hon. member said that because I wish to read a poem which I think might be of interest this afternoon, and which may apply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre at some time, but certainly not today.

A man isn't old when his hair turns grey;
Nor yet is he old when his teeth decay;
But he's heading fast for his last long sleep,
When his mind makes appointments that his body can't keep.

I do not know in what category of that poem the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre might fall, but he is a man who has brought great distinction to this House. I believe he has fought the case as hard as anyone in this country for senior citizens and pensioners of all kinds. I am glad he has had the advantage of reading the literature produced by the Progressive Conservative party during the last election, because there was in that literature a commitment to something that goes far beyond this particular legislation. I am glad he has said he supports advances in pension legislation.

I am sure we all agree that parliaments must deal with the pieces of legislation they have before them. This is an inadequate piece of legislation for many Canadians. It discriminates, as many members have said, against the large group of Canadians who perhaps finds themselves, in terms of their ability to make a place for themselves in the work force, in a worse position than others. However, that is the extent of the government's commitment with regard to old age security at this time. I do not know how else to measure the commitment of a government than by looking at the legislation that is brought before us. If this is the extent, and I think it is at this time, of the government's commitment, then I think it is inadequate.

Although we intend to support the legislation on the same basis as does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that is, on the basis that it is a small step forward, we cannot support it without bringing forth questions—it would be dishonest for us to merely say, yes, we support the bill—in terms of that group of people in Canada whom the bill does not affect, such as single women, widows, widowers, bachelors and divorced persons. I know there are federal-provincial problems. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) said that applying the provisions of this legislation to the above mentioned group of people is a long way away, if it is to come at all.

The liberal government has the habit of trotting out some things on a four year basis in terms of advance notice. I do not know why they do that, and the beauty of this Friday afternoon does not allow me to be cynical, but the fact of the matter is that this legislation is only worthy of support to the extent that it goes. It should not be built into something that it is not, and I hope that if necessity speeded us into an election perhaps we could find ourselves dealing with those categories of people who have been left out from this legislation.

The other matter dealt with by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in terms of the literature to which he referred for our edification, and I am glad he did, was that the Liberal party's commitment on July 8, 1974, only dealt with married people. That is quite so, it did. What concerns me about this legislation is not so much the relationships that it envisages—and I am sure the committee will unscramble anything that has to be unscrambled—as the fact that it is given predominance in the legislation ahead of a group of people who, in terms of our economic life today, need some protection within the context of this bill, however limited it may be. I am referring to married couples who depend upon this type of payment for their existence.

If a priority is established, then it should be in favour of married couples because it was in that sense that the piece of literature with which we dealt at some length was phrased. Married couples should receive first priority within the context of this legislation, and they should not be sacrificed for others who might be qualified on a different basis.

Now I want to deal with one matter which, I am happy to say, is dealt with in the bill. It has to do with financial errors. I have written to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) on many occasions regarding problems of overpayment of pensions. I must say to the minister that he has always been very prompt in dealing with the correspondence I have sent to him, and I am sure that is generally the way he has dealt with correspondence from all members of parliament. Perhaps some of his colleagues in cabinet could emulate this. There is an immediate acknowledgement from the minister of letters sent to him, and there is always a follow up. I do not want that practice to change because I mention this today, but he is the one minister for whom it is not necessary to mark one's files to remind the minister to answer. I do not want his head to blow up so much that he will have difficulty getting into the lobby, but that is a statement of fact.

The unfortunate thing about this particular error which this bill is meant to catch, that is, financial error and the necessity of paying back, is that the necessity in law is there. There is absolutely nothing the minister can do in terms of his discretion to assist old age pensioners who find themselves in that position. His answer has always had to be that he is sorry, it was an error, and he apologizes. He can make all the excuses and protestations he wants, but whatever is the computer they use that made the mistake, older people do not necessarily take advantage of that kind of error, and there is nothing the minister can do about it. I have had this experience many times, and I understand that that is the reason for this provision in the bill.

I think it is a very important clause because it allows, in case of senior citizens, that special group of people who in terms of opportunities for advancement might be called disadvantaged, for an exercise of discretion such as other ministers, notably the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), have exercised with respect to ministerial permits in proper cases, and there is a question as to how it operates. I am not suggesting that the minister should be forgiven for errors which cause inconvenience, but I am suggesting that this is a very good provision for which the minister should be commended.

Our party's policy with regard to senior citizens is much more far reaching than is the government's, and it has been for some period of time. It is an expression of our concern for a group of Canadians who fall within a special category, not only because of the difficulties which they experience in the work force and in remaining in the work force in a society which puts increasing emphasis on youth, but because most senior citizens have made a significant contribution to the well-being of the community. They have laid the foundation upon which we advance. For that reason alone I think they are entitled to our consideration.

It is also important that we look at the needs and requirements of senior citizens from another point of view, the need which they have in their particular circumstances to care for themselves in terms of housing, food, and health services, all of which are very important components of the cost price index in this country. It is a fact which I do not think anyone will dispute, that senior citizens spend a larger proportion of their income on these necessities than do other citizens, and it is important therefore that we never lose sight of the necessity for constantly updating and reviewing the amounts of money we are prepared to pay as citizens in a progressive society toward their well-being.

It is important also that we take a look at the cost price index to see whether it is the proper index upon which to gauge their needs and requirements. Some people have spoken of an old persons' index or the index of the disadvantaged, in search of phrases that would be weighted in favour of senior citizens who might find themselves in need, because it is a fact that senior citizens have different needs and expenses than does the average Canadian family of four and, as a result, new measurements must be devised to meet these unique needs.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the other day called for a basic old age pension of $300, and he referred to it again today. I really do not know whether or not the country can afford that, but I believe that whether the figure is $300 or any other figure, a country with our riches in terms of our resources, our gross national product and the opportunities which we are able to give to our young people, and to other people who do not have the disadvantages of senior citizens, should not lose sight of what is in the spirit of the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

● (1540)

I believe that senior citizens have to be treated as a special case. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has made a life's work of treating senior citizens' pensions, superannuations and other pensions as special cases. I do not really believe we have tapped the possibilities with respect to aid, not only in terms of monthly cheques, but aid in terms of the provision of adequate housing, in terms of provision of adequate services for those who, perhaps through age, cannot get around as well as they might. There was an instance of this in Ottawa-Carleton not too long ago. I think these have to be considered in a special category.

When I think of the amounts of money the government has been prepared to spend in certain areas and when I think of the fact that since 1961 the total cost of operating the Privy Council office and the office of the Prime Minister has increased by 1,148 per cent for a total increase of $5,901,000, then I think the government must give more than lip service to the contention that it is its duty to protect the disavantaged in terms of present benefits.

When I hear that the government is prepared to spend $821 million on professional consultant services—that is over and above the very capable public service of this country—and those services have increased 509.1 per cent since 1961—when I hear of that kind of extravangance I am not one of those who believe that we are incapable of providing for our senior citizens a continually increasing adequate income. If we are not prepared to take the steps which are necessary to fight inflation, or in the alternative if we cannot, which seems to be the argument of the government, then the government must recognize its duty to protect these people.

When the present benefits are related to skyrocketing inflation in terms of necessities of life and how those necessities relate to senior citizens as a particular group, I think those figures themselves speak for the necessity, not just for this legislation, but for ending the discrimination which is apparent in the absence of those provisions for other single people—the single woman, the widow, the widower, the bachelor, or the divorced person.

This discrimination cries out for action, and it is in that sense that I think this legislation is inadequate. Let us make no mistake about it. Let us not beat our chests with pride over this legislation. Let us not have the minister put his elbow out of joint from patting himself on the back over this piece of legislation, because in terms of the problem we have really not yet begun, and I do not want to gainsay in any way the efforts of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I believe that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been in the forefront of this fight. If the government has copied what he has proposed, then as a plagiarist I think it has done a reasonable job. I do want to gainsay that, but I am satisfied that all of the good will toward senior citizens does not rest in the bosom of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. There are many of us on all sides of the House who feel very strongly about this subject. Many of us today feel just a little twinge of guilt when we compare the magnitude of the problem with the relative poverty of the answer in terms of this legislation.

I understand that another hon. member wishes to speak, and I will relinquish the floor. Others have said that we in this party intend to support this legislation. We wish to see it go through today, but I will end by saying that in this particular area our work in this House has really only just begun.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Claude Tessier (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to take part in this debate, which in my view must rather be a consensus, because there can be nothing but agreement on the objective. This bill is an invitation to make a concrete step to improve the situation of older citizens. It involves a positive gesture, keeping in mind that there is no perfect solution. What is involved here is the meeting of real and effective needs, through a fair transfer.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

We, on the government side, recognize and emphasize that this bill aims at a more adequate treatment, although not perfect. Mr. Speaker, we are much the more pleased that this concern, on the government's part, was one of the objectives set during the last election. We are happy that it can be achieved.

We share real concern on this matter. This is not only an abstract concern, but a deliberate attempt to achieve positive results. We wish to repeat that we are just as much pleased as opposition members with this concensus, if not on the wording or means, at least as a cooperative effort at achieving the aim within the overhall economic situation. In so doing we show consideration for our elders and their vital needs, not being content with what has been done but attempting to do more if a majority so decides.

This is no election time politicking, this is recognizing our obligation to give our older citizens a practical answer to their effective problems.

As a politician concerned with the welfare of all my constituents, I have had an interest in the aged since I headed a home for elder citizens. I also animated Golden Age Clubs. I recognize that elder citizens have special needs, and I cannot accept that they should not have their share. I am inclined to support the minister without reservation on this legislation, no doubt because it incorporates in law the principle of a pension for every person. This in my view is correcting a discrepancy concerning couples in need. In addition to support for the bill, I extend my appreciation to the minister and the government because I regard this as an invitation to make further steps, keeping in sight at all times a constant priority which we should try never to forget.

We must also consider the ability to pay, in other words to redistribute while taking into account the fact that this fight is not and will never be over and that we must have the courage and the ability to fight it when the time comes.

In answer to my colleague from Abitibi (Mr. Laprise), I would say that I consider that government members are and have always been in favour of such a measure. However, we have had to wait for the right moment to give priority to this concern, and that is a matter of choice and timing. However, we must be sufficiently realistic and honest to understand this and to act accordingly, and also to speak and to listen accordingly. To say this is to be realistic and to take into account the social and economic reality. This is also a challenge to our senior citizens, not to fight and to protest noisily, since there are always too many who do so, but to continue to tell us about their needs in a way that I wish to be energetic and effective, but without losing their serenity and sense of measure.

I would like to speak on behalf of our senior citizens living in sparsely populated areas, which are often forgotten in the total context of our economic reality. Indeed, legislation is too often based on a universal concept, but in the case of Bill C-62, real and special needs are considered, and we may start to hope that our needs will be taken into account.

Finally, Bill C-62 provides some authority for the minister. This gives me an opportunity as a new member of Parliament to invite the House to go further and have more confidence in the government. In my opinion, this would add to our seriousness and our effectiveness. I am astounded that some of us act as defenders of our institutions, of the authority of these institutions, and respect nothing when speaking. I am also surprised that the legislation must be such that the statesmen, the representatives of the people, have to sacrifice all their authority in favour of overly powerful public servants. Afterwards, this situation is deplored. We must wonder about this and confirm the credibility of statesmen, their ability to administer and take into account the real needs and the talents of the established authority, as well as their authority and ability to make decisions, and finally, we must confirm the initiative of able individuals, which is too often destroyed by bureaucracy.

And here, I wish to call on all members of the House to regain the required effectiveness of our problem-solving capacity. The question that I ask myself is this: Can we serve Canadians, are we representatives? If so, whom do we represent? Is it possible to represent them? Our people have needs and, because of Bill C-62, I have the impression not only of being aware of the needs of a certain number of voters, but of giving them a completely practical answer. And I know that members on this side of the House share this feeling and wish to proceed by stages while taking into account the whole political, economic and social reality.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. Is the hon. minister rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions among the various parties in the House. I should like to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in particular for his kindness in agreeing to give up some of his time this afternoon so that we can conclude this debate today. If there is unanimous agreement among the parties I would certainly appreciate it if we could conclude debate today. Once more I should like to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there is certainly no doubt about our position. If it is necessary, we concur in that. I should like to know if it is agreed—and I address this question to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) through you, Mr. Speaker—that we should also proceed with that other piece of legislation, the Petroleum Administration Act, which is to come from the Senate. Is that part of the understanding?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It has already been made clear that I am prepared to surrender the time that was to have been spent on my private member's bill, C-249, for the purpose of finishing Bill C-62.

With respect to the other question, the answer is a conditional kind of yes. I have sent a message to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) and provided he gets here while the Senate amendments to Bill C-32 are under discussion, that will be satisfactory. It is not far from his office and I expect him momentarily. At any rate I am prepared to give whatever part of the private members' hour is necessary for either or both of these pieces of legislation to be passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The House has heard the suggestion of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge, it is the second time such a situation occurs in the House on a Friday afternoon. In other circumstances, your humble servant was the one who agreed to yield his time on private members' business to allow the passing of important legislation.

I therefore congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for having enabled the hon. member for Bellechasse to express a few ideas in the course of the consideration of that important bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are very kind.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Thank you very much. I gave the minister my word I would be brief, however, I want to discuss seriously the principle of the bill which I consider as very important. In fact we know some aspects of the bill are excellent while others are not so good.

To follow on the remarks of the previous speaker, I would say, about the officials who draft bills, that they are extraordinarily talented. They manage to put in bills some very good provisions and slip among them not so good ones. So we find ourselves in a difficult situation. If we want to discard the not so good we must discard the good ones. If we accept the good ones we must take the others.

It is for that reason that I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to kindly agree to bring in amendments when this bill is considered in committee, particularly with respect to the term "spouse". What does that mean? I quote from the definition of the bill:

> "spouse" in relation to a pensioner includes a person of the opposite sex who has lived with the pensioner for three or more years where there is a bar to their marriage or at least one year where there is no such bar and the pensioner and that person have publicly—

—publicly, how many times, that we do not know—

> —represented themselves as man and wife;

Mr. Speaker, I find it quite extraordinary that a serious legislation should sanction for all practical purposes the community life of a man and a woman and should determine that they become spouses without being married. I find that terrible. I think it is a very serious hitch when one considers what the family and family rights must be. I think it is a very bad example to give young people. We meet young people, I have lots of them, and I know what they talk about. When you listen to them, when you talk with them, when you touch on the question of family life, marriage, they are somewhat reluctant, and for all sorts of reasons. Yet, when they look at what we do, you cannot blame them because we are adults, responsible people, and we are now by every kind of legislation, and this bill is one of them—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I regret to interrupt the hon. member's excellent speech but wish to announce, that there have been discussions about the disposition of two items, Bill C-62, which we are now debating on second reading, and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-32. I understand that there will be little debate, if any, on the motion to concur. I wonder if the hon. member would agree to postponing the rest of his speech until after we dispose of concurrence in the amendments to Bill C-32. I should explain to my hon. friend that some members of the party opposite want to be present when that item is disposed of, and they must leave soon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The President of the Privy Council seeks agreement to postpone debate on Bill C-62 and to proceed with concurrence to amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-32. Does the House agree to this?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING THE ADMINISTRATION OF INTERPROVINCIAL, EXPORT AND IMPORT TRADE IN PETROLEUM AND PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for their courtesy in dealing with this matter. The House is considering concurrence in a number of amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-32, and I am pleased to speak to that motion.

Nine amendments were made in the other place to the bill as passed by this House. Of these, seven were proposed by the government in committee and, of these seven, six were purely technical in nature, directed to the correction of inconsistencies between the English text of the bill and the French text. Since both texts are authoritative it is of course imperative that any discrepancies be removed.

The remaining government amendment, which introduced a new clause 95(2), was intended to remove a possible administrative difficulty. The substance of Part III of the bill depends on the prescription of prices by the governor in council pursuant to either clause 51(1) or clause 52(1). Clause 51, as hon. members will recall, deals with the situation in which there has been agreement between a producer province and the minister, pursuant to which the governor in council may by regulation prescribe certain prices.

Clause 52(1), on the other hand, deals with the situation in which no such agreement has been entered into, or such an agreement has for one reason or another, as set out in section 52(1), become ineffective. In such circumstances the governor in council may unilaterally prescribe prices. Again, as hon. members will recall, an amendment was made to section 52 when the bill was before the House, as a result of which there will be an opportunity for debate in this House if the section is proclaimed.

Dependent on these two subclauses is a series of clauses, 53 to 65 inclusive, which are administrative in nature. The effect of the new clause 95(2) is to ensure that the administrative clauses do not come into effect immediately the bill becomes law, thus preceding the substantive implementation of clause 51(1) or clause 52(1). The wording of the new clause 95(2) states in effect that until the governor in council acquires power in section 51(1) or 52(1) to prescribe prices, sections 53 to 65 do not come into force.

Just prior to consideration of this bill in committee of the other place, one of the major natural gas companies, TransCanada Pipe Lines, made representations to the effect that they foresaw some difficulties with respect to clauses 53 and 64. These were reviewed in committee, referred for discussion between officials of the company and officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, and re-submitted to committee after a text had been agreed and had received the drafting approval of the Department of Justice. The amendment to clause 53 relieves the natural gas companies of a possible conflict between certain commercial obligations on the one hand and compliance with the bill on the other hand.

Clauses 53(1)(a) and 53(1)(b) as the bill was passed by this House prohibited the movement and acquisition of gas from within a producer province for consumption outside that province unless the price paid for the gas is approved by the National Energy Board. There was no corresponding prohibition on the other side of the transaction, namely, the sale. The company therefore saw a risk that it might be contractually bound to buy gas at a price not approved by the board and yet be legally prohibited by the bill from moving it out of the province. The gist of their proposal, therefore, was that there be a prohibition on the sale of gas, except at a price approved by the National Energy Board. This would remove the possible conflict between their obligations under contract and under the bill. In this context I should perhaps remind hon. members that Part III deals only with gas in interprovincial and international trade and not transactions wholly within the province of production.

The amendment proposed by TransCanada Pipe Lines to clause 64 was to remove what it perceived as an uncertainty as to the determination of "cost of service" or "purchasers' cost" pursuant to clauses 64(1) or 64(2) respectively. The amendment provides that in determining cost of service for the purposes of clauses 64(1) or purchasers' cost for clause 64(2), the board will apply the same principles as it would use under Part IV of the National Energy Board Act. The effect of this is to ensure that gas pipeline companies do not find themselves operating under rules which might be mutually inconsistent. All of the amendments were discussed in committee of the other place, and evidence was given, in answer to questioning, by officers of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, and by senior officials of TransCanada Pipe Lines.

The amendments to which I have just referred in some detail are, it is self-evident, highly technical in nature but, as I have said, they have been closely examined by technical experts before being submitted formally to the committee of the other place. With this explanation, I hope that the House will give its concurrence to the amendments to the bill which were made in the other place.

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the parliamentary secretary who has just spoken on the motion for concurrence for giving us all the information available to him. We concur in the amendments because they are, as he said, mostly technical.

I take this opportunity to say that we still think, and our agreement to concur in the amendments does not alter our position, that there are many better ways of resolving the difficulties of pricing in this country than those set out in this piece of legislation which may involve us in conflict of principle and constitutional difficulties. We, in my party, think that this matter could have been handled much more effectively if it had been done differently. We make no apology for the time and the energy that have been put into trying to improve the legislation. We are only sorry it could not have been improved more.

● (1610)

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will not delay the House very long. I just want to add to the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). I strongly agree with his views that we were acting most responsibly. Any extended time we took to analyse this bill was because of its possible repercussions.

It strikes me as passing strange and, indeed, a bit of an irony that after being accused by members opposite on a number of occasions, and having their minions placed in the press accusing the opposition of being irresponsible in delaying the passage of legislation through the House, the Petroleum Administration Act is proof positive that an overhaul of the rules is needed.

As a result of these nine amendments to the bill we may be open to the charge of irresponsibility, not irresponsibility for excessively close examination of the bill but for not examining it further. This demonstrates that far from taking too long to examine this bill at second reading in committee stage, we should have taken a longer time. We should have demanded of the minister that he assure us of the legality of each clause. I think it is a bit of an irony.

If there is sloppiness and tardiness, and if legislation that passes through this House is imperfect, I hope that those who are so quick to blame the opposition for everything that is wrong in the country might re-examine the procedures used by the government.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the members of the New Democratic Party concur in the amendments which have been proposed by the other place.

Mr. Gillies: Even Stanley?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): These are mainly technical amendments which clear up a number of anomalies. They will help to improve the legislation.

I cannot agree with those who think there could have been some other way to deal with the problem which confronted the country. The New Democratic Party has taken the position from the beginning that unless some agreement could be reached with reference to pricing of oil and gas, the federal government must have the authority to safeguard the interests of the country and to do some economic planning with regard to the price of the very important energy resources dealt with in this legislation. That is not to say we are fully in accord with the treatment of the producing provinces.

We have been most critical, and continue to be critical of the fact that after the producing provinces had agreed to take lower prices, they were confronted with provisions in the budgets of May 6 and November 18 of last year which took away from the provinces some of the benefits they were to receive for agreeing to accept a lower price for their products. I think that has created a good deal of bad feeling.

I agree with the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) that the opposition parties were justified in taking adequate time to examine this legislation. While we in this party supported this legislation, we have not supported the way in which the government has treated the producing provinces. However, that is not covered by this bill. It does not come under the purview of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald). It is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the government.

When I consider, for example, that provinces agreed to put extra revenue into a fund for the exploration of oil and gas on the understanding that this would not be taken into consideration when determining the amount they would receive from the tax-sharing program, and then found to their consternation that one third of the revenue was going to be taken into consideration when determining the payments under the tax-sharing program, I think that was a betrayal of a commitment. The provinces found to their consternation, and the oil and gas industry found to their dismay that the moneys paid to a provincial government by way of royalties were not to be allowed as deductible when paying their income tax. This has taken away much of the quid pro quo which the provinces thought they were getting when they agreed to a domestic price which was considerably lower than the international price.

There is not much value in going over this again. However, I think it is worthwhile for the government to remember that this legislation, which gives it very considerable power, ought to be used with discretion, keeping in mind that the provinces have co-operated, and co-operated very well. I hope when the government is preparing its budget for June 23, it will keep that in mind, and try to show the same consideration and extend the same good will to the provinces which the provinces have extended to it.

I am very glad to see this legislation now in its final stages. I hope that as a result we will be able to deal more adequately with the problems of oil and gas as they affect the people of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR PAYMENT OF SPOUSE'S ALLOWANCE TO PERSONS SIXTY TO SIXTY-FOUR

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-62, to amend the Old Age Security Act, to repeal the Old Age Assistance Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, every day in the House should be a Friday. A lot of work would be done in much less time, and that would be very nice.

As I was saying quite seriously a while ago, young people look at what we do, observe us, remember what we say and act accordingly. One only has to listen to their arguments here and there after meeting or any occasion to be convinced that they have ideas fully in line with the legislation passed in the House of Commons or provincial legislatures about family privileges and rights. It is for that reason that they often say it is much more advantageous for them to live together without being married. It is not to the advantage of a society to have laws that promote such situations. I think that if we are not careful, if we do not take care right now to try and improve our way of thinking, our way of legislating, very difficult situations will result in our society because the family is the basis of society. The family is the measure of society.

If we want to have a sound society, a united society, a strong society, we must absolutely preserve those small societies—families—in strong and united circumstances. Why not, if we recognize as a spouse someone who lives with another person, even if the law says that it will be recognized after three years. God knows that in our society there will be hundreds of cases like that and it will be difficult to find ways of meeting the requirements of the act. I think this will again be an underjob and we will create situations as we find in social welfare.

I think all hon. members agree to remember that in certain cases some people reasoned this way: I am unemployed, my wife works, but the income is not adequate to meet the needs of the whole family. I am willing to work, but I can't find a job. I am 55, 60 or 58 years old. So they are told: "Go to the welfare office. There is a law specifically designed for you". But they answer: "Well, I saw the welfare people, but they said: We cannot help you, your wife is on the work force. We cannot help you unless you live away from home. Go and live elsewhere and we shall help you". I would hate to see such situations officially recognized under a federal legislation.

I think we should consider very closely the clause of the bill dealing with the spouse and try to improve it, so that it will give greater recognition to family rights and promote stronger family ties. If the pension and supplement are granted to people who live together without being married, why should it not be granted also to widows and widowers who have not remarried, or to bachelors who are not married either; they are entitled to live elsewhere, so why should they not qualify for it too?

● (1620)

So I think we should very seriously consider that whole matter so as to avoid possibly unfortunate arguments during Golden Age Club meetings. Imagine a Golden Age Club meeting is scheduled for tomorrow. There will be people 75, 80, 60 years old, some of them married and others single, widowers and spinsters, bachelors, all kinds of people. Among them are those who live together, and who will benefit from a federal legislation, and others who will be denied that benefit and are also there to socialize, as members of the club. In what spirit do you think they will discuss our statutes?

Secondly, I think if we took it for granted that we should legislate and amend Bill C-62 to allow anyone over 60 to benefit from that legislation, we would be taking a step towards national unity, because those funds, those revenues would all stem from the same source and would be intended for people aged 60 or over. Then, we might understand better what it is to live in a federal state, why we have a parliament, why we have population-oriented laws which are the same throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding my remarks, I would like to refer to a publication which has been distributed to us and is entitled: Le soutien et le supplément du revenu dated February 1975. It is a federal-provincial review of a working paper we already know about. In that booklet, on page 16, there is a table which I found very interesting. I would like to end my remarks by mentioning that, in that table, the costs of the programs for senior citizens: old age security pension, guaranteed income supplement and superannuation, amounted to $3,680,000,000 for the year 1974-75.

Secondly, for people aged less than 60, in all groups, there were the provincial social welfare programs, the general shared costs welfare programs under the Canada Assistance Plan: $1,220 million.

Various assistance programs under the Canada Assistance Plan, category c): $760 million; federal family allowances: $1,780 million; Quebec family allowances: $95 million; workmen's compensation: $400 million; unemployment insurance—we should say "work insurance", it would sound more modern: $2,250 million; disability allowances, dependant pensions under the Canada Assistance Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan: $300 million, which makes a total of $6,805 million. Then we have to add the other related programs: training allowances, related programs: $240 million; veterans pensions and allowances: $470 million; student loans: $110 million; public housing: the amount is not mentioned; assistance to natives: $80 million, which makes a grand total of $11,395 million for all these programs which are scattered and administered at various levels of government, federal, provincial or municipal.

At the bottom, a note is added to show these are approximate figures, and that other programs may have been omitted from the table.

So, if it is desired to consider very seriously, in terms of figures, the possibility for Canada to introduce the groups of persons that are not included in the bill but that have needs, one could determine quite clearly that it might cost approximately $2 billion. This would bring the cost of these programs to $13,395 million.

But as the minister suggested this afternoon, a deduction should be made from that total of all amounts paid in social welfare and cost sharing programs. This would of course reduce the overall amounts.

Second, consideration should be given to the fact that OAS and welfare payments to various categories of people in Canadian society automatically come back to the Treasury as sales tax and also as income tax, on family allowances for instance. So, everything should be considered in that light, in order not to scare Canadians with astronomical figures and then saying this has no sense.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) told us quite seriously this afternoon that over a number of years old age pensions doubled. That may be so. But other things have doubled in the meantime. So finally, there is no gain there.

In 1974, the gross national product in Canada, in inflationary figures, is $140 billion, which, according to Statistics Canada, is equivalent to $79 billion in 1961 dollars. On the other hand, in another table, it is said that the Canadian dollar has lost some of its value. According to the table I have here, the 1974 dollar is worth 60 cents, or 60 per cent of its 1961 value. These are all figures on which we must rely to establish the potential of Canada to help people in need.

There is another possibility; we do not have to invent it. The thousands of young people that we have had educated, for whom we have paid a lot of money, have not become an asset because they are unemployed. We should make some effort to try to allow these young people to enter the labour market, to increase the gross national product, instead of having it reduced as will be the case in 1975. If we do not bother about those young people who have diplomas and try to get them interested, to make them work, to create products to meet the needs of Canadian society, others will do so in our place, and we shall witness other investigations like the one that was held under Mr. Justice Cliche in the area of crime. We should also look into other areas where we shy away from investigating because these areas are headed by big shots. We are not afraid to upset the small fry, but we are more careful when it comes to upsetting the big shots.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is a good idea to try immediately to ensure income security for the people that I have mentioned, to allow the young people to enter the labour market and contribute to the enrichment and development of our country. In this way, we shall not have to worry about paying higher pensions, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said this afternoon. He talked about $300. I remember that at one time, when we, of the Social Credit Party, were talking about $100, we were told that we were cranks, that it was utopian, that it made no sense. This afternoon, the minister told us that we have reached $208, and that it is beginning to make sense. But it would also make sense at a higher level, where more persons will benefit from it, provided everything is done to improve and develop our economy, to increase our production, so that our standard of living might also rise. This will enable our youth to stop being professional loafers and become workers, to be an asset to the country, and our senior citizens will be able to enjoy life with a well deserved income security.

The minister said to us that within the near future, he will submit other legislation on behalf of the category of people I have just mentioned. I very seriously invite the minister to make an effort with a view to accelerating the submission of such a bill, because it is an urgent matter. And he may rest assured that in the same way as he received the support of all members this afternoon, he will also receive their support and cooperation to apply a guaranteed income insurance program that will enable Canadians to live in decent conditions and make the greatest possible use of this country which is ours and which we want to preserve for the present and future generations with laws that will always be based, as I said initially, on the Canadian family. Let us try to work together to reinforce the bounds as much as possible, to respect the rights of the Canadian family, to give this taste of living together, to be really close together at the end of the day, to talk during the evening about national issues, events of the day, but with people who breathe the same air, who eat at the same table, and not, as is the case at this moment, when our children are deserting the home to go and eat here and there, because we have not created a good family climate.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the state has a very large responsibility. As for us, members of parliament, we have to choose the right words when we pass any bill and, in this case, I suggest it would be advisable to review very seriously the section defining the "spouse" and to whom the pension should be paid.

So I hope that during consideration in committee we will study the matter more thoroughly and that the minister is willing to accept our bona fide suggestions so that we will soon pass the bill which will be enforced. The sooner, the better.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order. Before recognizing the minister, I remind the House that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate on this stage of the bill. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank most sincerely all members of this House whose co-operation throughout this day has made it possible to examine in a serious, yet expeditious way a bill which a great many Canadians must have felt was long in coming.

I am particularly grateful to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who has gracefully surrendered the hour to which he was entitled under our regulations, both now and at the time reserved for the consideration of private bills. I wish to thank also the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) for his remarks and the interest he shows in this whole question. As he indicated, this is another step in our way to treat and deal with our senior citizens. Surely the government would like to go still further and more quickly, and if its possibilities were similar to those of the opposition party, and particularly to those of the opposition parties which do not have any chance of ever forming the government in the near future, it would probably make similar propositions. However, as a government, we must consider the available resources in the country at any given moment. The record of the Liberal party, as I said at the outset of this debate, and the record of this government shows the concern, the importance we have attached to the aged in our overall social policy.

I recall that only two years ago, I think, the total amount earmarked for old age security reached slightly over $2 billion. Now, for the current financial year, the amount which will be set aside for this purpose will total $4 billion, which would mean that we will have practically doubled the old age security benefits in the very short time of barely two or three years.

The bill before us has a limited objective. That objective was stated very specifically when the right hon. Prime Minister announced the bill during the last electoral campaign. We committed ourselves to helping those couples who must live on one pension only, that is, that of the spouse who is retired. That is a real problem and many representations were made to the government in this regard at various times. We are not attempting to extend universal pension from the age of 60, or to lower the pensionable age. Instead, we are trying to solve a specific problem a real problem, that of the couple who must live on a single pension. That is the problem this bill is attempting to solve.

The other much broader matter which several hon. members brought up, and which concerns the status of single people and widows, is more closely related to the guaranteed income in Canada.

[English]

Indeed, it is not only a question of old age pension; it is a question of what kind of support is going to be provided the people of this country in need, whatever their age and condition.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) asked this morning what were the priorities of the government. It is too bad he has not read the working document that the government published over two years ago. Those priorities are spelled out in black and white. To make it even easier for members opposite, the priorities and the propositions of the government are spelled out in dark ink in the text. It should be easy to read. Those propositions are spelled out quite clearly.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner).]

● (1640)

Our priorities are spelled out in terms of establishing a guaranteed income program to provide an income support program for those who are unable to work or who are unable to find work, and to provide an income supplementation program for the working poor. These are the priorities. We have been working on these for two years with the provinces, and have started implementing a good part of these programs, especially with regard to income support by increasing old age security and improving the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan, by indexing benefits, and tripling family allowances. We have taken those steps.

Not only have we been holding discussions with the provinces over a period of two or three years but we have brought in reforms and have made progress in respect of social security.

Certainly there are improvements which could be made, but I might say to those who have asked today that we just lower the age to 60 tomorrow that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) filed an answer to a question in this House a few weeks ago in which he showed how much this would cost. It would cost about $3 billion, merely for the level of pensions we are talking about at the present time. I am not talking about the $300 or $350 mentioned by some hon. members but rather the guaranteed program. Since a good part of this money will be distributed on a universal basis the question that arises is whether this is the real priority we should have in looking after the needs of the people of this country. My answer is no, for a very good reason. If we were to buy this argument now we would be using several hundred millions of dollars, as a matter of fact several billion dollars, to put money in the hands of people who do not necessarily need it.

When we are asked what our priorities are, I say that they are not in terms of further universal programs but rather are in terms of selective programs. This is what the guaranteed income approach is.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would answer a question. While he is speaking in these terms may I ask him what is the logic by which the government decides that a woman aged 62 who is married is to be covered under the old age security program whereas another woman who is 62 and a widow or a spinster must wait for the guaranteed annual income?

Mr. Lalonde: I thought I had answered the hon. member's question earlier. The logic of it simply is that when you have a couple one member of which is forced to retire at age 65 it would be unfair to limit the benefits to one person.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What about the one person living alone on nothing?

Mr. Lalonde: I accept that this is a problem which arises, but not only for people age 60 or 65. The same problem arises in respect of people age 55, 45, the handicapped, and those out of work. It arises in respect of single people, bachelors, and widows of whatever age if they cannot find employment.

The approach of the government is to establish a guaranteed income program which would take care of all these cases whatever the age, the condition, or whether those involved are married or single. As I have mentioned, we have taken an interim step to take care of an obvious unfairness and deficiency in our old age security system. This is one step, and there are more to come. I want to advise the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, however, that these will not be universal programs. They will be selective programs and will not be limited to persons of age 65. We want to have a social security system in this country to take care adequately of all people in need whatever their age or their condition. These are the objectives of the government.

The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) referred to this bill and made various comments about it. Comments were made concerning common law marriages. I must say that I take seriously some of the comments made. I would refer hon. members to the text of the bill and the definition of "spouse". They will find in effect that this provision is comparable to the provisions in other bills. I would remind hon. members that there is no intention on the part of the government or of parliament to pass a moral judgment about this or that particular situation in life.

I would remind hon. members that common law marriages have been accepted for quite a period in Canada both at the provincial and federal levels in respect of rights. This also applies to social security rights. So, we must look at this question in a rather less partisan and phony way than the way in which it has been argued here today. I am sure we will have an opportunity to discuss this matter further before the committee.

To return to the question raised by the hon. member for Victoria, may I say I can understand his argument but I cannot understand his conclusion when he referred to this bill as a mean bill. I think that is the expression he used. Well, this may be a mean bill, but it is a mean bill which is providing about $100 million in benefits to our senior citizens. If this is a mean bill, I would say that the opposition party when it was in office for six years did not introduce one single bill in the field of old age security that involved such an amount. I say that in the six years in which the Tories were in office the additions in respect of old age security did not come out to the total amount covered in benefits under this so-called small or mean bill.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): But it was worth more at that time.

Mr. McKinnon: What about inflation? I referred to this as a mean bill for the same reason the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) objected to it. It is mean because it does not cover widows and spinsters.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I think I have answered the hon. member's argument. I have explained the rationale of this bill. I do not want to go into the details at this particular stage. The bill will be considered in committee.

● (1650)

I will conclude by thanking once more all hon. members who have participated in this debate today for their contributions. I think many points have been made on this subject with some vigour, but this is what we can expect in the House of Commons. If there were no vigour here, I do not know where else we could find it.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister. This week, I asked a very serious question to the parliamentary secretary. I will repeat it to the minister because Mr. Speaker had invited me to do so at this time.

There are some clarifications I would like to have. Suppose a spouse of 62 who benefits from the legislation because his or her spouse is 65 years old or more. Suppose the elder dies; what happens to the survivor, who is younger and is not yet 65 years old?

Mr. Lalonde: I thought I answered this question this morning again, when I made my opening speech in the debate on second reading. I indicated then that the object of the bill being to cover only the couple forced to live on the pension of one person only, as the case you mentioned, if the widow or the widower does not qualify directly, it is obvious that the payment of the special allowance stops and, if the person is in dire circumstances, he or she comes under public welfare, to which the federal government contributes on a 50 per cent basis with the provinces.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may ask the minister a question. What the last hon. member to speak raised is very interesting and it is a matter that has concerned me. Has the minister any figure he might be able to give us as to what it might cost the government to remedy what I think is a defect, the matter which has just been raised? I think it is a defect in practical terms. The legal argument that the minister has given I can understand, but in real, practical terms it could be a great difficulty for a family caught in that situation as described by the hon. member, when they are caught in the reversion as the result of the death of one spouse. Does the minister know what it would cost?

Mr. Lalonde: I am in no position to give an answer at this time. Any answer would have to be very rough estimate. I can try to make a rough guess, and I will provide that information to the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thank those who have waited to discuss my bill, Bill C-249, but perhaps we can do that some other day. May we call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): It being five o'clock, the House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m.

At 4.55 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.
