The second reason that I wish to advance is that great changes are undoubtedly taking place in Russia. For 25 years Russia was under the iron rule of a despot. There can be no doubt that Stalin was one of the very able leaders of his time, but his methods were utterly and absolutely ruthless. In opposition to what were the real professed tenets of communism, Stalin slowly gathered into his own hands complete power of administration in his great country, and he exercised it ruthlessly. Fear was the dominating emotion in Russia during his time, and it increased with the passing of the years. It was fear of the police and fear of liquidation that led to the nauseating wholesale adulation of Stalin in every corner of Russia and in every department of its activities. He was represented as all powerful and all wise in the fields of literature, education, science, history, philosophy and the practical arts. Everyone was paying him tribute. Even the gentlemen who today are the custodians of the secrets of the Kremlin were among those who praised him most highly.

Now, after Stalin's death there was a popular revulsion against all this sort of thing, and without any question there are great upheavals and seethings going on in Russia today. In the long run it could not be otherwise. I am enough of a liberal to believe that it is impossible over a protracted period of time to circumscribe and tie down the human spirit. Sooner or later there was bound to be a revulsion against the tyranny that rested upon that immense country. After Stalin died there was a temporary struggle for power, but as communism in its philosophy never rested upon a personal dictatorship, we see in its place today a collective cabinet. Russia is indeed in a stage of transition.

Moreover, I should like to draw to your attention the spread of education taking place in that country. All the observers who have visited there in recent years report that there has been a tremendous stimulation of interest in education. Books—perhaps not in the sense that we have them—are widely read in Russia today; doctors, nurses, engineers and people in other branches of learning are being trained. To me that situation seems obvious, for you cannot open the windows of the mind through the process of education without stimulating in the individual new ideas and new thoughts. Sooner or later they had to come in Russia, and they are coming now. So we see the present rulers of Russia paying more attention than has ever been paid before to the recent Congress of Soviets that was held in Moscow a few months ago. This leavening is going to spread, no question about it.

When the Russian farm delegation visited the United States and Canada, almost a year ago, they experienced a revelation. For the first time they appeared in these countries and mixed with ordinary people; they saw what ordinary people on the farms were doing. No one can tell me that they did not go back to their homeland without some new ideas. That is what comes from this type of intercourse among people who meet each other and travel to each other's countries. One of the reasons why I support this agreement is that it will tend to promote that very thing.

Honourable senators, I think we need have no hesitation in unanimously supporting the agreement.

I have just one more thought to add. The agreement itself does not provide for the sale of the wheat that has been so much discussed in recent months. In an exchange of notes between the Russian and the Canadian Governments it is provided that over a period of three years Canada will sell from 1,200,000 to 1,500,000 metric tons, which is roughly 40 million to 50 million bushels, or something of the order of 13 million to 15 million bushels a year. That is a good thing. But, for the reason which I shall give now, I am not deceiving myself that this necessarily means a new outlet for this volume of Canadian wheat.

The only all-year ocean port in Russia, except the Black Sea ports, is Vladivostok, on the Pacific Ocean. The distance from Vancouver, an all-year port, to Vladivostok is about 4,300 miles; from Moscow to Vladivostok, all rail, is about 4,600 miles. It is a well-known fact that the great wheat- producing area of Russia is west of the Volga River—in other words, west of Moscow. Therefore, to transport wheat from Russia's wheat-producing area to Siberia and Vladivostok means at least two to three times the cost of transporting it from Vancouver to Vladivostok. On the other hand, the Black Sea ports of Russia, which are adjacent to her great wheat-producing plains, are open the year round, and navigation from, say, Odessa, on the Black Sea, to such places in western Europe as Liverpool and Rotterdam, is an all-year proposition.

So, if Russia has good harvests, we will be sending western Canadian wheat to Vladivostok in the Far East, and Russia will sell some of its wheat from the Black Sea area to the markets of western Europe. That is not a bad thing. Indeed, there is nothing new about it; it was happening even before the First World War. But again, it is a good thing to have this type of intercourse. I for one have always had confidence in the common sense of the average man, once he understands the situation; and I am enough of a liberal and have sufficient belief in the philosophy of liberalism to know that you cannot give people education and keep their spirits for ever cribbed, cabined and confined.

Honourable senators, this agreement that we are ratifying today is a step in the direction of promoting friendly intercourse with a great country. I feel convinced that as we promote that friendly interest, as we trade with each other, as we get to know each other, the tensions of the cold war are bound somewhat to relax.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I would like to make one or two comments. The first is to say that I could not be better pleased than I am with the very broad liberalism of the three speeches which have just preceded mine. I will not be able to contribute much more in that direction than has already been said, but it does strike me that we in Canada have four great neighbours and we must recognize that they are neighbours because the facts of geography make them so. One is Russia, which is across the Pacific Ocean, the one to the west is China, another is the United States, and the fourth is Great Britain.

Now in the question before us the argument is not whether trade brings about friendly relations, good feeling and knowledge; that must be admitted by everyone who knows anything about the subject. The question is, do we wish to be friendly with Russia, one of our greatest neighbours. In my opinion we certainly should be friendly.

There are a number of reasons why the people of the western nations have been afraid of the people behind the Iron Curtain. One is the possibility of war. Another is that a good many of those who are wedded to our particular type of civilization fear that our people may learn something from the Russians which would not be to their class interest.

The contest between the western people and those of Russia has not, in my humble judgment, been properly described as a contest between socialism on the one hand and capitalism on the other hand. The real contest is between the non-landlord conditions in Russia and its imperialism, on the one hand, and the landlordism of the west, on the other hand. That is the real contest.

There are those who so like our present conditions, from which they benefit personally, that they are afraid lest our people learn something from one of the greatest experiments in the history of the world; that is the revolution which took place in Russia, an element of which was abolition of the owners of the land who simply charge rents to tenants. Now, I am not at all afraid of letting our people know anything that may be to their own good. Of course, there is a great deal that I do not like in Russian civilization, in Russian methods, in Stalinism and so forth. There is very much that I like and love and approve of in our own methods of living, but I am not so hidebound that I think we have lost the ability to learn, or that other people have not something to teach us; and so I like to see an interchange of people between the nations behind the Iron Curtain and Canada. I would like to see more people come from those countries to Canada so that they may observe and learn from us, and I would like to see a large number of our people go to the Soviet Union so that we may pick up something useful from them. There is no nation that is all bad.

And so, honourable senators, the question is not whether trade will bring about an interchange of thought and understanding—that is admitted—but rather whether such interchange is desirable. I am strongly of the opinion that it is desirable, and so I support this measure. I thank those who preceded me for the remarks they have made and for the broad, kindly, sound liberalism they have expressed.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the honourable leader speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I do not rise this time to make any extended remarks. When I introduced this motion on Thursday of last week I explained the agreement and answered a considerable number of questions.

At that time I received considerable support for the agreement, but today the support is overwhelming and I am indebted to those who have spoken. When one introduces a bill or a resolution he expects to have some opposition, so it has been very pleasing this afternoon to listen to four honourable senators give complete support to this agreement.

I rise at this time, therefore, merely to answer a few questions that were asked of me last Thursday. I was asked whether Russia is now a party to GATT. At that time I indicated that it was my belief that she is not, and that has been confirmed. I might add that the only so-called Iron Curtain country which is a signatory to that agreement is Czechoslovakia.

The honourable senator from Queens-Lunenburg (Hon. Mr. Kinley) raised the question of what privileges were granted to Russia under this agreement with respect to entry of merchant ships into our ports. He asked me whether Russia was discriminated against, or words to that effect, and I said that no country was discriminated against. I did say that possibly the United States has some special rights in our lake ports. I find, however, that at the present time all countries have equal rights in our ports with the exception of countries trading under the British preference. That condition has been in existence from our colonial days; ever since then we have given special rights to ships carrying the flag of countries in what is now the Commonwealth of Nations.

The question therefore comes down to this: if Russia is getting no further rights in our ports now than she had previously, why is reference made to them in the agreement? The reason is that the rights which the Russians have now must be effective throughout the term of this agreement. A change could be made in respect of the right of ships of any other nation to enter our ports, but now this agreement is binding so far as Russia is concerned throughout the term of the agreement.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Will Russia be in the most-favoured-nation class?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes. Under the terms of the agreement Russia gets the benefit of our customs tariff to a similar extent to that afforded all countries which receive most-favoured-nation treatment.

I stated last Thursday that I thought the United States possibly had certain shipping rights in our lake ports. I find I was incorrect. United States shipping has no special rights in that connection; in fact, international shipping rules apply to trading on the Great Lakes, just as at ocean ports.

One other question which was asked was with respect to the goods which Russia is likely to sell to Canada. That is very difficult to foresee. It is true that, as was mentioned this afternoon, the two countries produce to a large extent the same types of goods. It is anticipated, however, that certain raw materials for semi-manufactured goods will enter Canada under this agreement. For the most part these raw materials are already non-taxable. In other words, the commodities that will come to us now could have been sold here prior to this agreement, although the Russians made no real attempt to sell them. I might mention that a rough estimate of the differential between the two categories —most-favoured-nation and general duties— is about 20 per cent.

The honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) asked whether vodka would be imported. All I can say in reply is that it will depend on the taste of our liquor-drinking citizens. If they want to drink vodka, there is nothing to prevent the Russians from shipping it in, although I doubt whether large quantities will be sold. It is possible that, as cement is manufactured somewhat more cheaply in Europe than in Canada, a considerable quantity of cement will come in.

That is all the information I can give as to what goods Russia may ship here. The quantity is very uncertain, and little is known about the types of products which will be offered.

Hon. Mr. Euler: The leader said that no special privileges are granted to United States vessels in respect of Canadian ports. Is not the law or the regulation the same in both countries: that Canadian vessels cannot ply between one United States port and another, and neither can United States vessels do business between one Canadian port and another, without a government permit?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I believe the honourable senators' statement is correct. I should point out that foreign ships entering Canada under the general tariff or the most-favoured-nation tariff have the same rights. That condition could be changed, but not, so far as Russia is concerned, during the life of this agreement. Ships flying the flags of countries subject to these tariffs cannot trade between Canadian ports. For instance, ships of the United States which are subject to the most-favoured-nation clause may not trade between Canadian ports. However, ships flying the flag of the commonwealth countries operate under the British preference clause, and have rights over and above those of the most-favoured-nation countries; so they are entitled to trade between Canadian ports.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is there any possibility of this trade treaty and the exchanges which may follow it leading to some improvement of conditions in the matter of migration? There are people in Canada with relatives behind the Iron Curtain who would very much like to have family reunions. No doubt many families in communist countries have relatives over here, and are anxious about their friends abroad. Is there any prospect that this trade agreement will lead to a better interchange of that kind between our country and Russia?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: All I can say in that respect is that the agreement contains no provisions with respect to migration. As to what the future may hold in store, the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) knows as much as I do. We all hope for more friendly relations between the U.S.S.R. and Canada. If the peoples of the world have toward one another as kindly a spirit as honourable senators have displayed here today, one can have good hope for general peace, more intercourse and greater freedom of migration between all the nations.

I am in full agreement with the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) that we should have no hesitation about ratifying this agreement; and I thank honourable senators for their support.

The motion was agreed to.

DIVORCE

BILLS—SECOND READINGS

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, moved, with leave, the second reading of the following bills:

Bill R-8, an Act for the relief of Islay Isobel Campbell Jones.

Bill W-9, an Act for the relief of Olga Pritula Memi.

Bill X-9, an Act for the relief of Ethel Elizabeth Margaret Ritchie Campbell.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Next sitting.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP BILL

COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Immigration and Labour to Bill B, an Act to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

Hon. Cairine R. Wilson moved that the amendments be concurred in.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, we are being asked to approve a number of amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act. On April 18 I expressed certain views about Canadian citizenship and my remarks on that occasion appear at page 379 of Hansard. I wonder if the amendments that the committee is asking us to approve are sufficient to make clear the position of a Canadian citizen? Part IV of the Canadian Citizenship Act deals with the status of Canadian citizens and the recognition of British subjects. Section 21 of that act says:

> A Canadian citizen is a British subject.

This provision was passed in 1946, seven years prior to the sanction of the Act respecting the Royal Style and Titles, which was assented to on February 11, 1953. That act, which is chapter 9 of the Statutes of Canada, 1-2 Elizabeth II, is not long but it is very illuminating. It states:

> Whereas the Prime Ministers and other representatives of Commonwealth countries assembled in London in the month of December, in the year one thousand nine hundred and fifty-two, considered the form of the Royal Style and Titles, and, recognizing that the present form is not in accordance with present constitutional relations within the Commonwealth, concluded that, in the present stage of development of the Commonwealth relationship, it would be in accord with the established constitutional position that each member country should use for its own purposes a form suitable to its own particular circumstances but retaining a substantial element common to all;
> And whereas the said representatives of all the Commonwealth countries concerned agreed to take such action as is necessary in each country to secure the appropriate constitutional approval for the changes now envisaged;

And whereas, in order to give effect to the aforesaid conclusion, it is desirable that the Parliament of Canada should assent to the issue of a Royal Proclamation establishing the Royal Style and Titles for Canada:

Therefore, Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. The assent of the Parliament of Canada is hereby given to the issue by Her Majesty of Her Royal Proclamation under the Great Seal of Canada establishing for Canada the following Royal Style and Titles, namely, . . .

—and this is most important—

"Elizabeth the Second, by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom, Canada and Her other Realms and Territories Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith".

My point is this. We have taken the oath of allegiance to Her Majesty, the Queen of the United Kingdom, Canada and her other realms and territories, and so on. I personally have taken my oath of allegiance to the Queen of Canada, and I wonder how it is that I am a British subject. We love Queen Elizabeth and are loyal to her. She is our Queen, the Queen of Canada. Why should we consider ourselves to be British subjects when in reality we are Canadian subjects as well as Canadian citizens? There is nothing in this question that could offend Her Majesty. She herself has acknowledged that she is Queen of Canada by virtue of a proclamation which came from her. Yet we ignore this fact and we remain British subjects. In raising this point I may be a little premature, for some Canadians, according to the way their minds work, believe they would not be as good Canadians if they were not British subjects. That is ridiculous. We are subjects of the Queen and she is the Queen of Canada. Why should we not be Canadian citizens I shall not persist in this now, and I do not intend to bring forth any amendment at this time. I am merely giving the house food for thought and discussion by all who are open-minded. To those who say that if we were Canadian subjects we would not be loyal to the Queen, I would point out that every member of the Parliament of Canada takes an oath of allegiance to the Queen of Canada, not to the Queen of the United Kingdom. She is one and the same person. Nobody could be offended by this. We are loyal to the Queen, but in her capacity that interests us most.

Naturally, there are some people who are more British than Canadian. I do not speak for them, I speak for myself. I put myself on record this 26th day of April, in the year of grace 1956, as predicting that, after all, some day, Canadians will call themselves Canadian subjects as well as Canadian citizens, though they will forget that I have said this.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I am glad that my honourable friend said that he did not speak for anyone except himself, because I think his objection is based on a misunderstanding of the meaning of the two words in question. I am sure he will accord to me that I am just as good a citizen of Canada, and just as loyal a Canadian, as he is. I know he comes from a line of people who have been in this country for probably some 300 years or thereabouts; but I also am a Canadian of the fourth generation on both sides of the house. I think I am pretty thoroughly acclimatized and just as loyal to and interested in Canada as he is. I put Canada's interests ahead of all other interests, in the same way as he does. However, the idea of "British subject" conveys to me that Canada is a part of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Commonwealth of Nations.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is what I said, did I not?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: No.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I thought I expressed myself correctly, and if I did not it was a slip of the tongue. I said that Canada is a part of the British Commonwealth of Nations. Am I not right in that?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: And that consists in all self-governing countries.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The Commonwealth Nations.

Hon. Mr. Haig: "British" is not used now.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Well, I thank you for the correction. At all events, this Commonwealth of Nations consists of Australia, New Zealand, Canada, some other countries, and Great Britain herself. It is the greatest league of nations in the world; its members get along with perfect understanding and a bond of sympathy, and share a fellow feeling and outlook. Of course, little difficulties arise, but fundamentally we are the same in outlook. The term "British subject" signifies that this fellowship and understanding exist between us and that we are part of that great organization, formerly comprised of dominions and now of self-governing countries. I do not think anything would be gained by dropping the words "British subject". The people of Australia and New Zealand call themselves British subjects, and they are just as concerned about their rights of self-government as we are. The English people call themselves British subjects, and they appreciate that we, too, are British subjects, equal in all respects to themselves, both in domestic and foreign affairs. I think the words "British subjects" add something to rather than detract from our citizenship. If we stated that we were Canadian subjects as well as Canadian citizens, we would deny to ourselves the membership in that broader brotherhood to which I have referred.

Now, if anybody imagines that when I call myself a British subject I am in any way defining myself as a citizen of Great Britain or of any of the other dominions, he is very much mistaken. I am a Canadian—first, last, and all the time—but I am also proud and happy to be part of the commonwealth, which is so influential in world affairs, and which may be even more influential in years to come. The commonwealth is an influence for enlightenment, peace and understanding among nations, and it is the finest league of nations that has ever been devised. Those words "British subject" signify our membership in that great fraternity.

I hope my friend will see no real difference between us in our respective attitudes toward these two ideas of Canadian citizen and British subject.

In closing, may I ask the Chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Labour (Hon. Mrs. Wilson) to inform us of what was done by that committee, before we are asked to vote for passage of the bill? When the bill was before us for second reading I made objection to the phraseology in section 2, which defines Canadian citizenship under certain circumstances. I understand that some revisions have been made to that clause. I also raised objection to that part of section 4 which places a limitation on our present rule with regard to the use of the English language and the French language. Would the Chairman of the committee please tell us what the committee has done?

Hon. Mrs. Wilson: With regard to the honourable senator's first objection, it will be observed that the words in section 2(B), "and his parents have not intermarried" have been deleted.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes.

Hon. Mrs. Wilson: And in section 2(C) the words "either his mother or" have been deleted.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: So the substance has been left, but the phraseology has been improved?

Hon. Mrs. Wilson: Yes. The wording of section 4(1) provoked quite a discussion in Committee. The honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) objected also to that section, which required an adequate knowledge of the English or French language. In committee the minister said that at first blush he was willing to extend the time of application from 1961 to 1965, in order to discover if any hardship would be imposed. Now it has been deleted altogether.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is good.

Hon. Mrs. Wilson: Yes. Two or three members of the commitee objected to that.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No doubt they felt there was nothing to be gained by that limitation.

Hon. Mrs. Wilson: Has the honourable gentleman any further questions?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, thank you. I raised just the two objections, and I am glad that both of them have been satisfied.

The motion was agreed to and the amendments were concurred in.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mrs. Wilson: With leave, I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 1, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, May 1, 1956

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND IN CANADA—REFUND OF FEES

Hon. A. K. Hugessen moved, with leave:

That the Parliamentary fees paid upon the Bill D, intituled: "An Act respecting The General Synod of the Church of England in Canada, The Missionary Society of the Church of England in Canada, the Woman's Auxiliary of the Church of England in Canada and the Church of England Consolidated Trust Fund", be refunded to the petitioners, less printing and translation costs.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

OGDENSBURG BRIDGE AUTHORITY—FIRST READING

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck presented Bill D-10, an Act respecting Ogdensburg Bridge Authority.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Thursday next.

DIPLOMATIC STAFFS

INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Thomas Reid inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of March 21:

What is the total number of all staff located or residing in Canada and attached to either embassies, legations or high commissioners' offices of the following countries: United Kingdom; United States of America; Soviet Union; Germany; France; China; and Austria.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry is as follows:

Mission	Diplomatic	Non-Diplomatic Personnel		Total
		Canadians	Other Nationalities
United Kingdom	29	86	44	159
United States	25	32	45	102
France	11	16	19	46
Germany	10	—	36	46
Austria	1	—	5	6
China	3	1	2	6
U.S.S.R.	23	2	27	52

N.B. The above figures do not include the staff of consulates, information offices and trade commissioners' offices located outside of Ottawa.

NATIONAL GALLERY PAINTINGS

NUMBER ON LOAN TO DEPARTMENTS—VISITORS TO GALLERY AND PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS—INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of March 22:

1. How many pictures and paintings belonging to the National Gallery of Canada are on loan to the various departments of the Government of Canada?

2. During the last five years what was the yearly average of visitors to (a) the Parliament Buildings, and (b) the National Gallery of Canada?

and pursuant to notice of April 26:

3. What pictures and paintings have been loaned to other institutions than Government departments?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have the answers to the first two parts of the honourable gentleman's inquiry, as follows:

1. 257.

2. (a) 258,300; (b) 135,000.

DIVORCE BILLS

Bill X-9, an Act for the relief of Ethel Elizabeth Margaret Ritchie Campbell.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the third time, and passed on division.

PENAL REFORM

DISCUSSION CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, April 24, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Croll calling to the attention of the Senate the present position with respect to penal institutions in Canada and in particular discussing the need for further reforms in the Canadian penal system.

Hon. W. Rupert Davies: Honourable senators, in dealing with the subject of penal reform, to which attention was called on March 5 by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll), I wish first of all to congratulate him on his address, and also on the interest he has taken in various matters which have come before this house since his appointment.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Davies: The Ottawa correspondent of Saturday Night, an old-established, well-written cultural magazine published semi-monthly in Toronto, stated in a recent article that the Senate was treated by the Press Gallery "with more or less contempt". The correspondent is an old and warm friend of mine, and a scholarly and very able writer, but I do not agree with that statement of his. So far as I know there have not been any complaints from the Senate about its treatment by the press. When the Senate does something which merits publicity, it gets it; and when a senator makes a speech of importance, it also gets publicity.

It must always be remembered that Canada is a large country; and while the news agencies try to serve this house very well, with a representative of the Canadian Press always in our gallery, the news columns of the daily papers are so crowded that a speech by a western senator might get big play in western papers and be hardly mentioned by eastern papers. Similarly, it is doubtful if an eastern senator would get any publicity in western papers unless he discussed a subject of vital interest to the west.

In any event, we must not blame the Press Gallery. Correspondents of various newspapers and news services may do a very good job in reporting the debate on some bill or measure before the Senate, but when their copy reaches the editorial desk it may be severely cut. However, if there is some measure of truth in the statement that the gallery does treat the Senate "with more or less contempt", I think the active interest which the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina has taken in the affairs of this house since he became a senator will do a great deal to lessen that contempt. The honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina asked for an all-out debate on the problems involved in this far-reaching subject of penal institutions in Canada. I am sure he did not expect or hope for a one-sided discussion. This is a question well worthy of the attention of Parliament, and the introduction of the question into the Senate has inspired other senators than myself with a desire to discuss its ramifications.

In discussing the present administration of our jails and penitentiaries, and reforms which might be introduced in an effort to make a larger number of the inmates respectable and respected members of society when they have served their sentences, and also in the matter of probation instead of sentences, I feel we should remember that there are two sides to this question.

We should never forget that in Canada no man or woman is committed to jail or penitentiary without just cause. Every one of those so committed has had a fair trial. After a person has been found guilty by a judge or jury, if the sentence passed upon him or her by the judge is not satisfactory an appeal can always be made to a higher court. It is interesting to note in this connection that as late as April 10 last the Ontario Court of Appeal cut four years and a day off a seven-year penitentiary term given to a man convicted of robbery and attempted robbery.

I feel also, honourable senators, that before we let ourselves get carried away on a flood of sentimentality about those people in our land who have broken the law—some of them cruel and desperate criminals—we should save some of our sympathy for those who have been wronged. I am thinking of people who have been assaulted and robbed, of women and young girls who have been raped, of widows who have been deprived of their savings by slick, crooked and cruel operators, of people who have suffered at the hands of forgers, of families who have been robbed of their bread-winner by the brutal crime of murder, and of other families whose little circle has been broken by the same horrible crime.

As I have said, no man is sent to jail or penitentiary in Canada without a fair trial. We have distinguished and honourable judges, who try always to be fair; we have hard working and painstaking solicitors and brilliant barristers, who always give of their very best, whether acting for the prosecution or for the defence. No one is railroaded to prison in this country. Perhaps mistakes are made occasionally but they are very rare, and, as I have said before, there is always the right of appeal to a higher court.

Now, although I have said that, do not think that I am entirely heartless with regard to the criminal. I am not. The prisoners may not have an alumni association, lobby groups or fan clubs, as the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina says, but they have the John Howard Society for men and the Elizabeth Fry Society for women constantly working on their behalf. I have been a supporter of the John Howard Society for some years and I know from their reports and from the contact I have had with their officials and their workers what a good job they are doing.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Davies: I know many of the workers in both the John Howard Society and the Elizabeth Fry Society, and I know much of what they are trying to do to rehabilitate prisoners when they are released.

The John Howard Society in a recent statement said that it was in a position to point to many hundreds of people who have received their services over the years and who have become successfully rehabilitated and are now productive citizens, both in an economic and a social sense. They hear occasionally by letter, by Christmas card, by the occasional visit or a telephone message from many of these people, and the society is pleased and encouraged by the number of evidences which they have of the help that it has been able to give. The society does not attempt to follow too closely those who have been set on the road to useful living again. It is always ready to help when called upon, but for reasons which it thinks wise it does not attempt to keep an accurate record of or to card-index the careers of rehabilitated people. The society feels that this is the better way. If it lets them work out their own problems they feel more independent and are the more quickly assimilated into society again.

While we are referring to the groups who devote a lot of time to the welfare of those sentenced to prison terms by our courts, we must not forget the Salvation Army. The Salvation Army is a wonderful organization, which includes in its work the comfort and care of prisoners who have served their sentences. It might surprise senators to know that in Metropolitan Toronto alone during the year 1955 the Salvation Army held 10,222 interviews with prisoners, made 1,670 visits to police courts, spoke on behalf of 853 prisoners, had 695 of these men and women turned over to their care, provided 394 with clothing, gave beds to 3,510, provided 10,920 meals, found employment upon discharge from prison for 319, met 351 upon discharge, and made 762 visits to friends and relatives of prisoners. That is the fine record of the Salvation Army in 1955, in one area in Canada.

Now, to turn for a few minutes to the comparison which the senator from Toronto-Spadina made between Britain and Canada. There is no doubt, at all, as the honourable senator says, that the United Kingdom, or rather England and Wales, is far ahead of Canada in the matter of putting prisoners on probation instead of sending them to prison. Why this is so, I am not prepared to say, but it is a matter which has given many others besides the senator from Toronto-Spadina a great deal of food for thought.

The honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) reminded us last week that a committee of responsible men has been giving detailed study to the operation of the Ticket of Leave Act and various reforms for more than two years. Its report has now been made to the minister and will be published in about ten days. The committee was composed of outstanding men, particularly well suited to the work they had in mind. Mr. Justice Fauteux, of the Supreme Court of Canada, was chairman. The other members were Mr. W. B. Common, Q.C., Director of Public Prosecutions for Ontario; Mr. Joseph McCulley, Warden of Hart House, University of Toronto, formerly attached to the Dominion Penitentiaries Branch, and Mr. J. Alex. Edmison, Q.C., assistant to the Principal of Queen's University, and for many years a very active and earnest worker in the John Howard Society.

I do not like to hear of instances where comparison between our country and England and Wales make Canada appear to be lacking in what we might call humanitarianism, but an honest appraisal of facts does not do us any harm. Britain is a much older country than Canada, and we must realize that a great respect—I was almost going to say fear—for the law has grown up in Britain over the centuries. To some extent the administration of justice there is different from our own system. As you know, in the smaller places there are boards of magistrates who serve without any salary. In sixteen places there are stipendiary magistrates; and in all the large cities there are what are known as recorders, who for the most part, I believe, are barristers and Queen's Counsel. Whether the fact that most of the misdemeanours in the smaller boroughs and counties are tried by fellow-citizens who are unpaid laymen has any effect on inclining people to avoid trouble with the law, or on the number of those found "not guilty," I do not know, but it might have. It would certainly be more humiliating to appear for trial for breaking the law before a group of friends and acquaintances than it would be before a paid magistrate, who is often far removed from one's daily life.

Then, too, in comparing the two countries and the incidence of crime in those countries, we must not forget that England and Wales is the southern part of a tight little island. If a man commits a crime and gets away from the scene of the crime, it is possible to keep him within a very limited area by having the airports and seaports carefully watched. In Canada we have 3,000 miles of border running along the north of the United States. Not only does the close proximity of the United States make it easy for Canadians who have broken our laws to escape to that country, but unfortunately it makes our country too often a haven for criminals on the run from the United States. Britain does not have this problem to contend with.

There are other factors which, in fairness, we should take into consideration if we are comparing the crime record of England and Wales with that of Canada. I do not think the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina included Scotland or Northern Ireland in his references. I am not doing so either. Scotland has a completely different administration with different laws. England and Wales has an area of approximately 60,000 square miles, and it has a uniformed police force of 65,836. Every village and rural district is adequately policed. Canada has an area of just under four million square miles, including, as we all know, a large area of water. Even so, it has a much smaller police force, and of course it has a smaller population. In the province of Ontario we have 1,540 uniformed provincial policemen. I have not the figures of the provincial police in the other provinces, but I assume that Quebec has about the same number. Now, if we also assume that each of the other provinces has 1,000, that gives us about 11,000 uniformed provincial policemen. The total police force in Canadian municipalities of 4,000 population or over is 10,796 men and 83 women. Let us add another 4,000 for the smaller places, which is perhaps a fair figure—I am speaking now, of course, of uniformed policemen, not town and village handymen—and we have a total of just over 25,000—25,296, to be exact—as compared with 65,836 in England and Wales.

Despite all these favourable factors to which I have referred, do not let us assume that England and Wales are free from crime or even that crime there is diminishing. It hurts me to use any harsh words about dear old Wales, but facts are facts and figures are figures. In 1935 the total number of offences of all kinds in England and Wales was 759,424. By 1943, nine years later, it had gone down to 569,825. By 1953, ten years later, it had climbed again to 704,441. These are the figures for all offences. Naturally, many of them were more or less petty offences. For instance, 54,000 were for drunkenness, and 15,000 were for offences against the Gambling Act. That surprised me, because I was under the impression that if there was one country where one could gamble to one's heart's content, it was Britain; but apparently that is not so.

Let us look for a minute at the most serious offences. I do not think that Canada shows up too badly. In the year 1953, of the 704,441 of all kinds of offences in England and Wales, 472,989 were indictable offences committed by persons over 16. Of those who committed these 472,989 offences, 84,252 were brought to trial and 77,726 were convicted. Of these 77,226, 18,000 were sent to prison and 10,798 were put on probation. That leaves about 48,000 unaccounted for. I presume they satisfied justice by paying fines. I read in a British paper only the other day that two farmers were very heavily fined because the inspector had found traces of hypochlorites in their milk churns. I have not got the Canadian figures for 1953—they were not available—but I was able to get the figures for 1952, which will, I expect, not differ very much from 1953. Those figures also refer to persons over 16 years of age, of whom there were in Canada in that year about 9,800,000. The records show that 29,761 were convicted of indictable offences. Of these, 14,603 were sentenced to confinement of one kind or another; 10,782 were sent to jails; 1,904 were sent to reformatories, and 1,917 were sent to penitentiaries. It is interesting to note at this time that there were on March 31 this year 5,507 prisoners in our penitentiaries, of whom, sad to relate, 694 were under the age of 21. However, this is something less than one-twentieth of 1 per cent of our population of those over 16 years of age, which I do not think is a record we should be ashamed of.

Now I will agree that the population of those over 16 in Canada is not quite one-third that of England and Wales in the same age group. Even so, I do not think a comparison shows Canada in too bad a light. Whereas we had about 14,000 sentenced to imprisonment in 1952, in 1953 England and Wales had about 29,000, of which nearly 11,000 were put on probation. As the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina has pointed out, England and Wales are far more liberal in the matter of probationery periods than so far we are in Canada. I lived for 25 years in Kingston, where one of the largest penitentiaries is located. For 23 of those years I lived next door to the penitentiary property. During that period I knew all the wardens; I knew the chaplains, both Catholic and Protestant; I knew the physicians, the dentists, a number of the guards and some of the trade instructors. All of them were men much the same age as we are; decent honest citizens who were trying to do their duty. I do not think I am stretching the truth when I say they were trying to do their duty in a kindly and fair way—a way not easy at all times, I can assure you.

As the honourable senator from New Westminster has said, do not let us assume that the prisoners in the penitentiaries are badly treated. So long as they obey the laws of the institutions, they are well treated. There are some people, possibly, those who have suffered at their hands, who might think that they are too well treated. Today is a far, far cry from the debtors' prisons of Charles Dickens' day, or indeed from our own penitentiaries of 50 or even 25 years ago.

I cannot agree with the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina that the prisoners in our jails and penitentiaries are forgotten men and women. I do not think it is a fair statement to say they exist in a sort of half life, or that there is still a Bastille complex in our prisons and penitentiaries. Admittedly we lock up the prisoners. They are locked up partly to punish them and partly for the protection of society.

Today, however, the prison authorities very definitely do not overlook the important question of what is going to be done for the prisoners while they are locked up. I would like to tell you something of the improvements that have been made.

In each of our penitentiaries today we have well-stocked libraries available to the inmates, each containing some thousands of books, and in our annual estimates each year there is provision of funds for the purchase of new books, as well as for subscriptions to current magazines. In addition, inmates are permitted to subscribe to approved magazines of their choice from their own funds, and they are also permitted to subscribe to the daily newspaper of their choice. A large variety of correspondence courses is available to inmates free of charge through the facilities of D.V.A. and the various provincial departments of education.

With regard to sports and recreation in our penitentiaries, organized sports are carried on at each institution both during daily exercise periods and over the weekends. Intramural leagues in softball, hockey and soccer are carried on according to season, and in most institutions a penitentiary team competes in one of the local outside municipal leagues. All games, of course, are home games but the contact of the penitentiary teams with outside players has been a great morale booster, and although many such games have been played over the past five or six years I am told there has never been an occasion when any untoward incident or lack of good sportsmanship toward the guests has been evidenced.

In addition to the standard games there are many other forms of sports and exercise, such as weight lifting, boxing, shuffle board, handball, horseshoe pitching, etc. Most institutions hold an annual field day either on Dominion Day or Labour Day when a full day's program of track events and competitive games is arranged. Each institution has a recreational director on the staff, and an Inmate Sports Committee.

I think honourable senators will agree with me that we are not lagging behind in Canada so far as providing sports and recreation in our penitentiaries. But that is not all by any means.

Today there is practically completed at all institutions the installation of radio ear phones in the individual cells on a two-channel circuit, replacing the former radios which blared out in the cell blocks, often disturbing those who wished to read or study. Now an inmate can listen to the radio or not as he pleases. We have not yet introduced TV sets, by the way. Except for the fact the inmates cannot go home at night I cannot see very much difference in the way they spend their evenings from the way most people spend theirs: reading favourite newspapers and magazines and listening to the radio.

There is an extensive program of hobby crafts permitted during leisure hours when the inmates are in their cells. This appeals to many who find greater relaxation and relief from tension in working with their hands rather than in reading. Many beautiful articles are made which are sold or sent home to their relatives. I think that is a pretty good record, but even that is not all.

Improvement has been made with regard to segregation. There are in Ontario and Quebec separate institutions—Collin's Bay near Kingston and the Federal Training Centre near Montreal—to which young and trainable offenders are transferred from the older institutions at Kingston and at St. Vincent de Paul. In that way they are separated completely from the hardened criminals. Within a single institution complete segregation is difficult, although in most cases the young inmates are celled in a separate cell block and carry on most of their activities separate from the older inmates. With the very small population in the Women's Prison it is not possible to segregate the inmates and the present building does not lend itself for segregation. Many improvements have been introduced at Collin's Bay Penitentiary in recent years. The institution itself is of modern construction. I watched it being built and I recollect that for some years before walls were built it was surrounded only by a high wire fence. It is of modern construction, having been built within the past 25 years.

I would like honourable senators to listen carefully to this. In 1949 a new accommodation building containing 100 outside rooms, each with its own door instead of a grilled barrier, and with wide corridors in which the inmates may gather for recreation and diversion in the evenings, was completed, thus permitting those who wish to read or study in their own rooms a degree of privacy. Since then there have also been constructed two dormitories which provide, for those who desire it, an opportunity of living in association with others rather than in the isolation of a cell. Recently completed also is a new boiler house and power plant, a modern well-equipped stores building, a new laundry and change room with modern equipment, an automotive building with all facilities for training in the automotive trades, and a series of modern workshops for trade training with all necessary machinery and equipment.

When taking part in this debate, the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) referred to a paper published in one of our penitentiaries. I do not know the name of it nor have I ever seen it. However, I have here a copy of The Diamond for April, 1956. I do not know how often it is published but it is written and edited, without official interference, by the men of Collin's Bay penitentiary. It is printed in the printing office of the Kingston Penitentiary. The Diamond is quite a bright little magazine. It has its amusing side, too. Kampus Kwerries, edited by a man who calls himself "The Marshall", has some very funny queries and answers. I wish time would permit me to read a few, for I know honourable members would enjoy them.

As I said earlier, I agree with the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina that we do lag behind England and Wales in the matter of probation, but I am sure there is some good reason for it, and that it is not due to lack of interest in the rehabilitation of prisoners, or rather those convicted in our courts to prison sentences.

At the moment we have a very limited probation, but as I shall point out in a few minutes it is improving all the time. It is hoped that the Fauteux Committee which had very broad terms of reference will give us some light and leading on this matter in its anxiously awaited report. This report, as you have probably read, has just been presented to the Minister of Justice and, as I said earlier, it is expected that it will be published in about ten days.

I have received from the Howard League for Penal Reform in England, of which the Right Honourable Viscount Templewood is president, the figures for several years past with regard to the number of indictable offences, the number of offenders sent to prison and the number put on probation in that country. They are so complicated, however, that I will not attempt to read or explain them here, but they do indicate a very liberal attitude to first offenders; and, strange as it may seem, for the years 1953 and 1954 the number of offenders who were put on probation and given a second chance exceeded by several thousands the number sent to jails and penitentiaries.

I would like now to touch briefly on our parole and ticket of leave system in Canada. It is well that we should know how these two remission services work.

If a prisoner behaves well and co-operates with the prison staff he has six days per month remitted from his sentence for the first year he is in prison. When he has accumulated 72 days' remission for good time—that is, 12 months, not necessarily consecutive, for good conduct—he may have 10 days per month remitted thereafter.

Parole is a provincial responsibility under the present laws. It is administered in Ontario by a permanent parole board consisting of five provincial appointees, of whom one is a woman. Apart from British Columbia, Ontario is the only province which has a parole system.

A prisoner is eligible for parole only after he has served the definite part of his sentence. In other words, parole is only applicable to a prisoner who has an indefinite term tacked on to his definite sentence.

Ticket of leave is the name for the process by which a prisoner in a federal penitentiary, that is, a prisoner serving a sentence of over two years, may serve some of his sentence on the outside, and by which a provincial prisoner may be released to authority whilst serving a definite sentence in any provincial institution. In theory, he is eligible for ticket of leave the moment he enters the prison, but the practice is to consider only those people who have served one-half of the sentence imposed. After a man has served one-half of his total sentence he can request ticket of leave. This is processed through the Remission Service of the Department of Justice, and reports on the prisoner made by outside agencies such as the John Howard Society, as well as reports by the prison officials, are taken into account. Each man who applies for ticket of leave is interviewed by a person from the Remission Branch of the Department of Justice, who visits prisons every six months for this purpose.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask the honourable member a question? Does that apply to people or criminals who have been convicted of a crime of violence?

Hon. Mr. Davies: I could not say definitely, but I would not think so. As we all know, in every institution there are a number of incorrigibles who do not become entitled to any of these privileges.

The new Director of the Remission Service of the Department of Justice is having good results in liberalizing previous policies. The percentage of people who have violated ticket of leave is less in the last three years, though the percentage of prisoners out on ticket of leave is considerably more.

I would like to place on record a statement showing the total number of persons released from various penitentiaries throughout Canada under the ticket of leave act, and the number of violations of the act, in the years 1950 to 1955:

	1950	1951	1952	1953	1954	1955
Total Released ..	924	754	736	825	904	1309
Violations	36	29	46	37	36	67

I said something about the Collin's Bay prison a little earlier. It is used almost entirely for first offenders, although some other prisoners, capable of rehabilitation, are sent there. It has a very good vocational training program in operation, where a man can learn such trades as sheet metal work, plumbing, carpentry, and so on. Some indication of the difference in results between Kingston penitentiary and Collin's Bay is shown by the fact that 7 out of 10 of the prisoners released from Kingston penitentiary return there. Since the new program was put into effect at Collin's Bay nearly 10 years ago only 3 out of 10 who did the vocational course have returned to that institution; the rest have had no brush with the law at any level—even for speeding.

The new Women's Prison which is to be built on part of the present Collin's Bay property will release the present Women's Prison in Kingston, which will become a reception centre for the area from which different types of criminals will be sent to the different institutions. Old lags, incorrigibles and the dangerous men will be sent from here to the present Kingston Penitentiary, which will become a maximum security institution with no outside gangs of any kind. Those people who seem to be capable of rehabilitation and reform and also mentally capable of undertaking a vocational training program will be sent to Collin's Bay, as many of them are now.

At least 50 or 60 prisoners in Kingston Penitentiary work outside on the farm, or care for the lawns and grounds of the warden's residence, and the training centre for guards, and so on. I understand that those prisoners are chosen for outside duties not necessarily because they are serving either short or long sentences but because they are considered to be the best escape risks.

As honourable senators have read in the press recently, there is to be a new penitentiary at Joyceville, which will be a medium-security prison with a farm program and other outdoor activities. To this penitentiary will be sent people who receive a short sentence and who may not be intelligent enough to reap the benefit of the Collin's Bay program. The new penitentiary will be 10 miles north of Kingston on highway 15.

In conclusion—and I am sure honourable senators will be glad to hear me use those two words—I want to say something about Canadian probation. I am not able to give the Senate a complete record of the situation with regard to probation for the whole of Canada. However, I find the situation in Ontario, at any rate, quite good. Since the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina secured his figures, which gave the number of probation officers in Ontario as 85, there has been a nice increase.

In 1953, in Ontario, there were 13 probation officers; there are now 114, all on full time. It is very encouraging to note, too, that the budget assigned to the chief probation officer for the coming year is $550,000. In 1955 there were on probation in Ontario approximately 10,000 persons, of whom 6,100 were convicted adult criminals; the rest were juveniles.

To fully appreciate what the 114 full-time probation officers in Ontario are doing we should take two very important factors into consideration. One is that they collected from the 6,100 convicted adult criminals $43,000 by way of restitution to those who had suffered at their hands. More startling, however, is the fact that instead of the 6,100 adults costing the province and the Dominion of Canada money for their keep and care while in places of detention—and this bears out the contention of the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina—records were kept of their earnings since they were put on probation, and the last figure obtainable showed that they had earned over $10 million. When I learned that, I thought it was an exaggerated figure but I worked it out, and it comes to an average of about $33 weekly for a year, which would be $10,467,600, so I presume it is correct.

I am sure honourable senators will be glad to know that the probation officers have also done a very good work in our family courts. The last audited figures show that $2,375,000 has been collected for the support of deserted wives and children. This, up to date, is the record for Ontario.

In British Columbia the number of probation officers still stands at 12. In Alberta and Saskatchewan there are two each. In Manitoba there are no probation officers at the present time, but I am informed that the money is in this year's budget for the establishment of a probation office with three officials. In Nova Scotia there are two probation officers, and the money is in the budget for two more. In Newfoundland there is also a probation officer.

This, honourable senators, is a record of which Canada has no reason to be ashamed, in my opinion. As a matter of fact, I would go so far as to say it is a record of which we should be proud. Admittedly, it is not as good as that of some countries. However, it is expected that the report of the Fauteux committee will recommend a number of progressive reforms.

I would again like to thank the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina for bringing this matter before the Senate. I am sure we all hope that in a few years from now we will be dealing with those convicted of minor crimes and misdemeanours of the less serious kind in a much more advanced and humanitarian manner than we are doing at the present time.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, this inquiry of the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) has unquestionably been inspired by a very generous heart, and the debate so far has been very interesting, although academic. I say that not because honourable senators who have taken part in the debate did not draw any conclusions, but because the inquiry itself suggests no conclusions. The intention of the sponsor was to bring the case of the prisoners to the attention of the Canadian people in order that some reforms could be made to the present situation in prisons and penitentiaries.

There is a distinction to be made between prisoners who suffer their fate by virtue of federal legislation, namely the Criminal Code, and those who are sentenced to jail by virtue of other legislation passed by legislatures or organizations such as municipal councils. Prisoners sentenced under the latter type of legislation may find themselves in jail because they have committed crimes or have not paid a fine. Certainly, there is a distinction to be made.

There are some prisoners who come under the jurisdiction of the Honourable the Solicitor General for a ticket of leave, and others who can be released by the attorneys general of the provinces, or even by the chief of police who can open the cell in the morning and say to a prisoner: "You have been in jail one night; that is enough, you may go now." There are an infinity of cases. What I wish to stress to honourable senators is that some cases are administered from Ottawa, others by the attorneys general of the provinces, the recorders, and even the chief of police, who, when he is a Good Samaritan, is a parole officer and a probation officer.

There are a great many more probation officers than the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina indicated. He mentioned about 100. To that there should be added nearly 300 more because each member of Parliament is in effect a probation officer and a parole officer. He looks after all those poor people who are in distress. Parents come to him and say, "Our son is suffering very deeply in his heart; we did our best to educate him, but see what bad companions have done to him; he was induced to do things that we reprove, and he is suffering for it." They say they are an honourable family and ask for help. The member of Parliament does his best to secure a certificate from the mayor of the municipality and have it countersigned by the local parish priest or clergyman. This he sends to the Solicitor General, pointing out that the prisoner is a good fellow, that he comes from an honourable family, and that because of certain circumstances he did things forbidden by law, and he implores clemency. I know this to be so because for many years when I was in active practice I tried to get my clients out of jail, and after I was elected to Parliament I found I was called upon to look after all my legal confrères' clients who had met sad fate before the courts and were in jail. I too made recommendations, supported by certificates from leading people in the community, in an attempt to have prisoners released.

In making such recommendations, what I noticed most was the care taken by the Department of the Solicitor General and by the Department of Justice to examine each case carefully. Sometimes it is desirable to have a favourable answer as soon as possible so that the prisoner, if he is to be released, may more quickly get a job and support his family who have become a charge on the state. It is hoped that if he is released he will be an asset to the community. But in each case the Department of the Solicitor General wants to have all particulars about the prisoner and is most anxious to keep a complete file for the purpose of probation and parole.

Incidentally, some countries have a probation system which keeps persons who have committed offences against the law out of jail. The whole case of the prisoner is studied, including his family connections, what he has done in the past, if he has erred or if he has behaved well; all this information is brought together in a big file for each prisoner, and it shows how meritorious his case may be. But how many civil servants would have to be employed by the Department of Justice or by the Honourable the Solicitor General in order to achieve that result for every prisoner? The aim seems to be perfection. Is it possible to do that in each case? I do not think so. It would take a great army of civil servants to check all the pertinent facts about each prisoner.

I have not had as much patience to compile statistics as did honourable senators who have addressed this chamber, but I did get some information. When I heard the sponsor of the inquiry say that Canada sent some 100,000 people to jail last year I was shocked and thought that that was a very large number for such a small country as ours. I wanted precise information as to the number of prisoners in this country. I was told by well informed people that the number of prisoners in Canada, not only in the penitentiaries but in the jails as well, at the beginning of the year was approximately 15,000 and at the end of the year also it was 15,000; and although during the year there were a considerable number of discharges, the reason why there were as many inmates at the end of the year as at the beginning was that many of the persons convicted during the year were recidivists. These people like the atmosphere of the jail and want to return time after time. There are some people in this country who appear before a police court magistrate every second week or every month charged with the same offence. Usually it is that of being found drunk on the street. For being in that condition they are arrested, convicted, sentenced to a week or two or three weeks in custody, or given the option of paying a fine, which they do not pay, because they would rather go to jail. While in there they earn money, they do not pay anything for their board or shelter, and they are happy about the whole thing. Of course, they are not in the majority, but there are many people like that in all parts of the country, and in fact in every country of the world. They are sad cases, but life is that way.

In my experience I have had occasion to deal with cases that were most deserving of sympathy, and at other times with cases in which I felt no sympathy at all for the prisoner, but nevertheless I did what I could to help them, as a penance for the remission of my own sins.

Something I could not quite comprehend at times, honourable senators, was that in the case of a man being sent to jail for cruelly beating his wife, she would be the first one to apply for a ticket of leave for him. She would ask for her husband's release even though her own life would sometimes be in danger. In this regard I had some strange recommendations made to me, and one in particular was noteworthy. It was signed by the mayor of the municipality and countersigned by the parish priest, and was to the effect that they were recommending that So-and-so be granted a ticket of leave, provided he would never return to the district! I did not forward that letter to the department, and I refer to it only because it serves to show how difficult it is at times to help those people.

I would like to say a word or two about the conditions in the prisons, but I must say I am not in a position to talk about this feature in a precise manner because I have not visited many of these institutions. I have seen the inside of some of our jails when I was called in by a prisoner, and I must say that in eastern Quebec a large number of jails now offer excellent accommodation, largely as a result of having been rebuilt. The Rivière du Loup jail was under reconstruction during the administrations of Mr. Taschereau and Mr. Godbout, and under the administration of Mr. Duplessis the work has been completed. It is a very fine building now, and all the prisoners there are well treated. The jail at Chicoutimi is a magnificent building. I can say the same for the jails at Rimouski and Montmagny. In fact, the judge who visits Montmagny on circuit told me that the court house there was well built, that the jail was in very good condition and that there were no complaints at all about it. I intend to follow the example of the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) and the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson), and visit the penitentiaries, to see what they are like. I will make it a point to listen to the prisoners and hear what they have to say. I consider that to be part of my duty. I may say that up to the present those inmates whom I have met say they have been well treated and have no ground for complaint.

Sometimes I receive letters from outside the province of Quebec. Some years ago I had a letter of complaint from some prisoners in New Brunswick and I could not do anything else but send the letter to the Attorney General of that province.

The Honourable the Minister of Justice and the Honourable the Solicitor General are extremely solicitous and very careful to do their very best to help those unfortunate people who are deprived of their liberty in this way.

I come now to discuss the question as to why people are in prison. They are in prison because they have been found guilty of committing an offence. I speak now of those who come under the jurisdiction of the federal Government, the inmates of penitentiaries. They have been sentenced to a prison term as a result of having been found guilty of committing an offence forbidden by a law passed by Parliament, by the Senate as well as the House of Commons. It is Parliament which has set the minimum and maximum penalties for each offence. In the first place the offence or the crime was defined by Parliament and set out in the Criminal Code. Crimes set out in that code are not to be committed if one wants to stay out of jail.

And now, honourable senators, we come to the consideration of an institution of which we must be proud. It is the right to trial by jury, won from King John by the Barons.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, may I request that, out of consideration for the honourable gentleman who is speaking, honourable senators refrain from audible conversation?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I could speak louder, but I do not think it is necessary.

The duty of the jury is to decide whether the prisoner in the box is guilty or not. British justice is admirable; it requires that a prisoner shall enjoy the benefit of the doubt; before he is found guilty he is not deemed to be so. That is an excellent principle. A man is accused of some crime. He is before the court and the jury; he has a lawyer to defend his case. If he has not committed the crime he has every opportunity to prove to the satisfaction of the jury and the court that he is not guilty. If he is not guilty he shall not be punished. If, although innocent through some mistake of the court in addressing the jury, or of the jury itself, he is found guilty, he has a right of appeal, even to the Supreme Court of Canada, the highest tribunal in the land. Thus he has every opportunity to defend himself in order to enjoy the liberty which is the greatest gift of British justice.

If he is found guilty, there are certain considerations to be borne in mind in the imposition of the penalty. A margin is provided between the minimum and the maximum of a sentence, and it is left to the judge to decide whether the maximum or the minimum or something between the two is the proper penalty for his offence. So variations in the severity of the sentence are provided for—a principle which accords with the true spirit of the law. Everything is taken into consideration—to the advantage alike of the prisoner and of society—so that no one shall suffer an injustice in this land.

Sometimes one has to be forceful in maintaining respect for the law. From time to time the criticism is heard that nothing is done in the Senate. This is unjust. I shall not attempt to cover all the ground from the institution of this body as a legislative chamber; but I will say, honourable senators, that one of the most important things which has been done by or on behalf of the Senate was the work of the special committee on the traffic in narcotic drugs. We had been reading in many Canadian papers that young children were the victims of peddlers of narcotics, and that nothing could be done to stop the traffic. But a committee was appointed; a committee consisting of serious, honest, courageous and intelligent people, who determined to get to the bottom of the scandal and to see if there was some way of stopping this continuous offence against society, and our youth in particular. The success of the committee, honourable senators, was tremendous; and it is no more than justice to affirm that this body has every reason to be proud of having appointed it, because of the good work done by its members. The committee had to be firm; in the nature of things it could not be tender-hearted. Although it was not an inquisition, it could not do other than it did and be true to the commission imposed on it by the Senate. Its work for the good of the state has proved so successful that, following the example of Canada, other countries have decided on similar investigations.

A service of this kind is at times ignored. I do not think it can be called too often to attention, so that no honourable senator, when he reflects on accomplishments of this kind, need have any inferiority complex.

As I have said, sometimes it is impossible to be tender-hearted. The examination into and revision of criminal procedure is more difficult in Canada than, for example, in Great Britain. With us, complications arise because of the various jurisdictions exercised respectively by the federal Department of Justice and the departments of the provincial Attorneys General. Some matters come exclusively under Ottawa, others under the provinces. So, when difficulties arise, the only way to a satisfactory conclusion is to bring together a group of composed representatives of the federal Justice Department and the departments of the Attorneys General of the provinces, to discuss possible reform. We are about to get it. Last night the Honourable the Minister of Justice announced in the House of Commons that during that day he had received from Mr. Justice Fauteux a copy in English of the report of the committee appointed on December 11, 1953, to inquire into the principles and procedures followed in the remission service of the Department of Justice. The minister also stated that the report of Mr. Justice Fauteux and his associates on the committee, men thoroughly familiar with criminal law, will be tabled in Parliament as soon as the necessary printing and translation is completed. The report will be published in both English and French, and all members of Parliament will have full opportunity to peruse it. But there have been further announcements about this subject. Not long ago I read in one of my favourite newspapers, the Halifax Chronicle-Herald, that a meeting of great importance is to take place between representatives of the federal Department of Justice and representatives of the Attorneys General of the various provinces. These officials will sit down together and review the whole subject. It will be a timely meeting and it is certainly called for. It should result in the elimination of any question as to different jurisdictions, for the types of cases which come under different jurisdictions will be dealt with by these representatives from provincial and federal jurisdictions. I hope that I have made my point clear.

Honourable senators, I do not wish to prolong this discussion now because we shall only have to start anew after we have studied Mr. Justice Fauteux's report, and certainly after we have studied the report of the meeting between the federal and provincial representatives on the very matter now before the Senate.

Those who have taken part in this debate so far have spoken in a manner that would be creditable to the Minister of Justice himself. Their material has been gathered with utmost care and their arguments have been presented in a clear manner. There have been slight differences of opinion, but on the whole the debate has shown that the Senate of Canada has every sympathy for prisoners who are deserving of it. Of course, I would not say that every prisoner is deserving of sympathy. There have been some shameful cases where men have behaved badly with youth, men who have killed young people, men who are abnormal. I wonder what is to be done with them. They do not deserve any sympathy, and it is wrong to forget that the Criminal Code, the Department of Justice, the offices of the provincial Attorneys General, the police forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have been established to protect society against these criminals. There is not only the jail, there is the rope. And I wonder if the rope is enough. People show sympathy for a victim of a crime, but I am shocked by the sympathy these same people later display for the criminal after the poor victim has been forgotten. I cannot at all understand this change of attitude, and I have found it discouraging.

If we are to be a happy country our citizens must abide by the laws of the land. We all know what is right and what is wrong. Our Criminal Code is really based on the Ten Commandments of God, together with many rules and regulations. When we think about it, perhaps the many laws on our statute books may explain the commission of some misdemeanours or delits. We may have too many laws, but each of us knows right from wrong. It is not the Criminal Code that tells us this, it is our own conscience. Sometimes unfortunate incidents occur because one is absent-minded and does not think beforehand of the consequences of an act. This sort of thing should be taken into consideration when assessing the degree of an offence. It is left to the jury composed of humble men like myself to decide whether an accused is guilty or not. In my experience before the bar I was always satisfied with the verdict of the twelve honest men serving on the jury.

The important thing today is to segregate prisoners so that a young man will not be corrupted by being placed with a hardened criminal. I leave this to honourable senators to think about, for it concerns one of the most urgent needs in penal reform today. Is there enough room in the penitentiaries and jails? The Department of Justice is building another penal institution now just to give more space to criminals so that they may be segregated. I consider this a very good thing and I hope it will be successful. If we give a prisoner the chance to rehabilitate himself and to become a good citizen, instead of being a liability to the state he will become an asset, and perhaps a good citizen; but it requires a lot of thought, a lot of prudence and a lot of tact, and above all a lot of common sense. I do not believe at all that psychiatrists can do everything. I believe in a good heart, and in good judgment. If prisoners are approached by men who are gifted with a kind heart and good sound judgment, the number of those who appear before the courts for doing otherwise than they should be will be much less numerous.

Honourable senators, I am sorry to have spoken at such length, although I could speak much longer on this subject. We cannot look after a certain number of people for a great many years without having a deep sympathy for them and trying to improve their lot, but it is impossible to do so at the expense of the whole community, of the whole country; it cannot be done that way. They have to be reformed, they have to be helped by the state, but they must not forget, at the same time, that what they have done is wrong. This debate has proven that the Senate is equal to its high reputation in discussing so important a problem.

Before concluding, I wish to express my thanks to and admiration for the present Solicitor General (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and to all his predecessors, from the time of the Honourable E. J. McMurray, who came here from Winnipeg thirty-odd years ago. They have done a good job and they deserve the respect of their country. Their work has been most painstaking, and they have done it according to their consciences and for the good not only of prisoners but of society. That is the way to deal with such difficult problems.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. McGrand, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

GRAND FALLS CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY LIMITED—SECOND READING

Hon. A. B. Baird, for Hon. Mr. Pratt, moved the second reading of Bill Y-9, an Act to incorporate Grand Falls Central Railway Company Limited.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill affects a great many people in the interior of Newfoundland. The Anglo Newfoundland Development Company, at the time of its incorporation, had special rights pertaining to the operation of a railway. The railway was constructed to enable the company to carry on its pulp and paper operations, and there are now some 22 miles of track servicing the towns of Windsor, Grand Falls, Bishop's Falls and Botwood. The railway which carries the company's products from its Grand Falls mill is used for the transportation of ore concentrates from Buchan's Mines and as well the transport of miscellaneous goods and passengers. The magnitude and diversification of the Anglo Newfoundland Development Company's operations requires that its activities be carried on through other than a single corporation. The railway, more and more, is employed as a common carrier of goods for the purpose other than those of the A.N.D. Company, and it is desirable that its operations should be in a separate corporation.

The railway company, servicing as it does four towns in Newfoundland, has an operational character quite distinct from that of the A.N.D. Company itself. One of the main reasons, therefore, for seeking a special bill to incorporate a railroad company is to divorce, corporationwise, the rail activities from the A.N.D. Company.

In addition, after the company is subjected to federal authority in its railway operations, it will be a common carrier; and shippers, including not only the A.N.D. Company, but all others at present existing and in future to come will be given the benefit of the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

The Maritime Freight Rates Act, Chapter 174, Revised Statutes of Canada, arbitrarily grants to industries shipping in and out of the Maritime provinces a 20 per cent federal subsidy on rail movements. The statute was enacted to assist industrial growth in the Maritime provinces of Canada and by section 12 of the act is applicable to the province of Newfoundland. The act was applied to the province in keeping with the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada.

The A.N.D. Company railway at the present time is a "provincial railway", being owned and operated by a company subject only to provincial authority. The operation of the A.N.D. Company railway by a company incorporated by federal act will subject the railway to federal authority in every regard. Principally, the maintenance and operation of the railway and the tariffs charged by the railway will be subject to the provisions of the Railway Act and the jurisdiction of the Board of Transport Commissioners. The enactment of this act will bring this railway, which is in many regards public in its scope, within the standard pattern of railway operations found throughout Canada.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Baird, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce Nos. 248 to 253, which were presented on April 26.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Committee, moved that the reports be adopted.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 2, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 254 to 290, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I have the permission of the honourable senator to ask a question?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Haig: How many petitions has the committee yet to deal with?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I have not the figures with me but I shall get them and give the information to the Senate at the next sitting, if that will be satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Thank you.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

BILLS—FIRST READINGS

Hon. Mr. Roebuck presented the following bills:

Bill C-10, an Act for the relief of Edith May Robertson Thompson.

Bill D-10, an Act for the relief of Hans Christian Anderson.

Bill E-10, an Act for the relief of Raffaele Polissena.

Bill F-10, an Act for the relief of Hilda Evelyn Charlton Carlson.

Bill G-10, an Act for the relief of Dorothy Pilkington Wilson.

The bills were read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: With leave, next sitting.

CANADA-DENMARK INCOME TAX AGREEMENT BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill 8, an act to implement an agreement between Canada and the Kingdom of Denmark for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill approves a tax agreement or convention entered into between Canada and Denmark, and declares the provisions of the agreement to have the force of law. In addition, the bill provides that if there are any inconsistencies between the agreement and the general law in relation to income tax in Canada and Denmark respectively, the provisions of the agreement shall prevail.

For those honourable senators who were in the house last session, I may say that the provisions of this tax agreement are similar in all substantial aspects to the tax agreement between Canada and Ireland which Parliament approved about a year ago. However, perhaps I should take a few minutes to tell the house the salient features of the agreement now before us.

The agreement is annexed as a schedule to the bill and, as I have said, the bill gives it the force of law. It applies to income taxes and surtaxes in Canada and corresponding taxes in Denmark. So, by the passage of this bill Parliament is enacting legislation that affects the income tax law of Canada.

The term "Denmark" excludes the Faroe Islands and Greenland for the purposes of this agreement. I think possibly the reason for that is that these islands do not have what would correspond to an income tax law at this time; but there is provision in the agreement for their inclusion if that becomes advisable, important or necessary in the future.

The basis for determination of what is taxable and to what extent it is taxable is to be found in the agreement. Generally, it is this: the expression "Danish enterprise" means an enterprise carried on by a resident of Denmark; and "Canadian enterprise" means an enterprise carried on by a person resident of Canada. Now, where you have a Danish enterprise operating in some fashion in Canada, or a Canadian enterprise operating in some fashion in Denmark, what is the incidence of taxation, if any? As a basis for determination of that the agreement provides, first, that the profits of a Canadian enterprise in Denmark will not be taxable unless the enterprise has what is called a "permanent establishment" in Denmark. Similarly, the profits of a Danish enterprise carrying on trade or business in Canada will not be subject to Canadian income tax unless the enterprise has a "permanent establishment" in Canada.

The term "permanent establishment" encompasses a variety of things. As will be seen from the definition section, article II, at the bottom of page 3, it means:

> A branch office, factory, or other fixed place of business, a mine, quarry or any other place of natural resources subject to exploitation. It also includes a place where building construction is carried on by contract for a period of at least one year, but does not include an agency unless the agent has, and habitually exercises, a general authority to negotiate and conclude contracts on behalf of the enterprise or has a stock of merchandise from which he regularly fills orders on its behalf.

For instance, if a Canadian enterprise were operating through an agency that it maintained in Denmark and that agency was one that habitually and generally represented the Canadian enterprise in Denmark, then it would be carrying on business and maintaining a permanent establishment in Denmark. And, in reverse, the same rule would apply to a Danish enterprise maintaining an agency in Canada.

But there are certain exceptions. First of all, the profits that are taxable where there is a permanent establishment are the profits attributable to the operation of that permanent establishment, and they bear the income tax rates that prevail respectively in Denmark and Canada. Now, a Canadian enterprise might have a permanent establishment in Denmark, and if that permanent establishment was used only for the purpose of purchasing supplies, goods and merchandise for its operations elsewhere, it would not be such a permanent establishment as would attract tax. That is easy to understand, because if you are only on the buying end of something in Denmark or Canada the transaction that produces profits must occur somewhere else.

Then, if a Canadian enterprise uses an agent in Denmark or a Danish enterprise uses an agent in Canada, for the sale of its goods or merchandise, and that agent acts in the same capacity for any number of people, that is not regarded as maintaining a permanent establishment in Denmark or in Canada, as the case may be, so the question of being subject to tax in those instances would not arise. Of course, if a Canadian enterprise operates through a subsidiary company in Denmark, that subsidiary company would bear its own incidence of tax in Denmark, but the fact that it was a subsidiary company and had a permanent establishment in Denmark would not make the parent company subject to tax on the basis of the subsidiary company's permanent establishment. And in the reverse case this rule would apply to a Danish enterprise operating through a subsidiary in Canada.

I do not propose to deal with all the exceptions. I have stated how profits are determined. Now, if you have the very close and comfortable relationship of a parent company and a subsidiary, or an enterprise of one country operating a branch in the other, there may be as between those two operations such a relationship or agreement as to leave a larger proportion of the profits in Canada or in Denmark, as the case may be. In those circumstances the country in which the subsidiary or branch operates has the right to look into the transactions, so as to determine the profits attributable to the permanent establishment in that country, on the basis of what those profits might be if there were a really independent operation there.

With respect to dividends which may come from an operation in Denmark or in Canada, respectively, if they are paid out of the profits to the extent that these dividends are paid to persons who are not residents of the country wherein they are earned, they are not subject to any tax. Profits, of course, have already been taxed.

Generally speaking, either country may impose a withholding tax on dividends, interest, rents or royalties that are derived in the other country if these are not attributable to the maintenance of a permanent establishment in that country.

So far as ships and aircraft are concerned, there is the same provision as in the convention with Ireland. That is, as respects ships and aircraft of a Canadian enterprise operating in Denmark, the tax on profits on the operations of the enterprise would be based on the residence of the enterprise. In other words, if a Canadian enterprise operates ships and aircraft not only in Canada but in Denmark, the profits of those operations would be taxable only at the residence of the enterprise, which would be Canada; and in the reverse situation, they would be taxable only in Denmark.

So far as the withholding tax is concerned, the general convention is that, with respect to dividends, interest, rents or royalties derived from sources within Canada, or derived from sources within Denmark, either country may impose a 15 per cent withholding tax, and if such enterprise, whether Canadian or Danish, owns a subsidiary company operating in the other country, and there are dividends passing from the subsidiary to the parent company, and the subsidiary-parent relationship arises by reason of ownership of 50 per cent or more of the shares, the withholding tax may be 5 per cent instead of 15 per cent. The same provision is in the Irish convention.

Copyright fees, royalties in respect of the production or reproduction of any literary, dramatic, musical or artistic work—excluding motion picture film—derived from sources in the other country by for instance a Canadian enterprise, obtaining income of that kind from sources in Denmark, would be exempt from the Danish tax; and in the reverse situation they would be exempt from Canadian tax.

The remuneration for the services of a Danish citizen who is in Canada performing governmental functions, or of a Canadian citizen performing similar functions in Denmark, is taxable only in the person's country of residence, not in the place where he is doing the work. If, however, an individual is working for a concern which earns profits, that, of course, is a difference story and this exemption does not apply. So if perchance a crown company of Canada or a similar Danish corporation had operations in the other country, this provision will not be applicable, since either company might earn a profit.

So far as personal and professional services are concerned, a Danish citizen, for instance, may perform personal services of a professional character in Canada, and if he does so for a Danish resident he is subject to no Canadian tax on those earnings, provided he is not here for a period or periods longer than 183 days in a year. That applies in the reverse situation where a Canadian performs such services in Denmark.

I should point out there is an exception. An exemption is not allowed in the case of public entertainers or professional athletes. In other words, an exemption is not allowed to a Danish public entertainer or professional athlete who comes to Canada, and in the reverse situation it is not allowed to a Canadian public entertainer or professional athlete who goes to Denmark. The earnings made in one country by public entertainers and professional athletes of the other country are subject to the ordinary laws of taxation.

A pension or annuity derived from sources within Canada by a resident of Denmark is exempt from Canadian tax, and likewise any pension or annuity derived from sources within Denmark by a resident of Canada is exempt from Danish tax.

Article XI of the agreement provides that professors or teachers from Canada or from Denmark, as the case may be, who receives remuneration for teaching, during a period of temporary residence not exceeding two years, at a university, college, school or other educational institution in the other country, is exempt from tax in that other country in respect of the income derived in those circumstances. For instance, a Canadian professor or teacher instructing in Denmark is exempt from tax in Denmark; and in the reverse situation a Danish professor or teacher instructing in Canada is exempt from tax in this country.

Article XII of the agreement deals with students or business apprentices. If a Canadian student or business apprentice goes to Denmark and receives full-time education or training in that country he will be exempt from tax in Denmark on payments made to him by a person or persons in Canada who are financing his education or training in Denmark. In the reverse situation, a Danish student or business apprentice who comes to Canada for full-time education or training will be exempt from Canadian tax.

Under article XIII a Canadian resident when paying his Canadian tax is entitled to an exemption on income earned in Denmark to the extent of the Danish tax. In other words, he may offset the Danish tax on that income earned in Denmark when he comes to pay his Canadian income tax. Danish residents when paying tax in Denmark are similarly given an exemption to the extent of the Canadian tax paid on income earned in Canada.

In a very general way I have outlined the sections dealing with exemptions. Then we come to a type of section that I have never been happy to see in any document, particularly a Canadian statute applying to Canadian citizens. Article XIV provides for exchange of information between the two countries. It says:

> The competent authorities of the contracting Governments will upon request exchange information of a fiscal nature which is available to them, or which they are able to obtain under their own legislation and which would be useful to assure the regular assessment and collection of the taxes referred to in this agreement, as well as the application with respect to these taxes of the legal provisions relative to the prevention of fiscal fraud.

That is the only place where the expression "fiscal fraud" appears, but I would point out that the wording of the section has quite a significance. It may not mean very much in its practical aspect so far as it applies to Canada and Denmark, for the amount of revenue involved would not be large, but that would not affect the principle. It occurs to me that the following situation might develop from an exchange of information. A resident of Denmark might earn income in Canada and have to pay income tax in both countries, and the Danish authorities might request the appropriate Canadian officials to supply them with information as to the Canadian operations and earnings of the Danish citizen. Under article XIV of the agreement Canada would supply such information. It might very well be that this Danish individual has satisfied all the legal requirements of the laws in Canada in relation to his earnings here. I do not know what examination would be made as a basis for a request from the Danish officials, but let us assume that they say, "We are looking into the possibility of a fiscal fraud here".

The significance of such an incident, as I see it, is that by virtue of this exchange of information Canada would be giving what I would call an extraterritorial sanction to possibly the criminal law of Denmark. And of course in the reverse situation Denmark would be giving a similar sanction to Canadian law.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Do we not do that with the United States?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, but the fact that we do it is no reason why I should not express my views on it. It is also no reason why I should not say that in its broad aspect I have difficulty in accepting the principle.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: Do we allow United States tax collectors to come into Canada to examine records of Canadian citizens or do we just provide them with the information? If the department allows the American authorities to come in and examine certain records, then I think the department is going beyond its rights, even under a treaty such as this. It is a trespass on the constitutional rights of our citizens. Giving information in returns is one thing, but to allow the American authorities to come right in and look over files and take anything they want from them is another thing. I understand this is being done at the present time, and I am wondering whether such a procedure is provided for in this agreement.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: There are some questions that I can answer, some that I cannot. As to the method that is employed, I assume the honourable senator from Vancouver (Hon. Mr. McKeen) has heard the same things I have. But I would want something more definite than that before I would make reference to it here. There is provision for exchange of information.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: I read in the press some years ago that FBI agents went into a certain office in Canada and took over the files. A Canadian court order was issued and the FBI agents were kicked out, but they had been allowed to go into the office first.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I am not dealing with that aspect. It would appear from the facts as related by my honourable friend that the FBI agents acted in excess of the law, and therefore the courts corrected the situation. I am not attempting to discuss any extension or excess of authority. I am only outlining what the article provides. Naturally, one would not expect that an excess of authority would be sanctioned by the Canadian officials, but if it occurred the courts would correct it.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: I am wondering if this legislation provides an authority that did not exist at the time I am speaking of, which was some years ago.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: May I ask the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) a question at this time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Some years ago a certain treaty was entered into between the United States and Canada. It was probably negotiated in a hurry, but to my vast astonishment and dismay I found it contained a provision that smuggling was an extraditable offence. That had a profound influence upon a very respectable portion of my electors and constituents.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: It was a type of national enterprise which had gained some status. If the people living on the border were going to be extradited, with the aid of the courts, it seemed to some of us—and I must say quite candidly to some of the ministers of the Government—to be something that had been overlooked. In the course of time that was corrected and the treaty was rewritten. As to the agreement before us, I am not so sure that the courts would have great power in the matter if the agreement were passed by Parliament and we consented to disclosure of that secret of secrets, the integrity of which the Government through its tax collector is supposed to preserve. Just how a judge would decline to issue an order of the court permitting someone with a status and a right under the law to examine the books of the Income Tax Department is something that it seems to me should be made quite clear, because we are surrendering a bit of our sovereignty, and at the moment we have not a great deal to spare.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I think that what the honourable senator has said is very apt at this time. In section 1 of article XIV providing for the exchange of information there are two aspects. In the first place, the contrasting Governments agree to exchange information "which would be useful to assure the regular assessment and collection of the taxes". That means by either country. I can quite understand that. Then it goes on to say, "as well as the application with respect to these taxes of the legal provisions relative to the prevention of fiscal fraud." It is the second aspect that I find very bothersome, for I have already cited a case where, so far as Canada is concerned, there may be no element of legal fraud and no violation of the provisions of the Canadian Income Tax Act in relation to the income, say, of a Danish citizen, yet the section would appear to give Denmark the right to ask Canada to furnish information in relation to the Danish citizen's operations in Canada, which information might be used by Denmark for the purpose of application of the Danish income tax law in relation to fiscal frauds in that country.

Having explained the effect of the article, as I see it, I do not propose to extenuate, except to call attention to the following words contained in article XIV:

> The information so exchanged shall retain its secret nature and shall not be disclosed to persons other than those charged with assessment and collection of the taxes referred to in this agreement.

That reminds me of the chap who was told a secret, and he was cautioned very seriously that he must not mention it to any person. Later it was found that he had told it to a number of people, but he justified himself very simply by saying: "Well, I thought it was all right. I only told it to people who I thought would keep a secret."

It would appear that here we are widening the doors of access to secret information. I do not know the effect this would have in the long run but I am prompted to suggest, partly facetiously, that if the lonely Shakespearean Dane should decide for some purpose or other to find an asylum or haven in Canada, and if this agreement becomes law, he might find that so far as his fiscal problems were concerned the asylum in Canada gave him no guarantee against the troubles that might pursue him from Denmark; and his loneliness would not be any the less profound nor would his asylum be any the more secure in Canada than if he had stayed in Denmark.

The only other thing I have to say is that if the agreement is proclaimed this year it will come into force in Canada on January 1, 1957, and in Denmark on April 1, 1957.

The agreement is a continuing thing—it goes on until somebody gets tired of it and either country gives notice of termination. Notice may be given before June 30 in any year, and then the agreement will cease to be effective so far as Canada is concerned, on January 1 in the next year, and so far as Denmark is concerned, on April 1.

That is the sum and substance of the agreement. How to translate it into dollars I do not know, but it seems to be part of Canadian fiscal policy to make tax conventions with as many countries as possible. We already have them with the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Ireland, Sweden. In countries where we do more business many features of the tax convention are undoubtedly very beneficial. In relation to the operations of this country's residents elsewhere, there is a definite and positive advantage arising by virtue of having tax conventions with governments in whose countries we conduct substantial business operations.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask my honourable friend a question? He stated that the withholding tax of 15 per cent may be applied by either country. Supposing one country applied the tax, would it then become reciprocal? Would the other country necessarily have to apply it?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No; the other country could steer its own course.

Hon. W. Rupert Davies: Honourable senators, I hope this bill will go to a committee and that the committee will make sure there is no joker in it. In 1946 we passed a convention with Great Britain, and there was a joker in it, a very serious one. Prior to that we made a convention with the United States. As we all know, hundreds of Canadians have fine homes in Florida, but are not subject to United States income tax. Well, I happen to have a small summer home in Britain, and for that reason I am liable to British income tax under certain conditions. When we passed the convention with Britain I thought my troubles were over. I had had a settlement with the tax authorities there just a year before. Recently, however, a very bright inspector came into our district—a graduate from Cambridge University, who has the firm intention of becoming a high official in the Internal Revenue Department. He has given me a lot of trouble.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Davies: I discovered something which I did not know before. I knew that anyone who maintains a residence in Britain is liable to income tax there, but I did not know that anyone who goes to Britain for four consecutive years is also liable to income tax in that country. What has given me the most worry is the fact that in our convention with Britain there is no definition of the word "capital". In Canada if we earn a certain amount of money, on which we pay the federal, provincial and municipal taxes, we look upon any balance we save as capital. But that is not so in Britain. There they take the view that capital is inherited money. I have argued this matter with the British authorities to quite an extent, but got practically nowhere. I find there have been rulings in their courts with respect to it.

Now there may be in this country some citizens of Danish origin who want to own a little home in Denmark in which to spend a month or two each year. What is their position with respect to income tax? For instance, in Great Britain one is required first to submit his Canadian income tax return. That is translated into sterling and is assessed at the British rate of tax. Then if the amount of money which he brings into that country is greater than the difference between the Canadian tax and the British tax, he has to pay income tax on the balance.

The joker is that a Canadian may take into Britain all the money he likes from his capital account, but he may not take in any money from his income account. However, the authorities over there maintain that he does not have any capital account unless it is inherited money. I pointed out to them that in Canada we do not inherit money, we earn it, but that argument does not seem to affect them at all.

I repeat, let us make sure there is no joker in this agreement with respect to Denmark. The word "capital" is not defined. Had it been defined in the British agreement we would know where we stand with the authorities there; but they take it upon themselves to determine its definition. In spite of the convention between the two countries, our interpretation of capital is different from theirs.

I rise to suggest that when this bill goes to committee we should try to avoid the chance of having in the agreement a joker such as that to which I have referred. The matter has given me a great deal of worry and annoyance, and cost me quite a lot of money. But as far as the convention with Britain is concerned, nothing much can be done about it at present. Had it been a convention with the United States I am sure something would have been done, because there are hundreds of influential Canadians who would want to have such a situation corrected. I doubt if there are many who are interested as far as Britain is concerned. That is why it seems to me useless to try to have that agreement amended.

Honourable senators, I strongly feel that the word "capital" should be defined in a convention of this kind.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I have some observations to make with regard to this agreement in its broadest application, rather than in its detail. I have not had an opportunity to study its various clauses, as did the member for Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden), and so there is much on which my comment at this time would be immature. However, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to this type of procedure.

In a recent debate in this house I called attention to the history and law with regard to the change of law by reason of an executive agreement. At that time I pointed out that many years ago, when the King had both the right to make a treaty and to enforce it in his own country so as to make changes in the substantive law, there was no difficulty; but as we have taken away from the executive the law-making power and left in its hands the treaty-making power, complications now arise. When the executive enters into an agreement such as this, it must still come to Parliament for implementation of the treaty through changes in the substantive law of the land.

What I said on that earlier occasion has application here. The executive makes a treaty, which is within its power, and then must come to Parliament asking for changes in the law, changes which affect particularly the individual citizen. Here we have a sweeping declaration that the whole treaty is the law of the land.

I submit to this house that that is not the way to draft the substantive law of this country. Goodness knows, the law is complicated enough now. When one wants to see what is the law of Canada, he goes in the first instance to the Revised Statutes of Canada, and perhaps looks over the statutes which have been passed since the last revision. But here we have a long agreement with Denmark, in the terms of which we find changes in the law affecting the individual citizen. The agreement is drawn in the terms of agreements, and was no doubt phrased by delegates sitting around a table and making concessions back and forth to suit the two parties and to bring about an agreement. The phraseology therefore is not that of the Criminal Code or of any other statute drawn by lawyers for the purposes of clarity and for carrying out the intention of Parliament with regard to our own citizens.

We have now before us an illustration of what happens when we adopt a procedure of declaring the terms of a treaty to have the force in the law of a statute of Parliament. The honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies) says he hopes there is no joker in this thing. Well, neither he nor I nor anybody else in this house can say whether there is a joker in this phraseology. It is indefinitely phrased when used for the purpose of changing the law. It may perhaps be quite definite as a matter of agreement between the executive in Canada and the executive in Denmark, but so far as it applies to a change of law affecting our own citizens it is utterly verbose, indefinite and unreadable.

The senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) told us of an agreement of this kind, which had been made law, in which there appeared an extradition clause. There was not an amendment to our Extradition Act, but only a part of an agreement between one nation and another, which changed the substantive law with regard to extradition as it applies to our citizens. As one goes through these agreements he will find much phraseology that is indefinite for the purposes of a legal enactment, phraseology which is quite unsuitable to be made into law applying to our own citizens. I say that is not the way to do the job.

Take for instance, the last section which the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) so ably described. He said "it would appear to" do such and such. I agree with him that it would appear to do what he says, but no one knows what it does say. It uses the words "prevention of fiscal fraud". Now, I do not suppose any well educated draftsman of statutes, charged with drawing a section with regard to fraud in the matter of income taxes, would use the words "fiscal fraud". I have never seen it; what its definition is, I do not know, and I am sure no one else does. I know something about the word "fraud", but how the word "fiscal" limits it I do not know. I could guess at it. Does it mean that any Danish citizen who comes to Canada may be interrogated by the officials of our Income Tax Department with regard to his actions in Denmark or to some memorandum or return that he has made to the taxation department in his own country, and that if certain information is obtained he may be extradited? How far it goes, nobody knows.

If we insisted, as I think we should, that when changes are to be made in our law they be incorporated in a bill or bills and be brought before us after revision by the Department of Justice, then we would have some assurance as to what we were asked to do. But to pass this bill and thereby to make this agreement the substantive law of Canada—well, I tremble at what might happen. It is not the way to do it.

I see that the department has taken care of itself, for that very article XIV says:

> Neither shall these provisions be considered as imposing on one of the two contracting Governments the obligation to perform an administrative act which would be contrary to its regulations or practices.

The department has taken care of itself indeed, but it does not extend any such protection, that I can see, to the individual in Canada affected by its provisions.

Now, take clause 2 of this bill:

> The agreement entered into between Canada and the Kingdom of Denmark, set out in the schedule, is approved and declared to have the force of law in Canada.

That is to say, if there are violations of this agreement by an individual in Canada he may be hauled into a police court or sued in the civil courts and have this long document pleaded against him. The citizen of Canada is supposed to know the law, and it is no excuse for him to plead that he did not know that we in Parliament had enacted a thing of this kind. Honourable senators, this is not the way to proceed.

Then clause 3.

> In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of this act, or the agreement, and the operation of any other law, the provisions of this act and the agreement prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

That is to say, all the protections which we may have enacted from time to time for the interests and the safety of the individual of Canada are set aside if they are inconsistent with the provisions of this act or this agreement. The thing is extraordinary. It is frightening. We should not proceed in this way.

The bill goes on to say, in clause 4:

> The Minister of National Revenue may make such orders and regulations as are, in his opinion, necessary for the purpose of carrying out the agreement or for giving effect to any of the provisions thereof.

So to the very executive that made this agreement we are passing over power to extend the provisions as they apply in Canada and to our own people.

Honourable senators, I say if there are any inconsistencies between this agreement and the substantive law of Canada this is the time for us to know what they are and all about them. If this legislation is to override the common law of this country and the statutory law of this country, it should be in statute form making clear beyond peradventure just what are the inconsistencies. We ought to know, and who should be in a better position than those who have drafted this bill to tell us where the inconsistencies lie? Why should we guess about it in this chamber? Let them bring in a bill stating in precise terms where the law of Canada is changed and let us see if we wish to adopt it as a new statute or as an amendment to existing statutes.

Remember, honourable senators, that in these matters the rights of Parliament are involved. It is our duty above all things to protect the parliamentary procedure of our country. We must not keep on handing over to the executive extraordinary powers which set aside the rights of Parliament and relieve Parliament of its responsibilities and duties. We as members of Parliament should be most jealous in this regard.

I see this phrase in article XVII of the agreement:

> The agreement shall be ratified by the contracting parties, and the instruments of ratification shall be exchanged at Copenhagen with the shortest delay.

If those who drew this agreement realized that they have not the right to ratify the agreement, but Parliament has that right, and if they had said that this agreement shall not come into force until it is ratified by Parliament they would have been much more respectful to Parliament and very much nearer the constitutional facts of our country.

Take also article XV:

> The present agreement may be extended, either in its entirety or with modifications, to the territories of the Faroe Islands and Greenland . . . The extension of the agreement and the modifications thereto shall be specified and agreed between the contracting parties in notes to be exchanged for this purpose.

Now, it may be unimportant that this agreement does or does not extend to the Faroe Islands. I do not know anything about that, but I do say that if this agreement is to be the law of the land, and is proposed in this bill, surely we should not allow it to be extended to another territory by order in council, secretly, behind green-baize doors and without notice to our citizens. It should be by act of Parliament and not by an order in council that any extension or modification of this agreement can be made applicable in law to our citizens.

I have looked through this bill and the scheduled agreement but cursorily. I did not study it before coming here because it had not been explained to us, but now I think we should give very serious consideration, not only to this agreement but to agreement after agreement as they come before us. I think we should take the definite stand that we will not approve an international agreement and at the same time call it law. I have no objection to approving an agreement, but if the executive wishes to change the law, let it bring in a bill stating what the law is and the changes proposed to be made, in the regular form. If the executive cannot do that, well then it had better not make the agreement. It is all right to make an agreement between executives so that each executive may carry it out to the extent of its ability, but when our executive undertakes to make an agreement on behalf of Parliament, then let it satisfy us beyond peradventure that the proposed changes in law are proper and satisfactory. I do not like the method of procedure now proposed.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, after listening to my honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) one would rather imagine that this bill was some desperate design to interfere with the liberty of the subject.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I do not think you can take that out of my words, that it is a desperate design.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I really want to go back to what the basic purport of this bill is. It is a relief measure designed to be of benefit to people who happen to have income both in Denmark and in Canada. It is designed to relieve them to some extent of what they would otherwise have to pay in double taxation in both countries. So to my way of thinking it is the sort of measure which Parliament should, as a general principle, approve.

I direct the attention of the house to the fact that this is by no means the first agreement of this kind which has been entered into by the executive and approved by Parliament; if anything, it is more probably the ninth or tenth. It may well be, as the honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies) and the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) mentioned a few minutes ago, that some of these agreements have contained undesirable loopholes and that certain individuals have not derived from them all the benefits they expected to receive, but it has always been the general principle of agreements of this kind that they are for the benefit of people who have incomes in the two countries involved. As to the bill before us, though I fully agree with my honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity that we should inquire into this agreement and see whether it really carries out what we and the Government of this country and the Government of Denmark obviously want to carry out—the avoidance of double taxation of our citizens—in general, it seems to me, it can be said to be beneficial legislation.

I was interested in the discussion which the honourable senator who explained this measure (Hon. Mr. Hayden) raised with respect to article XIV, and in particular the interjection of the honourable senator from Vancouver (Hon. Mr. McKeen), who asked whether the article would permit representatives or fiscal authorities of the other country to come into Canada and examine into our own fiscal records. As I read article XIV it cannot be construed as permitting anything of the kind. All it states is that—

> 1. The competent authorities . . . will upon request exchange information of a fiscal nature which is available to them, or which they are able to obtain under their own legislation . . .

That proceeding, it seems to me, would be confined to a case where, say, the fiscal authorities of Denmark asked our Department of National Revenue to furnish them with part of the information on its files with respect to some individual. I am quite sure that the article would not permit them to come into our own fiscal offices and examine the returns.

And there are a number of safeguards. My honourable friend from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) referred to the element of secrecy, about which I do not need to say more. But there is a third paragraph of this article which, I think, affords further protection. It states:

> The provisions of this article shall not in any case be considered as requiring one of the contracting Governments to disclose to the other Government, either, information other than that which its own fiscal legislation permits it to obtain, or information the furnishing of which would involve the disclosure of industrial, commercial or professional secrets or trade processes.

So the amount of information which under this provision could be given to the Government of Denmark would be no more than the Government of Canada had already obtained under our Income Tax Act.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Is my honourable friend stating that correctly? Did he say that "it did" obtain or "it could" obtain?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: "Permits it to obtain".

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No; but the honourable senator said that the information to be given under this section would be no more than our income tax authorities "had obtained" or "could obtain". Which did he say?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Or which they can obtain under our legislation. That is quite correct.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Can the honourable senator tell us what are the limitations on how much information can now be obtained under our law?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: There is no limit.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is there any limitation on it?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Cannot our department ask for any information with respect to your income—where you got it, what you have done with it, and all the rest of it—as many questions as it likes? There is no limitation.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That may be so. But I would not think that, in answering a question which the Government of Denmark might choose to ask, our fiscal authorities would go out of their way to try to get further information from the individual. The department would merely give what information it had on its own files.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: There is no limitation of that kind in the bill, is there?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Referring to the criticism of the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) of the form of this legislation: as I have said, it is the form which is invariably adopted when application is made to Parliament for sanction of a treaty. Under our constitutional procedure, I think my honourable friend will agree, treaties between countries are matters for the executives of the countries concerned.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is so.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: And in order to be implemented, in so far as any legislation is required, they must be approved by Parliament. That is why the agreement comes to us in this form. It is a treaty made by the Governments of the two countries. It is true that it cannot go into effect until Parliament gives its approval; and that is what we are now being asked to do. In other words, it is no more or no less than a treaty of the type of those which over the past 15 years Parliament has had before it, each of which was entered into by the executive and submitted to Parliament for ratification.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: This is not an approval of the contract. Are there not two methods of procedure? One is to approve the document, the agreement; and I think there is clear law that that action does not make the agreement the law of the land. Mere approval by Parliament does not make it substantive law. This measure goes much further, does it not, than a request for mere approval? It declares in its opening paragraphs that the agreement shall have the force of law. I have no objection to approving an agreement; my objection is to making the agreement law.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That of course is the precise object of giving the relief to the individuals who thereby will be relieved from taxation; who otherwise, under income tax law, would have to pay higher taxes. This agreement reduces their taxes in the relevant cases; and the legislation we are asked to pass is the law in that connection.

Hon. Mr. Davies: I am confused about this agreement. It is stated to have been signed on the 30th of September, 1955, but from the first page of the bill it appears that the agreement will not become law until proclaimed by the Governor in Council. So it is not law at the present time and will not become law until Parliament makes it so. Is that not right?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That is so, yes. That is why the article of the agreement quoted by the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity provides that the agreement shall be ratified by the contracting parties, and that the instruments of ratification shall be exchanged at Copenhagen with the shortest delay. That refers to the agreement between the executives and it means that they will mutually submit the agreement to their respective Parliaments for approval, and if the Parliaments refuse to give approval then of course the agreement will not come into force.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Parliament has no right to change the agreement.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: No. It can either accept or reject it.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, some years ago I shared the view that has been expressed this afternoon by the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). I still feel that theoretically he may be right, but in practice what he suggests is impossible to do. For instance, do you think that the Parliament of Canada could pass legislation before the entente is made with another country? Do you think that in international matters like this Parliament should pass legislation without an understanding with the other country concerned, and that the Parliament of the other country should pass similar legislation, and then have the entente made after passage of legislation by both Parliaments? That procedure would not work.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Ratification is the final step. First of all, you have the making of the agreement by the executives. If it is approved by the two Parliaments then the final step is ratification.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I want to make myself clear. I share the views of the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) and not those of the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity, for in my humble opinion the agreement must be made before legislation can be passed by the two legislative bodies to ratify the understanding—the entente cordiale, if you wish. I do not see any other way to proceed. The Canadian Parliament has always proceeded in the way it is proceeding now with this agreement. One may agree theoretically with the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity, but when we come to a practical application of the facts we cannot do otherwise than agree with our colleague from Inkerman.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, for Hon. Mr. Hackett, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

TRANS-PRAIRIE PIPELINES OF CANADA, LTD.—SECOND READING

Hon. T. A. Crerar moved the second reading of Bill A-10, an Act respecting Trans-Prairie Pipelines of Canada, Ltd.

He said: Honourable senators, I think this measure will prove quite acceptable to the house but perhaps a few words of explanation would enable honourable members to reach a speedier decision on it.

It will be recalled that at the last session of Parliament several pipe line bills were introduced and passed. Three of the companies which were incorporated at that time were the Trans-Prairie Pipelines, Ltd., the Westspur Pipe Line Company and the Saskatchewan & Manitoba Pipeline Limited.

Last year the promoters of the Trans-Prairie Pipelines Limited were operating a pipe line in the Virden district of Manitoba under a Manitoba charter. They wanted to cross into Saskatchewan, where prospective oil wells are developing, and in order to do so it was necessary for them to get authority from Parliament and to come under the control of the general Pipe Lines Act, which is administered by the Board of Transport Commissioners. In September the company applied to the board for authority to proceed, but at the same time two other applications covering the same territory were also presented. The board then had to decide which of these companies it would authorize to build a pipe line to serve this particular area, and it finally decided in favour of the Westspur Pipe Line Company, a subsidiary of the Imperial Oil Company. Trans-Prairie Pipelines was then unable to proceed, because it had no authority to do so. When it applied to Parliament for incorporation it intended to serve a comparatively local area. Now it has hopes of entering the field in a much wider area. I understand that the company has properties in northwestern Alberta, and no doubt it is felt that the designation "Trans-Prairie Pipelines" might be a limiting factor. At any rate, the company want to obtain a name that will more closely correspond with its possible activities in the future. All that is sought by this bill is parliamentary approval to change the name from Trans-Prairie Pipelines of Canada, Ltd., to Northwest Transmission Company Limited. The powers and obligations of the company under the present act will remain the same.

Honourable senators, I think this bill should go to the Committee on Transport and Communications and be held over for at least a week before third reading, so that anyone who might object to the new name of the company would have an opportunity to appear before the committee and voice his objection. However, it is not anticipated that any objection will be raised.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Can the honourable senator tell me if any other transmission company bears a similar name to the new name proposed for this company?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I do not know of another company with a similar name, but if there is it would be drawn to the attention of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask the honourable senator if the change in name has anything to do with the fact that the transmission companies have been doing well, while the pipeline companies are having trouble?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I think not. Of course, the company still retains its authority under the act passed last year, and although I am not competent to say whether it plans expansion immediately or not, I am informed that it has in mind the possibility of operating in a wider field, and so wishes to have authority for a change of name.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Honourable senators, I am glad to hear this bill is going to committee, because my curiosity is aroused with regard to the word "transmission". When the bill to incorporate the company came before us last session I think we all had it clearly in our minds that we were dealing with a pipe line. In the mind of the layman pipe lines are built for the transportation of gas. The proposed change of the name of the company to Northwest Transmission Company Limited seems to imply entry into a larger field. I would like to hear further explanation in committee, because to my mind the word "transmission" has no relation to the word "pipelines".

Hon. Mr. Crerar: In reply to the honourable senator from New Westminster, I would point out that even if the name is changed the company will still have to operate under the powers already granted to it by Parliament, which powers were specifically for the operation of pipe lines. The company would have to come back to Parliament for an amendment to its charter if it wished to engage in other forms of transmission.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Crerar, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

STATISTICS

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, earlier this afternoon the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) asked how many divorce petitions remain to be heard. The answer is that 75 petitions are now pending.

The statistics to date are as follows:

	Petitions
Heard and recommended	281
Rejected	4
Withdrawn	9
Total disposed of	294
Yet to be heard	75
Grand total for session	369

Hon. Mr. Haig: Thank you, very much.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, May 3, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

STAFF OF THE SENATE

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION REPORT

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present to the Senate a report of the Civil Service Commission of Canada respecting revision of salary ranges.

The Clerk Assistant: (Reading): The Civil Service Commission has the honour—

Hon. J. Adélard Godbout: Honourable senators, as the report will appear in the Minutes, I suggest we dispense with the reading of it.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Godbout, with leave, the report was referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts for consideration and report.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill No. 216, an Act to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Godbout: With leave, next sitting.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—
REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the report of the committee on Bill Q-8.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to whom was referred the Bill (Q-8) intituled: "An Act respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company", have in obedience to the order of reference of April 25, 1956, examined the said bill and now beg leave to report the same without any amendment.

Hon. Mr. Gershaw: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the sponsor of this bill if the railway runs into the town of Pincher Creek and, if not, has this been considered?

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: Honourable senators, the railway runs from Brocket to the centre of the gas field. I do not think it runs into the town of Pincher Creek. There are no doubt other towns in the area which would like to have the railway start from their particular location. But without arguing the point one way or the other, I think the town of Brocket was chosen on account of the suitability of its terrain for railway building.

Hon. Mr. Gershaw: May I ask if representations by the Board of Trade of Pincher Creek were made to the committee which considered the bill?

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: I do not know whether representations were made to anyone else, but I heard nothing whatsoever until after the committee met this morning. I have since heard that representations had been made to certain quarters in Ottawa suggesting that it might be advisable, from the standpoint of the town of Pincher Creek, to have the railway start at that point instead of Brocket. But, as I say, no representations came to me directly or indirectly until after the committee considered the bill this morning.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Perhaps I should say that no representations of any such character were made to the committee this morning.

The report was adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: Next sitting.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Godbout: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate I move that when this house rises today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The motion was agreed to.

CANADA-DENMARK INCOME TAX AGREEMENT BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden for the second reading of Bill 8, an Act to implement an agreement between Canada and the Kingdom of Denmark for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Hon. John T. Hackett: Honourable senators, I am grateful to the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) for moving adjournment of this debate yesterday on my behalf. The discussion yesterday afforded some very enlightening and helpful suggestions on the part of the honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies) and the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck).

I do not intend to make any extended remarks. I wanted answers to two or three questions. The first is: What is the taxing power in Denmark? Does it reside in a unitary power or in provinces or states, as we know them in this country and in the United States? If there are two or more taxing powers are they affected by the treaty which is the substance of the bill?

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I do not intend to delay the house at any great length. I would not have taken part in the debate at all if it had not been for the speeches made by the honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies) and the honourable senator for Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). These two speeches very much disturbed me.

It was my impression that the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden), who sponsored the bill in his usual clear and lucid way, was troubled by the provision which gives the right to income tax authorities in Denmark to obtain certain information from our income tax branch for taxation purposes in Denmark, and vice versa. Those of us who have been in this chamber for some time know that when the honourable senator introduces a bill he is very careful to make the meaning plain, and to support it fully; and if he is doubtful about any section, the least he does, and does very ably, is to direct our attention to what he thinks it means and make it plain that he is not too satisfied with it.

I support to the limit the honourable senator from Kingston in his remarks concerning the tax agreement with Britain. If what he said is correct—and I see no reason to suppose it is not—the situation is disturbing. It means that officials of another country can demand that our citizens pay to the British exchequer taxes of a kind which are not levied on their nationals here, because the word "capital" means one thing in one country and something else in the other. If that is the state of things, we may have to revise the tax treaty with the United Kingdom and similar agreements with other countries, in order that this inequality shall no longer continue.

In the next place, I do not approve of legislation which allows any persons other than the appropriate officials of our country to examine the income tax returns of our citizens. The information in these returns belongs to our Department of National Revenue and to it alone. We are careful and strict not to permit examination of our income tax returns by anyone outside the department. This is as it should be.

Coming to the speech of the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity, I am in entire agreement with what he has said. If a client were to consult me, as a lawyer practising in the city of Winnipeg, concerning the tax situation as between Denmark and Canada, upon the basis that sometimes he was engaged on business in one country and sometimes in the other, it would be only because I happen to be a member of Parliament that I could tell him what is the Canadian income tax law in that respect. We are now required, through a special enactment embodied in a special statute, to make law with which the general statute does not deal at all. That is what it amounts to, and I think it is all wrong.

It is true that I voted for the legislation of which the honourable senator from Kingston complains, and having done so I am as much to blame as anyone else. But in my wildest moments I had not foreseen a situation such as the honourable member has described. Or rather let me say that, though treatment of this sort might be expected from some foreign states, it never occurred to me that the British authorities would raise a point such as he has described, to the prejudice of our citizens. But apparently they have done so.

The issue raised by the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity is vital to the administration of our law. Speaking generally, our procedure has been very strict. Ignorantia legis neminem excusat—"ignorance of the law is no excuse"—but in looking up the law even the most capable lawyer, unless he has had experience in dealing with these things, would hardly search through eleven different statutes enacted over a number of years.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: You mean eleven different agreements.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, the statutes make the agreements part of the law. That is the trouble. I am willing to ratify the agreement but I am not willing to change the law, and it is the law that is required to be changed in order to put the agreement into force. I assume the bill will go to committee. If it does I will ask the legal officers of the crown why, instead of drafting legislation that not only ratifies an agreement but proposes to change the law, they do not bring in general legislation covering the whole matter so that people can understand precisely what the amended law would be. I would like them to explain why the general principles of the law cannot be put on the statute books where they can be readily found, rather than in some private bill—for that is really what this is. I know that technically it is a public bill, but it has to do with what is really a private matter between Denmark and Canada and the ordinary legal person would not think of looking among the public statutes to find what the law on the matter is.

Honourable senators, I am in favour of the agreement being ratified if it is going to facilitate business between Canada and Denmark. I am in favour of all such agreements between Canada and the United States, Great Britain and other countries, but I feel that we must have a uniform law and not give any of these countries any power that we do not give our own officials to examine the income tax returns of Canadian citizens.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Honourable senators, possibly I did not raise my voice to a sufficiently high pitch, but I had asked the Acting Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Godbout) a question, and I thought it was going to be answered. If it is not too late I would like to have the question answered now.

Hon. Mr. Godbout: What exactly was the question?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Is the high contracting party Denmark a country within which there is more than one legislative power? Has it states or provinces which may enact legislation imposing taxes? If so, would those taxes fall within the purview of the law that is presented in the form of the agreement appended to the bill before us?

Hon. Mr. Godbout: I believe, though I am not certain, that there is only a single taxing authority in Denmark. The honourable member could get this information in committee. If the bill is given second reading today I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. However, at this time I would like to remind the house that, as the honourable gentleman from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) pointed out yesterday, this agreement would not increase the taxing powers of Canada and Denmark, but would limit them. Whether it may be possible to limit those powers still further I am not in a position to say, but I am sure that information also could be obtained in committee.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Honourable senators, this bill is designed for the purpose of giving effect to an agreement which is said to be "for the avoidance of double taxation". We are told that, "resident of Canada" means "any person who is resident in Canada for the purposes of Canadian tax". I make no attempt at subtlety in this question. In Canada income taxes are imposed by the federal Government and by the Government of at least one province. Under the treaty would a Dane residing in that province who is taxed by both the federal Government and the provincial Government be able to deduct his combined income tax from his Danish tax?

Hon. Mr. Godbout: I am not in a position to answer that question definitely, but I am under the impression that he could not deduct the amount of the provincial tax. This is another question which could be answered fully in committee.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: From what has been said I assume that the bill will go to the Banking and Commerce Committee. We are not all members of that committee, and those who are not members will not have the benefit of the discussion which takes place there. Perhaps at a more opportune time we might consider whether it would not be wise to discuss measures of such importance as this in committee of the whole.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the question is on the motion of the Hon. Senator Hayden, seconded by the Hon. Senator Macdonald, that bill 8 be read the second time. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: On division.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Godbout: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I would like to point out to the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) that we have a clear understanding in this house that any senator can attend any committee of which he is not a member and ask questions of anybody and get his questions answered. The only thing he cannot do is vote. That matter was settled some twenty years ago, on an occasion I was the culprit. I went to a committee, asked questions and was stopped. When I came back to this house permission was asked to postpone a debate and I objected. At that time Senator Dandurand was Leader of the Government in the Senate and Senator Meighen was Leader of the Opposition. They said: "What is the matter with the new senator from Winnipeg? He wants to stop everything." I replied, "Yes, I want to stop everything until I have the right to go to any committee and ask questions and get information from it, since we do not make a practice of going into committee of the whole house." Senator Dandurand then stated: "You have the right to go to any committee and ask questions and get information. That has always been a rule in this house, and it is the rule now." The Right Honourable Mr. Meighen entirely agreed with the leader. The rule as stated by Senator Dandurand still holds good. Therefore I say to my honourable friend from Victoria, that he can go to any of our committees, ask any questions he wishes to, and pursue any matter he is interested in until he secures the information he desires.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Honourable senators, while it is perfectly true that any member of this house can ask questions in any of our standing committees, it is also true that he cannot always manage to be present when something he is interested in is being dealt with in committee, for he may be a member of another committee that is sitting at the same time. But when the house goes into committee of the whole, every member is supposed to be present and can ask questions. I think that is a much better arrangement. It is all right for every senator to have the privilege of asking questions in standing committees, although he cannot vote in a committee of which he is not a member, but when an important bill is under consideration it is well to throw the matter wide open for discussion, and that can only be done properly in committee of the whole house. I should like to see that done occasionally.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, any member can move that the house go into committee of the whole. Of course, he probably would require a seconder to his motion. I made a motion to that effect on one occasion, and I recall that a whole afternoon was spent in committee of the whole. That course is still open to any member who feels that thereby better progress could be made with the subject under discussion. We do not customarily go into committee of the whole because of the looseness—I do not use the word critically at all—of our debates. In this house we do not draw the lines very close. A member can always ask permission to question the senator who is speaking, and I have never known a senator to object to the asking of a question or to refuse to answer. In most of our debates we get along much as we would if the house were in committee of the whole, and that probably is why the house is seldom moved into committee of the whole. But I repeat that it is always wide open to any senator to make the motion.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: It has been done often.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, it has been done often, but new members who have not seen the house move into committee of the whole should be advised that at any time they desire so to move they may do so.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Of course, it does not necessarily follow that the motion will carry.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Godbout, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 1, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Croll calling to the attention of the Senate the present position with respect to penal institutions in Canada and in particular discussing the need for further reforms in the Canadian penal system.

Hon. Fred A. McGrand: Honourable senators, on rising to address this chamber I wish to congratulate the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) upon having brought the question of penal reforms before this house, and I want to commend all honourable senators who have contributed to this debate.

The question of penal reform is a live topic wherever a group of serious-minded citizens gather to discuss crime and its consequences. It is a frequent topic of discussion by sociologists and mental hygienists and has been debated in Parliament many times.

In any discussion on this subject, the object of our attention is one of the end products of crime, the offender, who is called upon to pay his debt to society. We are concerned with the offender because he is left on our hands. No discussion of penal reform is complete without a wider knowledge of crime, its causes and cure. No discussion of crime is complete without investigation of the broader aspects of mental health.

Dr. John Griffin defines the mentally healthy person in this way:

> The mentally healthy person is a productive and unalienated person; the person who relates himself to the world lovingly, and who uses his reason to grasp reality objectively; who experiences himself as a unique individual entity; and at the same time feels one with his fellow men; who is not subject to irrational authority, and accepts willingly the rational authority of conscience and reason; who is in the process of being born as long as he is alive, and considers the gift of life the most precious chance he has.

The late Dr. Grant Fleming said:

Mental disease is subject to the same national laws as any part of the body. There is nothing mysterious about the mental side of life except our great ignorance regarding this part of the life of man.

I like the statement made by the late Dr. Charles Mayo:

Medicine must turn its attention to the control and study of mental disease, that man's mind may last as long as his body.

There is no doubt that the burden on a community due to mental and emotional maladjustments is equal to the burden of all physical disease taken together. The thousands of human beings groping now in fear and misunderstanding of each other, the so-called stress diseases, the disorders related to man's social and emotional environment, constitute the major social problem of our day.

Some six of every thousand persons are completely incapacitated by mental disorders; about one in ten shows some degree of emotional distress. That is one group. There is another group equally large and more threatening, our criminal population. Together, they make up the legion of the lost, the legion of the mentally ill.

Most of the criminals started out as maladjusted boys with some frustration or lack of security, and behind prison walls they sit, outcasts of our social order. Many people accept a false explanation about juvenile deliquency: that heredity is to blame for the crime of children; that the child's heredity was his fate and that the young offender had received a moral weakness which he could not overcome.

Responsibility is personal; crime cannot be laid at the door of biological inheritance. Mankind is not divided into two predetermined classes: those who were born good and those who were born bad.

Dr. R. B. Cattell says:

To talk of the inheritance of crime, or even character traits, is obviously absurd. An act cannot be inherited, but only a susceptibility to being easily provoked to certain broad kinds of act.

Another false theory concerning juvenile delinquency attributes it to economic conditions, principally poverty. It is argued that low-income homes in slum areas, without sufficient recreation facilities, are a nursing ground for crime.

That economic conditions are not the chief cause of juvenile delinquency is evident from the following consideration; two identical homes in poor areas produce totally different children—one, law-abiding and religious; the other, criminal and vicious. If economic conditions were the cause, they would produce identical effects. The difference in the children is due rather to the home influence than to the want of money and luxuries. Many of the nation's leaders who have done most to uplift its citizenry were brought up in good homes in poor areas. Nothing can take the place of good parents. Also, juvenile delinquency is on the increase in middle and upper-class homes; and in spite of the fact that we in Canada have the second highest standard of living in the world, our juvenile delinquency rate in general is going up. Juvenile delinquency does not follow the pattern of infant mortality. The family allowance has provided our children with better-fed bodies but not better-nourished minds.

An inmate of a mental hospital and an inmate of a penitentiary are brothers under the skin. They reacted differently to the same frustration. As one permitted these frustrations to sacrifice his own happiness, the other sought to destroy the happiness of others. The criminal is made, not born. His life is a reflection of his home, his school, and what he learned from his associates. At birth a child has no knowledge. He learns by perception. He gets most of his knowledge by what he sees and hears. His early home life is the most important factor. The child learns to speak the language of his parents and usually adopts his parents' religion; often he sympathizes with his parents' political views. He has his own will and intellect, with the knowledge acquired by perception. He establishes his own goal and freely works toward it, regardless of whether he was rocked in a cheap cradle or an expensive one.

Emotional upsets start in childhood. Much of them are due to parental delinquency, ignorance, neglect, lack of understanding between parent and child and the feeling of insecurity, and it all adds up to frustration of the child. In one child the frustration causes him to lose confidence in himself. He becomes an introvert, bottles up his emotions and eventually blows up with a mental disorder. In another child the same frustration causes him to lose confidence in others. He develops a grudge against society, starts his life in public as a delinquent, and later on becomes a criminal.

The uncertainty and tensions of modern living contribute to the unhappiness of human relations. What is called "mental health" or "mental illness" is a function of living people, and so far as any person is concerned it is gone when that person ceases to live. While he lives, the evidence of mental health exists outside a person's skin; it exists in what he thinks, in what he feels, in what things mean to him; in how he behaves in regard to life and death, joy and sorrow, shame and praise, love, hate and fear. These are the units by which we measure mental health. Love, hate, fear, shame, and praise are the elements which tie one person to another. If a man can handle these elements in reaction to those around him and be happy, he is mentally healthy.

We can define mental health as the ability of one human being to live with another human being, in any situation in which he may be placed, without having to sacrifice his own happiness or destroy the happiness of those around him. Taking a broader view, we can say that the strength or weakness of a nation's health is as strong or weak as the mental health of its citizens. The foundation of the democratic way of life, as well as the basis of mental health, is respect for the dignity and the worth of individuals as human beings, and respect for other creatures on the earth.

Each individual responds differently to suggestion because each is an individual. So is each generation an individual with a group pattern. The present generation is different from the past ones. The last generation knew a depression and a world war; the present one has better-fed bodies but its minds have been nourished by comic books and television.

Adolescence is the appropriate time to experiment with one's own conscience at one's own risk. Growing up must include a bit of toying with the forbidden. It used to be smoking behind the barn or being bad in school. The present generation has much greater variety to choose from—car theft or murder with rape. The suspected killer of a 13-year old girl spends his time in jail reading comic books. All the technique of how to commit any crime and how to stare down a judge can be obtained in a crime comic for a few cents. There are some 90 million comic books read in the United States. Dr. Frederick Wertham, author of Seduction of the Innocent and several other books on the same subject, has handled thousands of juvenile delinquents during his many years of research. He says the comic books are an invitation to illiteracy, create an atmosphere of cruelty and deceit, stimulate unwholesome fantasies, suggest criminal and sexually abnormal ideas, create a readiness to temptation and suggest forms of delinquent impulse and supply the details of technique.

The Fredericton Council of Churches, recently reporting a survey made of reading habits, says that the literacy level of Canadians is alarmingly low:

> They have an I.Q. of 12 years of age and get the bulk of their reading from comic books.

In the corruption of youth, the comic book has been ably assisted by television programs. In one week in 1954 or 1955 a Chicago television station gave to the youth of America: 93 murders, 79 shootings, 9 kidnappings, 9 robberies, 44 gun fights, 33 sluggings, 2 knifings, 2 whiplashings, 2 poisonings, 2 bombings. This kind of teaching has had a response in the United States: a murder every 41 minutes, a rape every 30 minutes, a robbery every 7 minutes, an assault every 6 minutes, a burglary every minute, a larceny every 24 seconds and an auto theft every 2½ seconds.

In one week in 1954 there were 7,064 acts or threats of violence on New York television stations alone. An article in a recent issue of Parents' Magazine states that children spend between 22 and 27 hours each week before television sets. One-quarter of the time between 4 p.m. and 10 p.m. is spent on crime and violence. It quotes Dr. Ralph Banay, director of a clinic associated with the District Attorney's office in New York, as saying:

> For many disturbed adolescents, television is the preparatory school for delinquency.

Great social changes took place during the last century. Early in that century not more than 10 per cent of the white population of the world could read or write. By the close of the century universal education was the right of everyone. Illiteracy was virtually abolished, but not enough was done to develop our literature to the proper level of the needs of the average individual. As a result, cheap literature, which was produced and sold for the purpose of profit, exploited the baser side of one's nature and made a special appeal to those of lower intelligence. As a right to read was a necessity of that day, then the right to read that which best develops the individual is a "must" of this period.

There are different schools of thought on how to approach the study of man's mind and emotions. The science of the human mind is young, but mental disease is as old as man himself.

The whole world was horrified and shocked by the cruelty practised in many concentration camps during the last war. At one camp a woman had a beautiful lampshade made with the "tattooed skin of a human victim", but there is no reason to suppose that in other respects she was wanting in good taste; she simply had a blind spot on the subject of Jews and anti-Nazis, in accordance with the sentiment prevailing in the circle in which she moved. Why did German citizens fail to rise up in wrath to make these crimes impossible? The answer to this question is instructive. It lies in the effect of familiarity, and of conformity to an authorized moral code, in blinding the conscience to abuses that become customary.

John Newton, in his Thoughts upon the African Slave Trade, describes the treatment of slaves on the way to American slave markets. On board the ship they were piled in rows like books upon a shelf, with hands and feet in irons, and many a slave reached the land of the free chained to another slave who had been dead for many days. The captain was often a religious man who would permit no swearing among the sailors and read the Bible to them on Sundays. The founders of the slave trade were worthy men. One of them, John Hawkins, sailed a ship named The Jesus, and on this respectable business-of-the-day founded the wealth of Bristol.

In ancient Rome crucifixion was a normal punishment for slaves and foreigners. In ancient Jerusalem a humane society provided wine and myrrh to quench the thirst of victims going to death by crucifixion. Yet the majority of citizens regarded it all as customary and did nothing about it.

It is only a hundred years ago that children from the poorhouses of England were used as climbing boys to clean chimneys. Undersized boys were selected because some chimneys were nine inches or less in width. Many boys died as a result of their work. No inquests were held, because these children were expected to do some useful work. It took half a century of agitation before reform was accomplished. Property owners declared that their chimneys would deteriorate without this type of cleaning. Proponents of the slave trade declared that this business was essential to the economy of Bristol and the manufacture of cheap rum. Iron workers protested the banning of thumb screws and slave shackles as bad for business. Yet these apparently callous ancestors of ours were decent, civilized people like ourselves. They simply had blind spots toward cruelties that were sanctioned by custom.

Major C. W. Hume, Chairman of the Universities' Federation for Animal Welfare, says:

> There are many blind spots in the Anglo-Saxon conscience, with some practices in which we see no harm which will be classed by our descendants along with the slave trade and crucifixion.

A well known psychiatrist who has worked for 15 years with the criminally insane offers this opinion:

> The chief objective of mental health is not only to see that such conditions be treated and cared for in a proper and efficient manner or that methods be developed to deal with them once they have become firmly established, but that the multiplicity of factors which contribute to such undesirable results be looked into, studied further, eradicated and done away with once their baneful influences have been recognized. It should be clearly recognized that in the course of development from birth to maturity, chiefly, an individual grows and develops and, in so doing, he learns. His learning depends on other people who have, can and do teach him. Also there are a great many objects or so-called media from which any one picks notions, ideas and views on life which develop into attitudes and, later, fixed habits. In this respect, I want to refer here especially to means of possible influence on the minds, particularly of the young, afforded by TV scenes depicting slaughter of some kind, killing, murdering and other forms of sadistic behaviour, and I am led to wonder if such could not have any influence on developing, nurturing and fostering aggression and in such a way, through previous exposure to such deeds, though it may have been by other media. One is led to wonder how much sadistic crime will be motivated as a result of all this.

It is disturbing to most people interested in crime prevention to know that much of our amusement is built around acts that are cruel and sadistic and on the increase. Seventy million fans watch wrestling. Some time ago the Athletic Commission of California, cognizant of the brutality of the sport, sent out questionnaires to the fans for their opinions on its merits. They could vote for a return to the pressure and leverage of the ancient sport, or for the modern style. For each person who voted for the pressure and leverage style, ten voted for eye-gouging and all the holds that make wrestling brutal but spectacular. Some years ago boys of good homes were advised to stay away from that part of the town where men beat and kicked each other. Now this brutality is brought into the living room under the best of auspices.

Adolescence is the period of life when one starts experimenting with one's own conscience. All mental abnormalities have their roots in selfishness. All happiness has its roots in kindness. Society is made by man, so man as he moves about in society is a composition of his thoughts, his desires and his choices. Nothing ever happened to the world that did not first happen inside the mind of some man. Our ways of life are but the ideas of certain people that become the opinion of many others and are sanctioned by custom.

The child starts out in life with no knowledge of his environment or his heritage. He has only the instincts to be fed and to protest pain. He learns by perception, and in time he accumulates knowledge and his will makes decisions. He has opinions of his own as to his rights and the rights of others. His opinions are usually the result of suggestion by others. If these suggestions do not carry him beyond the mental age of 12 he grows to an adult in body but remains an adolescent in mind. This is equally true of one sex as of the other. If boys are presented with Davy Crockett and Wild Bill Hickock as their heroes in history and a modern wrestler as a present-day hero, and if girls regard a young woman who fights a bull in Mexico as an American heroine, then how can you criticize the young for delinquency? All crime is learned. Much of it is based on cruelty and brutality.

A boy of 5 gets a toy pistol. Even at that age he masters the idea of the lethal power of the weapon. At the age of 12 he gets a BB gun and practises the act of killing on small birds and animals. By 16 he gets a high-powered rifle. He is now conditioned to kill for pleasure. He can make use of all the sadisms our heritage has provided for him. Man was a hunter before he was a herdsman. His food and clothing depended upon his ability to capture and kill animals. This is not so today. The necessity of hunting to eat did not pass on to this generation but the lust to kill has been handed down from generation to generation. This continent was settled by people who knew little about the lust to kill, because hunting was restricted in the old land as a sport for gentlemen. It was on this continent that hunting for food was adopted as a means of livelihood, and hunting for fun a means of pastime.

There is a difference between the emotional reactions of people. Hunting for food gave the satisfaction of providing the body with nourishment. Hunting for fun gave an emotional satisfaction of having killed something, a gratification of our baser instincts.

Of all the creatures that travel the woods, only civilized man hunts for the pleasure of killing. Most animals hunt only for food. If the carnivorous animals hunted for pleasure, all wild life would have been destroyed long ago. Has this disrespect for animal life had anything to do with developing in some human beings a disrespect for the life and limb of others? Is there a difference between our crime pattern and that of older cultures? Reference has been made to penal reform in England. It is also well to remember that the work of humane societies is much more advanced in England than in Canada. The slaughtering of animals for food is done much more humanely in lands where crime is at a minimum. Norway, Sweden, Finland and Germany have abolished the steel-jawed trap for fur-bearing animals, and in England it will be outlawed after 1958.

In any study of penal reform the whole problem of crime, its causes and preventions must be considered.

A mentally healthy person is a productive and unalienated person who uses his reason to grasp reality objectively. Criminals and juvenile delinquents do not grasp reality objectively. They do not respect the rights of others, and do not respect the dignity of the human being. Any youth watching wrestling on television cannot help becoming inured to the low regard our society places on the human body and the emphasis it places on pain in others as a source of amusement. It does not "grasp reality objectively".

All mental abnormalities have their roots in selfishness; all happiness has its roots in kindness. Dr. J. Cotter Hirschberg, a noted psychiatrist, writes in his article Physiological Aspects of Cruelty:

> Cruelty implies a deviation from the accepted standards of behaviour, as embodied in the laws representing the social code of behaviour of a particular community.

He goes on to say:

> Cruel people are unhappy, dissatisfied people. In the light of our understanding about cruelty, what can be done to change the attitudes of the cruel individual, how can we reorient him to himself, to his community, and to the privilege and responsibilities of living with his fellow men and creatures? Cruelty which comes from excessive guilty feelings can be directed against animals as well as people. This kind of cruel person feels weak and incapable of dealing with the external world on its own reality terms. Feeling guilty over his inability to cope with the world around him, he conquers, captures, and kills fishes, animals and birds. Having no confidence in his ability to win out in daily tasks of living, he gains substitute achievement through hunting.

Dr. Carl Menninger, of the world famous Menninger Clinic, says:

> The joy of killing or inflicting pain is a product of an erotic, sadistic motivation.

Jonathan Fieldston declares:

> The great crime of the sport hunter is not that he kills—necessity may justify killing—the great crime is that he enjoys killing. Cruelty, like kindness, is indivisible. Children and men cannot be taught simultaneously to take pleasure from cruelty to some living creatures and abhor cruelty to others.

Criminals and cruel persons are unhappy and dissatisfied; they have little sympathy, compassion, charity, or mercy, and they are selfish and resentful.

At birth, a child has no habits. Habits, like taste, are acquired. Cruel habits are acquired slowly, and they become acceptable by indoctrination. The small boy may resent putting a worm on a hook, but he accepts the idea that the worm does not feel. Few housewives would do to a live salmon what they do to a live lobster. Custom has given it sanction.

Cruelty destroys sympathy. It weakens compassion, which is the desire to help someone or something in distress. Cruelty is the negation of mercy; it dulls charity, weakens faith in oneself and in the motives of men. Without these virtues, what is man but a savage? He has only hate, fear and anger left, and these guide him for the rest of his life. He has lost self restraint. All the restraint he knows is the restraint applied by others. He develops his ego with these credentials of his worthlessness, and he tries to purchase licence against the restraint of others. He has no respect for life: it is a monopoly that he thinks is his.

The right to live is not the monopoly of man alone. Dominion over animals for his use and benefit does not include the right to torture for amusement. The commandment, "Thou shalt not kill", may well have meant, "Thou shalt not kill for pleasure". Man has the liberty to kill for food, because the right to eat is basic. The licence to kill for pleasure is an invention of society.

The boy of 5 who gets a toy gun, and who at 12 gets a BB gun, to sharpen his marksmanship on birds and small animals, is being educated to become callous to suffering. He is being conditioned to inflict suffering without sympathy. Supplement this by what he reads in the comics and sees on television, give him a poor home, bad companions, and an aggressive drive, and he soon goes from bad to worse, as conditions permit.

Many criminals, such as bank robbers, are not killers. They refuse to take life, even to avoid capture. They are selfish, lazy, with lots of ego, but they are not cruel. They started at the top, not at the bottom of crime; they did not become conditioned by small doses of cruel behaviour. Such persons do not respect personal property but they still respect life.

The children of delinquent parents suffer from psychological cruelty. They live in torment and fear. Their parents are adult in body but their mental age has been arrested at the age of 12 by what they have read and seen, which leaves them with no ability to manage their teen-age children. Yet they worry about them and blame others for the children's shortcomings. From the cheap literature they read and the programs they see and hear on television and radio they know the turmoil of similar homes where a temporary solution was obtained by divorce.

It is generally believed that crime is centred in the large cities. They are the locale of organized vice. Our rural communities have their share of dilinquency. Many of our run-down rural settlements harbour the personnel that carry on small crimes and rackets.

Of the eleven crimes of violence committed in New Brunswick during 1955, nearly all were in such communities. The pattern is usually the same: a house on a partially-abandoned farm or a shack in an untilled field. In the door yard are the head or legs of a deer shot out of season, in the custody of a dog frequently kicked out of doors. The house is untidy, with comics on the floor, a BB gun on the window sill, a high-powered rifle in the place of honour over the door, and in the largest room a TV set bought on the instalment plan. Violations of the game laws, liquor laws, the motor vehicle laws, create a nursing ground for small crime. This is the soil where seeds of delinquency germinate. To punish the offender with a jail sentence does not remove the cause. It does not change his opinion as to his rights or to the rights of others. In centuries past thousands of persons went to prison for holding certain political or religious views. It did not change their minds. On the contrary, they came out of prison with their convictions deepened. Punishment is not an appeal to reason. It only deepens prejudice. It is not the physical punishment that influences the youth in prison, it is the loss of personal freedom. No one can serve a prison term without undergoing personality changes. Out at Boys Town, Nebraska, Father Flannigan found a way to handle bad boys, but it was not by punishment; it was the proper balance of love, fear, shame, praise, joy and sorrow that changed their lives.

Mental disease—with its twin offspring, insanity and crime—is the most urgent and most difficult health problem in Canada. Any survey of this problem must be thorough. Penal reform is only nibbling at the task. The roots of the trouble are deep and go well into the past.

The primitive life of early American colonization is catching up with the older civilizations of Europe. The "Wild West" is still with us. Buffalo Bill, Davy Crockett, Wild Bill Hickock are actors on the stage. Each has brought the brutality of his day to mingle with the mechanical violence of this generation. Will the exploits of Jesse James be re-enacted to make a new hero for a red-blooded American youth?

This country was founded on the fur trade. The steel-jawed trap has been placed on every stream and marsh of the Canadian wilderness, where psychopaths, who cannot get along with normal people, earn a livelihood. In some instances a spring pole is used to swing the animal into the air to die. An American poet looked at a fox in such a trap and wrote a poem entitled To a Fur Scarf. This is definitely an appeal to emotion:

> The trap jaws clanked and held him fast,
> None marked his fright, none heard his cries,
> His struggles ceased; he lay at last
> With wide uncomprehending eyes
> And watched the sky grow dark above

And watched the sunset turn to grey;
And quaked in anguish while he strove
To gnaw the prisoned leg away.

Then day came rosy from the East,
But still those steel jaws kept their hold;
And no one watched the prisoned beast
But Fear and Hunger, Thirst and Cold.
Oppressed by pain his dread grew numb,
Fright no more stirred his flagging breath,
He longed in vain to see him come,
The cruel biped, bringing death.

Then through the gloom one night came One
Who set the timid spirit free:
"I know thine anguish, little son—
So once men trapped and tortured Me.

An English writer who has written much on this subject says:

Most English women wear furs that have been got by the infliction of prolonged and severe pain, fear and thirst. They are eminently civilized women. Some are seen on the platforms at meetings of charitable societies, including animal protection societies, but they have a blind spot on this particular subject. I sat in a church behind a row of devout women wearing furs—the day was Good Friday.

Most of the practices that may be undermining society are long-established and deeply embedded in our way of life. They are sanctioned by custom. It would require a major operation to remove them. Not enough work has been done to evaluate the part they play in demoralizing youth.

"Brain washing" may not be a good term, but any successful rehabilitation of a delinquent must strip the emotional conflicts down to infancy and build anew on the nobler sides of man's nature.

Dr. J. Cotter Hirshberg suggests:

One can be aggressive and discharge tension through muscular activity in competitive sports; one can conquer nature by mountain climbing; one can shoot animals by photography. It is just as possible to share in the conquest of nature through productive work in the fields of chemistry and physics, as through hunting and fishing. An intellectual victory can dispel as much aggression as can hunting. One can discharge aggressive tension without requiring the inflicting of pain, the suffering of others, or the destruction of life.

Psychiatrists disagree on many things but they are agreed that the emotional life of a child starts at birth. During this period it needs a mother's care and love. In the days of the old-fashioned mother there was little juvenile delinquency. The bond between mother and child was firm and permanent. We know how many juvenile delinquents who reach our courts have read crime comics. I would like to know how many were breast fed. I would like to know something of the early life of the criminal who does not kill. I would like to know the extent and type of delinquency in those parts of older civilization where folk singing has preserved the finer things of our heritage. I would like to know the part that cruelty plays in the promotion of crime. Is cruelty a by-product that is given off while crime is processed, or is cruelty the mother-lode and crime an outcropping?

Mannheim, in his book Group Problems and Crime Punishment says:

The genuine criminal always shows endogenous defects of development, the latter having been arrested at a past stage of mankind, and he thereby resembles primitive and savage tribes.

It is difficult to evaluate all the factors we have at hand. Criminology has hardly reached the dignity of a science and psychiatry has scarcely attained the high state of maturity.

Toynbee pointed out that 16 of the 19 civilizations which have decayed from the beginning of history to the present, rotted from within, and only three fell to attack from without. Man's nature does not change, only his environment changes. There are greater opportunities today to study man's emotions than ever before. It would be well to take a long look at them. There is no better agency to do this work than the Canadian Mental Health Association. The appeal to sentiment must be endorsed by a like appeal to reason.

Man is a vain, erring, unruly creature. It is hard to pass any permanent judgment upon him. Our objective in mental health is that the usefulness of man's mind may last as long as his body.

Honourable senators, my designation in this chamber is Sunbury. At one time it was Sunbury County, of Nova Scotia. Like Western Nova Scotia, it was, in the words of Edmund Burke, "settled by the overflowings of the exuberant population of New England." It was part of Nova Scotia when John Wilkes was fighting for freedom of the press in England. It was part of Nova Scotia before Tom Paine wrote the words "United States of America" and before the Continental Congress resolved that all men were born free and equal.

One last word: In the early days of the New Brunswick Legislature, Sunbury was represented by a Scottish radical "Gleenie". He was, I think, one of the first, if not the first, to advocate in a Canadian legislature the cause of mental health and penal reform.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, for Hon. Mr. Macdonald, the debate was adjourned.

DEBATE PROCEDURE

PRIVILEGE

Hon. John T. Haig: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Several times lately Your Honour has called me to order on occasions when I was talking to my deskmate.

I am wondering what rule of the house gives the Speaker the right to do this. The rules, I understand, allow a senator to speak to another senator during a debate.

This afternoon during the speech by the honourable gentleman from Sunbury (Hon. Mr. McGrand) a rule was disobeyed many times, but I did not hear Your Honour call to order the senators concerned. In fairness, I do not think I should be called to order when, under similar circumstances, other honourable members are not.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: To what rule is my friend referring?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Mr. Speaker knows the rule to which I refer.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: I am asking for information.

Hon. Mr. Haig: As I have said, Mr. Speaker, the rule was disobeyed this afternoon over an extended period of time, and I did not hear Your Honour call the senators involved to order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, my recollection is that I called "Order" on three or four occasions this afternoon, but I did not name any senator. The question is one of propriety and ordinary common sense. I would say that the occasions on which "Order" should be called must be determined by the tone and audibility of the conversations.

Hon. Mr. Haig: All I wish to say, sir, is that if I see the rules being violated in future, I shall call your attention to the matter.

The Hon. the Speaker: The responsibility for observance of the rules in the Senate rests as much on honourable senators as on the Speaker.

PRIVATE BILL

OGDENSBURG BRIDGE AUTHORITY—SECOND READING

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck moved the second reading of Bill B-10, an Act respecting Ogdensburg Bridge Authority.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a small matter and I think despite the lateness of the hour we can pass it after but a brief explanation. If my memory serves me rightly I sponsored the Ogdensburg Bridge Authority Bill in 1952. At that time the estimated cost of the bridge was between $10 million and $12 million. Vast changes have taken place during the intervening period. Construction costs in particular have risen, as well as a number of other costs, and the engineer's estimate of the cost of building this bridge today is about $15 million. So, to make assurance doubly sure, this bill suggests an increase in the amount of bonds and debentures to be issued to $20 million. It would be impossible, of course, for me, with my limited knowledge, to justify that, but I suggest we refer the bill to committee, where detailed information would be available to us.

In the meantime, honourable senators, I need only say that the sole purpose of the bill is to authorize an increase in the amount of debentures, bonds, mortgages and other securities that the company may issue from $10 million or $12 million to $20 million.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce, Nos. 254 to 290, which were presented yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the committee, moved that the reports be adopted.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

BILLS—SECOND READINGS

Hon. Mr. Roebuck moved the second reading of the following bills:

Bill C-10, an Act for the relief of Edith May Robertson Thompson.

Bill D-10, an Act for the relief of Hans Christian Anderson.

Bill E-10, an Act for the relief of Raffaele Polissena.

Bill F-10, an Act for the relief of Hilda Evelyn Charlton Carlson.

Bill G-10, an Act for the relief of Dorothy Pilkington Wilson.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Next sitting.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 8, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, May 8, 1956

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 84, an Act to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be placed on the Order Paper for second reading?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With leave of the Senate, next sitting.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 249, an Act to amend the Department of Transport Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be placed on the Order Paper for second reading?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With leave of the Senate, next sitting.

JUDGES BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 252, an Act to amend the Judges Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With leave, next sitting.

PRIVATE BILLS

ALBION INSURANCE COMPANY—
FIRST READING

Hon. Vincent Dupuis presented Bill H-10, an Act to incorporate The Albion Insurance Company.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Thursday next.

MARITIME STOCK BREEDERS' ASSOCIATION—
FIRST READING

Hon. Mr. Hawkins presented Bill I-10, an Act respecting The Maritime Stock Breeders' Association.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Hawkins: Thursday next.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—
THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon moved the third reading of Bill Q-8, an Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

DIVORCE BILLS

THIRD READINGS

Hon. F. W. Gershaw, for Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, moved the third reading of the following bills:

Bill C-10, an Act for the relief of Edith May Robertson Thompson.

Bill D-10, an Act for the relief of Hans Christian Anderson.

Bill E-10, an Act for the relief of Raffaele Polissena.

Bill F-10, an Act for the relief of Hilda Evelyn Charlton Carlson.

Bill G-10, an Act for the relief of Dorothy Pilkington Wilson.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the third time, and passed, on division.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 3, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Croll calling to the attention of the Senate the present position with respect to penal institutions in Canada and in particular discussing the need for further reforms in the Canadian penal system.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, as I have quite a few figures to give to the house this evening I thought it advisable to draft notes for my guidance. If I follow my notes rather closely I hope honourable members will appreciate the reason.

On March 5 the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) called the attention of the Senate to the present position with respect to penal institutions in Canada and in particular to the need for further reform in the Canadian penal system. Since he opened the debate we have had a number of very interesting and informative addresses on this subject. I am particularly interested in penal reform, for decisions with respect to tickets of leave are made by me in my capacity of Solicitor General of Canada. Honourable senators will therefore understand that I have followed the debate quite closely. I wish to thank all who have taken part in the discussion so far. Their remarks have been noted by me and by my officials, and I can assure honourable members that many things that have been said here will assist me in making decisions from time to time as to whether certain persons who are incarcerated should be allowed out on ticket of leave. I particularly wish to thank the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina for bringing this subject to the attention of the Senate, and I welcome the opportunity to join with him and other senators in a discussion of the need for further reforms in our penal system. As the honourable senator stated, this is a continuing need. Parliament and the public should always be alert to recognize the need and take steps to institute reform wherever possible.

At the outset, I should like to make it quite clear that I am in complete agreement with the spirit of the honourable senator's remarks, which were prompted by a desire on his part to bring out for serious discussion the many problems that we face in Canada in developing an effective penal system. In my remarks this evening I shall probably repeat many things that have already been said here, as well as figures that have already been given, but my object is to make abundantly clear the situation in Canada as to releases from penal institutions, and how Canada compares with Britain in respect of certain matters that have been referred to in this debate.

The honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina did indeed paint a black picture for us, but I think honourable senators will agree with me that from what we have already heard there is a brighter side, because of reform which has already taken place and is continuing. Many hard-working persons in political life and in the public service and others from the ranks of an interested citizenry have done a great deal in Canada through the years to bring about improvements in our penal system. All these people, like the honourable senators who have spoken in this debate, and indeed like all of us, desire to see even greater improvements in the future.

Before I touch upon the important steps which are being taken or contemplated by the Government in this matter, I would like to mention some of the developments that have taken place in this country in the field of penal reform in recent years. Honourable senators are already aware of the division of jurisdiction in these matters between the Government of Canada and the ten provincial governments, and in fact even down to the level of municipal governments. I shall not take up the time of the house to detail the complexities of this system. May I say that since I assumed my duties as Solicitor General I have had considerable opportunity to observe what is actually happening in the penal field in Canada. Every day I have to deal with the cases of men detained in penal institutions for whom there have been applications for release on ticket of leave. I was not long at this work before I felt the need to learn more of the actual operations of our penal establishments, and as other honourable senators have stated, I have travelled from one end of the country to the other to see these establishments in operation at first hand. I have visited each of the eight federal institutions, as well as some of the major provincial prisons and reformatories.

While my experience made me more acutely aware of the needs, I have also been greatly heartened by the forward looking developments that I have actually observed. In describing these developments I of course am not confining myself to those under federal responsibility, which I shall reserve for later comment.

I should like to deal first with the subject of probation. Probation is frequently confused with parole. These two functions have already been differentiated, but perhaps I should say a few words on them. Probation is a device or correctional method used to rehabilitate the convicted person without resorting to imprisonment. Parole is also a correctional method used to rehabilitate the convicted person, but it is applied after he has served a certain portion of his term in prison. A person placed on probation is returned directly from the court to the community without having to undergo any term of imprisonment whatever, other than the time he may have been held in custody pending trial.

The essential requirements for effective probation are, first, that the court should be well informed as to the background abilities and potentialities of the convicted person, in order that it may properly determine whether or not he is likely to respond favourably to a period on probation; secondly, that having been placed on probation, the probationer will have the benefit of supervision and guidance, provided by a qualified probation officer. That, I may say, is a very essential factor in the device known as probation. These two requirements can only be fulfilled when there are qualified persons available to assist the court in providing the background information and later, supervision.

Now may I say a word about parole. I repeat, parole also is a method of rehabilitation in the community, under supervision, but it follows a period of imprisonment or detention in a penal or correctional institution.

I think everyone who is informed at all on these matters will agree that probation is an effective method of rehabilitation, apart from its economic advantages, which include saving the state the cost of keeping the offender incarcerated, and allowing him to be a producing member of society in the community. Of course these advantages have always to be balanced in the individual cases against the question of the deterrent value of a sentence of imprisonment.

Probation in Canada, as has already been pointed out, is a provincial and local responsibility. There is no doubt that we have been slow in developing probation services. However, during the past few years rapid strides have been made, and these we should gladly acknowledge. The extensive development in probation services in Ontario has been recognized by a number of honourable senators who have spoken, and figures were given for certain provinces, but I do not feel that they reflect the actual development that is taking place. I quite agree that Ontario has made the greatest strides in this field, but the other provinces also have made progress. Permit me to mention the other provinces, and to state briefly what is being done in each of them.

Since 1914 Saskatchewan has made a great deal of use of the probation method. As honourable senators know, there are few urban centres in Saskatchewan, and naturally there is not the same need for full-time probation officers which exists in the great urban centres of central Canada. However, in Saskatchewan effective probation service is given throughout the province by the welfare officers of the Department of Social Welfare and Rehabilitation. In centres such as Regina, Saskatoon and Moose Jaw some of these officers devote their full time to probation, and there is a chief probation officer for the province who acts as a co-ordinating head.

British Columbia was a pioneer in the field of probation, which was first given effect through the co-operation of a voluntary association, the John Howard Society of British Columbia.

In Alberta too we find developments in probation which have been going on for the past two years, and which no doubt will continue to expand.

Honourable senators may have seen the recent announcement in the press that a program of adult probation will be in operation in Manitoba by the end of this year.

To the best of my knowledge the province of Quebec has no official probation service, but there is effective probation in use in that province through the co-operation of the voluntary prisoner after-care societies, including the John Howard Society of Quebec, the Salvation Army, Sociétés d'Orientation et de Réhabilitation Sociale, and Le Service de Réadaptation Sociale.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: To that list should be added the juvenile courts.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I thank the honourable senator for adding the juvenile courts of Quebec to the others I have mentioned. However, the societies I refer to are not part of the court, but work with it.

I have not heard any announcement of a plan for probation in the province of New Brunswick, but I would expect it to be the next step in that province, considering the reorganization of its penal system which has been taking place during the last year and a half, under the directorship of a graduate in criminology.

The lonely figure of one probation officer for the province of Nova Scotia, mentioned by my honourable friend, hardly does justice to the actual situation in that province. The courts there are able to and do use the services of juvenile probation officers in the supervision of adults. This, I may say, applies also to other provinces.

Newfoundland also, under its Department of Corrections, has made provision for probation.

Probation, as I have said previously, is a provincial and local responsibility. I have described the developments under several provincial governments solely to indicate that they apparently are not unmindful of their responsibility and have, in fact, made considerable progress in recent years. Undoubtedly they are also looking to the future.

Now let us look for a moment at our penal institutions, not only those under federal jurisdiction. Here we have a division of jurisdiction between federal, provincial and, in some cases, county governments. I suppose all honourable senators are aware that in the main persons sentenced to terms of imprisonment of two years or more are sent to federal penitentiaries, and all those sentenced to terms of less than two years are sent to provincial or local institutions.

Some provinces have done a great deal to improve the rehabilitation facilities in their penal institutions.

Again, I come back to the province of British Columbia. That province has experimented for five years with forestry camps to which young men are taken from prison and provided with a wholesome outdoor life, in which they are contributing to the economic benefit of the province.

I may mention that the remission service of the Department of Justice assisted in the early stage of this experiment by granting special tickets of leave to all young men transferred to the forestry camp. In British Columbia we have the New Haven Borstal, the first institution for youthful offenders in Canada, modelled along the lines of British Borstal. Unfortunately, the institution had to be closed during the war years but was reopened in 1947 and is now considered to be one of the finest institutions of its type to be found anywhere.

In Oakalla Prison Farm there are two segregated rehabilitation centres, one for youthful offenders requiring closer study than is afforded at the New Haven Borstal, and one for older inmates who offer some promise of successful rehabilitation. Professionally trained social workers and psychologists on the staff provide the skills necessary to help in the rehabilitation of these offenders. That province looks forward soon to the opening of a new treatment centre at Haney which is to be under the direction of a criminologist now on the staff of the University of British Columbia.

I had the opportunity to visit Alberta's special institution for youthful offenders at Bowden, where I saw some 150 young men being given opportunities for vocational training and professional guidance in what I would say is one of the most modernly equipped institutions of its kind on this continent.

In the province of Saskatchewan we find a special unit for young offenders in the Regina jail staffed by a treatment team consisting of a part-time psychiatrist, a psychologist and several social workers. Saskatchewan has also experimented with the forestry camp method of treatment.

In Manitoba there has been a vocational training program at Headingly Jail for a number of years. At the present time the system in that province is undergoing reorganization, as a result of a report by a recent royal commission.

In Ontario the Department of Reform Institutions has over the last ten years developed a program which stresses a diversification of institutions and the employment of psychologists and social workers. A special training institution for young offenders has been in operation at Brampton since 1946. A similar one has recently been opened in connection with one of the industrial farms. A special medical and psychiatric clinic has been operating at the Guelph Reformatory, and for some years a treatment centre for alcoholics has been in operation at Mimico Reformatory. A similar treatment centre for drug addicts is now in the process of organization.

There are other special institutions which can be mentioned, such as the minimum security institution at Salmonier in Newfoundland. All across the country there are institutions for female offenders. I shall mention three located in the Maritimes. There is the Good Shepherd institution at Halifax, the Good Shepherd institution at Saint John and the Interprovincial Home for Young Women at Cloverdale. The rehabilitative service of these three institutions compare favourably with anything of the kind found elsewhere.

Honourable senators, I have given only a rapid survey of provincial developments in the institutional field in recent years, and I am sure that I must have neglected to mention many other noteworthy features, but at least I have indicated that we in Canada are not completely in the dark ages.

Now, as to federal institutions I need not go into any great detail. The improvements that have taken place since 1947 under Commissioner Gibson are well known. The greatest change has been on the treatment and training side. An extensive and intensive program of staff training has been the key to the change. It is necessary to have a trained staff before you can get good results. Some of the honourable senators who have spoken in this debate have stated that they visited our federal institutions and they spoke from first-hand knowledge of what is going on in the institutions.

In each institution under the deputy warden, as co-ordinator of rehabilitative treatment services, there are of course in our federal institutions chaplains, classification officers, school teachers, vocational instructors and recreational directors. All of these specialists are there to help the inmates in their rehabilitation.

The vocational training program alone has been a great forward step in the work of rehabilitation. Vocational training was first introduced into Collin's Bay Penitentiary, as was previously mentioned, in 1947. Courses are now offered also at Dorchester, Saskatchewan, British Columbia and the Federal Training Centre. A study of the reports of the Commissioner of Penitentiaries of recent years will show the variety of training offered and the success achieved in the placement of graduates through the co-operation of the trade unions, of provincial apprenticeship boards, and the national employment services. To date, there have been 823 graduates in vocational training, and 224 other young men benefited from some vocational training prior to the expiration of their sentences. That is since 1948.

I agree with honourable senators, and I think we all agree, that there is still much to be done, and the Commissioner in his latest report speaks of plans for two new minimum-security-type institutions as well as a new institution for women, which was mentioned previously during this debate. I do not doubt that it will be necessary in the near future to recommend some expansion of the staff necessary for rehabilitative treatment.

I would now like to take a litle time to talk about the prisoner after-care societies. I am sure all honourable senators know something of the work of these organizations. In fact, these organizations have been mentioned from time to time during this debate. Their development since 1946 has been outstanding. This is not to say that there were no active societies before that time. There have been prisoner aid societies in Canada from the time of Confederation, although at times they did pass through periods of adversity. The Prison Gates section of the Salvation Army has of course been active for years in giving assistance to men and women in prison and following their release.

Honourable senators may be surprised to learn of the actual number of organizations engaged in this work today. For your information I will read a list of societies known to me as having assisted in ticket-of-leave work. All these organizations are not of equal size; in fact they range from small societies operating in a restricted area, with only a part-time worker, or voluntary workers, to large societies with executive directors and several professionally-trained case workers. These societies are: Catholic Rehabilitation Service, Montreal; Elizabeth Fry Society, Ontario; John Howard Society, Alberta; John Howard Society, British Columbia; John Horward Society, Newfoundland; John Howard Society, Nova Scotia; John Howard Society, Ontario; John Howard Society, Quebec; John Howard Society, Saint John, New Brunswick; John Howard Society, Saskatchewan; John Howard Society, Shediac, New Brunswick; John Howard Society, Vancouver Island; Le Centre de Service Social, Trois Rivières P.Q.; Manitoba Welfare Association; Salvation Army; Service de Réadaptation Sociale, Québec, P.Q., Service Social de Hull, P.Q.; Société d'Orientation et de Réhabilitation Sociale, Montreal; Société de Réhabilitation, Sherbrooke, P.Q. These organizations receive financial support from various sources, including private contributions and from community chests. Most of them are also assisted by grants from provincial governments and the federal Government. Honourable senators may have noticed that the appropriations in our budget for this coming fiscal year provide for grants in aid to these organizations through the Penitentiaries Branch and through the Remission Service. The total amount is $80,000, made up as follows: Penitentiaries Branch $50,000; Remission Service, $30,000.

Personally, I can speak with some knowledge of their work as it applies in the field of supervision of persons released on ticket of leave. I mentioned previously this work with the men who are in the prisons, and also when the men are released on ticket of leave. Every day I have placed before me submissions recommending the release of inmates on ticket of leave, conditional upon their accepting the supervision and guidance of workers in after-care agencies. An examination of the files which have come to me shows that there has been correspondence with the agency concerned, and that representatives of the agency—we will say the Salvation Army, or the John Howard Society, whichever it may be—interview the inmate from time to time in the institution before he or she is released, and in many cases have also been in touch with members of his or her family in the home community. When the inmate is released the benefits from the guiding hand are seen in the splendid results which we have obtained from those who have been allowed out on ticket of leave. The percentage of men who break the conditions on which they are released is very, very small.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I do not like to interrupt the honourable senator, but may I ask him a question? He has referred to the vocational training which has been given to a good many hundreds of prisoners. What has been the result? When these men or women are released do they find any difficulty in obtaining employment in the lines for which they have been trained? Could my friend give me any idea of the percentage who have thus found useful employment?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have no definite figures, but generally speaking these people have found employment in the fields for which they have been prepared.

These after-care societies are very helpful in that respect. I mentioned that a representative of one of these societies has interviewed the prisoner before he is released; he knows the training the prisoner has received; in many cases, before discharge, the society's representative or some member of the inmate's family has obtained a job for him.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I was wondering whether there was any prejudice among employers against former prisoners.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The question is perfectly fair and pertinent, but I intended to refer to that point in my closing remarks. Perhaps I may defer it until then.

Now I would like to speak of the study of criminology and the training of correctional workers in Canada.

This, undoubtedly, is a great need. It is hardly correct to say that no Canadian university teaches penology. All schools of social work in this country give some attention to that field. Quite naturally they assume that correctional work may be considered a part of their social work field, and that many of their graduates will enter that field. Some schools of social work do have as part of their curriculum a course in criminology. I will refer to the University of British Columbia. In that university criminology has received some attention for many years, under the leadership of a well-known Canadian criminologist, Professor J. W. Topping, who is now, I believe, head of the Department of Sociology in the University of Manitoba. There is now a chair of criminology in the Department of Sociology at the University of British Columbia. That university offers an undergraduate course in criminology leading to the B. A. degree, and also work at the graduate level leading to the M. A. degree or a diploma in criminology. At the present time there are 24 undergraduate and ten graduate students of criminology at the University of British Columbia.

Honourable senators may quite rightly conclude that this is a small number of students for a country of 15 million people. I draw the matter to your attention, not to suggest for one moment that the number is adequate, but simply to indicate that hard work has already been done, and I think it should be recognized.

I have also mentioned the staff training programs in penitentiaries. I repeat that, to have good results, one must have properly trained staff. Provincial departments have also recognized this need. I am not certain of the developments in other provinces, but I may mention two provinces in which there has been, for some years, organized staff training. In Saskatchewan every staff member must undergo as part of his daily work a program of studies that extends over three years. In British Columbia, in co-operation with the university of that province, there is also a program of training.

Now let me refer to the comparison which was drawn by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) between England and Canada in connection with this whole subject of reform. Personally, I am never unhappy to have this done, because I feel we can learn many things from England as well as from other countries. There is no doubt that in England over the years they have developed techniques and methods which are worth study. Of course, in England full legislative authority over the subject-matter of criminal law in its widest sense, as has already been mentioned in this debate, is vested in a single legislature, and integration is easily achieved. England also has other advantages in that she has a highly urbanized population in a small geographical area, which makes for easy solution of many administrative problems. There are, I may add, some differences in the character of crime committed. Honourable senators will be interested to know that armed robbery, for example, is a most infrequent crime in England.

Let me now refer again to the comparisons made by the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Spadina. He gave us some figures which he described as frightening. These figures and figures similar to them have been given in articles and in public speeches during the last number of years. But they should be explained. I repeat that England has indeed done well in the field of probation. There is also no doubt in my mind from what I have read and heard about that country's system of prisons and Borstal institutions that there is much to praise in its treatment of convicted persons. It will be noticed that what I will say about statistics will not disturb the basic argument of the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina that in proportion to population Canada uses probation less and prison more than England does. However, a careful comparison of the statistics of the two countries, where they are comparable, does not show the extreme difference that the figures given by the honourable senator seemed to indicate.

In studying this problem the difficulty is to find comparable statistics. This is due to the different methods of recording data, different definitions, and different methods of disposing of cases before the courts. An error frequently made in quoting statistics is the comparing of two sets of things which in fact are not comparable.

Let us look at the figures given for convictions. I believe certain ones were presented the other night covering convictions for 1953. I will give them for 1952. In that year the number of convictions in England and Wales was 688,650, while in Canada there were 1,215,376, almost twice as many. Now, the figure for England represents the number of persons convicted of indictable and non-indictable offences, whereas the Canadian figure is made up of the number of persons convicted for indictable offences plus the total number of all their convictions. I will try to make my explanation clearer. For instance, a person might be charged at the same time with ten non-indictable offences. This would appear as one person in the British figures but as ten in the Canadian figures.

There are no figures available from England on the total number of convictions, and there are no figures available from Canada on the number of persons convicted of non-indictable offences. However, we can make a comparison between the number convicted in both countries of indictable offences. These of course, represent the more serious crimes. In 1952 in England and Wales the number of persons of 17 years of age and over who were convicted of indictable offences was 85,969. In 1952 in Canada the number of persons of 16 years of age and over who were convicted of indictable offences was 29,761. It will be readily seen that proportionately Canada does have a few more convictions per capita than England and Wales, but the proportionate difference is not anything like that appearing from the figures which were placed on the record.

In the case of prisons we find again that the figures are not comparable. The figure of 32,000, being the number of persons committed to prison in England in 1952, represents the actual number of persons admitted on conviction. The Canadian figure of 90,000, however, represents all admissions to penal institutions for any reason whatever, including first arrest on charge, readmission following bail, admission on conviction and admission on transfer from another institution.

A more meaningful comparison can be given by the following figures for 1952. In England and in Wales the number of persons of 17 years of age and over convicted of indictable offences and sentenced to imprisonment, Borstal training, corrective training and other types of detention was 27,467. In Canada the number of persons of 16 years of age and over convicted of indictable offences and sentenced to imprisonment was 14,625.

Another fairly close comparison would be between the daily average prison population in England and Wales and the number of persons in custody in Canada at the end of a year. The figures for 1952 are as follows:

England and Wales	23,607

Here again we see that the statistics that have been given such wide currency do not give a true picture, although we must admit that truly comparable statistics do show that proportionately Canada sends more people to prison than England does.

The figures given on probation are not comparable because they cover different age groups. The figure of 40,000 for England and Wales includes all persons placed on probation from 8 years of age. The figure of 3,000 for Canada is for 16 years of age and upward, and does not include any juveniles.

In Canada for many years there has been extensive use of the probation method for juveniles. I regret that I cannot give actual figures.

Honourable senators, I wish to re-emphasize that in taking your time to discuss these statistics I do so only to give as nearly correct a picture as possible from the data on hand. I am sure that we all agree that greater use should be made of the probation method in Canada than has been made up to the present time, and that we should examine the situation very carefully in relation to the large population in our penal institutions in Canada.

I have before me a report prepared by the judicial section of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics which deals with this matter in great detail. With the permission of the house I will have it inserted in Hansard so that honourable senators may have an opportunity to study its contents.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

See appendix to today's Hansard, pp. 486-90.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I wish now to refer briefly to the question of juveniles. I think the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina confined his remarks mostly to the problem of adult offenders, but he did mention the increasing number of young persons that are being sentenced to penitentiaries. This is indeed a serious problem, which the Commissioner of Penitentiaries has noted in his annual reports. However, I trust that honourable senators are not unaware of the work of our juvenile courts in Canada. This problem was mentioned by the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) with respect to Quebec, but considerable work is being done in our juvenile courts in all the provinces. These courts place young offenders on probation wherever possible, and send children who do not respond to probation to modern training institutions.

On the subject of parole I shall not say a great deal, for the matter has been under study by a special committee, which has just recently completed its report and submitted it to the Minister of Justice. The report is being printed and will be distributed within the next few weeks. I do not know what the report contains. Of course, the subject of parole is of great interest to me. Consideration of applications for release on parole is one of the duties that fall on me as Solicitor General. I noted with appreciation the kind remarks made by a number of honourable senators in this connection.

Some mention was made of the number of parole officers. Actually, there are four field representatives, and it is expected that an assistant will be appointed shortly. However, I would not want honourable senators to think that the several hundreds of people on ticket of leave are under the direct supervision of these officers. The Remission Service of Canada has the assistance of prisoner aftercare agencies across the country, together with that of provincial probation and parole officers in the provinces, wherever they exist.

May I now refer to the concluding remarks of the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll), as reported in Hansard of March 5, at page 249:

> I think the time is overdue for a second volume of the Archambault Report. The first was a landmark in the penal history of our country. Crime and the incidence of crime is one of the most pressing problems on the horizon. We urgently need a Royal Commission on our penal system or, short of that, I think it would be an excellent thing for this Senate to undertake a thorough study of the penal system by a small committee who would devote themselves to that work.

I think I should draw to the attention of honourable senators the fact that a number of members of this house are sitting on a very important committee at this time, namely, the Joint Parliamentary Committee on capital punishment, corporal punishment and lotteries. I have here an extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, dated February 10, 1954, as follows:

> That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament to inquire into and report upon the question whether the criminal law of Canada relating to (a) capital punishment, (b) corporal punishment, or (c) lotteries, should be amended in any respect, and, if so, in what manner and to what extent.
> That the following senators be appointed on behalf of the Senate on the said Joint Committee, namely,
> The Honourable Senators Aseltine, Beauregard, Bouffard, Farris, Fergusson, Hayden, Hodges, McDonald, Roebuck and Veniot.

The committee was reconstituted in January, 1955. An extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate dated Tuesday, January 25, 1955, shows the reappointment of all the senators previously named, except that the name of the Honourable Senator Vien is substituted for that of the late Senator Beauregard. That committee is considering a very important question in connection with crime in this country.

Also there is sitting at the present time an informal committee called by the Minister of Justice in re remission service and parole in Canada. The committee is composed of outstanding men, including an eminent jurist, all of whom are closely associated with the administration of Canadian criminal law, or take a great interest in those who find themselves in the clutches of the law. The members of the committee are: Mr. Justice J. H. G. Fauteux, Supreme Court of Canada; Mr. W. B. Common, Q.C., Director of Public Prosecutions, Province of Ontario; Mr. Joseph McCulley, Warden, Hart House, University of Toronto; and Mr. J. Alex. Edmison, Q.C., Assistant to the Principal, Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario. I have before me an excerpt from a letter to Mr. Common from the Honourable Stuart S. Garson, Minister of Justice, which reads as follows:

> This will confirm the arrangement under which you have been good enough to undertake to act as a member of an informal committee established to investigate and report upon the principles and procedures followed in the Remission Service of the Department of Justice in connection with the exercise of clemency and to recommend what changes, if any, should be made in those principles and procedures.
> As I think you know, I do not propose to place restrictions of any kind upon your field of inquiry. Rather, it is my hope that members of the committee would find it possible to examine the entire field of remission and parole and, after a full inquiry, report to me their findings and recommendations.

A royal commission is sitting at the present time on the subject of criminal sexual psychopaths.

The appointment of that commission reads as follows:

> By Order in Council P.C. 1954-445, dated the 25th day of March, 1954, the Governor in Council was pleased, pursuant to Part I of the Inquiries Act, to appoint:
> The Honourable James Chalmers McRuer, Chief Justice of the High Court of Justice for Ontario
> Doctor Gustave Desrochers, Assistant Superintendent of St. Michel Hospital, at the City of Quebec and
> Her Honour Judge Helen Kinnear, County Court Judge for the County of Haldimand, Ontario
> as Commissioners to inquire into and report upon the question whether the criminal law of Canada relating to criminal sexual psychopaths should be amended in any respect, and, if so, in what manner and to what extent.

The appointment of the royal commission in re the defence of insanity reads:

By Order in Council P.C. 1954-289, dated the 2nd day of March, 1954, the Governor in Council was pleased, pursuant to Part I of the Inquiries Act, to appoint:

Honourable James Chalmers McRuer, Chief Justice of the High Court of Justice for Ontario

Dr. Gustave Desrochers, Assistant Superintendent of St. Michel Hospital at the City of Quebec

Her Honour Judge Helen Kinnear, County Court Judge for the County of Haldimand, Ontario

Dr. Robert O. Jones, Professor of Psychiatry at Dalhousie University, Halifax, N.S.

Joseph Harris, Esq., of Winnipeg, Manitoba, as Commissioners to inquire into and report upon the questions whether the criminal law of Canada relating to the defence of insanity should be amended in any respect, and if so, in what manner and to what extent.

Honourable senators, having read to you the Orders in Council by which the two royal commissions were set up, the letter setting up the committee to consider the question of remission service and parole, and the names of honourable senators serving on the Joint Committee on capital punishment, corporal punishment and lotteries, I have brought to your attention the fact that at present we have these four bodies composed of very competent persons considering this whole matter of penal reform. In view of what is being done, I doubt if it would be advisable at this time for this house to set up a committee to consider the question. One committee has already made its report, which, as I have said, will be printed and distributed within a few weeks. The other bodies are still sitting. I would suggest, honourable senators, that we should at least wait until all these reports have been received by us.

In conclusion, I would again thank all who have taken part in the debate. We are indebted to the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) for bringing this important subject to our attention.

The honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) has asked me if those men who receive training in the penitentiaries are able to find jobs when they get out. Many of them do find work. In some parts of Canada their training is recognized by the trade unions. In those areas where there is plenty of work and a scarcity of men qualified in their trades, they have no difficulty finding work. But in still other parts of Canada there is a certain prejudice against men who have served time, and they have difficulty in finding jobs. Too often a man gets out of jail without perhaps having completed his training to become a first-class mechanic, but even when a man has a good knowledge of his trade a prospective employer is bound to ask him where he was last employed, and upon being told that the man learned his trade in prison he will say "I am sorry, but we can't take you." I think, honourable senators, the greatest service we can do for a man who has been released from prison is to treat him with all kindness and, if it is within our power to do so, to give him a job.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Will the Honourable the Solicitor General explain the difference between the findings of a royal commission, a joint parliamentary committee and an informal committee? We have heard about all three brands, and I would be interested to know what is the respective value or status of the findings of each of these three bodies.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I must admit that I am not fully prepared to give a definite answer to that question, but it seems to me the difference is to be found in the methods by which these various bodies are set up. The honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) has just reminded me that senators and members of Parliament may not be members of a royal commission. I take that statement to be correct. In any event, the reports and recommendations of these bodies are tabled in Parliament, but neither the Government nor Parliament is bound to accept them.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Is not another difference to be found in the fact that royal commissions have power under the Inquiries Act to force persons to testify, while parliamentory committees do not have that power?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is true.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: Under what authority does a commission receive the title "Royal Commission"?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: A royal commission is appointed by the Governor in Council under the provisions of the Inquiries Act.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: The purport of my question, if the Honourable the Solicitor General, will permit me, is the virtue and value of the findings of the respective bodies.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: You know that.

Hon. Mr. Power: What difference does it make?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I can only repeat that there are different methods of constituting parliamentary committees and royal commissions. The royal commission is set up by the Governor in Council, and its procedure differs from that of a parliamentary committee. As the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) has said, under the Inquiries Act witnesses can be forced to testify before a commission.

As to the result, I doubt if there is very much difference between the effect of the findings of a commission and those of a committee. As I have said, Parliament does not have to adopt the findings of either. I think the effect would probably be the same in both instances.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Cameron the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

[1] All data for England and Wales were excerpted from the publication "Criminal Statistics", England and Wales, Home Office, for the years shown.

[2] All data for Canada, with the exception of population data, were excerpted from the publication "Statistics of Criminal and other Offences", Dominion Bureau of Statistics for the years shown. Population data were based on "Estimated Population by Sex and Age Group, for Canada and Provinces", D.B.S. which is published annually (see 4 below).

[3] Estimated population of England and Wales 17 years of age and over as published in "Criminal Statistics", England and Wales, Home Office.

[4] Estimated population of Canada 16 years of age and over, adjusted from the published intercensal estimates (see 2 above). Population data may be obtained from these estimates, without adjustment, for 15 years of age and over.

[5] According to Criminal Statistics England and Wales, the principal offence of which a person is found guilty is tabulated for each person convicted. If a person is prosecuted on two or more occasions during the year, he is recorded once on each occasion.

[6] Canadian data on indictable offences are tabulated in two ways; first by persons convicted, and second, by convictions. The data for indictable offences shown in this table are for persons convicted. Only one offence was tabulated for each person represented in the table. This offence was selected according to the criteria set forth in the Methodological Note (6).

[8] Canadian data on offences punishable on summary conviction are based on convictions. (See Methodological Note (8)).

[9] For a list of offences that were excluded, see Methodological Note (9).

Methodological Note

(6) The offence was selected for tabulation according to the following criteria: (1) If the person was tried on several charges, the offence selected is that for which proceedings were carried to the furthest stage—conviction and sentence; (2) If there were several convictions, the offence selected is that for which the heaviest punishment was awarded; (3) If the final result of proceedings on two or more charges was the same, the offence selected is the more serious one, as measured by the maximum penalty allowed by the law; (4) If a person was prosecuted for one offence and convicted of another, for example charged with murder and convicted of manslaughter, the offence selected is the one of which the person was convicted.

(7) The reader is referred to Sections (B) of Tables VII and VIII of the Annual Tables contained in Criminal Statistics, England and Wales. Basic data relating to offences punishable on summary conviction, or non-indictable offences, for persons 17 years of age and over are to be found in these tables.

(8) No information is available on the number of persons involved in offences punishable on summary conviction. The reader is referred to Part II, Statistics of Criminal and Other Offences.

(9) The following offences, listed in Sections (B) of Tables VII and VIII (see 7, above), were excluded: 122. Obstructions and nuisances other than by vehicles; 123. Obstruction by mechanically-propelled vehicles; 124. Tramcars and trolley-buses; 125. Driving public vehicles dangerously, &c.; 128. Other offences; 129. Driving private cars dangerously, &c.; 130. Other offences; 131. Driving motor cabs dangerously, &c.; 132. Other offences; 133. Driving motor cycles dangerously, &c.; 134. Other offences; 135. Horsedrawn vehicles; 136. Hand carts and barrows; 137. Pedal cycles; 138. Taking motor without consent. Selection of the above offences was based on the category "traffic offences" which appears in two separate tables in the "introductory note." Numerical references are to be the statistical codes published in Tables VII and VIII (Sections B) Criminal Statistics, England and Wales.

(10) The following offences were excluded: Dangerous and reckless driving, driving while ability impaired, driving while intoxicated, driving while licence suspended, leaving scene of accident, taking without owner's consent, and other traffic offences, which include those classified as provincial and municipal traffic offences.

Routine proceedings.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP BILL

COMMONS AMENDMENTS

A message was received from the House of Commons returning Bill B, an Act to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act, and acquainting the Senate that they have passed this bill with certain amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The amendments were read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

1. Page 1, line 25. Strike out clause 2 on pages 1 and 2.
2. Pages 2, 3 and 4. Renumber clauses 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8 as clauses 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7.
3. Page 2, line 23. For the word "under" substitute the words "by virtue of a certificate of naturalization as defined in".
4. Page 3, line 22. For the words "that date" substitute the words "the thirty-first day of December, 1956".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these amendments be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 165, an Act to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With leave, next sitting.

CANADA SHIPPING BILL

AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the report of committee on Bill H-7.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to whom was referred the Bill (H-7) intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act", beg leave to report as follows:

Your committee recommend that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 200 copies in French of their proceedings on the said bill, and that Rule 100 be suspended in relation to the said printing.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: With leave of the Senate, now. I move that the report be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

STAFF OF THE SENATE

FIFTH, SIXTH, SEVENTH AND EIGHTH REPORTS OF INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMITTEE

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts, presented the fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth reports of the committee.

He said: Honourable senators, these reports are quite lengthy and it would probably take from twenty minutes to half an hour to read them. Therefore I do not believe honourable senators would want the reports read, and I would move that they be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the house.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: May I ask if the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) would object to having the reports published in the Minutes of Proceedings or in Hansard, so that honourable members may become acquainted with them before they are taken up for consideration?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am very glad to agree to that. Our rules provide for the printing of these reports in the Minutes of Proceedings. If for any reason they do not appear there tomorrow I will then move that consideration of them be held over; otherwise I will suggest consideration tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Thank you.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 291 to 299, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

The bills were read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: With leave, next sitting.

EXCHEQUER COURT (DIVORCE JURISDICTION) BILL

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 20, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, seconded by Hon. Mrs. Hodges, for the second reading of Bill I-5, an Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, the bill that we are now studying restricts itself to the granting of jurisdiction to the Exchequer Court of Canada in matters regarding divorce.

I have listened most attentively to the speeches which have already been delivered, and indeed have re-read some of them. For instance, the speech of the honourable senator from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Ross), which I did not have the opportunity of listening to, I have read several times.

At the outset of these remarks may I say that I count it a pleasure to congratulate all who have participated in the discussion of this bill. It is good to note that each speaker has put considerable work on the subject and has enlarged the scope of the discussion with a freedom of thought and a sense of justice that does honour to the Parliament of Canada.

Each time that I take part in a discussion on divorce I experience some emotion. It has always been with a great deal of prudence that I have marshalled my thoughts and approached such a debate, all the while attempting to preserve the broad outlook so characteristic of this house. Though my religious convictions may not have been without some influence on my opinion, a deep study of the question has convinced me that, strictly from the social point of view, divorce remains a scourge which must be fought wherever it exists, no matter what our religious creed may be. It is on this essential premise that I desired to participate in the discussion and to collaborate in the work of this house.

Like many others who have already spoken on this question, I recognize the fact that certain painful consequences sometimes result from the indissolubility of marriage. One cannot fail to observe this if individual cases and private interests are considered. In the present discussion, however, we must first and foremost consider the common good and the general welfare; for if the general interest requires the sacrifice of certain individual cases, then such sacrifices must be made. We must consider it a duty to abandon individual interests in favour of the general interest. In every country where it has been desired to protect private interests by laws and exceptions which apply only to certain individuals, it was soon realized that the general welfare was considerably affected.

In my opinion, if there exists a case where the general weal must be placed above the private interests of the individual, it is indeed in the matter of divorce. For all who consider the family and the children as the basis of society, the individual happiness of certain persons must be subordinated to that of the family and society in general.

The examples of France, Russia, England and the United States strike every one who has taken the trouble to study the results of divorce legislation in those countries. Two years ago in this house, speaking on the question of divorce, I gave some figures that are truly frightening. I do not intend to hark back on those figures, but they indicate incontestably that the divorce laws in those countries are causing conditions which are becoming more and more intolerable. Indeed, they tend to undermine the very foundations of society. Certain countries which are not especially characterized by religious feelings have had to return to more reasonable laws and have had to be mindful of protecting both the family and children.

Moreover, the field of divorce is not the only one where private interests must come second to those of the general public. For example, all legislation with regard to service in the armed forces and other wartime legislation, and laws relating to taxation do not affect all people equally. Certain families are more particularly affected, and the living conditions of a certain number of people become difficult. However, legislative bodies do not hesitate, and quite rightly so, to leave aside consideration of these specific cases in the general interest of society and the country as a whole. Likewise in the matter of divorce, the exceptions are often worthy of sympathy, but if we wish to safeguard the general welfare I am of the opinion that the rule regarding the indissolubility of marriage must be kept in its integrity.

My convictions on this subject are shared by numerous Canadian citizens, whatever the regions or the religious faiths to which they belong. Others are convinced of the contrary. Among the former are those who think that exceptional cases must be extremely curtailed; others are convinced that the list of exceptions must be enlarged. I respect the opinion of each group, just as I respect the opinion of all Canadians who wish to bring to bear on this question the attention that its seriousness warrants. That these opinions may be the result of religious convictions, of traditions or of social ideologies matters little. They are the inevitable consequences of the diversity of a democratic way of life. I respect these opinions, and I trust that the members of the house will, in the same manner, respect the opinion that I share with the vast majority of the province to which I belong.

I come now to the heart of the matter, to a discussion of the bill. I shall leave to the members of the Senate from Newfoundland the task of discussing the bill in so far as it applies to that province, and I shall limit my remarks to the province of Quebec.

The first question that must be decided is that of knowing whether the province of Quebec is opposed to the principle of divorce. I do not think it necessary to comment at length on this point, for all members of this house are convinced that the province of Quebec is unswervingly opposed to all divorce. Numerous illustrations could be cited relevant to this attitude; but I shall mention only a few of them.

No public organization from Quebec that I know of has, up to now, made to the Canadian Parliament any representation to the effect of having the principle of the dissolubility of marriage recognized for any cause whatsoever. In eight of the Canadian provinces legislative bodies, associations, and other private groups have placed the problem of divorce legislation in the forefront. No movement of this kind has ever occurred in the province of Quebec. The Canadian Bar Association has pronounced in favour of divorce legislation, but the resolution was successfully passed only after 20 years of struggle, all the members of the Quebec branch of the association having unanimously spoken against the resolution.

No organization, either religious or civil, from the province of Quebec has ever made representation to the Canadian Parliament either to extend the grounds for divorce or to extend to that province jurisdiction of the courts on this question. Never has the legislature of the province of Quebec thought to rule on this question of divorce, for the extremely simple reason that the entire Catholic population of the province disapproves of the very principle of divorce. As a matter of fact, the Civil Code of Quebec, like the Custom of Paris, hallows the principle of marriage indissolubility. Indeed, article 185 of the Civil Code enforces this basic tenet in the following terms:

185. Marriage can only be dissolved by the natural death of one of the parties; while both live, it is indissoluble.

This is so well known that I need not dwell further on it.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Mr. Speaker, may I rise to a point of order? I am listening with much interest to my honourable friend from Grandville, but he is not discussing the bill at all, he is discussing something else altogether. I do think, sir, that the ordinary rules of procedure in this house require a member when speaking to speak to the subject under discussion.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: The matter which is under discussion at the present time is a bill that relates to the dissolubility or indissolubility of marriage.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: It is a bill that proposes to give the Exchequer Court of Canada power to grant divorce for adultery.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Under the same laws that we have now.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: No. We have no law which authorizes a court or gives instructions to the Senate to grant a divorce in any case. Anyone may petition the Divorce Committee of the Senate for a divorce and be refused. There is no legislation in Canada or in Quebec stating that when adultery has been proven divorce must be granted. If we accept the jurisdiction of the court we violate the principle contained in the Civil Code of Quebec, that is the principle of indissolubility of marriage. Anyhow, that is my opinion and I am entitled to it. My honourable friend may have a very different opinion, but I share the opinion of the vast majority of the people of Quebec, including the vast majority of lawyers in that province. I think that I am staying closely to the point when discussing the principle of dissolubility or indissolubility of marriage.

I pass now to the question: Why is the province of Quebec opposed to divorce? The honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), in his memorable speech on this subject, asked this question and hoped someone would enlighten him.

The first reason is one of a moral nature, and I have already referred to it. The great majority of the population of Quebec is French-speaking and Catholic. Now, all Quebec Catholics, both English-speaking and French-speaking alike, are opposed to divorce, for a moral reason found in their religion. Catholic doctrine teaches that marriage is inviolable and also unalterable. Thus the fundamental laws governing marriage do not depend upon human wills. They have been established by God; and it belongs to the church to enforce the discipline of them. Positive human laws regulate the conditions of validity and the social consequences of the free consent given by husband and wife. But these latter laws must be superimposed upon and not substituted for the essential prescriptions of the church. Such is the basic Catholic doctrine with regard to marriage.

There, then, is the profound reason why the Catholic majority of Quebec recognizes the principle of the indissolubility of marriage and at the same time is fundamentally opposed to the very idea of divorce.

Now, honourable senators, it so happens that this reason of a moral order is reinforced, traditionally, by a judicial standard which has always prevailed in positive law —both public and private—of French Canada. Our population in Qeubec has at all times been under the régime of marriage indissolubility. Under the French régime there was never any question of divorce, no more than in France. Indeed, no divorce legislation had been passed in France before the French revolution, that is to say 1792.

From 1760 to Confederation no divorce was granted in French-speaking Canada. On the cession of the country by France to England, the latter—and here is an example of British fair play—recognized the right of her new subjects to speak their own tongue, to practice their own religion, and to be ruled by the civil law in force at the moment of the cession; that is to say, French law. As I shall explain in a few moments, this attitude on the part of those who had conquered Canada was not without some influence on the conduct of the French Canadians of Quebec at the time of Confederation.

From 1774 to 1840 the successive governments of Lower Canada not only refused to interfere with the principle of marriage indissolubility, but also never granted a single divorce in this part of the country.

With the union of the two Canadas, in 1840, a parliament was formed for those two important sections of our country, Upper and Lower Canada. The Canadian leaders who guided the country during this period from 1840 to 1867 governed with the same broadmindedness, as some of them hoped that, sooner or later, Canada would become a great nation without distinction of race or creed. In the same spirit of co-operation they agreed to leave to the elected members from Upper Canada the task of making laws which would especially affect Upper Canada, and to the members from Lower Canada the task of preparing legislation affecting Lower Canada in particular. Never, moreover, during this period was the principle of the indissolubility of marriage broken in so far as Canadian Catholics were concerned. On the contrary, in the Benning case, a request for divorce by an English Protestant from Upper Canada was refused by the Union Parliament in 1865. Also, the Union Parliament adopted, in 1866, one year before Confederation, the Civil Code of the Province of Quebec and thereby recognised, as far as that province was concerned, the principle of the indissolubility of marriage. Article 185, which I read to the Senate a moment ago, dates from 1866; that is, one year before Confederation. Until 1867 that is how Canadians of every religion and descent respected the principle of marriage indissolubility and refrained from imposing on Catholics a principle contrary to that which had, in addition, become a tradition for Quebec.

That is the religious doctrine and those are the judicial norms to which the population of Quebec adheres. It is to be seen, then, that Quebec's unshakeable opposition to all divorce law is founded on two principles: the first and more important is Catholic doctrine; the second, a judicial tradition of ancient standing.

It is now time to examine under what conditions and in what spirit Confederation was brought about; and, at the same time let us see why jurisdiction in matters of divorce was granted to the central government. No one, I am sure, can possibly imagine that between the promulgation of the Civil Code in 1866 and the effective date of Confederation in 1867 the opinion of the people of Quebec was brought in any way to admit the principle of divorce.

Let us go back to that date. Let us try to put ourselves in the frame of mind of the Fathers of Confederation and determine the reasons motivating the transfer of the jurisdiction to the central government regarding this part of the Civil Code which is so important to the province of Quebec.

When the discussions relative to Confederation were under way the question of competence in matters regarding marriage and divorce was delicate. Some favoured retaining complete jurisdiction in this matter; others were rather of the opinion that federal jurisdiction on these two questions should be granted, in order to prevent each province from having its own special laws for marriage and divorce.

The example of the United States was not without some influence on the diversity of Canadian opinion. The American experiment and experience had revealed many gaps and a legislative chaos which was to continue increasing. Moreover, we must not forget that the religious minorities of Quebec—I mean the English Protestants of Quebec—were seriously disturbed about their own situation if jurisdiction in the matter of divorce was left to the province of Quebec. The Benning case, which I have just referred to, gave these minorities food for thought. They suspected that if provincial jurisdiction was retained it would be impossible for them to obtain divorce legislation in the province of Quebec. They did not want to lose this liberty. Thus it was that, faced with these considerations, a compromise was arranged.

If the general opinion of Canadian non-Catholics considered the federal jurisdiction as important, either to avoid differing provincial laws or to respect the rights of Quebec's minorities, no less was it true that at that time, as previously, and likewise as today, Canadian Catholics remained firmly opposed to divorce and to all principles contrary to the indissolubility of marriage. Thus you had, on the one hand, the generally favourable opinion of Anglo-Protestant Canadians with regard to the recognition of the principles of divorce, and on the other hand you had the opinion of the Canadian Catholics, which was strictly opposed to that principle.

Nevertheless, it must not be forgotten that many Canadian Catholics, particularly in Quebec, were of opinion that the sole means of safeguarding inviolate the principle of marriage indissolubility was to retain for Quebec the jurisdiction over marriage and divorce. If this opinion, which was largely held by the population of Quebec, had not been abandoned, Confederation would not, perhaps, have taken place; or, if it had taken place, jurisdiction in matters of marriage and divorce would have remained in the hands of the provinces, thus depriving the Quebec Protestant minority of any possibility of obtaining divorce, whereas their fellows in the rest of Canada could have obtained it locally.

Now, how can we explain the fact that the upper clergy of Quebec, the immense majority of its population and similarly its most prominent politicians did not insist on retention of local jurisdiction? Quite evidently, the reason was the assurance given to the people of Quebec, to its clergy, and to its politicians that British "fair play", which the French Canadians of 1760 had been able to trust, would continue to be practised as in former days. The Catholics of the province of Quebec surely did not agree to surrender the principle of marriage indissolubility. Surely they did not consent to having the principle of divorce imposed on their province. They placed their trust in their clergy—at least in the ecclesiastical leaders, who showed no opposition, and in their public men. They had confidence in the British "fair play" expected of the Anglo-Protestant majority. The Catholic population of Quebec was assured that the federal Government would not violate the principle of the indissolubility of marriage as recognized in Quebec, meanwhile allowing the Anglo-Protestant minority of Quebec, even if resident in the province of Quebec, to obtain a divorce in cases judged compatible with their beliefs and traditions.

Permit me to quote one or two statements. Sir Hector Langevin, Solicitor General for Canada at that time, said:

> The word marriage has been placed in the draft of the proposed Constitution to invest the federal Parliament with the right of declaring what marriages shall be held and deemed to be valid throughout the whole extent of the Confederacy, without, however, interfering in any particular with the doctrines or rites of the religious creeds to which the contracting parties may belong.

Mr. John Scoble, member for West Elgin, stated:

> The Catholic members of the house take exception to the power conferred on the general government in the matter of marriage and divorce. I think the power is very properly placed there. I respect their religious convictions; as a Protestant, I ask them to respect mine. We owe each other mutual toleration. If the Protestant section of this house and this province do not regard marriage as a sacrament, and, therefore, inviolable and indissoluble, I believe they will be found to have as high an opinion of the sacred obligations involved in it, and admit it to be as binding upon the conscience of all who enter upon that holy and honourable state, as their Catholic fellow-subjects. This view ought not to be offensive to the judgment or the conscience of our Catholic friends, for it will not and cannot interfere in the slightest degree, either with the form or the continuity of their marriages; and surely they will grant to us, the non-Catholic section of the province, that liberty of conscience in this matter which they claim and enjoy themselves.

Honourable senators, these quotations show clearly the spirit in which legislation was passed on marriage and divorce, and why the religious leaders and public men of French Canada ever consented to allow divorce to be placed under federal jurisdiction: namely, to grant the English Protestant minority of the province of Quebec the right to enjoy freedom of religious faith and the power to obtain divorces in those cases where their own creed permitted.

This trust which the people of Quebec evidenced in 1867 has been justified up until the present. The conduct of the Parliament of Canada has never wavered. The "gentlemen's agreement" has been maintained in its integrity; and until now no bill has been presented in either house which might violate in the smallest degree the principle of the indissolubility of marriage as applied to the province of Quebec. The sole exceptions are the present bill before the Senate and the one presented by a member of the House of Commons. I am not casting any doubt on the good faith of those who have presented the proposed legislation. I have the impression that their good faith has been taken by surprise. Indeed, they have not realized that a "gentlemen's agreement" existed and that this agreement had been respected up until now; nor did they realize that rejecting the agreement would violate the assurance given and would be contrary to British "fair play".

The approximate number of divorce petitions presented annually to the Parliament of Canada is 400. By far the great majority affect only persons of the English Protestant minority residing in the province of Quebec, and it was precisely for them that the compromise was accepted. Must the people of Quebec now regret having confided the task of legislating on divorce to the hands of the federal Government? Is the majority of this house going to put aside the "gentlemen's agreement", without which Confederation would probably not have been accepted?

I have too much confidence in my colleagues and in my fellow countrymen of the English language to think for one moment that this "gentlemen's agreement" could be put aside, solely to remove from certain members of the Canadian Senate the burden of divorce investigations. I willingly recognize that these investigations are long and tiresome; but on the other hand one should not forget that the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, did not hesitate to say before this house that the work of his committee does not constitute too heavy a burden. He added that even should this work be increased the committee would be quite capable of handling it without difficulty. I thank him for his honesty; and I am most happy to notice that the honourable senator states that he is ready to continue this task rather than favour legislation which would hallow in a province, against its will, a principle of which it has always disapproved.

In rereading attentively the speeches delivered in this house by colleagues whose opinions, frankness and loyalty I respect, I notice that they do not seem to consider the present bill as a violation of the principle of indissolubility of marriage but rather as a simple piece of legislation signifying a change of jurisdiction. If that is their opinion, I regret that I am unable to share it; for the present proposed law, if adopted, would constitute a law of general application—a law fundamentally different from bills governing exceptional cases. Indeed, the Canadian Parliament, by its Constitution and in virtue of its sovereign authority can, when it deems fit, adopt bills governing individual cases in matters of divorce, and may do so without thus recognizing the general principle of marriage dissolubility.

It would be quite otherwise if by a general law the Canadian Parliament conferred on a tribunal even discretionary power to pronounce divorce. This latter legislation would have a general application, unlike bills of a private nature which apply only to the interested parties, and, by this very fact, would imply the general principle of the dissolubility of marriage in the case of adultery.

The bill which has been presented aims at giving to the Exchequer Court of Canada the power to dissolve marriages of the residents of the province of Quebec in cases of adultery, and that is absolutely against the principle enacted by the Civil Code of 1866, which clearly states that marriage is indissoluble while the two parties live. No adultery or other reason can justify dissolution of marriage. That is the principle which was adopted in Quebec one year before Confederation and has never been modified since. In the other provinces adultery is recognized as a cause of dissolution of marriage. Consequently, I consider it impossible to claim that adoption of the bill as it has been submitted would not constitute a law of general application. That is to say, if the Exchequer Court of Canada were given the right to pronounce divorce in the case of adultery, then adultery would be a cause for dissolution of marriage, which is exactly the opposite of what the province of Quebec wants. Such legislation would impose on the province of Quebec the principle of the dissolubility of marriage in the case of adultery, and by this very fact, and in a most flagrant manner, would violate article 185 of the Civil Code of Quebec. This article decrees that marriage is indissoluble.

The honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris), one of the most distinguished lawyers in this house, has attempted to preserve the principle of marriage indissolubility as recognized in the province of Quebec, by proposing that the Exchequer Court of Canada be granted discretionary power similar to that which belongs, under the Constitution, to the Parliament of Canada; that is to say, the power to grant or to refuse divorce even in the case of adultery. I deeply appreciate this effort on the part of one who is so well versed in law. I realize, moreover, that my honourable friend has not forgotten the special position of the province of Quebec. However, I must state that his proposition is not acceptable, because it would not prevent his general law from tampering with the principle of the indissolubility of marriage. My learned colleague knows very well that no court of justice may exercise discretionary power in a complete and absolute way.

I take it for granted that no one is proposing to give to the Exchequer Court of Canada such discretionary power that that tribunal could render judgments according to its own whims, caprices and mere inclinations that might ignore every principle, legal rule or other procedure of law. Moreover, according to doctrine and jurisprudence no court of justice can exercise such discretionary power completely and absolutely. The only power of discretion possible for a tribunal is that conferred by the law which grants jurisdiction to the tribunal. Such discretionary power, in addition, may be exercised only according to strictly defined limits, or in cases as foreseen by such law.

The law granting jurisdiction to the Exchequer Court of Canada in matters of divorce should, then, define the limits and terms of discretionary power that it is proposed to grant to this tribunal. For example, such discretionary power could rule on the prescription regarding applications for divorce, or on the effect of reconciliation of the parties applying for divorce, or on the loss of the right of the applicant when he himself is guilty of adultery. In the case which is before us at the present time, the discretionary power which might be given to the Exchequer Court of Canada in cases of divorce on grounds of adultery could not be interpreted as granting to this tribunal, when adultery has been proven, the discretion to grant divorce in one case and to refuse it in another. This court of justice would end by recognizing that, in the cases where adultery has been proven, divorce must be granted. Thus, inevitably a jurisprudence in this sense would be established which would bind the court. By this very fact, the discretionary power which we are discussing would be put aside.

Honourable senators, no tribunal has the discretion that the Parliament of Canada has. Parliament is the only body that has a discretion so large that it may grant divorce today to one couple and refuse it tomorrow to another couple, although the evidence in both cases was very similar. Parliament is not obliged to give any reason for granting a divorce; it may do whatever it wants, without reasons, on its own initiative. That is exactly what I call a discretionary power. No court can exercise such a power. And if we look at the way the discretion has been exercised by Parliament we see it has come to the point—and I cannot blame anybody for it—that everyone who applies to the Senate for divorce and proves adultery is given a decree of divorce.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Oh, no, I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Well, mostly—I would say in 95 per cent of the cases. The power of Parliament, of course, is such that it could refuse in certain cases a divorce application even where adultery has been proven; that illustrates how large the discretion of Parliament is.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Is that discretion allowed to a judge?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: No, never. No judge of a court is allowed discretion to grant a divorce to one couple today because he feels like it, and to refuse a divorce tomorrow to another couple in similar circumstances. As a matter of fact, the Privy Council has often said that a court should exercise its discretion according to law or jurisprudence. For instance, it would be quite easy for the court, if it had discretionary power, to establish jurisprudence by which no application would be entertained when there is a possibility of reconciliation between the parties; or where an applicant is himself guilty of adultery; or when an application for divorce is made five years after the alleged commission of adultery. These would be recognized exceptions established by jurisprudence, if not by law. As I say, reasons should be given for granting one application and refusing another where the circumstances are similar.

If we look at the discretion which the Senate has had and which it has exercised for the past ninety years, we can come to the conclusion that generally speaking when adultery has been proven, the committee recommends that a divorce be granted, and that recommendation is usually accepted by the Senate and the other house. I would not say that is the practice without exception. The Senate by its own constitution has discretionary power, but a court, established with jurisdiction to pronounce divorce in cases of adultery, could not exercise discretion which would be in accordance with the whims or caprice of the judge who presides over it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Would the honourable senator permit me to say a word in defence of the Divorce Committee? The committee does not act as an automaton to grant divorce when adultery is proven. The conduct of the parties is taken into consideration, and frequently for good reason divorce is not granted, even when adultery has been proven. For instance, in a case where the applicant does not deserve the relief asked for, or where the respondent has been put in the position of committing an offence by the act of the applicant, we do not grant a divorce even though the routine proof of adultery has been made.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I accept the statement of the honourable senator. I have no doubt that Parliament has exercised its discretion properly, in that when an applicant for divorce has placed himself in such a position as to be unworthy of attention, even though he may prove adultery, he is not granted a divorce.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: He must come to Parliament with clean hands.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Yes. But Parliament, having complete discretion, will not grant divorce to one applicant and refuse it to another if the circumstances are similar.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Neither would a judge.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Neither would a judge. That is why I say that discretionary power cannot and will never be exercised except by the Senate in its handling of individual cases. In other words, it does not recognize a general principle. For instance, if tomorrow the Senate wished to render different treatment to two parties in the same position, it could do so, but a court could not do so under the law.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question? The British North America Act gives the Parliament of Canada power to grant divorce. Is there anything in the bill now before us in conflict with that act?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: No, there is not. The Parliament of Canada has complete jurisdiction over divorce; it could, if it wished, pass a bill tomorrow stipulating that divorce shall be recognized all across Canada, or it could pass a bill providing that divorce be granted on other grounds than adultery. There is no doubt that its jurisdiction is complete. But if Parliament exercised that jurisdiction in so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, it would show a lack of fair play and a violation of the "gentlemen's agreement" of 1867.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Why was divorce jurisdiction given by the British North America Act?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: A "gentlemen's agreement" is not put in any act, otherwise it would not be a "gentlemen's agreement". It should continue to be observed as it has been over the past ninety years.

Hon. Mr. Euler: If that is so, how is it possible for people from the province of Quebec, Catholic and Protestants alike, to come to Parliament and get a divorce?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: They come here because Parliament has the right to grant divorce to them.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Is that a breach of faith with the province of Quebec?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: The right was given to the Parliament of Canada essentially for the benefit of the English Protestant minorities of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Does it therefore mean that it is improper for citizens of the province of Quebec who are not Protestants to apply to Parliament for a divorce, as they are doing at every sitting of the committee?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: If we enter upon a discussion of the possibility of sin on the part of Catholics we shall be going pretty far. If it is declared that divorce is legal, many Catholics will take the opportunity to sin. For instance, killing is forbidden in Canada, yet some Canadian citizens kill. Likewise adultery is forbidden by almost all religions, yet adultery is committed. Some Catholic people sin just as members of other faiths do. When Catholics come before the Senate and apply for a divorce they commit a sin according to their religion, if they still believe in it. But that is no reason for giving a court general permission to grant divorce and inviting Catholics to come to it and sin.

In the bill which is now before us the giving of power to the Exchequer Court of Canada to use discretion in divorce cases based on the ground of adultery could not be interpreted as giving to that tribunal the discretion, in cases where adultery has been proven, to grant a divorce in one case and refuse it in another under similar circumstances. The court would recognize that in a case where adultery has been proven, divorce must be granted. Thus, inevitably, a jurisprudence in this sense would be established which would bind the court. By this very fact the discretionary power which we are discussing would be put aside.

Granting to the Exchequer Court of Canada jurisdiction with regard to divorce, even with discretionary power, would inevitably lead to recognition of dissolution of marriage in the province of Quebec.

You will ask me why we should refuse to grant to the Exchequer Court of Canada the discretionary power which now belongs to the Canadian Parliament in matters of divorce. I am quite ready to recognize that Parliament, when it adopts laws of exception in matters of divorce, may exercise a discretionary power in such cases. There, however, it concerns a discretionary power which would be exercised by a lawmaker and not by a tribunal. Parliament, in matters of divorce, has an absolute power. More precisely, this absolute power is a consequence of the "gentlemen's agreement" of 1867 which rendered Confederation possible.

Such absolute power permits the Canadian Parliament to impose, even on the province of Quebec, the principle of marriage dissolubility for any cause whatsoever. Such legislation would be contrary to the "gentlemen's agreement" of 1867, and opposed to the assurance given to the province of Quebec that this absolute power was conferred upon the Canadian Parliament only for the purpose of protecting the Anglo-Protestant minority of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. Haig: It does not say so.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: It does not say so because it was a "gentlemen's agreement", and such an agreement is never in writing, otherwise it would not be a "gentlemen's agreement".

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It was to protect the minority?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Yes, to protect the minority of the province of Quebec. If in 1866 Parliament granted the principle of indissolubility of marriage in the province of Quebec, how could it be believed that next year Quebec would agree that Parliament be given power over marriage and divorce that would set aside completely the law which had been passed in 1866? The purpose was not to impose on a province, against its will and without its consent, legislation contrary to the beliefs and traditions of the huge majority of its inhabitants. I am convinced that the Parliament of Canada, which respects customs and liberties and is inspired by British "fair-play", will never use its absolute power in such a way. And today, if divorce is granted indifferently to members of various religious denominations, it is granted by a law of exception in every case. It cannot be said to be granted by a law of general application. Consequently the principle of the indissolubility of marriage has been preserved, and that for ninety years.

The honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) suggested that honourable senators who believe that divorce should not be granted on any ground to applicants from Quebec or Newfoundland, should propose that no divorce be granted by Parliament to applicants from Quebec and Newfoundland on any ground. Even though this suggestion appears to me to be favourable and would, I am sure, be well received in the province of Quebec, none the less to carry it out would be to violate the compromise which preceded the pact of Confederation. By virtue of this compromise the province of Quebec, although by a great majority opposed to divorce, would nevertheless protect the rights of the Anglo-Protestant minority. And we do not ask that all divorce petitions from the province of Quebec be refused. We would accept that, but we would still say it was a violation of the "gentlemen's agreement" that was made in 1867.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Is there anything on record in connection with this "gentlemen's agreement"?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I have cited two speeches made by people who were very close to Confederation and were members of Parliament; one was the then Solicitor General. I may mention also the fact that in 1867, when Confederation was submitted to Parliament, Parliament was composed solely of Quebec and Ontario legislators. If the clergy and the French-Canadian politicians had opposed it, I do not think it would have been possible to pass such legislation and grant divorce jurisdiction to the federal Parliament.

The Benning case which came before the house in 1865, two years before Confederation, was the petition of an Ontario Protestant asking for divorce on the ground of adultery. It came before the Union Parliament and the vote was against it, because the province of Quebec was opposed to the dissolubility of marriage. I am sure that the Anglo-Protestants of Quebec at that time feared very much that if the jurisdiction was left in the hands of Quebec it would never be possible to have a divorce application considered in Quebec. There was not a single member of the upper clergy in the province of Quebec, not a single politician of Quebec, I mean of any scope, who opposed the Confederation legislation, because they were assured that it would be used by the Canadian Parliament in such a way that it would not interfere with the Catholic faith of the people of the province of Quebec and the principle of marriage indissolubility. That is my conviction.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: May I ask a question? If that is the case why is not the Senate Divorce Committee compelled, whenever a Roman Catholic applies for a divorce, to refuse it?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Well, you ask me a very complicated question. We have in Canada complete freedom of religion. Because a person is a Catholic today is no reason why he may not be a Protestant tomorrow. If you were to refuse a divorce on account of the fact that a man was regarded as a Catholic—it might be that he has been a Catholic or that he was married before a Catholic priest—he might submit to you that he is no longer a Catholic. Then what would be the answer?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: But they do not do that.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: They don't do it, because they do not need to. Whenever they will need to, they will do it.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: May I ask my honourable friend a question? I have listened with a great deal of interest to his very impressive dissertation on the subject of divorce in Quebec, and I am wondering if the honourable gentleman could tell me where the difference comes in between divorce and annulment of marriage, in view of his remarks about the indissolubility of marriage.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: The two do not at all interfere. I explained at the beginning of my speech the principle of the Roman Catholic religion on divorce. When you admit that principle you come to the conclusion that the laws of marriage and divorce are only the application of the church law, which superimposes the positive law. So there is no annulment of marriage in Quebec unless it has been agreed upon by an ecclesiastical tribunal, exactly as was the case in England a hundred years ago. Approval of annulment, according to the rules governing Catholics, must be given by an ecclesiastical tribunal. If it is not so recognized, it stands in the same position as a proceeding for divorce, and the parties cannot remarry.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Thank you. I was thinking in terms of the emphasis you had laid upon the indissolubility of marriage.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: My statement is that marriage is indissoluble unless, through the action of the appropriate ecclesiastical tribunal, annulment is permitted in accordance with the principles of the Catholic religion.

A few moments ago I was referring to a remark of the honourable senator from Vancouver South in which he challenged those who object to this bill to propose that every demand for divorce which comes from the province of Quebec should be refused. I repeat that even if this proposal appears to me to be more favourable—and it would, I am sure, be well received in Quebec—it none the less would be a violation of the compromise which preceded the pact of Confederation. By virtue of this compromise the province of Quebec, although by a great majority opposed to divorce, would nevertheless protect the rights of the Anglo-Protestant minority.

However, I see no reason for objecting to the refusal of divorce to those who have contracted their marriage before a minister of the Catholic church and according to its rites, unless the request were accompanied by authorization from the ecclesiastical tribunal. If the Senate took the position, as regards those who had been married before a Catholic minister, "We are not going to entertain your petition unless you come before us with the authorization of the ministers and the tribunal of your own religion", that attitude would be quite satisfactory as far as Quebec is concerned.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That would be going too far.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Why?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: There would be a revolution if you put that rule into effect.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: That may be so, but it conforms to a law which is binding on Catholics. We do not oppose it. We submit to it. Why should the Senate oppose it? Why should honourable members decide that the rule is too difficult or too severe? If Catholics are satisfied with it, that is their own affair. If individual Catholics do not follow that rule, either they live in sin or they abandon their religion. The vast majority of Catholics would be quite happy if such a decision were made. Why should not the Senate adopt it? As a matter of fact, it would give this chamber jurisdiction to grant divorce only to people of the class that the Fathers of Confederation agreed should be entitled to it.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think you are getting into pretty deep water.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Would not that proceeding be an abdication by the High Court of Parliament to some other tribunal,—which would be unthinkable?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I do not say that the suggestion will be, or should be, accepted. I recognize that if the Senate were to consent to the granting of divorces only in cases of a dissolution or an annulment made by an ecclesiastical court, it might feel that it was limited to following the exercise of jurisdiction by another tribunal. I repeat, I am not urging that the Senate should accept the suggestion. All I say is that we Catholics would be very happy if it did so, because it would have the approval of an immense majority of those of my faith in the province of Quebec.

The honourable senator from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Ross), following a suggestion put forward in 1946 by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, Mr. Louis St. Laurent, proposes that petitions for divorce on the ground of adultery which come from the province of Quebec shall be accompanied by a judgment, rendered by a judge of the Superior Court of that province, decreeing separation from bed and board by reason of adultery. When one considers that, as a result of a recent amendment of the Civil Code of the province of Quebec, adultery on the part of either husband or wife, is a motive which justifies the court in granting separation from bed and board, and also that the judges of the Superior Court, who have jurisdiction to hear and judge the grounds for separation from bed and board, are well placed to evaluate the proof before them, and moreover possess the additional jurisdiction of determining the custody of the children, and questions concerning the properties of the husband and wife, one will, I think, come to the conclusion that the suggestion made by the honourable senator from Calgary is very opportune and answers the questions which have been raised concerning this point. Also, speaking only for myself, I may say that when the suggestion of our Prime Minister was made it was not opportune, because at that time the husband and wife were not on an equal footing in the matter of adultery. A husband could ask for separation from bed and board if the wife had committed adultery; but the wife could not obtain separation on that ground unless the adultery had been committed in the common domicile. But the law has been changed: today the rights of the sexes in this respect are the same; and I am pretty sure that if the Senate were to rule that no application or petition for divorce would be considered unless a judge of the Superior Court of Quebec had granted judgment in separation as to bed and board on the ground of adultery, public opinion in Quebec would be satisfied.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: If that were done, would you not be recognizing divorce in Quebec?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: We do not recognize any divorce. We would not grant divorce in Quebec; we would grant separation from bed and board. That is all we would do, and it has been done for the last five centuries. It is a recognized procedure everywhere. But if it is the desire of the Senate to put an end to hearings by this body in relation to application for divorce, why should it not provide that, if an inquiry into the subject-matter has been made elsewhere by a dependable person or tribunal his or its findings shall be accepted? A judge of the Superior Court of Quebec will not decree separation from bed and board by reason of adultery unless he is satisfied that adultery has been committed. That is precisely how the Senate proceeds in such cases at the present time. This proposal would reduce the amount of investigation work carried on by the Senate. Most of it would be done by a court in Quebec having jurisdiction to grant separations as to bed and board, to settle questions concerning guardianship of children, and money matters resulting from separations or divorce. But divorces themselves would still be granted by special act of Parliament, and in exceptional cases.

Honourable senators, if the Parliament of Canada legislates in this sense, it will be sufficient for it to amend existing regulations. We do not need to pass a law.

This legislation would be easy to apply, would be as just for Catholics as for Anglo-Protestants, and would free the Canadian Senate from the tiresome investigations which have been mentioned. The suggestion of the honourable senator from Calgary is the best that I have heard, and it would appear to be an excellent one to follow if ever it should be decided to transfer these investigations to a power beyond the Senate committee.

For his part, the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), in supporting the present proposed law, brought up the following two reasons among others: the excessively high cost of obtaining a divorce bill, and the fact that the Canadian Senate was not created to hear divorce cases and to conduct investigations into matrimonial problems.

The proposed legislation in no way settles this question of expense, since, firstly, the cost of an investigation before the Exchequer Court of Canada sitting in Ottawa; secondly, the fees of the attorneys charged with the procedure; and, thirdly, the expenses of witnesses, would all be the same. Even if it was proven that the cost of an action in the Exchequer Court would be much less, I still do not see there a valid reason for motivating the proposed change in jurisdiction. The simplest solution then would be to decrease the cost of the bills, and Parliament could rapidly make a decision in this respect.

As for the second reason given by the honourable senator, I believe I should point out that the mere placing of divorce jurisdiction in the Canadian Parliament necessarily imposes on Parliament the obligation to hear divorce cases and to conduct investigations into matrimonial problems unless, recognizing divorce, it gives a court jurisdiction over it. Besides, all our predecessors have always carried out this function; and they did so for a long time for the whole of Canada, without finding that a reason for requesting a change of jurisdiction in this matter. Moreover, this reason seems to lose its complete value in the face of the statement made by the Chairman of the Divorce Committee, the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity, to which I have referred.

Finally, is it necessary to note that the House of Lords exercised the same function until 1857?

Hon. Mr. Euler: That is a long time ago, a hundred years.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Yes, but the Senate of Canada is still exercising this function. The House of Lords set a pretty good example to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Euler: But it discontinued the procedure one hundred years ago.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Because it gave jurisdiction to the courts, and now the right to divorce is recognized in England under the law. Anyone there who is able to prove certain facts can get a divorce just by going to the courts. As a result, instead of having about 3,000 divorce cases a year in Britain there are some 30,000 to 40,000.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Does he know of any country in the civilized world, other than Canada, where divorces are dealt with in a legislative body instead of in the courts?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I have not examined into the matter of divorce jurisdiction in every country but I am pretty sure there are still many countries where divorce is not recognized.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Oh, that may be.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That was not the question.

Hon. Mr. Euler: No, that was not my question. My question was, is there any other legislative body that deals with divorces other than the Parliament of Canada? Divorces are not handled by legislative bodies in England, the United States or France, for instance.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: No. Divorce has been recognized in those countries. I would point out that in every country where divorce is handled in the courts the number of cases has increased to such an extent that the situation has become intolerable to those countries.

Hon. John J. Connolly: May I assist the honourable gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) to this extent? I do not know of any parliamentary body other than the Canadian Senate which handles divorce in the first instance. However, the House of Lords, which is the highest court of appeal in Britain, can deal with divorce matters on appeal.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Comparatively few cases would come before the House of Lords.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It is a judicial committee of the House of Lords that deals with such divorces, is it not?

Hon. John J. Connolly: Yes, but that is part of the House of Lords.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: But the cases do not go before the House of Lords in Britain for final approval or anything like that.

Hon. John J. Connolly. No.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: At any rate, if citizens of other countries wish to have a divorce they can pass laws to get it. But when the province of Quebec does not want divorce, why should it be imposed upon it? It is not the concern of any other province. People in other provinces can get divorces as they want them and we in Quebec do not interfere. Why should they interfere with Quebec and impose upon us a law which we do not want, a law providing for something we do not believe in? We are not asking for it.

Hon. Mr. Euler: How about the minority in your province?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: At the time of Confederation divorce jurisdiction was placed in the federal authority for the precise purpose of protecting the Anglo-Protestant minority of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I wonder.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Well, you just have to look at the remarks of Mr. Scoble and the other members of Confederation. The principle of indissolubility of marriage was passed by the Union Parliament in 1866, exactly one year before Confederation. Does my friend believe that from 1866 to 1867 the majority of the population of Quebec changed its mind and accepted the principle of the dissolubility of marriage?

Hon. Mr. Howden: May I ask a question? I am a member of the Divorce Committee and I wonder if the honourable senator from Grandville realizes that the vast majority of petitions we hear come from Quebec and that they are not from English-speaking persons?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: My honourable friend may be right. They may not involve English-speaking citizens but the majority of them are not Catholics.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Twenty-five per cent of them are.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I would accept that figure.

Hon. Mr. Howden: It is a higher percentage than that.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: We would not object if the Divorce Committee said to the French-Canadian people of Quebec, "We will not entertain your applications for divorce". We would be pleased.

Hon. Mr. Euler: A moment ago the honourable senator asked a question which I would like to answer in this way: I am very loath to believe that members of the Protestant minority in Quebec who are able to establish grounds for divorce under the law of Canada, would prefer to come to Parliament for divorce than to a court in their own province.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: My honourable friend knows that at the time of Confederation the question as to jurisdiction over divorce was whether it should be federal or provincial. The decision that it should be federal was made only in order to protect the Anglo-Protestant minority of Quebec; otherwise it would have been left with the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Haig: As I understand it, laws affecting the province of Quebec prior to Confederation were passed in the Parliament of Canada by members from Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Not exactly.

Hon. Mr. Haig: They must have been supported by the majority of members from that province or they would not have been approved.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I would not say that exactly. The members of the Union Parliament were from Ontario and Quebec, which at that time was known as Upper and Lower Canada. Legislation affecting Upper Canada was decided upon by members from Upper Canada and their decision was accepted by the members from Lower Canada; and similarly the Upper Canada members accepted legislation affecting Lower Canada and approved by the members from that part of the country.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But in 1866, you say, legislation was passed that marriage could not be dissolved by the courts?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Now, who passed that law?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: The Union Parliament, on the decision of the Quebec members.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is what I thought.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: There is no doubt about it. And, as I say, between 1866 and 1867 the majority of the province of Quebec did not change.

Honourable senators, finally it is necessary to note that the House of Lords exercised the divorce function until 1857. Moreover, when the Lords voted the pact of Confederation they wanted to bestow on the Parliament of Canada a jurisdiction similar to that which they themselves had exercised, a jurisdiction with all the obligations that it includes.

I rely upon the fair play of this house, on the judgment of all the colleagues, and I ask them not to impose on the province of Quebec a principle which would directly offend the conscience of those who live there.

I have confidence in the decision which will be taken, since the Parliament of Canada, in dealing with so vital and so delicate a question as that which now confronts us, has never imposed upon a province a principle which is in opposition to the almost unanimous opinion of its population.

If the present bill was not defeated by an immense majority the population of Quebec would not fail to realize that the Canadian Senate attempted to free itself of a responsibility which is incumbent upon it and which since Confederation it has carried out with competence and broadmindedness. You will agree with me that this would be a painful observation, especially following the statement of the Chairman of the Divorce Committee. He has not failed to declare that the divorce work in no way disturbs him and that the Senate committee is quite capable of carrying it out just as well as are the divorce tribunals already in existence in Canada.

May I be permitted, in conclusion, to reaffirm that the Canadian Senate is an institution dear to the province of Quebec. This institution was founded for the purpose of protecting minorities. I believe that it has done its duty and that it has well fulfilled its functions. It constitutes an essential cog in the political life of Canada. I foresee the day, more or less distant, when the Canadian Senate will play a role of the highest order and will probably be the organism to combat most effectively the subversive ideas which are at present making some progress. I am convinced that the Senate will protect the principle of the indissolubility of marriage so dear to the heart of the population of Quebec.

Let us not permit the "gentlemen's agreement" of 1867 to be violated. Neither let us abandon a policy which has been followed without interruption by our predecessors since the pact of Confederation; and let us know how to prove, in a decisive manner, to a population which respects and esteems us, that the Canadian Senate, through its members, no matter to what race and what religion they belong, does not hesitate to reject proposed legislation which would affect the beliefs and traditions of an important minority of our country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Honourable senators, I had proposed to speak on this debate this afternoon, but in view of the lateness of the hour, and the apparent state of exhaustion of some members, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: We are far from exhausted.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Euler, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

CONSTRUCTION OF BRIDGE OVER ST. LAWRENCE RIVER NEAR TROIS-RIVIÈRES—SECOND READING

Hon. J. M. Dessureault moved the second reading of Bill Z-9, an Act respecting the construction of a bridge over the St. Lawrence River near the city of Trois-Rivières.

He said: Honourable senators, La Corporation du Pont de Trois-Rivières is a corporation without share capital and for no pecuniary gain, or a non-profit corporation, incorporated by a special act of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, assented to the 2nd day of February 1956, a copy of which is set forth in the schedule to this bill. It has all the powers necessary to construct a bridge over the St. Lawrence River, near the City of Three Rivers, in the interest and service of the cities, towns, villages and parishes situated in the electoral districts of Three Rivers, Maskinonge, Champlain, St. Maurice-Laflèche, Nicolet, Lotbiniere, Drummond-Arthabaska, and of the whole province of Quebec.

However, according to the Navigable Waters Protection Act the corporation must obtain by an act of Parliament permission for the construction of such a bridge over the St. Lawrence, and this is the purpose of this present bill.

Subject to the provision of this act, La Corporation du Pont de Trois-Rivières is seeking authorization to construct, maintain and operate a toll bridge and its approaches for the passage of pedestrians, vehicles, carriages and other like purposes connecting the north and the south shores of the St. Lawrence River approximately one mile above the western limits of the city of Three Rivers.

The said bridge shall be constructed and located under and be subject to such regulations for the security of the navigation of the St. Lawrence River as the Governor in Council prescribes, and to this end La Corporation du Pont de Trois-Rivières shall submit to the Governor in Council, for examination and approval, designs and drawings of the bridge giving the soundings accurately, the bed of the river, etc., the whole to the satisfaction and approval of the Governor in Council.

Plans, a survey and report have been made by Dr. P. L. Pratley, one of our best Canadian engineers, and a detailed and complete report has also been made by Coverdale and Colpitts, consulting engineers of New York, giving detailed estimates of the cost, traffic and revenues of the proposed bridge. I might add that the cost of the bridge is estimated at $12,500,000. It will be a two-lane cantilever structure with a total roadway of 26 feet in width. The length of the bridge is estimated at 6,500 feet, and the total length of the entire project, including the approaches, will be 9,000 feet.

There will be a clear span of 810 feet over the centre of the St. Lawrence channel, with a minimum clearance of 162 feet above the water. This high clearance is required by ocean shipping, now using the river as far as Montreal, and which, it is expected, will go further inland upon the completion of the St. Lawrence Seaway project.

If this bill receives second reading, I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, where further information, if required, will be available.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dessureault, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

PRIVATE BILLS

TRANS-PRAIRIE PIPELINES OF CANADA, LTD.—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the report of the committee on Bill A-10.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to whom was referred the Bill (A-10) intituled: "An Act respecting Trans-Prairie Pipelines of Canada, Ltd.", have in obedience to the order of reference of May 2, 1956, examined the said bill and now beg leave to report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Next sitting.

OGDENSBURG BRIDGE AUTHORITY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Hugessen presented the report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on Bill B-10.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to whom was referred the Bill (B-10) intituled: "An Act respecting Ogdensburg Bridge Authority", have in obedience to the order of reference of May 3, 1956, examined the said bill and now beg leave to report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Next sitting.

GRAND FALLS CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY LIMITED—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the report of the committee on Bill Y-9.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to whom was referred the Bill (Y-9) intituled: "An Act to incorporate Grand Falls Central Railway Company Limited", have in obedience to the order of reference of May 1, 1956, examined the said bill and now beg leave to report the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 3, lines 17 to 22, both inclusive: delete subclauses (2) and (3) of clause 14.

2. Page 3, lines 45 and 46: delete clause 17 and substitute therefor the following:

"17. The works and undertakings of the Company, other than those related to the transport of goods or passengers by motor vehicle, are hereby declared to be for the general advantage of Canada."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these amendments be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Next sitting.

CANADA—DENMARK INCOME TAX AGREEMENT BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. G. Peter Campbell, for Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the report of the committee on Bill 8.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom was referred the Bill (8) from the House of Commons intituled: "An Act to implement an agreement between Canada and the Kingdom of Denmark for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax", have in obedience to the order of reference of May 3, 1956, examined the said bill and now beg leave to report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Campbell: Next sitting.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable Senators, with leave of the Senate I move that when this house rises today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government when it is expected that the large number of items remaining on the Order Paper will be disposed of? Some of us are disturbed about the number of bills to be dealt with and are anxious to see that they go to the other place as soon as possible.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am glad that the Leader of the Opposition has brought this matter to my attention. I have conferred with a number of honourable senators, and intended to speak to my honourable friend about the procedure to be adopted for the remainder of the session, but I have not had an opportunity to do so. I thought that the two private members' items on the Order Paper—the discussion on penal reform and the Exchequer Court (Divorce Jurisdiction) Bill—might be disposed of first and that we could proceed afterwards with the bills referred to by my honourable friend. From inquiries I have made it does not appear that many more speeches will be made in the debate on penal reform, but that a larger number may be made on the Exchequer Court Bill. However, in neither case do I think there are many more senators to be heard from. If it meets with the approval of the house, I would suggest that we dispose of these two private members' items first and then proceed with the other business.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Thank you.

The motion was agreed to.

CRIMINAL LAW

JOINT COMMITTEE ON CERTAIN QUESTIONS —PRIVILEGE

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I wish to rise on a question of privilege. In doing so I am speaking on behalf of the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden), co-chairman of the Joint Committee on Capital and Corporal Punishment and Lotteries, who is absent from the house today.

The joint committee has been holding sessions in camera for the purpose of considering a report to both houses of Parliament. In the Ottawa Citizen of May 8, 1956, there appeared an article headed "Abolition of Prison Lash urged by House Committee", which quoted from a confidential document circulated among the members of the committee for study and consideration.

While there is no intention to pursue the matter further, it is my duty to point out that the article in question did not quote the various alternatives set forth in the confidential document, and has, therefore, tended to mislead the public, as no decision has been reached by the committee on these alternatives, nor has any report been made in connection therewith to either house.

PENAL REFORM

VOCATIONAL TRAINING FOR WOMEN— INQUIRY

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I should like to direct an inquiry to the Honourable the Leader of the Government. In the very excellent and interesting speech which the leader gave regarding prison reform he mentioned the vocational training program that is being provided for prison inmates. My first question is: Has any of this vocational training program been introduced into the Women's Prison, in Kingston, which is the only federal prison for women? And secondly, how many women were sentenced to the penitentiary at Kingston during the past year?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Women are more law-abiding than men.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I believe I have the information at hand which the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson) has asked for. In my remarks of the other evening I did not refer specifically to any of the speeches made previously. I recall now that the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) asked me if it was the intention of the Government to put into effect the recommendations made last session by the Special Committee on the traffic in narcotic drugs. While it is not possible to announce Government policy until it has been definitely decided upon, I can assure him that the Government is giving very careful consideration to the recommendations, and they are receiving the close attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable senator from Fredericton has asked about the rehabilitation facilities provided for women. In some penal institutions provision is made to a certain degree for rehabilitating women. I agree with the honourable senator that that is not nearly as extensive as we would like it to be. Her remarks in the house the other day were, I think, quite fair and very much to the point. I should point out that at Oakalla women prisoners are housed in small cottages, with six or eight women to a cottage. At Kingston at the present time there is little provision for training, as the honourable senator mentioned, but, as she remarked, the Government intends to build a new penitentiary for women. The honourable senator thought—I have not got her exact words before me—that the building should be of the cottage type, that women prisoners should be given more freedom and they should be given a second chance, as it were. From inquiries I find that in the fiscal year 1954-55, of the 38 women admitted to penitentiary, that is at Kingston, 31 had previously served terms of imprisonment, and 8 of them had been in penitentiary before. So most of the women did get a second chance, if not a third chance, and as you know, women are not sent to penitentiary unless it is for a very, very serious offence.

SENATE POSTMARK

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, may I ask the honourable, congenial and efficient Leader of the Government in the Senate if a new red ink envelope stamping machine has been ordered for the Senate post office and if so when will it be used?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: On the Order Paper today there is an item for consideration of a report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy in which I believe that matter is referred to. If it is not referred to I will answer the question when the report is under consideration, if it meets with the approval of the honourable senator.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Thank you.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 8, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Croll calling to the attention of the Senate the present position with respect to penal institutions in Canada and in particular discussing the need for further reforms in the Canadian penal system.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, in rising to take part in this debate on penal reform I am reminded of the story of the time Mark Twain introduced a friend of his to an audience. After enumerating various qualities of the speaker, Mark added "and he has never been in jail". He paused, and continued, "and I do not know why". Well I have never been in jail either, and I do not know why,—

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: —because after listening to this discussion it seems to me that it is my duty as a citizen to take a more active interest in this phase of public affairs than I have hitherto done. I should have made it my business to visit some of our penal institutions, if for no other reason than that of informing myself on a part of our nation's welfare which affects the lives of many thousands of people every year and which costs the taxpayers amounts that have been estimated as being between $100 million and $150 million a year. I find it rather difficult to get any accurate or exact figures, but the amount is somewhere in that neighbourhood. This cost too is only the visible cost. It does not measure loss to the inmates of earning power, to the country in terms of relief to families, and to the treasury in the form of income tax. In addition there is the loss in terms of social dislocation for family and community. This last, as far as the affected families are concerned, is far greater than the monetary loss.

At this time I would like to commend the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) who has performed a useful service in focusing attention on this subject, and to say that I found the address of the honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies) very enlightening and useful. I was particularly pleased with the contribution of the honourable senator from Sunbury (Hon. Mr. McGrand) who touched on the problem, largely in its mental health aspects, in a very scholarly manner. The subject is one which must receive increased attention in the years to come. I am grateful also to the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. McDonald) for the light he threw on the subject. Certainly this discussion should result in—what I think is necessary—a more informed public opinion.

A measure of the public interest in this topic is the suggestion that a Royal Commission on Penal Reform should be appointed to deal with it. My view is that already there are too many commissions—commissions which, though good in themselves, expend a great deal of time, energy, labour and money, and whose reports, while they create attention at the time they are issued, are all too soon put away in dusty pigeonholes in various offices and libraries. My view is that if a portion of the money which a Royal Commission on this subject would cost was set aside for a carefully organized program of public education in this field, we would get far better and more lasting results. Even after a commission has made its investigation and submitted its report, the job of informing the public as to its recommendations remains to be done. I submit that we already have sufficient information as to what is needed to be done to go much further, and that great improvements would result if the general public were more adequately informed on the matter. It remains to make available to the public, to community leaders and all concerned on the community level what kind of problem we have and what is to be done about it.

In any discussion of a topic as important as this it is well to have in mind our terms of reference. I find that in the Archambault Report penology is defined as the science of dealing with (1) potential criminals, (2) the treatment of criminals in prison, (3) aftercare of those who have been released from prison. I have no quarrel with this definition; in fact I think it is a good one, and that the division of the problem into these three areas is sound. My only question with respect to this reference—and it is an academic one —is that I doubt the advisability at this time of describing penology as a science. I think that is "stretching it a bit"—at this time, at any rate.

If we accept this delineation of the subject —and I think we should—it suggests that there is a very big educational job to be done; and, as one who has spent his life in the field of adult education, I should like to make a few practical suggestions as to how that program of enlightening the public as to their responsibility should be put into effect.

Accepting the definition means that as a corollary we adopt the principle that two phases of successful penal reform can be carried out only by a well-informed and interested public. In other words, if we are to be effective in dealing with the matter of potential criminals and crime prevention, we must be concerned with providing the kind of information which the honourable senator from Sunbury (Hon. Mr. McGrand) presented so effectively. In fact the only way we can do anything about crime prevention is by educating parents, community leaders and the general public on those institutions and those attitudes in the community which tend to encourage departure from the normal standards of good conduct. In this connection I want to support many of the things suggested by the honourable senator from Sunbury when he discussed the possible ill effects on a certain type of mentality of some comic books, certain radio, television and film programs, and so on. At the same time I would be the first to admit that radio, television and films have a tremendous potentiality for good, and are being used increasingly as one of our educational tools. But unfortunately today a substantial portion of the time of these great media of mass communication is being used for a type of program that is certainly not in the public interest. I think it is true today that too many of the mores of our time are being formed, not, as they should be, by the home and the church and the community, but by a certain kind of comic strip, by a certain kind of radio, television and film program. There is incontrovertible evidence that this is the case, and I think that, if we are serious in our desire to prevent crime, we should take a hard look at certain of these programs which supply to some minds, at least, a complete reference book as to how to carry on certain types of crime.

In the second phase of the educational program, the only way in which adequate aftercare of prisoners can be carried out is by educating the public as to what the problem is and how they can play a part as citizens in helping with the re-establishment of discharged persons. In order to be effective the good work of such institutions as the John Howard Society, the Elizabeth Fry Society and others needs to be given much more support than it has had, and it can only get that support if more people realize what the problem is.

The third phase of penal reform, that of reforming those who are in prison, is simpler than the two previous phases which I have mentioned because at least some of the factors are controllable, and the individuals concerned provide at least a captive audience with which to experiment. This is something certain speakers sometimes like to have.

My approach to this problem would be the one which I would follow in dealing with any other educational program. I would consider it as a task in mobilizing the resources of information and leadership and transmitting that information through informed leaders to the people who need it to discharge their responsibilities as effective members of the community.

I am going to enumerate a number of the things that might be done at relatively small expense and which I think would be helpful in creating a new appreciation on the part of the public of their duties and responsibilities in this field.

If I were the Minister of Justice I would create a small well-trained Division of Public Information. This division would be directed by a person well qualified as an educator and an organizer and one who had the ability to prepare or have prepared material dealing with penology that was brief, simple and useful to ordinary citizens who are the local leaders of the thousands of voluntary agencies which do the community work throughout the land and who probably represent the greatest force for making their communities alive and effective places in which to live.

The kind of material I have in mind is the inexpensive leaflet material that has been prepared so ably for the past few years as discussion material for Citizens Forum and Farm Forum groups. In my view this is about the most successful discussion material that has ever been prepared in Canada. It is certainly inexpensive. We do not need expensive, slick paper jobs running to 25, 50 and 100 pages but what is needed is the short four or eight-page leaflet simply written and produced on inexpensive paper. There might be a series of leaflets dealing with various aspects of penology. This would be a beginning. Equipped with this kind of information I would get in touch with the leaders of the Women's Institutes, the Farm Women's organizations, the Local Councils of Women, the Farmers' Unions, the service clubs, Women's University Clubs, the trade unions and co-operatives; in short, the leaders of agencies in the country that are holding meetings, who are in touch with the needs and feelings of the people. Many of these organizations have already undertaken studies in this field, particularly the Women's University Clubs. I would encourage the establishment of social welfare committees within organizations where they do not already exist. I would ask these people to make penology a special study. The organizations that I have mentioned would also be associated with those who have made it their special responsibility to do something in this field. These would include the Canadian Corrections Association, which represents the merger, as of February last, of the Canadian Penal Association and the Delinquency and Crime Division of the Canadian Welfare Council; the John Howard Society, which exists in all provinces except in Prince Edward Island; the Elizabeth Fry Society, which is at present organized only in Ontario and British Columbia; the Women's University Clubs of Canada, which already have set up special study groups on penal reform; the Parents Action League in Ontario, and a number of similar agencies.

From personal experience I know that organizations such as these are carrying on educational programs within their groups in every community in Canada. Practically every one of them has a convenor of welfare legislation whose duty it is to bring to the attention of the membership the available information on problems of this kind. These people are constantly writing to universities and libraries asking for the kind of information I am suggesting. I would encourage these people to put this topic on their program to be dealt with as often as they felt it useful and desirable to do so. This is one way in which the energies, interests and enthusiasms of hundreds of voluntary agencies can be mobilized and made effective in the community at very little cost.

Some honourable senators may recall the efforts that were made early in the war in a similar way by the Wartime Prices and Trade Board. I recall that representatives of that organization came to my department in the University of Alberta—the Department of Extension—and the Department of Extension in other universities, to see if we would try to sell the people of the country on the necessity for rationing, restrictions, controls and so on. We gladly did that. We looked upon it as our job and we found the people were responsive and anxious to help. I suggest that the same kind of approach to this particular problem, which is of such increasing importance, would meet with a similar response.

The next step would be to go to the editors of the daily newspapers across Canada. If you examine the pages of your daily newspapers you must be impressed by the number of well-documented articles dealing with various aspects of community welfare which these instruments of public service publish every year. Just recently I had the opportunity of examining newspaper articles submitted from all over Canada in a competition in which the editors dealt with various aspects of community welfare. It was an amazingly enlightening experience and I was impressed as I had never been before with the excellent job that these editors and newspapers are doing in trying to inform, enlighten and uplift the communities in which they live.

I would encourage the editors to assign some of their best qualified men and women to do a series of articles on this subject. In all cases the stories should be related in some way to experiences in the local community, so that the lesson could be brought home to people living there. From my knowledge of the high sense of community service of the leading newspaper men across Canada I know they could be enlisted in a community project of this kind.

Another medium of mass communication which could be used effectively and which I know from experience would again contribute time as part of its community service is the local radio stations. These stations have been extremely generous in providing time and assistance in the production of programs designed to improve their local communities. They have an enviable record of community service to their credit and I know that they could be enlisted in a well planned and well co-ordinated effort of community education through a program of this kind.

A third medium of public information which should be mobilized is the film industry. There could be prepared a number of suitable documentary films for release as shorts in the regular theatres and, particularly, through the 16 mm. educational film field. Again speaking from my experience in adult education, I have found that there is a segment of between 25 and 35 per cent of the total population that will not read serious articles in the newspapers, and the same people do not listen to serious programs on the radio, but this group can be reached through the visual media of films and television and these instruments of mass communication should not be overlooked.

Finally, I would encourage the appointment in every voluntary organization of some person whose responsibility it would be to become informed in this field. This person in effect could be the authority on the subject of penology within his or her local organization. The educational program which I have outlined is one which is capable of being developed at very little expense and it could be used as the basis of informing people with a view to taking intelligent action in every community. The importance of giving people work to do should never be overlooked, for when they are doing useful work they feel that they are making a contribution and that it is not some paternal organization in Ottawa or elsewhere that is doing everything for them.

An educational program such as I have in mind would, in being carried out, logically fall into two divisions: first, the kind of information that would be useful in the prevention of crime; and, second, the kind of information which would be useful in the after-care of discharged or convicted persons.

The duties of this information division would be to supply and make available to individuals and organizations information on the factors that tend to create and encourage criminal tendencies. Some of these might be listed as:

1. The loosening of family ties and the weakening of the role of the church in formulating standards of conduct. I leave it to honourable senators to assess what is happening in that field.

2. The increasing urbanization of our society.

3. Bad housing, overcrowding, poor recreation, and the loss of the feeling of sanctuary in the home.

4. Working mothers. The lack of home training because the children are growing up without good home influence.

5. The mores of the times. The acceptance of violence. The lack of respect for people and property. The honourable senator from Sunbury spoke on this very subject. If we are honest with ourselves, in spite of the fact that some people say that the young people are better than they have ever been—and in some respects I think they are—we have to admit that an increasing number of them have no respect for tradition, for property, or for the rights of others.

6. Some educators and some psychologists who, because they have deprecated the need for discipline in the home or in the school or in the community, have encouraged what amounts to almost anarchy on the part of some children and young people. I know it is thought to be old-fashioned to say that we should put more emphasis on discipline and control today, but I think it is time we faced up to the facts of present-day living.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: 7. The costs in terms of dollars and cents to the country and to the families. The cost in terms of social values, that is, broken homes, families on relief, and the discouragement and despair of children.

8. The advantages of parole and ticket of leave systems. There is a great area of information relating to this important aspect of our national life, as to which there is abysmal ignorance on the part of the ordinary citizen, and it is not his fault entirely. Many ordinary citizens have no idea of the numbers of people involved nor of the cost to society of the maintenance of law and order. Many normal people who have had no experience with mentally disturbed individuals, or with individuals of criminal tendencies have no conception of the attitudes and the reactions of such persons to situations which would be accepted by persons of normal personality without any ill effects. The average citizen has little opportunity to visit our prisons, our mental hospitals and similar institutions to see at first hand the kind of people who make up the portion of our population causing the trouble. And people of normal intelligence have little understanding of the effect in terms of incitement of crime comics, trashy pulps, poor radio, television and movie programs on people of low mental attainments and poor mental attitudes. Until the great majority of people are able to recognize the factors which favour abnormal behaviour on the part of the weaker element in the community we are not going to be effective in dealing with crime prevention.

On the question of after-care of discharged prisoners, it would be the function of this information office, working through the voluntary agencies, to inform the people:

1. On the need of the discharged prisoner and his family to be accepted in the community. Here is real work, which cannot be done by the professional officer, no matter how well intentioned or capable he may be, for his efforts would be nullified without the co-operation of the community helping the discharged person back to the status of a normal individual in the community. In many cases there is a resistance and natural reluctance to take such people back as normal members of the community.

2. On the discharged prisoner's need to be given a job.

(3) On the necessity of making a special effort, by example, by advice and by association, to re-establish the individual as a self-respecting and respected member of the community. I emphasize that before people can become effective in this field they must be informed.

Honourable senators, I want to spend a moment or two on the question of juvenile delinquents. Anything I have said in this discussion has not been intended as criticism of the policies which have been in effect nor of those who have had the difficult responsibility of carrying the policies out. The Archambault Report made rather depressing reading and, coming out as it did just prior to the war, it was not possible to do very much in the way of implementing its recommendations until some years afterwards. Fortunately, as the honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies) stated so well, many steps have been taken to improve the position of the person confined to prison and that process of improvement is still going forward. However, I feel that we shall never get results either in prison or out of it until we pay more attention to the educational job that needs to be done both inside and out. As far as the work in the prisons is concerned, much is made of the fact that most of the prisoners are confined for such a short term that there is insufficient time to carry out an effective educational program. It is also pointed out that the majority of the prisoners are in provincial or municipal jails, where the facilities for carrying out an educational program are least adequate.

According to Daniel Coughlin, Director of Probation for the Province of Ontario, more than half the men and women committed to prison in Canada in 1950 were sentenced to terms of 90 days or less. Admittedly this is not a very long time in which to carry out an educational program that will be effective in changing the prisoner's attitudes and making him a more useful member of society. Nevertheless, we recall from our experiences in the armed forces during the war that amazing things were done by the use of special educational methods in training men who, in many cases, were practically illiterate. I know whereof I speak, because I had a good deal to do with training men in camps who could neither read nor write. I suggest that these same methods and techniques would be effective in our prisons too, if we were to apply them. In other words, there is an opportunity here to use techniques and practices which we learned and applied under the stress of war.

Much has been made of the fact that many of the recommendations of the Archambault Report with respect to education have been implemented. Kingston Penitentiary and the institution at Collin's Bay are often held up as an example of a forward looking policy, and in many ways they are; yet in spite of this, there is employed there today one part-time psychologist who has the responsibility of advising on the segregation and direction to various kinds of effort of the hundreds of prisoners in those institutions. Improvement this may be, but it is still far from adequate.

I know the point will be raised that to provide the kind of educational treatment that is necessary will cost money. Certainly it will, but my answer is that if we spend more money in this field and in the preventive field which I discussed earlier we shall save more than the cost of providing additional trained educational staff.

One more matter and I shall be through. The great majority of the people in our prisons are young people, and I am sure we are disturbed every day with the reports in our newspapers of the increasing number of misdemeanours committed by juveniles and young adults. Two things occur to me as being useful in meeting the problem. In the United States about three weeks ago a judge said to me that annually over one million people under 25 years of age are being sent to prisons in that country. I am afraid we are not too far behind, proportionately.

First of all, I think that, if anything, we have been too lenient in the treatment of many first offenders. If there has been error in our law enforcement up to the present time—I am not saying there has been—it has certainly been on the side of leniency. I am simply appalled at the state of affairs under which young, undisciplined and irresponsible youths, whether they be from good homes or bad, are brought before magistrates for stealing automobiles worth from $3,000 to $5,000 and let off with a warning, and in some cases not once but twice. There are cases on record where people have been sent to jail for stealing a few dollars, or even a few cents. So why in the world should people who steal $3,000 or more be given special consideration because the money is represented by an automobile? It seems to me that here is one case where sloppy sentimentality has been allowed to run riot. In some communities and among a certain element of the zoot-suited and leather-jacketed gangs, to steal a car has become the smart thing to do, because they know all they will get, for the first offence at least, is a warning—and that is a cheap price to pay, according to their peculiar mentality, for being thought daring and smart.

One of the reasons why it is suggested that it would be unfair to send these people to prison for a first offence of that kind is that they would be corrupted further by being given the opportunity to associate with more experienced and hardened criminals in prison. Fortunately, there are signs that steps are being taken to meet this situation by providing a new type of detention for them. In my own province of Alberta there has recently been established the Bowden Institute, which is a large farming institution with facilities for learning trades, etc., and specifically set aside for young first offenders and juvenile delinquents. There are similar institutions in other provinces.

There has recently been established in British Columbia a forestry camp which I understand is modelled on one that has been very successful in the State of Wisconsin. Saskatchewan has made a beginning with a similar project. My suggestion would be that we should seriously consider an extension of the principle of the Bowden Institute, Burwash Reformatory and the British Columbia Forestry Camp for dealing with a much larger number, not only of young offenders but of others who may be sent to prison for less serious offences. I would suggest that camps be established in our national parks and forest areas under competent trained supervisors and educators where these first offenders would be sent to serve their sentences with a minimum of confinement. They could be put to work opening forest trails, building small bridges on bridle paths and walks, clearing fire lanes, trimming out undergrowth, etc. They should be under a rigid and enlightened discipline and be given a thoroughgoing course of hard work. This kind of program would have the effect of giving these people some discipline, probably for the first time in their lives; would subject them to some physical work, also probably for the first time in their lives; and would expose them to an educational program designed to give them a more wholesome outlook —and the whole thing would be carried out under healthful and wholesome conditions.

In conclusion, I come back to my original thesis, that if we are to be successful in bringing about the measure of penal reform which we all think is necessary and desirable we have got to start with a much better organized and much more extensive program of education, both of the public and of the inmates.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, it had been my intention to adjourn the debate this afternoon and endeavour to make some contribution to it at a later date, but the thought has been expressed that the debate should shortly be concluded. However, I cannot let it close without expressing one or two ideas.

First, the subject under discussion is a highly humanitarian one and, as my fellow senators will appreciate, one that appeals to one strongly.

May I take this opportunity to congratulate those who have taken part in the debate? It would be invidious, except for some special reason, to name some senators and omit others. However, I do wish to offer my compliments and congratulations to the senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) who initiated this somewhat lengthy discussion. Enterprise and initiative are all too rare: his initiative in this instance has resulted in an excellent debate. I would also compliment the honourable lady from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson) upon her very excellent and well-informed address. My compliments also go to the honourable senator who has just taken his seat (Hon. Mr. Cameron) for his thoughtful, studious and humanitarian address.

I have listened with interest to excellent speeches by senators who think that we have done much in the field of crime prevention and the reform of criminals by humanitarian treatment and in many other ways, and to excellent speeches by others who think there is much more left to be done in this field. I agree with both views. I think we have made splendid progress in recent years in bringing about a more sensible, common-sense, decent treatment of those who get into trouble through crime, and our efforts to re-establish these people have not been inconsiderable. I might refer to the work of the John Howard Society, the Elizabeth Fry Society and the Salvation Army. Figures in connection with the monumental work of the Salvation Army were given to us the other day by the senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies). There are many other agencies, religious and otherwise, which have been doing good work, and I might also mention in a general way what has been accomplished by the department itself in the management of our judicial institutions. Nevertheless, I still am thoroughly impressed that, although we have made great progress, there is still much to be done, much that cannot be accomplished in a debating assembly such as ours. What remains must be done step by step, somewhat laboriously and as the result of most intimate knowledge of what we are doing. For that reason I will make a suggestion, and I suppose the debate will then close.

First, however, let me say that just recently there came into my hands a document, an original document, which seems to support my statement that there is still much to be done. It is a form reply sent out by Kingston Penitentiary to a private party. It seems that some foolish fellow attempted to hold up a bank with a toy pistol, was immediately captured and sentenced to five years in penitentiary. He was a member of a club, and fourteen of his fellow members of the club joined in a petition asking for consideration of his case; and one of them undertook to write on behalf of the others to assure him that he was not entirely forgotten and to give him courage to meet them again when his sentence was finally concluded. It was a most humanitarian and reasonable interest, and a highly commendable thing for those men to do. I have here the reply from the penitentiary, signed by the censor of the penitentiary. It is in these terms:

> The attached letter forwarded by you addressed to the above-named inmate is being returned as it has been found objectionable by our censor board for the following reason: "Friends are not permitted".

Well, honourable senators, I wonder if it is the rule of our penitentiaries that letters from friends are returned, no matter what they contain, and that only relatives are allowed to show their interest in a prisoner or to give him any assurance of friendship when he is finally discharged. If it is, we certainly have something to find out about prison matters.

Accordingly I suggest by way of conclusion to this debate that we do not allow all this excellent thought and these fine expressions to die in the air, as they will if we do not take some practical steps such as are within our power. Honourable senators, let us not forget this debate; let us continue it next session. I would suggest that at the next session there be appointed a select committee headed, if you will, by the member from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll), to inquire into this whole matter. Let us call before the committee those who would be most likely to give information, commencing with the private institutions interested such as the John Howard Society, the Elizabeth Fry Society, the Salvation Army and some of the other churches, officials of the department, the management of the penal institutions themselves, and anybody else who is either interested or informed. Let us find out more about this subject. I admit some ignorance in this matter. Like my friend who has just sat down, I have never been in prison, and like him I do not know why. I am afraid we are all speaking ex-parte. There is not a single ex-criminal among us.

I feel that I personally am very much uninformed as to what is going on in our prisons. I would like to be a member of a committee—if I am not too overworked in another committee that I could mention—which would call before it those who know something about the subject and have responsibility in connection with it, so that we may ask what we can do to assist in improving our penal institutions and also in preventing crime.

We are unanimous in our desire to prevent the commission of crime, to act humanely toward those who have been found guilty of breaking our laws, and to rebuild broken characters. So I urge that we do not allow this matter to die. If next session we have a special committee of inquiry and inform ourselves thoroughly, it may be that, like last session's committee on narcotic drugs, under the chairmanship of the senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid), it will make some practicable and sensible recommendations which may be carried out.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McIntyre: Will my honourable friend permit a question? He referred to some young fellow who was sentenced to a five-year term in penitentiary for holding up a bank with a toy pistol. I would like to refer to the Williams case in Montreal.

As I understand it, Williams had no helpful guidance from his real parents. He was brought up by a foster mother, and while in her charge he was a model boy, but when he left her he fell into bad company, and at the age of 20 took part in a bank hold-up, for which he was sentenced by the trial judge to 28 years in the penitentiary. To my mind a sentence of that length is beyond all reason. My question is, has anything been done to review or investigate this young man's case?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Of course I could not answer that question; I do not suppose even the Minister of the department could answer it off-hand. But I can say that if these facts are brought to the attention of the Remission Service of the Department of Justice the matter will be reviewed. Sometimes one is apt to be misled about a case through hearing of it only in outline. Here, it is said, is a young man who took part in the holding up of a bank and was punished with what looks like a most excessive sentence—28 years. It may be that there are conditions and circumstances of which you and I are not informed, but of which the court took cognizance before passing sentence. Or it may be otherwise. We must not too readily pass judgment on such sentences. But, merely on the outline that my friend has given us, I think that a review is very much in order; and I hope the honourable senator himself has brought the matter to the attention of the Remission Branch.

As for the man who was sentenced to five years, I do not know whether the penalty was adequate; I am not commenting on it nor expressing an opinion. I mentioned it only because of the response to kind-hearted friends who are trying to assist the man, largely for his rehabilitation.

Hon. Cairine R. Wilson: Honourable senators, the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) has intimated that the debate is about to close, so I should like to say a few words.

There have been repeated references to the Archambault Commission and the reforms which have been instituted as a result of its work. But I want to draw attention to the fact that it was the late Agnes Macphail who, in season and out of season, many years before the Archambault Commission was appointed, urged an investigation of the subject.

Like those who have preceded me, I wish to express appreciation to the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) who initiated this debate, and to all others who in the course of the discussion have given us so much information and valuable thought. I had not the pleasure of hearing the honourable senator from Sunbury (Hon. Mr. McGrand), but I read his speech with great interest and I wish to thank him very much for it.

I had the privilege for some months of quite a close association with Sir Alexander Paterson. to whom the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) referred, and I learned a great deal from him. I was astonished at the progress of penology in Great Britain by contrast to the amount of attention given to it in Canada, and the thorough manner in which Sir Alexander interests himself in all his charges impressed me very much indeed. He was sent out, as some may remember, in connection with the situation of some unfortunate friendly aliens who, having been in Great Britain when Hitler was believed to be planning an invasion, were transferred to Canada because they were regarded as a potential danger in case of attack. The deportation of these men, most of whom were young, cast no reflection on them: they were moved merely because they happened to be in a part of the country wherein they might become a liability. For instance, the students who lived in and around Cambridge were sent away; those at Oxford were allowed to remain.

I have had personal knowledge of the invaluable work of the Salvation Army. In the case of two young girls who were presented to me, I was thankful to be able to deal with members of that great institution. Its public relations officer took one girl into his own home; and since their discharge neither of these young women has shown any disposition to commit crime, even of the slightest nature.

I had supposed that the reason why so few of my sex are to be found in penitentiaries is because women are essentially law-abiding, but I learned from our Solicitor General that they are sent there only for very serious offences. The practice is to give them a second chance, and it is, I think, somewhat of a reflection upon us when they return to their former courses and are committed to a penitentiary or transferred there from prisons for longer sentences.

I trust that consideration will be given to the suggestion of the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson) that women prisoners be allowed to serve their sentences within the province in which their friends reside; and to the honourable senator's further suggestion, that women prisoners be given the opportunity of training for occupations which would be of value to them after their release.

I am told that a large proportion of the women at Kingston are there as convicted drug addicts. This would seem to provide a wonderful opportunity of doing what may be termed experimental work with a view of finding a cure for the unfortunate victims of this habit.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable members, my part in this debate will be limited to a word or two in support of what has been said by the honourable senator from Mount Stewart (Hon. Mr. McIntyre). I had a communication this session from Montreal in this connection, and I have been very disturbed about it ever since. The young man in question pleaded guilty. He did not or could not find anyone to defend him; and, as has been mentioned, he was sentenced to 28 years in prison. I happen to live in a city of which I think very highly, and which in the past two years has been the scene of four or five bank hold-ups. The longest time that any bank robber implicated in these affairs was at liberty after a hold-up was five days. Most of the robbers were in jail within three days. I will add for the benefit of the honourable senator from Edmonton (Hon. Mr. MacKinnon) that when our Winnipeg Chief of Police was asked how he was able to apprehend them so quickly he said, "There is only one reason."

Let me tell you about the hold-up of the Bank of Commerce, at the corner of William and Princess Streets in Winnipeg. A man drove up in a taxicab, went inside, held up the bank and made his getaway. An employee copied down the licence number of the taxi and telephoned the information to the police. They in turn got in touch with the taxi company, which had a two-way radio system operating between its office and its taxis. The company's dispatcher asked the driver of this particular car where he was taking his passenger, and the driver replied, "To the overhead bridge". When the taxi got there it was immediately surrounded by city police, and within two days the robber was sentenced to prison for five years.

Another case in Winnipeg involved three men who held up a bank on Broadway Street, between the Parliament Buildings and Main Street. They were waiting at the bank before it opened. When the first employee arrived and opened the doors the bandits got in, robbed the bank and made their escape in a car. A farmer living about eighty miles away had heard a newscast describing the robbery, the getaway car and its licence number. He later saw the car passing his farm and he immediately telephoned the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and told them the car was heading in a certain direction. As a result the men were arrested at the next town, and within a few days were sentenced to penitentiary terms.

I am not one of Canada's leading lawyers but I have had quite a bit of experience in practising law. Whenever I have heard an accused man sentenced in court I have thought, "It is too bad there isn't someone who could speak to that fellow so that when he comes out of prison he will be a better man." Laymen do not have any occasion to visit jails but some of us lawyers do. The guards permit us to go right into the cells and talk to prisoners. On one occasion a prisoner told me he had been arrested for bigamy. I said to him: "Well, I'm not the man you want. I'm a very able fellow but I'm high-priced and it would cost you $200 to have me defend you. I can give you the names of five or six other lawyers who would do a much better job for $50." Anyway, I got him out on bail. Incidentally, he was a returned soldier still in service, and he had been picked up in Halifax and taken to Winnipeg to be charged. While out on bail he went around town and asked different people, "Do you know Jack Haig?". Well, everybody did, even the police, and they told him, "Oh, he's a good lawyer all right." So the accused came in the next morning and said, "I still want you to defend me." At the trial the first witness for the crown gave evidence that the accused had married a Winnipeg woman who was already married and who had deserted her first husband. The next witness, a Winnipeg man, testified that he was the husband of this woman. But the court never did find out about the London, Ontario, wedding. That trial took place back in 1917, and just four months ago I saw the man on a street in Winnipeg. He was with his wife.

Hon. Mr. McLean: Which one?

Hon. Mr. Haig: The third one, the Winnipeg woman. He stopped and said to his wife, "Do you know who this man is?" She replied that she did not. He said: "Well, this is the fellow who saved me from the penitentiary. Isn't he a fine fellow?"

That illustrates what can happen when you show a little interest in these things. Of course, I admit that the fee of $200 helped me to show interest in that case, but I did go out of my way to help the man.

We in this house can take steps to find ways by which these people can be helped. When the brother of the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen was warden of Prince Albert Penitentiary he introduced a system to help rehabilitate the prisoners. Later he introduced the same system in Vancouver. Some people have a natural ability for this type of work, and that kind of ability is needed as much as anything else. Men and women would certainly be doing something worth while if they could show that as outsiders they are interested in the rehabilitation of prisoners.

The honourable senator from Mount Stewart, referring to a case where a young man received a sentence of 28 years, said that the length of the sentence was beyond all reason. Well, I think if we followed the suggestion made by the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) we would be able to make things more humane for prisoners generally. The longer you practise law the more you find that the distinction between honesty and dishonesty is sometimes a pretty thin line.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: If the client of the honourable senator from Winnipeg had three wives he was not a bigamist, but a "trigamist". For having done such a good job the honourable gentleman should have charged his client three times as much.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, may I have the consent of the house to make a few more remarks?

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the honourable senator unanimous consent of the Senate?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: A certain case has been mentioned this afternoon, but I do not think it is customary to refer to any particular case in Parliament. The granting of tickets of leave is a matter which is decided upon by the Governor General. All prisoners released before the expiration of their sentences are released by the Governor General on the advice of the Solicitor General, and their cases are not debatable in Parliament beforehand. Therefore, I will not deal with any particular case now.

I rise at this time to say there are no forgotten men or women in Canadian prisons. A convicted person may receive a long sentence but he has the right to appeal. It may be argued that in some cases the time limit for filing an appeal has expired and no appeal has been made. This may happen, but it is always permissible to apply to the court or to the Minister of Justice, if necessary, for an extension of this time limit. Every case has to be judged on its own merits and, as the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) has said, we have to know all the facts before giving an opinion.

I wish to emphasize that there is no strict rule as to how long any prisoner must remain in prison. Every case is reviewed by the Remission Service, which has a highly qualified and well-trained staff. The records of prisoners are looked at with a very sympathetic eye. When it is felt that a prisoner has shown a sufficient degree of reform to enable him to go out in the world with the likelihood of rehabilitation he is allowed out on ticket of leave. It was mentioned during this debate that prisoners serve half time. However, that is not a hard and fast rule, for every case depends on the circumstances. Half time for first offences is the general rule, but in many instances the offender does not serve half time. In other instances he may serve more than half time. The guiding principle is that if a man shows a sufficient degree of reform, we who are responsible for recommending his release must be assured that on his return to society he is likely to live as a good citizen. The sentences imposed on some prisoners may seem to be long, but in order to decide if that is so or not we must know all the facts. Let me assure honourable senators that every prisoner's case is reviewed, and, I repeat, when it appears that he is likely to be a law-abiding citizen he is released.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Perhaps the honourable leader would comment as to why in some instances friends are not allowed to communicate with a prisoner.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not know the prison rules with regard to writing to prisoners, or whether prisoners are allowed to correspond with other persons than their immediate families. That is a matter which comes under the Penitentiaries Branch, and not directly under the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General. However, I shall be pleased to make inquiries, and will report to the honourable senator later with respect to the matter.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I can assure honourable senators that all the suggestions made here will be considered by the Penitentiaries Branch, or by the Minister of Justice himself, or by me, as Solicitor General and my associates in the Department of Justice.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Crerar, the debate was adjourned.

EXCHEQUER COURT (DIVORCE JURISDICTION) BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING— DEBATE POSTPONED

On the Order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Aseltine, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hodges, for the second reading of Bill (I-5) intituled: "An Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act".—(Hon. Senator Euler).

Hon. Mr. Euler: Honourable senators, as the senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) is absent from the chamber today, and I shall not be here on Tuesday, I would ask that this order stand until Wednesday next.

The Hon. the Speaker: The order stands until Wednesday next.

PRIVATE BILLS

ALBION INSURANCE COMPANY— SECOND READING

Hon. Vincent Dupuis moved the second reading of Bill H-10, an Act to incorporate The Albion Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is similar to most bills incorporating insurance companies to do all types of insurance business other than life insurance. No meeting of the company for the election of directors will be permitted until capital stock in the amount of $500,000 has been subscribed, and no business shall be commenced by the company until at least $500,000 of its capital stock has been bona fide subscribed, and at least $340,000 paid thereon. Moreover, the company will be subject to the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, as are all other insurance companies.

If the bill receives second reading I shall move that it be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask if the Department of Insurance has approved the bill?

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: I am informed that the Superintendent of Insurance has no objection to the bill. At any rate, he will be present when the committee meets.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dupuis, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

MARITIME STOCK BREEDERS' ASSOCIATION—SECOND READING

Hon. Charles G. Hawkins moved the second reading of Bill I-10, an Act respecting The Maritime Stock Breeders' Association.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill proposes to amend the Maritime Stock Breeders' Act, which was passed by Parliament in 1902. I believe, although I am not quite sure, that the Maritime Stock Breeders' Association was formed some time prior to its incorporation by Parliament. At that time it was largely concerned with the development of purebred stock, but as the years went by its activities were extended, and they now cover a much wider field. The association serves the agricultural communities in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and it is now held in very high regard. One of its two main functions is the Maritime Winter Fair, held annually at Amherst, which I think can be said to be one of the better—

Hon. Mr. Quinn: One of the best.

Hon. Mr. Hawkins: —fairs held in Canada. More recently it has organized what is called the Fat Stock Cattle Show and Auction.

Clause 1 of the bill would amend paragraph (c) of section 2 of the act to allow the association to hold exhibitions other than livestock exhibitions. The explanatory note on the clause reads:

> By paragraph (c) of section 2 of chapter 73 of the statutes of 1902 the association was empowered simply "to hold live stock exhibitions". Since that time the scope of the Association's activities has increased, and the purpose of clause 1 of this bill is to authorize the association to hold general agricultural exhibitions, to include not only the exhibition of purebred live stock, but also of other farm animals and farm products of all kinds. The clause further authorizes the association to make its facilities available for the purchase or sale of any such livestock or other such agricultural produce, products, goods or services, by interested farm groups, persons or organizations.

The purpose of clause 2 of the bill is to enable the association to borrow funds. At the present time the source of funds is largely from admission fees to cattle shows and from grants by the three provincial Governments and the federal Government. Recently—I think last year was the first time—the federal Government made a grant equal to the combined grants of the three provinces. I am informed that clause 2 is in the usually accepted form to cover such circumstances.

As I have said, honourable senators, the Maritime Stock Breeders' Association has for more than half a century been serving the agricultural communities of the three Maritime provinces, and is held in high regard. I would therefore bespeak your earnest consideration in the passage of this bill. If the measure receives second reading, which I am quite sure it will, I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hawkins, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP BILL

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill B, an Act to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald moved that the amendments be concurred in.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, may I draw your attention to Hansard of April 18 last and the remarks made at that time about citizenship, which is always given by the father to his children. I am satisfied that the Honourable the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration decided to have the bill amended in the House of Commons in accordance with the suggestions made to him in the Senate.

I would like to explain to honourable senators some of the steps preceding this legislation. Last year a committee of the other house considered amendments to the Canada Elections Act. There we heard two witnesses who came up with two schemes for a Cook's tour. One of them was the Judge Advocate General, from the Department of National Defence, the other a bureaucrat from the Department of External Affairs, and each had concocted a scheme to travel to many countries in the world. The Judge Advocate General thought very cunningly of giving a vote to the wives of soldiers, and for that purpose he had to go abroad to organize the polls for the elections in the countries where the wives of soldiers would have the right to vote.

I wonder, honourable senators, if one senator would be permitted to refer here to what he had said in the House of Commons? When a member of that house I told the story as reported in the Commons Hansard of May 18, 1955, at page 3905. What I have said is just a summary of what took place. Naturally, everyone thinks of wives of soldiers as being persons who deserve every consideration, which is quite right. However, in the committee I asked the Judge Advocate General if he had been asked by the soldiers or their wives to suggest that they should have the right to vote. May I read briefly from the report of the committee proceedings:

Q. To summarize the whole thing, you did not receive any representations from any soldier stationed overseas, nor from a wife of any such soldier, to appear before the committee and to ask that the franchise be extended to them?—A. No, we had no such request.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Will the honourable gentleman say who the witness was on that occasion

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: The witness was the Judge Advocate General, who was appearing before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections of the House of Commons on March 17, 1955, and I have referred to page 122 of the proceedings.

The report on this point is of course much longer than the portion I read. The witness had said that we should give the vote to the wives of soldiers. He was asked, "Did they ask for it?" And the reply was, "No". But he thought he should organize this Cook's tour. That is the first instalment of the story. The second instalment is that he made the Cook's tour after the act was amended. He took a plane or boat, crossed the seas and visited many countries to organize the polling booths for the general election. He wanted to see how it could be done. That was the first stage.

This year we had placed before us a piece of legislation which would give citizenship to ladies who were not the wives but rather the friends of soldiers and the mothers of their sons. You see, it went much further, and I wonder if these ladies would be permitted to vote; however, that is outside the question.

But the House of Commons Committee on Privileges and Elections succeeded in amending the Elections Act, so as to curtail the trip of another bureaucrat of the Department of External Affairs who wanted to organize polling facilities in all our embassies and legations in the various countries of the world. Imagine what a fine trip he would have had. So, even if the Judge Advocate General was at liberty to travel around the world to establish polling stations for the wives of soldiers, the other bureaucrat in the Department of External Affairs could not make a trip at the expense of the country. If he went abroad he would have to pay his own way. I mention this only to show that the House of Commons did its best to save money by preventing one departmental official from making a long trip last year.

In the second place, I want to make a little correction of an interpretation that was made by my distinguished and learned friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) the other day when I was discussing the Canadian Citizenship Bill, as reported at page 378 of Hansard. I was referring there to newcomers from outside of Canada, whether they come from the United Kingdom or somewhere else. I said:

I am proud to be a British subject as much as I am of being a Canadian citizen, but the time will come when the newcomers from outside, whether they come from the United Kingdom or from somewhere else, will have to take out Canadian citizenship in order to have public rights in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: They do now. A person cannot be a lawyer or a doctor in the province of Quebec, even though he be a British subject, unless he has Canadian citizenship.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Neither can he vote.

I am sure that my learned and distinguished colleague from Toronto-Trinity was absentminded when he made that remark, because in the Canada Elections Act, Chapter 23 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, section 14, under the heading Qualifications of Electors, I read:

. . . every person in Canada, man or woman, is entitled . . . if he or she

(a) is of the full age of 21 years or will attain such age on or before polling day at such election;

(b) is a Canadian citizen or other British subject;

(c) has been ordinarily resident in Canada for the twelve months immediately preceding polling day at such elections.

And so on. Therefore, anyone coming to Canada from anywhere in the British Empire or Commonwealth is entitled to vote if he or she is 21 years of age and has 12 months residence in Canada previous to the date of the election.

I will not insist on what I said the other day, for the very good reason that what is said is said; it is on record and is not to be repeated indefinitely. But next year, and perhaps even later this session, I may speak again. I do not want to take up any more time of the house today, and I do appreciate the fact that my honourable colleagues have been so kind to me this day.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Honourable senators, I wonder if we could have some explanation of these amendments as they relate to the bill. From my reading of them there appears to be a discrepancy. I would ask the sponsor of the bill to note particularly the third amendment, which appears on page 491 of Hansard and reads as follows:

Page 2, line 23. For the word "under" substitute the words "by virtue of a certificate of naturalization as defined in".

I have the bill in front of me, and I do not find the word "under" on page 2 of the line indicated. That amendment must refer to another clause.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable senator will recall that the bill was introduced in this house, was amended in committee, passed by this house and then sent to the Commons. So the bill that was amended in the Commons was the amended bill that finally passed this house on April 26 last. My recollection is that it was reprinted before it received third reading here. The bill that the honourable senator from New Westminster has before him at the present time is perhaps the original bill that was introduced in this house.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I stand corrected.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It is said that the Senate does not amend many bills, but this year we have amended quite a few, and this is one of them.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I wonder whether the leader would explain the reason for the amendment that was made in the House of Commons. I understand from reading the House of Commons Hansard of May 8 that clause 2 is deleted from the bill because of an amendment which had previously been made to the original draft in the Senate. The Senate amendment then having gone to the Commons for consideration, they decided that in view of the action that was taken here the clause as it remained was not a valid clause. Is there an explanation as to why that should be?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As has been mentioned, clause 2 was amended after the bill was introduced in this house. Honourable senators will recall that during the debate on second reading objection was taken to that clause. In the committee the bill was amended to conform substantially with the suggestion set forth by the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot), although the amendment did not go quite as far as he has suggested. When the bill went to the House of Commons it was decided to leave the clause in its original form, so that the amendment which appears in the amending bill was struck out. It was necessary to renumber the remaining clauses.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendments were concurred in.

STAFF OF THE SENATE

FIFTH REPORT OF INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Earlier this day the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) asked me if any action had been taken by this committee with respect to the Senate Post Office cancellation stamp. I thought there was a reference to that matter in one of the committee's reports. However, I find that that is not so; but I can inform the house that the committee did take action and that a new cancellation stamp is being ordered.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Hear, hear. Will the honourable gentleman be kind enough to tell us what the committee has decided with regard to the purchase of a new rug, the installation of improved electric lighting in this chamber, the improvement of the acoustics, the removal of the ugly paint from the windows, the removal of the depressing pictures, etc.?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The committee agreed that a subcommittee should be appointed, to be known as the Subcommittee on Senate Precincts, under the chairmanship of the Honourable Mr. Dessureault, to consider the whole matter of the Senate precincts, including the question of a new rug and other matters which the honourable senator has mentioned.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Thank you very much.

The motion was agreed to, and the report was adopted.

SIXTH, SEVENTH AND EIGHTH REPORTS OF INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the sixth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I, with unanimous consent, make one motion for the adoption of the sixth, seventh and eighth reports of this committee?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Before the motion is put I wish to ask three questions.

First: on page 376 of the Minutes of the Proceedings appears an item headed, "Secretary to the Clerk of the Senate"; and on page 379 is a listing of what appears to be the same position, although with some small differences in compensation. The suggested range is shown on page 376, in the committee's sixth report, as from $3,650 to $4,190, whereas in the seventh report the proposed salary range runs from $4,010 to $4,550. Which is correct? I do not know.

My second question is, who is the Assistant to the Clerk of the Parliaments? Is that a new appointment, or has it been in existence for some time? I have been here a long while but I never before heard of the position.

My third question relates to doubts which have arisen in the minds of some persons regarding changes in the method of paying the temporary staff. The method of payment, I note, has been changed from a per diem to a monthly remuneration. This question has been raised: if their employment begins or ceases in the middle or towards the end of a month, will payment to them be made for the full term of the month in which they have worked?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I must confess that I am not sufficiently familiar with the details to answer these questions, but I am sure that the Clerk of the Senate is. I would have suggested that concurrence in these reports be delayed until next Tuesday but for the fact that the recommended salary increases are in accordance with those which have been approved for all members of the Civil Service. I do not know whether the benefits to the staff would be delayed if the changes were held up for a few days, but I am sure that to do so would make more work for those who are preparing the lists. Probably it would meet the wishes of the honourable senator if concurrence in these reports could now be given; he might then see the Clerk of the Senate, and if he is not satisfied with the information he receives he can raise the matter at a later sitting. I think it is advisable that these reports be concurred in today.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: May I intervene to remark that I think the answer to one of the questions of the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) was given in the committee by the Clerk: that is, that payment of increases is to be made at a monthly rate.

Hon. Mr. Reid: That was not my question. What some members of the staff are asking is, if, for instance, a sessional worker's term of employment commenced in the middle of April, or later in that month, would payment to him on the new monthly basis be made for the entire month of April, or would his salary run only from the day that his duties began? Some rule should be laid down.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am sure that the Clerk can correctly advise the honourable senator on this matter, but if honourable senators would prefer to have me consult with the Clerk and make a statement at our sitting on Tuesday, I will do so. I hope, in the interest of the staff, that the reports will be concurred in today.

The motion was agreed to, and the reports were adopted.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce, Nos. 291 to 299, which were presented May 9.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the committee, moved that the reports be adopted.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Next sitting.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 15, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, May 15, 1956

The Senate met at 8 p.m., Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien, Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY COMPANY BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 248, an Act respecting the construction of a line of railway in the province of New Brunswick by Canadian National Railway Company from a point at or near Bartibog in a westerly direction to the Tomogonops River in the vicinity of Little River Lakes.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With leave, next sitting.

NATIONAL GALLERY PAINTINGS

DISPLAY SPACE—INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Donald Cameron inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of April 24:

1. Is it a fact that large numbers of paintings are stored and not available for display because of a lack of fire-proof buildings in which to display them?

2. If this is true would it be possible and permissible for the Director of the National Gallery to arrange to have them placed on exhibition in the more suitable corridors and public rooms of the Centre Block where they would add greatly to the interest of the casual visitor and tourist alike?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry is as follows:

1. Yes, a number of paintings are stored because of a lack of suitable gallery hanging space.

2. No. The paintings presently in storage, exclusive of the War Collections, are required for loan exhibitions both in and out of Canada and also for inclusion in National Gallery planned exhibitions during the coming seasons. It is not recommended that paintings be hung in corridors and public rooms which do not have proper hanging and lighting facilities and adequate protective arrangements.

ON LOAN TO OTHER INSTITUTIONS THAN GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS—INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of April 26:

What pictures and paintings belonging to the National Gallery of Canada have been loaned to other institutions than Government departments?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry is as follows:

During the past year 112 paintings have been loaned to recognized art galleries and museums for specific exhibitions on short-term loans; this does not include paintings owned by the National Gallery which are included in circulating exhibitions being circulated throughout the country.

Of the 112 paintings, 94 were loaned to Canadian galleries and museums and 18 to galleries outside Canada. Four paintings were loaned for publicity purposes; two have been returned and two are at present on display at the Chateau Laurier Hotel, Ottawa.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 300 to 323, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES LIMITED

AGREEMENTS AND CORRESPONDENCE—INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) if it would be possible to procure for the members of this house copies of the two agreements entered into by the Government with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, and also a copy of the communications passed with a gentleman by the name of McMahon. This matter is now under consideration in the other house, and in due course it will come before us. I am sure it would be helpful and useful if in the meantime we had an opportunity to study the relevant documents.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I will be glad to make inquiries with respect to the matter raised by the honourable senator from Churchill and report to the house at its next sitting.

PRIVATE BILLS

TRANS-PRAIRIE PIPELINES OF CANADA, LTD.—THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. Crerar moved the third reading of Bill A-10, an Act respecting Trans-Prairie Pipelines of Canada, Ltd.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

OGDENSBURG BRIDGE AUTHORITY—THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. Roebuck moved the third reading of Bill B-10, an Act respecting Ogdensburg Bridge Authority.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

CANADA-DENMARK INCOME TAX AGREEMENT BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the third reading of Bill 8, an Act to implement an agreement between Canada and the Kingdom of Denmark for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I do not wish to labour this matter unduly but I would like to reaffirm the statement I made on second reading, that this is not the way to change the law in keeping with a convention, treaty or international agreement. Here we have a bill which declares an agreement to be the law of Canada, and I could not illustrate better the effect of such a method of procedure than to recall what happened in the committee when this bill was discussed. We were told there that we must adopt the agreement in its entirety, without a single amendment, not even the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t", or otherwise reject the agreement in whole and lose the advantage, if there is any, of the agreement as a whole. The consideration of a bill under such circumstances was something of a farce.

The honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies) had made some suggestion with regard to the definition of capital, but there was nothing that could be done, no matter how plausible his argument or how sound his suggestion. We had to "take it or leave it, swallow it holus-bolus," and so we swallowed it. It was a bit of a gulp, it is true, but we swallowed it. And here it is to be swallowed again, on the motion for third reading.

My objection is not to the agreement or convention or treaty or whatever it may be. There is a great deal of detail in it and I have no wish to discuss it section by section tonight, because we cannot do anything about it. We have to swallow it holus-bolus or throw it out in toto, and I fancy we are not prepared to reject it altogether. Nevertheless, I must call attention once again to my objection to this manner of proceeding. The executive, which takes upon itself the making of a treaty that is binding as between itself and a foreign country, has no business to gag the members of the Senate in this way. The executive should ask us to make what changes are required in the statute law in order that it may conform to the terms of the treaty, and then leave it to us to say what the phraseology of the bill should be. We should have freedom to enact such changes of law as we desire, and we should not be asked to make the wording of the agreement the wording of the law of Canada. This agreement was drafted not for the purpose of being passed as an act of Parliament, but rather with a view to bringing the parties together in an agreement. Yet we are presented with its phraseology, which was not drawn by our counsel—perhaps not drawn by counsel at all, but only by negotiators—and we are expected to enact the agreement as a statute of Parliament. I repeat that I object to this method of procedure; and I do hope that the officials, who have a great deal of influence in these matters, will take note of my objection and the objections of others in this chamber, and not again put us in the position of being required to enact an agreement as a statute. Rather, they should notify us what changes they desire in the statute law, and we should be free to deal with the matter as we wish, make such changes as we consider proper—beat it into shape, if you will—and so put on the statute books something of which we need not be ashamed.

Hon. Thomas Vien: Honourable senators, there is a great deal to be said in a general way, in favour of the principle just propounded by the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity. But with respect to an agreement between Canada and another country there is only one of two courses that we can take: we can authorize the Government to negotiate; or if negotiations have taken place and an agreement has been entered into subject to ratification and is presented to us, we must accept it or reject it as a whole. In our consideration of such an agreement the independence or freedom of Parliament is not curtailed, for we are free to say yes or no. But it seems easy to understand that an agreement arrived at after long negotiations could hardly be amended in this house or the other place.

Hon. Mr. Davies: May I ask my honourable friend whether the agreement could not have been submitted to Parliament before it was signed?

Hon. Mr. Vien: The usual procedure is that a treaty or international agreement is first negotiated and then submitted for ratification. If my undertanding is correct, the practice has been to request Parliament to grant ratification by means of a bill or a simple resolution of both houses. In this case we are requested to give our assent to a bill embodying the terms of the agreement. This treaty, which has been arrived at after undoubtedly long and laborious negotiation, may still be improved upon. The views that have been expressed in this house and in committee will certainly be seriously considered in due course, and the Government will continue to negotiate for better terms. The agreement can be terminated upon proper notice being given by either contracting party. If it were found that the interests of Canada were injuriously affected, the Government would in due course give notice of termination. New terms might then be discussed and agreed to. In principle, I wish the terms of any treaty to which Canada is a party could be submitted to Parliament for discussion. But, in my opinion, this is impractical. It is obviously impossible for Parliament as a whole to negotiate with a foreign country. When, therefore, our accredited representatives and those of a foreign country have settled the terms of a treaty, and when these terms are submitted to us for ratification, we must either accept or reject them. The other party is not here to discuss with us suggested amendments. The present procedure is in keeping with parliamentary practice as I have observed it since I entered Parliament.

Hon. John T. Hackett: Honourable senators, I wish to add a word. My objection is not so much to the form that the treaty has taken as to the absence of information. I made one or two feeble inquiries in committee and I received courteous replies, but they added nothing to my information. Why do we have this treaty? Is there any Dane who wants it? Is there any Canadian other than possibly a spokesman who desires it? It seems to me that it is treating this house and Parliament with a degree of levity to ask us to put into effect a binding treaty which in so far as this house is concerned nobody has sought or needs. Why was it introduced? Are there a substantial number of citizens of this country or of Denmark who find themselves in a position to benefit by the enactment of this treaty?

In committee I asked one question to which I got a very courteous reply. I found that in Denmark there are three taxing agencies. There is something like the principal country, something like a province and something like a municipality, and I was told that one agency could more or less speak for them all. Now, there are taxing agencies in this country, and it seems to me that more astute, thoughtful and beneficial negotiations would have made this treaty more completely reciprocal. I do not say exactly how that should be done. A treaty is a solemn engagement and something which should not be treated lightly. I suggest with the utmost respect that this house was given very scant information concerning the reasons for introducing the legislation and its purport. It is all very well to say we want treaties of this kind with many nations. That answer does not go very far but it is the best answer one could get. I submit that in the future treaties of this kind should be supported by further information and this house should not be asked to go it blind, as it has on this occasion.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Would the honourable senator from Victoria permit a question? Could he tell us what was the information that he asked for and that was refused?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: If the honourable gentleman had been in committee he would know that.

Hon. Mr. Vien: I know my honourable friend does not mean to be discourteous.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I certainly had no intention of being discourteous.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I am very sorry if my answer was misunderstood by the honourable senator from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Vien). I will merely say that the information concerning the purpose of this treaty was not available.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I think that I should answer some of the statements that have been made about this tax convention and the bill confirming it. More often than not the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) and I are able to find common ground and resolve any differences in our viewpoints. In this particular instance, however, it would appear that we have not been able to do that. Whether that is his fault or mine I am not prepared to say now. I do not doubt there is merit in the cause he has espoused, but sometimes in espousing a cause a person may get so carried away that he emphasizes the wrong point. This is a very poor cause for any vehement assertion of the principle that the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity has advocated.

First of all, the tax convention is beneficial in all its phases to Canadians who may do business in Denmark; and, in reverse, it is beneficial to Danish citizens who may do business in Canada. I learned a long time ago that a business agreement was a poor thing about which to become evangelical or a crusader in one's espousal of a principle.

We have to understand just how these conventions or agreements are reached. In this case the Danish and Canadian representatives sat around a table and negotiated. I made one inquiry as to why, for instance, the odd expression "fiscal fraud" was put in the tax convention, for to me, and I am sure to most Canadians, the word "fiscal" is a broad term which relates to other matters than income tax. It may also relate to customs and excise taxes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask if that was evangelical on your part?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: If my friend thinks that I used the words "evangelical" and "crusader" as a barb to make him smart, I assure him that I had no such intention.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Oh, I did not think that.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: To return to what I was saying: the explanation I got was that Europeans use the words "fiscal fraud" where we might have used the words "tax evasion" or "fraudulent evasion", so for purposes of the agreement the term "fiscal fraud" was accepted.

Honourable senators, this agreement is not perfect. My idea of a perfect agreement in relation to taxes is one that does away with taxes altogether.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: But although the agreement is not perfect, it does go some distance in the right direction, and it represents the distance to which the two countries were able to go jointly.

The language of the agreement is simple, and I think it is easily understandable. I am sure that if the draftsman had converted its simple language into income tax terminology the agreement would have been far more difficult to understand. Of course, that would have meant more business for the lawyers, but business men will be pleased that this tax convention can be read and understood by themselves.

I think the convention goes to the fullest extent to which the parties are able to go at this time and that it is the expression of an agreement that is relieving and beneficial in its provisions to residents of either of the countries who may be doing business in the other. Maybe it is unfortunate that the agreement does not go farther, but I think that in making provisions which are beneficial we should have some thought for what might occur on a later occasion. However, we should not snub people, and we should not feel impatient if the convention is not as broad in its scope as at first we think it should be.

As I say, the convention is beneficial, and the language is simple and easy of interpretation. All that has been done is to annex it to a bill that would give it the force of law. Now, to reject such a bill because we do not incorporate into the Income Tax Act the exemptions and the reductions that are provided in the tax convention would, I think, be unjustifiable. The Danish people might not be able to read and understand the language of our Income Tax Act, but obviously they can read and understand the language of this tax convention; and they have signed it. Therefore, I am prepared to go along with that phase of it. I am not at all disturbed because in this particular case the Income Tax Act has not been amended directly and specifically to incorporate the provisions of the tax convention.

The honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) was present in committee and asked questions. I am glad to note that we were courteous. I was only the chairman, and I could have been voted out of the chair if I had not behaved as I should. I thought that the answers to questions went as far as they should go. My friend referred again this evening to the three types of income tax that are the subject-matter of the agreement so far as Denmark is concerned. So fas as Canada is concerned there is just one type, namely, the income tax and surtaxes which come under the authority of the federal Parliament. The federal authority in Denmark has, by special statute, power to deal not only with the federal tax but also with what would correspond to our provincial tax and our municipal tax. Denmark was able, therefore, to enter into an agreement relating to the three levels, whereas the federal authority in Canada was only able to enter into an agreement with relation to the field over which it has jurisdiction. The parties to this agreement dealt in good faith within the limits they had, and they did not presume on that authority. That was the extent of the information given in committee. No more information than that could be given. The Government went as far as its authority permitted it to go, and that was the beginning and end of it. If there was scant information, in the circumstances, I can only say that the committee could have sat longer; if so desired, it could have adjourned for a day. If any senator who asked questions was not satisfied with the answers he only had to say to the witness, "Well, get this information." That has been done before. We have brought even ministers into committee, sometimes when they have been loath to come. On occasion when lacking information on a section, for instance, we have said, "We will adjourn until tomorrow, and if the minister is not here then we shall have to strike out the section." If more information is asked for at any time, it is surprising how quickly it is available before a bill is passed.

So far as I could see—I do not profess to have a magic eye to discern information that is not available—I thought the information that was given before the committe on this bill was as full and complete as it could possibly be in the circumstances. I thought the real criticism did not turn upon lack of information, or upon the beneficial features of the tax convention, or upon whether our negotiators had done a good job in the circumstances, but rather upon the principle which the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity put forward. As a matter of general principle my friend might find, in a case that I might regard as a better example, that he and I would be on common ground, but in this particular case I cannot get on common ground with him, for there is no harm done to legislation or precedent or anything else in this case. And yet, as I have said, the effects of the convention are beneficial.

In closing, I am reminded that the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) was disturbed because he did not know how many or how few people in Canada might be benefited by the agreement. I am very partial to anything that suggests relief in the matter of taxation. My concern is whether or not legislation that comes before us is likely to present benefits to the taxpayers of Canada and to the residents of Canada in their operations anywhere else in the world. I do not want to measure this convention in dollars or in numbers. If it is or is likely to be of benefit to Canadians, I say it is a good thing and that we should give it the force of law in Canada.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed, on division.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the third time, and passed, on division.

PENAL REFORM

DISCUSSION CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 10, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Croll calling to the attention of the Senate the present position with respect to penal institutions in Canada and in particular discussing the need for further reforms in the Canadian penal system.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, let me say at once that my contribution to the discussion on this matter brought forward by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) will be brief. I say that because, while the matter is one of absorbing interest, my ignorance of it is colossal. Nevertheless, we are indebted to the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina for introducing the subject, which is an entirely appropriate one for discussion in this house. That it is a matter of supreme importance in the national sense goes, I think, without question.

The discussion so far has hinged, it appears to me, largely on the question of remedial action. People commit crimes. What can we do with them afterwards to get them back on the right road? I am not for a moment minimizing the importance of remedial action, nor indeed the need for it; however, I would like to suggest to the house that there is another aspect of the question that is well worthy of our consideration.

In many of the physical diseases that afflicted mankind as late as fifty years ago, remedies by way of prevention were in many cases largely unknown; the whole effort, once the disease had struck an individual, was to try to bring about curative processes so that he could be restored to full health. But scientific inquiry probed further and new knowledge was gained. For instance we have found a method of preventing diphtheria, and eventually, if a program of prevention, now known and practicable, is carried out, we shall be able to eradicate tuberculosis in the human family. Other illustrations of a similar nature could be given. These facts illustrate the importance of preventive measures and the study of them.

It is true that the treatment of the whole problem of crime has been left largely to the psychiatrists. Why does an ordinary, normal, healthy individual take to crime? There must be some reason for it. Those who have probed into the mysteries of the human mind have brought forward certain suggestions as to why people turn to crime. I find it difficult to agree always with some of the theories advanced. That may be because of what I referred to at the outset, my colossal ignorance of this subject. But I do think there are certain things in our social life and in our manner of living that contribute to the development of crime, and that these things could in large measure be remedied.

In my experience in life, now running back over many years, I have observed or at any rate imagined I observed, certain phenomena. In the rural districts that I have been familiar with the ratio of crime to the population is vastly less than it is in crowded cities. Why is that so? I recall when I was a lad out on the prairies, in the frontier days, when there was not a magistrate or a law enforcement officer within perhaps 200 miles, that people never locked their doors; they were never afraid that their small possessions might be stolen. Indeed, frequently people would help themselves to something they needed at the moment, perhaps an implement of some kind, and when they were through with it they would return it to where it belonged. That is a state of society which to me has a great deal to commend it. I am told that the same custom exists today on the far northern frontiers of Canada. I was interested not very long ago in reading about an individual who lived in the far northern part of Alberta. He was a simple man, a trapper, but one whom everyone trusted, and when he died his remains were interred on a promontory where the Smoky and the Peace Rivers come together. And what was the inscription placed upon the stone that marked his last resting place? It was this:

> He was every man's friend and he never locked his cabin door.

Now that, I think, is illustrative of the wholesome surroundings in which people like him and many others on the frontiers lived, in the early days.

Social studies indicate that probably the greatest source of development of the individual in crime lies in the congested slums of our large cities, and that is understandable. Many years ago, when I visited New York frequently, I used to stay at a hotel at the corner of 42nd street and Broadway. To reach the place where I did business I took the elevated railway—which, thank heaven, has since disappeared—down to the Battery. Often when going down there on a summer morning I saw little children up 50 and 60 feet above the sidewalk, in the blazing heat, out on a little platform that was surrounded with a railing, getting a breath of fresh air. There was not a place anywhere nearby where these children could go out and get a breath of God's fresh air and see a bird or a blade of grass. It is inevitable that such conditions will breed the distortions in the human mind that eventually lead to crime of one kind or another. I refer to them simply to illustrate the importance of prevention.

Now, there has grown up in recent years another curious state of mind or point of view, that you can cure social problems by the spending of money alone. There never was a greater fallacy propagated than that.

I have sometimes thought, for instance, about the matter of family allowances. Do not get excited; I am not going to criticize family allowances as such. We pay family allowances to everyone who has children up to a certain age. A person may have an income of $50,000 a year and yet receive family allowance payments. And so we have paid out in the last eleven years or so well over $3 billion. Now, would we not be further ahead in all our social relations in Canada if we had limited family allowances to the deserving and the needy? Sometimes the needy are not deserving, yet they get the payments. If we limited them to the cases of real need, and used the balance of the money to clean up slums in Montreal, Winnipeg, Ottawa or Hull, let us say, would we not be putting that balance to better use?

Hon. Mr. Howden: Where would you draw the line?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That is one of the things that should have been undertaken long ago. Some effort is being directed today toward elimination of slum areas in our cities. In Montreal, for instance, there is an area where such a program is under way. Take any slums, where people live in poverty, with little opportunity to enjoy fresh air. Clean up the slums, build decent housing, establish parks with fountains where children will have a chance to play in the fresh air and sunshine, and I venture to say that over a period of 25 to 50 years there will be a very marked reduction in the criminal developments that now come from such areas.

Another thing: We have become a little bit too modern in the matter of discipline. About 3,000 years ago, a wise Hebrew prophet named Solomon prepared quite a large body of proverbs, wise sayings. One of the proverbs that he uttered was this:

He that spareth his rod hateth his son: but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes.

It was only a little more than 300 years ago that the English poet Butler paraphrased that saying in a phrase which we frequently hear today: "Spare the rod and spoil the child". What is meant by "the rod"? It seems to me that one can substitute "discipline" for "rod". The child who grows up under proper discipline is much more likely to become a good, normal, law-abiding citizen than one who is allowed, as some modern psychologists and psychiatrists recommend, to work out his own character-pattern and find his own way in the world. Personally I have no patience with that theory of child training. Fortunately it is passing out in the United States, where it became the vogue 40 or 50 years ago, and we need to get rid of it in this country. What is essential is discipline; not roughness or cruelty, but treatment whereby a child can learn early in life that punishment is inevitably associated with wrong-doing; that it is a law of nature and of human beings.

Many of our homes fall short of what they should be for the proper rearing of families. I sometimes wonder, with all our modern gadgets—television and the rest—what sort of people we shall produce in 25 or 50 years. It is of course impossible to foresee. No doubt television, wisely employed, can be a very useful educative agent; but we need to give some thought to how these new inventions can be applied for the development of healthy, normal children. I am a great believer in the out-of-doors for youngsters. If a child acquires a love of flowers and birds and the other gifts of nature, the chances are remote that he or she will go wrong in after life; whereas the absence of such contacts smothers or curbs a child's development—often with deplorable results.

Another condition which disturbs me is the extent of mental trouble in these days. I believe the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) referred to this; it seems to be growing. Apparently we cannot build enough mental hospitals to provide for the numbers who are becoming mentally unbalanced. I have been interested in this subject for a good many years, and with a view of informing myself I have read a good deal about it. A few days ago I came upon a medical article which dealt with the condition known as schizophrenia. In dealing with this subject I have to walk warily, but as I understand it this disease is a sort of split personality which in adults leads to what we commonly call insanity. For a number of years pundits have put forward the theory that this disease is caused by inhibitions and other influences which affected the sufferer in his early years.

In the article to which I am referring, and which was communicated recently to a large convention of psychiatrists in Chicago, it was stated that a research team at Tulane University, in the southern United States, who had been examining into this condition, discovered that the blood of schizophrenics contains a substance which is absent from the blood of normal human beings. They arrived at this conclusion after a wide range of experiments. They took a pint of blood from a schizophrenic and isolated the element in it which is absent from the blood of normal persons: they then injected some of this substance into the blood of monkeys, with the result that the animals developed some of the characteristic symptoms of schizophrenia. Two penitentiary inmates volunteered to receive injections, and within an hour after the inoculation they exhibited evidences of insanity. The effect, however, passed off and the two prisoners again became normal. I mention this, not because I am an authority on the subject—in fact, I am a complete ignoramus, as far as that is concerned—but because today there is a generally received theory that insanity is predetermined by prenatal and other influences. It is quite possible that science may find a cure. At any rate, the article illustrates a point which I want to impress upon the house—that, at least in my humble judgment, it is most important to develop more study regarding the prevention of crime by the elimination of the causes which lead to wrongdoing. I believe that great progress can be made in that direction, and that it is a far better and more fruitful approach than to try to find means of reforming the individul after he has committed a crime. When we have discovered means of preventing the development of criminal tendencies we shall have the surest and safest method of dealing with this matter so far as society is concerned.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The discussion concluded.

PRIVATE BILL

GRAND FALLS CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY LIMITED—COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to Bill Y-9, an Act to incorporate Grand Falls Central Railway Company Limited.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen moved that the amendments be concurred in.

He said: Honourable senators, I think I should give the Senate a word or two of explanation of the amendments which the committee made to this legislation. This is a bill to incorporate Grand Falls Central Railway Company Limited. The railway in question already exists in the province of Newfoundland as a part of the enterprise of Anglo Newfoundland Development Company Limited which, as honourable members may know, operates a very large pulp and paper industry at Grand Falls.

The primary object of the incorporation of this company is to split off the railway enterprise as a separate corporation from the pulp and paper enterprise and to make it subject to the Board of Transport Commissioners as a work for the general advantage of Canada, so that the freight on this railway, if it becomes a federal railway, will benefit from the advantages conferred by the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

Section 14 of the original bill authorized the company to enter into the highway transportation business, and subsections (2) and (3) specifically set out that the provisions of the Railway Act with respect to traffic, tolls and tariffs in such transportation business would apply. Objection was taken to these provisions by the Canadian Trucking Associations on the ground that if they remained in the bill the company would be empowered to carry on a trucking business in the province of Newfoundland without being made subject to the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities. We were informed that the Minister of Transport also objected to these provisions of the bill on the same ground.

Honourable senators will probably recall that the same question was raised last year in connection with a bill involving the Canadian National Railway Company. It was declared at that time in the other house by the Minister of Transport that it was a matter of Government policy for trucking matters to remain under the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities, and a consequential amendment was made to the Canadian National Railways Bill to make that position clear.

The amendments which the committee has suggested and which are now before the Senate for consideration make the same changes with respect to this Bill Y-9. I may say that the changes were willingly accepted by the sponsors of the legislation, so your committee was in the happy position of having everybody in complete agreement.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: May I interrupt to ask the honourable senator a question? Was the decision to leave the trucking business under the control of provincial authorities a concession or was it made by virtue of an interpretation of the B.N.A. Act.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: There was no intervention at all by the Province of Newfoundland. It was purely a matter that the Canadian Trucking Associations wished the control of trucking to remain with the provinces, and the Minister of Transport agreed with that stand, declaring that it was in accordance with dominion Government policy. As I say, these changes were accepted by the sponsors of the bill.

The first amendment which the house is now asked to concur in is to strike out subsections (2) and (3) of section 14, which would eliminate the provision that the highway transportation business of the company should be subject to the provisions of the Railway Act.

The next amendment is to delete section 17 and substitute a new section 17. The section in the bill now reads:

> The works and undertakings of the company are hereby declared to be for the general advantage of Canada.

If that section remained in that form it would mean that the trucking business of the company would be part of the works for the general advantage of Canada, and therefore subject to dominion jurisdiction and to the jurisdiction of the Board of Transport Commissioners. In committee it was agreed to amend section 17 to read as follows:

> The works and undertakings of the company, other than those related to the transport of goods or passengers by motor vehicle, are hereby declared to be for the general advantage of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask a question? I am not rising to oppose the bill, but it seems to me that a certain point should be cleared up. I always thought that a railway or bus company or motor transport company which operated entirely within a province came entirely under provincial jurisdiction and was of no concern of the federal authorities. Do I understand this company is operated within one province and yet will be under federal jurisdiction?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: The honourable senator is perfectly right. Under normal circumstances a railway which is operated entirely in one province falls within the jurisdiction of that province, but he will recall that under the British North America Act the federal Parliament has power to declare such a provincial work to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, in which case it becomes subject to dominion jurisdiction. That is what it is sought to do here in order to bring the company, in so far as its railway operations are concerned, under the jurisdiction of the federal Board of Transport Commissioners and to give it the benefit of the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

Hon. Mr. Reid: This rather intrigues me. Supposing there was a railway company operating wholly within the province of British Columbia. Could the federal Government declare that railway to be a work for the general advantage of Canada?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Not the federal Government, but the federal Parliament could, regardless of any objection by the province.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Is your explanation based on the fact that the trucking operation is a subsidiary of the railway?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Yes.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendments were concurred in.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Next sitting.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

CANADA SHIPPING BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the report of the committee on Bill H-7.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to whom was referred the Bill (H-7) intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act", have in obedience to the order of reference of April 19, 1956, examined the said bill and now beg leave to report the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 3, lines 8-13, both inclusive: delete clause 6 and renumber the subsequent clauses.

2. Page 9: delete lines 1 to 5 both inclusive and substitute therefor the following:

"495A. The International Convention for the Prevention of Pollution of the Sea by Oil, 1954, set out in the Fourteenth Schedule, is approved, and the Governor in Council may make regulations:

(a) to carry out and give effect to the provisions of the Convention while in force in respect of Canada, such regulations to conform in all respects to the said provisions;"

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Tuesday next.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the Committee's reports Nos. 324 to 337, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

PRIVATE BILL

MARITIME STOCK BREEDERS' ASSOCIATION—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, presented the report of the committee on Bill I-10.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, to whom was referred the Bill (I-10) intituled: "An Act respecting The Maritime Stock Breeders' Association", have in obedience to the order of reference of May 10, 1956, examined the said bill and now beg leave to report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hawkins: Next sitting.

PRIVATE BILLS

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR FILING PETITIONS

Hon. Charles L. Bishop, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Orders, presented the committee's third report.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

Your committee recommend that the time limit for filing petitions for private bills, other than petitions for bills of divorce, which expired on Friday, March 30, 1956, be further extended to Friday, May 18, 1956.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Bishop: With leave, I move that the report be now concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

DIVORCE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Hon. Mr. Roebuck presented the following bills:

Bill U-11, an Act for the relief of Marcel Alban St. Amour.

Bill V-11, an Act for the relief of Grace Elizabeth Browning MacDonald.

Bill W-11, an Act for the relief of Mary Carol Devone Henry Scott.

Bill X-11, an Act for the relief of Stanley Mira Levene, otherwise known as Stanley Mira Francis.

Bill Y-11, an Act for the relief of Alice Isabel Christian Thompson.

Bill Z-11, an Act for the relief of Czarna Landzman Desmarais.

Bill A-12, an Act for the relief of Real Perras.

Bill B-12, an Act for the relief of Andrea Marietta Hiekisch Farago.

The bills were read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: With leave, next sitting.

PRIVATE BILL

GRAND FALLS CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY LIMITED—THIRD READING

Hon. A. B. Baird, for Hon. Mr Pratt, moved the third reading of Bill Y-9, an Act to incorporate Grand Falls Central Railway Company Limited.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 9, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, seconded by Hon. Mrs. Hodges, for the second reading of Bill I-5, an Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, after an unbroken experience of forty years in Parliament—twenty-three in the House of Commons and approaching seventeen years in the Senate—I cannot recall a time when in both houses there have not been strong protests against the practice of Parliament in dealing with applications for divorce—a practice not followed, as far as I know, by any other legislative body in the world, and one which was abandoned by the House of Lords in Britain a hundred years ago. It has long been felt in Parliament not only that the hearing of hundreds of cases of marital infidelities was not consonant with the dignity of Parliament, but that the time given to work on the Divorce Committee by members who belong to other important committees which the divorce work often prevents them from attending, might much more profitably be employed in considering matters of national importance.

So when my friend from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) introduced his simple bill to rid Parliament of what I think I may describe as a disagreeable and unsuitable job, I felt that it might very well be accepted, especially since, it seemed to me, it could not possibly violate the conscience of the most violent opponent of divorce itself.

It is indeed a simple bill. It does not really touch divorce. It makes no change whatsoever in the present divorce law. It does not add or subtract from it. Adultery is still the only ground that is recognized. All that the bill does is to take the application of the divorce law from here to there, from the Senate to the Exchequer Court, also in Ottawa.

In my innocence I even felt that the opponents of divorce might welcome the bill, because it would relieve them of the rather stultifying routine of allowing these hundreds of bills to pass "on division". But I received a rather rude awakening last week when I heard the amazing and remarkable speech by the senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard), for whom I have a very high regard, although we do not always agree.

Merely for the record and to clear the ground, as it were, may I state what is well known already to all senators? Until some twenty or twenty-two years ago all the provinces except Ontario and Quebec had what I might call divorce courts. But the applications, especialy from Ontario, became so frequent and burdensome that Ontario courts were given jurisdiction in matters of divorce. Therefore, with the exception of Newfoundland, which I believe had only one divorce case last year, Quebec is now the sole province without divorce courts. Petitioners from Quebec are therefore obliged to appeal to Parliament for relief. The applications are numerous, amounting to about 400 this year, and the Divorce Committee has to be divided into three and sometimes four sections in order to cope with them. Not only is every petition dealt with at a long hearing in committee, but every petition which the committee recommends is followed by a private bill, which must go through the first, second and third reading stages in the Senate, and then be sent to the House of Commons where, like any other bill, it must receive first and second readings, be referred to committee, and finally receive third reading before becoming law.

I shall now turn briefly to the arguments presented by my friend from Grandville. He is an able lawyer and he knows well the rules of order. To my surprise, although this bill has nothing whatever to do with the merits or demerits of divorce as such, my friend consumed considerable time in stating his opposition and that of the Catholics of the province of Quebec to divorce. He stated that "divorce remains a scourge which must be fought wherever it exists, no matter what our religious creed may be". Then he added that it was on this "essential premise" that he participated in the discussion. I was surprised at that, because discussion of divorce is not germane to this bill at all. He continued at considerable length to emphasize the opposition of Quebec to divorce, and finally my deskmate (Hon. Mr. Crerar) objected to the Speaker that the senator was not discussing the bill at all. With that view I agree. Every senator knows quite well that Catholics as well as members of some other denominations —and perhaps even some people who do not belong to any church at all—are conscientiously opposed to divorce. They have a perfect right to their views, of course, for each man is the keeper of his own conscience. But there is a time and a place for everything, and I do submit that this simple bill is not the occasion for giving a dissertation on the merits of divorce.

With reference to my friend's remark that divorce must be fought wherever it exists, may I suggest that his speech would have been much more convincing if it had been made on a bill which, say, he had introduced for the repeal of the divorce law altogether, for then we could have discussed the merits and demerits of divorce, as we did last session on another bill introduced by the senator from Rosetown. Or I might suggest that the senator from Grandville and some of his Quebec colleagues accept membership on the Divorce Committee and fight divorce there.

The honourable gentleman then entered into a rather lengthy discussion on what I suppose one might call the historical or constitutional aspect of divorce as applied to the province of Quebec. Not being a lawyer, I admit I could not entirely follow his argument, but on this point I am quite willing to accept the view of such eminent lawyers as the senator from Vancouver-South (Hon. Mr. Farris), whom I am glad to see here this afternoon, the senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) and the senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) that the bill is valid; and I accept that gladly, especially because the latter two gentlemen are opposed to the bill. During this part of the discussion the senator from Grandville alluded to what he called a "gentleman's agreement" made some ninety years ago, which to my mind was not very convincingly authenticated. I would merely say that surely an agreement of such importance should appear somewhere in writing and be embodied in the British North America Act. May I add that the statement that the restrictions on divorce in Quebec were designed to protect the Protestant minority in the province puts quite a strain on my credulity. It is difficult to convince me that a man or woman entitled to divorce in that province by Canadian law prefers to go to the expense and inconvenience of coming to Parliament at Ottawa rather than ask for relief in a local court.

Then at last my friend did address himself to the bill, but to me his line of argument was so tenuous that I could hardly discern it. His objection to the Exchequer Court being given jurisdiction over divorce matters in Quebec was that this court, or any other court that might be designated, would not have discretionary powers, so if a complainant comes into court with clean hands, as the saying is, and the respondent is proved guilty of adultery, the judge must necessarily grant a divorce. I am not enough of a lawyer to know if that is so, but I am quite willing to accept that statement. Then my friend added—and this is true—that Parliament has absolute power to grant or reject any application for divorce, no matter what the reason may be.

Now, if it be true that judges would have no discretionary power, what of it? If a complainant comes into court with clean hands and proves adultery, which is a ground for divorce under Canadian law, why should he or she not be granted a divorce? But the objection seems to me to be pointless, in any case. I believe the Chairman of the Divorce Committee (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) will bear me out when I say that in practically 100 per cent of the cases where adultery is proved, if the complainant has come with clean hands we almost invariably grant a divorce. My friend the Chairman of the committee nods his head. I am quite sure we are right in doing so. So between the two methods—that is, whether Parliament shall retain the power to grant divorce, or whether the Exchequer Court is to be granted that power—there is a distinction without a practical difference.

Here is an interesting thought which occurs to me. Suppose we should become consistent in reverse, as it were, and the minorities in our other provinces should induce Parliament to disestablish their divorce courts. Then applicants from those eight provinces also would be obliged to come to Parliament at Ottawa for relief. Imagine the situation!

In all of Canada there are probably at least five or six thousand applicants for divorce every year. I am not giving an exact figure, but I believe that to be fairly accurate. Well, suppose this horde—perhaps I should not use that word—were to come here and swamp us with their just demands under the law of Canada. Every Protestant senator, at least, would have to join the Divorce Committee, which would have to sit pretty nearly day and night in order to deal with so many applications. The result, of course, would be chaos—even to suggest it seems like an absurdity. Yet, without desiring to offend anybody—and I think most of my friends from the province of Quebec will give me credit for speaking in good faith—I say that is exactly the situation in principle that exists today in so far as Quebec is concerned.

In all the provinces where there are divorce courts I have never heard any objection to their existence, even from Catholics, although they do not believe in divorce. And why should they object? If they are faithful to the discipline of their church or to their own convictions they simply will not use or go near these courts, and their consciences are clear. Catholic judges in these provinces deal with divorce cases according to the law which they are sworn to administer, even though they personally are strongly opposed to divorce. I would hesitate to believe that the judges in all the provinces would do otherwise.

In this debate some irrelevancies have crept in, as is almost invariably the case in any debate. My friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Hon. Mr. Kinley) described divorce as an evil. It might be said that I also am violating the rules by dealing with matters outside the bill, but it is only fair that I should refer to some of the irrelevant points already discussed in this debate. Like the senator from Grandville, my friend from Queens-Lunenburg confuses cause and effect. Divorce is not an evil. It is usually a great blessing, in that it relieves an innocent man or woman from an intolerable situation. The evil is not divorce; the evil is in the things that lead to divorce. My friend from Queens-Lunenburg said that when he goes to a wedding of a happy young couple it is an inspiration to him. Well, he is a bit of a sentimentalist, as we all are, and I give him credit for his feelings. But in the event that this bill becomes law and he goes to another wedding will his inspiration be any less if the thought should cross his mind that perhaps in the future one or other of the two happy people might have to apply to the Exchequer Court rather than to Parliament for relief?

I should like to deal for a few minutes with the speech made by the senator from Toronto-Trinity, for whom I have great regard. He is clear in his thinking, clear in his speaking, and one of the most valuable members of this house. Certainly, he is a very good chairman of the Divorce Committee. He and I usually fight on the same side, I am glad to say, and quite frequently in lost causes.

My friend said that at first he was in favour of the bill but that he changed his mind. I am sorry he did so, but of course that is his privilege. He gave three reasons for opposing the bill. The first was the most plausible one, namely, that the Divorce Committee is doing a good job, so why change it? His second reason was that the Exchequer Court is not the proper body to deal with divorce. His third reason, and one with which I must absolutely disagree, was, why force this bill on Quebec? May I deal briefly with his three reasons, and then perhaps add one of my own.

True, the committee is doing a good job. Why should anyone disagree with that? I have served as a member of the committee ever since I entered the Senate. While I say the committee is doing a good job, we do not always find agreement on that point in the House of Commons. The committee is a large one—I think there are now 20 members.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Twenty-five.

Hon. Mr. Euler: That is about one-quarter of the Senate membership, especially with the present vacancies. During a session these 25 senators handle some 400 petitions for divorce, and the work has become so arduous that it has been necessary for the committee to divide itself into three and sometimes four sections. The members of the committee are all very capable legislators; they belong to other committees, such as the important committees on Banking and Commerce, Finance, Transport and Communications, and Immigration and Labour. They cannot be in two places at once. I submit that the abilities and qualifications of these senators cannot be used to their full advantage because their time is taken up with these sordid divorce cases. The mere fact that the committee is doing a good job is to me not essentially a primary reason why it should be continued. For instance, if a highly qualified surgeon, architect, artist or even—I almost said even a lawyer, but I withdraw that because the observation might be misinterpreted by so many of my capable colleagues who belong to the legal profession —if one of these highly qualified persons was reduced to the digging of ditches—a perfectly respectable and honourable occupation—and made a good job of it, would there be any merit in the suggestion that he should stay at it for his lifetime rather than do the things for which he was specially trained and qualified and which would be in the interest of both himself and his country?

I come to my friend's second reason, that the Exchequer Court is not the proper body to consider divorce cases from the province of Quebec. On that point I have only to say that at the moment this bill appears to propose the only practical way of ridding Parliament of divorce matters. I agree that the Exchequer Court is not the best place, but I think it provides a better way of dealing with divorce applications from Quebec than the present system does.

The last reason my friend gave, and one with which I disagree, was, why force this bill on the province of Quebec? My answer to that question is very simple. The bill does not force anything on Quebec or any other province. It might be regarded as forcing something on the judges of the Exchequer Court, but, after all, they are servants of Parliament. But what force is being used against Quebec, when all that the bill proposes to do is to let the Exchequer Court do what Parliament is now doing? I cannot see the force of my friend's objection. He did, however, make a statement, perhaps even a suggestion, that the courts of Quebec might be charged with dealing with divorce, as are the courts in the other provinces. On that suggestion, to my regret, he did not, in golfing parlance, "follow through" and recommend that this be done. To me, that seems the proper solution of the problem.

Incidentally, another reason why the Divorce Committee should be maintained has just occurred to me. This vagrant thought crossed my mind, and in expressing it I hope I will not offend the feelings of any members of the committee: It may be that they like the job. There is always a certain amount of human interest in the evidence that comes before the committee, and it may be an attraction—I have no one in mind when I say thus—like a signboard bearing the magic words "adult entertainment" outside a movie theatre.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I interrupt my honourable friend to say that I think that comment is rather unfair.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I do not think there is a single member of the committee who would not feel relieved and thankful if the job were taken off his hands.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I made the comment extemporaneously, and I said that I hoped no one would take offence from it. Apparently my honourable friend does object to it.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: "A little nonsense now and then—"

Hon. Mr. Euler: Thank you.

The senator from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Ross) made a proposal similar to that made by the senator from Toronto-Trinity, which to my surprise received the approval of the senator from Grandville. The proposal was that the courts of Quebec be authorized to take the evidence in the various cases and forward some sort of report to Parliament, which would then stamp—I almost said rubber-stamp—its approval and grant the divorces. I hope I have correctly represented my honourable friend's proposal. My objection to that suggestion is that Parliament should not be concerned with the matter at all. The cases should be heard in divorce courts in Quebec, as they are in the other provinces. If I may paraphrase the words of a great British statesman, I would say: Give the judges of Quebec the tools and let them finish the job.

In conclusion I say, in all good faith, that it seems to me the only remedy for the present situation is to empower the Quebec courts to deal with applications for divorce from that province so that all the people of Canada, majorities and minorities, will have the same rights, and the discriminations which now exist will disappear.

I find it very difficult to believe that, as was intimated by the senator from Grandville, it was really on behalf of the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec that the "gentlemen's agreement" was framed. I can hardly conceive that the people in that province who are justly entitled to divorce under the law of Canada would prefer to come to Ottawa, at much expense and inconvenience, rather than seek relief in their own province as do the people in other parts of Canada. I cannot see wherein there would be any violation of conscience if the people of Quebec had access to local divorce courts. In Ontario, for instance, people who are opposed to divorce, whether Catholics, Anglicans or others, and all who have any conscientious scruples against divorce, simply do not use the divorce courts. The same attitude might very well prevail in the province of Quebec.

For the reasons that I have stated, I intend to vote for the bill.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. W. Rupert Davies: Honourable senators, I am not going to make a long or important speech on this bill, but I wish to say a few words on it because I think it proposes a very important change. I feel I shall have to vote against the bill, and I would like to give my reasons.

Last year I supported the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill, which was introduced by the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), and I voted for it. I have not lightly decided that I must vote against the bill that is now before the Senate. It also was introduced by the honourable senator from Rosetown, for whom I have the very highest regard. He has given 20 years of sincere membership to the Divorce Committee, and for 10 years he was its chairman. For that reason the honourable senator's views are entitled to the greatest respect. Furthermore, I am glad to say that I count the honourable senator among my warmest friends in the Senate, and it really disturbs me to have to oppose him on this measure.

Frankly, honourable senators, I feel, perhaps in my ignorance, that our attack on the problem of the increase in divorce applications which come before the Senate Divorce Committee from Newfoundland and Quebec is being made in the wrong way. I know some senators will feel that I am presumptuous in saying such a thing. I am one who has never sat on the Divorce Committee. I have never been asked to sit on the committee, for which I am truly thankful. I did attend two of its sittings when I first came into the Senate, but I did not like what I heard there so I never went back. However, I have the very warmest admiration for those members of the Senate who sit on the committee and who give up four or five days each week to their onerous task. I appreciate very highly the work which they are doing. I do not know if they get any special credit for the extra time they devote to this work—

Hon. Mr. Haig: No, they do not.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Well, they should. At least there should be a provision that if any member of the Divorce Committee happens to exceed the 21 days allowable absence, every day of his or her attendance at the Divorce Committee when the Senate is not sitting should be counted in the senator's favour.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Davies: I realize that the number of divorces coming before the committee each year from Newfoundland and Quebec has grown so large that they present a real problem. The hearings take up a great deal of time. My feeling is, however, that if in the opinion of the Divorce Committee it is time Parliament, or in reality the committee itself, should be relieved of this heavy task we should deal with that problem first and separately. Then, if and when we decide that divorce petitions from Newfoundland and Quebec should be heard before some other tribunal we should try to decide what tribunal that should be, and pass on that recommendation to the House of Commons. I do not like the idea of arbitrarily deciding that if we feel a change is necessary that change must be the transfer of the cases to the Exchequer Court.

I have heard many of the speeches delivered on this bill, and those I did not have the pleasure of hearing I have read in detail. I was much impressed with the speech of the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly). I read with great interest the quotations from the discussions which took place on this difficult question during the Confederation debates.

There have been some references to the rights of minorities during this debate. I do not like forcing anything on minorities. Unfortunately we find it advocated all too often even in our democratic country. Because of my feeling in this matter I believe we should not pass legislation which would force on the people of Newfoundland and Quebec the necessity of going to the Exchequer Court when they wish to apply for divorce.

I know full well that there is a Quebec Protestant minority, many of whom no doubt belong to my own church, the Presbyterian. Many of these people do not object to divorce on religious grounds, although in the main they dislike divorce and prefer to avoid it wherever reasonably possible. This Protestant minority is, admittedly, entitled to some consideration. Its members may feel that when one of them wants a divorce he or she should have the privilege of seeking it in a proper court. This situation, perhaps, exists also in Newfoundland. It seems to me that if in either province the non-Catholic minority—because they are not all Protestants—feel they have a grievance in this regard they should make their protest through the senators from their own province.

The one point on which I am in agreement with the principle of the bill is that it should not cost a citizen of Quebec or of Newfoundland any more to obtain a divorce than it costs a citizen of Ontario or British Columbia. In a matter of this kind, over which the federal Parliament has jurisdiction, it seems to me that all Canadians should be treated exactly the same so far as costs are concerned. Perhaps it would be more correct to say, as regards Ontario, not that there are divorce courts, but that applications for divorce are heard by judges of the High Court at their regular sittings.

The honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) has referred to the way in which divorce jurisdiction was established in Ontario. I recollect very well the attempts made prior to 1930 through the press—not only by the press but in letters to the press—to have divorce jurisdiction conferred on the courts of Ontario. They have it today. But the province of Quebec does not want divorce courts. We were told so by the honourable senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard), and I assume he was speaking for the people of his province. Neither, I am informed, does the province of Newfoundland want divorce courts, although divorce as far as that province is concerned is not a pressing question. These two provinces object to divorce courts, and by the same token they would object, I believe, to having the marital problems of their citizens dealt with by the Exchequer Court. I do not see why Parliament should force upon them something they do not want, and because I hold that their wishes should be respected I am opposing this bill. In other words, it seems to me that honourable senators from provinces where divorce tribunals exist should not attempt to impose on other provinces some trial court which is not acceptable to them. I would not suggest for a moment any restriction on the voting privileges of any honourable senator, but it seems to me that we should try to be as considerate as possible of the convictions of majorities in particular provinces with whose views we do not agree. So it is a moot question, to my mind, whether honourable senators from provinces which possess divorce courts should endeavour to interfere as respects legislation which can affect only those provinces in which there are no divorce courts, and wherein there is no definite demand for them.

Speaking on this point a week ago today, the honourable senator from Grandville said, as reported in Hansard, page 503:

> But when the province of Quebec does not want divorce, why should it be imposed upon it? It is not the concern of any other province. People in other provinces can get divorces as they want them, and we in Quebec do not interfere.

May I say, with all respect to the honourable senator from Grandville, that that statement is not quite correct, because, when the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill was before this house last session 12 senators from Quebec province—which, as clearly stated in the bill, was not affected at all—voted against the measure. The vote for the bill was 20 against 37; but if the 12 had refrained from voting the bill would have been defeated by 5 only, instead of by 17. I agree in general with the honourable senator from Grandville, but, to quote an old saw, "What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander". If provinces having divorce courts should not interfere with Quebec, equally, it seems to me, honourable senators from that province might well refrain from intervening when a bill is before this house to relieve situations affecting divorce in provinces which possess such courts, a bill which would not affect Quebec at all. The great majority of Quebecers are Catholics, but of a total population of slightly over four million, half a million are non-Catholics, and of that minority 25,000 are French non-Catholics. I recognize that this minority of the minority in which Quebec stands to Canada as a whole can claim the right to have its own divorce actions heard before a court. But I think its case should be presented to this house through senators or members of parliament from its own province.

What we Canadians desire more than anything else for this country is unity. Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Robert Borden, the late Lord Bennett and the late Mr. Mackenzie King continually emphasized, when they held the high office of prime minister, the great need for unity. I have mentioned names revered in Canadian history, men who helped to build up our wonderful country. In my opinion, however, none of these great men eclipses our present Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, in the fervour with which he advocates on every possible occasion unity of the two major races.

We all want a united Canada. We do not want interprovincial strife nor religious strife. In this connection, I believe, the Canadian people are very broadminded. If we want to progress side by side we must be prepared to give as well as take.

I am sorry, honourable senators, that I cannot support Bill I-5. As I said earlier in my remarks, I believe that if the Divorce Committee feels we should take some action to remove from the federal Parliament divorce actions originating in Newfoundland and Quebec, the Senate should give serious consideration to the matter. But I cannot vote to force on these provinces a divorce court which they do not want; and I do not think it can be doubted that most of their people are opposed to the bill.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: What about the minority in Quebec? They want it.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Who has asked for it?

Hon. Mr. Davies: Have they asked for it?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Through their solicitors, yes.

Hon. Mr. Bradette: Produce the proof.

Hon. Mr. Davies: I am a militant continuing Presbyterian, and I don't care who knows it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Davies: But I repeat that, if a Protestant or non-Catholic minority in Quebec has a grievance, it should be presented to Parliament through properly constituted representatives in the Senate or the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Will the honourable senator tell us whether in his opinion the law would be changed if this bill were passed? For instance, were I a Roman Catholic living in Quebec, would I not be as free to apply to Parliament for divorce then as I am now?

Hon. Mr. Davies: I would not like to give an opinion on that. I do not know.

Hon. Mr. Haig: You had better answer that.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Why should I answer it? There are lots of brilliant legal lights in the Senate who could answer it, and you are one of them.

Hon. John P. Howden: Honourable senators, I have little argument to offer in this debate, because ample argument has already been made both pro and con. It is with a considerable degree of regret that I am going to vote against the bill, for over the years I have formed a warm regard for its sponsor (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). I of course have my reasons for not wanting to support the bill. First of all I think the Senate Divorce Committee is rendering a very fine service to the people of Canada. I feel that we are giving a better, more reasonable and more sympathetic service than is being given on divorce matters in the courts of the land. I think we have been able to convince people that we have done a fair, sympathetic and good job, so why change things when we are doing well enough? We have no idea in the world what would result if we were to adopt this measure.

With regard to the submission made by the honourable senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard), I do not think we would be acting fairly if we were to remove the existing divorce legislation from the statute books without first submitting the question to the people of Quebec. I believe that the citizens of Quebec look upon our divorce legislation rather favourably and I do not think it would be a bit fair to do away with it without putting the question to them in the form of a referendum. For this reason and because I feel we are doing a good, sympathetic and conscientious service, which apparently is satisfactory to everybody, I intend to vote against this bill.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, it is quite evident that the proposal advanced in the bill introduced by the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) has excited a good deal of interest in the house. Frankly, I had not intended to speak on this measure today but a few misconceptions have been advanced that should be dealt with as soon as possible.

My old friend of long standing from St. Boniface (Hon. Mr. Howden) has stated one reason he has for voting against the bill is that the Senate committee is doing an excellent job. I do not quarrel with that statement for a single moment. I think it is a matter of congratulation to the Senate that over the years its committees which have had to deal with this matter have done so in a most praiseworthy fashion. Divorce, of course. is a disagreeable matter but unfortunately we have to deal with disagreeable matters at times. The important thing here is to determine just what is the most effective method of dealing with this question. I grant at once that the divorce committees over the years, certainly since I have been in the Senate, have done excellent work. I doubt if you could find any judge in Ontario or even in a wider field who could deal with divorce more justly and ably than does the present Chairman of our Divorce Committee, (Hon. Mr. Roebuck).

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I think the same was true of his predecessor, the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine).

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: So my support of this measure is not based on any feeling that the Senate is doing the work inadequately. It is being adequately done. But I do wish to suggest to this house a few reasons why the measure is entitled to support.

Among these reasons I would put first those of a practical character. About 40 per cent of our membership in this chamber do not wish—indeed refuse—to serve on the Divorce Committee. I find no fault with that. I have not the slightest criticism to offer if among our colleagues there are those who for reasons of conscience—good and honest reasons—do not want to serve on the Divorce Committee. But this means in effect that the work of the committee has to be done by approximately three-fifths of our membership. There has been a tendency over the years for the number of divorce applications to increase, and today three subcommittees are required to sit almost continuously in order to deal with the applications. This means that the members of the committee are engaged when our other committees meet to deal with the various pieces of legislation that come before the Senate. What will happen if within three or five years we find ourselves faced with 600 divorce applications in a year? We will simply have to enlarge the membership of the committee to deal with them. If Parliament had not taken steps in, I believe, 1930, to have divorce petitions originating in the province of Ontario dealt with by Ontario courts and not by Parliament, as they had been previously, what would be our situation today? If we continue in this way we shall ultimately get ourselves into a situation that will be almost impossible to deal with. That is why, in looking ahead, I think it is important to take steps to deal with this matter now.

As pointed out very clearly by our colleague from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler), the bill does not in any way enlarge the grounds for which divorce can be granted. That has been carefully guarded against in the legislation. It therefore becomes merely a question of whether the Senate is to continue to deal with divorce matters, or whether we shall take steps to have them transferred to a court, where I think they should be dealt with.

I have every respect for my honourable friend from Grandville. I thought he made an excellent speech the other day, although I feel bound to say that a substantial part of his time was spent in discussing other matters than the measure before us. May I offer a suggestion here, publicly, to my honourable friend? I wish he would take part more frequently in our debates, for he is an eminent lawyer, and many matters which come before us in the form of legislation would benefit greatly by his contribution.

I want to put forward another thought for consideration, although it may not be regarded by those who are opposed to divorce as of much importance. If this measure became law and the responsibility of dealing with divorce matters were delegated to the Exchequer Court, the ground upon which divorce could be granted by that court would definitely be limited. That is not the case, theoretically, so far as Parliament is concerned. In Parliament an applicant for divorce presents a petition and asks that the petition be dealt with. What would happen if some day some one came along and presented a petition to Parliament asking for a divorce on the ground that the marriage had failed, or that one party was insane, or on any ground other than adultery? It is true that by convention and practice we have limited the granting of a divorce to one ground only, but there is nothing to prevent Parliament from accepting a petition on other grounds. The subject has a right to petition for redress. I suggest to my honourable friends from Quebec and elsewhere who are opposed to this bill that they might give careful consideration to that possibility. In Great Britain the subject of divorce was a matter of much contention for a long period of time, and it was only after years of agitation that the grounds were widened. Is it inconceivable that the Parliament of Canada also might at some future date widen the grounds? Personally, I have no opinion to offer on that point, but I suggest that since the individual subject can petition Parliament for divorce there is nothing to prevent the Senate from receiving a petition from an applicant asking for relief on grounds other than adultery, and nothing whatever to prevent the Committee on Divorce from considering that petition and, if it saw fit, reporting favourably upon it. I put that proposition forward as worthy of some thought.

My honourable friend from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies) advanced the argument that this bill might, in some measure, disturb the unity of Canada. I cannot follow the logic of his remarks in that respect. Why should it disturb the unity of Canada? I have too great respect for my honourable friend from Grandville and his fellow members from Quebec in this house, and for all those members who from conscientious conviction are opposed to divorce, to believe for one moment that if divorce jurisdiction were transferred from Parliament to the Exchequer Court the unity of Canada would be endangered. Heaven forbid that the unity of our vast country should be based only on that kind of consideration.

There is one other practical aspect to this question which I think deserves consideration. I can foresee the time when more and more of the time of the Senate and its members will have to be devoted to the work of the Divorce Committee, if divorce matters continue to be dealt with by Parliament. Can we throw out this business altogether? In my quiet moments I have considered the question whether Parliament can refuse to accept petitions for divorce; but if that were done it would run counter to another very important principle, namely, that the subject has the right to present a petition to Parliament, and as far as I am concerned I do not, in any sense, wish to deny him that right. Therefore, the practical aspect of the question will come before us more and more, whether we pass this bill now or not. Sooner or later we shall have to deal with it, and in my humble judgment the sooner we deal with it the better.

Hon. Norman P. Lambert: Honourable senators, the oral infection which has often emanated from the seats occupied by my honourable friends from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) and Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) has once again reached my place in the house and has compelled me to join in the discussion.

I am also impelled by a desire to pay my respects to the sponsor of this bill (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), because on two previous occasions I supported him in connection with bills for broadening the grounds for divorce. Had this bill been a third effort to that end, I should have had something quite different to say from the views which I am about to express. This bill deals exclusively with the legal machinery which would be used for handling divorce within the federal jurisdiction, and because it has that rather narrow and technical application I can see no good end to be served by supporting it.

The Exchequer Court, as at present constituted, is not, in my humble opinion, qualified to perform the function which this bill would place in its hands. Indeed, I doubt if any other court could be set up under federal jurisdiction which would not be handicapped by the same obstacles as is the Exchequer Court. At any rate, such a court would not be as well qualified to deal with the divorce work which comes before this house as is the present Divorce Committee of the Senate.

For now more than eighty years no one has successfully established any claim of incompetence or lack of ability on the part of the Senate Divorce Committee. Personally, during the time I have been a member of this chamber I have been most grateful to the senators who have served on that committee and have given so generously of their time and ability. It is easy for other senators to engage in academic debate on the subject.

I submit that in terms of national unity—and here again I cannot agree with my respected colleague from Churchill—the Senate Divorce Committee makes a greater contribution in the field in which it functions than does any other branch of Parliament. To support that view one has only to review the arguments that were put forward on this floor in previous years when the bills submitted by the senator from Rosetown were being debated. Until the time comes when the law is amended to deal with the question of divorce on broader grounds than at present, I think the existing machinery as represented by the Senate Divorce Committee should remain as it is.

Furthermore, in reply to the argument that members of the committee are kept so busy handling the cases that come before it that they cannot devote time to other deserving work of this chamber, the answer is I think quite obvious. That question was raised during the debate on a bill introduced by my honourable friend from Waterloo about a year ago to require the filling of seats in the Senate within six months of their becoming vacant. I do not think there is any argument at all to support the theory that if the Divorce Committee of the Senate were abolished it would mean a greater measure of interest and participation by the present members of that committee in the other work of the house. True, there is a lot of work to be done, but the reasons why it is not being done are obvious to anyone who cares to review the situation that has developed in recent years within our chamber and elsewhere.

Honourable senators, with some regret I say that I cannot support my honourable friend's bill, for the reasons which I have tried to place briefly before the house.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I would not have participated in this debate but to deal with one point I raised when the honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies) was speaking. The handling of the bill, I may say, is in the capable hands of the senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), and I know that on legal matters he does not need any help from me.

I asked the honourable senator from Kingston a question as to the effect of the passage of this bill on the present law; he replied that as he was not a lawyer he could not answer me. May I now tell him that the passage of this measure would not change the law one iota. People from Quebec who seek divorce could still make petitions to Parliament for relief, and this house would have to deal with them as it saw fit. As an alternative to coming to the Senate for a divorce, such people could go to the Exchequer Court.

May I say that whenever this house gets around to honouring the past chairmen of the Divorce Committee, they cannot pass me by. I was chairman for one day, heard one case and was fired. But I had the honour of serving as a member of the committee for a long time. I call to mind the first case I sat on as a member of the committee some twenty-one years ago. A woman had left her husband, gone to the United States and got a divorce, returned to Montreal and subsequently married another man. Her first husband, thinking her divorce was legal, married again in Montreal. About ten years later he went to draw his will and his lawyer questioned the status of his first wife. The man stated that she had been divorced in the United States, but the lawyer advised him that as the divorce decree had no legal effect in Canada she had better petition Parliament for a divorce. So she came before our committee. She was guilty of adultery, that was certain—her hands were black as coal. And then the man came in and consented to the divorce. His hands were black as coal as well. There were eight of us sitting on the committee and we recommended the divorce.

After the hearing was over I went to the chairman. I said: "I am a new man, Mr. Chairman; I did not say a word today, but that is not the way divorces are handled in my province and if any more cases like this come up I am going to object not only in committee but on the floor of the house". Then he told me the story behind the case and I kept silent.

This bill is no attempt at interfering with the rights of the majority or the minority in Quebec, or Newfoundland, or any other province. If we passed the bill we would simply be saying to the people of Quebec and Newfoundland, "You can go ahead and do as you are doing now, if you like, but if you want to have your divorce petitions heard in a court we are going to give you the opportunity of doing so."

As my honourable friend from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) said the other day, at the time the Confederation pact was entered into that right was provided for. My honourable friend from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) said that the passage by the Union Parliament in 1866 of a Civil Code article declaring the indissolubility of marriage was done at the request of the members from Quebec, but in answer to questions asked by me he admitted that the laws in those days were passed by Parliament for each province, that the members from each province would vote on a measure affecting their province and, if it carried, it was then submitted to the whole assembly and adopted by that body. That was the practice they evolved, because otherwise they could not have run the government of the country in those days. What the province of Quebec adopted in 1866 and was written into the British North America Act in 1867, was adopted at the request of the Protestant majority of the province of Ontario. They made the request because, as they said, Quebec wanted that protection. That is clear. That is the basic reason for that provision being in the law. In this bill we are not interfering with that, not touching it at all. We are leaving it absolutely alone. It stands, and will stand as it did on the 1st of July, 1867, when it became the law of Canada. What we are trying to say to the men and women from Quebec and Newfoundland who seek divorce is that they may apply to the Exchequer Court if they wish to.

Divorces granted in Canada have been increasing yearly. I have not the figures, but the honourable member from Rosetown will give them. During the first years of Confederation there were only two or three divorce petitions a year from the whole of Canada, but they gradually increased. Since 1930 the increase has been tremendous.

No divorces were granted in my province of Manitoba prior to 1930. It was only in that year that we discovered Manitoba had the right to grant divorces in virtue of the terms under which Manitoba entered Confederation in 1870. The Manitoba Act of that year provided that the laws of England as they existed in 1870 were to be the laws of Manitoba, and as England had a divorce law at that time the divorce law of England was enforceable in Manitoba. But nobody knew it then, not even the lawyers, and it was not until 1930 that we found out.

The reason for my speaking today is that I want to assure my friends who do not believe in divorce, my friends from not only Quebec but from every part of Canada, that this bill does not in any way do anything to affect existing divorce legislation, that whatever rights exist now will exist after the bill is passed, if it is passed. This bill does not interfere with one iota of the majority rights or minority rights in the province of Quebec. All it will do is give the people of that province a chance to go before a court if they seek relief by way of divorce.

The Chairman of the Divorce Committee (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) said that if the people of Quebec are satisfied with what is being done for them at present, why not let it be? But are the rest of us satisfied? The chairman and his associates on the committee are doing a good job. I know they are. But again I ask, are the rest of us satisfied? Senators from my province stay in Ottawa every week-end, until Tuesday night, doing nothing. The Senate sits Tuesday night, and Wednesday and Thursday afternoons, then adjourns until the following Tuesday night, and all because the Divorce Committee has to stay here to hear the evidence in divorce cases. Now, honourable senators, there is a limit to that kind of thing. I am prepared to work five or six days a week to do the business of our country, but I do not think that we should come here from all over Canada and wait around while twenty or twenty-five people present their divorce petitions. It is all done to satisfy the whims of people in that province who refuse to allow the minority in Quebec a way to obtain divorce other than through an act of Parliament.

Honourable senators can vote as they like on this bill. It makes no difference to me. I have been here since the 5th of January, except during the adjournment at Easter. Now, how many bills have come over here from the House of Commons this session? We have had the bill to provide short-term credit to grain producers in the west, the bill respecting payment of carrying costs of wheat reserves owned by the Wheat Board, and one or two small unimportant bills. And at present we are waiting for another bill to come to us. They are steam-rolling that bill through the Commons to get it over here as fast as they can.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: The pipe lines bill.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I did not mention pipe lines, I said "another bill". My point is this: I do not see why we should have 60 senators sitting around here from Thursday until Tuesday night, at the expense of the people of Canada, doing nothing.

Hon. Mr. Howden: There are not 60 members on the Divorce Committee.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Senators living in the provinces of Ontario or Quebec do not have to sit around here week-ends.

Hon. Mr. Howden: As I just mentioned, there are not 60 senators on the Divorce Committee.

Hon. Mr. Haig: There are 25.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: There are 25 senators on the committee, but not all attend. The number who attend is of the order of nine or ten.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But you will admit that there are 25 on the committee.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is true.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, they can be forced to attend.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask a question of the honourable senator regarding the situation which he has just described, the days of idleness and lack of occupation? Does he seriously attribute that situation to the sittings of the Divorce Committee?

Hon. Mr. Haig: I was on the Divorce Committee myself and I found that it would never sit unless the Senate was sitting. If the Senate were to adjourn on the first day of February because there was no business before the house and it was not to meet until the first day of March, you could not hold the Divorce Committee here during February. That was my experience. Maybe there were bad times when I was on the Divorce Commitee, but that was the situation then.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: That is not so.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes it is. Senators who come here from British Columbia, Alberta, and the other western provinces, as well as those from the Maritime provinces, have got to stay here day in and day out. We cannot leave; we cannot get home but must stay here to attend the sittings of the Senate. As I said, this does not apply to senators who live in Ontario or Quebec. They can leave for home on Thursday afternoon or evening and not come back until Tuesday afternoon or evening. It is a very good arrangement for them. But if it were not for the petitions to be heard by the Divorce Committee that situation would not arise.

If the legislative program is delayed, it is not through any fault of the Senate. With four parties represented in the House of Commons, long debates are inevitable. I had the honour and pleasure of being a member of the Manitoba Legislature at a time when all its members belonged to one or other of two parties, and at that time the sessions would last about six weeks. Later on, while I was still a member, there were four parties, and then the sessions never ended in less than four months. We see exactly the same result in the House of Commons. It is bound to occur, because each party has to put up its case, and one or more members of the other groups want to reply.

I have seen a great increase in the number of divorces in this country. Compare the total of applications last year with the number thirty years ago, and you will be astonished. Today there are as many applications in British Columbia alone, and nearly as many in Ontario, as came from all Canada in the old days. And the situation is growing worse, and we have to face it. Whose fault it is I do not know. It certainly cannot be blamed on an extension of grounds for divorce, because the one ground—adultery—has never been added to. Nor is it due to some alteration in Senate law or procedure. It seems that petitions are coming from classes of people who formerly would never have presented them. It is a symptom of the times we are living in, and, as one who has had some experience in this matter, having handled a great many cases, I have some knowledge of the reasons. Not that I approve of divorce. I thank God that none of my children who are married—and quite a few are—have sought divorce. I would hate to think any of them had the intention; and I am sorry for any friends of mine when I hear that their children are contemplating that step.

Nothing that the Roman Catholic church, the Anglican church or any other religious body has said in condemnation of divorce overstates the evil. I admit all this; and if I thought that mere opposition was any remedy I would oppose it with all my power; but opposition is not and cannot be the solution. From 1901, when as a young man I was in a law office, until 1930, only one application for divorce came before the firm. From 1930 to 1955 there have been, I suppose, on an average two divorce cases a week. Whatever the causes that have produced this change, they are unaffected by law. This bill does not suggest any cure. It does not pretend to do so. And in answer to a question from the honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies), whom I believe to be an honest and sincere man, I say that the position of Quebec is not affected one iota by this measure. All it seeks to do is to give the man or woman who wishes to sue for divorce the right to proceed before either the Senate of Canada or the Exchequer Court. The Exchequer Court is open ten months in the year; the Senate sits about five months.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Does my honourable friend assert that if an applicant goes to court the court will be bound to grant a divorce?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Not otherwise than as it has to give judgment now.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: The court will be bound to grant it if this bill goes through.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I have been on the Divorce Committee for many years. I have spoken of one case; I will now refer to another. A young man belonging to the Roman Catholic Church applied for divorce. His wife, also a Roman Catholic, appeared with him before the committee. We heard the case. It was stated that the wife had attended a party, had taken a drink or two, and afterwards committed an act of adultery, but that it occurred only once. As chairman of the committee I asked the husband, "Is there any evidence at all of another offence?" He said, "No, but I want a divorce". I said: "If my colleagues will agree, I would suggest that you and your wife, who both belong not only to the same religion but to the same church, go to your parish priest, tell him the facts, ask his advice, and take it. Will you do that?" They both said they would. Then, with the consent of my colleagues, I adjourned the case until the 4th of May following. The young man was a druggist, about 35 years of age; his wife was around 30; and they had two or three children. When the couple came back I asked the woman if she had gone to the parish priest. She said that she had. I said, "Did you tell him what I told you to tell him?" She said: "I told him I would be there on a certain day, with my husband, and I named the day, but my husband did not come. So I said to the priest, 'Father, my telephone number is such-and-such, and if he telephones I will come right over'." I then asked the young man: "What did you do? You told me you would go". He said, "I did nothing; it is none of your business"—or words to that effect. I said, "As far as I am concerned, no divorce will be granted". My colleague, who is here in the chamber, concurred; and the divorce was refused. A judge might have granted it, but I doubt it.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: He would have been bound to.

Hon. Mr. Haig: My honourable friend may be right, but often when I thought judges were "bound" to do certain things they did not do them.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: May I ask the honourable senator what all this has to do with the bill before us?

Hon. Mr. Haig: I was replying to the honourable senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard). That is the only reason I have spoken, other than to comment on the suggestion of the honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies), that the bill would effect some change. In my opinion there would be no change in the legal position of the people of Quebec.

In conclusion I would say that I do not think Canada as a nation will come to an end, whether the bill is rejected or whether it is passed. But I believe we have the opportunity of taking a progressive step to amend a situation which is troubling us more all the time. I hope that some action on our part will help Canadians better to understand the nature and extent of the problem.

Finally, let me say I do not know how any one who does not believe in divorce can sit in this house and vote for divorce bills. They say "on division". They will not serve on the committee, but I think they should, because there they would learn something about the problem involved.

Honourable senators, I am going to vote for the bill because, for one thing, I have a great respect for my honourable friend from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). He is one of the dearest friends I have ever had. I have a deep respect for his legal ability and the experience he gained on the Divorce Committee, of which he was a most distinguished member for many years. But my main reason for voting in favour of the measure is that I think it would help Canadians to understand this terrific problem of divorce, and help them to take a greater interest in solving it.

Hon. Felix P. Quinn: Honourable senators, I am not going to make a speech. When this bill was introduced I understood its object was to transfer divorce jurisdiction from the Senate to the Exchequer Court of Canada. I was of that opinion until hearing the remarks of the honourable senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig), but he said in effect that we would not be transferring jurisdiction from the Senate to a court but that both the Senate committee and the courts would function. Well, as I do not see the necessity for a second court I will have to vote against this bill.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hackett, the debate was adjourned.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce, Nos. 300 to 323, which were presented May 15.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the committee, moved that the reports be adopted.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

VILLA ST. LOUIS DISASTER

EXPRESSIONS OF SYMPATHY

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, before the motion for adjournment is put may I refer to the terrible tragedy that occurred last night near Orleans, a few miles from Ottawa, when an R.C.A.F. jet fighter crashed into a nuns' rest home I have no official details of what occurred, and I only know what I learned from radio newscasts. I understand that a CF-100 jet fighter plane had gone into the air to intercept an "unknown aircraft" and, after making its investigation, proceeded to take part in some training with another CF-100 fighter. As honourable senators are aware, the first-mentioned plane crashed into the rest home where a large number of ill nuns were sleeping. Many were killed and injured. The dead have left friends, relatives and dear ones behind, and I am sure the members of this house will join with me in extending to the bereaved our very deep sympathy.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, on behalf of my party I would like to join with the Leader of the Government in expressing sympathy to the friends and relatives of those who lost their lives in the tragedy last night. It is one of those things that happen in life and are difficult to account for; but that fact does not lessen the sorrow of the bereaved. I am sure we all sympathize deeply with them in their great loss.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, May 17, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

NATIONAL HOUSING BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 215, an Act to amend the National Housing Act, 1954.

The Bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall the bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With leave, next sitting.

PRIVATE BILL

CONSTRUCTION OF BRIDGE OVER ST. LAWRENCE RIVER NEAR TROIS-RIVIÈRES—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the report of the committee on Bill Z-9.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to whom was referred the Bill (Z-9) intituled: "An Act respecting the construction of a bridge over the St. Lawrence River near the city of Trois-Rivières", have in obedience to the order of reference of May 9, 1956, examined the said bill and now beg leave to report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall the bill be read the third time?

Hon. J. M. Dessureault: With leave, I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

FEDERAL EXPENDITURE IN PROVINCES

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR RETURN

Hon. John A. McDonald: Honourable senators, I desire to give notice that on Wednesday next I will move:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a return showing:

1. What was the total expenditure in each province of Canada for the fiscal year 1954-55, by the federal Government, including the statutory subsidy and tax rental agreement payments?
2. What was the total expenditure during the fiscal year 1954-55 in each province by each federal Government department and agency?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I may say to the honourable senator that I shall try to get the information as soon as possible.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate I move that when this house rises today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The motion was agreed to.

DOMINION CURLING ASSOCIATION

ALL CANADIAN CLUBS NOW MEMBERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. John P. Howden: Honourable senators, it is well known to all our members that the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) is an enthusiastic curler. For years he has attended meetings of curlers across Canada, and he has been endeavouring to have all the curling associations united in a single body. I understand that most of our societies had joined the general body. There were one or two exceptions in the east, principally in the Montreal area; but I have just received the glad news from the honourable senator that all these clubs have now joined the Dominion Curling Association, of which he was formerly the president, and a very active one. I am happy to give the house this information, and to add my congratulations.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I did not expect this. I thank the honourable senator from St. Boniface (Hon. Mr. Howden) very much for his kind references.

Twenty-seven years ago the curlers of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia set out to form a curling association for all Canada. Gradually the curling associations of Alberta, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and eastern Quebec—the section around Quebec City—came under the Dominion Curling Association, but the clubs in the Montreal district and the Ottawa Valley remained under the Royal Caledonian Curling Club of Scotland. Notwithstanding our strong desire that these clubs should join the Dominion Curling Association I earnestly requested our members not to approach them in this connection. Well, just two days ago they sent me an application for affiliation. I will be attending our annual meeting in Toronto tomorrow and I am confident that this application will be approved. It will mean that, with the exception of Scotland, Canada will be the only country in the world having all its curlers under one organization.

We hear a lot of talk about bringing people from various sections of the country closer together. There is nothing like a curling bonspiel to do this. It is really something for curlers from, say, British Columbia, to hear Quebecers using the French language on the curling rinks. Anyway, whether French or English is spoken, the rocks certainly seem to understand what to do.

Honourable senators, I am sure I speak on behalf of every curler in Canada when I say how delighted we are that the clubs from the Ottawa Valley and the Montreal district have seen fit to apply for membership in the Dominion Curling Association.

PRIVATE BILL

MARITIME STOCK BREEDERS' ASSOCIATION—THIRD READING

Hon. Charles G. Hawkins moved the third reading of Bill I-10, an Act respecting The Maritime Stock Breeders' Association.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

LIVE STOCK AND LIVE STOCK PRODUCTS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. J. Adélard Godbout moved the second reading of Bill I-7, an Act to amend the Live stock and Live Stock Products Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is not a very important piece of legislation. Its sole purpose is to bring the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act up to date with respect to chicks, poultry and hatcheries in certain provinces, especially as regards interprovincial trade.

At the outset it might be useful to explain that the law with respect to trade within the provinces will continue to apply after this bill is passed to seven provinces—that is, all provinces except Ontario, Quebec and Newfoundland. These seven provinces have asked that the federal law apply in their territories. Of course, the law will apply to all ten provinces as far as interprovincial or foreign trade is concerned.

The purpose of the first clause of the bill, which amends section 42 of the act, is to include hatching eggs in the reference to chicks throughout Part III of the act and to make provision for their inspection by federal officers. Since the section was first passed, some 20 or 25 years ago, much has been learned about the productive capacity of hatching eggs.

Under the second clause of the bill hatcheries which offer hatching eggs or chicks for sale would be relieved from the necessity of grading according to the existing federal standard. It is felt that federal grading is not applicable to modern conditions and does not correspond at all with what buyers expect from sellers of chicks or hatching eggs. However, the amendment reserves to federal officers the right to inspect the grading of R.O.P. eggs or chicks. "R.O.P." means "Record of performance."

Clauses 3 and 4 relieve the hatchery owner from the obligation of submitting advertising or other publicity material to the federal officers for approval. It is no longer considered necessary to submit such material for approval, as most hatcheries in Canada comply with the requirements of the federal officers more closely than they did twenty years ago. Passage of this bill would bring the law in line with modern trends.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask the honourable senator if the proposed changes in the act, as they affect hatching eggs and poultry, have the support of the various poultry organizations throughout Canada? My own province of British Columbia is highly developed in poultry matters, and I am wondering particularly if the organizations there support the proposals.

Hon. Mr. Godbout: Honourable senators, there is no doubt that the hatcheries throughout the country have asked for and support these improvements in the act, which has not been amended for perhaps 20 or 25 years. I am sure most of the larger hatcheries in British Columbia and Ontario are anxious that the law be amended as the bill proposes. Heretofore all advertising and publicity material has been submitted to the federal officers. There is no doubt that the capacity and integrity of the modern hatcheries are well above the standards required by the federal law. For instance, the present egg-grading requirements have little application to modern commercial practice.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Godbout: With leave of the Senate, I would move third reading now.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Honourable senators, the custom is to refer such bills to the appropriate committee. I am much interested in the poultry business, and I should like to have some explanations before I agree to the bill.

Hon. Mr. Godbout: Then, I would move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Natural Resources.

The motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. William H. Golding moved the second reading of Bill C, an Act to amend the Post Office Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a very simple bill, but it proposes an important amendment to the act. The purpose of the bill is to give sanction to a practice whereby the Postmaster General has transferred a contract from the actual contractor to another person at the request of the former, when the transfer was in the public interest and did not entail additional costs.

I am sure all of us who have represented rural constituencies in the other place will have some knowledge of this practice with respect to rural mail contracts. When a contractor takes ill, or when for some other reason he cannot carry on his contract, the Post Office Department has found it more convenient to transfer the contract than to call for tenders. However, it appears that recently the Department of Justice has expressed grave doubts as to the legality of this procedure. It is of course the desire of the Post Office Department to continue the practice, which has been found to be most satisfactory from the standpoint of a minimum disruption of service, the elimination of costly temporary arrangements, and the saving of time and expense involved in the invitation of tenders. The proposed legislation is intended simply to remove a doubt as to the legality of a long-established practice.

It has been the practice since Confederation to authorize the transfer of contracts for the conveyance of mail, entered into as a result of tenders, from one person to another under the existing terms and conditions, provided certain requirements are fulfilled. The requirements are that: (1) The contractor requests the change; (2) The person suggested is satisfactory; (3) The change is in the public interest; and (4) There is no increase in cost.

If the service and the rate have been satisfactory, such contracts have been renewed for a further term or terms in the same manner as other mail contracts. That is, a contract which has been transferred may on expiry be renewed at the same rate.

Transfers of mail contracts from one person to another, where the annual expenditure is $1,000 or less, have been negotiated by virtue of the authority invested in the Postmaster General under section 23 of the Post Office Act. The Department of Justice has expressed the opinion that the Post Office Act in its present form does not permit the Postmaster General to transfer a contract when the amount involved is $1,000 or more.

As far as the Post Office Department is concerned, the practice of transferring contracts under the conditions outlined has proved to be most advantageous. I have already mentioned that the advantages are a minimum disruption of service, the elimination of costly temporary arrangements, and the saving of time and expense involved in the invitation of tenders.

The circumstances in which contracts are transferred are as follows. In many cases the transfer is negotiated from the estate of a contractor to his widow or children. In most other cases the transfers are negotiated when the contractor sells his farm or business or when the contractor is in the hands of the sureties and the transferee is the person who has worked as courier.

As to cost, the average rate per mile per annum of the rural route contracts which were transferred was $60.24 per mile. The average rate obtained through the invitation of tenders during the same period was $70.03 per mile. Theoretically, a saving of $50,000 was effected by negotiating some 162 transfers of contracts for amounts in excess of $1,000 during the year ending September 30, 1954.

At the present time there are approximately 13,000 contracts for the conveyance of mails.

Hon. Mr. Davies: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Does this bill deal entirely with mail deliveries on rural routes, or does it include deliveries in cities?

Hon. Mr. Golding: I believe it deals with deliveries anywhere, but I have been speaking only about rural routes.

Hon. Mr. Davies: What is the maximum amount of a contract that may be transferred without the calling of tenders?

Hon. Mr. Golding: If this bill passes there will be no limit to the amount.

Hon. Mr. Davies: I don't like that.

Hon. Mr. Golding: During the twelve-month period from October 1, 1953 to September 30, 1954 the following transfers were authorized: under $1,000—303; over $1,000—162.

I think it is in the interest of the department to have authority to transfer contracts, and it wants to be sure that when making transfers it is acting within its legal rights. That is why the bill has been introduced.

If it is the wish of honourable senators that the bill be considered in committee, I shall be glad at the appropriate time to so move.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Do I understand that the department has been making transfers in the past but has only recently found out that it is not within its power to do so?

Hon. Mr. Golding: That is right. It was just recently that the Department of Justice indicated there is some doubt as to the legality of the practice which has been followed for a long time.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, this raises a question of some importance with respect to the Post Office Department. I think that most of you will recall that when the postal rates were raised a year or so ago the increase was said to be necessary because of the cost of implementing the 40-hour week and the increase in wages. A matter was brought to my attention last year which has particular reference to Toronto. During the very heavy Christmas rush at the post offices much overtime was required and many employees who wanted to spend Christmas with their families could not get sufficient time off to do so. In return for working overtime at Christmas the department allowed them time off at a later date. Honourable senators will appreciate that this practice is wrong in principle and an obsolete method of dealing with employees. It should be abolished at once. The worker should be paid for his services and not bartered with. The 40-hour week means just that, and overtime should be paid for in the proper way.

May I make this observation: overtime is not an incentive to the employee but is rather a penalty on the employer. If an employer was permitted to use overtime in that fashion he would be able to reduce his labour force. Private industry does not ask an employee to work overtime in the busy season in return for time off in the non-busy season, and the Government should be a model employer.

The normal practice is to pay time-and-a-half after eight hours in a day and 40 hours in a week, and double time on holidays. Whether the practice which was followed in Toronto last Christmas will be followed there again or in other places next Christmas I do not know, but I use this opportunity to serve notice on the Post Office Department that the view of at least one member of the Senate—naturally I speak for myself—is that if extra employees are required at Christmas they should be hired in the normal way. The practice of bartering with people who are in no position to barter, because their job may be at stake, is one that should be brought to an end very quickly.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, I hope this bill will go to committee. As to the remarks just made by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll), may I say that it is difficult to see what overtime has to do with this bill. In any event, his statement that overtime is entirely a penalty on the employer is too sweeping, for there are trades where overtime is an incentive to the worker. I know whereof I speak. Overtime is not entirely a one-sided thing today. I say that without fear of successful contradiction.

Honourable senators, since I first came to Ottawa, in 1930, I have known of no Government measures that have generated more discussion than bills dealing with rural mail carriers. I doubt if there has been a session in which many members of the other house did not speak about rural mail carriers. Many, naturally looking for votes, have advocated putting all mail carriers on a salary or wage basis. Now, anyone who has ever looked into the matter must realize how difficult an undertaking that would be. There are some rural mail routes on which the scheduled delivery is once a week. On other routes a man uses a horse or dog-team most of the time and delivers mail to perhaps 25 persons twice a month. And all across this country, of course, there are districts where mail is delivered six times a week. As a member of the other house I represented the most populous of all the districts in Canada which had rural mail routes. On one rural route in my district there were 650 mail boxes. Even today there are in the district mail routes with as many as 425 mail boxes, a fact which indicates the great congestion of population there.

Now, if you take a rural mail carrier who has his own car to service as many as 650 or 425 mail boxes and compare him with a carrier, probably a local merchant, who delivers mail once a week or twice a month, you realize what a great gap there is between the two. An illustration such as this helps one to see how difficult, if not almost impossible, it would be to place all rural mail carriers under a standard wage or in the Civil Service.

All through the years tenders have been called for the servicing of rural mail routes. That comment brings me to the particular point I want to mention. I am sorry that I did not bring with me this afternoon the correspondence that I have in connection with a certain case, and I am asking that the bill be referred to committee so that I may there draw the attention of the authorities to this case. It has to do with a route in the disrict where I live. Tenders were called for and some ten or more bids were submitted. Following the negotiations, and the award of the contract to the lowest tender, which is the necessary consequence of our tender system, the person to whom the contract had been given withdrew. The man who put in the second lowest tender expected that he would get the contract, and what was his astonishment to find that it went to an outsider who had never tendered at all. Naturally he wanted to know how this came about. Writing to me, he said: "I was the next lowest tenderer; why should I not have been asked to tender again?" So when I came to Ottawa I took up the matter with the department, which made inquiry of the Vancouver head office. The reply received was that the office in Vancouver had never been informed of the list of tenderers, and as the mail had to be kept going departmental officers went out and selected a man in the district who was willing to do the work. Cases of this kind could be easily rectified, I suggest, if the authorities here would notify local offices which are directly handling rural mail that under such circumstances the person who submits the second lowest tender should at least be given an opportunity to carry on the work. I am pleased that this bill will be considered in committee, because when the officials are there I can produce the correspondence. Nothing can be done about it now, but I thought it well to make the matter public in this way.

As one honourable senator, in speaking to this motion, introduced a topic unrelated to any provision of the bill, I hope nobody will tell me I am out of order if I mention something else which is not directly in point. I am not saying it in an "evangelical" way, but in as kindly a fashion as I can. I am one who takes some interest in philately—to the uninitiated the collection of stamps. There has been considerable talk and agreement among philatelists that from a pictorial point of view recent issues are not up to the standard of ten years ago and earlier. I do not mention this in a spirit of carping criticism; I do not know who is responsible, but I hear these remarks everywhere. One has only to look at a certain recent issue to be forced to ask what kind of an animal it is supposed to represent. It is hard to tell.

Hon. Mr. Haig: A goat.

Hon. Mr. Reid: A few years ago Canada was producing some of the most attractive stamps that could be found anywhere. Why are our standards declining? Does the fault lie with our artists, or with those who choose the designs? I think others will agree with this criticism.

Hon. W. Rupert Davies: Frankly, honourable senators, I do not like this bill at all. It amounts to this: the Post Office Department admits that for years it has been doing something illegal, and it is now asking us to condone what I do not think it should be allowed to do. If someone who holds a contract for a rural route gives it up, surely the job should be thrown open to tender. I am not greatly impressed with the suggestion that, by not doing so, a few hundred dollars may be saved. The point is, this is Canada, and the money the department is spending is the taxpayers' money, not the money of the Liberals, the Conservatives, the C.C.F.'ers, or any other party; so if someone gives up his contract the appointment should be thrown open to everyone who may want to tender. If we approve what this amendment apparently means, it would seem that local politicians, postmasters, or any one else in authority can pick out someone, notwithstanding that half a dozen others may want to do the work, and perhaps would do it at a saving, and tell him, "You can have this contract from now on". It seems to me that from this point of view we should give serious consideration to the bill before we consent to pass it.

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor: Honourable senators, as one who, down through the years, has had a good deal of experience with regard to rural mail contracts, I wish to compliment the mover of the second reading on the fair manner in which he has presented the bill. I cannot agree at all with the honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies). It is clear from the bill that there will be no increased cost to the Government, and certainly the rural mail box holder will be saved considerable inconvenience. The Post Office Department is asking authority if a contract-holder dies suddenly and he has a widow or son able to carry on the work, to transfer the mail contract held by the head of the family to another member, or perhaps to some other person, and thus ensure uninterrupted service. If, on the other hand, the department were to adopt the course suggested by the honourable senator from Kingston and call for tenders, the service would be held up, and perhaps in the end there would be increased expense to the taxpayers.

Hon. Mr. Davies: On the other hand, money might be saved.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Not very often. The department would already have gone through the operation, a year or two earlier, of calling for tenders. Having accepted the lowest tender—for that is the rule of the department—it would be merely transferring the contract at the same figure. Therefore I say the arrangement gives a good service to the people at large and entails no additional cost to the taxpayers.

I am in accord with the general principle of the bill. If we approve of what the officials have been doing, and there is some doubt as to their legal right to do it, I certainly think we should remove the doubt and give them the necessary authority to carry on.

I will not refer now to the remarks made by the honourable senators from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) and New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid). At some other time I may deal with some comments of the honourable senator from New Westminster. I think that he is—if I may use the expression—entirely "off the beam".

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: So is the honourable member from Toronto-Spadina.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Well, I would not say that. There are differences of opinion with regard to hours. It is not unusual in the operation of firms and other organizations for an employee to be told, in the busy season, "If you will put in a little extra work now, we will give you an additional week during a dull period". So when an employee has given the Post Office exceptionally good service, say around the Christmas season, and has worked overtime—which a good many persons like to do—he may be allowed an extra week in the fishing season or at some other time when things are slack.

I repeat that I am in accord with the general principle of the bill.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, my friend from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) drew a distinction between "evangelical" and "kindly". I took it to mean that evangelism is not kindly, and as I was charged recently in this house with being "evangelical" I now take strong exception to the accusation.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I want to compliment the sponsor of the bill on the exceedingly clear and comprehensive explanation he has given of it. He did it very well, and I think we should appreciate the fact. But I hope the bill will be sent to committee, because from various remarks which perhaps were not entirely pertinent it appears that a good many questions could be asked of representatives of the department. The senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) said there was one person in the house who did not altogether agree with the overtime methods employed by the department. Let me say there are two such members here.

There is a good deal to be said on both sides with respect to the relationship between employer and employee. Most of us get along very nicely with those we hire and have no arguments at all. However, where there is a large number of employees, such as in the Post Office Department, certain principles must be carefully followed in order that the rights of both parties may be protected and duly observed.

My friend from Toronto-Spadina said that overtime is a penalty on employers. I do not know just what he meant by that, but I do not agree that long hours in busy seasons and short hours in non-busy seasons should be a rule of employment in big institutions. That is not in line with the principle of the eight-hour day. I think the senator from New Westminster said that overtime is a blessing to many employees. That is true, but not free overtime or overtime when it is convenient to the employer and short hours when it may or may not be convenient to the employee. That is a case of "heads I win, tails you lose". Overtime is a blessing to the employee only when he is paid for it, not when he gives it practically free. It may be a real blessing if wages are low and it enables the employee to raise his living standard. We may be able to discuss this question in committee with the senior officials of the Post Office Department, but in principle I agree with my friend from Toronto-Spadina that as a general rule it is not right for employers of large groups of workers to disregard the principle of the eight-hour day in favour of long hours in busy times and short hours in non-busy times. That does not represent a square deal.

With regard to the assignment of contracts, as a matter of contract law agreements that are not personal in character are assignable by the parties. If I hire a doctor he cannot transfer his privileges and obligations to somebody else without my consent, for it is a personal contract. Contracts of employment are personal contracts and are not assignable, but contracts of a general character where the personal skills or virtues of one side or the other are not involved, are assignable as a matter of right by one party without the consent of the other. I would presume that a contract for the carrying of mail is not a personal but a general contract and, according to common law, assignable.

The only reason why the Postmaster General has not been able to assign certain contracts in the past was that he had to act according to the strict letter of the Post Office Act, which apparently did not give him this power. However, he is not asking for more in this regard than is the ordinary right of every contractor of a private nature. I see no reason for denying him this power which he has exercised in the past.

Hon. Mr. Haig: If I make a contract with a man he cannot assign it to someone else.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: If it is a general contract he can.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Not unless the contract contains a specific provision permitting him to do so.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, the contract has not got to contain such a provision. This is very old law, which perhaps you and I have not read since we were at school. I stand ready to be contradicted by the honourable senator, but my memory of the old fundamental law, as in Hansen, is that you can assign a contract which has no personal features but not one which has personal features. I think these contracts for the carrying of mail are general and not personal contracts, but I may be wrong. As I said, it has been a long time since I have read this law. Evidently the Postmaster General thought that under the Post Office Act he had the right to do what he has been doing, and no doubt there has not been objection from anybody. If the carrying out of a contract is interrupted, why should the minister not transfer the burden or privileges to someone else? These are short contracts, so why should it be necessary to call for tenders again to ensure a reasonable deal for the public, when tendering has already been done, and perhaps quite recently? There does not seem to be the slightest objection to giving him the power to substitute one contract for another when all three parties agree, and when the public has been protected by the calling of tenders in perhaps the very recent past. I must say that at this stage I am in favour of the bill.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, my friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) referred to personal contracts. Well, practically every contract is a personal contract. If I make a contract to build a house I cannot assign the work to somebody else. If I take a contract to deliver mail on some rural route I cannot transfer that obligation to somebody else, for according to the law I am the only person who has been entrusted to deliver that mail. I agree with the honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies). I do not blame the Post Office officials for what has happened. They have transferred contracts, without calling for tenders, when the amount involved has not exceeded $1,000. I do not think anybody ever checked on this and the practice just went on. Back in the days when the limit was fixed at $1,000 that probably was considered a lot of money. I remember when $1,000 was an awful lot of money. I used to teach school for $420 a year. I was a pretty fair teacher too, being rated as a second-class professional teacher. If a principal got $1,000 a year everybody thought he was a pretty big man. Indeed, it has only been in the last fifteen or twenty years that $1,000 has not seemed like a large amount. When I first came to this house, 21 years ago, the sessional indemnity was $4,000 a year. That amount purchased as much in goods then as $8,000 purchases today.

I make no accusation against the Post Office Department. My relationship with the Deputy Postmaster General, in particular, has been most happy. Some people say he is not the greatest deputy minister in the service, but in my opinion he is one of the greatest. He has an abundance of common sense, and that is useful to him in the performance of his duties.

Honourable senators, I think this bill should go to committee. I also think it ought to be made clear to the Post Office authorities that if they award a contract for delivery of mail for, say, $4,000 on Route 19 assuming that is the lowest tender and a year or two later the contractor wants to transfer the contract to somebody else, we do not think the department should say the other fellow can take it and do what he likes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: The bill says if "no additional expenditures involved."

Hon. Mr. Haig: The trouble with that practice is that no chance is given for a new tender to come in. In Manitoba, if a man has a route it is hard for anybody else to come in. I do not like to give a government official the power of selecting someone to succeed a person who happens to give up his contract. I think the contract should be open to tender. The Winnipeg School Board, the City of Winnipeg, the Province of Manitoba, and I think all other public bodies in the dominion, call for new tenders when a contract is given up. Of course, I quite realize that in certain cases, such as the construction of a building which demands urgent completion, it might be disastrous to halt the work for even a moment and the Government might find it necessary, if the existing contractor could not continue, to appoint a new one.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Would it not also be a disaster in the case of mail delivery?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, it would not happen so often. I do not like the idea of anybody having the right to say that the contract should be passed on to somebody else. I am a city man, although I was brought up in the country, and I know there is more fighting in politics over the rural mail routes than anything else. In Manitoba there is often a big row about somebody else taking on a contract. I say that when a man has quit his contract a new tender should be called for.

Honourable senators, I think this bill should go to committee, where the proper officials could be present and the matter fully discussed.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, since hearing what has been said here today, I quite agree that this bill should go to committee.

I do not intend to enter into a discussion as to whether some personal contracts are assignable and others are not. Probably the general statement made by the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) is correct, but in any event we know that the contract in question is assignable. The Government has not only recognized the assignment but has extended the term at the expiration of the contract, though it had no power to do so. The bill asks for that power in future.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Not to extend the contract?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, at its expiration.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: After its expiration the contract can be extended.

Hon. Mr. Haig: At the same rate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: At the same rate, but at no additional expense.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: The department is doing that now.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, it is doing that now.

Now, the question has arisen as to whether a contract of this type should be assigned. If a contractor died his son might want to carry on the contract. In such a case would anyone suggest that the son should not be given the right to carry on the contract?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Or his personal representatives.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, or his personal representatives. I might point out that these contractors are under bond, and they cannot assign a contract to anyone they like; the person to whom it is assigned must be acceptable to the department. He must be of good character, of some substance, and one who can be trusted.

With respect to continuing the contract of an assignee, may I point out that in many cases an assignee has gone to considerable expense to get equipment to complete the contract. Suppose a contract had only two years to run, and the new man had to get equipment and probably give up some other job. If he renders good service to the community should he not have the same right to have the contract extended as did the original contractor? I would also point out that the new contractor receives less money for carrying out this contract than those who had tendered, except the man who actually got the contract.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Does the leader not think that this might possibly lead to nepotism?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It has not so far, and I cannot imagine that it will. The practice has proved to be very satisfactory throughout the country; there have been no complaints with respect to assignees continuing the work, and I do not think the business of the Post Office Department could be carried out in the manner expected of it unless it had the power that is being asked for in this bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Golding, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

EXCHEQUER COURT (DIVORCE JURISDICTION) BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE POSTPONED

On the Order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Aseltine, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hodges, for the Second Reading of Bill (I-5) intituled: "An Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act".—(Hon. Senator Hacket).

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, with the consent of the house I would ask that this order stand until Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien (Acting Speaker): The order stands until Wednesday next.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce, Nos. 324 to 337, which were presented on May 16.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Committee, moved that the reports be adopted.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

BILLS—SECOND READINGS

Hon. Mr. Roebuck moved the second reading of the following bills:

Bill U-11, an Act for the relief of Marcel Alban St. Amour.

Bill V-11, an Act for the relief of Grace Elizabeth Browning MacDonald.

Bill W-11, an Act for the relief of Mary Carol Devone Henry Scott.

Bill X-11, an Act for the relief of Stanley Mira Levene, otherwise known as Stanley Mira Francis.

Bill Y-11, an Act for the relief of Alice Isabel Christian Thompson.

Bill Z-11, an Act for the relief of Czarna Landzman Desmarais.

Bill A-12, an Act for the relief of Real Perras.

Bill B-12, an Act for the relief of Andrea Marietta Hiekisch Farago.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the second time, on division.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Next sitting.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 22, at 8 p.m.

67513—36

THE SENATE

Tuesday, May 22, 1956

The Senate met at 8 p.m., Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien, Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 338 to 344, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, I beg to give notice that it is my intention to ask the following questions of the Government on Thursday next:

(1) In agreeing to the relocation of a different route of the Trans-Canada Highway in that part of British Columbia between the Pattullo Bridge and Abbotsford, and on sections between Abbotsford and Bridal Falls, what proportion of costs for the proposed relocation of these sections will be undertaken by the Dominion?

(2) What amount of moneys has already been paid by the Government to the Province of British Columbia on the present designated Trans-Canada Highway on the sections recently agreed upon for relocation between the Pattullo Bridge and Bridal Falls?

(3) In the event of the Government having agreed, or decided to assume a percentage of the costs involved in relocating and building these new sections of the Trans-Canada Highway, is it the intention of the Government to take into consideration the amount of money already paid to the provincial Government for the present sections now in use, which will be abandoned as part of the Trans-Canada Highway following completion of the new proposed sections?

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I do not propose on this occasion to make any reference to the matter raised by the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid), but I should like to know when I may properly do so. Will it be in order to discuss the subject when the question has been answered?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I think my honourable friend will have plenty of opportunity in the very near future to take up the question.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Thank you.

DIVORCE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Hon. Mr. Roebuck presented the following bills:

Bill C-12, an Act for the relief of Barbara Mary Elliott Priestley.

Bill D-12, an Act for the relief of Nancy Elizabeth Theresa Butler Waugh.

Bill E-12, an Act for the relief of Robert James Clarke.

Bill F-12, an Act for the relief of Veronica Rose Latter Haworth Robinson.

Bill G-12, an Act for the relief of Billie Mae Margaret Taylor Dennis.

Bill H-12, an Act for the relief of Naida Donnithorne St. James.

Bill I-12, an Act for the relief of Alma Elizabeth Mackie Wahlberg.

Bill J-12, an Act for the relief of William Maguire.

Bill K-12, an Act for the relief of Anne Perley-Robertson McNicoll.

Bill L-12, an Act for the relief of Colette Palardy Loranger.

Bill M-12, an Act for the relief of Esther Kathleen Hamilton Williamson Maynard.

Bill N-12, an Act for the relief of Helga Maria Berger Pilgrim.

Bill O-12, an Act for the relief of Ruth Carol Friedman Allen.

Bill P-12, an Act for the relief of Joseph Thomas Evans.

Bill Q-12, an Act for the relief of Marie Jacqueline Carmen Van Troyen Morin.

Bill R-12, an Act for the relief of Hazel Wilhelmina Langtry Kimpton.

Bill S-12, an Act for the relief of Sergei Vermala.

Bill T-12, an Act for the relief of Stanley Tom Wood.

Bill U-12, an Act for the relief of Amelia Alice Stefani Schofield.

Bill V-12, an Act for the relief of Bridget Rowley McHale Bowman.

The bills were read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: With leave, next sitting.

THIRD READINGS

Hon. Mr. Roebuck moved the third reading of the following bills:

Bill U-11, an Act for the relief of Marcel Alban St. Amour.

Bill V-11, an Act for the relief of Grace Elizabeth Browning MacDonald.

Bill W-11, an Act for the relief of Mary Carol Devone Henry Scott.

Bill X-11, an Act for the relief of Stanley Mira Levene, otherwise known as Stanley Mira Francis.

Bill Y-11, an Act for the relief of Alice Isabel Christian Thompson.

Bill Z-11, an Act for the relief of Czarna Landzman Desmarais.

Bill A-12, an Act for the relief of Real Perras.

Bill B-12, an Act for the relief of Andrea Marietta Hiekisch Farago.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the third time, and passed, on division.

CANADA SHIPPING BILL

COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to Bill H-7, an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen moved that the amendments be concurred in.

He said: Honourable senators, perhaps I should offer a word of explanation to the Senate on the amendments suggested by the committee to this bill. It will be recalled that the bill was explained on second reading by the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris), and an extended discussion followed which gave evidence of the fact that this was quite an important and, in some respects, even a controversial bill. Your committee found that to be the case, for it held three long sittings and heard a great number of representations. Our consideration of the bill was divided into two rather separate and distinct parts. The bill contains a large number of amendments to the Canada Shipping Act, some of minor, and one or two of major importance. The one which aroused most discussion and resulted in our first recommendation for a change would amend section 114 in such a way as to empower the Governor in Council to make regulations requiring masters and mates of fishing vessels to hold certificates of competence. So far, there has never been such a requirement with respect to masters and mates of fishing vessels, and a good deal of objection was taken to the proposed amendment. That objection came principally, I think, from the members of the committee who come from the Maritime provinces, and who, I must say, by their knowledge of this subject, and all other subjects relating to shipping, gave the committee a great deal of assistance. We heard the deputy minister, and we heard the secretary of the association which represents the fishing industry.

After those representations, and a good deal of discussion, we have recommended that this section of the bill be struck out. It was obvious that there was a feeling, even among certain representations of the fishing industry itself, that a time might come when it would be necessary to require masters of fishing vessels to obtain certificates. But this will be a matter of rather prolonged education and negotiation between the department and the industry itself. We felt the time had not arrived, and no special reason was given us to show that the time has arrived, when the Governor in Council should be given power to require masters and mates of fishing vessels to obtain licences. That was the only amendment suggested to all the provisions of the bill relating in a general way to the proposed amendments to the Canada Shipping Act.

The second topic, and one which took up a great deal of the time of the committee, was a very interesting one relating to the subject of oil pollution of the sea. As honourable senators will recall from the speech by the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris), section 26 of the bill gives the Governor in Council power to make regulations to enforce the International Convention for the Prevention of Pollution of the Sea by Oil, 1954. That convention is set out as a schedule to the bill and, if approved, will appear as the Fourteenth Schedule to the Canada Shipping Act.

A great deal of discussion took place on the subject of oil pollution and on the terms of the international convention. Honourable senators from the eastern seaboard urged strongly that the convention in its present form does not give sufficient protection to the fishing industry on the east coast from pollution of the waters of the Atlantic Ocean by oil, because it provides for an area of only fifty miles outside the territorial waters within which ships are forbidden to discharge oil; whereas, for some of the European countries which signed this convention the limit within which ships are not allowed to discharge oil is much greater than fifty miles.

However, I think as a whole the committee felt that half a loaf is better than no bread. We have no international convention at the present time with respect to this very important subject, which is becoming one of great interest and urgency; and it was felt that Canada should become a party to this convention, in the hope that perhaps within the next two or three years after it has been ratified by the necessary number of countries we may be able to improve and tighten it up so as to give our fishermen on the Atlantic coast better protection than they would receive under the convention in its present form.

The committee did make an amendment to section 26 of the bill to carry out the suggestion made by the honourable senator from Vancouver South when he moved second reading of the bill. He pointed out that although this convention is attached as a schedule to the bill, in its then form the bill did not state that the Parliament of Canada approves of the convention. We therefore amended section 26 to provide in terms that the Parliament of Canada approves of this international convention which, as I have said, appears as a schedule to the bill; and we authorized the Governor in Council to make regulations not inconsistent with the terms of the international convention for the purpose of carrying its provisions into effect.

Honourable senators, I think that is all I need say in explanation of the committee's amendments.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: May I ask my honourable friend if any specific reason was advanced as to why the distance of 50 miles offshore was chosen?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Yes. One of the most important countries whose assent is essential if the convention is to have any real force is, of course, the United States of America. We were told that the United States shipping interests were very much averse to having any limit at all—in other words, they wanted to be allowed to discharge their oil wherever they wished—and that it was only possible to get the United States to agree to become a party to the convention by restricting the limitation on the discharge of oil to 50 miles along the Atlantic coast.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Would the honourable gentleman say if he has been informed of any diplomatic intercourse concerning the extension of this limit to 100 miles off the United States shore? This was referred to in a dispatch which I read in the New York Times of yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Nothing of that kind was brought to our attention.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendments were concurred in.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Next sitting.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. A. K. Hugessen moved the second reading of Bill 216, an Act to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the Senate will recall that in the year 1951 Parliament passed the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act, which in general terms set up the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority for the purpose of constructing, in conjunction with its counterpart in the United States, a deep sea shipway from Montreal to Lake Erie. The present bill contains a number of amendments to that act. For the most part these amendments are required owing to one condition which exists in connection with the seaway. That condition has relation to the bridge over the St. Lawrence River near the town of Cornwall.

Many years ago, I think in the late eighties or early nineties of last century, the New York Central Railroad Company built a branch from the northern part of the state of New York to the city of Ottawa, and of course the branch had to be constructed, over the St. Lawrence River, in the vicinity of the town of Cornwall. The bridge which carries this railway is in two parts: the southern part crosses over from the United States to Cornwall Island, in the course of which it crosses the International boundary; the northern part crosses from Cornwall Island to the mainland of Canada, entirely within the dominion. It is with the first or southern part of this bridge that a question now arises. It has been found necessary to remove this bridge, in the interest of navigation when the seaway is constructed.

This is apparently the only bridge in the vicinity which crosses the St. Lawrence River. Quite a number of years ago—I do not know when—arrangements were made for this bridge, primarily a railroad bridge, to be used also for vehicles and passengers, and a private company was set up, known as the Cornwall International Bridge Company, which leased the bridge from the New York Central Railroad Company, for the purpose of sending roadway traffic over the bridge at such times as it was not being used by the railway. I understand it is not wide enough to be used for both purposes at the same time, but that very few trains pass over it.

Now, it has been found necessary, as I say, to remove this bridge; and the intention is to replace it by another bridge about a mile away, I think, at a part of the river which rather strangely is called Pollys Gut. The principal purpose of the bill now before the Senate is to give the necessary authority to the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority to bridge Pollys Gut, and if honourable senators will follow the bill with me they will see in what respect it achieves the object which I have endeavoured to explain.

In its first section it amends section 10 of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act by authorizing the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority to acquire either alone or in conjunction with its counterpart in the United States shares or property of any bridge company operating and managing bridges. That would permit the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, if it can do so, to acquire the shares of the Cornwall International Bridge Company, which will have to be acquired in some way because that company has rights which would have to be either acquired or expropriated. This section permits the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority to acquire all the property necessary to build the proposed bridge.

Section 3 contains the specific authority which the proposed new section 14A of the bill grants to the Authority to construct, maintain and operate a bridge over Pollys Gut, with all necessary approaches and facilities.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Any suggestion to change the name?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: No. Perhaps the house would welcome an amendment from my honourable friend.

Section 4 amends section 15 of the act by authorizing the Authority to establish tolls for pedestrians or vehicles using the bridge.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Does my honourable friend know of any other place in Canada where pedestrians are charged tolls to cross a bridge?

Hon. Mr. Bradette: Yes; in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I think there are quite a number.

Section 5, although it does not say so in specific terms, also relates essentially to this particular project. It is proposed thereby to add to the present act a provision that authorizes the American counterpart of the Seaway Authority, known as the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation or other similar authority in the United States, acting in conjunction with our own Authority, to do whatever may be necessary in Canada for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of the act. That is necessary because, as honourable senators will realize, the international boundary goes down the middle of the river. Our Authority may have to do things on the United States side and the American Authority may have to do things on our side in the course of the construction of the bridge. I understand, in fact it has been suggested, that one of the ways by which the bridge may be built is that the Canadian Authority shall build the whole of the substructure and the American Authority shall build the whole of the superstructure. In any event, it appears that a provision of this kind is necessary under the circumstances which I have described.

Section 7, although again in general terms, relates to this specific problem. It permits the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority with the approval of the Governor in Council to incorporate subsidiary companies for the purpose of carrying on any of the operations which the Authority might itself carry on. It is altogether likely that if this power is granted, advantage will be taken of it to form a separate corporation for the purpose of operating this bridge, and that for this reason. Primarily, of course, the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority is a seaway body, and the tolls which it levies for the seaway have relation to that and that only, whereas the tolls that it might levy on a bridge would be something quite different; in that respect it would be acting as a highway authority and would have to levy the tolls applicable for a highway bridge of that nature and character.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask a question with reference to the tolls? Ordinarily, within a country, transportation rates are subject, I believe, to the Board of Transport Commissioners. As this is an international matter, will there be any control of rates, and if so, by whom?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I do not believe there is any authority in the Board of Transport Commissioners to govern rates on road bridges. Of course it would have the right to govern rates in so far as the railway uses a new bridge.

Hon. Mr. Euler: But this structure will be international in nature. The Canadian board would have no authority over the American end of it, would it? What authority would control?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I do not know that I can answer that question. Of course the tolls would have to be settled as between the Canadian Authority and the American Authority, and I suppose they would be such as both Authorities would consider to be sufficient to provide for the cost of maintaining the bridge, and at the same time attracting more traffic.

Hon. Mr. Horner: That problem may diminish when the Americans own the whole thing!

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: In any event, I have stated the principal reason for the bill.

There are a few proposed amendments to the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act which do not deal specifically with this particular bridge. There is the right to authorize the Authority to procure the incorporation of subsidiaries. Also there is a provision that the Navigable Waters Protection Act shall not apply to works undertaken by the Authority; and it is further provided that the net proceed of the sale of surplus property under the administration of the Authority shall be paid to it so that these amounts may be credited against expenditures.

That, I think, is as much explanation on second reading as the Senate will require, though if questions are asked I shall be glad to do my best to answer them. It will be my purpose, if the Senate gives second reading to the measure, to suggest that it be sent to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications for further study.

Hon. Mr. Horner: The honourable senator has referred to this undertaking as a "deep sea" channel. It is not so, nor will it be when it is completed. It will be no more than 27 feet deep, and therefore insufficient for the largest ocean-going vessels. The only harbour such boats can go into is up in my country, at Churchill, where there is 75 feet of water. Only partly loaded large boats can travel down the St. Lawrence at the present time, and there will be a similar limitation on large sea-going vessels when you are through with this project.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask a couple of questions? As I understand the bill, it is intended to authorize the construction of a specific bridge.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yet its purpose is phrased in the widest terms,—not to construct a certain bridge at a certain place but, to quote from the explanatory notes:

> . . . to empower the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority to construct, maintain and operate international bridges . . .

How many bridges do they propose to construct?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The notes say "as specifically authorized by the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act".

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Very well, but the bill authorizes the construction of bridges.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No. The only one authorized is authorized in section 3.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: This question was raised in the other place and the answer given was that section 3 of the bill specifically authorizes the Authority to build and operate this bridge and this bridge only, and that it was not intended to empower the Authority by inference or in general to build any other international bridge. If it wishes at any time in the future to build another international bridge it will have to come back to Parliament for an amendment to the act.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why put it in general terms? Why should the first clause not give authority to construct this specific bridge as authorized by the act? Would that not be better for clarity's sake?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That is exactly the point. The only one that would be authorized by the act, if this bill goes through, would be the one at Pollys Gut.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Then why make it plural?

Hon. Mr. Euler: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why do you not specify that the Authority is to build a bridge at Pollys Gut and not bridges as may be authorized?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: It amounts to the same thing. By section 10 of the act the Authority is given power to build any bridge or work pursuant to the act. Then by section 14A the work which it is authorized to construct is the bridge over Pollys Gut and no other.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Well, it does not seem to be very good draftsmanship. May I ask another question? Is there any limitation imposed on the amount of the tolls, how long they shall be maintained, and what shall happen in the event that, say, a certain amount of money has to be raised? Will it be necessary to pass an order in council before tolls are applied, or is there any limitation on the amount that shall be raised by tolls? Is there anything for the protection of the public in the matter of tolls which may be levied?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: No, there is nothing specific of that kind in the bill, and I suggest to my honourable friend that at this stage it might be very difficult to be specific in these matters. In the first place it is not known, I imagine, how much this new bridge will cost, or how much compensation will have to be paid to the Cornwall International Bridge Company. Moreover, any provisions of that kind would have to be made by way of agreement between the American Authority and the Canadian Authority and would not be subject solely to the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Not solely, but to the extent that they would be subject to Canadian jurisdiction why could not the Authority, after acquiring the knowledge, obtain authorization or, shall I say, ratification by order in council?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Well, I do not think that my honourable friend need be too deeply concerned with the possibility that the Seaway Authority or any subsidiary company which it may organize for the purpose will charge excessive tolls to people using this bridge. After all, it is a body subject to the control of Parliament. My honourable friend will realize what an enormous volume of protests there would be addressed to members of Parliament if the Authority did seek to charge tolls that were thought to be excessive or indeed out of line with the tolls that are charged on bridges of a similar size elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What could we do about it? We would be helpless.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: May I ask the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) a question?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Section 22 of the act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

22. (1) The Navigable Waters Protection Act does not apply to works undertaken pursuant to this act.

(2) Any work constructed in accordance with this act is a lawful work notwithstanding that it interferes with navigation.

May I ask whether this bridge will be constructed in such a way that it will have to be opened up to let vessels through or will it be high enough to allow navigation to proceed underneath?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I do not know, but I think it is to be built in conjunction with locks that are to be constructed at the falls and therefore it will likely be a swing bridge or something of that kind.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Will there be automobile traffic on it?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Yes. The bridge will also be used by the New York Central Railway to replace its present bridge and tracks.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Apparently the Seaway Authority will face the same difficulty that we are going to face in Montreal if the Victoria bridge is built in such a way that it will have to be opened up to let navigation through.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I am particularly interested in the capital expenditures to be made under this bill. The explanatory note opposite section 2 of the bill reads:

The money spent by the Authority is provided by loans that must be recovered by tolls; it is therefore advisable that the proceeds of the disposition of property be credited against expenditures.

As I understand it, the principle is that certain expenditures will be made and toll charges will be credited to offset the expenditures. Is that right?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Yes, that is right as I understand it. To the extent that property is sold by the Authority the proceeds of sale will be credited against capital expenditures, and the net amount will be that which will have been spent by the Authority in respect of which it will seek to levy tolls for the purpose of paying operating charges and interest, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I have no objection to this, but I want to get the information on record, for we have been told the direct opposite at recent meetings of the Finance Committee. It has been stated there that since 1920 all capital expenditures on public buildings have been charged up as expense items in the particular year concerned, with no charge being made to capital account, and that the revenue from any building sold has gone to the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada. An altogether different policy is being pursued here, and I want to make sure it is on record so that I may bring it up at some future time.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That would appear to be so from the explanation given of section 2.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hugessen, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 23, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

POST OFFICE BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the report of the committee on Bill C.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom was referred the Bill (C) intituled: "An Act to amend the Post Office Act", have in obedience to the order of reference of May 17, 1956, examined the said bill and now beg leave to report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave of the Senate, now.

Some Hon. Senators: Next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Next sitting.

LIVE STOCK AND LIVE STOCK PRODUCTS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Charles G. Hawkins, Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Natural Resources, presented the report of committee on Bill I-7.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Natural Resources, to whom was referred the Bill (I-7) intituled: "An Act to amend the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act", have in obedience to the order of reference of May 17, 1956, examined the said bill and now report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hawkins: Next sitting.

PRIVATE BILL

ALBION INSURANCE COMPANY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden presented the report of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce on Bill H-10.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom was referred the Bill (H-10) intituled: "An Act to incorporate The Albion Insurance Company", have in obedience to the order of reference of May 10, 1956, examined the said bill and now report the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 1, line 13: immediately after the word "Company" insert the words "of Canada".
2. Page 2, line 30: immediately after the word "hundred" strike out the words "and forty".
3. Page 3, line 20: immediately after the word "than" delete the word "twenty" and substitute therefor the word "forty".
4. In the title: immediately after the word "Company" add the words "of Canada".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these amendments be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Next sitting.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 345 to 357, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

BILLS—FIRST READINGS

Hon. Mr. Roebuck presented the following bills:

Bill W-12, an Act for the relief of Shirley Susan Morris Duggan.

Bill X-12, an Act for the relief of Maureen Evelyn Allison Cooper.

Bill Y-12, an Act for the relief of William Windsor Frewen.

Bill Z-12, an Act for the relief of Ethel Hansen Echlin.

Bill A-13, an Act for the relief of Muriel Doreen Southall Fisher.

Bill B-13, an Act for the relief of Paulette Lavallee Plotkin.

Bill C-13, an Act for the relief of Michael Costom.

Bill D-13, an Act for the relief of Peter Butler.

Bill E-13, an Act for the relief of Ivy Umilta Gooding Joseph.

Bill F-13, an Act for the relief of Margaret Lash Johnston.

Bill G-13, an Act for the relief of Ethel Simon Baroff.

Bill H-13, an Act for the relief of Golda Cohen Winter.

Bill I-13, an Act for the relief of Henriette Lessard Hughes.

Bill J-13, an Act for the relief of Ewart Ernest Clouston.

The bills were read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: With leave, next sitting.

CANADA SHIPPING BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris moved the third reading of Bill H-7, an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill O-8, an Act to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill provides for certain amendments to Part I of the Navigable Waters Protection Act. That is a statute which has been in force for a great many years, and the particular sections which are now being amended have remained in their present form for a long time. To some extent, people who had to apply for a permit under Part I of the act, which deals with the construction of works such as dams, booms and wharves on navigable waters were, I think I could say, in somewhat of a straitjacket, because the provisions of the statute had no flexibility at all. I emphasize that the main portion of the bill deals only with Part I, which has to do with this type of work on navigable waters.

Up to the present time and under the statute as it now stands, if you were proposing to construct a wharf or boom on navigable waters, you would have to apply through the Minister of Public Works for the necessary approval, deposit your plans, and then carry out a process of advertising in the Canada Gazette and in the newspapers in the area; and after a period of time had elapsed the Governor in Council might, if he saw fit, approve of the work.

Hon. Mr. Reid: What about a bridge?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: This applies to bridges. Section 2 of the act says:

> "work" includes any bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau, wharf, dock, pier or other structure, . . .

The difficulty has been that the statute gave no recognition to the fact that sometimes a work might be of such urgent necessity that the applicant could not afford to wait the several months or more that were required to clear the matter in order to get the necessary approval, and in that regard the statute was inflexible.

Under the bill the old provisions in the statute remain—that is, you must deposit plans, do certain advertising and apply for approval. But subsection 2 of section 4 of the bill is a relieving subsection whereby if the minister is satisfied that there is an emergency you may get permission to proceed with the construction before all the time required by advertising, etc., has elapsed. There is an additional provision that if you have proceeded with a work without having obtained approval and that work has not been found objectionable by the minister—that is, if he has not considered it to be an interference with navigation and has not ordered it to be destroyed—when a period of five years has elapsed you may, by complying with the requirements for depositing the plan and advertising, get approval after the event.

These are all in the nature of relieving provisions, and therefore are highly desirable in the interest of the public and those who may operate under this statute.

I should point out to honourable senators that when the bill goes to committee some amendments will be proposed to subsection 2 of section 4. As it is drawn, in my opinion it creates confusion or something worse. I have already called it to the attention of the department, and some amendments will be proposed to remove the confusion.

Another important thing the bill does is to substitute the Minister of Public Works for the Governor in Council, wherever the Governor in Council is authorized by Part I to do certain things.

If the bill is passed it will be the Minister of Public Works who may directly do these things.

Honourable senators, those are the main purposes of the bill before the house.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I do not expect that the honourable senator who just explained the bill, being merely a member of the legal profession, ever donned cork boots and made use of these aids on what are called navigable waters.

On the question of the control of navigable waters, I would like to mention the Ottawa River upstream from here. I have often wondered on just what authority the Upper Ottawa Improvement Company takes unto itself authority to make charges in connection with certain lumbering operations on that part of the river. Anyone who cares to inquire will find that charges are actually made for the use of the Ottawa River. For instance, if you are floating timber or pulpwood logs down the river you have to pass them through chutes or booms, and for doing that a certain toll per thousand feet or per cord, as the case may be, has to be paid to the company. I wonder if this bill is going to have any effect whatever on that phase of lumbering operations.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I can tell my friend that what this bill provides for is approval by the minister of the construction of works on navigable waters. It has nothing whatever to do with tolls. I would assume that if a chute were a private venture on a navigable water it would have been approved before its construction was proceeded with.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask the honourable senator if he has any explanation of the provision for raising from $1,000 to $5,000 the value of works that do not require approval by the minister? I assume the increase is related to the inflationary spiral in the cost of bridges and other public works, but there may be some other explanation as well.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: My friend has raised a question in connection with section 3 of the bill, which rewrites section 4 of the statute. Again, it is relieving, and is designed to take a burden of detail off the department in cases where it would appear that certain works could not possibly interfere with navigation.

I suppose the department has reached the conclusion that no substantial work of the kind in question here could be constructed nowadays at a cost of less than $5,000, so it proposes that the limit of $1,000, which has remained in the statute from the time it was originally enacted, be increased to $5,000. I think the dollar amount is perfectly safe, because it would appear to me that the real test is whether or not the work would be likely to interfere substantially with navigation.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, is this not in line with the progress of our times?—that is, if it is progress; it may be the opposite of progress, a going backwards. There was a time when this kind of thing had to be dealt with by act of Parliament, but the increased volume of public business has made it necessary to transfer a great amount of detail to the executive. We are now going a step further; we are transferring the responsibility from an overloaded executive to the head of the department in charge, the individual who perhaps knows more about it than anybody in the Government—that is, in the elected circle—though of course there may be officials who are more familiar with these matters than a changing minister could be. It is a part of the process of progress or change which some of us—and I am included—resist to the extent of our ability, whereby power is taken from Parliament and exercised by the executive in secret, or nearly so; at all events behind closed doors and without public discussion. This particular change does not offend, because it concerns detail work, without very much influence on the general public. The building of these public works is not likely to affect very much the economy of our nation, nor indeed to be the subject of much discussion. The amendment seems to me to be right and necessary, because of the tremendous bulk of public business in our time.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I note that section 4 refers to plans and works on sites which have not been approved. I always thought that plans must be approved by the Government before a wharf could be built at, or a bridge built over, a navigable stream. I imagine it will come as a surprise to most honourable members that this section is now being inserted in the bill.

But what I rose to draw to the attention of the house particularly is that the time has come when, in my opinion, the Government will have to look more closely into bridges, dams and groynes across navigable streams. What may be called a new menace has arisen. Pipe lines for oil and gas are beginning to be placed across navigable streams, and while these installations do not in any way interfere with navigation, because usually they are down in the bed of the river, it has been found that a danger exists, for should a leak take place in the pipe fish will be destroyed. In view of the present extent of construction of pipe lines for gas and oil, note should be taken by the Government of this potential menace. A large pipe line to bring oil from Alberta crosses the Fraser River; and whilst every precaution is being used by the company to avoid the possibility of erosion or leakage, the danger is there. So it is time that the Government should give attention to these works, not perhaps from the standpoint of obstruction, but as a development which requires close scrutiny to be given by the department before a company is permitted to cross a navigable stream with pipes for either oil or gas.

Hon. Mr. Power: Is it not now the case that whoever wants to construct a pipe line beneath the bed of a river must obtain permission of the department and approval of the Governor in Council?

Hon. Mr. Reid: I am not sure.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: If the statement of my honourable friend from New Westminster

(Hon. Mr. Reid) were in the form of a question, it might be pointed out that under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, which has been in force for many years, the definition of "work" includes "tunnel or pipe".

Hon. Mr. Reid: Fine.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: So the foresight which the honourable senator hopes the Government will now acquire was acquired, apparently, many years ago.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: If the honourable senator from Wellington (Hon. Mr. Howard) chose to tell the story of a pipe line that burst in Lake Memphremagog, in which he owns an island, he could also tell of the destruction—the horrible destruction—not of sockeye, but of other fish in that beautiful lake.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 16, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, seconded by Hon. Mrs. Hodges, for the second reading of Bill I-5, an Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Hon. John T. Hackett: Honourable senators, when I made a short speech in the house the other day I was told that nobody could hear me. So if I raise my voice today I do not wish to be regarded as approaching this difficult subject in a bellicose mood.

Bill I-5, if it becomes law, will be known as the Exchequer Court (Divorce Jurisdiction) Act, 1956. Its purpose, as disclosed by the bill, is to confer jurisdiction on the Exchequer Court of Canada to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii, on the ground of adultery, committed after marriage, to persons domiciled in Quebec. The effect of the bill, which was set forth in complete detail by the honourable senator who introduced it (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), would be twofold. First it has to do with the Senate itself and those members who give their time to the divorce committee. Secondly, it seems to open the door to grounds for divorce which might be available to Quebecers, including grounds which could not and would not now be considered by the Senate. Possibly I should retract the words "could not" and say that, as I am informed, they would not be considered here. At the present time adultery is the sole ground on which divorce is granted in the Senate.

The reasons given in support of the bill were manifold. It was said that the Fathers of Confederation did not intend that Parliament should be converted into a divorce court; that Parliament should not give its time to the petty squabbles which sometimes arise in domestic life; that senators should devote their time to national and international matters as distinct from domestic grievances; that parliamentary divorce is the most antiquated divorce system in the world; that it is cumbersome and costly; that petitions for divorce a vinculo matrimonii are heard by no other legislative body. The honourable senator informed the Senate that the bill seemed to him to be the best remedy available to cure a difficult situation. So much for the reasons.

If the bill became law it would relieve senators from hearing petitions for divorce on the ground of adultery committed after marriage by persons domiciled in the two provinces mentioned, and would transfer petitions from Parliament to a court where rules of law obtain that are not binding upon Parliament. At this moment I wish to refer to a document to which I will make further reference later.

As honourable senators are well aware, the question of marriage and divorce has been discussed in England by members of a number of royal commissions. The report of the latest commission, the Royal Commission on Marriage and Divorce, 1951-55, was presented to the British Parliament in March of this year. The noble lord who was appointed chairman of that large and illustrious commission, Baron Morton of Henryton, stands in high repute for his learning, wisdom and industry. He is a law lord who came to Canada a few years ago as a guest of the Canadian Bar Association.

During the debate on the bill now before the Senate there was some controversy between my honourable friend from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) and some other honourable senators as to what was the effective difference between submitting a petition to Parliament and submitting it to a court. I believe my honourable friend answered that the difference was that Parliament exercises a discretion which is free, unfettered and uncontrolled in any way, whereas a court is bound by a judicial discretion. While I appreciated the honourable gentleman's address I was unable to go all the way with him, but I do support his assertion concerning the difference between Parliament and a court with regard to decisions to be rendered.

Here is what the Royal Commission on Marriage and Divorce, 1951-55, says with regard to this very matter. I am quoting from page 264, section 1007:

Although in the statute the words "may make an order" are used, the discretion of the court is not an absolute but a judicial discretion to be exercised in accordance with the rules of law. Consequently, if all the requisite facts are proved the order asked for must be made unless there is some compelling reason to the contrary.

I think that indicates the possible difference between the outcome of a petition presented to Parliament and the outcome of one that might be presented to the Exchequer Court if this bill becomes law.

Hon. Mr. Farris: May I interrupt the honourable senator to ask him a question? Has the Parliament of this country ever acted on that discretion?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Well, it has acted to this extent—and I bow to the long experience of the honourable gentleman who asks the question—that adultery, to my knowledge, is the only ground upon which divorce has ever been granted by the Senate Divorce Committee. I am impressed by the fact that additional grounds are included in the bill, and an attempt might be made to enforce them in the courts. If the honourable gentleman reads clause 3 he will see that it would provide the Exchequer Court with power to grant divorce for reasons other than adultery.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask where that appears in the bill?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: In section 3 of the bill which is before me.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Would you kindly read it?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Certainly. Clause 3 reads as follows:

Section 18 of the Exchequer Court Act is amended by adding thereto as subsections (4), (5) and (6) the following:

"(4) In an application for a divorce made pursuant to paragraph (k) of subsection (1) of this section, if the court is satisfied by the evidence that the case of the plaintiff has been proved, and does not find that the plaintiff has been in any manner accessory to or has connived at the adultery of the defendant, or that the plaintiff has condoned the adultery complained of, or that the action was commenced and is proceeded with in collusion with the defendant or the co-respondent, then the court may give judgment declaring such marriage to be dissolved and in so doing may grant a judgment nisi prior to granting a judgment absolute:

Provided always that the court shall not be bound to give such judgment if it finds that the plaintiff since his marriage to the defendant has been guilty of adultery, or if the plaintiff has, in the opinion of the court, been guilty of unreasonable delay in commencing or proceeding with the action or has been guilty of mental or physical cruelty to the defendant, or has, without just cause, deserted the defendant or separated a mensa et thoro—

That is the form of separation in Quebec, namely, separation from bed and board.

—from the defendant, before the adultery complained of or has conduced to the commission of adultery by the defendant.

"(5) A married woman who, either before or after the passing of this act, has been deserted by and has been living separate and apart from her husband for a period of two years and upwards, and is still living separate and apart from her husband, shall, if her husband was, immediately prior to the desertion, domiciled in a province not having courts with jurisdiction to grant a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, be deemed to be domiciled in that province for the purpose of an application for a divorce made pursuant to paragraph (k) of subsection (1) of this section.

"(6) The divorce jurisdiction conferred upon the court shall be exercised only at the city of Ottawa."

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask a question at this point? Does that in any way alter the provision that before divorce can be granted by a court, adultery must be proved?

Hon. Mr. Horner: In anything the honourable senator has read from the bill, I cannot see how the existing ground for adultery is changed.

The Hon. the Speaker: An honourable senator may ask a question of the honourable gentleman who has the floor, with his permission, but may not make a statement.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I asked a question a moment ago. I do not want to press the matter, but would like an answer.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: The attempt appears to be to get into a federal court a question which is dealt with otherwise in the courts of other provinces, and if this question falls into a federal court it seems to me to follow that legislation will be introduced to give to the people in the provinces affected the prerogative that is enjoyed elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. Euler: But if this bill becomes law will it not leave unchanged the present ground for divorce, which is adultery? The point I want to make is that the bill does not provide for widening the ground for divorce.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I am submitting that it is an attempt to widen, because by federal legislation you would be putting into the Exchequer Court, a federal court, cases which a Quebec court could not hear. There would be an appeal from the Exchequer Court to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The next argument that the sponsor of the bill advanced was that under section 91 of the British North America Act the legislative power as regards marriage and divorce was conceded to the dominion. My honourable friend from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) read into the record an excerpt that he had taken from a newspaper, and which he said might be interpreted by a person who was schooled in the law as meaning that divorce could not be granted by the courts until article 185 of the pre-Confederation Civil Code of Quebec had in some way been removed or amended. I am one of those who share the opinion which in an offhand way the honourable senator said might be so read and so interpreted.

With regard to subsection 26 of section 91 of the B.N.A. Act, I would draw to the attention of honourable senators the facts that provincial legislation had to be passed in order to make effective the legislation that was passed here in 1930 and is to be found in R.S.C. 1952, chapter 85, under the short title "The Divorce Act (Ontario) 1930". Ontario did approve, and it enacted legislation to establish the agent that could apply the law. Considering the law in Quebec and the attitude which the people of that province have taken to this question, it does not seem likely that legislation will be enacted by the provincial Legislature of Quebec to change article 185 of the Quebec Civil Code.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask my honourable friend if it is a fact that the law he quotes as now affecting Ontario could affect Quebec?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: No, it does not. What I said, or intended to say, was that law was passed in the federal Parliament affecting divorce; but that Parliament has no power under section 91 to set up courts. Under section 92 of the B.N.A. Act that power is conferred on the provinces. The province of Ontario concurred in this point of view and set up a court and passed the necessary legislation to make it effective in Ontario, but not in Quebec. I intended to say further that so long as the pre-Confederation law of Quebec remains as it is, it would seem very doubtful that the federal powers would or could in truth make a change in that regard.

It is true that section 101 of the B.N.A. Act gives the federal Parliament the right to enact laws establishing courts. It was under that act that the Supreme Court and the Exchequer Court were established. At one time they were one court, but in the year 1885 they were separated. The Exchequer Court was set up for reasons quite different from the matters which form part of the consideration of marriage and divorce. Section 58 of the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act, 38 Victoria, provides that:

> The Exchequer Court shall have and possess concurrent original jurisdiction in the Dominion of Canada, in all cases in which it shall be sought to enforce any law of the Dominion of Canada relating to the revenue, including actions, suits, and proceedings, by way of information, to enforce penalties and proceedings by way of information in rem, and as well in qui tam suits for penalties or forfeitures as where the suit is on behalf of the crown alone.

And so on.

That has been extended by section 18 of the Exchequer Court Act, as follows:

> (a) every claim against the crown for property taken for any public purpose;
> (b) every claim against the crown for damage to property injuriously affected by the construction of any public work.

I shall not read the whole section, but one finds running through the Exchequer Court Act an interest of the crown. The purpose of the act was to provide a tribunal for the crown to exercise its right of action or resist claims made upon it. Admiralty matters have been added, and also questions of patent and copyright, all of which are international questions. But one finds at no place any reference to civil rights, unless civil rights in a diluted form be found in copyright and patent matters or claims against government-owned railways can be so considered. I suggest that to embroider onto the Exchequer Court jurisdiction in matters of divorce would be to extend its jurisdiction entirely beyond what it was intended to be.

I do not overlook for a moment the question of the function of the Senate and its protection of minority interests. Reference has been made to the people who constitute the minority in Quebec. I represent a senatorial division which probably has the largest minority interest in any senatorial division in the province. I have never heard of any complaints by the minority of unwillingness to come to the Senate in Ottawa with petitions for divorce. Quebec has never asked, through its Government or its representatives in this chamber, for a transfer of divorce jurisdiction from Parliament to the courts, and I would be disinclined to believe that the Senate would wish to force upon a province legislation which it does not seek and has said, I believe long before my advent here, that it did not want.

So much for that aspect of minority interests which have always been so carefully and so jealously protected by this honourable body.

I would now like to say a few words about divorce itself. One of the reasons advanced for seeking to shift the hearing of divorce petitions to another tribunal is that divorce is increasing. That is one of the misfortunes of western civilization. If honourable senators are interested in the story that marriage and divorce proceedings have followed in England, I may say it seems that the matter was, from antiquity, in the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, with an appeal to the Pope. At the time of the Reformation great changes came about. The appeal to the papacy ceased and the sovereign became the dominating power in Church as well as in State. But at that time there was no question of divorce as we deal with it and understand it now. It was a form of separation, not as is stated in the bill, a vinculo matrimonii—from the chain of wedlock, if you will—but a mensa et thoro, which is separation from bed and board. The ecclesiastical courts dealt consistently with matrimonial matters which were other than dissolution of a valid marriage. They dealt with dissolution of marriage that was found to have never been valid, because of something that occurred before marriage or something that prevented its completion, such as non-consummation. But divorce is something that follows a valid marriage.

In 1535 the appeal to the Pope ceased in England. The ecclesiastical courts continued to render judgments or decrees. I am not discussing how people may have acted upon them, but there was no admission by any authority at that time that a valid marriage could be undone, and it was not until the early 1700's that legislation was enacted to give Parliament jurisdiction over marriage and divorce. I am not trifling with history; I am reading from a report which came to me the other day in which it is stated that it was only between 1715 and 1856 that Parliament passed private bills of divorce and during that time only 244 divorces were granted by the Parliament of England by way of private bills. The cost, the delay and the increase in the number of divorces brought about changes; and the subject was referred to the courts.

There have been two or three royal commissions on marriage and divorce in England. Until 1857, when the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act was passed, the only way of securing a divorce in England and Wales was through an act of Parliament. The royal commission of inquiry which began its work in 1850 did not finish its labours until 1855, and two years later it was followed by the statute I have just mentioned. Another royal commission was appointed in 1909, under the presidency of Lord Gorell, and it brought about further changes. There was no other inquiry on the subject until the one I have already mentioned, the chairman of which was Lord Morton of Henryton. I am not overlooking the efforts of Mr. A. P. Herbert, M.P., which brought about some changes in the law of divorce by act of Parliament. But the Morton investigation took five or six years to complete. Its report is a remarkable study; and I hope that copies will be made available to all members of our parliament, including, of course, the Senate. I obtained two copies, one of which I sent to an old friend who now faces me, and who frequently tells me I am wrong—

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Where could one get a copy?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: —and I kept one for myself, which I shall be glad to lend to the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). The last paragraph of this report, which is the fruit of nearly seven years' careful study by men and women learned, patriotic, and well endowed with wisdom, is this:

> It is our hope that a real, marked extension of the work of education, pre-marital instruction, marriage guidance and conciliation would check the tendency to which we have referred, to resort too readily and too lightly to divorce. Unless this tendency is checked there is a real danger that the conception of marriage as a lifelong union of one man with one woman may be abandoned. This would be an irreparable loss to the community. There are some of us who think that if this tendency to divorce continues unchecked it may become necessary to consider whether the community as a whole would not be happier and more stable if it abolished divorce altogether and accepted the inevitable individual hardship that this would entail.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Is that the statement of Lord Morton's Commission?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Yes. That is a finding of the commission.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: That is the last royal commission?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Yes. The report was tabled in the British Parliament at the end of March this year.

Hon. Mr. Farris: The commission recommended with practical unanimity the continuance of the present divorce law.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Honourable senators now know to whom I sent the first copy! I am not going to agree entirely with my honourable friend's statement. The commission has said, in effect, "We have got to struggle on, but we must do everything we can to curtail the encouragement and the opportunity of divorce".

Now, these words I have read are solemn words; they are ominous words. Ours is a young country. Many people wish to come to Canada because of its wealth, because of the opportunities it offers to youth; in fact one of our difficulties seems to be that more people desire to enter Canada than we have been willing at times to admit. But I think that over and above the wealth of Canada, the richness of its mines, the glory of its forests, what impresses people most is our capacity—which is a blessing from on high—to get along together. We do not always agree, but so far we have never quarrelled.

That is why I was somewhat reluctant to attempt to set forth here some debatable points of view. I had no desire, nor have I any desire, to attempt to break a lance with anybody, and I have no particular interest in trying to argue points. The Parliament of Canada, which has brought men and women together in the Commons and in the Senate, is a great school of tolerance. Here we learn to appreciate one another's differences. Parliament has engendered in us a feeling—a commiseration or a pity almost—one for the other, which helps to make Canada a better place in which to live. Nobody wants divorce, and nobody wants the number of divorces to increase. Divorces happen and most people are sorry when they do, including the individuals directly concerned. I am one of those who likes to believe that, if we can bear a little while longer, the day will come when we can convince younger people they owe it not only to one another, to their children and families, but to the state and to their God, to be a little more tolerant with each other's shortcomings. I think it would be better to wait until that time comes rather than to say that because so many divorce petitions are being presented to Parliament we should rid ourselves of the task of hearing them and adopt procedures followed in other countries.

Including myself, sixteen senators have so far addressed the Senate on this most difficult question. I find that most of those who favour the point of view expressed in the bill come from that new and surging part of Canada, the west, over the mountains and on the plains. They are entitled to their views, but the people nearer my homeland seem to feel differently about it. It may be that if some of those honourable senators whose homes are a long distance from Ottawa did not have to remain here over week-ends when others are able to go home, they would feel differently. It may be that an adjustment in the time of Senate sittings is needed. A different point of view might emerge on this topic of divorce if we could do more business at one time and so make it unnecessary for a large number of senators to remain in Ottawa every week during the session.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Haig, for Hon. Mr. Aseltine, the debate was adjourned.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce, Nos. 338 to 344, which were presented yesterday.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the committee, moved that the reports be adopted.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

BILLS—SECOND READINGS

Hon. Mr. Roebuck moved the second reading of the following bills:

Bill C-12, an Act for the relief of Barbara Mary Elliott Priestley.

Bill D-12, an Act for the relief of Nancy Elizabeth Theresa Butler Waugh.

Bill E-12, an Act for the relief of Robert James Clarke.

Bill F-12, an Act for the relief of Veronica Rose Latter Haworth Robinson.

Bill G-12, an Act for the relief of Billie Mae Margaret Taylor Dennis.

Bill H-12, an Act for the relief of Naida Donnithorne St. James.

Bill I-12, an Act for the relief of Alma Elizabeth Mackie Wahlberg.

Bill J-12, an Act for the relief of William Maguire.

Bill K-12, an Act for the relief of Anne Perley-Robertson McNicoll.

Bill L-12, an Act for the relief of Colette Palardy Loranger.

Bill M-12, an Act for the relief of Esther Kathleen Hamilton Williamson Maynard.

Bill N-12, an Act for the relief of Helga Maria Berger Pilgrim.

Bill O-12, an Act for the relief of Ruth Carol Friedman Allen.

Bill P-12, an Act for the relief of Joseph Thomas Evans.

Bill Q-12, an Act for the relief of Marie Jacqueline Carmen Van Troyen Morin.

Bill R-12, an Act for the relief of Hazel Wilhelmina Langtry Kimpton.

Bill S-12, an Act for the relief of Sergei Vermala.

Bill T-12, an Act for the relief of Stanley Tom Wood.

Bill U-12, an Act for the relief of Amelia Alice Stefani Schofield.

Bill V-12, an Act for the relief of Bridget Rowley McHale Bowman.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Next sitting.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, May 24, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Charles G. Hawkins, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, presented the committee's third report.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

Your committee recommend that they be authorized to print 1,000 additional copies in English and 200 additional copies in French of their final report on the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957, and that Rule 100 be suspended in relation to the said printing.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hawkins: Next sitting.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate I move that when this house rises today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The motion was agreed to.

FEDERAL EXPENDITURE IN PROVINCES

INFORMATION TABLED

On the notice of motion by Hon. Mr. McDonald:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a return showing:

1. What was the total expenditure in each province of Canada for the fiscal year 1954-55, by the federal Government, including the statutory subsidy and tax rental agreement payments?
2. What was the total expenditure during the fiscal year 1954-55 in each province by each federal Government department and agency?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I now table the information asked for.

POST OFFICE BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. William H. Golding moved the third reading of Bill C, an Act to amend the Post Office Act.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

LIVE STOCK AND LIVE STOCK PRODUCTS BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald, for Hon. Mr. Godbout, moved the third reading of Bill (I-7), an Act to amend the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

DIVORCE BILLS

THIRD READINGS

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, moved the third reading of the following bills:

Bill C-12, an Act for the relief of Barbara Mary Elliott Priestley.

Bill D-12, an Act for the relief of Nancy Elizabeth Theresa Butler Waugh.

Bill E-12, an Act for the relief of Robert James Clarke.

Bill F-12, an Act for the relief of Veronica Rose Latter Haworth Robinson.

Bill G-12, an Act for the relief of Billie Mae Margaret Taylor Dennis.

Bill H-12, an Act for the relief of Naida Donnithorne St. James.

Bill I-12, an Act for the relief of Alma Elizabeth Mackie Wahlberg.

Bill J-12, an Act for the relief of William Maguire.

Bill K-12, an Act for the relief of Anne Perley-Robertson McNicoll.

Bill L-12, an Act for the relief of Colette Palardy Loranger.

Bill M-12, an Act for the relief of Esther Kathleen Hamilton Williamson Maynard.

Bill N-12, an Act for the relief of Helga Maria Berger Pilgrim.

Bill O-12, an Act for the relief of Ruth Carol Friedman Allen.

Bill P-12, an Act for the relief of Joseph Thomas Evans.

Bill Q-12, an Act for the relief of Marie Jacqueline Carmen Van Troyen Morin.

Bill R-12, an Act for the relief of Hazel Wilhelmina Langtry Kimpton.

Bill S-12, an Act for the relief of Sergei Vermala.

Bill T-12, an Act for the relief of Stanley Tom Wood.

Bill U-12, an Act for the relief of Amelia Alice Stefani Schofield.

Bill V-12, an Act for the relief of Bridget Rowley McHale Bowman.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the third time, and passed, on division.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. T. A. Crerar moved the second reading of Bill 249, an Act to amend the Department of Transport Act.

He said: Honourable senators, let me say at once that this bill has the germ of an authoritarian principle in it and since some honourable senators are probably aware of my attitude of mind on most matters of that kind they will agree that I sponsor the bill without any blowing of bugles or clanging of cymbals, and indeed with very little enthusiasm, but because it is necessary.

It may be useful if I briefly sketch the background because the bill in itself is a very simple measure.

During the war years it was necessary to institute a great many controls over the ordinary working of the country's economy. Those controls were introduced under the War Measures Act, which act, as honourable senators will recall, enabled the Government to govern by decree almost anything except the levying of taxes. When the war was over, of course, the War Measures Act ceased to have practical effect. However, the Government at that time—and this, I may say, was subsequent to my leaving the Government—brought in a bill entitled the Emergency Powers Act, which in due course was passed by Parliament. That act gave the Government a pretty wide degree of authority to pass orders in council dealing with matters in which the economy of the country might be affected. One of the orders passed under the act granted authority for the control of the movement of bulk goods either by rail or by ship on inland waters and also, as I recall, on coastal waters as well when transported in ships of over a certain tonnage. But it was not long before the Emergency Powers Act was subjected to a good deal of criticism—some people were asking why it was necessary to keep it in force years after the war—and Parliament caused the Act to expire on May 31, 1954. Then in order to ensure the orderly and efficient movement of goods in bulk, by rail and ship, the Department of Transport Act, which was passed in 1936, was amended by the addition of a subclause. This was done in the session of 1953-54, about two years ago.

Under that amendment to the Department of Transport Act provision was made for the appointment of a transport controller, whose authority extended to control of the use, operation or supply of transport and storage facilities and to control of practically all transport of goods in bulk. The bill defined "goods in bulk" as including grain and grain products; ores and minerals (crude, screened, sized, refined or concentrated, but not otherwise processed); ferrous metals; iron and steel scrap; sand, stone and gravel; pulpwood, woodpulp, poles and logs; coal and coke; and sulphur and phosphate.

It will be recalled that in 1954 the world, internationally, was in a very uneasy posture. There was fear that war might break out; the tension was very considerable; and in the event of the development of any international emergency the Government under this amendment to the Department of Transport Act, possessed the power to direct the movement of the bulk goods which I mentioned a moment ago. That tension has apparently eased, although I daresay it is felt that the need for control still exists. Speaking quite frankly, were it not for one thing I would not support the renewal of these powers; and let me say that I do not want my sponsorship of this bill to be cited against me if on some future occasion I should oppose a similar measure. In that respect I am giving no hostages to fate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable senator still has an open mind!

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Yes, always an open mind.

The real need for this measure today is in connection with the movement of grain. There has been a congested condition affecting grain out in the Prairie provinces, and the Transport Controller's efforts, at any rate during the past year, have been devoted almost wholly to assisting in the movement of grain in order to reduce this congestion. In doing so, he could direct the railway companies to ease up on the carriage of pulp or ore or some other commodity and concentrate the available supply of cars on the movement of grain. That is an illustration of the sort of power which, under this legislation, the Transport Controller possesses. Now that congestion, so far as western grain is concerned, still persists, and should there be a large crop on the prairies this year it will almost certainly continue for another year, perhaps two years.

So the main purpose of this bill—and this was pretty well disclosed in the debate on the measure in the other house—is related to grain and the need for facilitating its movement. This is made perhaps more necessary by our rigid inflexible system of marketing grain. As honourable senators know, the marketing of wheat, oats and barley is completely and rigidly controlled under the Wheat Board Act by the Wheat Board, which is declared to be an agent of the crown. The rigidity of control frequently gives rise to an inflexible state of affairs. If the Wheat Board is to move grain out of the country to meet its export commitments, it is necessary to have some control exercised by a transport controller so that, when necessary, box cars can be made available for the movement of that grain.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why would it not be possible to have an official of the Board of Transport Commissioners handle a matter of that kind?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I do not know that the Board of Transport Commissioners would want to be burdened with this, and I do not think it should be. The cost of administering the control is very small. As a matter of fact, the Transport Controller is a member of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada. He is administering this control in addition to doing his other duties, and his total staff is no greater than five or six at the outside. It is not intended that this should be a permanent institution, and indeed it is not desirable that it should be. However, if we are to have a transport control, it is better to have it this way. It is important that the congestion which there has been for the last several years in the movement of grain in the prairie country be reduced, and so it is necessary, as I have said, to have some control exercised by a transport controller when the Wheat Board gets an opportunity to sell grain abroad. To my mind this is the only justification for continuing the Transport Controller's power.

Subsection 3 of section 6A of the Department of Transport Act now reads:

> This section shall expire on the 31st day of May, 1956.

If nothing were done about it, the Transport Controller's power would expire at the end of this month. The sole purpose of the bill which I am submitting to the house is to amend subsection (3) of section 6A to the effect that the power shall expire on the 31st day of May, 1958; in other words, it extends the power for two years. Having regard to all the circumstances involved, it is desirable that this power be continued. But once we get rid of all the Wheat Board's arbitrary powers—and I am not yet without hope that that day will arrive—I think we will find there will be no need for a Transport controller.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Is there any amendment to the bill, to include pipe lines, for instance?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I beg your pardon?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I asked if there is any amendment to the bill, and I added, rather facetiously, to include pipe lines, for instance?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Our honourable friend is in the wrong house.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: It is a facetious question.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not understand the question. Both the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) and I are too Scottish to get it.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I understand it is a facetious question. My Scottish upbringing developed in me a great solemnity, so I did not see the point for a moment or two.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I have only a few comments to make at this time. I read the report of the debate in the other house on this bill. The great complaint in western Canada is that the Transport Controller is not controlling and that there is mismanagment in the distribution of box cars. That is the complaint you hear on every hand. I believe the railroads are not allowing much interference, and that may be all to the good when the controller is doing very little indeed. It is true there are many districts in the west where the farmers have made fair wheat sales, but there are other districts where the farmers have sold very little. This may be due to grade, but that is hard to understand. Many of the farmers have not sold sufficient grain to pay their bills and there is generally a great deal of dissatisfaction. The honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) hopes the day will come when the Wheat Board is divested of its arbitrary powers. What a forlorn hope! If he were to start in Winnipeg and travel clean west to the foothills of the Rocky Mountains he would be amazed at the small number of those who would support the idea of abolishing the Wheat Board. He could put them all in one railroad car.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: And have some room to spare.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Yes. The farmers of western Canada would like to see a farmer-controlled board. I would like to see a committee of farmers inquire into this whole question of the distribution of box cars.

There is another important matter in connection with the question of handling grain. One of the causes of the pile-up of grain in western Canada, particularly in Alberta, even at this date, was the strike of stevedores and loaders in Vancouver a year ago last winter. A guaranteed sale of approximately $30 million worth of wheat was lost. I contend that the board lost the sale of that grain because we were not able to deliver it to an eastern market. We were strike-bound. Dislocation occurred and fear spread throughout the western provinces just at the time navigation opened and great hope was held out. Orders were coming in, and boats were ready to load, but were tied up by the strike. That is a thing the farmer fears. He has no means of combating such a strike, and when one occurs it costs him and the rest of the Canadian people a lot of money. We simply must work out some scheme to deal with the problem, so that labour unions can negotiate and get what is coming to them without tying up vital services. Let them hire the best counsel in the land and debate the question, but the work must be carried on.

I do not like the idea of a transport controller, and I do not think he is doing a very good job. For the life of me I cannot see what the Board of Transport Commissioners busies itself with. I am sure one or two of its members could carry out the duties allotted to this special controller.

Honourable senators, that is all I intend to say on the subject.

Hon. Norman P. Lambert: Honourable senators, I am sure the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) would be the last person in this chamber to adopt an apologetic attitude for the bill under discussion, which recommends the continuation in office of the Transport Controller, Mr. Roy Milner. Mr. Milner is responsible to the Minister of the Department of Trade and Commerce, not to the Wheat Board. The Wheat Board, which is the marketing agency for grain, was established by the Canadian Wheat Board Act of 1935. The Senate, together with the other house, has amended the act nine times, recognizing the undisputed fact that orderly marketing as prescribed in the act is essential to the national economy. Owing to abnormal conditions the Prairie provinces yielded larger crops in the past two years than ever before, and it became necessary to appoint a transport controller to ensure that delivery of grain to elevator points and thence to the head of the lakes was facilitated. I submit very strongly that the work of Mr. Milner, as Transport Controller, apart altogether from the Wheat Board Act, has been largely responsible for the satisfactory disposition of the surplus of grain at this time.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Satisfactory nothing!

Hon. Mr. Lambert: There is in the elevators today, according to the latest figures I have, vacant space for about 140 million bushels, and this is largely due to the orderly disposition of cars for the shipping of grain from elevator points, under Mr. Milner's direction. So long as the Wheat Board remains in existence as the marketing agency for wheat and other grains in this country, the Department of Trade and Commerce, which is responsible for this activity—and not the Department of Transport—must see to it that the grain is moved; and if nature in her bountifulness should produce another great crop there will be more need than ever for the extraordinary powers that have been given to the transport controller, to help to get order out of chaos in the marketing of the crop.

I am sure my honourable friend from Churchill will join me in acknowledging the great ability of Mr. Milner, who resigned from his position with the Board of Grain Commissioners to do this special work in conjunction with the Wheat Board. That work is a public service to this country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I would like to direct a question to the sponsor of the bill. Is wheat the only product that has been controlled under this act for the past two years?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: There is control over movement of the list of commodities that I mentioned.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I do not intend to enter into a discussion about wheat. The quarrel has nothing to do with the Grain Act at all. The quarrel is between the private elevators and the pool elevators. It is claimed that Mr. Milner gives preference to the private elevators, and that he should allot more cars to the pool elevators, because more grain goes through them than through the private elevators. It is contended that the pool elevators are the ones that should get the preference. One has only to read the newspapers and the House of Commons Hansard of this session and every other session to find that this same question comes up again and again.

I happen to know Roy Milner. I have known him longer than any other member of this house, even the honourable senator from Churchill. His brother was a student in my law office and is now a lawyer in the city of Winnipeg. I know his father and mother well. Roy Milner is a very able and a comparatively young man.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: He came from New Brunswick, did he not?

Hon. Mr Haig: No, he came from Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: He came from Brampton.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I also know that if there was one Liberal vote cast in the city of Winnipeg, it was by Roy Milner's father. It is my opinion that Roy Milner is a very representative man in my city and the surrounding community, and he is an able appointee to the position of Transport Controller. Indeed, he is the kind of man I like to see occupying such a position. I know the Milners to be people who consider Canada first, and that is most important.

I can understand the viewpoint expressed by the senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner). In that respect may I digress for a moment, to say that the farmers in the three Prairie provinces are engaged in the biggest gambling game there is in the world today. They have had a good crop for the past two or three years, and I hope they will get a reasonable return for what they have produced. They are a fine people, and they form an essential part of the economic credit of this country. I say most emphatically: if the farmers of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta are unable to meet their debts, God help the rest of Canada. The wheat farmers are the backbone of our country, and therefore they need all the help we can give them. Let us not get into any wrangles here as to who is right and who is wrong on this question. I make those remarks merely to clear the atmosphere.

In conclusion, I repeat that Roy Milner is a good appointee, and I am pleased to see his term of office extended for another two years. If in that period we are called upon to face the same problems we have faced in the past, there is nobody I know of who will be able to do a better job than he.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I have one or two observations to make. Usually, when wheat is being discussed I say nothing, because I live in a city and know very little about the wheat question. Of course, I recognize the importance of the industry, and quite readily agree with the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) as to the excellent qualities of the people engaged in it.

However, let me say to the senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) that orderly organization of an industry is not undemocratic; liberalism and democracy do not necessarily involve chaos or the failure of people to stand in line and work together in sensible co-operation. There is nothing undemocratic in the Government of this country organizing the shipment of a great product such as our wheat; as a matter of fact, the Government would be very lax indeed if, at a time when the national interests as to the disposition of our wheat were in danger, it did not interfere and prevent the dragging and pulling, and backing and filling, of various people or organizations who were trying to capture the few cars that remain to be disposed of. To my mind, there is nothing undemocratic about this piece of legislation.

Two things only cause me concern at the present moment, and I hope that in the course of the years they will disappear. The first is the floor price of wheat: that is government gambling which is not to our economic good. I hope that in due time all floor prices will disappear, and that every industry will stand on its own feet and be healthy for having done so. Certainly such a system would be more beneficial to our national economy.

Secondly, I hope that in the course of events any compulsion in the matter of purchase and sale will disappear, and that the producers will be able to sell their wheat and other products without control of any kind. If there is to be government organization to assist in the selling of these products, the participation of producers therein should be voluntary. Then the industry would stand on its own feet, and rise or fall on its own merits, without government compulsion.

Some Hon. Senators: Carried.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Speaker: I would point out that if the honourable senator from Churchill speaks at this time he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators, regarding the points raised by our colleague from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), I do not find myself in disagreement with him. Under certain conditions I don't know that there is anything very undemocratic in having a transport controller—I repeat, under certain conditions. We have abnormal conditions today in respect of the movement of wheat; and that alone, it appears to me, is the justification for continuation of control.

The Transport Controller operates under pretty broad powers; and of course, as always, the success or otherwise of such an operation depends a great deal on the kind of individual who exercises the authority. I have heard it said that the best kind of government in the world is dictatorship tempered with assassination. In other words, if we are to entrust an individual with great powers, it is of great importance what kind of individual is selected to exercise those powers. That we all know from our own observations and experience.

I agree with everything that has been said by the senior senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) as to the qualifications of Mr. Milner, a man of ability and integrity, whom I have known for many years. But my colleague from Ottawa was in error when he said Mr. Milner had resigned from the Board of Grain Commissionners. He is still a member of that board.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: I should have said he was seconded from the Board of Grain Commissioners.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That is right; he was seconded from the Board of Grain Commissioners for this job, but his office is still in the Grain Commissioners' offices.

My honourable friend from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) expressed himself rather vigorously, as he always does, and we are delighted to hear him do so. He criticized, indirectly at least, the way Mr. Milner has handled the distribution of cars.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Yes, sir!

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I may say to my friend that the people he should criticize in that respect are the members of the Wheat Board. Mr. Milner does not distribute cars to Blaine Lake, Qu'Appelle and other points in Saskatchewan at all. That is not his job. The Wheat Board knows the quantity and kind of wheat it wants to move, and it directs the placement of cars for that purpose. If there is a shortage of cars for the movement of wheat Mr. Milner will tell the coal people, the pulp and timber people and others dealing in bulk commodities, to go a little easier on the use of cars so as to allow more for the movement of wheat, and his orders are effective.

That is the main principle involved in this control. Once the cars are made available the Wheat Board knows the number of cars at its disposal, and it decides where they will be sent. For instance, if the board has made export sales of No. 3 northern or No. 2 northern it knows from its records the areas in which that grade of wheat can be secured, and so it directs cars to those particular areas. In the meantime other areas have to take fewer cars. That is one of the things I have in mind when I speak of the rigidity of this marketing system.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Would you permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Horner: If hundreds of empty cars were standing on sidings for days, while at the same time wheat was waiting to be moved, whose duty would it be to deal with that situation? I should think the Transport Controller ought to move about the country and see to it that these cars were moved to where they were needed. Would that not be his duty?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That is not the controller's responsibility at all. If cars were lying idle on sidings while at the same time elevators were filled with grain awaiting transportation, I do not know whose duty it would be to rectify that situation.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That would be the railway's job.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: The controller's duties do not extend to the allocation of cars over the prairie area. His main responsibility is to keep the overall movement of bulk goods in Canada before him, to scan the transport of all kinds of bulk commodities; and if a shortage of railway cars in a particular area is proving detrimental to the movement of wheat he can order the railways to allocate fewer cars for this, that and the other purpose for a few weeks, a month or two months, until the wheat situation is cleared up. That is about the main job of the Transport Controller.

I agree with my honourable friend from Blaine Lake about the tie-up at Vancouver, due to strikes and that sort of thing. But that is about as remote from the responsibility of the Transport Controller as anything one might imagine. This bill simply extends his powers for two more years. It may be that in two years from now we shall not have an International Wheat Agreement; it may be that the Wheat Board will not be under the necessity of pushing forward certain grades of wheat to meet commitments under such an agreement. That we do not know. In my opinion the time limit of two years is a very wise provision in this bill, and I am quite certain that the Department of Transport and everyone associated with the Government would like to get rid of the controls as quickly as possible.

For the reasons I have given, I think the bill should get second reading.

Hon. Mr. Reid: What about the question I asked?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: What was that?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Were any other commodities outside of wheat controlled under the act in the last two years?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I apologize to the honourable senator for not answering that question. Of course, during the war, the controls were much more complete. But laterally the controls on certain commodities have tended to decline, or so I have been informed. However, a dealer in lumber, for instance, might have orders for delivery to the prairies or somewhere else and want cars to make the shipment, and the Transport Controller might say, "You will have to wait a little while because we need these cars for wheat movement". In the main the need for continuing this control is, I am informed, to facilitate the movement of wheat from the western provinces, and as far as possible to relieve the congestion that has existed there for some considerable time.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: If there is a desire on the part of any honourable senator that the bill be referred to a committee, that can be done. However, I do not think it is necessary. As I have said, the bill simply extends the powers of the Transport Controller for another two years, and if it is agreeable to the house I shall move third reading now.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, before this bill is read the third time, may I be permitted to make a few remarks?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Go ahead.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I have had a number of experiences on this question of the spotting of freight cars for loading wheat. Why, as recently as a year ago I saw box cars being auctioned off to elevator companies. I remember at one time there was a row of box cars on the sidings up the line, but the trainmen would not bring them into the town because they wanted to allot one to each of the line elevators and not to the pool. There was a car order book with 200 or 300 cars listed in it and when the manager of the wheat pool wanted a car the railway conductor said, "We won't be bothered with that; we will put cars where they are not using a car order book".

I recall another experience in a place where there was one elevator, and somehow or other the train crew adopted the practice of coming in at night when they would have a good chance to slip all the cars to the elevator agent. On this particular occasion I walked six miles, got hold of a bag of wheat, and climbed on to the car before the train came to a stop. The train moved up to where the elevator was, and the elevator man was all ready to lower the spout into the car when I said, "No you don't, I am going to load this car". Well, it was desperately cold weather—40 below zero—and they took me into the caboose which was standing on the siding between the elevator and the station, and showed me an order to the effect that this car, a foreign car, could not be loaded by a man drawing in wheat, but had to be loaded by the elevator. I learned afterwards that the elevator man had given them $20 for the car, and that this order that they showed me was a fake. I drove my horse and cutter, with two sacks of grain, to the next town. On the siding there were a couple of good box cars; I put a sack of grain on each, and told the brakeman that I was going to load those two cars and to move them to a place where I could do so. He complained that it was too cold, but I said "I will make it good for you" and I gave him a little money. We came to Blaine Lake, and there was a pitched battle to decide who was going to load the cars. I said I would load them if it took me all winter. Well, I did load the cars, and I got 20 or 25 cents a bushel more than I would have got if that grain had gone through the elevator.

There is a racket in the spotting of cars for loading wheat. That is the complaint, and I will never be satisfied until conditions are changed. I am reminded of Stephen Leacock's account of his experience as a gardener during the war. He felt that, like everyone else, it was his duty to produce as much food as possible, so he went out and bought a straw hat, overalls, a hoe and a rake. The result of his efforts was a nice large box of vegetables, which he shipped east to Montreal, and—to illustrate the efficiency of the railroads—the last he heard of it was that it had arrived at Windsor, Ontario.

It seems to me that if I were the controller I could do quite a good job by arranging to have cars moved on an equitable system to where they are needed, not have them shifted around for nothing. The farmers will never be satisfied until cars are assigned to the elevators of their choice, whether they belong to the United Grain Growers or to any other organization. I contend that transportation is hampered by the practice of assigning one car to each elevator, without regard to the wishes of those who grow the grain and are paying the freight. By the way, in Saskatchewan the freight rate is about double the rate in Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Then move to Manitoba!

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) if he is suggesting that, at points where the car distribution system is in effect, preference is given to pool elevators over private elevators?

Hon. Mr. Horner: No; I am suggesting that I should have the right to deliver my grain to whatever elevator I want it to go to, with the assurance that it will be shipped.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: I understood the honourable senator to suggest that there are hundreds of grain cars standing empty on sidings.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: He did not designate the points at which this condition exists. In his subsequent remarks he made the observation that he thought grain cars were being unequally distributed among the elevators, and he intimated, as I understood him, that pool elevators enjoyed favouritism in the matter of apportionment.

Hon. Mr. Horner: No. I said that, as the supply was distributed, one car would be assigned to each elevator. So, although a car order book might contain the names of 200 growers requiring car space at, say, the pool elevator, and though there might be very little demand from the other elevators, the additional cars needed to supply the pool members' requirements were held back. I maintain that the farmer should be assured of car service at the elevator of his choice, whether pool or otherwise.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Regardless of whether he belongs to the pool organization or is farming on his own.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Absolutely.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: I should like to speak to that point. My honourable friend knows very well that the whole pool organization in western Canada, of which he has spoken profoundly and understandingly on other occasions, was adopted by the farmers as a means of alleviating their economic injustices, and that it was the culmination of many years of organized effort. The beginning of the movement, as my honourable friend from Churchill knows full well, was definitely associated with the establishment of the car order book system at country elevator points, whereby the individual producer, before he was organized into a group, by putting his name on the list could make the railways recognize his right of priority according to the place he occupied on that list. As I understand it, that system still obtains, with one great difference, that today the grain growers in western Canada are organized into what is known at a wheat pool, whose elevators belong to its members; and where there is a car order book the railways must supply cars to shippers in order of precedence. Pool members naturally have the priority: probably they constitute a large majority of farmers in the particular district. I suggest to my honourable friend that if, at any points in the grain growing and marketing areas of western Canada, hundreds of cars remain empty on the sidings, it is his duty and the duty of the farmers' representatives at those places to inform the Wheat Board and the Transport Controller.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

JUDGES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris moved the second reading of Bill 252, an Act to amend the Judges Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a short and simple bill, but of some importance. It provides for an increase in the number of judges in two provinces, Quebec and British Columbia. It relates to what we in British Columbia term the trial court and to a similar court in the province of Quebec.

It is proposed that in Quebec the number of Superior Court judges shall be increased by four to a total of 48. The number of Supreme Court judges in British Columbia will be increased by two, to 11, or, including the Chief Justice of the province, to 12.

I may explain to the house that section 92(14) of the British North America Act provides that the administration of justice in a province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts, is vested in the province. Therefore, the present bill would not have been introduced had the two provinces concerned not taken steps to make the bill necessary. At its recent session the Legislature of Quebec passed an act authorizing the number of Superior Court judges in that province to be increased by four. I thank my honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) for providing me with this information. It occurred to me that some honourable member might ask me a question on this point, and I thought I had better make sure what I was talking about. I myself checked the situation in British Columbia and I found that in 1955 the Legislature there, by chapter 13, authorized a change in the constitution of the provincial Supreme Court to provide for two additional judges. The two legislative acts—one initiated by the Duplessis Government in Quebec and the other by the Bennett Government in British Columbia—are an express indication of the importance and necessity for creating these additional judgeships.

I am not competent to voice an opinion in respect of Quebec, but I have a distinct and somewhat painful knowledge of conditions in my own province. As a matter of fact, I have to fly back to British Columbia within the next two weeks to take part in an important trial which was set down for hearing a month ago. There has been such a complete congestion of litigation before our courts that it has been simply impossible to get a case heard until at least two months after it has been set down for trial. Honourable senators can well understand what an undesirable situation this is.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is the situation not worse in Quebec?

Hon. Mr. Farris: It may well be. Perhaps my honourable friend knows that better than I do.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I have some reason for believing that the Quebec courts have been two years behind in the hearing of cases.

Hon. Mr. Farris: We are not two years behind in British Columbia, but we are certainly jammed up with current cases that have actually been set down for trial.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: What about Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It is not so bad.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I think the average layman has an idea that a judge works just so many hours a day grinding out judgments, and the layman's attitude probably is, "Let the judge work a little harder and catch up". I would point out that it is contrary to the basic principle of the administration of justice that a judge should be forced to act in a routine way. His work cannot be considered on the basis of the number of hours he actually sits in court. It is essential that judges, in order to fairly administer justice, should have sufficient time for thorough study of the problems presented to them. I know that in my province the judges are greatly handicapped in their effort to give important cases that deliberation and contemplation which is so essential in weighing the scales of justice between man and man.

I might say that in gathering information about this measure I read Hansard of the House of Commons, and much to my surprise I found that this bill—unlike the pipe line legislation now before that house—was handled expeditiously. In a very few minutes of one sitting of that house the bill was given second and third readings and was passed without a dissenting voice.

In view of the fact that the Legislatures of British Columbia and Quebec have seen fit to pass statutes providing for additional judges, and in view of the fact that the members of the other house, with their intimate knowledge of these matters, have seen fit to pass this bill without delay, I think the Senate should accept my word, and that of the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) that the bill is highly desirable and should be promptly enacted.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I heartily concur in the remarks of the sponsor of this bill. He has pointed out how essential it is that a judge should have enough time for contemplation and study in the preparation of judgments, and so forth. But there is another factor to be considered. A judge should be able to hear a case without having to hurry. One of the worst things in the conduct of litigation is to see a judge hurrying the parties, cutting them short,—

Hon. Mr. Farris: And jumping on the lawyers.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, shutting them off. Sometimes they need to be shut off a little bit, but it is far better that a judge should show a great deal of patience than be impatient in these matters. My colleagues of the important court on which we serve, the Standing Committee on Divorce, have had some experience in this very thing in recent times. Because of our new organization and the larger number of subcommittees hearing divorce petitions, we have not found ourselves being hurried. We are not pushed to get through our work. The result is that no person goes away thinking he did not have time to present his case fully, and that he has not been fairly dealt with. I think it is even more important to the litigants than to the judge that the judge should not be rushed and overloaded with work.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I have two questions that I should like to ask the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris). First, is the Superior Court of Quebec equal in stature to the Supreme Court of British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Reid: The second question: what is a puisne judge?

Hon. Mr. Farris: A puisne judge is a judge other than the Chief Justice of a court.

Hon. Vincent Dupuis: Honourable senators, I have a great deal of confidence in the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) and I have always desired that his province and mine should live in harmony. I fully agree with him and the sponsor of the bill that this legislation is really needed at this time. It has long been pressed for by the bar of the province of Quebec. And the provincial Legislature at its recent session passed a statute authorizing an increase of four in the number of Superior Court judges—which legislative action, as was pointed out by the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris), had to be taken before this bill could be introduced in Parliament.

So far as the district of Montreal is concerned, I wish most sincerely to felicitate our Associate Chief Justice there, who, with the gracious co-operation of other judges, has arranged for a more even distribution of cases, so that judges who happen to have no cases ready to be heard in the morning are assigned others that can be proceeded with. The roll has therefore improved greatly in the past couple of years, but we are still in arrears.

From my experience as a lawyer in Montreal I feel that not only four additional judges, but twice that number should be appointed. Consequently, I heartily support the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Farris: I see no object in delaying third reading.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No.

Hon. Mr. Farris: With leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

ALBION INSURANCE COMPANY—COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to Bill H-10, an Act to incorporate The Albion Insurance Company.

Hon. Vincent Dupuis, for Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the committee, moved that the amendments be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendments were concurred in.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: With leave, I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce, Nos. 345 to 357, which were presented yesterday.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Committee, moved that the reports be adopted.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

BILLS—SECOND READINGS

Hon. Mr. Roebuck moved the second reading of the following bills:

Bill W-12, an Act for the relief of Shirley Susan Morris Duggan.

Bill X-12, an Act for the relief of Maureen Evelyn Allison Cooper.

Bill Y-12, an Act for the relief of William Windsor Frewen.

Bill Z-12, an Act for the relief of Ethel Hansen Echlin.

Bill A-13, an Act for the relief of Muriel Doreen Southall Fisher.

Bill B-13, an Act for the relief of Paulette Lavallee Plotkin.

Bill C-13, an Act for the relief of Michael Costom.

Bill D-13, an Act for the relief of Peter Butler.

Bill E-13, an Act for the relief of Ivy Umilta Gooding Joseph.

Bill F-13, an Act for the relief of Margaret Lash Johnston.

Bill G-13, an Act for the relief of Ethel Simon Baroff.

Bill H-13, an Act for the relief of Golda Cohen Winter.

Bill I-13, an Act for the relief of Henriette Lessard Hughes.

Bill J-13, an Act for the relief of Ewart Ernest Clouston.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Next sitting.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 29, at 8 p.m.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION REPORT

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the following report from the Civil Service Commission.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Civil Service Commission, at the request of the Library of Parliament, and in accordance with the provisions of sections 62 and 9 of the Civil Service Act, has the honour to submit for approval the following:

It is recommended that the establishment of positions authorized for the Library of Parliament be amended by deleting one position of Librarian 4 and adding one position of Librarian 5, effective April 1, 1956.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this communication be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Next sitting.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 358 to 364, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

BILLS—FIRST READINGS

Hon. Mr. Roebuck presented the following bills:

Bill K-13, an Act for the relief of Mary Ethel Irving Buchanan Simcox.

Bill L-13, an Act for the relief of Constance Catherine Mary Pilon Milmine.

Bill M-13, an Act for the relief of Joseph Henri Maurice Messier.

Bill N-13, an Act for the relief of Mildred Helena Seale Darker.

Bill O-13, an Act for the relief of Robert Alfred Price.

Bill P-13, an Act for the relief of Alfred Sevigny.

The bills were read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: With leave, next sitting.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Hon. Mr. Reid inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of May 22:

1. In agreeing to the relocation of a different route of the Trans-Canada Highway in that part of British Columbia between the Pattullo Bridge and Abbotsford, and on sections between Abbotsford and Bridal Falls, what proportion of costs for the proposed relocation of these sections will be undertaken by the Dominion?

2. What amount of moneys has already been paid by the Government to the Province of British Columbia on the present designated Trans-Canada Highway on the sections recently agreed upon for relocation between the Pattullo Bridge and Bridal Falls?

3. In the event of the Government having agreed or decided to assume a percentage of the costs involved in relocating and building these new sections of the Trans-Canada Highway, is it the intention of the Government to take into consideration the amount of money already paid to the Provincial Government for the present sections now in use, which will be abandoned as part of the Trans-Canada Highway following completion of the new proposed sections?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have the following answer to the honourable gentleman's question:

1.—50 per cent, as provided for in the Trans-Canada Highway Agreement.

2.—$1,031,286.92.

3.—Payments made previously will be credited against claims made for construction on the proposed relocation.

DIVORCE BILLS

THIRD READINGS

Hon. Mr. Roebuck moved the third reading of the following bills:

Bill W-12, an Act for the relief of Shirley Susan Morris Duggan.

Bill X-12, an Act for the relief of Maureen Evelyn Allison Cooper.

Bill Y-12, an Act for the relief of William Windsor Frewen.

Bill Z-12, an Act for the relief of Ethel Hansen Echlin.

Bill A-13, an Act for the relief of Muriel Doreen Southall Fisher.

Bill B-13, an Act for the relief of Paulette Lavallee Plotkin.

Bill C-13, an Act for the relief of Michael Costom.

Bill D-13, an Act for the relief of Peter Butler.

Bill E-13, an Act for the relief of Ivy Umilta Gooding Joseph.

Bill F-13, an Act for the relief of Margaret Lash Johnston.

Bill G-13, an Act for the relief of Ethel Simon Baroff.

Bill H-13, an Act for the relief of Golda Cohen Winter.

Bill I-13, an Act for the relief of Henriette Lessard Hughes.

Bill J-13, an Act for the relief of Ewart Ernest Clouston.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the third time, and passed, on division.

NATIONAL HOUSING BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. David A. Croll moved the second reading of Bill 215, an Act to amend the National Housing Act, 1954.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of Bill 215 is to amend the National Housing Act, 1954. Its provisions are directed mainly towards the urban redevelopment and home improvement provisions of the act. There are other changes proposed, but they are of less importance.

I think I can give you the crux of the bill, to begin with, in capsule form.

When the proposed amendments become effective, the federal Government will continue in a more realistic fashion to provide financial aid to municipalities in acquiring and clearing blighted or slum areas in any municipality, and when cleared, the area will be put to its highest and best use. This may include its use for a public purpose, or for housing of all kinds, or—and I ask the house to note the change implied in these significant words—for commercial or industrial purposes.

There is a further requirement that families dispossessed by the acquisition and clearance must be re-housed in suitable and adequate accommodation within their family means.

The amount of federal assistance, in the first instance, will be one-half of the gross cost to the city of acquiring and clearing the area. The proceeds from the disposition of the cleared area will be divided between the municipality and the federal Government. The home improvement provisions of the act, which I am sure will be of particular interest to honourable senators, are being amended in two ways: first, by increasing the amount of loan that may be made available to an individual for the improvement of his home, and, secondly, by extending the period over which the loan may be paid back, from the present maximum of five years to a maximum of ten years. The maximum amount of the loan in respect of a single family dwelling is being increased from $2,500 to $4,000.

Those are the two main and important provisions of the bill, and before dealing with the proposed amendments in more detail I should like to review briefly the background of federal legislation on housing.

The first significant housing legislation was the Dominion Housing Act of 1935, which established a system of joint lending. Approved lenders, consisting mainly of life insurance companies, made loans under the act jointly with the Minister of Finance. The lenders' share of the loan was 75 per cent and the Minister of Finance contributed 25 per cent. Under the act of 1935 approximately 5,000 housing units were financed. National Housing Act of 1938 continued the joint lending arrangements and added provisions relating to low rental housing. Under the 1938 act more than 21,000 units were financed.

The 1944 act broadened the scope of the legislation very materially. It did three significant things. It continued joint lending; made provision for limited dividend low rental housing, and made it possible for banks to make guaranteed loans for home improvement and home extension. This represented a re-introduction of the principles of the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act of 1937, under which $50 million was loaned for home improvement purposes prior to the war. Provision was also made for research in housing and community planning.

Then came the National Housing Act, 1954, which wrote history in this country when the Bank Act was amended and insured loans were introduced. Within twenty-one months after that act introduced the banks to the loaning field, 108,000 loans were approved.

Let me present all this in perspective. Under the 1935 act 5,000 units were financed. Under the 1938 act 21,000 were financed. Then came the 1944 act, and in the ten years from 1944 to 1954 200,000 units were financed. And under the 1954 act, in less than two years 108,000 units have been financed. Honourable members will agree that is progress.

In 1945 about 12 per cent of the houses built throughout Canada were financed under the provisions of the federal act. Ten years later, in 1955, this proportion had increased to about 46 per cent, involving the insurance of loans aggregating in excess of $600 million.

During the year 1955 house building in Canada set an all-time record, with over 142,000 dwelling units started and more than 131,000 completed. Since 1945 the number of families in Canada has increased by 843,000, while 911,000 houses have been completed. During the past three years the number of houses completed has exceeded the increase in family formations; the excess of houses over family formations in 1955 was 53,000. That figure may give the impression that the sense of urgency has disappeared, but it does not mean that we can afford to be complacent. Housing has played and will continue to play a major role in our development. The problem does not admit of a static approach.

The Senate will be happy to know that the one millionth post-war house has already been started. Nor have the low income groups been neglected. They are provided for in two ways—limited dividend loans and federal-provincial projects.

Under the limited dividend provision, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is authorized to make loans up to 90 per cent of the loaning value of the project, repayable over a period of 50 years. The loan bears interest at 3¾ per cent per annum. The sponsor of such a project may establish a company the dividends of which, by its charter, are limited to 5 per cent of the amount invested by the sponsors. A long-term money arrangement and low interest rate permit the units to be rented at moderate and low rentals. This provision first came into effect in the 1944 act, under which 7,000 units have been financed to date. Over 1,000 of these units have been for elderly persons, and the monthly rents have ranged from $17 to $45 for fully serviced apartments. Units for other families of low income, financed under this provision, have ranged up to $60 per month.

The federal-provincial section of the act provides also that the federal Government in partnership with a province may build rental housing for low income families. Capital costs and operating costs or losses on these projects are borne 75 per cent by the federal Government and 25 per cent by the province. The province in turn, may have an arrangement with a municipality under which the municipality may contribute towards the province's share. Under this provision of the act about 6,000 housing units have been completed for people of moderate and low incomes. Nearly half of these rental housing projects are subsidized directly, and the remainder are rented at rentals calculated to cover the amortization of the capital, interest, taxes and administration costs. In the subsidized projects rents are geared to family income and adjusted for the size of the family.

I have already indicated that the National Housing Act has been amended from time to time to meet changing circumstances. The most important change took place in 1954, when the insured loan arrangement was established. Prior to 1954 loans were made on a joint basis, the lending institutions providing 75 per cent and the federal Government 25 per cent. As the house is aware, prior to 1954 the banks were prohibited from making loans secured by residential real estate. Under the 1954 act approved lending institutions provide the full amount of the loan and obtain from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation insurance against loss. The Bank Act was amended so as to permit banks to provide loans under the National Housing Act. The extensive branch system of the banks has added about 4,000 new points where the borrower can seek a house loan. It is true to say that mortgage money for housing is now available in every nook and corner of our country, and it is not stretching it too far to say that it is available at every whistle stop. The banks have participated to a significant degree. From March 22, 1954, when the new act came into effect, to the end of 1955, commitments have been made to the extent of 107,949 units, involving in excess of $1 billion. The banks have approved about 47 per cent of these loans.

The policy of the federal Government, as indicated by the National Housing Act, has been to create climate and conditions favourable to the development of a high level of housing construction. This has been done primarily through the efforts of the federal Government to encourage a steady flow of mortgage funds into the housing market. The housing activities assisted by the act are to be seen mainly in the new suburbs on the perimeter of our cities where so many families have acquired homes.

What is equally important, we have an established construction industry organized and capable of carrying on building in both summer and winter, whose full capacity has not yet been tested, and which is employing more than 300,000 people in the ratio of one on the job and two off the job.

While a large and extensive program of house construction has proceeded on the perimeter of our cities, little attention has been paid to the heart of our cities, which is also the heart of our problem. We are now entering an historic period in the building of our cities. Within the next 25 years the population of Canadian cities and towns will double. The amount of urban housing to be built in this brief span of time will exceed in quantity all that has been inherited from the past. Our national economy has already displayed the productive capacity to accomplish this very great task. There remains the challenge to give our cities a character and design worthy of the great opportunity.

It is with this aspect of our urban growth that the bill before us is vitally concerned. While the suburbs have spread into the surrounding countryside, many changes have overtaken the existing housing in the centre of our cities. In old residential districts some houses have been replaced by apartment buildings, many have been converted to boarding houses and other uses. From nearly a century of house building Canadian cities have inherited a stock of housing which is caught in the relentless process of depreciation and obsolescence.

The growth of cities has placed new demands upon the centre of urban areas with increasing traffic, growing commerce and a changing pattern of living. During the past ten years, we gave the highest priority to building homes—and that is as it should be—mostly in the suburbs where land and services were available, and took no concerted action to conserve and replace the existing stock of the nation's older housing.

There are now more than 3·8 million housing units in Canada, two-thirds of which are more than 25 years old. More than half a million are more than 50 years old. About 10 per cent of all our housing is more than 75 years old. These houses which shelter the majority of our population are a very important part of our national wealth, but it is a form of wealth which does not improve with age and use. The stock of housing must inevitably decline in physical condition and usefulness unless there are effective measures of conservation and unless steps are taken to replace what is obsolete in our housing inventory.

The last census showed that in our major cities alone as many as 100,000 units are in a serious state through lack of repair and, I regret to say, are lacking in the most elementary sanitary arrangements for healthy living. In most cities there are areas where the sanitary arrangements have reached a condition which can only be rectified by complete redevelopment. I refer of course to blighted areas—in other words, just plain slums.

Since 1944 grants have been offered to municipalities to acquire and clear substandard, blighted or slum areas. To re-house families living in these areas, loans have been made available to limited dividend corporations and the federal government has been ready and has entered into partnership arrangements with provincial governments to build low rental houses. On May 24—just last Friday—a housing project of 100 subsidized rental units was started in Saint John, New Brunswick, to cost $896,070. Already there are in Saint John 288 subsidized rental units. Though much has been done, a great deal more could be done under this dominion-provincial arrangement for low rental housing.

In the past, grants for blighted or slum areas were payable only after—I emphasize the word "after"—acquisition and development by the municipalities. That imposed a financial burden which many municipalities could not meet; thus, due to municipal financial stringency and credit, some essential undertakings were not proceeded with and local incentive and initiative were lost thereby. That is being corrected in this bill.

This bill does not propose to change the net amount of the grant. Under the present legislation the federal Government may enter into an agreement to pay the municipality from the very inception and during the process of acquisition and clearance one-half of the cost to the municipality. When the project is disposed of the proceeds are shared between the municipality and the federal Government on an equal basis. Thus the federal Government will be a half partner of the municipality from the very beginning of the undertaking of any redevelopment project. This adds flexibility to the arrangements and provides the municipality with half the gross finances during the process of acquisition, clearance and disposal. This financial arrangement will be welcomed by the municipalities.

Here is another important point which will be of interest to this house. At the present time an area may be acquired and cleared only if it is to be used for re-housing or for public purposes. The bill removes this limitation, so that cleared land may be put to the highest and best use; which may be for re-housing or public purposes, or commercial or industrial purposes. I am sure the house has now caught the significance of those words.

There remains, however, one important limitation—the redevelopment area must be of substantial size so as to establish a new neighbourhood character. The bill does not contemplate piecemeal projects. It is considered that a municipality may have to exercise its power of expropriation to acquire sufficiently large tracts of land to round out workable sites. The bill anticipates no little plans. There is a provision to the effect that any families dispossessed must be re-housed in suitable accommodation at rents within their means, which means that there must be a relocation of families.

And while we are talking about slum projects, it will be interesting for the house to know that the federal Government has given grants to two slum clearance projects—one in St. John's, Newfoundland, and the other in Toronto. In Toronto there is what is known as the Regent Park (North) project, pursuant to which about 40 acres were cleared by the city, and upon that area 1,289 housing units have now been completed. The federal grant amounted to $1,300,000. The province contributed $1,000 per housing unit.

Under the present bill it will not be essential for the province to participate in any projects, but it will be necessary that the province formally approve a municipal-federal undertaking. Provincial participation will of course be welcomed by both the municipality and the Government.

There is one very interesting fact that I want to emphasize about the Regent Park (North) project. Prior to its acquisition and clearance the tax payments to the municipality for the property involved, the 40 acres that I mentioned, were some $36,000 a year. The new project is paying annual taxes amounting to $240,000 per year, while at the same time it is reducing the principal debt and paying all carrying charges. I emphasize this because it clearly demonstrates what many of us have for a long time been saying, that slum clearance not only serves a social and welfare purpose but an economic one as well, not to mention the human betterment.

At the present time there are under active consideration two other projects—one, the Regent Park (South) project in Toronto, which may be almost a repeat of the Regent Park (North) project; and the other, a very large project in Montreal.

The second significant amendment contained in the bill before us deals with home improvement loans. At the present time loans may be made by banks to individuals wishing to improve their homes. These loans are guaranteed by the federal Government. The present limit is $2,500 for a single home and $1,250 for each additional housing unit in the building. These loans are repayable in not more than five years. Under the proposed legislation the loan is being increased to a maximum of $4,000 for each individual housing unit and $1,500 for each additional unit, repayable in periods up to 10 years.

The bill contains a number of minor amendments, which I do not propose to deal with at this time. They can be fully discussed when the bill is before the appropriate committee, where details will be available.

Now, let me sum up, if I may. This bill, as I interpret it, removes a further roadblock to slum clearance. The first approach to the redevelopment of slum areas was one of participation. The federal Government would give a grant and the lands had to be redeveloped for housing or public use. This bill is aimed directly at the heart of the problem which our great cities face. It is no longer a matter of mere participation, it is now a partnership between the federal Government and the municipalities. The partnership is a 50-50 one and the lands may be used for the best possible purposes, either commercial or industrial. I believe that this is the beginning of a realistic attack on slums. If the amended act catches the imagination of the people and arouses their sense of social justice, then if I were a slum I would worry.

This is the tenth anniversary of the National Housing Act which was passed in 1946. The first 10 years have been memorable ones. We have benefited from 10 years of its operation. I think that is worthy of note and comment and commendation. The administrators are not ivory-tower dreamers, but are ever trying to improve the act and to provide adequate housing within the reach of those whose need is greatest. Their approach has been realistic, productive and profitable. I mention the Government and the minister as worthy of commendation. I pay special tribute to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which have done a magnificent job since the act came into effect in 1946.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, this is a very important bill. I come from a city that would be very glad to see it passed, but I want to point out some difficulties although I may not know them all.

For 14 years I represented on the Winnipeg School Board an area now known as Number One Slum District. The houses which were there then are still standing. I have canvassed families in every one of them, and I know what these places are like.

We want to clear away the slums in Winnipeg and in every other city, town and village of Canada. The problem is how to do it. Will it be solved if this bill becomes law? That is the question. In my own province, and probably in every other, municipalities require more and more money for their various activities, including the maintenance of schools. I am thinking of a house in my own city, which I will not further identify, consisting of six rooms, namely, three bedrooms, a kitchen, a dining-room, a living-room and also a bathroom. The occupants include six children, all of school age. To build a house suitable for that family would cost today not less than $10,000. The existing dwelling could be sold to the commission for about $2,000; the land is worth not more than $1,500, probably only $1,000, because the frontage is limited to 25 feet. So, at best, $3,500 would be available for the building of a $10,000 house. True, the dominion and municipal authorities would each pay half of the value of $3,500, but what is the situation of the man who built the place and owns it? The Winnipeg commission, like that in some other cities, is composed of social service workers. I honour these people for the work they do. They loyally support a policy they believe in, and most of us have confidence in them. But how can the tenants of a $3,500 house, who are paying $120 a year in taxes, afford to occupy a $10,000 house on which the taxes are $350 a year?

It is not enough for the federal Government to assume half of the cost of acquisition and clearance. If it intends to solve Canada's slum problem it will have to provide the municipalities with greater relief in respect of taxation. Real estate cannot carry much longer the cost of our educational system. As I have pointed out, the expense of maintaining schools is far greater than it was some years ago. And it is also to be noted that one of the chief elements of the added cost of living is higher rentals. For some time there was in effect a law under which the owner of a piece of real estate who rented it could not set the price; he got only what he was permitted to charge; whereas if his money had been invested in bonds his profit would have been unrestricted. It was a law which should never have been passed—I have said so before in this house—but it was an element in reducing the cost of living, and now that it has been repealed, the tenant of course has to pay more.

I repeat that I am in favour of slum clearance, but how are slums to be cleared away, whether in Winnipeg, Toronto, Saint John, Montreal—if Montreal has slums, as I presume it has—?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: It has other things!

Hon. Mr. Haig: I know it has other things; but what will be the position of a property owner who is compensated with no more than $3,500, if a house to replace it cannot be built for less than $10,000? In my city people from the slum area told the commission, "If you solve our cost problem we will move out of our present accommodation; if you do not solve it you have got to put us out". Similar difficulties, I have no doubt, face the authorities in Regina, Saskatoon, and all through the prairie country, where during five or six months each year the weather is very cold and good accommodation at reasonable prices is necessary.

Slum areas present other problems. In Canada, as in the United States and Britain, they seem to breed an unusually large proportion of zoot-suiters, although admittedly these youngsters are recruited from every part of a city. And there is no doubt that an unduly large proportion of hospital admissions —in Winnipeg, nearly one-half—come from about one-tenth of a city's area, namely the slum district. This is not right. Men, women and children from these sections are as much entitled to have their health safeguarded as are those in any other area.

I have raised these questions, not in opposition to the purpose of the bill, but to point out that although the Government has gone a long way in the right direction, it is not providing by this bill a cure for the problem.

I know a young man who lives in exactly the same kind of house in which I lived 50 years ago. At that time my tax bill was $100 a year. We had three bedrooms, a large combination living-dining-room, a reasonably sized kitchen, a basement with a furnace, and so on. I paid $100 a year in taxes and I thought I was being robbed when they were finally boosted up to $125. I kicked awfully hard about it, but the city assessors thought otherwise. This young man I mentioned now pays $360 a year in taxes for the same accommodation. That illustrates how taxes have increased in Winnipeg, and our city is no exception. As a matter of fact, Winnipeg is a well-governed city and has been honestly and extremely well run. I can only go back fifty years, but during that length of time I have known nearly every man and woman who has served on the city council and the school board and I can say they have been honest, upright and able representatives, who have always tried to keep expenses down. Nowadays a school with eight rooms costs some $300,000 to build but when I was on the board a similar school cost only $100,000, yet people said we were extravagant. Those are the facts. There is absolutely no solution in this bill to the slum problem.

Hon. Mr. Farris: What is the solution?

Hon. Mr. Haig: The solution is for the federal Government or the provincial Government or both to pay a larger share towards the cost of education. There is no doubt at all about that, and the day will come when this will have to be done if our children are going to be educated. I realize such a policy might be looked upon by some as an interference with provincial rights; but the fact is we are giving money now for education. The federal Government has to give the provinces and municipalities more money or provide them with a larger field of taxation in order to meet the cost of education. I don't care which way it is done, but the municipalities have to get a larger share of the earnings of people in order to carry the load. I have no objection when the city taxes me on account of the cost of fire and police protection and street cleaning, but my house should not be heavily taxed to help meet the cost of educating the children in the community while the owners of the business block across the road pay only a small share of this cost. The federal Government pays no taxes in my city, yet it takes out $15 or $20 million a year in income tax alone.

The solution is this. Give the municipalities sufficient money to carry on their services, and let the federal Government, in co-operation with the municipalities, clear out the slum areas and replace them with new houses. At the same time the federal and municipal governments will have to share the cost of compensating owners for transferring from one house to another. As far as the municipalities are concerned, it would pay them in the long run to do this, but they cannot afford to do it alone. The cost is just too high. I know it is for Winnipeg, and I am sure it is for Montreal, Fredericton, Halifax, or any other municipality.

There are several other matters involved in this bill. There is the question of housing rental by the provinces. I am not talking politics. Three or four other senators are present from Manitoba and they have opposite political views to mine, and I am sure they would be ready to answer me if I were talking politics. The Government of Manitoba claims —I think this is right—that it is spending all it can afford on assisting its municipalities, and that it has got to have greater help in this regard. The federal Government has offered some kind of settlement, which is due in 1957. But it is not enough under the present cost of living and of everything else. These costs have increased so much over the last twenty-five years that it is just impossible to work on the basis of old standards.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit me to ask a question?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: How would he suggest the federal Government should raise the taxes to pay this?

Hon. Mr. Haig: It would not need to raise the taxes.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: Do you mean there is money enough as it is?

Hon. Mr. Haig: The taxes are high enough now, but the Government could contribute more to education and cut down on other things. Education is far more important than many of the things it is spending money on now.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It is much easier said than done.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Surely it is, but it has got to be done.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Nobody has yet discovered how to do it.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Why in the world should we send a soldier and his wife and nine children to Europe, build a house for them there and keep them all over there so that the soldier can take his training there. I do not know why, and nobody else does either.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Ask the soldiers.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Our soldiers should not have to have that kind of training.

Hon. Mr. Baird: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The point is that education and slum clearance is something we have to take care of, and we cannot effect slum clearance unless we lighten the load on the municipalities. They have only so much money. That is the situation. I will not vote against this bill, for it probably is an attempt at slum clearance, but personally I do not think it will succeed. It may in some of the richer cities like Toronto, but I don't think it will do any good in my own city. We just have to get more financial assistance than is proposed in this bill, and unless we get it I do not see how we can clear up our slum areas. We will have them with us for a long time. This whole question requires the attention of the best minds in the country.

Mention has been made of money being spent on rental houses for soldiers. This type of housing scheme has not been successful in Manitoba, for our provincial Government has refused to pay any part of it. Back around 1938 the federal Government did build some houses there and rented them to veterans, giving them an option to purchase. The municipality agreed to a certain tax levy that would remain unchanged. Well, that particular housing project is still in existence, but no new buildings have been constructed under that arrangement for probably the last seventeen or eighteen years. Time and time again schemes have been introduced to build up areas for veterans. I will admit that the federal Government has been willing to pay 75 per cent of the cost, but the provincial Government has said it cannot pay the remaining 25 per cent. Whether it can or not I do not know. In any event, if this bill goes into effect I do not expect any results from it as far as slum clearance is concerned.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I cannot let this bill receive second reading without making some comments.

First, I wish to compliment the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) upon the wealth of information contained in his explanation. He expressed himself with a clarity that was remarkable and at the same time most acceptable. I think his latent enthusiasm was delightful.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The senator from Toronto-Spadina is a humanitarian, and no doubt the humanitarian aspects of this bill touch his heart very closely, as they do mine. I commend him for the work he has done in the preparation of his address and for the service he has rendered to this house by its delivery.

I think it is true, and that in justice to this chamber it should be said, that when matters of humanitarian interest come before it they always receive sympathetic consideration by all honourable senators.

The Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) dwelt on a problem that always confronts us when an effort is made to cure evils arising from the housing shortage. In the main, of course, he is right in saying that the task is to provide good housing at a cost which people in the lower income brackets can afford to pay.

I noticed the enthusiasm with which my friend from Toronto-Spadina spoke about the limited dividend provisions of the act. But although the greatest of care may be exercised by the department to see that the dividends to be reaped by those who are putting up the money for the building of a house shall not be excessive, I did not hear him say anything about any limitation upon the value of land required for the building of the house. I speak from experience. Not long ago I thought I would build a house—it seemed to be necessary at the time—and I looked around for a lot, but I could not find a suitable one within the limits of the city of Toronto for less than $6,000. That would be a very high figure to pay for a start—just to get someone to move off a piece of land so that I might use it. An item in a Toronto newspaper recently told about a farm on the outskirts of the city—when I say "the outskirts," I mean miles away—which sold for $1 million. That is indicative of what was going on all over the place.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Another one sold for $2 million.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Well, I suppose it depends on the size. There seems to be almost no limit to the prices that will be paid for land. My friend from Toronto-Spadina referred to the blighted areas in the centres of our cities. If an inquiry is made it will be found that those blighted areas are very high in land values and very low in building values. In discussing housing problems it only confuses the issue to speak of real estate; for real estate, in the ordinary accepted meaning of that term, includes two types of value, namely, the value of the house that is constructed by man's hands, and the land value, which is not due to the efforts of a particular owner, but to the efforts of the community and of all the citizens combined.

The Leader of the Opposition complains of the tremendously high taxes. He is right. But can he tell me of anything higher than the tax on houses? Take the sales tax of 5 or 6 or 7 per cent—

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Ten per cent.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: —when that tax is paid, that is the end of it, but when money is put into a house the purchaser pays 3 or 4 or 5 per cent annually on that house as long as it is in his possession. A house is the most heavily taxed property in Canada. On the other hand, land values are so under-taxed that the owner is able to extact from the user a tremendous—

An hon. Senator: Socialism!

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: My friend says "Socialism." No, that is not socialism. It is the very antithesis of socialism; it is just common sense applied to municipal affairs. Taxes on land values are so low that the owner of the land is able to charge the user of the land fantastic prices. The solution is not to try to rob the dominion treasury of enormous sums of money, as the Leader of the Opposition suggests, in order to carry municipal services. He speaks of "the federal Government". Well, the federal Government has not a copper of its own. He really means the taxpayers who supply the money to the federal Government. How does he propose to get the money? He speaks not in terms of small figures but large figures. Should we increase the income tax, or is it high enough already? Should we raise the sales or corporation taxes, or raise the tariffs, or are they not high enough now? If the cost of municipal services is switched to the dominion treasury, it must always be remembered that it is still the taxpayer who supplies the money. And when one considers the kinds of taxes—the land value tax, the house value tax, the tariff tax, and so on—what is the choice between them? The taxpayer puts up the money in any event. True, some kinds of taxation are more damaging than others. The one that is least damaging of all is the land value tax.

My friend says, "Reduce the cost of the dominion Government and then you will not need to increase the taxes." There is something in that, but perhaps not nearly as much as he suggests. I recently read of a reduction by the United Kingdom in its expenditures on military upkeep, a reduction in the number of soldiers to be kept under arms. Also it has been stated, whether truly or not I do not know, that Russia is talking about reducing her expenditures. I have wondered, although I have no knowledge upon which to base a decision, if the time is not coming soon when this dominion will be able to reduce the heavy taxes which we are bearing for military purposes. Very large sums indeed are paid for military upkeep. I have never voted against them, for I would not take the responsibility of doing so, but I do hope that those who are responsible for these heavy expenditures will, in the near future, consider the possibility of reducing them somewhat, but in keeping with the public security.

Honourable senators, I like to see houses built. There has been a wonderful development and I think the dominion Government is entitled to a great deal of credit. I share with the member for Toronto-Spadina his enthusiasm, latent and otherwise. I also agree heartily with the Leader of the Opposition that it is time we examined underlying principles and facts and brought a realistic view to the question of housing.

I know that municipal taxes are a matter for provincial and not dominion legislation; but my friend from Toronto-Spadina talks about a partnership between the municipalities and the federal Government for the provision of housing, and the important questions to which I have referred are of interest to the dominion as well as to the provinces. Under present arrangements for meeting housing needs some persons become immensely wealthy at the public expense while others are required to pay exorbitant rates of tax on their homes. Unless we give some thought to that problem, with a view to reducing the cost of owning and occupying houses, we may not be so generous in our gifts or partnership. Now that we are partners in this operation which involves huge expenditures, we have something to say about it. And let us not refer to those who try to make an intelligent analysis of the problem as socialists, and think that thereby we have answered them. We have to match thought with thought, not just call names. We must give consideration to the big problem of housing and how we are going to deal with it.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon Mr. Croll, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF FINANCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the third report of the Standing Committee on Finance, which was presented on May 24.

Hon. Charles G. Hawkins, Chairman of the committee, moved that the report be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the report of the committee on Bill 216.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to whom was referred the Bill (216) intituled: "An Act to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act", have in obedience to the order of reference of May 22, 1956, examined the said bill and now report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Next sitting.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Hugessen presented the report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on Bill O-8.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to whom was referred the Bill (O-8) intituled: "An Act to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act", have in obedience to the order of reference of May 23, 1956, examined the said bill and now report the same with the following amendment:

Page 2, lines 21 and 22: delete "compliance with section 7," and substitute therefor "deposit and advertisement as in the case of a proposed work,".

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Next sitting.

DIVORCE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the following bills:

Bill Q-13, an Act for the relief of Marie Theresa Gerega St-Jacques.

Bill R-13, an Act for the relief of Julius Michael Cantor.

Bill S-13, an Act for the relief of Gerald Zelman.

Bill T-13, an Act for the relief of Lucille Viola Arthur Ward.

Bill U-13, an Act for the relief of May O'Connor MacKenzie.

Bill V-13, an Act for the relief of Rita Cleevely Scott.

Bill W-13, an Act for the relief of Leah Banfield Rideout.

Bill X-13, an Act for the relief of Margaret Isobel Gillespie Mackenzie.

Bill Y-13, an Act for the relief of Edda Roehm Sackmann.

Bill A-14, an Act for the relief of Jacqueline Bussiere Sirois.

Bill B-14, an Act for the relief of Doris Elaine Cameron Gladwish.

Bill C-14, an Act for the relief of Myra Goodman Lobell.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: With leave, next sitting.

EXCHEQUER COURT (DIVORCE JURISDICTION) BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING NEGATIVED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 23, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, seconded by Hon. Mrs. Hodges, for the second reading of Bill I-5, an Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) speaks now, his speech will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to make a very long speech, but there are some matters which I would like to clear up, and some additional remarks that I want to make, in the hope that they may have some influence upon those who are wavering and have not yet decided just how they will vote on this bill.

In the first place, however, I want to thank all those who have taken part in this debate. The debate opened on the 28th of February and has continued on and off for the last three months, during which time we have had quite a number of excellent speeches. I want to congratulate particularly my seconder (Hon.

Mrs. Hodges), who made, in my opinion, an outstanding speech; it was so good, in fact, that it received prominence on the front pages of daily papers in all parts of Canada. I want to thank all honourable members who have spoken in support of the bill. I should also mention that the press gave us very good coverage, and my special thanks are tendered to Mr. Grant Dexter, of the Winnipeg Free Press, who wrote two very fine articles, which were published in that paper on February 28 and 29 last.

Before I go any further there is one little matter I should clear up with respect to the report made in 1947 by Mr. John F. MacNeill, the Clerk of this house, who at that time was our Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel. The honourable senator from Queens-Lunenburg (Hon. Mr. Kinley) indicated, I believe, that in my remarks on February 28 I gave the impression that the suggestions which were made in that report were those of Mr. MacNeill. I had no intention of leaving that impression; he was merely enumerating the various suggestions which from time to time have been made by other people, and in connection with which he did not bring in any final report.

I thought I made out a good case for the passing of this bill when I spoke on February 28, and in my opinion no convincing argument has been made against it. The question before us is not one of divorce; it is simply whether the practice we have been following for many years is going to continue. The honourable senator from Queens-Lunenburg said something to the effect, if I remember correctly, that when moving the second reading I had implied that one purpose of the bill was to reduce our work. I should just like to quote from Hansard to convince my honourable friend that I said nothing of the kind. I am reading from page 198:

> May I emphasize that the bringing in of this bill is not an attempt on my part to get out of doing some work. During my term as Chairman of the committee I never complained, no matter how many cases we had to deal with. The purpose of the bill is not to reduce our work, but to remove from Parliament a work that we should not be doing here.

And at page 197:

> In those days, while my friends from Ontario and Quebec were spending their week-ends in Montreal and Toronto we were working very hard at disposing of numerous cases. I never objected; in fact, I rather enjoyed the work. However, I always felt that this was not a task that Parliament should be dealing with at all. It seemed to me that my time was being more or less wasted and that I could have applied myself better to more important national matters. I always believed, too, that that was the opinion of the people of Canada as a whole, that they did not think we should be spending our time on matrimonial squabbles between husband and wife, but would prefer to have us handling matters of more importance to the country at large.

Then I went on to explain why Bill I-5 was being introduced. I beg your indulgence while I read a few more lines from what I said on that occasion:

> Bill I-5 deals with parliamentary divorce only; it does not propose to change the grounds for divorce, and it has nothing whatever to do with the question whether divorce should or should not be permitted. It is merely a proposal to change the present practice under which persons from two provinces of Canada have to come to Parliament to seek a divorce. The bill deals with nothing else, and I hope that honourable senators who participate in the debate on it will try to confine themselves to the issue.

I may say that I prepared drafts of two speeches. The earlier draft I discarded because it contained certain facts and figures that might have resulted in a wide-open debate on the question of divorce, and I did not want that to occur. I was careful to leave all this material out of my speech of February 28, yet in spite of that certain senators, it seemed to me, strayed far afield of the bill.

As I said before, I feel that no good case had been made out against the bill. It is my opinion right now that, down in the bottom of his heart, no senator present today can find any real reason for not voting for the bill.

Parliamentary divorce at first was no problem at all. To indicate how it has developed since the year 1867, I would like to put on the record a table showing the number of divorces granted by Parliament in various years:

1868	1
1870	0
1872	0
1874	0
1876	0
1877	3
1878	3
1880	0
1885	5
1890	2
1900	5
1910	20
1920	100

Then we come to the year 1930, when Ontario was given divorce jurisdiction.

1930	247
1940	62
1943	92
1944	111
1945	179
1946	290
1947	348
1947-48	292
1949	350
1950	240

1951	294
1952	312
1953	282

Honourable senators will see that in 1867, when the British North America Act was passed, divorce petitions to Parliament were so few that they created no problem at all, but that as the years have gone by, and particularly since the last war, the number of cases has increased by leaps and bounds. From January 1, 1931—that is after Ontario secured divorce jurisdiction—to December 31, 1955, 4,133 divorces were granted by Parliament. All the petitioners were from Quebec, except 17 from Prince Edward Island and 30 from Newfoundland. In addition, many petitions were heard and refused, some were partly heard and withdrawn, and others were wholly withdrawn. That is the picture at the present time.

Now, honourable senators, the question is, what are we going to do about it? Are we going to continue to handle divorces or are we going to turn the cases over to the Exchequer Court to be adjudicated upon in the usual way?

During the debate on this bill it was said by several honourable senators, including myself, that no other parliament or legislature in the world today deals with divorces in the manner in which we do here. In my opinion our practice is indeed archaic. We are following a practice which prevailed in England after the Reformation. I have in my hand the report of the Royal Commission on Marriage and Divorce presented to the British Parliament in March of this year. Incidentally, I see from the speech made by the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett), delivered during my absence last week, that he too has a copy of this report. It is well worth reading. I would like to quote one short paragraph from page 4:

> It appears that in the years immediately after the Reformation in some cases parties regard themselves as entitled to marry again after (or possibly even without) a decree of divorce a mensa et thoro, but by the beginning of the seventeenth century the earlier view prevailed that the courts had no power to dissolve marriages. From then until 1857, the only means of setting aside a valid marriage was by private act of Parliament—a practice which developed at the end of the seventeenth century. This process was both slow and expensive, and over the period 1715 to 1852 the total number of dissolutions was, according to the report of the Royal Commission of 1850, only 244.
> These arrangements continued unchanged until the middle of the nineteenth century. The situation as it existed in 1850 was summarised in the report of the Royal Commission of 1909 as follows:
> ". . . according to common law as well as ecclesiastical law and practice, divorce remained unrecognized; but the Legislature recognized it, in case of a wife's adultery, and in case of a husband's, when his adultery was accompanied with aggravating circumstances, by giving a remedy . . . through what was in form a legislative, but in substance a judicial, proceeding, which was open, as a matter of course, on sufficient evidence, to anyone who was rich enough to pay for it. The cost and inconvenience were, however, so great that the remedy was obviously beyond the means of the great bulk of the community."

It seems to me, honourable senators, that when divorce jurisdiction was given to the Parliament of Canada by the British North America Act of 1867 we were merely adopting a practice that had existed in England prior to the Reformation.

It was said, I think by the Chairman of the Divorce Committee (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), that the committee could handle even more cases than are now coming before it—even if they increased to 600 or 700. I do not think that a man of his ability and experience in public life was summoned to this house for the purpose of spending the greater part of his time on that kind of work. I think his talents could be used to greater advantage in the consideration of national affairs. I have no doubt that if half the members of this chamber belonged to the Divorce Committee and it divided itself into ten or fifteen sections, they could handle a great many more cases; however, it would not be very long before public opinion would demand that something be done about it. It is my view that we should take the matter in our hands right now and do something about it.

As I said earlier, this work takes up a great deal of the time of a number of senators. The senator from Queens-Lunenburg said that although he did not believe in divorce in any form, he was willing to serve on the committee and do his part. I have before me the attendance record of the committee for last session, which shows that out of 52 sitting days the senator from Queen's-Lunenburg was present on only 15 occasions.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Honourable senators, may I rise on a question of privilege? I have been on the committee ever since I became a member of this house, and I regularly attended its sittings until last session, during the greater part of which I was travelling in the Mediterranean.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We have on the Divorce Committee one senator from the province of Quebec. I am not going to name him, but I will look right at him. Out of the 52 sitting days last year, he attended four days.

If this situation is to continue, my suggestion is that the senators from Quebec, who so much favour the present procedure for handling divorce petitions, should themselves take over the work of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Let them sit here from Monday to Friday for the first eight weeks of the session instead of going home to Montreal or Quebec City every Thursday night; and when the bulk of the petitions have been heard and disposed of, let them stay here on Tuesdays and Fridays to attend the committee.

Hon. Mr. Reid: What a hope!

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is what would happen if other senators refused to do the work. Why should the senators from the far east and west, instead of occasionally having a free week-end in which to attend to their own business, have to stay in Ottawa just to do the work that is properly that of the senators from Quebec who favour the handling of divorce in this way? If they want to keep divorces in the Senate, let them do the work.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I would not like the house or the public to feel that the senators from Quebec have refused to do their duty because of not serving on the Divorce Committee. If we are not members of the committee, it is because we cannot conscientiously belong. If the other senators wish us to go on that committee and deal with the petitions, we will do so, but by refusing them. My honourable friend would not like that.

Hon. Mr. Horner: The judges have to do this type of work.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Judges have to do it. We do not.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I may say that in Saskatchewan we have quite a number of judges of the same religious faith as the honourable senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard), yet day after day they hear divorce cases and decide them according to law. I do not think there is any excuse at all for the senators from Quebec. But I will leave that question for the moment.

I would like to refer now to the remarkable speech which was made by my friend the senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly). I listened to him very attentively, and until just before he ended I was under the impression that he was going to vote for my bill. He went into the subject very fully and showed how this question had been dealt with at the time of Confederation, and he led right up to the finale; then, much to my consternation, he said that he was going to vote against the bill. Well, I thank him for making that speech because it was helpful to me. It gave me an insight into the question that I did not have before.

The senator from Ottawa West spoke immediately after the senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) and opened his remarks with the following words, as reported at page 297 of Hansard:

> Honourable senators, I think I should say in the first place that if the honourable gentleman who introduced this bill (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) wanted to find a good reason why it should have been introduced, the speech which has just been made would probably justify everything that he has done.

He was referring, of course, to the speech made by the honourable member from Toronto-Trinity.

Then, as reported at page 298, the senator from Ottawa West said this:

> The avowed purpose of the bill, in its practical result, is to end parliamentary divorce in Canada, and to substitute for it a limited divorce jurisdiction in a federal court, the Exchequer Court of Canada. If the bill should pass, the judicial function now exercised by our Standing Committee on Divorce would practically disappear.

I agree with that. As I said in my previous speech, an occasional case from Quebec might come to Parliament; but that province would likely follow the pattern of Ontario after it was given divorce jurisdiction. As honourable senators know, we have had no petitions from Ontario since then.

I want to quote further from the speech of the honourable senator from Ottawa West, at page 298 of Hansard:

> Let me put it in another way. In 1930, when Parliament passed the Divorce Act (Ontario), the federal authority did not relinquish to that province its power to legislate upon divorce. Rather, that act declared that the divorce law which would run in Ontario thenceforth would be the law of England as of a certain date. From this declaration it followed that in Ontario thereafter, for the administration of justice in matters of divorce, resort could be had to the courts of Ontario. The validity of that act has not been successfully questioned. I doubt if it could be successfully questioned and I think the same could be said of this bill if it becomes effective. Perhaps I should add that pursuant to the authority vested in Ontario in 1930, that province proceeded in 1931 to enact the Matrimonial Causes Act. This Ontario legislation deals with such matters as maintenance, alimony, custody, and the settlement of property rights between the consorts. There are no such provisions made by the bill now before the Senate, . . .

This is the point I now want to emphasize.

> . . . and so it can be assumed that jurisdiction over these matters—which, and perhaps here I disagree slightly with the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), I think are matters of property and civil rights within the province—should remain in the courts of the provinces to which this bill applies.

Now, I agree entirely with that statement.

When drafting this Bill I-5 I examined the Ontario bill very carefully and deliberately left out all references to the law of England, so that control over maintenance, alimony, custody, settlement of property rights, and nullity would be left with the two provinces concerned. And it is my opinion, honourable senators, that if this bill is passed the Exchequer Court will have no jurisdiction whatever over those matters; that they would continue to reside within the powers of the courts of Quebec and Newfoundland.

I think I have disposed of the main arguments of the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). But my honourable friend said something else, namely, that there was no demand from the province of Quebec for this legislation. Now, I do not admit that at all. As honourable senators know, I have served on the Divorce Committee for almost 22 years, and during that time I have had many conversations with lawyers from the province of Quebec who were conducting cases on behalf of clients. Time and time again they told me, almost to a man, that their clients do not want to have to come to Parliament to go through our complicated procedure to get a divorce; rather, they would like to have their cases dealt with more quickly and economically by some court. Many of these lawyers suggested that in their opinion that court should be the Exchequer Court of Canada, so as not to necessitate the setting up of a court in Quebec, which is objectionable to the people of that province.

I want to point out in this connection also that at the time the Ontario Act of 1930 was passed there was no agitation for that legislation from the province. Prior to that time, from 1920 to 1928, as I said in my original remarks, the Senate had passed four bills to give the province of Ontario jurisdiction, but they were rejected by the other house. Then in 1930 a private member of the Commons from another province brought in a bill to give Ontario jurisdiction, and it was passed on a free vote in both houses.

The honourable senator from Ottawa West said that the reason why Parliament was given exclusive jurisdiction was that the rights of the minority should not be taken away from them. I agree with that. The provisions of this bill cannot affect in any manner whatever the rights of majorities in the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland. The purpose of the bill is merely to provide the minority—whether Catholic, Protestant or of no religion—who believe in the right of divorce, a convenient and less costly means of having cases heard and disposed of than by petitioning Parliament for a private bill. There is no attempt to impose or force anything on the people of Quebec. The honourable senator from Grandville states that anyone belonging to his faith who comes to Parliament for a divorce is a sinner. Well, the Bible says that all men are sinners—

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: And liars.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine:—and I do not think the retention of divorce business in Parliament will help at all in that respect. If a minority is in favour of divorce, I cannot see that it makes any difference to what religion it belongs. The object of the legislation passed in 1867 was to give the minority protection, and that is all we are concerned with. I would be the last person in the world to try to force anything on the people of Quebec; but let me repeat that nothing in this bill seeks to impose anything on the majority; it is solely for the relief of those who believe in the principle of divorce. They must believe in it or they would not bring their petitions before us.

Hon. Mr. Horner: They find it necessary.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Probably they prefer that course to living in adultery and having illegitimate children.

I shall leave that part of the subject for the moment, and address myself to the matter of costs. The honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity said that, were this bill to pass, there could be no assurance that the expense of getting a divorce would be any less. Let me assure him that in Saskatchewan, and no doubt in many other provinces, the average cost is less than $400, and even in exceptional cases, where it is necessary to produce proof of an unusual kind, the total cost would be no more than $500.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is, in local courts, not in the Exchequer Court.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am referring to local courts, where the plaintiff can issue a writ for $5, obtain a decree nisi, and then a final decree. The solicitor's disbursements will be no more than $50 or $60.

The honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity also said that the Senate committee is able to reduce a petitioner's expenses by remitting part of the parliamentary fee of $210. I looked up the record for 1955 and found that in only 22 cases out of 406 was there any remission at all. So obviously it is not a very important factor. Even where a remission is made, the balance which remains to be paid by the petitioner is much more than all the disbursements of a lawyer on behalf of his client in an action in the provincial courts. If jurisdiction in these matters were conferred on the Exchequer Court the costs in any circumstances would not be more than they are now, and my opinion is that in practically every case they would be much less. No parliamentary fee would be required; and there would be no expense for advertising, which under the present system, with advertisements in two newspapers, one French and one English, and in the Canada Gazette, frequently amounts to $100.

Within a week I could draw up a set of rules for the direction of the Exchequer Court in cases of this kind. I could also prepare a tariff of costs which would be reasonable, so that a lawyer acting for a wife suing for divorce, upon getting judgment against him, could make him pay all the costs. In that way the wronged woman would have to pay very little, if anything.

So I contend, as I did when I introduced the bill, that the present system, besides being cumbersome, is costly. In England it was found to be so burdensome that it was abandoned in 1857, when the Matrimonial Causes Act was passed. I have no doubt that, if this bill should pass and jurisdiction is vested in the Exchequer Court of Canada, the outlay required of litigants will be considerably less than it is at present.

I wish now to refer to two other paragraphs, Nos. 220 and 221, in the report of the British Royal Commission on Marriage and Divorce, issued in March. Some question was raised in the course of this debate as to whether the Exchequer Court would be able to exercise discretion, and what the word "may" in section 3 of the bill means—whether "shall" or something else. This report may be of some help. It states:

> 220. Although the court may have jurisdiction and grounds of divorce can be proved to exist, it does not always follow that a divorce will be granted, since the conduct of the spouse seeking relief may in certain circumstances act as a bar to relief. Where there has been collusion between the parties, or where the matrimonial offence has been condoned or connived at by the spouse seeking relief, the court must refuse a decree. In addition, the court in England has in certain circumstances a discretion to grant or refuse a decree. The most frequent exercise of the court's discretion is in respect of the petitioner's adultery.
> In Scotland there are no discretionary bars (except where in an action on the ground of insanity the pursuer's conduct has conduced to the insanity).
> 221. In both countries the courts will inquire into conduct which constitutes a bar to relief, whether this is pleaded by the other spouse as a defence or comes to the notice of the court in some other way. In England a statutory duty has been laid on the court to inquire in every case, so far as it reasonably can, as to the existence of collusion, connivance or condonation.

Honourable senators, in my opinion that is exactly what this bill would do.

I would like to give the house a few reasons why I named the Exchequer Court in this bill. In the first place, it is a federal court at present in existence and no new court would have to be set up. The British court is known as the Admiralty, Probate and Divorce Court. It deals with matters which are absolutely individual and separate, and yet it has no difficulty in handling them. Therefore, in my opinion the handling of divorce cases would not conflict at all with the other duties of the Exchequer Court of Canada. A set of divorce rules and a tariff of costs could be drawn up in short order, as I have already stated, and a judge sitting ten months a year could easily dispose of all the cases that would come before him. It is my belief that there is no other effective way to handle these cases.

In his speech of March 20 the honourable senator from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Ross) said he did not think it was necessary to give the Exchequer Court jurisdiction to hear divorce actions, that more satisfactory results could be had by changing the rules of the Senate. Under his proposal a Quebec person seeking divorce would first take proceedings in the Superior Court of the province, praying for separation as to bed and board on the ground of adultery on the part of the respondent, and if the petitioner succeeded in his action he would file with the Senate a petition for divorce, accompanied by a certified copy of the final decree of the Superior Court, whereupon the Senate would take action without hearing any witnesses. Well, a judge in the province of Quebec could grant judgment for separation as to bed and board for a dozen different reasons, and only in the odd case would it be granted on the ground of adultery. In all other cases the petitioners would still have to come to Parliament and make their application in the usual way. Another point is that even when there was a certificate to the effect that separation as to bed and board had been granted on the ground of adultery, Parliament would not know whether there had been collusion, connivance or condonation. So I do not think the honourable gentleman's proposal would prove satisfactory at all.

In conclusion, I would point out that Canada is growing up and Canadians are demanding that the prestige of Parliament be maintained. There is a great deal of difference between conditions as they are now and as they were for a long time after 1867, when in some years there were no divorces at all, and only one or two in others.

A few years ago a prominent senator from Florida visited Ottawa, and in the course of a tour of the Parliament Buildings he was shown the Senate Divorce Committee rooms. He was simply astounded when informed that the Parliament of Canada heard evidence on squabbles between husbands and wives from Prince Edward Island and Quebec, which at that time were the provinces without divorce courts. It amazed him that we spent so much time on that kind of work. I firmly believe that the majority of Canadians feel the same way and, as I said before, I think the members of this house also feel the same way at the bottom of their hearts. While travelling on our continental trains across Canada I am continually approached by people asking about parliamentary divorce. My inquirers are greatly surprised to hear that we handle so many divorce cases and spend so much time on them.

Honourable senators, this bill would merely give limited jurisdiction to the Exchequer Court, which would have the right to grant divorces on the ground of adultery alone. It is a more limited jurisdiction than that exercised by Parliament, which can grant divorces on any or no ground at all, as it sees fit. I think this bill should be put to a vote, and I hope that when you come to vote you will forget politics and vote the way you feel you should. Just as surely as I am standing here, if this measure is defeated today it will not be the end of the matter, but the question will be brought up from time to time until eventually parliamentary divorce is dispensed with.

The Hon. the Speaker: Are honourable members ready for the question?

Hon. Senators: Question.

The motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine was negatived on the following division:

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Civil Service Commission respecting the Library of Parliament.

Hon. Norman P. Lambert moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to offer a word of explanation of this report, which was tabled yesterday by His Honour the Speaker. It has particular reference to to the case of Mr. Forget, a well-known and experienced member of the Reference Staff of the Library of Parliament. A year ago the Civil Service Commission reviewed the classification of librarians throughout the service, added one more classification and adjusted the rates of pay, but through oversight the case of Mr. Forget was not taken into consideration. He was classified in Grade 4. Other members of the staff who were in that class were raised to Grade 5. Representations were made to the commission, and the classification of Mr. Forget in Grade 5 has now been approved. The Joint Committee on the Library, and the Librarians, have been so advised, as is indicated by the report from the commission and the accompanying letter from the Librarians.

The Civil Service Commission's recommendation does not involve a promotion in the real sense but is a mere change in classification from Grade 4 to Grade 5. If the change were not made Mr. Forget would receive a lower salary than he received under the former Grade 4 classification. That classification carried a salary range of $4,650 to $5,400, and the new range is $4,500 to $4,980. The range for Grade 5, to which those formerly in Grade 4 were promoted is $4,860 to $5,400. The present recommendation, if concurred in, would place Mr. Forget in the Grade 5 classification and make him eligible to receive the increased salary.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask the honourable senator if the classification Librarian Grade 4 is done away with and if no members of the staff are now classified lower than Grade 5?

Hon. Mr. Lambert: There is a classification Librarian Grade 4, but it carries a lower salary than the former Grade 4. The reclassification carried out last year gave the older employees under Grade 4 a Grade 5 rating and accordingly a higher salary.

The motion was agreed to, and the report was adopted.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce, Nos. 358 to 364, which were presented on May 29.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the committee, moved that the reports be adopted.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I would much appreciate it if the honourable gentleman would tell us if the committee has taken advantage of the recent amendment to the rules of the Senate permitting a complaint to be made about any crime or misdemeanour committed by witnesses before the committee? And if there have been complaints, to whom and when were they made?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: In reply to the honourable senator, may I say that no complaints have been made. However, members of the legal profession who as a rule appear before the committee have been notified of the change in the rules and warned of its implications. That action, which was thought sufficient for the moment, was taken after thorough consideration by the committee.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: It was a warning, not a complaint?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: When we sent out the notice advising the profession of the change in the rules, that in itself was a very definite warning that people who come before the committee are liable to prosecution if they violate the Criminal Code by committing perjury or fabricating evidence. Since that time we have not had occasion to take advantage of the new rule. Perhaps the warning had the desired effect.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: The change was for the future, not for the past, was it not?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It was.

The motion was agreed to, and the reports were adopted, on division.

BILLS—SECOND READINGS

Hon. Mr. Roebuck moved the second readings of the following bills:

Bill K-13, an Act for the relief of Mary Ethel Irving Buchanan Simcox.

Bill L-13, an Act for the relief of Constance Catherine Mary Pilon Milmine.

Bill M-13, an Act for the relief of Joseph Henri Maurice Messier.

Bill N-13, an Act for the relief of Mildred Helena Seale Darker.

Bill O-13, an Act for the relief of Robert Alfred Price.

Bill P-13, an Act for the relief of Alfred Sevigny.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Next sitting.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, May 31, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Routine proceedings.

NATIONAL HOUSING BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris, Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the report of the committee on Bill 215.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom was referred the Bill (215) intituled: "An Act to amend the National Housing Act, 1954", have in obedience to the order of reference of May, 29, 1956, examined the said bill, and now report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Next sitting.

DIVORCE STATISTICS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's 365th report.

He said: Honourable senators, the house will no doubt be pleased to know that the Divorce Committee held its last meeting for the present session this morning. I now propose to read the committee's 365th report and to make some comments as I go along.

For the present session 435 petitions for bills of divorce were presented to the Senate and dealt with by the Standing Committee on Divorce, as follows:

Petitions heard and recommended	356
Petitions heard and rejected	9
Petitions withdrawn	14
Petitions not proceeded with	56
	435

Honourable senators may note the number of the petitions which were rejected. For the most part they are contested cases in which the proof was not sufficient to satisfy the committee beyond peradventure that the Parliament of Canada should intervene.

Hon. Mr. Horner: What were the 56 petitions which were not proceeded with?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Almost all of them were applications which the petitioners did not complete and which are in consequence transferred to the next session of Parliament. Our hope is that in the meantime the parties in each case may become reconciled.

Of the petitions recommended during the present session of Parliament, 5 were from petitioners domiciled in the province of Newfoundland and 351 were from petitioners domiciled in the province of Quebec.

Of the petitions heard, 13 were opposed.

Of the petitions recommended during the present session of Parliament, 82 were by husbands and 274 were by wives.

On a previous occasion I suggested that some of the lady members of the house might make some comments on this point to the disparagement of us men, and the response I got on that occasion was, "The figures speak for themselves."

Of the petitioners domiciled in the province of Newfoundland, one was a husband and 4 were wives.

Of the 351 petitioners domiciled in the province of Quebec, 81 were husbands and 270 were wives.

The committee met on 41 days and held a total of 138 meetings of subcommittees. On 29 days the committee functioned in three sections. On 8 days the committee functioned in two sections. On 4 days the committee functioned in one section.

I might explain this to some degree. This session we have been using only three subcommittees, whereas last session on a number of occasions we used four. The amount of work that can be accomplished by four subcommittees is quite considerably more than the amount that can be accomplished by three, but our difficulty was that the solicitors simply would not prepare their cases and bring them forward in large enough numbers to keep more than three subcommittees busy. If there had been more cases ready to be tried on any day we would have divided into more subcommittees.

In 9 cases only the committee recommended that part of the parliamentary fees be remitted.

It is only in instances of real poverty, and indeed where the respondent is a woman, that fees are ever reduced. Unless the circumstances are most remarkable and unusual the standard practice is to reduce the fee to $50, but that amount does not cover the cost of trying the case.

The fees paid to Parliament for bills of divorce heard and recommended during the 1956 session amounted to $73,595.

That is a large sum of money, but of course expenses are incurred by the Divorce Committee in its proceedings. During a meeting of the committee this morning a request was sent to the Chief Treasury Officer of the Senate, Mr. Gilman, for a report showing the cost incurred in handling all these cases. I have not these figures before me at the moment, but they will be available later, and certainly before the commencement of next session.

Assuming that all bills of divorce recommended by the committee, now in various stages before Parliament, receive the Royal Assent, the comparison of dissolutions of marriage granted by Parliament in the last ten sessions is as follows:

1947-48	292
1949 (2 sessions)	350
1950	240
1951	294
1952	312
1952-53	282
1953-54	378
1955	402
1956	356

Honourable senators will observe that my prognostication of a larger number of cases this session than last session was not correct. We actually tried some 40 fewer cases this year. That is not a great change, but it is in the right direction and welcome.

Statistics covering the number of divorces granted in Canada during the years 1951 to 1955, both inclusive, (1956 for Newfoundland and Quebec), are as follows.

I do not propose to read the entire statement to the house, but will hand it to Hansard. It will be noted that there is a slight increase, but the figures are fairly regular through the years.

The statement is as follows:

	1951	1952	1953	1954	1955	1956
Canada	5,163	5,634	6,110	5,922	5,801
Newfoundland	4	3	9	8	1	5
Prince Edward Island	10	9	15	8	7
Nova Scotia	187	188	185	249	253
New Brunswick	156	200	181	117	181
Quebec	290	309	273	370	401	351
Ontario	2,102	2,202	2,774	2,468	2,274

Honourable senators will notice the remarkable regularity in those figures.

	1951	1952	1953	1954	1955	(1956)
Manitoba	361	338	374	371	337
Saskatchewan	226	223	218	250	237
Alberta	589	630	603	610	627
British Columbia	1,339	1,532	1,478	1,471	1,483

My friends from British Columbia will be particularly interested in the figures from that province; they too show remarkable regularity, and are fairly high. Of course those divorces were all granted by courts in that province and not by Parliament.

The following statement shows a comparison between the number of divorces granted to husbands and wives respectively in the years mentioned:

	Husbands	Wives
1951	2,010	3,155
1952	2,218	3,416
1953	2,421	3,689
1954	2,337	3,585
1955	2,256	3,545

You will notice that the wives have it in every year.

I should like now to make some general comments in addition to the formal report. To begin with, I would pay tribute where tribute is very much due, to the members of the committee, of which I have the honour to be chairman. I am proud of the members of this house who devote their time with remarkable devotion and sense of responsibility to this daily work.

In the early part of the session we sat every day of every week, from Monday until Friday, inclusive, and in the latter part of the session we have been sitting two days a week.

While I bow to all the members of the committee, I take off my hat to Senators Barbour, Golding and Howden.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: My friends in the house are joining with me in this tribute. I may say that at least one, and I think all three, of these gentlemen had 100 per cent attendance. In addition to attending the general committee, they have each sat on nearly 40 subcommittees, hearing five, six, and sometimes more cases in a single day.

I shall give the figures of attendance at the general committee. Those who attended more than 20 sessions, being approximately 50 per cent of the meetings, deserve, I think, some special recognition from this house. They are Senators Barbour, Golding, Howden, Gershaw —I pause here to say that Senator Gershaw acted as chairman of a subcommittee on nearly every day we met since the session opened; this duty he handled with consummate skill and kindness. Associated with Senator Fergusson, who is a lawyer, and another member of the committee, he has conducted a very competent court. Also on this list, after Senator Gershaw, are myself, Senator Hodges, Senator Kinley—and here let me pause to make another remark. I think something is coming to Senator Kinley. I cannot refer to another debate and I do not need to make reference to it, but I wish to point out that Senator Kinley has been a very constant and capable member of the Divorce Committee for more than ten years. Last session he took a European trip and in consequence his record of attendance at the committee's meetings, though not very low, was much lower than has been his custom. This time he is in the upper class of those who have done the work. Then there were Senator Smith, Senator Hawkins, Senator Fergusson, Senator Cameron and Senator Burchill.

All those senators have attended more than 20 meetings of the general committee together with the meetings of the subcommittees.

And let me here pay a tribute to the two women senators of the Divorce Committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It is said that this is a man's world, but I am glad to say that the Senate Divorce Committee is not entirely a man's committee, because the women members of the committee have brought to it something which the men themselves could not bring. They have destroyed the idea that divorces are given by men and not by women. It is much more healthy to have a committee of this kind. I want to mention too the sense of responsibility which these two women members have evidenced on all occasions, their excellent attendance record, their common sense, their knowledge, and their ability in the judgment of these difficult cases.

There is only one member of the committee who has attended more than ten but less than twenty meetings, and that is Senator Croll. He has been a valuable member, but he has had other duties to fulfil and they have reduced his attendances.

I wish to say something also about Senator Ross. Our honourable colleague has not been very well and we have excused him on a good many occasions, but he is an important member of the committee and has attended whenever he has been asked to do so. He has tried cases, almost always as chairman, on nine different occasions.

Senator Baird is another who has held himself open to come whenever he was asked. He has not a high attendance, but he has contributed to our committee's work. The rest have just a few attendances not worthy of mention.

I have reported on attendances for two reasons: one is to give credit where credit is due, and the other is to inform the house on how many members actually do this work. There are 12 members in the over 50 per cent class, and adding the other three that I have mentioned, Senators Croll, Ross and Baird, we find that practically all this work has been done by only 15 members. We have a committee of 22 members, and the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) are ex officio members. Nobody expects them to attend these meetings, for they have other important work to do.

Senator Aseltine we look upon as the father or grandfather of the committee. He served for 10 years as chairman and now holds his position in a rather honorary capacity. Senator Aseltine has never refused to take a case. He has been asked to do so only when there was a difficult case to be heard, and he has taken quite a number.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I want to pay tribute to the Senate staff which handles all this multifarious and complicated detail. I commence with Mr. Harvey Armstrong, Chief Clerk of Committees, who supervises all divorce petitions and certifies to the applications having satisfied the formal requirements. Mr. John A. Hinds, Assistant Chief Clerk of Committees, also examines petitions and takes care of the handling of the routine, the interlocutory work of the Divorce Committee. Mr. James MacDonald is Clerk of the main committee and No. 1 subcommittee, Mr. Gerard Lemire is Clerk of No. 2 subcommittee; and Mr. Alfred Fortier is Clerk of No. 3 subcommittee. These three gentlemen perform a very valuable function and their task is not an easy one. To their knowledge and skill, and to their devotion to their duties, a great deal of credit is due. I feel that all my confrères on the committee thoroughly agree with this statement. Mr. MacDonald, who is clerk of the committees on which I personally sit—the main committee and No. 1 subcommittee—renders a service that is most commendable, highly valuable and really outstanding.

I give honourable mention to Mr. Ralph Ells, who calls the cases and faithfully looks after many details of that nature.

And then, honourable senators, I must say that a great part of the routine hard work of the committee is done by the Hansard reporters who record the evidence day after day. It is exhausting work, and it is done with a great deal of care and efficiency. Mr. Basil Lake, as you know, is the Chief of the Senate Reporting Branch; Mr. Graydon Hagen is the senior reporter, and Messrs. Shelton, Hubbard, Crockett and Lawrence are the other reporters. I should not omit to mention also the amanuenses, the young women who type these long stories day after day with a great deal of devotion.

Let me close this portion of my remarks with a tribute to the late W. T. Mathews, who, as you know, passed away just a few days ago. He was a very valuable official of our department, and very popular, because he was so willing, so obliging and so efficient. We are all grieved at his passing. We miss him, and we send our condolences to his family.

That, I think, is the substance of my report, except for some remarks I wish to make about the general work.

I have not been at all satisfied, honourable senators, with the state of the rules under which we hear these cases. I have here the original rules. They were remodelled as long ago as 1906, and were adopted during the session of that year. That is half a century ago. I asked for a memorandum from Mr. Armstrong as to the changes which have been made in that period. This is his report:

Rule 134. With respect to reporting and printing of evidence.—A change was made to provide that the Clerk of the Committee shall notify the reporters to attend at the meetings of the Committee. Formerly the rules provided that they be notified by the chairman.

That is a mere nothing.

Also, that the evidence be printed under the supervision of the Clerk of the Committee instead of the Clerk of the English Journals.

Rule 136. Publication of notice.—The period was changed from "to be published during at least three months before consideration by the Committee" to "once a week for a period of four weeks".

Rule 138.—The change here provides for the filing of the petition in the Senate instead of the presentation of the petition to the Senate, also, the time limit for filing of the petition was reduced from the first 60 days of the session to the first 6 weeks of the session.

Rule 139(5). Information to the respondent.—The period within which the respondent must file a notice of his (or her) intention to oppose the granting of the petition was reduced from two months to 30 days.

Those are all the changes which have taken place in the rules in the last half century, and it is accordingly not to be thought that they are up-to-date and streamlined according to modern procedure. The pleading which comes before us, as a result of the lack of demand on our part, is often atrocious. In our form appear the words "on divers occasions"; and time and again there comes before us a husband charging a wife, or a wife charging a husband, with having committed adultery "on divers occasions": In other words, so far as the pleading is concerned, the whole life of the respondent is put in review, because adultery is charged at some time and some place, with some person unnamed. That is not according to modern pleading, and one could not get away with it in any other court.

By practice, though not by our rules, the petitioner must state particulars when they are demanded. But as this requirement does not appear in the rules, a lawyer who does not know the practice may come to Parliament at a great disadvantage in answer to such a pleading. The position of the petitioner may be even worse. The petitioner cannot demand particulars from the respondent, and all manner of defences may be put forward. For instance, there may be a denial of the charges, or there may be an allegation of connivance, collusion, or condonation. The respondent may allege that the parties have lived together, or have forgiven each other; or that the petitioner has been guilty of such cruelty as disentitles him or her to the relief claimed. It seems to me that our rules should require from the respondent, when the petition is opposed, a short, concise statement of the facts upon which he or she relies and which he or she intends to prove, so that the petitioner shall have notice of what he or she must meet. Similarly, the petitioner should be required to give to the respondent a concise statement of the facts upon which he or she relies.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Who makes these rules?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: They were made by this house fifty years ago.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Is my friend giving notice of amendments?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No. I will say what we intend to suggest, but I am not giving notice of amendments now, because I am not yet ready to do so. This matter was discussed in the committee this morning, and action, the nature of which I shall mention, was decided upon.

One point before I come to the suggestions: it relates to the more debatable question as to whether the petitioner should be required to name the co-respondent. There is no such obligation at the present time. There are two sides to this question. What appeals to me is that if a husband charges his wife with adultery with some person, the least he can do is to tell her, if he knows, who that person is; or vice versa, if the wife charges the husband and she knows the name of the person with whom she alleges adultery has been committed, her husband is entitled to know who the accused person is said to be as well as when and where the adultery was committed. The committee, too, in my opinion, is entitled to this information. Further, the co-respondent so named should be served with notice of the proceedings. I imagine that sometimes a person so charged would like to come before the committee and say, "The allegation is false; the story is concocted; I have had no improper relations whatever with the respondent". Under the present rules, the names of alleged co-respondents are frequently mentioned in the evidence, but as these persons have no knowledge of what is going on they have therefore no means of protecting their reputations.

Now, what are we to do about it? To amend these rules is a detailed and exacting piece of work. It requires a study of the rules of the provincial and United Kingdom courts for purposes of comparison with our existing procedure. The committee this morning passed a resolution asking for a report, before the next session of the house, from the Clerk of this house, Mr. MacNeill, who through experience of many years is well informed on these matters; from our Parliamentary Counsel, Mr. Hopkins; and from the Chief Clerk of Committees, Mr. Armstrong. We require that this memorandum be presented to the committee as soon as it assembles after the opening of the next session. No doubt the committee will consider that report; and I am giving notice, though not a formal notice, that this committee, not I, will ask for a revision. Some thought, at least, should be given to the matter before the Divorce Committee resumes its work.

Of course, it will be remarked that changes in the rules cannot be made retroactive. That goes without saying: the changed procedure would be applied only to petitions filed after the changes are made. But I do hope that we can make progress in this regard, and that a sensible, careful, well-considered revision will be made which will help the committee carry on its work effectively.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I rise at this time to express the appreciation of the house to the Chairman of the Divorce Committee (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) and the other members of the committee for the splendid service they have rendered Parliament in their difficult task. I know there are many here who would prefer that all divorces be considered outside Parliament, but so long as the law remains as it is we should feel happy indeed to know there are members of the Senate who are prepared to give their time and talents to this important work.

I wish to thank the chairman of the committee for his faithfulness to his task and for the general interest he has taken in the divorce work. He has suggested certain changes in the rules. I will not comment on them at present, but I look forward with interest to reading the report which is to be presented at the next session of Parliament by outstanding officials of this house.

We are greatly indebted to the members of the Divorce Committee generally. They heard and recommended 356 petitions. A number of the members were very regular in their attendance and several others were present at many of the meetings. Theirs is a splendid record indeed, and on behalf of Parliament—and I think I can say on behalf of the people of Canada—I thank them.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: Ordered that the report do lie on the table.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate I move that when this house rises today it stand adjourned until Monday next at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

The motion was agreed to.

DIVORCE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the following bills:

Bill D-14, an Act for the relief of Jennie Zalezniak Wiseman.

Bill E-14, an Act for the relief of Phyllis Elizabeth Jardine Williams.

Bill F-14, an Act for the relief of Martha Hope MacDougall Fortier.

Bill G-14, an Act for the relief of Hugh Oliver Semper.

Bill H-14, an Act for the relief of Yvonne Elizabeth Thurgarland Brosseau.

Bill I-14, an Act for the relief of Hugh Lawrence Byers.

The bills were read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: With leave, next sitting.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. A. K. Hugessen moved the third reading of Bill 216, an Act to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

DIVORCE BILLS

THIRD READINGS

Hon. Mr. Roebuck moved the third reading of the following bills:

Bill K-13, an Act for the relief of Mary Ethel Irving Buchanan Simcox.

Bill L-13, an Act for the relief of Constance Catherine Mary Pilon Milmine.

Bill M-13, an Act for the relief of Joseph Henri Maurice Messier.

Bill N-13, an Act for the relief of Mildred Helena Seale Darker.

Bill O-13, an Act for the relief of Robert Alfred Price.

Bill P-13, an Act for the relief of Alfred Sevigny.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the third time, and passed, on division.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY COMPANY BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. G. Percival Burchill moved the second reading of Bill 248, an Act respecting the construction of a line of railway in the province of New Brunswick by Canadian National Railway Company from a point at or near Bartibog in a westerly direction to the Tomogonops River in the vicinity of Little River Lakes.

He said: Honourable senators, on the occasion of a recent visit to Charleston, South Carolina, when I was leaving my hotel the clerk asked me, "Senator, what part of Canada do you come from?" I replied, "I come from New Brunswick." He looked at me for a minute and then he said: "Well, you don't say! You sure do live a way up in the woods."

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Well, probably that is true, but it is a great source of satisfaction to the people of New Brunswick to know that these woods which some of us have been logging over for many years have been found to contain something more than timber and pulpwood. By the way, these woods contain the finest spruce timber to be found in any province of Canada, bar none.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Except Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: About five years ago a young geographical student, Mr. Bennett Baldwin, of the University of New Brunswick, was working on a geographical survey in the vicinity of the town of my distinguished colleague, Senator Veniot, when he made an important discovery. He made a report to Dr. Graham MacKenzie, head of the Department of Geology of the university, which indicated that an unusual body of ore was present in the vicinity of Bathurst. On the strength of this report Mr. M. J. Boylan, of Toronto, became interested in the area and, as a result of his enterprise and bold adventure, prospecting companies, individuals, and mining corporations of some magnitude from all over the continent have been drawn to this whole area stretching over the counties of Gloucester and Northumberland, from the watershed of the Nepisquit River to the watershed of the Miramichi River. This ore body is a combination of zinc, lead and copper, with small quantities of silver and gold, and it is now conservatively estimated to contain 75 million tons.

It is interesting to note that Mr. W. S. Fairweather, Vice-President of the Canadian National Railways, in testifying before the committee of the other place, made the statement that there is such an enormous amount of zinc available that one knows very definitely that for a period of a hundred years at least there would be no question as to the supply of zinc concentrates.

Last week, at Newcastle, in conversation with one of the executives of one of the larger mining companies interested in the area at the present time, a gentleman asked the executive if the ore body could not be considered as one of the largest on the continent. He replied that he regarded it as one of the largest bodies of base metal ore in the world. It is a zinc-lead-copper combination, with a little silver and gold, but the metallurgy is not the same in the Bathurst area as it is in the vicinity of Newcastle.

At Little River, one of the Miramichi tributaries, the Heath Steel Mines, a subsidiary of the American Metals Company, has been operating for some time. It has discovered a very large mine there which is being developed today. The company is building a concentrating mill at the mine and is making substantial progress. Up to the present time, I understand, it has proved an ore body of 700,200,000 tons in that area.

The Heath Steel Mines must of necessity find a market for the ore, which must be transported from the mine to the shipping point. To this end the company has made an agreement with the Canadian National Railways to build a branch line into the mine. This bill gives the enabling authority to the Canadian National Railways to build the branch line. The project will cost about $3 million, and Heath Steel Mines guarantees to ship 75,000 tons of concentrate per year for six years, in default of which it will pay a penalty of $3 per ton.

I know that honourable members who realize that New Brunswick has not shared in the same measure of general prosperity which other sections of our great country have enjoyed over recent years, will rejoice with me in this rich source of natural wealth and give their support to the bill.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask the honourable senator a question? First of all, I want to say that I think we all rejoice with him because this ore body has been discovered and is to be developed, for it will be a wonderful help to his province.

I come to my question. Section 5 of the bill speaks of loans not exceeding $3,220,000, but the schedule on page 4 gives the estimated cost of construction as $2,800,000. If the work of construction and completion of the line will cost $3,220,000, why is that amount not stated in the schedule? There is a difference of $420,000 between the two figures.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: I think the reason is that it is difficult to make a very close estimate of the cost. However, if my honourable friend wants a better answer he may get it from the officials in committee. I shall move that the bill go to the Transport and Communications Committee, if the house so desires.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I think the answer to the question asked by my honourable friend from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) was given by Mr. Fairweather in his evidence before the committee of the other house. Mr. Fairweather said that although it was estimated that construction of the railway line would cost about $2,800,000, it is the practice to add 10 per cent for contingencies.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Then it occurs to me that the amount of $3,220,000 should appear in the schedule. It seems to me that the two figures are confusing.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Apparently it is common practice to add 10 per cent for contingencies. It is conceivable that costs may rise from time to time.

Hon. Mr. Reid: The difference between the two figures in this case is 15 per cent.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Burchill, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

NATIONAL PARKS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Kinley moved the second reading of Bill P-8, an Act to amend the National Parks Act respecting the boundaries of Cape Breton Highlands National Park.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a very simple bill, and contains only one enacting paragraph, which reads as follows:

> The lands described in the schedule to this act are withdrawn from Cape Breton Highlands National Park, described in the schedule to the National Parks Act, and declared to be no longer required for park purposes.

This park was established in 1930.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: 1937.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I am told that it was established in 1930. It is referred to in chapter 43 of the Statutes of Canada, 1936. The land, which was provided by the province of Nova Scotia, was approximately 390 square miles in extent. The purpose of this bill is to withdraw an area of 13·3 square miles from the park, because it is said to be no longer needed. This will not detract from the utility of the service of the park. I asked the authorities the reason for the withdrawal, and who was to get the land, and I was told that the land was to be withdrawn because research conducted during the last year or two indicated that the prospects for discovery of base metal ores in this particular area were good. This area, which is near the southwest corner of the park, is known as "The Panhandle". That land will of course go back to the province of Nova Scotia.

The bill, though simple, is interesting, in that it has to do with a national park in the scenic part of Cape Breton Island, which is known as the most easterly part of Canada; in fact, the radio commentators say that it is where the east begins. That is not exactly correct, because I think Cape Charles in Labrador is some hundreds of miles further eastward than the northern tip of Cape Breton Island. Now that Newfoundland is part of Canada, the honour of being the most easterly point of the dominion of Canada must go to Cape Race. Nevertheless, this park, situated in the Highlands of Cape Breton, with its scenic surroundings, delightful climate and natural beauty is of interest to the whole of Canada. At this time of year everyone is thinking of the out-of-doors and planning a summer vacation. Now, since many nice things have been said in this house about the other provinces, I think I could very properly say that I know of no more enjoyable place to pass a summer vacation than in the Highlands of Cape Breton. This park, with its Keltic Lodge, provides a splendid playground.

It should be said that my friend the honourable senator from Halifax North (Hon. Mr. Connolly) was the instigator of the movement to create the park; and I think he was instrumental in having the splendid hotel constructed there. We are very thankful to him for that kind of accommodation and development in the province of Nova Scotia.

The approaches to the park, while rugged, are good. Last year great improvement was made to what is now called the "Road to the Isles". Instead of crossing by ferry, one may now go by way of the New Canso Causeway, which is in itself well worth going to see. It is a great feat of engineering, connecting the mainland with Cape Breton Island. There are three main roads leading to the park by way of the causeway. One going from Halifax across the new Angus L. Macdonald Bridge, which is a most modern and extensive highway improvement and a splendid convenience to people travelling to the eastern part of Nova Scotia; thence along the new paved highway skirting the southeastern shore and across country to Antigonish. A second route leads through Truro, and a third route is known as the Sunrise Trail. All these roads lead toward the causeway and thence to the national park in Cape Breton.

The park itself is a great asset to the country. And if minerals are discovered there it may be that in the near future Nova Scotia will be in the happy position of New Brunswick, as so eloquently described this afternoon by the honourable senator from Northumberland-Miramichi (Hon. Mr. Burchill), of having base metal mines adding to its industrial prosperity.

Honourable senators, I am very glad to have had an opportunity to explain this bill to the house and to say a few words about the splendid holiday attractions in the Cape Breton Highlands. People in search of a change and recreation can be sure of finding there a variety of charming scenery, a delightful climate tempered by the sea, the traditional hospitality of the Scottish people in that part of the country, and every facility for good living.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, this is a bill of more than passing interest to me. I agree with everything the sponsor (Hon. Mr. Kinley) has said about the beauties of Cape Breton and the fine national park in the northern part of that island. As a matter of fact, I take a little personal pride in the park, because I had the responsibility of being minister of the department concerned at the time this park was established. I recall very well the day in the autumn of 1935, after the new Government had come into office, when the late Angus L. Macdonald came to my office. He was then Premier of Nova Scotia and it was the first occasion on which I met him. He came to discuss the establishment of a national park in his province.

As most honourable members probably know, in the establishment of a national park the province has to make the area available, and then the federal department responsible for national parks takes over its development. The site of the Cape Breton Highlands Park was selected after a good deal of consideration. Three areas were examined, and it was unanimously agreed by everyone interested that this one was the best. I have visited all the national parks in Canada with the exception of the recently established one in New Brunswick. The Rocky Mountain parks, such as Jasper and Banff, have majestic settings in the mountains, but on the whole I believe Cape Breton Highlands Park is probably the most beautiful and finest national park in Canada. It has evergreen hills, from which clear streams flow, and in addition it is partly bordered by the sea, which is the park's greatest asset.

I was hoping that the sponsor of the bill, the honourable senator from Queens-Lunenburg, who I understand is a very proficient golfer, would have something to say about the golf course in the park. I may inform the house that here is, potentially, the finest golf course in Canada. I take some pride in this fact also, because one evening I spent a couple of hours with the golf course architect, going over the layout of it.

The park has an excellent golf course, good fishing, and delightful scenery, and in the summer months of July and August its climate cannot be excelled. I do not know how many square miles of area the bill proposes to withdraw from the park.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: It is 13·3 square miles.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That is in the south-western portion?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That will not detract from the beauty and utility of the park.

Honourable senators, I have taken the opportunity to make these few remarks mainly because the man who was responsible for getting the park established in Nova Scotia was my good friend, the late Angus L. Macdonald. In the same year the Government established a park in Prince Edward Island, a different kind of park altogether. It has a beauty all its own and I may say to my honourable friend from Queen's-Lunenburg that if he wishes new pastures in which to test his golfing ability he can find an excellent golf course in the Prince Edward Island National Park.

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the two excellent speeches delivered on this bill. I am one of those who are absolutely opposed to the cutting down of the areas of any of our national parks. When application was made to reduce the area of the Prince Albert National Park in Saskatchewan I fought the matter for several weeks. When application was made to reduce the area of the Banff National Park in order to build some hydro-electric development, I opposed it also. And if I were a member from Nova Scotia, in view of what has been said about this wonderful park, I would certainly fight this bill to the limit, I would not allow the area of that park to be reduced by one square foot. It is apparently a beautiful spot and it should be left that way forever. I do not think that the discovery of a few minerals along the outside perimeter of the park should influence Parliament to agree to any reduction at all in its size.

In any event, I would like to see a map of the whole territory and I would also like to have a great deal more information on what is proposed. Unless we see such a map and have that information it is absolutely impossible for us to decide whether it is a good thing or not.

Honourable senators probably know that I am a great lover of the outdoors. I spend all the spare time I can in the open. If I get fed up with the work in my legal office I go off fishing or hunting, and if I get fed up with what goes on here I sometimes do the same. When I do that kind of thing I like to have a good place to go to, and I feel sure that if I were living in Nova Scotia I would like to spend my holidays in this park. It is not too big a park; it is small, compared with other national parks.

As I said before, honourable senators, generally speaking I am absolutely opposed to the reduction of the area of this or of any other national park.

Hon. Felix P. Quinn: Honourable senators, I am prompted by the remarks of our good friend from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) to say something on this bill. Perhaps the sponsor of the bill could explain why it is necessary to withdraw some 13 or 14 square miles from this national park for the purpose of exploring or surveying or prospecting or developing the mineral wealth of that part of Nova Scotia. I did not think it was necessary to do anything like this. I thought that prospectors and surveyors could go anywhere, even on private property, and especially on property which is owned and controlled by the crown. I would like to have that feature explained. I do not see why this area could not be left within the national park and the exploration carried on just the same without interfering in any way with the development or the beauty of the park. I was interested in what the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) said in his testimony to the natural beauty of the Cape Breton National Park. I have been through it and I have travelled over the Cabot Trail, and I enjoyed it immensely.

One beautiful summer morning, some years ago, when I was a member of the other house I was campaigning along the eastern shore of Nova Scotia, and I stopped at a general store which was just over the border in Guysborough county. While I was inside the store a car pulled up and I noticed it carried State of Michigan licence plates. The man in the store asked me if I knew who it was and I said I had no idea. I went out toward the car and as I approached it a rather elderly man got out. I said, "Good morning, sir," and he answered "Good morning." I told him who I was and what I was doing. He said, "I run into politicians occasionally when I am home, but you are the first one I have met since I came to this country." I asked him if he was alone and he said that he was accompanied by his wife. He told me how he came to be there. He said: "Every year along in the fall my wife and I would take the train to New York and from there go on an ocean trip and visit various parts of Europe. I have been all over England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, France, Germany, in the Alps and Pyrenees, and toured Italy. In fact, I have visited all the interesting parts of Europe. However, I am getting up in years, and on my return last fall a professional friend of mine said to me: 'You are getting too old to travel now. I notice your last trip has taken a lot out of you. Why do you go so far away? Why don't you take a trip like I took this year?' So I asked my friend where he went, and he told me it was to Nova Scotia. I had to ask him where that was." Then I said to the man from Michigan, "Do you mean to tell me you did not know where Nova Scotia was?" He said, "Well, I've heard of it." This reminds me of the story my friend from Northumberland-Miramichi (Hon. Mr. Burchill) told about the man in South Carolina who thought New Brunswick was away up in the woods.

The Michigan tourist said: "My friend went to the pocket in his car and took out a road map, on which he pointed out the location of Nova Scotia. He told me: 'You go to Detroit, cross over to Windsor and follow a beautifully paved road through Ontario, then through Quebec and New Brunswick and on into Nova Scotia, where you will see one of the finest countries in the world.' I took his advice and I am here. I have been here three weeks. I came by Amherst, went over the Sunrise Trail, through Pictou and Antigonish, crossed by ferry to Cape Breton, and drove along the Cabot Trail." He added: "Let me tell you, Mr. Quinn, that you have everything in Cape Breton that they have in Europe. You have mountains, rivers, lakes and natural beauty." Then, pointing to a little place called Marie-Joseph looking out on the Atlantic Ocean, with the sun shining down and glimmering over the water, he said, "Where on earth could you find a more beautiful scene than this in front of us right now?"

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: What about the fishing?

Hon. Mr. Quinn: He did not say anything about fishing but you can get that there too —salmon fishing and trout fishing—and in the fall there is deer hunting and moose hunting. I am just recounting what this gentleman told me, that you can find in Nova Scotia everything that is to be found, at much greater expense, in Europe. He ended by saying: "Remember, I have only been part way through Nova Scotia; I have not yet seen Halifax and the western part of the province, but I have seen enough of it to sing its praises, and when I get back I will tell the people in Michigan about the wonderful scenery in Nova Scotia."

I am glad to hear my honourable friend from Queens-Lunenburg speak so highly of the beaches at the national park in Cape Breton. I can confirm what he has said; but I should like to know why the territory it is proposed to withdraw from the park could not be left within its boundaries.

Hon. James P. McIntyre: Honourable senators, so much has been said about the national park in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, that I think some mention should be made of our national park in Prince Edward Island. I have had the pleasure of taking my honourable friend from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) through it. When talk arose about the establishment of a park in the province, some officials same from Ottawa to select the site. One of them, I believe, was a Mr. Smart. I drove these gentlemen to two or three places which were thought to be suitable for this purpose, and I do not think they were very much impressed. Finally I took them to the area where the park is now established. They were in the rear seat; I was driving the car. I drove right on to the shore and for miles along the beach; and as I heard the sound of the waves lapping in from the north, I noticed these men moving about in the back seat, and I said to myself, "This is the place they are going to pick for the national park". And that is what they did. There is no question that it is a beautiful place.

Last year I visited Fundy Park, in Albert County, New Brunswick. It commands a magnificent view of the Bay of Fundy.

On Cape Breton Island you drive to the national park over the Cabot Trail and what they call Smoky Mountain, and the sea is in view all the way around.

The national park in Prince Edward Island has wonderful scenery in the background and fine farmlands. The sea to the north, and one can travel for 25 miles over paved roads in the park to the home of Lucy Maud Montgomery. There one may see the Lake of Shining Waters, Lovers' Lane, and other scenes reminiscent of the work of this famous authoress. There is also a very fine golf course, to which I had the pleasure of taking the honourable senator from Churchill and the Minister of National Revenue. Mr. McCann told me he thought—and I say this without wishing to minimize the attractions of Cape Breton—that it was the finest golf course he had seen.

All in all, any one who visits the national park at Prince Edward Island will be well repaid for his trouble. I have to give great credit for its establishment to the honourable senator from Churchill, who was the minister in charge of the department concerned when the park was created and who, through the officials, developed it to its present state and equipped it with a good hard surface road. Visitors from the United States and various parts of Canada have told me that it has the finest bathing beach in North America, and probably in the world.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is the honourable senator in favour of allowing the area to be reduced?

Hon. Mr. McIntyre: No.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Well, that is the whole problem here.

Hon. Mr. McIntyre: We want to enlarge it.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: If the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Kinley) speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I had not supposed that this bill would produce such an animated discussion of the beauties of our Atlantic provinces, but I think it has been all to the good, and that we can benefit from it.

Let me speak frankly. I suppose the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) takes a natural pride in having been an innovator in this matter, but he was associated with the Premier of Nova Scotia, the late Hon. Angus Macdonald. Our friend from Churchill was in charge of the federal department concerned with the project, and from time to time he came to Nova Scotia. However, I want to give the honourable senator from Halifax North (Hon. Mr Connolly some credit—

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I will agree.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: —for the organization and completion of this work, the details of which were looked after by his department when he was a member of the provincial government.

From time to time I have heard the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) speak on the subject of national parks, and he has consistently opposed any reduction of their areas. So far as I am concerned, however, I do not think it is for me, when this Government bill is before us, to argue whether or no 14 square miles should be withdrawn from the present park. The proposal of the Government of Nova Scotia is made pursuant to an arrangement between that province and the Dominion, so I think we must assume that it is in the interests of all concerned.

In reply to a remark of my good friend from Bedford-Halifax (Hon. Mr. Quinn) I would say that I do not know why prospecting in this area could not be carried on, but from a general knowledge of business which, I suppose, is shared by us all, it is my opinion that prospecting or developing cannot be done advantageously unless the interests concerned have title in the land. God gave us, in Nova Scotia, a land of great beauty, but we need more industrial development, and anything that can be done in that respect should be done. The property affected by this bill, which is known as "The Panhandle" in the southwest corner of the park, and is, so to speak, attached to it, could well be returned to the province.

I support the bill, and I hope it will be passed.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: Suppose an ore body was discovered in this area which it is proposed to withdraw from the park and that ore body extended over the rest of the park, could the promoters not go ahead just the same and develop all of it?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: That is a question.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Natural Resources. I have a map of this area which will be available to the committee. The purpose of the bill is in the main a matter for examination in committee.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION BILL

COMMITTEE AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendment made by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on Bill O-8, an Act to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I move that this amendment be now concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Now.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: With leave, I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was read the third time, and passed.

DIVORCE BILLS

SECOND READINGS

Hon. G. Percival Burchill, for Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, moved the second reading of the following bills:

Bill Q-13, an Act for the relief of Marie Theresa Gerega St-Jacques.

Bill R-13, an Act for the relief of Julius Michael Cantor.

Bill S-13, an Act for the relief of Gerald Zelman.

Bill T-13, an Act for the relief of Lucille Viola Arthur Ward.

Bill U-13, an Act for the relief of May O'Connor MacKenzie.

Bill V-13, an Act for the relief of Rita Cleevely Scott.

Bill W-13, an Act for the relief of Leah Banfield Rideout.

Bill X-13, an Act for the relief of Margaret Isobel Gillespie Mackenzie.

Bill Y-13, an Act for the relief of Edda Roehm Sackmann.

Bill Z-13, an Act for the relief of Joseph Ernest Adrien Joly.

Bill A-14, an Act for the relief of Jacqueline Bussiere Sirois.

Bill B-14, an Act for the relief of Doris Elaine Cameron Gladwish.

Bill C-14, an Act for the relief of Myra Goodman Lobell.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the second time, on division.

THIRD READINGS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Now.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: With leave, I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the third time, and passed, on division.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 4, at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, June 4, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

STAFF OF THE SENATE

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION REPORT

The Hon. the Speaker presented to the Senate a report from the Civil Service Commission recommending that the position of Cleaner and Helper be exempt from section 12 of the Civil Service Act.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, the report was referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

PRESIDENT OF INDONESIA

DR. SUKARNO TO ADDRESS MEMBERS OF BOTH HOUSES

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that tomorrow morning a joint sitting of the two houses of Parliament will be held in the House of Commons to be addressed by the President of the Republic of Indonesia. Honourable senators are asked to be in their places at 10 o'clock in the morning and are cordially invited to attend.

PRIVATE BILL

WESTERN GOSPEL MISSION—REFUND OF FEES

Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien moved, with leave:

That the parliamentary fees paid upon the Bill F-5 intituled: "An Act to incorporate The Western Gospel Mission" be refunded to the petitioners, less printing and translation costs.

The motion was agreed to.

THE YUKON, ACCESS TO SEA—FRASER RIVER, ENGINEERING SURVEYS

INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Thomas Reid inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of May 15:

1. What representations, if any, have been made by the Canadian Government to the Government of the United States, looking towards giving Canada direct access from the Yukon to the sea through territory known as "The Panhandle"?

2. For a copy of the first report of the Government under the two hundred and eighty thousand dollar ($250,000.00) grant made last year to the British Electric Company, or Corporation, for the carrying out by that company of hydro-electric engineering surveys on the Fraser River.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry is as follows:

1. No representations have been made to the Government of the United States by the Government of Canada to obtain direct access from the Yukon to the sea through the Territory known as "The Panhandle".

2. No grant was made as suggested. Only a site reconnaissance report has been received to date on the Fraser river. It was on the basis of the information contained in this report that it was decided to have detailed engineering investigations carried out and a complete report on them prepared. A contract was, therefore, entered into with the British Columbia Engineering Company on June 14, 1955 for the carrying out of this work. It is not possible to know at this time when a complete report on the work will be forthcoming which can be made public.

COLUMBIA RIVER HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER

INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Mr. Reid inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of May 17:

What, if any, representations have been made by Premier Bennett, of the Province of British Columbia, or by any member of the British Columbia Government, either to the federal Government or International Joint Commission, suggesting the trading of Columbia River hydro-electric power for access rights by Canada through the United States Alaska Panhandle?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry is: None.

NATIONAL HOUSING BILL

Hon. David A. Croll moved the third reading of Bill 215, an Act to amend the National Housing Act, 1954.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, before the bill receives its third reading may I, with apologies, take up the time of the house to make a few observations? I should like to have had an opportunity to ask certain questions when the bill was in committee, but unfortunately I was unable to be present, for I was attending a meeting of the Joint Committee on the Federal District Commission.

I am sure every honourable senator was much impressed with the figures which were placed on the record of the other house by the Minister of Public Works, under whose jurisdiction this measure will be administered, and as well with the figures placed on our own record by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll). Therefore, it is not my intention to put any more figures before you. What has been accomplished under the National Housing Act since its inception is, I am sure, a source of some pride to the people of Canada.

I was very much interested and pleased to notice that the minister had said that under this act it was not the responsibility of the Government to compete with private enterprise. His words were: "The Government should not assume responsibilities which could effectively be borne by private enterprise." Nevertheless, there is some interference with private enterprise, and it is with regard to that matter that I wish to speak for a few minutes to this house.

I do not know the circumstances in municipalities in other provinces, but I find that, generally speaking, in British Columbia private builders are not now building houses for sale or rent, because such people are not prepared to accept as low a down payment as $1,000 to $1,500. The result is that most of the housing in that province is carried on under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Before this act came into effect, and operated so successfully, builders and private citizens were building houses for sale because they were able to obtain a down payment of from 35 to 75 per cent. But today no purchaser is going to pay down that much money when he can have a house built under Central Mortgage for as low a down payment as $1,000 to $1,500, depending on the cost of the house, and have his mortgage payments amortized over a period of 25 years.

Central Mortgage, however, before making a loan, takes into account the age and income of the prospective borrower. For instance, a man of 60 years of age would have serious difficulty in getting a loan, because the corporation would naturally think he might not live long enough to pay it back. I am speaking of actual cases, not just supposition. Similar restrictions apply to income. Unless a borrower is earning $5,000 or over per annum he would have difficulty in obtaining a loan from the corporation. The latest figures published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics show that some 83 per cent of the working population of this country have annual incomes of less than $5,000. Of these, 34 per cent make as much as $3,000 per annum and another 34 per cent make $2,500. One can readily see that the men and women in the low income bracket get no advantage from the existing legislation.

Now, without any explanation at all, as far as I know, the family income required for loaning purposes by Central Mortgage has been increased. This was one of the matters I intended to ask about in the committee. In 1953 the average income that a borrower must have before he could obtain a loan was $4,961; in 1954 it had increased to $5,382; and I understand that now it is $5,447. On top of that, interest rates have been increased. In 1954 the rate of interest charged on loans under the National Housing Act was 5½ per cent; in 1955 the rate was reduced to 5¼ per cent. Without in any way passing judgment on the Minister of Finance in his efforts to tighten up on credit, I say that there seems to be a conflict there; on the one side we have the Government endeavouring to curtail the use of credit, and on the other side we have the Minister of Public Works, through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, urging the building of more homes and in the process the interest rate on National Housing Act mortgages has been increased to 5½ per cent. Officials of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation recently made a most interesting statement to the Gordon Royal Commission. In that statement they estimated that in the next 25 years the population of Canada will be increased by 10·5 million people—in other words, that in 1981 the population of Canada will be 26·5 million—and that by that time Canada will require 3,400,000 new homes, the estimated cost of which would amount to $35 billion, the owners' share being $15 billion and the lenders' share $25 billion.

They had something to say also regarding the old houses in this country. It may interest honourable senators to know that two-thirds of the present houses in Canada are 25 years old, 500,000 are 50 years old, and something like 10 per cent, equal to 380,000 houses, are 75 years old. While I am on this point I am willing to predict, from personal observation, that many of these old homes will outlast many of the new ones being built today.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I say that without fear of successful contradiction. As a matter of fact, having visited and inspected some recently built ones while they were under construction, I wonder if they will last even 25 years, the term in which the payments will continue to be made.

I would like to suggest to the Government that consideration be given to a housing system that is in vogue in the United States in regard to older houses. A problem arises when an owner wants to sell an older-type house. But even though a house is only one, two, five or ten years old, unless the owner is willing to take less than $1,000 as a down payment he will have a lot of difficulty in disposing of his house. What he is up against is that a prospective purchaser can go to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and by making a down payment of $1,000 or $1,500, have a house built costing up to $12,500. Many elderly people in this country whose children have married and have families and homes of their own are left with splendid houses too big for them, houses that were built of the finest lumber and materials, which cannot be sold unless the owners are prepared to take a second or third mortgage as well as a low down payment. Otherwise the prospective buyer may go to Central Mortgage and Housing and contract a loan which is payable in instalments over a 25-year period.

I say to the Government in all sincerity that if it wants to do a little more it should review the cost of houses. During the last war, under the war-time housing legislation, a number of houses were erected in the constituency which I then had the honour to represent; and I remember that members of the C.C.F., who were always predicting doom, said that these houses would become a slum area. Just before I returned here after Easter this year I had the opportunity of looking over this particular housing project, and I was pleased to find that every one of these homes was tastefully painted, and all of them had attractive gardens at the back and neat lawns in front. As I reflected on these conditions I remarked that perhaps one of the causes of slums is not so much the type of houses as the kind of people who live in them. The occupants of these dwellings, each of which cost in the neighbourhood of $3,500, bought them under the war-time housing provisions of the National Housing Act; and now they have a beautiful village. I mention this as illustrating the possible advantage of providing a smaller and less costly house, not inferior in material but lower in price, for the use of that great majority of our people who earn less than $5,000 a year.

These are points which seem to me well worth while bringing to the attention of the Senate and of the Government. In doing so I am not to be understood as criticizing the present great housing scheme, which has been so successfully carried on. A splendid job has been done. Not long ago it was reported that the one millionth house erected under the scheme had been completed. But I thought it my duty to rise and draw these points to the attention of the Government in the hope that the Minister of Public Works particularly will bear in mind the needs of the lower income groups.

The honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) will be interested in a recently reported incident which no doubt can be paralleled in many other places. A news despatch headed "Widow Pays Lower Rent for 'Hovel'" states:

> A widowed mother of nine, whose house was described to the Anglican Synod Thursday as a "miserable, ramshackle hovel," said Thursday night she has had her rent reduced from $100 to $65 a month.
> The case of Mrs. Marjorie Caster, 39, was described to the Anglican diocese of Toronto by Rev. R. K. Perdue, in a plea for more low-rental housing schemes.
> Mr. Perdue said the rent is being paid to a "respectable trust company" in Toronto, some of whose directors, he said, are probably "Anglicans and pillars of their church."

I hope they are very proud of taking $100 a month from a poor widow.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: They have cut down the rent.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It was cut down only recently. Apparently when these people were praying and looking up to God on Sunday not much thought was given to the widow. I say that in all seriousness.

The present bill seems to offer a great deal of encouragement to municipalities. But in general I have to agree with the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) that many municipalities may not be able to take advantage of it. I know that, were I still reeve of the municipality in which I had the honour to hold that office for nine years, I would be unwilling to recommend that it embark on the housing business, because, as we found in earlier years, and as the Government no doubt realizes, the moment a municipal body engages in this activity it lets itself in for trouble. For instance, in the matter of dispossession, no municipality or government is prepared to evict a tenant for not paying his rent or other obligations. So I think the Government acted very wisely in so handling the housing scheme as to leave the financial responsibility with banks and other institutions; otherwise the scheme would not be in the fine position in which it is today.

I advise the Government to give some further thought to the difficulties which the municipalities have to face. In some districts —Toronto, for example—the city authorities may be able to acquire land, clear it, subdivide it and sell it for housing purposes; but a municipality which contains slum areas or quite a number of hovels must as a first step find accommodation for those who live there before removing them to new quarters, and before taking any steps to remodel the slum districts. Such a course may be possible in cities with other and adequate accommodation, but it is beyond the resources of rural municipalities. So, I repeat, there will be a good deal of hesitancy about embarking on new housing projects; first, because councils do not care to get into this business; secondly, because they have not the funds.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. John A. McDonald moved the second reading of Bill 84, an Act to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act.

He said: Honourable senators, these amendments to the Canadian Farm Loan Act which are contained in the present bill come at a very appropriate time, when financial institutions as well as individuals are withdrawing from the farm loan business and going into more profitable fields. This leaves the Canadian Farm Loan Board in a position where it can take up the slack and do a much larger business than it has been doing up to the present time.

The Economics Branch of the Department of Agriculture for the province of Ontario, in a recent survey covering over 700 farms, found that in the past individuals have taken nearly 50 per cent of all farm mortgages; sellers of farms have taken about 33 per cent; financial instiutions, about 9 per cent; and family mortgages accounted for about 4 per cent, leaving a comparatively small number made by Government loaning institutions.

One reason, perhaps, why the Canadian Farm Loan Board has not been doing more business is that there have been occasions when a long time elapsed after the applications were received and the appraisals were made before the farmers actually received their loans.

I have not heard very much criticism of the board; and it was my pleasure to work quite closely with the officials in Halifax when I was with the provincial Government. I think the board has done especially good work in keeping interest rates down. We have to think back to the position of borrowers in the 'twenties. Early in that decade several of the provincial Governments had experimented with the farm loaning business, but with no great success. As a result, interest rates jumped from 7 per cent to 12 per cent. This was the situation which the federal Government was faced with in 1927, 1928 and 1929, when it was contemplating legislation of this type. The Canadian Farm Loan Board's rate has been 5 per cent in recent years.

Another reason why these amendments come at an opportune time is that many farmers today find it necessary to change over from horse power to machine power. Many have already done so, particularly in the Canadian west. I am sure that a lot of people whose pleasure it was to drive behind a fine span of horses, and to work with horses, regret that this change has to be made.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I am sure people cannot take the same pride in working with a tractor, truck or automobile that they can in working with horses. But we must move with the times, and the economic situation today is such that many farmers must add to their acreage. This in turn necessitates the spending of a lot of money for farm machinery. I want to suggest, however, that many who own moderate-sized farms with productive acreage should not jump too quickly in making this change from horse power to machine power. Many farmers who do mixed farming and grow fruits and vegetables, especially those whose own families do the farm work, can carry on more economically in this fashion than by investing in expensive farm equipment. Before such farmers go out and spend large amounts of money for farm machinery they should make sure they will employ the machinery a sufficient number of days in the year to justify the expenditure.

Honourable senators, I now wish to give you some explanation of the proposed amendments to the act, but before doing so I think I should tell you that I am indebted to Mr. F. L. Chester, Commissioner of the Canadian Farm Loan Board, for much of the information which I am going to present to the house. Mr. Chester has indicated that he or some other competent authority will be pleased to provide information in committee if the bill is given second reading.

The act which this bill amends has been of assistance to farmers of Canada, not only as a source from which loans could be had but, as I have said, it has been especially helpful in keeping interest rates on farm loans from institutions and individuals at reasonable levels.

Besides this form of farm credit we have also had in operation a form of government guarantee of bank loans made to farmers under the provisions of the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Under the Canadian Farm Loan Act a loan can be made for a maximum of 25 years, which period, if this bill passes, will be extended to 30 years. This change is made in subsection 2 (f) of section 6 of the bill. Loans made by the banks under government guarantee have been for a shorter period of up to five years for an intermediate credit.

We also now have the advantage of the Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act, passed last year, which is a parallel act to the Farm Improvement Loans Act. In consequence the Canadian Farm Loan Act will no longer have to govern loans to fishermen. This change is made by section 11 of this bill.

The original Canadian Farm Loan Act provided for a co-operative scheme between the federal Government, the participating provinces and the borrower, each contributing 5 per cent of the amount loaned to the capital of the board, and the lending funds of the board were provided by the federal Government.

All provinces in Canada, excepting Ontario, Saskatchewan and Prince Edward Island, participated from the outset. In 1934 the Canadian Farm Loan Act was amended and the federal Government became the sole owner, having repaid the capital provided by the provinces and the borrowers. Lending was then extended to all provinces in Canada and has since been continued uninterrupted. The Canadian Farm Loan Board maintains a branch office, responsible for the processing of all loans, in each province except Newfoundland. Applications for loans from Newfoundland farmers are made direct to the head office in Ottawa. I expect that if and when the applications are of sufficient number a branch office will be opened in Newfoundland.

The main purposes for which the Canadian Farm Loan Board was set up were:

1. To reduce farm mortgage interest rates of between 7 and 12 per cent.

2. To provide a dependable source of funds for farm mortgage lending under varying economic conditions.

3. To provide mortgage loans for a long period. As I have said, it is 25 years at present, and if this bill is approved it will be 30 years.

4. To provide for the orderly repayment of farm mortgage loans with maximum ease by amortizing the loan through equal annual, semi-annual or monthly instalments of principal and interest.

The provision by this board of moderate and stable interest rates for farmers across Canada has always been predicated upon a competitive and self-sustaining operation without the benefit of government subsidies, so that the mortgage interest rates charged farmers by all mortgage companies could properly and fairly be influenced by that charged by the board. The board makes loans to farmers across Canada without restrictions as to age, residence, sex or nationality. Since commencing loaning operations in 1929 this board has made mortgage loans in excess of $100 million to more than 43,000 farmers in Canada. At the present time there are more than 20,000 borrowers, owing a total of over $44 million.

The collection experience of the board has been considered good, and as at March 31, 1955, the total in interest arrears amounted to only $173,381, representing ·439 per cent of outstanding principal. Foreclosures of loans have always been kept to the lowest minimum consistent with safety of investment, and foreclosure has been resorted to only when the borrower's position has been apparently hopeless. The board's record of real estate acquired shows 684 securities from 1929 to 1949 and 17 securities from 1949 to 1955—a total of 701.

Actual losses sustained by the board since its inception total $716,917. These losses have been taken care of by the reserve for losses built up through the years, and which now totals $2,349,258.

The board in 1955 required 123 employees to place 2,137 new loans totaling $8,207,000, while administering an investment of $40,000,000. It cost the board 1·39 per cent of investment in 1955 to administer 20,982 loans.

With the permission of the house I shall place three short tables on Hansard.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The tables are as follows:

A history of the board's maximum loan limits on first mortage:

1929 to July 2, 1934
50% of appraised value of land and 20% of permanent insured improvements thereon not to exceed	$10,000
July 3/34 to April 6/35
50% of appraised value of land and 20% of permanent insured improvements thereon not to exceed	7,500
April 17/35 to June 17/52
50% of appraised value of land and buildings not to exceed (These are on first mortgage)	5,000
June 18/52 to present
60% of appraised value of land and buildings not to exceed	10,000
Proposed amendments
65% of appraised value of land and buildings not to exceed	15,000

A history of interest rates charged by the board on first mortgage is as follows:

	Interest rate charged	Cost of funds to Board
1929 to Oct. 12/34	6½%	5 %
Oct. 13/34 to May 22/35	5½%	4 %
May 23/35 to April 1/45	5 %	3½%
April 2/45 to March 31/52	4½%	3 %
April 1/52 to present	5 %	3¾%-3⅞% Present cost 3¼%

Repayment periods:

1929 to April 16/35

Interest plus 1 or 2% of principal at option of borrower. Equivalent to amortization on a 23 or 32-year plan.

April 17/35 to present

Repayment on amortized plan not in excess of 25 years.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: In summary, the first 5 sections of this bill could be said to simplify the capital structure of the Farm Loan Board. It will broaden the board's activities by increasing the maximum amount of loans from $10,000 to $15,000 that can be provided under the act. It will simplify and improve the lending procedure by eliminating the short-term second and chattel mortgage loans, and it will dispose of the capital of the board acquired in connection with its operations under the Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act.

The short-term loans are made for 5 years and bear one per cent higher interest than the regular 5 per cent interest on regular first mortgage loans. Under this bill it will be possible to loan up to 65 per cent of the appraised value of properties, instead of the present limit of 60 per cent. As the act stands at the present time, the capital of the board consists of $5 million, which was originally advanced at the inception of the Board, together with issued shares of stock to the amount of $2,240,301. It is considered desirable to convert this original capital into an ordinary loan by the Government to the Board at current rates of interest.

The bill further provides for the cancellation of the $2,240,301 issued capital stock to the par value of $1 per share, and in substitution the board will be capitalized by 30,000 shares of stock of the par value of $100 per share, the total value of which will be $3 million.

With respect to reserves, under the existing statute the board has been required to set aside at least 10 per cent of its net annual earnings in a special reserve fund, and at present this amounts to $878,000. But this is not a reserve in the ordinary sense of the word because it has not been available under the statute for the payment of losses. In addition, the board, under long practice, has had a special reserve built up on the basis of one-half of one per cent of its lending. This reserve now amounts to $2,349,258. In substitution of these two reserves, the bill provides for the establishment of a single reserve account to which all losses may be charged, and it is stipulated in the bill that the amount of the reserve will never exceed the amount of the capital, which, as I have indicated, will be $3 million.

Prior to 1952 the board could raise money only by the issue and sale of bonds to the Minister of Finance, which was an awkward and cumbersome method of financing; and in 1952 Parliament made provision for simple borrowing by the Board from the Minister of Finance without the necessity of issuing bonds. It is now proposed to go a step further and drop the bond-issuing provisions entirely, and to convert all the board's borrowings into simple straight loans from the Minister of Finance. The original purpose of the bond-issuing power was to enable the board to borrow money directly from the public; but this was never done.

The board will repay the capital advance of $29,000 for loans to fishermen and $161 shares of stock, less the operating deficit of $5,203. As the few outstanding fishermen's loans are paid, the proceeds will be paid into the consolidated revenue fund.

Honourable senators, if this bill receives second reading I will be pleased to move that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few remarks. First of all, I abhor the very thought of a mortgage on a farm, and always have. I doubt the wisdom of increasing the amount of loans. I am sympathetic toward men who take up farming without experience. A great many Canadian farmers today who are using tractors and modern machinery would be much better advised even to use oxen. I knew a farmer in Saskatchewan who had 250 acres of nicely seeded wheat before an engine had ever turned a wheel on the farm; he worked horses before he ever thought of using heavy machinery and a tractor. When travelling by train up the Ottawa Valley from Montreal or in any other direction I can easily tell the farms that are worked by horses because the fields are nicely worked and tilled; but where tractors are used, in an endeavour to save a few dollars, the land is in an awful mess, and one can see holes at the corners of the fields where the tractor turned. On a small farm with a few dairy cows, and where there is a bush lot for winter use, a team of horses is almost essential, and often the team is called upon to pull a tractor out which has bogged down. For instance, on a wet morning a farmer who attempts to operate a tractor on a hilly farm will get stuck on every little knoll and sit with his wheels spinning, where an old team of horses would walk faithfully along.

Something has recently been said in the press about the trend towards mechanization of farming in France; but four or five years ago when I visited that country I saw a large number of horses at work in the fields. And in my travels through Belgium I saw on the farms a great many beautiful horses, fit for show, but not one tractor did I see. It was wonderful to see a couple of young colts among the cows in every pasture field.

The farmer who uses a tractor finds when it is worn out that he must have cash to repair it or buy a new one; whereas, if he uses horses, he can drive to town in his horse and buggy and leave his pocket-book at home. Too often one sees a farmer who assumes a mortgage in order to keep up with the mechanization trend, only to find that the cost of maintaining machines and buying fuel has greatly increased. For instance, even diesel fuel oil has increased from 17 to 21 cents a gallon. There are a great many farmers in the northern part of Manitoba and across Saskatchewan, and of course in eastern Canada as well, who would be much better off if they could not obtain a mortgage to buy mechanized equipment. When they do buy a tractor they are either digging it out, or overhauling it, or they are out on the road driving their cars and spending the money and extra time that they think they saved by using the tractor instead of the faithful horse. Furthermore, the horse will reproduce its own at little cost to the farmer; he can always have colts coming along to replace the older horses.

I would warn farmers to think very carefully before they mortgage their land for any purpose. In my own case, when I bought land my first desire was to get a clear title to it as quickly as I could. Of course, honourable senators will tell me that the banks were at that time not allowed to lend money on land. Well, my answer is they lent it to me. I would go to my banker and lay my clear titles on the table and tell him that I wanted to borrow a certain amount of money for a year. I would tell him also that if I lost my crop and the worst came to the worst I could always mortgage my land, but I would do it only as a last resort. Sure enough, I would get my loan, and whether the banker was acting strictly according to the provisions of the Bank Act or not it worked well for me for many years.

So I advise all young farmers to keep their land clear as long as they possibly can. Although credit is not as readily available as it once was, there are some people who are able to get it for the purchase of land and machinery. Of course, I believe that the record of repayment under this legislation has been very good and the losses have been exceedingly small. However, we do not know what lies ahead of us, and therefore I would caution farmers to hold their titles clear. They should borrow against their land only as a last resort.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, the Canadian Farm Loan Act has been in operation now for quite a number of years, and it has no doubt been of benefit to many Canadian farmers particularly because, as the sponsor (Hon. Mr. McDonald) has mentioned, it has effected lower interest rates. I well recall the days when a farmer who wanted even a short-term loan had to pay from 8 per cent to 10 per cent interest. By and large the profits from farming are not sufficient to bear such high rates.

The sponsor of the bill spoke of the long delay in obtaining long-term and intermediate loans from the Farm Loan Board. The trouble in the district from which I come is not only the delay, but the fact that in many cases a loan is never made at all. I come from what is called the dry area. I recall seeing some years ago a letter from the chief official of the board in which he said they were not making any loans in the dried-out area. It was, I think, a great mistake to make that general statement, because there are in that area men who have made a real success of farming and who are quite worthy of obtaining loans. The idea of blanketing off an area and not giving consideration to applications from it is certainly not fair to the farmers of that district.

I observe that the fisherman can get loans, but I find nothing in the bill that says that the farmer on irrigated land is included. I have correspondence from men who have large interests in irrigated land, and they complain they cannot get a loan; they complain that their applications are not even considered. This act is not used within my district to the extent that the farmers feel it should be used. There is a good deal of criticism that loans are refused without adequate investigation. That may apply on a limited scale, but I have heard so much about the problem that I feel I should place these few remarks on the record.

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I think we are labouring under some misapprehensions in our discussion of this measure. It is absolutely impossible to get money from the Canadian Farm Loan Board, secured by way of a mortgage on land, for the purpose of buying new machinery or to expand a farming operation in any manner whatever. I know that to be the fact, because year after year I have had clients make application for loans, and nine-tenths of them were refused.

I recall particularly the year 1934, when the amount which the board could borrow from the Government was increased to $90 million. Passage of the bill was delayed in this house, and I asked the then Leader of the Government to hurry it through for the benefit of a great many farmers in my district who had clear titles to quarter-sections of land but were in bad shape after the dry years; they had used up their resources and wanted to borrow some money to carry on. Finally, Parliament passed the bill, and I went home and told my farmer clients to go ahead and make their applications for loans. Well, it took several hours to fill out the three or four sheets of information required, which included all the borrower's history fom his birth-date forward. The farmer had to give all the details of his debts, including his grocery bills and so on. The result was that no loans were made to the people who had a clear title to their quarter-section of land, because the loan had to be big enough to pay off all the borrower's debts, and if it did not do that he had to go to his creditors and get them to agree to accept 50 per cent or perhaps 75 per cent of his obligations.

I took this question up with the board, and I was told that it was not in a position to lend money to people to do anything except pay off their debts and obligations and start afresh. I think that is still the principle behind this whole loaning operation.

The honourable senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw) has said very few loans have been made in his district. The same is true of the district I come from. The reason is, as I have said, that the loans are not for the purpose of buying machinery or expanding in any way, but rather to meet the farmer's total obligations, and in most cases the amount available is not large enough for that purpose. The whole object of this bill is to put a farmer back on his feet, pay up all his debts, and give him a chance to start over again.

If a person has security he can go to the bank and, under the act which was passed a few years ago, borrow sufficient money to buy his combine or tractor or anything else of that kind; but I am informed he cannot do that on money borrowed from the Farm Loan Board because it will not lend money for that purpose.

I raised this objection the last time the Canadian Farm Loan Act was up for amendment. I hope this bill is referred to committee, so that we may ask these questions and find out if what I said is exactly true. Over the years I have helped clients make dozens of applications and I cannot remember right now that any one of the loans ever went through, because the farmers could not get enough money to clean up all their obligations. My honourable friend from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) seems to think that money can be borrowed from the Canadian Farm Loan Board for the purpose of buying tractors and combines and other farm machinery, by placing a mortgage on a piece of land, if you happen to have a piece of land for which you have a clear title. However, my experience has been just the opposite. It has not been the policy of the board in our district at any rate to do that, even though we have in the Rosetown area one million acres of land under cultivation, one of the finest farming areas in the whole of western Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: And as a rule we have not been able to get a loan large enough to pay the balance owing on a piece of land, pay off prior mortgages on some other piece of land and that kind of thing, and if you cannot do that you cannot get a loan at all. You may have a section of land with a clear title and not be able to get a loan of any kind unless you pay all of your debts.

I agree that raising the maximum amount to $15,000 may be of some assistance and I am certainly pleased to see that the chattel mortgage feature has been done away with. If you made application for a loan under the present law there was not only a long delay, with the possibility of not being able to get it at all, but if it was accepted finally you had to give a first mortgage on your land, and sometimes a second mortgage, and you had to give also a first mortgage on all your goods and chattels, that is, on all your farm machinery. In other words, it tied you up completely, so if things went bad you could not borrow money in any other way at all, because the banks would not lend you anything; they would say, "Well, everything you have is mortgaged to the Farm Loan Board, and that is the end of it so far as we are concerned".

I would like to have the answers to a lot of questions that I intend to ask on this bill, even though it is an improvement on what we have had before. I think the policy of the board, as I have found it, is wrong. If a man is farming and has a clear title to a piece of land he should be able to borrow some money from the board on that land just as he can borrow from a mortgage company on land that he has a clear title to. Therefore, I hope that the sponsor of the bill will have an expert at the committee so that we can ask him these questions I have in mind.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, it is only to be expected that there would be different views regarding this bill, and no doubt honourable senators who preceded me have spoken on how the provisions of the bill would affect their own district.

I am rising first to commend the Government for the amendments proposed in the bill. I can say that as far as the Fraser Valley district is concerned the Farm Loan Board was a godsend in many instances. I further believe that farmers generally would rather owe money to the Government than to machinery companies or the banks for the machines they have to buy.

I will go this far in agreeing with the honourable senator from Blaine Lake, that there are arguments that can be used in favour of the use of horses rather than machinery. When tractors were first introduced in my district you could pass through the Fraser Valley and see sometimes eight or ten horses idle in the field while the farmer's tractor was at work. I remember one farmer saying to me that he hoped he would be able to sell his hay so that he could buy gasoline and oil for his tractor. I asked him, "Who is going to buy the hay if all the farmers are using machinery and tractors?" I say to the honourable senator from Blaine Lake it was inevitable that machinery was adopted by the farmer; in fact, I do not know where the farmer would be today without machinery or the tractor. In so far as my part of the country is concerned, it is almost impossible to get farm help. You will see throughout that area many instances of a farmer's boy at 10, 11 or 12 years of age driving a tractor, plowing and cultivating with machinery the fields which perhaps would never be cultivated if the farmer had to depend on horses or on outside help. You realize, of course, that today industry has offered to the workman the five-day week, three weeks' holidays, superannuation and sick leave benefits, and now labour is advocating even shorter hours and a guaranteed annual wage. Just what the ultimate end will be I do not know.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: Don't forget the 30-hour week.

Hon. Mr. Reid: And the farmer has to compete with that. No, I cannot imagine what the farmer would do without the tractor or machinery. I do not know much about the prairies, but I know that in the lower Fraser Valley you cannot get men to milk cows, or to work 8 and 10 hours every day; furthermore, you cannot get men to work with horses today, because after a day's work in the field the men would have to spend an hour or more feeding and cleaning them.

Many farmers in my district would have lost their farms were it not for the help given them by the Farm Loan Board.

Honourable senators, I am not sure if I can manage to be present at the meetings of the committee to which this bill will probably be referred, because of the fact that I have other committee meetings to attend. However, if the sponsor of the bill cannot give me now the information I want, I would appreciate it if he would obtain it for me in committee, if I am not able to be at the meeting. I would like to have answers to the following questions: What is the chief reason for increasing from 25 to 30 the number of years for the repayment of a loan? And how many farmers of 50 years of age have obtained a loan from the board? A man who is 50 now will in 30 years be 80. Generally speaking, a farmer is at his best at 40; at that age he is experienced and in his full strength. If the Farm Loan Board adopts the policy followed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation it is going to be extremely difficult for a man of 45 or 50 years of age to get a loan, because by the time it is repaid he will be over 80.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: A man of that age will not get a loan, even today.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Well, that is what I would like to find out. In my district I think he can. I would like to be informed as to the real reason for changing the term for repayment from 25 to 30 years, and also as to the number of farmers over 45 years of age who have not been able to obtain loans.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: The preceding speaker has said some of the things which I thought I would like to say; but I rise chiefly for the purpose of congratulating the honourable senator from King's (Hon. Mr. McDonald), who has so ably presented this bill.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: I think he did a splendid job. He gave us all the information we need, and he did it so well that we have in our minds a pretty clear presentation of the objects of the bill. No man is better qualified than the honourable senator from King's to introduce such a bill, for his record as Minister of Agriculture for the province of Nova Scotia during several years is an outstanding one.

It is always most refreshing to hear from the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner). I sometimes wish that things were as he thinks they are. Unfortunately we do not live in the kind of world of which he spoke this afternoon; and I think the questions he raised were adequately answered by the honourable senator who has just taken his seat.

As the honourable senator from King's and others who come from Nova Scotia know, there is in that section of the country a real problem because of changes in the size of farm holdings. The small farmer of years ago, who got along very nicely on a quite limited acreage, is passing out. He can no longer live on a small piece of land, so he has turned to some other occupation; and in order to increase production these small holdings have been amalgamated into larger farms. In farming, as in industry, increased production is the answer to the problem of survival. When those who operate these amalgamated farms set out to compete, they have to buy expensive machinery. For the last several years, in two and perhaps three provinces, the provincial departments of agriculture have been trying to induce farmers to build silos as the only effective means of carrying on a dairy business. Considerable headway in this respect has been made both in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, where we see evidence of many silos, principally the horizontal type, being built. But silage cutters and machines used in the preparation of proper silage cost money, and farmers are not in a position to purchase what they need unless they are able to borrow.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Money for this purpose cannot be loaned under the provisions of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: I welcome this legislation as providing a means for farmers to obtain the up-to-date machinery which is absolutely necessary in order to run efficiently even a moderate-sized farm in these provinces at the present time. What the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) said is quite true. How in the world can any man operate a farm today and come out square at the end of the year in our section of the country if he has to pay 80 to 90 cents an hour in competition with industry for labour? It is impossible. Much as we regret it, the horse, to which the honourable senator from Blaine Lake referred, has faded out of the picture.

When the honourable senator from King's replies, I should like him to answer two questions. First: I presume that the Farm Loan Board pays the Government a certain rate of interest for the money it borrows: does that rate vary from time to time? My second question is: are there various provincial farm loan boards which are engaged in the same type of service; and if so, is there any conflict between the Farm Loan Board and the provincial boards in this respect?

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I do not wish to discuss the bill, but before the honourable senator from King's replies I should like to clear up one or two misunderstandings. The honourable senator from King's did not say—or if he did, he was mistaken—that this board lends money to anybody to buy machinery. That is done under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. The applicant goes to a bank and specifies the machinery he wants, an advance up to 75 per cent of the cost is made, and a note or a lien is taken. I know of one bank in Virden where the young man in charge of accounts made in three weeks 175 loans to farmers for machinery.

The bill before us has to do with farmers who have debts against their farms and want to borrow money. The maximum advance has been increased from $10,000 to $15,000, and debts existing when a loan is made on a farm are included in the total to be advanced. But, I repeat, money cannot be borrowed from the Farm Loan Board for the purchase of machinery. The problem as far as Manitoba is concerned—and, having quite a large number of farmer clients, I think I know as much about the matter as anyone here—is similar to that in New Brunswick, but on a much larger scale. When my honourable friends from Blaine Lake and Rosetown and I were growing up, a man with a half-section of land was regarded as quite a large farmer. Today, with such an acreage, he is a "piker"; he cannot make it pay with the high-class, expensive machinery now in use. To have a first-class farm one must operate at least a section of land. When I was a boy the farmer hired in the spring a man to help him sow his land; he engaged someone in June and July for summerfallowing; and in August and September two or sometimes three men were brought in to take off the crop and put it in stacks: and between that time and the first of December, whenever the threshermen came around, he would have his grain threshed. But nowadays one has only to go to Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta to see a very different condition of things. The farmer goes around his fields with a tractor and after a while his wife will come along in a truck. The farmer will load the truck with wheat or whatever grain it is and his wife will deliver it to the elevator. Then she will return to the farm for another load.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is not so now, for the elevators have too much wheat.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is true in your district, because you grow too much wheat.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am not a farmer but what about the sowing of the grain?

Hon. Mr. Haig: The same thing is true. One man can do it all. Nowadays, for the same acreage, a farmer will sow as much grain in two weeks as the honourable senator from Blaine Lake used to sow in six weeks.

Hon. Mr. Horner: That is not so.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, it is being done. As the honourable senator from Northumberland-Miramichi (Hon. Mr. Burchill) said, the real crux of the argument is the fact that farmers will not do this work for the financial return that the grain will yield. That is the trouble. What my friend from Blaine Lake has said would be right if they could get men to do the work, but they just can't.

The trouble with this whole set-up is that the Canadian Farm Loan Board cannot compete with private lenders in making loans to farmers. Loan companies are able to do things the Farm Loan Board can't. For instance, the loan manager of a private company will go out at any time and appraise land, and he can lend a farmer more money than the board can. Farmers will nearly always borrow from private companies in preference to the board.

The figures presented by the honourable senator from King's are about right. I understand that only about 2 per cent of the loans made to farmers in Ontario are made by the Canadian Farm Loan Board.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Approximately 3 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, that is almost as bad. In Manitoba the figure is about 5 per cent. That is simply ridiculous. My honourable friend has said they are cutting down costs. Well, farmers are paying the same rate of interest proportionately that other borrowers are. It is true they are not paying 8 per cent, but neither is anyone else. I used to borrow from the bank at 8 per cent interest, but I wouldn't have to pay that now, because it is not the going rate.

I happen to know the branch manager of the Farm Loan Board in Winnipeg. He is a smart young man and is very familiar with the difficulties encountered by the board in its operations. I have gone to him with farmers seeking loans and he has said, "Senator Haig, I can't make that loan" and I have replied, "Well, I can place it elsewhere, but it will cost the farmer one per cent or 1½ per cent more". Usually the farmer has said, "All right, I'll take the loan at that rate, because I want the money to buy certain land I'm after." Many a farmer wants to buy an adjoining quarter- or half-section of land to his own farm, but quite often the loan which the board is able to give is insufficient for the purpose. The fact that the maximum loan is being increased to $15,000 may help in some cases, but this still doesn't take fully into account the present low purchasing value of the dollar and the increased value of farm land over, say, the past fifteen years.

I understand the new Commissioner of the Canadian Farm Loan Board is Mr. Chester.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Haig: He was an alderman in Winnipeg for some years. He is a smart fellow and he knows his business, but his hands are tied. The board should give him more latitude in respect to making loans. The same is true of the branch managers. For one thing, in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta a farmer is unable to secure a loan from the board from November 1 until May 1. Why is this? Well, the officials say, "As long as the land is covered with snow we won't make a loan on it".

Hon. Mr. McDonald: They cannot appraise it properly under those conditions.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But the loan managers of private companies do. There is not enough authority vested in the commissioner or the local managers of the board. I have known the manager of the branch in Winnipeg for a long time. He always votes Liberal, but outside of that he is a pretty fine fellow. He was born and raised on a farm and he understands farming life. He was a credit manager of a private company in Winnipeg, so he is familiar with credit matters and experienced in dealing with the public, and he can judge a person's ability to make good. However, he is hamstrung by a book of rules and regulations which he cannot go beyond. He simply cannot compete with the manager of a private loan company who is given practically full authority in the matter of making loans.

The honourable senator from Rosetown may live in a better farming district than the honourable gentleman from Blaine Lake, or vice versa, but generally speaking I know where the best farm districts are in Manitoba, and so does anybody else who has lived there long enough and has had anything to do with farming. That knowledge is available to the board, but what good is it to the manager in Winnipeg if he is not allowed to use it? That is the type of thing I object to in the operations of the Canadian Farm Loan Board. Through the years the board has done a lot of good work but I do not think our farmers have obtained nearly as much benefit from it as they would have if a little more freedom had been vested in its commissioner and local managers. If the board had realized that the value of land fluctuates with changing economic conditions Canadian farmers would have enjoyed better service from the board.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: In his reply would the honourable senator from King's advise us if the cost of administration is charged against the benefits which have accrued to the board?

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, after listening to the numerous agricultural loaning experts in the house it is with a little diffidence that I rise to make a few observations upon this bill. Not being an expert I probably am not qualified to judge, but it does seem to me that this bill is a definite improvement on the measure it supersedes. The important part of it really represents a reconstruction of the capital structure of the Canadian Farm Loan Board to make its regulations more easily administered and applied. That is all to the good. The powers under which the board can loan, as I understand it, are not extended or enlarged, but the board is given authority to increase loans from $10,000 to $15,000. The provisions of this bill would enable a farmer who might have a mortgage on his farm at, say, 6 or 7 per cent interest, payable in three or four years' time, to set that loan up anew. He can borrow from the Farm Loan Board now on a long-term basis up to 30 years, at interest of 5 per cent, discharge his old mortgage, and save in two ways: he can effect a saving on the rate of interest he is paying, and he can amortize his debt over 30 years if he wishes to do so. The effect of that, of course, would be to reduce his immediate obligations and, as year succeeds year, he would have more money from the proceeds of his labour to invest in labour-saving equipment, farm machinery, and so on. That is all to the good.

There are some fields of activity, I think, that governments would do very well to keep out of, but I have always felt that the Government is quite justified in engaging in this field.

Honourable senators, again with a little hesitation, may I offer a comment or two to express my own views on the general condition of agriculture? It is clear to me, at any rate, that nowadays agriculture in Canada, both east and west, is passing through a very critical stage. A great handicap to the farmer—or, if one prefers to use a more euphonious term, "the agriculturist"—is that he is exposed to hazards not experienced in other lines of business. In this very district at the present time farmers are almost unable to do any seeding on the land because of the intermittent rainfall. It is now June 4, and there is a grave possibility that if seeding cannot be done very soon it will be too late to do it this spring. The same is true of western Canada. Ordinarily the Prairie provinces do best with cereal crops if seeding is done by May 10. If seeding is done later there is a greater hazard of frost and rust damage. This season very little seeding was done in the Prairie provinces before May 10. Fortunately, today a farmer with mechanical equipment can do in three or four days' time the work that formerly took him perhaps two or three weeks with four-horse teams; by working from daylight to dark, if the weather is suitable, he can now manage to get his seed planted in time. The same is true of harvesting operations.

But the need for mechanized equipment raises a pertinent problem. The farmer who requires such equipment to get the work done expeditiously faces a very heavy outlay of capital investment. My honourable friend from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) would be better able than I to give an estimate of the equipment required on a farm to do work expeditiously. That raises another problem. If a farmer is going to use expensive equipment to the best advantage he must have a farm unit of the size that is suitable to it. This puts the small farmer—the quarter-section man, or the man with a hundred or two hundred acres—in a difficult position, for he cannot afford to spend $12,000 or $15,000 on equipment for the limited amount of land he cultivates. Sometimes I think that, particularly in the Prairie provinces, we are in a state of transition, and that two types of farmers will emerge. The first type will perhaps farm anywhere from 800 to 2,000 acres of land, or maybe more, and he will be able to afford $25,000 to $40,000 for the necessary equipment. Then there will be the small unit farmer who cannot afford such equipment, and he will be pushed back to the use of horses, as in the past. It may be that my judgment in this matter is wrong. However, I suggest that some day, perhaps during a future session when we have ample time on our hands, it might not be a bad idea if this house were to institute an inquiry into these matters, for I believe them to be of great importance to the well-being of this country.

One more observation, and I am through. We have seen the growth of industry and the emphasis put upon industrial development. Sometimes in reading the sayings of the wise I find myself bewildered. I think we are putting too much emphasis on industrial development of all kinds. Agriculture is one of the oldest professions in the world, and deserves our consideration. The advance of industrialization has resulted in shorter hours of labour in the factory, and the wages of the factory worker have been greatly increased. This means that the future of farming is threatened. Our young men are going to the towns and cities to take advantage of shorter hours and higher pay. Why would not a young farmer, if he were looking for a position, enter the civil service, for instance, if he could do so? Why would he not go into a factory where he would work 40 hours a week at good wages, and have the hope that probably within a few years he would be working only 36 hours a week for the same wages? How in the world can we expect him to stay on the farm, particularly if he is in a mixed farming operation, where he has to tend his livestock seven days in the week and gets no overtime for it?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: He has freedom and he is his own boss.

Hon. Mr. Horner: And he has a life worth living.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: A good deal has been said on that score, but I hope the honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) is not too much impressed by it. It is true that there is a great deal of freedom on the farm, but I would point out that people today want security more than they want freedom; indeed, they are willing to sacrifice freedom for security. Heaven knows where that road will lead them. As I said earlier, these are important problems; they might well engage the attention of this house at some future time. In the meantime, I cordially support the bill which was so adequately explained by the honourable senator from King's.

Hon. George H. Barbour: Honourable senators, I am prepared to go along pretty well with the remarks expressed by the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) on this bill. Let me cite the case of a man I know who owned two farms, each of which carried a mortgage. In 1953 he purchased a third farm. Although this latter farm had been sold in 1922 for $10,000, and the land was certainly more productive in 1953 than in 1922, he was not able to get a 50 per cent loan from the Farm Loan Board. He was told that he must first clear off the other two mortgages if he wanted to keep the other farms. So he was compelled to raise money elsewhere.

I have frequently heard other complaints about the length of time a farmer must wait before getting a loan. As the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) has said, farmers are unable to get their land valued for loan purposes between the months of November and May.

Further, I am advised that a farmer can get a mortgage from a loan company at a cost of about $15 or $20, but to get a loan from the Loan Board he must pay $10 when he makes his application, and in addition his legal expenses amount to as high as $75. When this bill goes to committee I should like to ask the honourable senator from King's if that is the case, and if so why the cost is so high.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the honourable senator from King's speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: —I shall attempt to answer as many of the questions raised as I can at this time, but may I say that the Commissioner of the Canadian Farm Loan Board is now in the gallery of the house and is available to meet with us in committee this afternoon. Unfortunately, he has to go to Toronto, and will not be available to us again this week. I am sure he is our best adviser, and if it is agreeable to honourable senators, we could meet in committee this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Reid: How will the senators who are not now in the house be notified of the meeting?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: May I say to the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) that I heartily agree with what he said. I know of many farmers who have unwisely mortgaged their land to make the changeover from horses to machinery when their acreage was not large enough to make the operation profitable. I speak more for the farmers in eastern and central Canada than I do for those in the Prairie provinces when I say that I think we should keep in mind the fact that the farmer often has help from within his own family, and it is not always necessary for him to assume the heavy financial burden of buying machines and paying for gas and oil. If a farmer can get along with horses, he is producing his own power on his own fields at much less cost than if he were operating a tractor.

The honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) asked a question as to extending the term of loans from 25 to 30 years. Many requests were made by people for an extension of time beyond 25 years; in fact, the Federation of Agriculture asked that the term be increased to 40 years. It was thought that an extension to 30 years was reasonable under the circumstances. Of course, I cannot imagine the board making a loan to a man of 50 years of age for the full 30-year period.

Hon. Mr. Reid: That is the point.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: His age would have to be taken into consideration. He might get a loan for, say, 10 or 15 years. It must be remembered that the Canadian Farm Loan Board is dealing with public funds. In this respect I should like to ask the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) if he would be prepared to make a personal loan in a case where the board has turned the applicant down. It must be remembered that loans are made only when there is reasonable assurance that they will be repaid with interest. However, these particular cases can be discussed when the bill is considered in committee.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I would have no objection to making a loan to a farmer who had a clear title to his land; it is good security.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: The honourable senator from Northumberland-Miramichi (Hon. Mr. Burchill) referred to the rate of interest. I have already placed on Hansard the table covering the rate of interest at which the board borrows money from the Minister of Finance, which is 3¼ per cent, and the rate which it charges the borrower, which is 5 per cent. The board pays its administration costs and sets up its reserve out of the profit it makes on the difference between its borrowing and lending rates. It may be said that over the past four years the amount left over after administration costs was quite small —I think it was something like $300,000. Some suggestion has been made that the board should reduce its interest rates to farmers. The answer to that criticism is that if the rate were reduced by even only one-half of one per cent it would mean a reduction in income of more than $200,000 a year, a reduction that the operation could not stand.

Some questions have been raised about the delay by the board in making appraisals of land. It has to be remembered that the appraisers are trained men and know their job well, but it would not be safe for one of them to loan money in, say, the province of Nova Scotia without personally making an inspection of the land in question. This has to be done at a season when the snow is off the ground.

Honourable senators, I may not have answered all the questions raised but, as I said earlier, the commissioner is prepared to discuss the bill with us in committee if we can assemble there this afternoon.

Hon. Stanley S. McKeen: Honourable senators, there is one question I would like to ask on the subject of these loans. A question was already asked whether a bank loan would be made to a person whose application was turned down by the Farm Loan Board. Was not the purpose of this legislation to lend money at a cheaper rate of interest than could be secured commercially? Of course, if a farmer can borrow money at the bank, naturally he would have no need to go to the Farm Loan Board. But am I correct in understanding that the purpose of this legislation is to give farmers loans that are not considered safe bank loans, and at a cheaper rate of interest?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: That is right.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators, if it meets with your approval I would move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Natural Resources. The National Parks Bill is also before that committee for consideration, having been referred to it on motion of the honourable member from Queens-Lunenburg (Hon. Mr. Kinley). Whether we have time to consider both these bills this afternoon or not, I do not know, but I would like to have Mr. Chester, the commissioner of the Canadian Farm Loan Board who is at present in the gallery, appear before the committee.

Hon. Mr. Reid: You will not be able to get the committee assembled now.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The Committee on Natural Resources is not the right committee to refer this bill to.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators, I am at your service.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I just want to raise an objection. This matter has nothing to do with the Committee on Natural Resources at all. This is a banking bill, and if there is any bill that should be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee, this is one. The bill deals with the lending of money—it has nothing to do with natural resources at all—and it should be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators, it is immaterial to me which committee is chosen. I thought that the Natural Resources Committee had more members who are personally interested in this matter than perhaps the Banking and Commerce Committee had.

Hon. Mr. Reid: What is the hurry? Could we not take it up next week?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: There is no hurry.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the question is on the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Natural Resources.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No.

Hon. Mr. Haig: No.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is not the right committee.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: If there is objection to referring it to the Standing Committee on Natural Resources I would be pleased to change it to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate it is moved by Hon. Mr. McDonald that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

DIVORCE

BILLS—SECOND READINGS

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, moved the second reading of the following bills:

Bill D-14, an Act for the relief of Jennie Zalezniak Wiseman.

Bill E-14, an Act for the relief of Phyllis Elizabeth Jardine Williams.

Bill F-14, an Act for the relief of Martha Hope MacDougall Fortier.

Bill G-14, an Act for the relief of Hugh Oliver Semper.

Bill H-14, an Act for the relief of Yvonne Elizabeth Thurgarland Brosseau.

Bill I-14, an Act for the relief of Hugh Lawrence Byers.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the second time, on division.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I have the indulgence of the house to revert to standing orders for the purpose of presenting some reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck presented the committee's reports Nos. 366 to 382, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, June 5, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

PRIVATE BILL

NIAGARA LOWER ARCH BRIDGE COMPANY LIMITED—FIRST READING

Hon. W. D. Euler, for Hon. Salter A. Hayden, presented Bill J-14, an Act respecting Niagara Lower Arch Bridge Company Limited.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Euler: With leave, next sitting.

PRESIDENT OF INDONESIA

ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF BOTH HOUSES

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, this morning we were privileged to hear an outstanding address by the first President of the Republic of Indonesia, at a meeting of members of both houses. I am sure all honourable senators would like to have that address, and the other addresses delivered this morning, appear in the permanent records of this house. With leave, therefore, I would move:

That the address of His Excellency Dr. Sukarno, President of the Republic of Indonesia, to members of both houses of Parliament this day, and other addresses delivered on this occasion, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, and form part of the permanent records of this house.

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: Honourable senators, in future would it be possible to have a notice sent to each senator's room advising when a visitor is coming to address members of both houses? Unfortunately I was not in the chamber yesterday afternoon at the time notice was given that the President of Indonesia would address members of both houses. I had a speaking engagement, and had previously arranged to show some slides early in the evening. Therefore I did not learn in time, that the President of Indonesia would be here, and I am greatly disappointed because of having missed his address.

The motion was agreed to.

See appendix to today's Hansard, p. 633.

PUBLIC BILLS

SUSPENSION OF RULES

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved, pursuant to notice of May 29:

That for the balance of the present session, Rules 23, 24 and 63 be suspended in so far as they relate to public bills.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, before the question is put, I would like to ask a question. I know it is customary, two or three days before prorogation or dissolution, to move for the suspension of certain rules. However, may I ask the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) to be frank enough to tell us exactly the purpose of this resolution at this particular time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I shall be perfectly frank in my answer to the question asked by the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner).

As has been said, a motion in these words is customarily passed toward the end of each session. My recollection is that it is passed about the time the last interim supply bill is likely to come to us. The words of the motion clearly state its purpose, namely, to relieve the house of the observance of Senate Rules 23, 24 and 63 as they relate to public bills.

As to the effect of the motion, its passage would remove the delays which must occur under our rules at the various stages of consideration of public bills. For instance, Rule 23 requires that two days' notice must be given of the second reading of a bill. Similarly, there is a rule providing that this house must meet on every sitting day at three o'clock in the afternoon.

I will be perfectly frank, as I try to be in answering all questions in this house, in giving my honourable friend an explanation of the effect of this motion. There are two bills which may be affected by it, if not today, in all likelihood tomorrow. One is the interim supply bill. As honourable senators will recall, in March we approved a bill granting interim supply for the months of April and May. We are now into June, but for reasons which we all know and to which I shall not refer, the bill granting additional interim supply has not come to us. It may come to us today or tomorrow, but I would think that, at the very latest, it would reach us on Thursday. Whenever it does come before the house I am quite sure honourable senators would want to give it first and second readings that day, and perhaps even give it third reading, and allow it to pass. However, that will be a matter for the house to decide.

There is another bill that is likely to come to us, I hope, today, but in all probability, I would say, tomorrow. That is the pipe line bill. It has been discussed, as we know, for a number of weeks in the other house and is now at the third reading stage in that house. If that bill comes to us tomorrow, under our rules it would receive first reading immediately. It would then be necessary, if the present rules are in effect, for the bill to stand and not be called for second reading until Friday. Now, honourable senators, we have completed practically all the work that is on our order paper, so unless we suspend the rules mentioned in the motion we would sit here on Wednesday and Thursday doing nothing, and start consideration of the second reading of the bill on Friday. I do not think honourable senators would want to do that. I feel they would like to commence consideration of that bill on second reading as soon as reasonably possible after it reaches this house.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I doubt if there is one senator in this house who would desire that this bill should receive first reading tomorrow, if we get it, and remain here Thursday without being considered by this house, although we have no other work before us, and then be taken into consideration on the second reading stage on Friday.

Honourable senators, let me impress upon you that the suspension of these rules does not in any way curtail debate. There will be every opportunity under the rules of our house for debate to go on in the usual way without any curtailment whatsoever, and without restriction.

The only prpose of my motion, so far as the pipe line bill is concerned, is to enable us, if the house so desires and so votes, to start consideration of that bill tomorrow on the motion for second reading, but without curtailing debate in any way whatsoever.

Honourable senators, if the motion which I have submitted carries, I would suggest that instead of meeting tomorrow afternoon at 3 o'clock we should meet tomorrow morning at, say, 11 o'clock and receive the bill.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If honourable senators wished to start discussion immediately on second reading it could be done. However, if honourable senators felt they would like to have the bill for several hours, we could adjourn after the routine proceedings until, say, 2, 2.30 or 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and then proceed with the motion for second reading of the bill.

Honourable senators, I have been perfectly frank with you, and I think you will agree that this motion should be passed.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable members, I thank the Leader of the Government for the statement he has made. There is one point in the statement that I am just a little perturbed about. I quite agree with the idea of meeting tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock; I think it is a good one. But I suggest that we resume at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and, after second reading, go into Committee of the Whole House to consider the bill. I say that because, so long as I have been connected with this house or have known anythink about it, it has been the practice to refer important bills to committee. This house, during my experience, has always been noted for its efficient work in committee, where detailed information could be asked for and obtained. Ordinarily I would have suggested that the bill should be remitted to the Banking and Commerce Committee, the Natural Resources Committee, or some other standing committee, but perhaps only the members of the committee would attend the meeting; other senators, though having the right to attend, might not feel like doing so. So, all things considered, it seems to me that it would be best to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole and have a full discussion. The Leader of the Government, in accordance with a practice in the other place, could send for officials and have them in attendance to answer questions on which he is not fully informed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: A big job.

Hon. Mr. Haig: This house is noted for its deliberate handling of legislation from the other place, especially bills which affect Canada as a whole. When the Fathers of Confederation were engaged in their historic debates, Brown of Ontario and Cartier of Quebec were particularly keen on the creation of an appointive Senate. Macdonald rather favoured an elective second chamber, but to this Brown was absolutely opposed, because a body of that kind had been in existence in Canada from 1841, and, he contended, had been a complete failure. In the result the appointive method was accepted. At that time Macdonald insisted, and there was general agreement with him, that the Senate should consist of a body of men—at that time nobody anticipated women senators—

Hon. Mr. Euler: They were not "persons"!

Hon. Mr. Haig: —who would give "sober second thought" to legislation coming from the other house. I still think that that principle is the right one. Perhaps, if I were in the other chamber, I would be fighting like a tiger on one side or the other. The members of that house are the elected representatives of the people, and therefore it is their responsibility to deal first with national problems. I do not think that our position is on all fours with theirs. We have to say whether, all things considered, it is advisable in the interests of Canada that a pipe line should be constructed in the manner that is proposed.

I have before me a copy of the bill. There are some questions about it which I should like to ask the Leader of the Government, but they are of a technical nature, and it may be that he is not sufficiently informed at the moment to answer them. For instance, how is the cost of gas supplied to Winnipeg to be determined?

If a city requires so many cubic feet a year, will it be charged less than if it takes a larger amount? How are the payments to be arrived at? Will Winnipeg, say, be charged with a fixed proportion of the total cost of the service across Canada, and in what relation to, say, Montreal and Toronto? Departmental officials will be able to give us that information, and it could be obtained in Committee of the Whole. So I repeat that while I assent to our meeting at 11 o'clock tomorrow, I think we should meet again at, say, 2 o'clock. I suggest that hour rather than 3 o'clock, because it would afford us a greater opportunity to ask questions if the house went into Committee of the Whole. Then we could have all the next day, if necessary, to discuss the legislation. I would like to hear from the Leader of the Government as to whether he favours this idea. The Department of Trade and Commerce will know what officials should come here to assist the leader. I have read the contracts, and while they tell part of the story they do not tell the whole story. I make my suggestion in the belief that it would enable us to perform our duty in this house. For this reason I would like to see it agreed to before we pass the motion.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, the question of whether this bill should be considered by one of our standing committees or by the Committee of the Whole is one which the house itself will have to decide.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I agree.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The idea of having the bill handled by the Committee of the Whole House has occurred to me too, and I think I can say I would agree to that procedure. True, it would mean more work on my part, but I would be willing to take that on. The Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) has suggested that certain departmental officials should make themselves available in the house to assist me, and indeed I would welcome their help. I am satisfied the department would send its best informed officials. An excellent adviser would be Mr. M. W. Sharp, Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he would know what others should accompany him. Personally I would be agreeable to adopting this course.

Hon. Norman P. Lambert: Honourable senators, I would like to express myself on the point which has been raised by the Leader of the Opposition. Actually, I think we are out of order in discussing, before this bill comes to us, how it will be dealt with in the Senate. In the meantime the only thing this house is called upon to decide is whether it is willing to suspend three rules of the Senate in order to bring a certain bill before us in the way the Leader of the Government has suggested.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, as I understood it the proposal made by the Leader of the Opposition is that the bill be read a first time at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning, and then at 2 o'clock in the afternoon we should forgo second reading—

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Haig: No, the idea is to take as long as we like.

Hon. Mr. Croll: —and go into Committee of the Whole. Or was it to go into committee on second reading? I could not follow the suggestion.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: After second reading.

Hon. John T. Hackett: Honourable senators, I would like to say a word at this point. I recall that when John Buchan, Lord Tweedsmuir, came to this country as Governor General he was met at the shipside by a group of newspaper men. They asked him what his occupation had been before he was appointed Governor General of Canada, and somewhat to their amazement he replied "Politician and publisher". He may have given a somewhat different meaning to the word "politician" than the more or less scurrilous connotation that applies to the word here and now. I am called by some a politician. If that means being interested in the affairs of the country—

Hon. Mr. Reid: What is wrong with that?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: —I have been that for a long time, and all the time I have been associated with a political party that has not always sat to the right of His Honour the Speaker.

I should like to say a few words about the motion that is now before the house to suspend certain rules. If I could appeal only to the party of which I am a member I might feel that my endeavour could not rally a very large majority to my point of view; but there is in this house a group of men who express opinions that people are glad to hear, for they are opinions of men and women of thought, courage and experience. The Government of Canada is entrusted to Parliament, and Parliament is composed of Her Gracious Sovereign, the Senate and another legislative body. I have not lived on another continent or on another planet for the last two or three weeks and I am not entirely unaware of some of the occurrences, regrettable occurrences, of these last few days. But however regrettable occurrences elsewhere may have been, it behooves this body to give an example and to preserve the dignity of Parliament.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I shall not attempt to review in detail the events to which I have made reference, but I think that without attempting to place the blame, without saying who is right or who is wrong, we can agree that there have occurred regrettable instances in one of the great legislative bodies on this continent—

The Hon. the Speaker: Will my honourable friend permit me to remind him that any reference to the debates or the proceedings of the House of Commons is definitely out of order?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Mr. Speaker, and honourable senators, I always bow, or endeavour to bow, with such grace as I can command, to the ruling of the Chair. In this instance, Mr. Speaker, you are putting no burden on me. I shall endeavour to say what I intend to say without making reference to, or naming any events in, another chamber under this roof, but possibly I am entitled to mention what is common knowledge throughout the land, of what every newsboy on the street, every taxi driver, every person in the city, knows, that chaos has reigned where order should prevail.

The Hon. the Speaker: In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I must again refer my honourable friend to the very well-known parliamentary rule to which I have alluded. And I will express the view that the Chair should be respected.

The Senate has no specific rule which prevents reference by a senator to debates in the House of Commons but, under Rule 1, in all cases not provided for the standing orders, rules, usages and forms of proceeding of the Lords House of the Imperial Parliament shall be followed. In the House of Lords, by usage, allusions to the debates in the other house are out of order.

Bourinot, Fourth Edition, at page 357 says:

> It is also a part of the unwritten law of Parliament that no allusion should be made in one house to the debates in the other chamber, a rule always enforced by the Speaker with the utmost strictness.

May, Fourteenth Edition, at page 427, says:

> The rule that allusions to debates in the other house are out of order, prevents fruitless arguments between members of two distinct bodies who are unable to reply to each other, . . . but it is mainly founded upon the understanding that the debates of the other house are not known, and that the house can take no notice of them.

It is abundantly clear that all authorities agree that the dignity of Parliament can best be maintained by members confining themselves strictly to the subject-matter under consideration. I believe that any reference to the debates or proceedings in another branch of Parliament—and in order that there shall be no misunderstanding, I mean in the House of Commons—is distinctly out of order, and I so rule. I ask honourable members of this house to observe that rule and to attempt no evasion of it. Anyone with intelligence and long parliamentary experience knows the wisdom of the rule, and I hope honourable senators will abide by it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I hope that the aroused interest and the universal comment upon events have not escaped the knowledge of this house and will not preclude a reference to those events as they have been expressed by the press and by the people at large.

I said a few moments ago that Parliament is comprised of the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons. For the moment I wish to direct my remarks to the Senate and the rules which govern its deliberations. The Leader of the House (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has moved that certain rules be suspended until the end of the session. I submit to the house that the end of the session is not yet in sight, and that the two bills or anticipated legislation to which he has referred have not yet come to the attention of honourable senators. I understand that in certain circumstances the rules have been suspended in the past, but to suspend the rules for the very purpose of passing hurriedly one of the two pieces of legislation, as the honourable leader frankly admitted was the purpose, is placing fetters upon the members of this honourable house which they should not be asked to wear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It is striking fetters off.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: The honourable gentleman will undoubtedly have something to say about his view of my submission, and I shall listen to him with my usual attention and respect.

The first of the rules which we are asked to put aside for the time being is, Rule 23, which says:

Two days' notice must be given of a motion for any of the following purposes:

(a) To make a new rule or standing order, or to repeal or amend an existing rule or standing order;

(b) For an Address to His Excellency the Governor General, not merely formal in its character;

(c) For an Order of the Senate for any papers or documents not relating to a bill or other matter appearing among the Orders of the Day, or on the notice paper;

(d) For the appointment of a special committee;

(e) For the adoption of the report of any such special committee;

(f) For the second reading of a bill;

(g) A like notice is required of any inquiry, not relating to a bill or other matter appearing among the Orders of the Day, or on the notice paper.

Rule 24 reads:

One day's notice must be given of any of the following motions:

(a) To suspend any rule or standing order, or any part thereof;

(b) For the third reading of a bill;

(c) For any substantial amendment to a private bill;

(d) For the consideration of substantial amendments made in a public bill by a Committee of the Whole;

(e) That the Senate resolve itself forthwith into a Committee of the Whole;

I ask that, with the consent of honourable senators, the remaining paragraphs of that rule be copied into my remarks as if forming part of my reading:

(f) For the appointment of a standing committee;

(g) For an instruction to a committee;

(h) For the adoption of a report, not merely formal in its character, from any standing committee;

(i) For an adjournment of the Senate, other than the ordinary daily adjournment or that under Rule 14, 25 or 44;

(j) For any purpose to which neither the next preceding nor the next succeeding rule applies; and—

(k) A like notice is required of any inquiry relating to a bill or other matter appearing among the Orders of the Day or on the notice paper.

Further, we are being asked to suspend Rule 63, which reads:

No bill shall be read twice the same day; no Committee of the Whole House shall proceed on any bill the same day the bill is read a second time; and no bill shall be read the third time the same day that the bill is reported from the committee.

If these rules be suspended this honourable Senate will find itself as entirely—

Hon. Mr. Horner: Gagged.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: —impotent as it would be had closure been imposed: and even more so, because here no public utterance could be made after the acquisition of essential information. It would mean that this house, and its members, would be surrendering their right to contribute a sober second afterthought, for there is no possibility of thought if information be not available, and this house will not have had an opportunity of gathering and considering the information on which to make an essential decision.

I do not like to go too far into the discussion of this bill, because it has not been distributed yet, and the information concerning it is far from complete. But with the passage of this motion we in this house will have yielded up our right to weigh and consider information and to afford that assistance to the people of Canada, of whose government we form an essential part; we will be admitting that a matter of prime importance may be rushed through this house without adequate consideration.

Hon. Mr. Hardy: May I ask the honourable senator to what bill he is referring so frequently?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I think that is probably a very pertinent question. I refer to the bill concerning which we were told by the honourable leader of this house that we were being asked to suspend certain rules in order to put it through rapidly, a bill that neither the Senate, the honourable senator from Leeds (Hon. Mr. Hardy) nor I has yet seen.

Hon. Mr. Hardy: There is no bill before the house now.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Very well; it might be in order if the honourable gentleman were to move that the motion for suspension of rules be put aside until the bill to which it applies comes to the house. In the meantime I shall do the best I can in the absence of the information which, as the honourable senator has suggested, has so far been absolutely lacking. I for one am disinclined to pass a motion for the suspension of rules concerning legislation that I have not seen, and concerning matters about which I know nothing.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: Everybody is in the dark?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I submit, to be scurried through a narrow gateway without any opportunity of knowing where it leads is something that is absolutely unworthy of the dignity of this house. What is the great rush?

Some years ago Parliament passed the Emergency Powers Act, a piece of legislation which served a very useful purpose during the war years. When the war was over the taste of power had been so highly cultivated in those who wielded it that they renewed many times that legislation in the form of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, which enabled a portion of the Government to act without much assistance from Parliament. That act was continued from year to year, and the term "emergency" and the necessities of the moment were used as a means of retaining power. I think it was Lord Acton who uttered the words: "All power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely". This has found expression in our own Canadian Parliament. Now we in the Senate of Canada are asked, without debate, and before the presentation or arrival of legislation, to say that we throw aside all opportunity for discussing it when it comes to us, for appreciating its value, or the means of obtaining information necessary on which to formulate an opinion.

I submit that this motion, if passed, will place this honourable Senate and the senators in a belittling and degrading position. It would be a sacrifice of our status; it would be a yielding of our usefulness. I do not like to say that it would be the death knell of the Senate, but it certainly would be an additional ground and a very potent argument in the mouths of those who, feeling that this honourable body is useless and capable of rendering no service to the crown, seek its abolition.

I have been a partisan, and I have disagreed with men to whose party I did not belong. But most of us have had in common a belief in and a respect and a love for Parliament, and it occurs to me that by allowing this resolution to be carried we are showing and proclaiming to the high heavens that other things are far more important than Parliament. We are yielding to the temptation to permit the executive to intrude upon Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What executive?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: We in this Senate, knowing that matters which have been discussed abroad for some weeks are now coming here, are asked to treat these matters as if they were of no importance and not worthy of attention.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Well, how much attention?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: All you want.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: All that is necessary.

Hon. Mr. Croll: The Government tried to have that bill reach us 10 days ago but your party would not allow it to get here. Let us get some facts in this debate.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: Wait and see how much attention.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: After the axe has fallen it is rather late to wait and see. It is better to point out in advance of what is coming and endeavour, if not to dodge it, to prevail upon honourable senators that they are incurring perils of parliamentary doom and in particular of this house in which we sit. It is intimated that this legislation must be passed in a great hurry.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: What is the haste? And however great the haste may be with regard to a pipe line or other kindred undertakings, no matter how important they are, how can they be compared or weighed in the balance with our parliamentary institutions? We are asked to surrender, to yield up, those things that make for the stability, for the freedom, for the well-being of this Canadian land. We are asked to say that this honourable Senate can make no contribution to debate, that it does not require any information.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: The motion does not say that at all.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Well, if the honourable gentleman cares to read the rules and see what they require and what they exact, and what will happen if this motion be passed, he possibly would be less inclined to contradict me.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask my friend a question?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Euler: His leader has suggested that the whole matter be discussed clause by clause in Committee of the Whole. Does my friend regard that as being a sufficient opportunity for discussing all the aspects of the bill or not? I am just curious to know. Does that not give full opportunity for discussion that he suggests we are going to be deprived of?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I do not think that it gives a full opportunity. We are told that this is a great question, on which the well-being of half a continent rests; and we are asked, when we come to discuss this highly disputed bill which we are told is of vital importance, to rush it through.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Oh, no. I made no such suggestion. That suggestion cannot be read into the language that I used.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Let us follow the ordinary procedure that is written into the rules of this house, which are the fruit of long years of experience. It means, if we adopt the resolution, that the legislation when it comes here will be hurried through. There is no guarantee from the honourable gentleman opposite, and even did he give it he might not be able to fulfill the undertaking, because the rules would have gone—the protection of debate, the protection of securing information necessary to appreciation of the facts, of their worth, would have vanished.

I have always liked to cherish faith in these institutions. I believe that our people at large have had faith in our great national institutions—the civil service, if one will, within its proper ambit; the army, in times of trial; the courts, and, above all, Parliament. I have had faith. That faith, whether I be allowed to say it or not, has trembled in the last few days, and when I read that this honourable chamber is willing to be scurried through the gates in defiance of the rules that govern debate in this chamber, I am disturbed. My faith is shaken, hence my opposition to the resolution.

> Enough, if something from our hands have power
> To live, and act, and serve the future hour;
> And if, as toward the silent tomb we go,
> Through love, through hope and faith's transcendent dower,
> We feel that we are greater than we know.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I would like to refer to an illustrious figure of the past. He was not a parliamentarian; he was a philosopher; his name was Diogenes; and once he went around with a light in his hand to find an honest man, but he found none. Some weeks ago, when I used a searchlight in this chamber, I was more fortunate than Diogenes, because I found several public-spirited women, who are great debaters, and a large number of eminent Canadian citizens who are remarkable law-makers,—I mean, the senators of Canada. I found them with the light I had in hand; and I make no distinctions as regards those of my colleagues who belong to parties other than my own, although during the last hour I felt a draft of hot air in anticipation of the legislation which is to come from the other chamber. But I will not enlarge upon that.

When we examine the rules, one after the other, I think no one can complain about the motion which is before the house, and for this very good reason, that the rules which are to be suspended if the motion is agreed to are rules which date back for centuries in the House of Commons and the House of Lords at Westminster. For instance, honourable senators, the Honourable the Speaker knows very well that the reason for the delay between readings of a bill is that in the British Parliament there are not enough seats for all members. That is true both of the House of Commons and the House of Lords. No one knows that better than the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) who, no doubt, when he went to the Privy Council to argue a case, attended many debates at Westminster.

There is no question of depriving any member of the Senate of his liberty. Everybody knows that the legislation referred to by the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) will come before us tomorrow. The honourable gentleman who has just spoken has only to be here and he will not be deprived of the opportunity to make as many speeches on this particular bill as he wishes to make, provided of course he remains within the rules and bows to the rulings of the Honourable the Speaker.

I do not wish to be evasive or circuitous, so I will come straight to the question, and say that what I have hated in my political life is humbug. I have fought it on various occasions, and at times with success.

From my experience in this chamber—and I will speak no more of the dead, but of the living—I am impressed with the atmosphere of serenity which exists here, which is a model for all Canadian legislatures and for all municipal councils and public bodies. In the Senate they will see the guiding star of democracy and liberty in Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: These principles are not in peril because three rules are suspended to prevent unlimited discussion and waste of time, silliness, repetitions, and speeches which are out of order. Who will suffer from the suspension of these rules? Is there one senator who will be affected, provided he adheres to his duty and attends the sittings? What difference does it make if the motion for second reading is called immediately after first reading, when everybody has an opportunity to express his opinion about the bill? What difference does it make if the third reading is moved immediately after all honourable senators who want to speak on the second reading have made their speeches? Is there one who will suffer injustice? What is the injustice? It is not in the motion of the Leader of the Government; it is in the speeches of those who complain of an injustice which does not and cannot exist. To argue otherwise is an insult to the Honourable the Speaker of this chamber and to the intelligence of all my colleagues. We are not old people, but we are not children either. Whenever legislation has been brought before us I have admired the study and painstaking care that every member of the Senate has given to it. Mr. Speaker, would it be possible for honourable senators serving under your experienced guidance, your knowledge of the rules and history of Parliament, your spirit of fair play and sense of tact, good judgment and kindliness, to doubt the fairness of any ruling you would make in the future? Your past conduct is a guarantee of your future conduct in dealing with us who serve under you.

Honourable senators, I cannot say how much I have admired the quality of the debates that have taken place in this chamber since my appointment to the Senate in January of this year. In those few months the Senate has considered all types of questions, including some very contentious legislation, and I have admired the unfailing dignity and the sincerity of honourable members and their ambition to serve their country well, as good red-blooded Canadians should.

When I was a member of the other house the Chairman of the Private Bills Committee sometimes would ask for the suspension of the rule requiring remittance of divorce bills and other bills to that committee. The fact we suspend rules does not mean that we abandon British parliamentary traditions and procedure. Indeed, I trust the Senate to such a degree that were the leader or any other member to move suspension not only of three rules but of the full 152 rules that govern the Senate, I would vote in favour of the motion.

Some years ago I was a member of a Canadian delegation to a British Empire Parliamentary Conference held in Westminster Hall, London, England. Our meetings were presided over by Lord Simon. On one occasion I read a paper that I had prepared on the importance of parliamentary rules. I said I was interested in the parliamentary rules of Australia, for they were four times more numerous than those of the House of Commons of Canada. My remarks were followed by an address by a Mr. Schramm, a delegate from New Zealand, from the Antipodes, who stated: "I am surprised that a Canadian delegate should stress the importance of rules governing the debates of a legislative assembly. I do not think they are necessary at all in a well-organized legislative body and I think we could easily dispense with them". These remarks were made by a British Commonwealth parliamentarian in the very presence of Lord Simon, in a committee room of the Mother of Parliaments.

I had prepared a treatise on the standing orders of the various legislative bodies of the British Empire and I took it to a reader of a firm of English publishers, Longmans, Green and Company, near St. Paul's in London. He asked me if he could look it over for a few days, and when I returned he advised me: "My friend, unless a foundation is supporting you I would not publish a book on rules. Nobody reads them."

Honourable senators, this country is founded on a spirit of fairness, justice, liberty, good manners and tact, and this spirit will last for ever in the Senate, whether we suspend three rules or 152 rules.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, this resolution reads:

> That for the balance of the present session Rules 23, 24 and 63 be suspended in so far as they relate to public bills.

When notice of this motion first appeared on the order paper I ascertained that the suspension of these rules is very common, and the practice has been carried on for a long time, perhaps before I even got into politics—and that is a considerable number of years ago. However, when the notice appeared I indicated I would oppose it, and when it appeared on the order paper yesterday I again indicated I would oppose it, for at those times I thought it was a luxury which this house could not afford. But today, in the light of the information given by the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), and from what we know ourselves, I realize that it becomes a necessity to suspend these rules in order that we may conduct public business properly and carry out bargains made between honourable men who have a right to expect us to carry them out. I know the purpose of and the need for this resolution at the present time, and my honourable friend wounds me when he says that it is belittling and degrading to members of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Horner: So it is.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Well, your repetition does not make it any more certain.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: May I inform the honourable member that I made no statement at all which is repetitious.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Nor did I.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Oh, I know where the statement came from. I recognized the voice, and welcomed it very much.

The Leader of the Government has tried for more than a week to bring this measure before this house; and I think the Government has shown a great deal of concern and solicitude for the Senate by attempting to have it sent here, so that we might deal with the bill normally. I was impressed today when I heard the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), an old and tried veteran in the political life of this country, express the opinion that we shall have ample opportunity to discuss the bill. In the Senate we are in the fortunate position of being free to discuss the measure when it comes here, without haste or heat. I think the honourable senator from De La Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) made a point. I will repeat it, because I was impressed by his remark. How can anybody be deprived of any rights and opportunities for discussion, when we have two days after the first reading of the bill? On the first reading the bill is not debatable. What is lost by forgoing two days' notice of second reading? Everybody in the Senate can read and write and understand what has been going on. We have all been concerned and interested in the debate, and many of us have sat in the House of Commons—perhaps I should say "the other place"—and certainly it is not wrong for me to say that we have been reading the Commons Hansard. We have talked to our constituents. During the two weeks of debate, when I was home on weekends, I received many, many telephone calls, and my ears have been ringing ever since. These calls showed the great interest and awareness of the public. I thought this house would welcome the resolution at this particular time because it affords members an opportunity—I repeat, an opportunity—to do what has not been done in the other place, that is, to get information. That is the strength of this house.

Hon. Mr. Horner: For one day!

Hon. Mr. Croll: Two days. The Senate meets tomorrow at eleven o'clock. If any honourable senator wishes to speak at that time, he has the assurance of the Leader of the Government that there will be an opportunity to do so. lot of information can be obtained within two days. The information will be here and available to every member of the house, not to just a select committee. This will give the house an opportunity, not to take a second look at this bill, but to take a first look, because the people who should have taken a first look did not do so.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: We would have ample time for discussion on second reading, in committee, and on third reading. It would have been much better to have a longer time for discussion—it would have appeared to have been much better. Certainly the opportunity for discussion would not have been any better.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I make a few remarks? Apparently coming events have cast their shadows —and I use the word "shadows" advisedly. In the past this has been a calm and reasonable house where we have inquired into legislation thoroughly, examined it, thought about it, taken the time necessary to consider it, and finally given it our approval or disapproval, as in our judgment in the interest of Canada we have seen fit. I was very much impressed by the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), made in the sincerity of our previous discussions, that when the bill comes here this house go into Committee of the Whole for its detailed consideration, rather than send the bill to a standing committee. I thought it was a splendid idea, and so did the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). That discussion took place not as between political parties or partisans, but on both sides in the spirit of elder statesmen considering a mere matter of procedure in a normal, quiet way.

Then I was amazed at the super-heated phrases uttered by my friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) in reference to a change in the rules of a minor character, for that is a procedure which we have followed here year after year as long as I have been in Parliament, and no doubt much earlier. My friend talked about "gagging" this house.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I did not use that term.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, it was the honourable gentleman from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) who used the term "gagging". However, the honourable senator from Victoria did compare the suspension of the rules—which would allow us to discusss the bill immediately on its arrival—with the imposition of closure. That is what he called it. Now, surely, my friend cannot have read the rules that it is proposed to be set aside. I refer to Rule 63, which commences:

No bill shall be read twice the same day. . . .

In the margin are these words, "Restrictions on dealing with bills." We are not proposing to impose restrictions. What we are proposing to do is to remove restrictions. How can one talk about removing restrictions with the thought in mind of closure? The ideas are incompatible. The purpose of the rule is to enable us to deal with a large mass of legislation in an orderly way, so that no bill can be slipped or railroaded through surreptitiously and so quickly that members know little if anything about it. But in this instance there is practically no other legislation to take precedence over this bill which is expected to come from the Commons. We are all aware of what the bill contains, and we are all itching to get at it and discuss it.

The purpose of the motion is to allow us to commence debate immediately the bill arrives. The proposed change would enable immediate commencement of the debate, and it evidences a complete misapprehension to say that it would affect the debate itself. It is the commencement of the debate that will be affected by the change now proposed, not how long it shall go on or when it shall terminate.

My friend spoke about being denied the opportunity for consideration of the legislation. Will he tell me how it can aid consideration to require us to stand at ease for two days while this bill is before the house, before we can say a word, ask a question or attempt to get the information for which he expresses a desire?

The honourable senator talked also about the legislation being rushed through, when it is in fact a matter of getting at the work and doing it. We in this house usually do not allow rules to stand much in our way; our debates are quite free in that regard. True, there are certain outstanding rules which we must and do observe, but at the same time we allow other senators to interrupt and make comments and that sort of thing.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Why not suspend the rules altogether? Surely they are there for some purpose.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: They are there for some purpose and when they are necessary we observe them, but we are not bound by them when they are not necessary.

Hon. Mr. Horner: May I ask a question? The honourable senator speaks of the debate not being limited. Can he assure us that the house will adjourn on each of the next two days at the usual hour?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why should I give such assurance? The house itself will decide when it shall adjourn; and were I to attempt to give an assurance of that kind, the senator from Blaine Lake would be the first to take me to task. It is, I repeat, for the house to decide how long we will sit. But I can assure my honourable friend that we will sit as long as it is necessary. Further, I give this assurance to my honourable friends, the senator from Blaine Lake and the senator from Victoria, that I am prepared to sit here and listen to what they have to say just as long as they want to talk, unless it becomes pure repetition, and I would not accuse either of them of indulging in that. I am ready to stay here and discuss this measure until it is threadbare and we all have had every opportunity to speak on it.

I wrote down these words of the senator from Victoria: "We are yielding to the temptation to permit the executive to intrude upon Parliament". I asked, "What executive?" but got no answer. I think that remark calls for some reply. The great strength of this house rests in its independence and the independence of its members.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I would like to think so.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I wish you would think so, because in thinking so you would be right.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Let everyone speak for himself.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Quite so; and I speak for myself. I stand in my place in this house seeking nothing from anybody, in or out of Parliament, and without the slightest fear of anyone, or of anyone influencing my thought or actions. I know of no position in the community that is as free and independent and gives one the opportunity for untrammelled thought as does a place in this Red Chamber. It is a most unjust imputation upon the members of this house to suggest that the executive or anyone else can give us directions. We are the freest, the most independent and the most sure-footed legislative chamber in the dominion of Canada.

I can assure my friends who seem to have caught the nervousness of the moment that when the bill in question comes here it will be debated fully and freely and everyone will have a chance to express his or her thoughts; moreover, for the first time the full information will be laid before honourable senators and made public. I am sure that the Leader of the Government is prepared to play his part in that regard. I hope that when we complete our proceedings my friends in the Opposition will—I am sure the honourable leader will—join with us in pride in the house to which we belong.

Hon. Felix P. Quinn: Honourable senators, as one of the senior members of this house—I think I am No. 9 on the seniority list—I give way to nobody in my jealousy of the reputation and dignity of the Canadian Senate.

I followed what the senator who has just taken his seat had to say. He seemed to express some fear that something might happen in the forthcoming debate. I can foresee nothing improper happening because, as I have said, I am jealous of the dignity of this honourable body. I believe that when this bill comes before the Senate it will be debated fully, and every man and woman who wishes to may express his or her opinion fearlessly and honestly.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Hear, Hear.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: I listened to what was said by my good old friend from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot), with whom I have been associated here and elsewhere for the past thirty years. He made reference to the Greek philosopher Diogenes. The story is told about Diogenes that he went about with a lantern seeking an honest man. May I say that if he continues his search and arrives in Ottawa, and reaches the Senate, I hope they won't steal his lantern.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! oh!

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the Leader of the Government, (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: —I have given consideration to the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) that this bill, after it receives second reading, should be referred to the Committee of the Whole rather than to a standing committee. When he made the suggestion I intimated that I thought I would be in accord with it; and, after listening to the discussion here today, I am completely convinced that that would be the proper procedure.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If that procedure is adopted I shall, as I said previously, undertake to have the best informed officials from the department come and assist me to answer any questions that may be asked with respect to the bill.

There has been very little opposition to the motion now before the house. In fact the only objection was, I believe, taken by the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett), who used rather surprisingly strong language. I am sure he could not have read into the remarks which I made on moving the motion any suggestion that anyone in this house was going to attempt to rush this legislation through without its being given proper consideration. Certainly, I intended to make the directly opposite point. I feel that this house should give careful consideration to the bill, and I agree that the best way to do that is to go into Committee of the Whole.

I wish to assure the honourable senator from Victoria and all other members of the house that, in so far as I am concerned, debate on the measure will be curtailed in no way whatever; every honourable senator will be given an opportunity, within the rules of this house, to express his or her view.

If this motion carries, I shall have only two suggestions to make: first, that the house meet tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock, at which time the bill can be given first reading; and secondly, instead of second reading being put off until Friday or Monday,—as would have to be done under the rules—that the house proceed with second reading then or adjourn until the afternoon, according to the wishes of honourable senators. No limit will be put on discussion; no one will be fettered, as the honourable senator from Victoria suggested, in the debate on this bill. I ask him, what better arrangement can we make for full consideration than to bring it before the Committee of the Whole? Each senator can speak on the bill once on second reading and once on third reading, but when we are in Committee of the Whole any senator can speak as long and as often as he likes, and no one will be fettered.

Honourable senators, let me once again assure you that it is not my intention nor is it —judging from the remarks of honourable senators who have spoken—the intention of anyone to rush this bill through the house without due consideration. It will receive careful consideration, and I hope that consideration will start tomorrow.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: The question, honourable senators, is on the motion of the Honourable Senator Macdonald, seconded by the Honourable Senator Beaubien:

That for the balance of the present session Rules 23, 24 and 63 be suspended in so far as they relate to public bills.

Is it your pleasure to pass this motion?

Hon. Mr. Horner: On division.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, may I revert to motions? I would move that when this house adjourns this day it stand adjourned until tomorrow at 11 o'clock in the morning.

The motion was agreed to.

DIVORCE

BILLS—THIRD READINGS

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, moved the third reading of the following bills:

Bill D-14, an Act for the relief of Jennie Zalezniak Wiseman.

Bill E-14, an Act for the relief of Phyllis Elizabeth Jardine Williams.

Bill F-14, an Act for the relief of Martha Hope MacDougall Fortier.

Bill G-14, an Act for the relief of Hugh Oliver Semper.

Bill H-14, an Act for the relief of Yvonne Elizabeth Thurgarland Brosseau.

Bill I-14, an Act for the relief of Hugh Lawrence Byers.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the third time, and passed, on division.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce, Nos. 366 to 382, which were presented on June 4.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck moved that the reports be adopted.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

AND THE GENERAL PUBLIC in the
HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA
on
TUESDAY, JUNE 5, 1956, at 10.20 a.m.

The President was welcomed by the Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Wishart McL. Robertson, Speaker of the Senate, and the Honourable L. René Beaudoin, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister of Canada): Mr. President, we are honoured by your presence here today for your visit to Canada is tangible evidence of the growing friendship between our two countries. Let me assure you, therefore, of the pleasure which your visit to Canada, to our capital and to this Parliament gives us. If I may take the liberty of making a personal reference, Mr. President, I should like to say that I still recall with the best of memories my own too brief visit to Indonesia in 1954, where you made me welcome and we first became acquainted. I join with my colleagues in the hope that your sojourn in Canada will be as pleasant and rewarding as was my own among the friendly people of Indonesia, whose gracious hospitality I shall always recall with pleasure.

Although it is true that vast distances separate our two countries geographically there exists no such distance or distinction between the hopes and aspirations of our two peoples. We share in the hopes for the building of strong and vital nations, states well adjusted in their relations with their neighbours and anxious to be on good terms with all peoples of good will.

Canada is a young nation made up of diverse races which have brought to this continent cultures, traditions, of other lands out of which we are building a united society. Indonesia too may be proud of her own ancient peoples and traditions, of her rich cultures which today she seeks to preserve and adapt to the demands of the twentieth century. Both our peoples have inherited countries rich in natural resources which we desire to develop, to improve the living standards of our peoples. We both know that national development cannot be achieved by international isolation. So we in Canada take much satisfaction in our co-operation with you in the United Nations and in the modest assistance toward your economic progress that we can make through the Colombo Plan.

As parliamentarians, Mr. President, we have followed with a lively interest the events associated with the convening of Indonesia's first elected Parliament. We know something of the difficulties which were involved in conducting your first national elections last autumn and of the magnificent way in which your people overcame those difficulties. I hope that on your return to Indonesia you and the other distinguished parliamentarians who accompany you will convey our greetings to the members of your new Parliament.

I am sure that my colleagues and friends are aware, Mr. President, of the high esteem in which you are held by your people. In Indonesia the name of Sukarno is synonymous with the achievements of national independence, and to a degree which would be the envy of any statesman you enjoy and richly deserve the title of father of your country.

Therefore it gives me great pleasure, Mr. President, to welcome you to the Canadian Parliament.

I now invite the President of the Republic of Indonesia to address us.

President Sukarno of the Republic of Indonesia: Mr. Speaker, I am deeply grateful for this opportunity of addressing the distinguished Parliament of this great country. I am also deeply grateful for the invitation which has brought myself and your other Indonesian guests to these hospitable shores.

In one very important sense Canada and Indonesia are neighbours. Your country is both an Atlantic power and a Pacific power, and travelling west from your shores the Republic of Indonesia is a neighbour of yours. Nothing is more important than knowing one's neighbours; that is one more reason why I was so glad to receive this invitation to visit you.

I feel that there is a close link between Canada and Indonesia. Both of these countries are on the verge of a great new period of development, and I am firmly convinced that the future of both countries will bring increased prosperity and increased happiness for all mankind.

Perhaps there is another link between us. In terms of history it is not so very long since Canada released herself from colonial bonds. If I am not mistaken, the uprisings in both Upper Canada and Lower Canada in 1837 did not immediately bring national independence, but they did bring a new political constellation, which led directly to the granting of responsible government to those colonies we now know as Canada. That new political constellation was a direct ancestor of the British North America Act which even today serves, with its amendments, as your constitution.

With us it was different. My nation still had almost one hundred years of colonialism to undergo after the Canadian people had assumed the mantle of nationhood. Our independence did not come smoothly, but it came eventually as a result of war, of enemy occupation, of revolution, and, most important, of a national struggle lasting decades. But now that great struggle is partly over. The Republic of Indonesia has joined the family of nations and seeks to play a full part in the joint tasks and joint responsibilities of that family.

Standing before the members of this Parliament and before you, my thoughts inevitably fly to the far-flung homes of the Canadian people who have chosen you as their representatives and who have handed to you the responsibilities of Government. I would like to convey to those people, spread over this vast country, the most sincere greetings from myself, from members of my party, and from the Indonesian people. Further, I wish to convey to you the most grateful and heartfelt thanks of the Indonesian people for your assistance in the past, and our hope that this visit will lead to even closer relations in the future. It would not be surprising if even closer relations should develop between neighbours, even though they are separated by the thousands of miles' expanse of the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to say a few words to the French-Canadian members.

(Translation):

May I be permitted to say a few words to the French-Canadian members As first citizen of my country, I feel greatly privileged to extend to you most cordial and sincere wishes of the Indonesian people, whom I have the honour of representing here. They are the wishes of a friendly nation whose ideals and interests are almost identical with yours. Such similarity is quite logical since, in all democratic countries, the roots of civilization are basically the same.

Moreover, I avail myself of this opportunity, which is unique in our history, to thank you for the warm welcome you have given me.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, it is obviously true that the land, the climate and the people are the basic elements for the making of any nation. The future of that nation depends greatly upon what is done with the land and its resources. The political future of the nation depends, it is clear, upon the organized strength of the nation, and the social and cultural development of the nation can be measured only by the peoples' victory over their environment.

Like Canada, Indonesia is a vast country. We have more than 3,000 inhabited islands and our archipelago runs from Malaya to the north of Australia. It is a vast country of 82 million people and—I do not say this in any boastful spirit—it is today the third largest democracy in the world. Our nation is young in this modern world of ours, but it does not enter the family of nations empty-handed. I know that Canada is just beginning to exploit the great wealth bestowed by God upon this country: we of Indonesia are in the same position. The difference between us is that Canada's great natural wealth could not be exploited until science and technology had reached their present level. Indonesia's natural wealth could have been exploited—to the benefit of humanity—long ago. But we laboured under colonialism.

Now we can see no limit to the possibilities of development. It is no exaggeration to say that even we of Indonesia do not know the wealth of our country. It is no exaggeration to say that many of the islands composing our archipelago have hardly been explored, let alone exploited. When modern technology and modern science are devoted to the task of extracting the maximum from those islands, then I say with no fear of contradiction that Indonesia will contribute very, very greatly to the material well-being of this interdependent world of ours.

Furthermore, it is my belief that Indonesia and the other newly reborn countries of Asia and Africa have other gifts to bring to the world. I would like to quote to you a passage—a very short passage, but a very important passage—from a booklet distributed by the Canadian Government. This booklet was distributed three years ago throughout the countries of southeast Asia, and, speaking of Asia, it stated that:

> Although we may have something to give and to teach, we have also much to receive and to learn. In this vast country of ours, we have found out how we may live and prosper, but from the east, with its ancient cultures, we have much to learn of the abiding things that bring comfort and delight to the mind and heart.

Mr. Speaker, that may well be true. What is equally true is that from the east also can come great material benefit, material benefit for all countries, material benefit both for the west and the east, material benefit for the whole world.

I know that it is a truism to talk of the interdependence of nations: I know that almost every speaker today refers to this, but it is sometimes difficult to appreciate just what it means in cold reality. The Government of Canada has obviously a real understanding of the position: this is shown clearly by the fact that each year Canada contributes more than $25 million to the Colombo Plan. As the representative of a country, and as the representative of a nation benefiting from this aid, I know what the Colombo Plan means and, please believe me, I express the gratitude of my people for this example of the brotherhood of nations and the interdependence of mankind.

We are indeed grateful for all assistance which comes to us, from whatever quarter of the globe it may come. We struggled long for our national identity. We love that national identity, we hold that national identity dear as life itself. We aim, therefore, above all things, to maintain and preserve that national identity. I assure you in all seriousness: nothing will ever take that from us. No hope or promise of quick reward will persuade us to barter one scrap of our independence, for to us that independence, that national independence, is more precious than any other thing in this world.

When I first set foot in the United States I expressed my hope of observing America, amongst other things, as a state of mind. It is important that Asia and Africa be seen as a state of mind. And what is that Asian and African state of mind? Essentially it is the determination that the nations of Asia and Africa develop their own national reality. I use the word "reality" advisedly, because a nation is a reality.

Who could doubt that after observing the post-war world? In particular, perhaps, who could doubt that after observing the Asian and African Conference which was held in Bandung a year ago? That great and historic meeting of twenty-nine states showed clearly the path of history in this post-war and troubled world. Representatives of more than half of mankind, pre-representatives of 1,600 million people, met together in one of Indonesia's mountain cities, and discussed problems common to them all.

Those national representatives of Asia and Africa discussed the basic problem of where their nations stood in this modern world. I know that it is not necessary for me to tell you of the result of that conference. You know that a long and all-embracing resolution was unanimously adopted. That result answered the basic question of where those nations stood. It answered the question of what the peoples of Asia and Africa sought and desired. Those assembled representatives of the majority of mankind clearly expressed their opposition to colonialism in all its forms. That is a basic fact in the mid-twentieth century.

Above all things, this is the period of Asian and African nationalism. This is the era when the old conditions, the old and hated pattern of world society is undone. Who can be surprised by the fact that colonialism, whatever form it assumes, whatever mask it may hide behind, however it may disguise itself, is indeed a hateful and a disgusting thing? I will tell you this: colonialism left Indonesia with a heritage of illiteracy, a heritage of human sickness, of human ignorance, of human degradation, which was a disgrace and a menace to the twentieth century. We had the highest illiteracy rate in the world. We had the highest mortality rate in the world. We had the lowest living standard in the whole world: one "goband" a day, two and a half guilder-cents a day—not even one dollar-cent a day. Our country was rich, but its wealth did not serve to alleviate the misery and ignorance of our people. Having achieved independence, we still feel the consequences of 350 years of colonialism. And those consequences are not light ones.

Illiteracy, sickness which science has long known how to control, technical backwardness, great social inequality, great economic backwardness, were our inheritance, but under a national government, under a government dedicated to the uplifting and progress of our people, these things are not insupportable or unchangeable.

Just eleven years ago almost all of our people were illiterate; today less than half of our people are illiterate. Perhaps it may seem that I am boasting. I do not intend to boast, but I am immensely proud of the achievement in this field, and I am immensely proud of our national progress in other fields. We—a nation previously numbered amongst the voiceless and the unconsidered in the world, a nation perviously numbered amongst the unregarded—we have, for example, but recently completed, to our great satisfaction, the very first general election in our country. This is a considerable achievement, and I am proud of it. I am proud of it because it shows a degree of political progress which could hardly have been expected of a nation which only eleven years ago was not even considered by the world.

We elected, under conditions of universal suffrage and secret ballot, a Parliament and a Constituent Assembly. Although I know well that those things alone are not a guarantee of democracy, I know equally well that without those things democracy cannot exist. We have chosen, and chosen after proper consideration, the democratic path to national fulfilment and national emancipation. We have chosen the path of Pantja Sila, the five principles of our state. They are: Belief in God; nationalism; humanitarianism; democracy and, last of all, social justice. It is our belief that this path will lead us most rapidly to the full and useful life which every nation ought to contribute and enjoy in our present-day world.

We all know that there is more than one road to participation in the world's affairs. We have chosen this Pantja Sila road. It is our sincere hope, our most sincere hope, that it will lead to success.

I am told that people are sometimes surprised at our attitude towards certain international problems in the world. We do not automatically accept the views of any group of people. We do not join in any military organization. We intend to be ourselves. It is true, it is very true, that we are enthusiastic members of the United Nations, and we see in the United Nations the faint outlines of a future world organization. We call our foreign policy not a "neutral" foreign policy; we call our foreign policy "independent" and "active". We call it so because we take an independent line in accordance with what we see as the best interests of the world and our own nation, and we act upon that.

One of the draftsmen of Canada's greatness, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, said, in the year 1900:

> I claim for Canada this: that in future Canada shall be at liberty to act or not to act.

In those words that great Prime Minister, that architect of the future, summed up the foreign policy which we of Indonesia choose to follow today.

We seek to follow a policy which will give the greatest benefit to all mankind, and if that foreign policy should sometimes run counter to what you believe and act upon, believe me when I say that what we do and how we vote is dictated by our ideals, and not by any spirit of opposition.

Yes, we are separated, as I said, by the Pacific Ocean. But we are also joined by the Pacific Ocean! We are neighbours, and nothing is more important than that neighbours should understand each other. I have not come to your vast country to negotiate any treaty. I have come with the hope that this short visit of mine will lead to a better understanding between our nations. If this should be so, I will be well content. You have a great future with your neighbour and friend to the south, the United States of America, that vast country which I so recently visited. There is a saying that an "unseen frontier of friendship" exists between Canada and the United States. It is my prayer that between us of Indonesia and this country of Canada a similar frontier of friendship may develop and grow strong.

Again I say: If our foreign policy should sometimes run counter to what you believe in or act upon, it is dictated by our ideals and not by a spirit of opposition. So let our friendship be strong.

Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, I beg you, do not under-estimate the force of the nationalist torrent which is today pouring over Asia and Africa. It is a mighty torrent, and one thing is certain: we are in the midst of an historical change which is vital for the whole future of mankind. It is a nationalist torrent, and that torrent is not directed against anyone or any nation. It is a torrent whose object is the greater freedom, the greater liberation, of mankind. I say this in all seriousness: any attempt to stand against that torrent will be in vain, just as every attempt ever undertaken to stand against an historical process has been vain. This torrent is directed only against the outworn principle of colonialism. You may call it a destructive torrent, but it is one which is destructive only of colonialism and one which will lead to a greater and wider horizon of freedom for all men everywhere and in every country. In the framework of history it is constructive and progressive.

Today most of my own country is free, most of my own nation is enjoying the fruit of independence, but to our sorrow and continued dissatisfaction a part of our nation and country stills suffers under colonialism, that plague on mankind's fulfilment. West Irian—perhaps you know it better as West New Guinea—is still unfree. Until West Irian is rejoined to the rest of my country Indonesia will feel herself incomplete and insecure. There can be no question that West Irian is part of Indonesia, and indeed until 1950 no one in the world would have dreamed of denying that fact. Until we are united with our still unfree brethren we of Indonesia will never be content, because we know just what colonialism means in terms of human unhappiness, in terms of human misery and human degradation.

In this world of ours, troubled and uneasy though it is, there is still much success and many gains for the peace and security of men. Whatever we have gained has been won because man's understanding of other men as brothers has increased.

This is essential. Mankind the world over is basically the same, whatever cultural or ideological details may appear to divide it, Understanding and sympathy are necessary. Active understanding and active sympathy will help relieve the strains and tensions in the world. This is really my message to you. Give us your understanding and your sympathy. Give us, if you can, your active understanding and your active sympathy. If you do that, and if we of Asia and Africa retain that active sympathy and understanding, then the future of the world can indeed be bright.

Yes, mankind is basically the same, whatever racial or ideological details may appear to divide it. Why should mankind divide itself? Look, Indonesia is a country with many religions and many faiths. We have in Indonesia Moslems, we have Christians, we have Civa-Buddhists, we have peoples of other creeds. We have many ethnic units, such as Javanese, Achinese, Balinese, Madurese, Sundanese, etc. But, thank God, we have our will to unity.

We try to practise our state motto "Bhinneka Tunggal Ika", which means "Unity in Diversity". We are tolerant to each other, we are one nation. One of the most remarkable phenomena in modern history is that we of Indonesia, although living on 3,000 islands, are united in one nation, without pressure, without compulsion, without civil war.

What, then, is our unifying force? It is the will to unity, it is "le désir d'être ensemble", instead of suspecting each other, dominating each other, threatening each other and colonizing each other—living at each other's expense.

We of Indonesia try to practise "Bhinneka Tunggal Ika" amongst ourselves. Let us try to practise "Bhinneka Tunggal Ika" amongst nations.

Then, only then, can we look up again to the stars, and say: "Thank God, for You have given us this world, and we have lived according to Your Word."

Hon. Wishart McLean Robertson (Speaker of the Senate): May I, Mr. President, thank you on behalf of the Senate of Canada for coming to us and for the eloquent and inspiring address you have just delivered.

We realize that you are the first head of an Asian state who has ever visited this Parliament. We were disposed to extend to you a hearty welcome, for your reputation had preceded you. We were disposed as well to extend that hearty welcome because of the great respect we have for the Indonesian minister in Canada, and we extend that welcome on the part of all those who have come under the charm and influence of his personality.

We are more honoured and pleased on this occasion, Mr. President, because Indonesia—although a young nation, as the age of states is reckoned—has become a leader of that community of nations in Asia and Africa which are newly independent or just emerging to take their rightful place in the family of free nations. It was just over a year ago that the achievements of the Asian-African Conference held in Bandung, Indonesia, brought dramatically to the attention of the whole world the fact that a new and powerful force was present in world affairs. We welcome this new force which is based on the independence and equality of the people of Asia and Africa. There has long existed among the people of Canada sympathy and understanding for the aspirations of countries like Indonesia which are engaged in the great task of creating new nations out of ancient civilizations.

You, sir, have been a most powerful spokesman, not only for Indonesia but for that larger community of which Indonesia forms a part. We leave this chamber with a clearer understanding of the important matters with which you have dealt and we sense that, great as may be the geographical distances which separate our two countries, we are close in mind and heart. We would ask you particularly, Mr. President, to convey to your parliamentarians and the people of your country generally our warmest expressions of esteem and friendship.

Indonesia is the world's sixth most populous nation, and her natural beauties and resources are justly famous. She may be proud, Mr. President, of her accomplishments at home and her reputation abroad. We wish her well in all her future undertakings.

(Translation):

Hon. L. René Beaudoin (Speaker of the House of Commons): Mr. President, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate, honourable members of the Senate, honourable members of the House of Commons, ladies and gentlemen:

While listening this morning to the President of the Republic of Indonesia, who enjoys such prominence and popularity in his own country, because of his struggle for her independence, and especially because of the well-deserved success he has achieved as a result of perserverance and courage, I recalled a statement once made by a Canadian writer to the effect that the spirit of independence, is deeply rooted in the heart of peoples. And if, under certain circumstances, and by virtue of certain historic rights, that spirit is sometimes subjected to equitable laws, it is none the less true to the laws of nature and to common aspirations that societies develop in the sense of their autonomy.

This same struggle to which you referred a while ago, Mr. President, we have experienced at home, albeit without clash, or blow, and especially, without bitterness, so that here, that is to say in the Commonwealth, the symbol of the Crown and the good will of all parties are the only bonds which make it a united whole.

While listening to you, Mr. President, we noted that your problems were quite different from ours, though quite as complex. Canada, which is a sovereign country, has always avoided interference in the domestic problems of other countries, and so we are in a position to wish you, and to hope with you, that they may all be solved in accordance with your wishes, for the greatest good and aspirations you symbolize so admirably.

In this task you are ably supported by your Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Ruslan Abduglgani, whose presence at your side I note with pleasure.

(Text):

To you, Mr. President, to your able Minister of Foreign Affairs and to the people of Indonesia, may I express the best wishes of the Canadian people and of the members of this house, and also the sincere hope that you will be successful in all your worthy enterprises till you have fulfilled your cherished ideals.

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CROWN CORPORATION BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 298, an Act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Before the motion for second reading is put, may I ask the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) to outline the contents of the bill briefly, as is done in the House of Commons on first reading?

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Do I understand that the Leader of the Opposition would like me to explain briefly the purpose of the bill?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Just the general outline, so that when we read it we will understand it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I will be very glad to do that, although it is somewhat unusual, because in this house a bill is given first reading immediately it is presented, and at that stage is not debatable. However, as the Leader of the Opposition has suggested, when a minister introduces a bill in the other house he usually gives a brief outline of it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, has the Leader of the Government unanimous consent of the house to make an explanation of the bill on first reading?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: On one condition, that when the motion for second reading comes before the house the Leader of the Government will not feel that he has already given a full explanation of the bill. If this is merely a superfluous and additional explanation, very well, but it must not interfere with a full and complete explanation when we consider the bill on second reading.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I shall be very careful to follow that suggestion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, has the Leader of the Government the unanimous consent of the house to proceed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yesterday afternoon I suggested that when the house resumed this morning the bill should be given first reading, provided it had been printed and distributed. The bill has been printed and copies have been distributed; therefore, when it has been given first reading I will move that second reading be considered when the house reassembles later this day, say at 2.30 this afternoon. In the interval honourable senators will have an opportunity to study the contents of the bill.

I repeat what I said yesterday, that as far as I am concerned debate on this bill will not be curtailed in any way whatever. It was suggested that the suspension of certain rules was for the purpose of rushing the bill through the house in a few hours. That was not the purpose of it; nor was its purpose, as one honourable senator suggested, that the members of this house should be fettered. There will be no fettering in this house, as far as I am concerned, and debate will be in accordance with the rules of the house.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: As amended.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It was suggested that this amending of the rules is an unusual proceeding. May I have the privilege of recalling to honourable senators what took place in this house in 1932?

On April that year the Senate was expecting from the House of Commons the Unemployment and Farm Relief Bill. On that day the Right Honourable Mr. Meighen, the then Leader of the Government, had this to say:

> Honourable gentlemen, last evening, the Senate adjourned until the regular hour today, the reason for meeting at this hour being, not that there was business immediately before us, but that there was a prospect of the submission to us of a very important measure which was awaiting passage in the other house.

If my memory serves me correctly that was a measure to which closure was applied in the other house. The Right Honourable Mr. Meighen continued:

> The hope was entertained that this measure might be ready for us this afternoon. That hope has been disappointed and the situation is now pretty much as it was last evening at the time of adjournment. The measure to which I refer is so urgent that I do not care to take the responsibility for having the Senate not in session when the bill is sent to us. Consequently I move that the Senate adjourn during pleasure and meet again this evening.

I might say to honourable senators that the Senate adjourned and met again in the evening, and when it met the bill had not yet passed the House of Commons. However, later that day the bill did pass the Commons, and the Senate reconvened in accordance with the order that it should be adjourned during pleasure.

That was a very important measure. The rules were amended at that time, in the same way as we amended the rules yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Suspended.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Correct: —in the same way as the rules were suspended by this house yesterday.

When that important measure came to this house there was not any debate whatsoever, which I hope will not be the case this time. I am not suggesting that the Senate was fettered then or that there was any stifling of debate. That very important measure passed its first, second and third readings in this house in less than five minutes. Whether there was any intention to rush it through, I do not know, but I repeat that there is no such intention in my mind in connection with this bill.

The purpose of the measure is that there shall be built in this country an all-Canadian gas pipe line which will enable a great natural resource in the province of Alberta to be brought from that province across Saskatchewan, across Manitoba, into the city of Winnipeg, where it is so sorely needed; from Winnipeg to the Ontario boundary: there, in co-operation with the Government of the Province of Ontario, a line will be built, and leased to the company, from the border of Manitoba to Kapuskasing to carry that gas down to Toronto, into western Ontario, into eastern Ontario and western Quebec. The intention is that Canada shall have a truly all-Canadian gas pipe line.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Did the bill to which the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has referred receive its first and second readings at one sitting?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: On that occasion the first reading was given without debate. The second reading was moved by the Right Honourable Mr. Meighen, and he did not even make a statement on the motion.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: This was at the same sitting?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes. The only member who spoke on the motion for second reading was the Right Honourable Mr. Graham. At the same sitting, on the motion of the Right Honourable Mr. Meighen, the bill was given third reading, and passed. All this occurred in about five minutes.

Hon. Mr. Euler: And without a committee.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I thank the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) for reminding me that the bill was not even sent to committee.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, I understand the procedure is that the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) will move second reading this afternoon; that thereupon debate will ensue; and that later we shall go into committee on the bill. Unfortunately I was absent yesterday, but that is my understanding, and I should like to know if it is correct.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: All I can do is to propose that the motion for second reading be made this afternoon. I will move that the house do rise until 2.30 this afternoon, when the motion for second reading will be considered. If the bill is read the second time I shall then move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Hon. Mr. Reid: After debate?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: After the bill has been debated and has received second reading I shall move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole. It will be for the house to decide whether that course shall be taken.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be set down for second reading?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Later this day. I so move.

The motion was agreed to.

DIVORCE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the following bills:

Bill K-14, an Act for the relief of Elizabeth Redling Lefebvre.

Bill L-14, an Act for the relief of Marie Cecile Veronique Goudreau Johnstone, otherwise known as Lucille Goudreau Johnstone.

Bill M-14, an Act for the relief of Claire Esther Cohen Weiner.

Bill N-14, an Act for the relief of Vera Norine Tromley Ashford.

Bill O-14, an Act for the relief of Jacques Demers.

Bill P-14, an Act for the relief of Virginia Ruth Jones Lord.

Bill Q-14, an Act for the relief of Harold Barnes.

Bill R-14, an Act for the relief of Geraldine Isabella Johnson Mole.

Bill S-14, an Act for the relief of Adam Forbes.

Bill T-14, an Act for the relief of Rose-Anna Rose Crombie.

Bill U-14, an Act for the relief of Esther Phoebe Brunger Abels.

Bill V-14, an Act for the relief of Lorna Elizabeth Cadorette Belinsky.

Bill W-14, an Act for the relief of Benjamin Franklin Luther.

Bill X-14, an Act for the relief of Gordon Frederick Collins.

The bills were read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Tomorrow.

PRIVATE BILL

NIAGARA LOWER ARCH BRIDGE COMPANY LIMITED—SECOND READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill J-14, an Act respecting Niagara Lower Arch Bridge Company Limited.

He said: Honourable senators, the company which is now petitioning for this private bill was originally incorporated by the Parliament of the Province of Canada in 1846, the name of the company then being The Niagara Falls Suspension Bridge Company. Among the amendments that have been made in the interval was one changing the name of the company to Niagara Lower Arch Bridge Company Limited. The company was re-incorporated by letters patent dated October 24, 1929, under the provisions of Part I of the dominion Companies Act.

The original bridge was completed in 1848 and has been in continuous operation since that time, except for a short period when traffic over it was halted during a centennial celebration in 1948.

The purpose of the bill is to include in the company's act of incorporation a power to give title on a sale, in the event of a sale of the bridge, its abutments, et cetera. It was discovered several years ago that this power was lacking in the act. All that the bill does is to provide a power of sale under certain conditions, such as obtaining approval of shareholders.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I would move that this house now rise until 2.30 o'clock this afternoon, and that consideration of the second reading of Bill 298, an Act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, be the first order of business dealt with this afternoon.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until 2.30 p.m.

At 2.30 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CROWN CORPORATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill 298, an Act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation.

He said: Honourable Senators, as I have previously said, the purpose of this bill is to enable our country to have a Canadian gas pipe line, a line that will run all the way across Canada from this side of the Rockies, through Saskatchewan and Manitoba, into the city of Winnipeg, beyond the Ontario border, through northern Ontario, down into Toronto, with lines extending through western Ontario to the east, through eastern Ontario and into the western section of Quebec, including the city of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Might I ask the honourable leader where that appears in the bill?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I will answer questions at the end of my remarks, if the honourable gentleman has no objection.

At the present time there are vast quantities of gas in the province of Alberta. The supply is practically all in the ground, and very little of it is being used, for it is untapped. Some of it has been tapped, and a considerable quantity of gas is being wasted, and will continue to be wasted, until a line is built to take it to places where it is badly needed. Added to that, an expenditure of between $150 million and $200 million has been made in Alberta to develop these fields. At present there is little or no revenue from that investment. I would emphasize that this gas is not owned by any government; it is owned by private companies in the province of Alberta. These private companies have obtained a permit to export a certain amount of gas from Alberta. I remind honourable senators that it is the province in which the gas is situated that has control over the gas and can allow or refuse export of that gas from the province, provided the gas is being exported in Canada to other Canadian provinces. Of course, if the gas is to be exported to the United States, it is necessary to obtain an export permit from the Canadian Government.

There is great demand for gas. The province of Manitoba is sorely in need of it. There are new industries about to commence operations in Manitoba, and they are holding back until they know whether they can get gas. If it is not available to them, some may not locate there; if they can get gas and decide to locate there, they will use a special type of equipment. There are other industries which, I am informed, are in need of a change in their equipment, and they wish to know soon whether the change-over will be made for gas or some other type of fuel.

In Ontario there is a fast growing demand for gas. At the present time, according to statements made by the Premier and the Provincial Treasurer, this province is getting along with its fuel supply, but it will not last very long. Ontario must have natural gas by 1960 or it will experience a fuel shortage.

Now, you say to me, with this great demand for gas, and gas being in existence, why is it not being brought to the potential users? Few people realize the magnitude of an organization which must buy the gas, and construct the pipe line to carry it and distribute it to consumers. It is a prodigious undertaking, not only as to the actual construction of approximately 2,000 miles of pipe line, a portion of which requires a pipe of 34 inches in diameter, but also as to the cost—for it will be a very costly enterprise, especially if the line is to be built through northern Ontario.

During the past five years several proposals have been made to set up a company to export gas from Alberta. The first proposal that I recall was made by a company which wanted to export gas directly from Alberta into the northern United States. Permission for the carrying out of that proposal was refused by the Government. I repeat, it is the provincial Government that allows the export of gas from the province, but it is the dominion Government which must grant or refuse a license to export to a foreign country. In that instance the Government refused a permit to export and stood firmly on its policy, which is as follows:

> That energy in the form of gas must be made available to Canadian consumers, and that only quantities of gas that are in excess of the present or future needs of the Canadian consumers would be permitted to move outside Canada.

I recall the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated on one occasion—and I am in accord with his statement—that that policy is not a policy of "Canada first" but of "Canada always". And, as I have said, the Government refused to grant an export permit to allow the gas to go direct from Alberta to the United States.

Another proposal was made which was not accepted by the Government. It was that gas should be exported from Alberta, through Saskatchewan into Manitoba, and from Manitoba into the United States, following a course through the northern states and south of the Great Lakes, re-entering Canada either at Sarnia or in the Niagara district. That proposal also was refused because such a line would have meant that the United States would have been getting the gas before those parts of Canada which are in the industrial areas of Ontario and Quebec.

Another proposal was that a line should be built from Alberta into the United States, and a compensating line built from the United States into Canada via Buffalo. A permit was again refused, because under that proposal Canadian gas would be going to a foreign country before domestic consumers would have an opportunity of using it.

For some considerable time, therefore, different suggestions were made as to the best method of bringing gas from western Canada to eastern Canada. A number of companies, as I have pointed out, were interested in this very worth-while endeavour. Finally, the Province of Alberta became discouraged with the delay. A vast sum of money had been invested in the development of these gas wells and no return was coming from it to Alberta. It was therefore natural that the premier of that great province should desire that a line be built as soon as possible.

He approached the dominion Government —he approached our Minister of Trade and Commerce—and suggested that the minister should bring together representatives of two of the principal companies, Western Pipe Lines and Trans-Canada. These companies did come together, and as a result they amalgamated and formed one company, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: In what year was that done?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: My recollection is that was early this year or late last year.

As a result of this amalgamation and the determination of one company—a strong company—to bring the gas east, the Province of Alberta for the first time gave permission for exportation from that province. Reference has been made to "five years", but it was much more recently that an export permit was obtained. I do not want to make any mistake in dates, but I am satisfied that permission was granted not more than two years ago. In saying this I correct the statement I made to the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) that these two companies were amalgamated only last year. My present recollection is that this occurred two years ago.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: That is so.

Hon. Mr. Gershaw: January 1954.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: At that time, in 1954, the Province of Alberta agreed to the exportation from Alberta of natural gas in the amount of 500 million cubic feet per day, with the proviso that not more than 200 million cubic feet should be exported to the United States, the remaining 300 million cubic feet to be used in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I thought the Canadian allotment was 400 million cubic feet.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No: 200 million cubic feet was to be available for export and 300 million cubic feet for use in Canada.

Having the assurance that it could obtain gas, the company was under the impression that it could finance this line to eastern Canada, provided it could sell also some gas in the United States. The Tennessee Gas Transmission Company, which had arranged to buy gas from Trans-Canada, made application to the appropriate federal board in the United States for permission to import it.

The Canadian company then endeavoured to arrange its finances, but it soon found that it was not economically sound, particularly in the first few years, to build a line through northern Ontario and to meet even the carrying charges. It was a costly undertaking, and the possible return was too small. The company having made every effort, but without success, to obtain the money, approached the dominion Government with the proposal that the dominion Government should, if it was determined that the line should be an all-Canadian one, build the northern Ontario section. The Canadian Government felt that this would be of especially great benefit to the province of Ontario, and the Ontario Government came forward very quickly and said: We do need the gas. We need it so badly that we will pay one-third of the cost—provided it is not more than $35 million—of building the line from the Manitoba-Ontario border to Kapuskasing.

Hon. Mr. Bradette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The Ontario Government no doubt felt that not only was it necessary to have the gas on account of the difficulties which it was bound to face in 1960, but that it was essential that the line should go through northern Ontario where there is great potential wealth and where great advancement in industrial expansion can take place. The Ontario Government felt so keenly about this that it did not hesitate to approve an arrangement. I will go further and say that when this proposal was made in the provincial Legislature, although there was some criticism of it, the Legislature approved unanimously the provincial Government's proposal to join with the dominion Government and build the line through northern Ontario.

Trans-Canada was undoubtedly very much encouraged that it could get started, and so were the Government of Canada and the Government of Ontario. But there was a delay. The Federal Power Commission at Washington delayed making a ruling on the application. The application was heard last fall and the hearing is still before the commission, although it has been adjourned. In the meantime Trans-Canada found that it could not even raise the money—and a very large sum it required—to build the line from Alberta to the eastern-Manitoba border. It just could not get the money because the public did not feel that it was a good financial investment. So what was to be done? The company had the contract. The provinces of Manitoba and Ontario were crying for gas, and the Alberta Government had given Trans-Canada the permit to export gas. Trans-Canada had made contracts to buy gas from the producing companies.

I think I should emphasize that point. I have heard it said outside of this house: "The Government owns all the gas. Why can't the Government just take the gas?" Well, the Government does not own the gas. Before any gas is exported or used it must be purchased from the producers. A company cannot make contracts with two other companies to export the gas; it can make a contract with only one—at least, it did contract with only one, namely, Trans-Canada. Trans-Canada got the contract from the producers; they were ready to sell, to transport the gas, but did not have the money to build the line. At that time Trans-Canada had a right of way. It was not an easy undertaking to get a right of way across Canada to place the pipe. The company had the right of way, the engineering experience, and, what is equally important, an option on $40 million worth of 34-inch pipe. That pipe is difficult to obtain, so difficult that if Trans-Canada had not obtained an option to purchase the pipe this whole scheme would have been set back at least two years. Trans-Canada has the gas, the export permit, and the pipe to build the line. In fact, it has everything except the money.

Eastern Canada, Manitoba, Ontario—and I will go so far as to say western Quebec—had to have the gas.

If there is any doubt as to whether Ontario and these other provinces need the gas, there are on record letters written by the Premiers of three provinces, in which they ask that arrangements be made to get this gas out of Alberta and into the east as soon as possible. I have before me a letter dated April 24, 1956, written by the Honourable Mr. Manning, Premier of Alberta, to the Prime Minister of Canada. I could read the whole letter if honourable senators have any doubt—

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Do not dispense with it; read the letter.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The letter reads as follows:

My dear Prime Minister:

Passing through Ottawa, today, I had hoped to have an opportunity to discuss with you the serious situation developing as a result of the prolonged delay in getting the Trans-Canada pipe line project under way. This was not possible due to your engagement in Toronto, and as previous commitments prevent me staying over until tomorrow, I had a brief discussion with your colleague, the Right Honourable Mr. Howe, and am writing this letter to outline some of the thoughts I had hoped to discuss with you personally.

My colleagues and I have become increasingly concerned over the serious threat to the whole national gas development and gas utilization program occasioned by the repeated frustrations and delays that have attended the proposed Trans-Canada pipe line project. For the following reasons, in our opinion the situation has reached the point where any further delay in commencing at least the western section of the line may well prove disastrous to the entire project.

1. If the project is delayed another year, all present permits, both federal and provincial, and all contracts entered into by the company will lapse by default. It will be extremely difficult to grant further indefinite extensions of the government permits, and almost impossible for the company to retain existing contracts with gas producers.

2. Trans-Canada Pipe Lines and the Alberta Trunk Line Company have made arrangements for the large dimension pipe necessary for the project if it proceeds this year. If it is delayed another year this pipe, in all probability, will be allocated to some other project. If this happens it will be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for the company to make firm arrangements for the delivery of the necessary pipe in time to commence construction in 1957.

3. Another year's delay in providing a market for Alberta gas will have a retarding effect on the development of both the oil and gas resources of the province. Millions of dollars of investment capital already are immobilized in gas wells which are capped because no export market is available. A program involving over $100,000,000 of new development for gathering lines, processing plants and auxiliary industries which large scale export of gas will make possible is being held in abeyance and each further delay is undermining confidence in the future prospects to a degree that is damaging to both the provincial and the national interests.

4. Public acceptance of the present national gas policy which dictates that Canadian consumers be given first priority in the use of Canadian gas is being weakened by the prolonged delay in getting western gas to eastern consumers. A policy impossible of practical application in a reasonable period of time cannot indefinitely command public endorsation and support. Over two years have lapsed since the present Trans-Canada project was formulated as a vehicle to implement national policy with respect to natural gas. To date western producers have not been able to sell one cubic foot of gas for delivery to eastern consumers. Living with this situation every day, we are very conscious of the extent to which the uncertainty created by repeated delays is undermining the confidence of investors and producers, and of the public generally.

For these reasons we believe it is of the utmost importance that at least the western section of the proposed line be constructed this year. In fairness to the Trans-Canada Pipe Line Company, I believe it rightly can be said they have complied with every condition and requirement of the national gas policy laid down by your government. They have encountered temporary difficulty in financing their part of the project only because of the delay before the Federal Power Commission at Washington, which is something entirely beyond their control. Under these circumstances, we feel your Government would be fully justified in taking whatever steps are necessary and in your judgment proper to ensure the immediate start of the Trans-Canada project within the framework of the national policy that precludes consideration of other markets until eastern Canada is served.

I respectfully submit these observations for your consideration, with the sincere hope that you will be able to make an early announcement that construction of the line will commence this spring.

Yours very sincerely,

Ernest C. Manning,
Premier of Alberta.

Then there is a letter from the Honourable Douglas Campbell, Premier of Manitoba, dated May 15, 1956:

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I am writing to you concerning the discussions taking place regarding the transmission of natural gas from Alberta to Manitoba and eastern Canada.

As I have indicated to you on previous occasions, the availability of natural gas in Manitoba at minimum economic rates can have an important influence on the economy of this province. There are now a number of important developments in Manitoba which are being held up pending the arrival of natural gas.

At this time I would like to reaffirm Manitoba's interest in this matter and to stress once again that it is imperative that construction of the pipe line between Alberta and Winnipeg be completed this year. For this reason I trust that whatever solution is agreed upon will assure the arrival of natural gas in Manitoba in 1956.

Yours sincerely,

Douglas Campbell.

The other letter of which I have a copy is from the Honourable Dana Porter, Provincial Treasurer of Ontario. This was written to Mr. Howe.

Hon. Mr. Farris: What is the date of it?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not have the date at the moment; in any event, it was written recently.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It was received on May 14, according to the Commons Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Howe wrote Mr. Porter on May 11, and this letter was received in reply.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is this a confidential letter?

Hon. Mr. Croll: You can listen.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I can assure my honourable friend that I, like him, would not read confidential letters. It is as follows:

Dear Mr. Howe:

I beg to acknowledge your letter of May 11th, in which you outline the present status of the project for a trans-Canada gas pipe line, and the financial arrangements recently concluded between your government and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited in order that construction of the western section will commence this year.

As we have frequently stated, a trans-Canada pipe line is, of course, a federal responsibility. A provincial government is in no position, constitutionally, to assume any responsibility for decisions as to the construction or the financing of a national undertaking that crosses the boundaries of several provinces. We have, however, from the outset concurred in the policy of a line that would be built entirely within the boundaries of Canada, within Canadian jurisdiction. As a provincial government, we are particularly interested in the potential benefits for northern Ontario that would undoubtedly follow the building of a gas pipe line through that portion of the province. Generally, in view of our rapid industrial expansion, coupled with the fact that our hydro-electric power resources are now approaching their maximum limits of development, the necessity of new sources of fuel for our industries and our domestic consumers is becoming increasingly urgent. We agree with you that further delays in the construction of this project would have very adverse consequences. Time has become of the essence. Every day's delay invites the most serious consequences to the development of Ontario, and to the national economy. In these circumstances, it would appear essential that the western section of the line be completed during the year 1956. To accomplish this, we understand that actual construction must be commenced not later than July 1. We understand from your letter that your financial arrangements with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited are designed to accomplish this purpose.

You will recall that our agreement with your government, as set out in the correspondence of November, 1955, provided for the incorporation of a Crown Corporation to build the Northern Ontario section of the trans-Canada line. The conditions upon which we agreed to lend money to such a corporation, to the limit of $35,000,000, were as follows:

1. That our investment would be returned to us out of rentals based upon the through-put of gas, with interest at the going rate, so that eventually this investment would involve no cost to the taxpayers of Ontario.

2. That we should not be called upon to advance money under our commitment until you were able to assure us that all other portions of the entire trans-Canada line from Alberta to Quebec would be completed and operated.

3. That, by reason of the terms of the agreement between your government and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, our commitment would terminate if the company were unable by May 1, 1956, to show financial ability to carry out their entire undertaking.

In any matter of such complexity and magnitude, we recognize that it may become necessary to consider changes in arrangements from time to time. At the last session of the Legislature an act was passed, by the unanimous recorded vote of the house, giving authority to enter into such arrangements. The act allows for certain flexibility so as to meet changing situations as they may arise. Section 1 of the act is as follows:

"1. For the purpose of implementing the arrangements made or to be made between the Government of Canada and the Government of Ontario to facilitate the construction of a connecting link through Northern Ontario of a pipe line to transport natural gas from Alberta into Central Ontario, the Treasurer of Ontario is hereby authorized to loan from time to time out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund any sum of money, but not more than $35,000,000, to a corporation constituted or to be constituted on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada and having as a purpose the construction aforesaid."

Upon condition that the construction of the western section begins not later than July 1st, 1956, we are willing to concur in the extension of time that you request. Subject to this change, we shall continue our commitment to participate in the financing of the Northern Ontario section.

Yours sincerely,
Dana Porter.

Honourable senators, from what I have read I think you will agree with me that there is no doubt as to the necessity for this line being commenced before July 1 of this year. As a result of the difficulties in financing the line, when the permit from the Federal Power Commission was not forthcoming, an arrangement was made whereby the Government would advance to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited a sum equal to 90 per cent of the cost of the construction of the line from the eastern border of Alberta to the city of Winnipeg, that amount in any event not to exceed $80 million, the loan to bear interest at 5 per cent, the construction of the line to be completed this year, and the money advanced to be repaid with interest on April 2, 1957. As security for the loan the Government, through a crown company, will have an assignment, a mortgage, on all the assets of Trans-Canada; it will have not only a mortgage on the line from the Alberta border to Winnipeg, but it will have an assignment of every interest and equity whatsoever which the Trans-Canada company has in every respect.

Hon. Mr. Horner: In Canada?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: And outside of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Will the honourable gentleman say how the Government will rank compared with the Government of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes. I would rather answer questions at the end of my remarks, but I shall answer this one now.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: It is quite satisfactory if you wish to defer the answer.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The building of the Ontario section will not commence until the western section has been completed; in any event, it will not commence until next year. Therefore, the Province of Ontario will not advance any money until after the dominion Government has been entirely repaid.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: If it be not repaid, I am asking where the dominion Government will stand, in regard to security, with the Government of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: But Ontario has no interest in this line and cannot have an interest in the line until after the dominion Government has received back with interest its money used for the building of the western Ontario section. I think I could explain the arrangement this way: if Trans-Canada does not complete its contract and return the money to the dominion Government by April 2, 1957, the dominion Government would then have to step in and take over the western section of the line and whatever other assets of the company it deemed advisable to take over. If that occurred then the dominion Government would have to make a new arrangement with the Province of Ontario; at least, the dominion Government would have to prove to the Province of Ontario that it could complete the length between Winnipeg and the eastern border of Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. Croll: If it had the financial resources to do so.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, if it had the financial resources to do so. The dominion Government, of course, would have the financial resources to do it.

Let me make it clear that the Province of Ontario—and I think we want to be fair with all the provinces—is not going into this arrangement unless it is assured that there is going to be an all-Canadian line from Alberta through Saskatchewan, Manitoba and northern Ontario on down into Toronto and eastern Ontario and western Quebec. So, if Trans-Canada fails in its undertaking the dominion Government would have to come back to Parliament and present another bill to get authority either to complete the line itself or to make some other arrangement. We do not know what will happen, but one thing is clear, that the dominion Government's present arrangement with Trans-Canada is to lend that company money not exceeding 90 per cent of the cost of construction of the western or prairie section of the line or $80 million, whichever is the lesser.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Do I understand that the lien in security of the $80 million would be on the western section only?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, the lien is not on the western section only. The Government will have a mortgage on all the real property of the company, a chattel mortgage on all its chattels, and liens or some form of security on all the other assets, and it also will have an assignment of the contracts of Trans-Canada with producing companies and also with the company that is manufacturing the 34-inch steel pipe.

The crown company in advancing this money will have a charge on all the assets whatsoever, including an assignment of the shares of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. There is nothing on which it will not have a charge.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Would the leader permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: So, if the line be not completed and paid for from the Alberta-Saskatchewan boundary to Winnipeg the crown company or the Government will have a lien on the portion of the line to be built north of the Great Lakes through Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Farris: There will be nothing there.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: There is nothing there yet.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I cannot answer until I hear the question.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: It will have a lien upon the complete line if the refund of the $80 million be not made at the date that the leader has mentioned?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The latter part of the statement is correct. It will have a lien on everything that Trans-Canada owns or in which it has any interest. But at the present time Trans-Canada has no interest in the northern Ontario section of the line, so of course the dominion Government could not have a lien on that.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Well, that will leave Ontario, if the line through northern Ontario were not built, and the $80 million had not been repaid, with a second mortgage, or a mortgage on a parity with that of the Government on the northern Ontario line?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, that is not correct. At the present time the provincial Government has no interest in any line. At the present time the dominion Government has no interest in the northern Ontario portion of the line to be built. This bill will provide the sum of $130 million, and $80 million of that amount can be advanced to Trans-Canada as a loan to build the prairie section. If that money is not repaid, then, and only then, can the dominion Government enter into its arrangement with the provincial Government for building the northern Ontario section.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is there not something more than that?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: May I ask one more question? What is the arrangement for the building of the line from Winnipeg to the Ontario boundary?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: And from Kapuskasing to Toronto?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The building of the line from Winnipeg to the eastern boundary of Manitoba is a requirement of the Trans-Canada Company. No part of this $80 million can be used for building the line east of Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Just a moment before you go ahead. Am I correct in saying Ontario certainly will not advance the $35 million until the line is built from Winnipeg to the eastern boundary of the province of Manitoba, because otherwise it might have a line from the eastern boundary of Manitoba to Kapuskasing and no connection with the gas fields in Alberta?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is quite right. Trans-Canada will build the line to Winnipeg, on to the Ontario boundary, and from Kapuskasing to Toronto.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Where is it going to get the money?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The company must prove its ability to finance the line.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: When?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It must prove by April 2 that it is able to finance the line from Winnipeg to the eastern border of Manitoba. Unless Trans-Canada fulfils its agreement, the dominion Government need not construct the northern Ontario section; it can make whatever arrangements it thinks best to complete the line. There is no "catch" in this. I repeat that if Trans-Canada does not prove by April 2, 1957, that it can build this line as far as the eastern border of Manitoba, and from Kapuskasing down to Toronto, the dominion Government has complete freedom of action.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is that a provision of the agreement?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is a provision of the agreement.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Where does that appear in the bill?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It is in the agreement.

Had the dominion Government been content not to have an all-Canadian gas pipe line, the undertaking could have been handled through private financing several years ago. But there is a national policy with respect to gas produced in Canada, and, as I have stated once before, that policy is that assurance of supply to Canadian users must be evident before any gas can be exported. The Government is determined to have an all-Canadian line, and I believe that every honourable senator is in agreement with that principle. The line to be built under the provisions of this bill is all-Canadian. The provinces have complete control over the volume of gas to be exported, and the price to be charged at the source; they can determine on an equitable sharing of markets among the gas producers; they have full authority over the distribution of gas within their respective areas. For instance, in Ontario the rates must be approved by the Ontario Fuel Board. In Alberta, the Public Utilities Board, and in Manitoba a similar tribunal, have full control over the rates to be charged to consumers and the amount of earnings permitted distributors. The federal Government has an over-all control of the transmission company; and Parliament may enact legislation with respect to the company's permissible earnings.

So if ever there was an all-Canadian company, this is it. It is located in Canada; it is subject to Canadian law, to regulation by provincial authority and to over-all regulation by the Board of Transport Commissioners. In addition, under the agreement Canadians will have the opportunity to purchase 51 per cent of the common stock, and, as honourable senators know, it is the holders of common stock who control a company.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Not always.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Although of course I cannot guarantee that Canadians will take up 51 per cent, that is the percentage which will be offered to them.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: At a price.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: At a price. So Canadians will have an opportunity to invest in this company if they see fit. If they do not, no one can force them to do so. But I would point out that, under the Companies Act, the majority of the directors must not only reside in Canada but must be Canadians.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Must the directors' meetings be in Canada?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: They have to be held in Canada.

Honourable senators, this is a very large undertaking. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Haig) asked me yesterday about rates which would be charged at various places across Canada. I have a schedule; it is rather complicated. I will explain it in part, if I can, and then, with the approval of the house, have the statement put on Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Put it on Hansard the way it is.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The schedule sets out the rates in the various provincial zones, and also the approximate cost in various cities.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is that schedule a portion of the agreement?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What authority has it?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: These are contracts which have been already made with Canadian distributing companies. Then Trans-Canada will have to enter into further agreements with these and other distributing companies.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Have the distributing companies agreed to this?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Whom have they agreed with?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: They have agreed with the municipalities and with distributing companies. I will read part of the material covering rates:

All contracts are for a 25-year period, with prices for the full period of the contract, without escalation. (Prices to U.S. customer, Midwestern, increase about one per cent per 1,000 cubic feet at end of each 5-year period.) Canada divided into six "rate zones") . . .

It is difficult to explain this document without following the wording of it. In general it approximates rates in major cities and the various provincial rate zones. With the approval of the house I will place the document on Hansard:

Contracts with Canadian distributing companies (except special case, Union Gas Co.)

All contracts are for a 25-year period, with prices for the full period of the contract, without escalation. (Prices to U.S. customer, midwestern, increase about one per cent per 1,000 cubic feet at end of each 5-year period). Canada divided into six "rate zones" with rates equal for all customers within each zone. Distributors in each zone have choice between four schedules of general service rates, dependent upon the "load factor" each believes he can achieve in the type of market he serves, these being rate "A" (minimum load factor 75%), "B" (minimum load factor 63%), "C" (minimum load factor 50%), and "D" (minimum load factor 37%). A predominance of "space heating" market (winter sales) involves a low load factor. Year-round sales to industry, and interruptible sales to industry during summer months, make possible higher load factors, and hence lower average cost of gas to the distributor. Load factors will therefore vary widely between markets of the various distributors in each "rate zone", thus affecting the delivered cost of gas to each type of customer in the several markets. Following are examples of the actual average cost per MCF of gas that would be delivered by Trans-Canada at the distributors' gates in each rate zone, under the various load factor schedules (A to D) on firm contracts, together with the special rates for off-peak interruptible summer sales to the distributors in each rate zone.

Approximate cost of Canadian gas to distributors at gates of major cities to be served:

City	Contracted Gas at Expected Load Factor—MCF:	Seasonal Off-peak:	Excess Gas Interruptible:
Winnipeg (at 60% Load Factor)	32·9c	25c	18c
Toronto (at 75% Load Factor)	49·3c	35c	30c
Montreal (at 75% Load Factor)	52·1c	35c	30·5c

All the above are general service rates. As of May 1, 1956, special industrial rates are available which will reduce the above rates according to the proportion of firm industrial sales in the load pattern of the utility entering into a contract with Trans-Canada.

Special contract sale at Emerson, Manitoba, to Midwestern Gas Transmission Company

Contract No. 1, a high load factor, firm sale, "take or pay" contract for 200,000,000 cubic feet per day, for twenty-five year period. During first three years only, gas may be accepted at Canadian-U.S. border at 75 per cent load factor, with price payable to Trans-Canada 27·27c per MCF. During balance of contract only 95 per cent and 100 per cent load factors apply. Contract prices for high load factors are as follows:

Contract No. 2, to take effect only when and if Alberta and Canada authorize export of additional gas reserves surplus to Canadian needs and the U.S. authorizes import, would also be a high load factor, firm sale, "take or pay" contract for 200,000,000 cubic feet per day. Costs to Midwestern for gas delivered to it at Emerson under this contract would be about three cents per MCF higher than under contract No. 1, and would also increase about one cent per MCF at end of each five years of the 25 year contract. During first three years only, gas may be accepted at 75 per cent load factor, at a price of 31·05c per MCF. During balance of contract only 95 per cent and 100 per cent load factors apply. The contract prices for the high load factors are as follows:

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Would the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) state what is the origin of this document and where copies of it can be obtained? If it is not available until tomorrow it may not be of much use to those who would like to consider it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That schedule was printed in the House of Commons Hansard of May 29.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask another question? I am really searching for information; I am not trying to obstruct. Does that schedule cover the cost of the sale price of gas in the United States as well as in Canada?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: How is that regulated?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There is a provision in the regulations that gas cannot be sold to United States distributors at a rate less than it is sold to Canadian distributors.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Does that take into account the length of the haul?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Under similar conditions.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: And the quantity of gas?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The load, and so forth. The purpose of the clause is to ensure that Canadian consumers will get gas as cheaply as American consumers under similar circumstances.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: All things considered.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, all things considered.

Hon. Mr. Farris: May I interrupt to say that the schedule in question can be found at page 4427 of the House of Commons Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Under date of May 29.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Thank you. Honourable senators, this is a gigantic undertaking. The building of the line alone will cost about $375 million. That is just for the construction and engineering services. Added to that there will be the cost of distributing the gas in the various cities and towns along the line. Each community will have a utility which will sell the gas. It will cost a considerable sum of money to extend the piping through the various towns and cities. There will be the cost of the equipment which will be used when gas is assured, and there will be the cost of the plants that will necessarily be established in the province of Alberta to free the gas of sulphur so that it can be sent through the line. So the $375 million is only one small part of this gigantic undertaking which will cost, before gas is being delivered throughout eastern and northern Ontario, Winnipeg and elsewhere in Manitoba, a total of at least $1 billion. It is not easy to finance an organization which requires that much money.

The Government has been anxious about this and has felt that the people of Canada want an all-Canadian line. This is an all-Canadian line, and no other proposal has been advanced which will give us an all-Canadian line. If the proposal before the house is not accepted, then a line cannot be established in Canada for at least two years, if then. Manitoba needs gas; Ontario needs gas; Montreal needs gas. The industrial areas of Manitoba and eastern Canada as far as western Quebec need gas. This bill will enable Canadians to have gas through an all-Canadian natural gas pipe line.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable members, I am a little out on my schedule. I did not think my honourable friend would take quite so much time.

There are two comments I want to make at the outset. They will probably not influence anybody except myself in this debate. First of all, I am opposed to this bill. Secondly, I presume I am the only shareholder in this house who owns stock in a company that may, if the line goes through, be one of the distributors. I happen to own stock in the Winnipeg Electric Company; but, believe me, I didn't buy the stock last week —I bought it about thirty or forty years ago. I am mentioning this fact at the outset because sometimes this sort of question is raised, and I do not want, by any action of mine, to have any aspersions cast on this house.

About two years ago the Government of Manitoba took over the assets of the Winnipeg Electric Company. Among the assets was the power site for developing electricity. However, the company also owned a gas producing distribution system in Winnipeg, and the province did not want that and so turned it back to the company, saying, "You incorporate a local company to handle the gas distribution and we will transfer its value back to you for so many shares." I think for every share a person had in the Winnipeg Electric Company he got one share in the gas company. I am not sure whether I have sixteen or sixty-four shares; it is so long ago that I acquired them that I cannot remember. As a matter of fact, I don't know where they are. At any rate, they are worth about $14 each now, and if this legislation goes through and it does all the fine things the Leader of the Government claims it will do—which I am not too sure about—these shares will be worth about $20 each.

I want to inform the house that I have nothing to do with the company itself and I am going to vote against the bill. Therefore, my vote cannot be challenged on this ground. I wanted to make this statement because I may meet with some questions by reason of being a shareholder in this particular company.

Honourable senators, the issue in this bill is very simple. It is not a complicated issue at all. It is not whether we will build a pipe line across Canada. The issue is simply whether the credit of Canadians to the extent of $80 million should be invested in a pipe line running from Alberta to Winnipeg so that American investors owning 83 per cent of the capital stock in the company involved can make money out of the line. That is the only issue. There has never been a challenge in this house and there never will be as to whether the pipe line should be built. But there is a challenge all over Canada that our credit of $80 million should not be used to make it possible for Americans who come here and who hold 83 per cent of the capital stock of a company, to make a profit out of it by our guarantee. That is the issue, the clear issue. Make no mistake about it. Every telegram and letter I get—and I get quite a lot of them—emphasizes this point. That is what is concerning the people.

Let me tell you something. This line has been under consideration by this company for about five years. The owners are partners in a very wealthy corporation. The very reason they cannot put up the necessary money is that they cannot get into the United States through the Emerson line where they already have bought all the land that they can buy. I do not know about Alberta or Saskatchewan. When they bought the line in Manitoba they came down to Winnipeg and went south to Emerson. I do not say they bought all the right of way, because they could not get some of it, but they will get it ultimately, and it is on the plan. In fact, they have title to some of the land between Winnipeg and Emerson now. Then they found themselves up against the American distribution system.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Haig: And the American distribution system said, "No, we will consider this." They have been considering it for a long time, and no one knows how long they will be considering it. It is a difficult situation. The Tennessee Company is the aggressor. It is going into the central United States; it has largely been an eastern company, and the companies in the mid-west are objecting to it. That is the situation. How long they will be before the courts, nobody knows. We do know this, however, that the company has been unable to get the money in the United States to build this line, because it could not get a permit to import gas into the United States. That is the crucial point of this whole matter.

Honourable senators, I am in favour of a Trans-Canada pipe line, and so is everybody else who has the interest of Canada at heart. My friend the Leader of the Government read a letter from the Premier of Alberta. What can Alberta do if it has the gas and cannot sell it? The only places where Alberta can sell its gas are the United States or the country east of Alberta, that is,

Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, and maybe the Maritime provinces. I wonder if there is any objection from honourable senators from the Maritimes. There are four provines down there, and no doubt they would like to get cheap natural gas.

An Hon. Senator: That would be nice for you.

Hon. Mr. Haig: If I were a senator from the Maritime provinces, or from Newfoundland, I would want to know why the Government did not build power sites there but was keen to see that gas was transmitted from the west. That is what we object to. My honourable friend talks about Winnipeg. I know the Winnipeg situation just as well as, or maybe a little better than, anybody else here; it is natural that I should.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Does the honourable member know Winnipeg better than Premier Campbell does?

Hon. Mr. Haig: I have lived there longer than Premier Campbell has. I have speculated in more stocks than he has, and I have been elected as many times. Therefore, I know a good deal about the people of Winnipeg, and what they think. If I may say so, the people of Winnipeg have never refused to elect me at any place where I have run for election—never once. I have always told them, as I am telling my honourable friend now, the straight facts, whether they liked it or not, and I have received their votes. There is no question of the result if you tell the people what you really believe about what an issue involves.

Honourable senators, a large number of people in Manitoba would not change to gas. A great many have oil furnaces. There are also central heating plants which burn coal. It is a cheap grade of coal which comes from Saskatchewan, and it is loaded on cars by steam shovel and brought into the pits in Winnipeg, where the heaters are located; the coal is dumped into the heating plant by machinery and is never touched by human hands. The City of Winnipeg has a number of such plants, and by this means the consumer can have hot water, steam or hot air piped into his dwelling house, depending on the type of district he lives in. Even if gas becomes available at a cheaper price than it is at present, the difference will not be sufficient to justify taking out an old heating system and putting in a new one. There might be some demand for gas in Winnipeg by manufacturing plants, but the demand would be limited, because there is very cheap coal on the boundary of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, which comes in large quantities and is used for the purposes I have mentioned.

The people of Manitoba have never been a bit averse to public ownership. One might as well admit it. For instance, the electric power of our province is either owned by the province or by the City of Winnipeg. Nobody else owns any of it, or ever has. The water supply for Winnipeg is brought in by the city; it is owned by the city and distributed by the city. One of the largest heating plants is owned by the city, while the other one is managed by a competitive private company, but the rates are set by a board in Winnipeg.

I want to touch on the history of this matter for a moment, but before doing so I wish to comment on one or two things said by my friend the Leader of the Government. He said that it was necessary for Alberta to sell gas. Honourable senators, Alberta naturally wants to sell gas, and if you will read the letter you will be quite convinced of that. And—well, I will not say what I was going to say.

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: Say it, anyway.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I was going to say that Mr. Manning had some help in writing that letter.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: What evidence have you of that?

Hon. Mr. Haig: My honourable friend talks about an all-Canada gas line. The original agreement provided for 2 million cubic feet of gas a year to be exported to the United States, as against 3 million cubic in Canada. Anyone who has followed this question knows that until companies like Trans-Mountain and Westcoast Transmission Company, of British Columbia, got permits to sell their product in the United States as well as Vancouver the stock had no value at all, and as far as I know was not even purchased. The same thing applies here. I heard a member of the other house who is an expert argue very strenuously —I cannot remember if it was in the house or elsewhere—that an all-Canada route was the right thing to have, but that to make it pay it would have to supply the market in the United States. All the trouble started with Tennessee. They suggested shipping to Ontario a certain percentage of their gas, and said we could send ours down to the west to fill their needs. They said they would build up a clientele for western gas in Ontario. Well, what did the board in the United States say? They said, "We won't let you sell any gas at any place if it means taking it away from the people who are using it now, or from prospective users of the gas along that line". That is the argument; that is the problem we face. If we sell gas to the United States through this pipe line, we will not be able to get it back—it will be gone. Therefore, we may have to take care of a loss from year to year.

I realize there is a demand in this country for a pipe line to be built from Alberta to eastern Canada. Whether or not the venture would be justifiable on financial grounds I do not know.

Honourable members, my mind goes back a long way. In the year 1904 Canada had an election, and a transcontinental line was built from Quebec to Winnipeg. That was 42 years ago, and the line has not yet paid the cost of the axle grease used on the cars that occasionally run on the line.

Hon. Mr. Bradette: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Haig: We have paid out millions during my time in this house. As a senator, I was a party to writing off $1 billion on that amalgamated road, the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific; now this year I see the Canadian National Railways are going to be in trouble again. It is the same thing every year. Whenever an application related to rates is made before the Board of Transport Commissioners they adopt as the standard not the C.N.R. but the C.P.R. The northern part at least of what is now the Canadian National was built in 1904. Those of us who were around at that time will remember it. We were told it would cost $19 million to build that line. When we asked what the $19 million was for we were told it was the interest on the money during the building of the road. Well, we have been building it ever since, because we have paid out many times that amount.

I say this pipe line can be made to pay handsomely provided we can carry it over the years until a demand for gas is built up. It may take five years, it may take ten; that is the problem we face.

There is no doubt about it that when the American bankers were consulted by this company and asked to lend the money, they said something like this: Our experience with pipe lines is that until you can get a pay load you are not sure what will happen; we are not sure that you can get a pay load, unless you can enter the United States with the gas. I say, honourable senators, that is why the American bankers did not put up the money.

There is no doubt that the people who hold 83 per cent of the shares have the money. I have the list of shareholders before me, and I note that some of the companies have as much as 370,000 shares—there are four or five of them in this organization. The only Canadian shareholders I see of any importance hold one or two shares. That is the situation, and that is why I am opposed to this measure at this time.

Had the Government come forward and told us it intended to build the line from Alberta to Winnipeg, from Winnipeg to Kapuskasing, thence to Toronto or Montreal, or both, and that it proposed to borrow money and operate the line under public ownership or as a private enterprise to be rented to a company, I would have voted for such a proposition. True, I would have preferred one system to the other, but I would have gone along with the proposition, because I think it would be a great development of our natural resources. But I certainly do not propose to vote for a proposition in which somebody in the United States owns 83 per cent of the stock and makes 83 per cent of the profit out of my money. I don't think anybody would expect me to vote for it.

I have received much correspondence and many wires about this legislation. True, some of them came from labour unions. But have they not the same right to express their opinions as anyone else has? They have to pay taxes, bear the high cost of living and help to support this country, and we must listen to them. They feel that while Canada needs the pipe line, they do not like the system under which its construction is proposed in this case.

There is one particular paragraph in Part II of the bill to which I take exception. I refer to paragraph (e) of section 7 (2), which says that in the event of default by Trans-Canada the crown corporation may:

> (e) pursuant to any agreement in that behalf made, with the approval of the Governor in Council, before or after the coming into force of this act, between Her Majesty and Trans-Canada and any shareholder of Trans-Canada and any holder of an option to purchase shares of Trans-Canada, acquire shares of the capital stock of Trans-Canada—

Now we are asked to approve contracts that have not yet been made. I believe that under that clause the Government could have gone ahead and approved of whatever it considered necessary.

It is obvious that there is strong feeling about this measure all across Canada. During my time in this house I have never seen such strong objection taken to a piece of legislation. I challenge any member to point to a single action by Parliament during the past twenty-one years that has stirred up the people of Canada as this measure has. It is all very well to say that because of somethting that happened in another place the people were stirred up, but I say if the makings of a fire had not been there the spark would not have set it off. That is the situation; and it is for that reason that I feel that we as senators should be very careful as to how far we go in the passage of such legislation.

I could read to the house a review by one of the leading reporters in Canada, whose daily paper was in favour of the construction of a trans-Canada pipe line, but this reporter and his paper opposed its construction as proposed by this bill. That attitude has been taken by many other people. I fail to understand why the Government having had this project under negotiation for two years, has done nothing about it until this time. My honourable friend the Leader of the Government has said that it was in January, 1954 that negotiations were carried on with Ontario. I know when I was in hospital in the fall of 1953 I had plenty of time to read the newspapers, and it runs in my mind that there was discussion in the press at that time about the trouble in financing the section through northern Ontario. The arrangement proposed then, as I remember it, was that Ontario would put up $35 million and the federal Government would put up the balance to finance a line. But it knew at that time that the company in question was having financing difficulties even then. Why was not something done at an earlier date?

Further, why should this bill come to this house in the dying days of the session? We have been here since last January; the Government knew this problem was facing it; it knew the American company could not get the authority it required from the Federal Power Commission in the United States. Now we are asked to make a decision by way of passage of this bill which should have been brought to us months ago.

While I made the suggestion the other day that this measure should now be considered in Committee of the Whole House, I am of the opinion that the Senate, had this bill been referred to us at an earlier date, could have referred it to one of our main standing committees to which all senators would have been invited, and to which we could have summoned the Premiers of Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec, and as well businessmen from across Canada to give us their side of this picture. That committee could have heard also the gas men from Tennessee who have some of their own gold in this enterprise, who could have told us why they were not able to finance it entirely and had to come back to the Government for help. We never had an opportunity to do this, and we have not got it now. That is my first point.

Next, supposing on March 1 of this year the Government had said that the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines people could not carry the financial arrangements for the line. The honourable leader has said they had an option. One would think they could have gone next door and sold that option, but that just could not be done. But tenders could have been called for. We saw in the papers the other day that tenders had been called for such a project in Great Britain, and contracts have been granted here in Ontario. Of course, there are lots of people who are ready to tender on this job. It might have meant a little delay in getting started, but this project has already been hanging fire for five years.

The Premier of Ontario acknowledged recently that his province would probably not need gas very badly until 1960; in fact, the engineers of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission said they would not need it before that year, and they gave a public statement to that effect. In those circumstances, why did our Government not say to the American investors: "Now, gentlemen, apparently you haven't got the money to carry out your contract, but we don't think we should go to the people of Canada and ask them to help you to make good your investment. We think we should call for new tenders and see if there is anyone in Canada who will undertake the construction of this line and build it."

The Government did not do that, though. It could have done it. There was no reason why it could not have been done. We are under no obligation to this American concern. We have already given it five years in which to do something. I think after that delay it should not come along now and say there is need for great haste in the matter. I can see no grounds for the extreme haste. If the pipe line is not ready by, say, the 31st of December I do not see how it will make any great difference to anybody. The remaining portion of the line cannot be started until next year. As far as Ontario and Quebec are concerned, there certainly will not be any gas delivered there for several years to come. The only people who will benefit by early construction of the line will be the people in my own city of Winnipeg. However, I believe that Winnipeg can live another year without the gas; I have a sneaky feeling that we could hold out another year without the gas. And I believe that Regina, Moose Jaw, Brandon and Portage could hold out for another year even if they do not get the gas. Winnipeg is the only place that would be able to get gas under this contract next year. No other city could get it. And it must be remembered that it is the easy part of the line that is going to be built.

My honourable friend the leader said this company has the contracts. Well, I do not know what other contracts it has, but I do know that it has pretty good ones in Manitoba as far as right of way is concerned.

It has been said that Ontario will need the western gas by 1960. That is four years from now. Well, a gas line could be constructed by that time even if tenders were called for its construction next year.

I do not know that I need to say anything further, honourable members.

To summarize, it looks as though the Government of the day got excited and lost its head, lost its nerve, and thought that the country would go to the dogs if that line from Alberta to Winnipeg was not built this year. I do not believe that is correct at all. I think the country would still go on just as well without it. I am of the opinion that the American capitalists should never have been allowed to dilly-dally as long as they have. If we are putting up 90 per cent of the cost of this line we should own it. I think the feeling of the majority of the people of Canada is that if the Canadian taxpayer is going to put up the money to build the line he should own it and nobody should have any claim on it whatsoever.

As to the gas supplies in Alberta, I am sure that province would only be too glad to sell gas to the Government, if it was ready to pay cash. I am almost certain that the provincial Government would much prefer to do business with the dominion Government than with this American concern.

That Ontario will need the gas I have no doubt. It is a fine province, I admit, and a great manufacturing centre. However, it seems to me that its power experts have told us that the present power developments in Ontario are sufficient to supply power until 1960. So I ask why is Ontario not willing to let the rest of Canada get its fair share? I know that Ontario pays something like 50 per cent of all the taxes in Canada, but the rest of us also pay taxes, proportionately. I think Ontario should have waited for one more year.

I hope that the majority in this house will vote against the bill. If we do that, then the Government will have to call for tenders from somebody else to build the line. It will get lots of tenders if the pipe line is going to be the bonanza that the leader of the house says it will be. The Government will get all the tenders it wants, do not make any mistake about that. I was told about two years ago that the stock of the Westcoast Transmission Company would be a good thing. I said to myself that maybe I would buy a little and when I went in to buy there was a terrific scramble for it. That was a good deal. I fully realize that if the stock of Trans-Canada is put on the market and if it is as good a deal as my honourable friend says it is—although I am not too sure of that—there will be a scramble by people to get their money into it.

Why should we be so solicitous for this American concern? Why should we not build this pipe line and give any profits to the taxpayers of Canada? Whether the directors of the organization be citizens of Canada or not may not be important, but surely our laws will protect our investment. Surely our laws will be able to control what the company can do. I am not very much afraid on that score, but what I am afraid of is that it will be broadcast to Canada and the United States that Canadians are so keen to help out the Americans that they will guarantee their investment in Canada, and that even if the Americans have not got enough money to put up, we will put it up for them.

I think it is a very grave mistake that is being made on our part. The American people are a great people, a very energetic people, and it is a fine thing to live on this continent beside them, but we must remember that they look after number one. Never make any mistake about that. And the only people they will respect are the people who also look after number one. They will think the less of us if we do not look after number one, and we certainly are not doing that when we are willing to put up $80 million to build a line which they in effect should be supplying the money to build. If it ever comes about that the company does not pay back the loan and we have to build the Ontario line, and it turns out not to be such a success as my honourable friend says it will, and there is a loss on the line, of course the taxpayers of Canada will be called upon to pay it.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Will the honourable senator permit a question? Would he be in favour of building a Government-owned pipe line from Alberta to the east?

Hon. Mr. Haig: I will answer that question: I would rather have the Government call for tenders to build the pipe line across Canada and the successful tenderer put up the money and operate it under the controls we have in Canada. If they would not do it and I were the Government, I would build it. There is your answer.

That is all I have to say. If any other honourable senators wish to ask questions, I will answer them.

I hope I will receive some support in the stand that I have taken. I hope that the people of Canada will arise and insist that this project shall be delayed until we have had a chance to thoroughly consider it, and that a thorough and proper investigation will be made before Canada is committed to spend such large sums of money for the benefit of American investors in our country.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: The Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) said he wanted to know how the Maritime senators would vote on this bill. I wish he would tell honourable senators how the Maritimers voted when, three or four years ago, the prairie farmers were given a handout of $65 million, and again this year, when there was a grant to them of another $32 million.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, I don't know. I know how I would have voted had I been a Maritimer: that is all I can say. But the honourable senator from Prince (Hon. Mr. Barbour) is mistaken in his assumption. Our prairie farmers were not given $65 million. The Government wheat agency made a contract with Great Britain on which we lost $600 million, and the people of Canada got their wheat and bread and fed themselves for about a hundred million dollars less than it would have cost them had they paid the world price at that time. However, on the honourable senator's question, I repeat that I would object strenuously were I expected to pay money to other interests if my own people had no corresponding benefits.

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris: Honourable senators, I fear I must tell the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) that I am somewhat disappointed in his speech. I thought yesterday, following his very reasonable approach to the subject, that today there would be a continuation of what seemed to me a sensible attitude. But when he tells us that there is only one issue in this matter, namely, whether Americans are to make a profit out of a line constructed with Canadian money, and in the next breath informs us that it does not look as though the project will return any profit for the next four or five years, I wonder how he can be consistent. As I understand his position, honourable senators, it resembles that of the early Puritans who, according to Macaulay's jibe at them, objected to bull fighting, not because of the pain it gave the bulls, but because of the pleasure it gave the spectators. What we here have to consider, and what the people of Canada should be considering, is, what benefits will Canadians receive from the early construction of this line? I shall return to that question a little later.

I have been much interested in the free advice which we senators have been receiving from what I suppose we may deem to be purely disinterested newspaper writers. We have been told that the Senate was created to protect minorities. I wonder whether it has occurred to these gentlemen that the Senate is also created to protect, if the occasion requires, the will of the majority as represented by its elected and appointed members of Parliament. We are told that we should have a "sober second look." Well, I believe that at least we are all sober; and my respectful suggestion is that it is the people of Canada who have been misinformed and ought to have a "second look"—

Hon. Mr. Bradette: Hear, hear, and how!

Hon. Mr. Farris: —rather than the senators of this country, who have been reading about and studying this question for at least the last month.

However, I do not propose to ignore entirely this gratuitous advice which we have received; and I have gone over in my mind some of the basic principles that relate to responsible government as we have it in Canada and to the constitutional functioning of Parliament.

I suggest that, divorcing ourselves entirely from the immediate present, we consider the development of our constitutional history; and I believe that honourable senators are as well informed on this subject as are some of these newspaper writers in the back rooms —we do not know who they are—with eyeshades over their eyes and cigarettes in their mouths. I assert that the first principle governing democracy in this country is majority rule.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Farris: That applies not only to the people at large, but to those who are either elected or appointed members of Parliament.

Sometimes majority rule does not prevail. We heard in times past about "gag" rule. I think we may also hear about "gab" rule. Neither is desirable. We fully understand that the second basic principle of democracy is freedom of speech and freedom of debate. But whenever there comes a time—and it has happened in the past—that a conflict arises between majority rule and the attempt to thwart that rule by filibuster, other considerations must be admitted. Many times the people of Canada and their representatives have had to consider and choose between these two conflicting factors. The result is that for a long time, both in Great Britain and here, the elected houses have protected themselves with the closure rule. In this house closure is not operative, and the reason, I take it, is that the Senate has never experienced a serious filibuster. I hope it never will.

I was a little concerned at one incident which occurred after the opening of the debate this morning. I attribute it, not to my honourable friend the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) but to the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett), who pulled his leader's elbow, or coat-tail, whereupon the Leader of the Opposition asked, "Would the Leader of the Government tell us what is in the bill?"

Well, with all deference to my honourable friends, that looked to me like a little bit of scenery. I was here when this bill was introduced in the House of Commons on May 14, nearly a month ago, and at that time I immediately acquired a copy of the bill from the distribution office. I have had it on my desk ever since. It is very difficult for me to believe that my honourable friend from Victoria and the Leader of the Opposition have not had a copy of the bill before them as long as I have. Both of these gentlemen are far too intelligent, after having copies of the bill in their possession for almost a month, to require the Leader of the Government to explain what the bill contains. But to the unsuspecting public it may appear that an explanation of the bill was not available to us until only two days before the deadline of its passage. I will not press this any further, but honourable senators can draw their own conclusions.

There has been a lot of talk about the Senate vindicating itself. Many editorials and newspaper articles have claimed that it is about time the Senate vindicated itself. Well, I do not think we are going to proceed on the principle of pleasing those who think we should be vindicated. I say to my honourable friend from Victoria that if he thinks the Senate needs vindication and that we can be vindicated by voting to destroy this bill, he should not have come to the Senate—especially if he did not have a better regard for the Senate than that.

Honourable senators, all this talk we hear about appealing to the Senate as the last bulwark of liberty reminds me of Rudyard Kipling's verse about the soldier:

> O it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that,
> An' "Kick him out, the brute!"
> But it's "How are you, Mr. Atkins?"
> When the guns begin to shoot.

Now, as a last resort we are asked to bring Mr. Atkins here and to do what could not be accomplished any place else, and defeat something which in my opinion represents the will of the great majority of the people of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Horner: There is a way to find that out.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Mr. Speaker, your ruling has not precluded me from following the warning of the familiar railway sign "Stop, Look and Listen". Whether I have stopped or not, I have done a lot of looking and listening and I have found no difficulty in coming to a conclusion as to how I ought to vote on this bill. His Honour the Speaker has given a ruling relating to reference to debates in the House of Commons. He might have read the next paragraph from the authority he quoted, which provides:

> It is perfectly regular, however, to refer to the official printed records of the other branch of the legislature, even though the document may not have been formally asked for and communicated to the house.

Therefore, I take it, Mr. Speaker, you would have no objection to my referring to records of the other house which indicate that this bill was introduced in that place on May 14. I think I might go so far as to say that this legislation has had the right of way there as far as the Government could provide to that effect, ever since. If any honourable member here says, "Well, they did not discuss it all the time" I would say that I of course am not supposed to know officially what they did in this debate. I keep in mind the story by Mark Twain of his Mississippi steamboat about which he said, "The boiler was so small and the whistle so big, that every time the whistle blew, the engine stopped."

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

The Hon. the Speaker: I would ask the honourable senator—

Hon. Mr. Farris: I am not going to make any application to that.

The Hon. the Speaker: —to be very careful not to evade the rules in any way, shape or form.

Hon. Mr. Farris: All right. I do hope you will not deprive yourself, Mr. Speaker, of the right to make any application you wish to that story.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I wish to come now to a short analysis and discussion of the merits of this bill itself. My honourable Leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) gave such a clear explanation of the bill that I feel somewhat embarrassed in repeating any of it, but there is so much misunderstanding abroad—and I am afraid the speech of the honourable leader opposite will contribute to that misunderstanding; and I say that in a most kindly way because we are good friends—that a little repetition will not do any harm.

There are two parts to this bill. One part relates to the construction of the northern Ontario section which runs north of Lake Superior. There is the second part that relates to the western line. These two separate parts of the bill should be considered in two ways. First, they should be considered separately, and then they should be considered as two parts of one unified line from Alberta to Montreal. I have in mind an illustration that I heard a member of the cabinet give. Incidentally, he gave it to me personnally, so if he gave it in the house too I cannot help that. We were discussing this whole question and he brought up a point about a garden hose. He said: "If you go around trying to water a garden with just a nozzle you will not have any success. You have got to have the nozzle attached to the hose and connected to the water supply." Now, in regard to a pipe line of this nature, to construct the northern Ontario section alone would be useless and worthless. To construct the western end alone would be of some benefit to the people of Winnipeg. However, such a benefit would probably not last very long, for I do not think there would be enough profit in it, particularly if what the Leader of the Opposition has told us is true—that none of the Winnipeg householders would ever change to gas. The whole thing would fizzle out. That is why I say that we must consider this bill in two distinct ways and analyze each part, and see if all this hysterical headline stuff that we have read about throwing our assets over to these avaricious Americans is correct.

Let us take this northern Ontario line. I hesitated to use the word "partnership" with Ontario in connection with it until I happened to read a recent speech of Mr. Frost in which he referred to it as a partnership between Ontario and the dominion Government.

Section 5 of the bill recites that the corporation is established for the purpose of constructing, operating and leasing, with an option to purchase the Northern Ontario section, to Trans-Canada, a pipe line from Manitoba to Kapuskasing.

Honourable senators, it is essential to get the full picture because while my friend the Leader of the Opposition may feel qualified to know more about Manitoba than does Premier Campbell, I doubt very much if he or any of his supporters can claim to know more about this question than Mr. Frost, the Premier of Ontario and the Treasurer of that province, Mr. Dana Porter—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Farris: —or anybody else in that Government. May I read into the record the bill which was introduced into the Ontario Legislature, and at the same time remind honourable senators that the bill was passed with the unanimous vote of Conservatives, Liberals and C.C.F.'ers in that house. The short title is given, and the bill goes on to say:

Whereas the transportation of natural gas from Alberta to central Canada is of vital necessity to support the energy, resources available for the continued industrial growth of Ontario—

Remember, this is the unanimous view of every member of the Ontario Legislature. Mr. Drew and his cohorts will not get much support or comfort from the Conservatives represented by the members and the voters in the province of Ontario. Of course, my friend will say, "Oh, they are all crazy about that—it wouldn't matter if they had to wait a year or even two years." In fact, I think he rather suggested that, "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth", and that it would be a good thing for them to wait for a couple of years.

The bill continues:

Therefore, Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Assembly of the province of Ontario, enacts as follows:

1. For the purpose of implementing the arrangements made or to be made—

The very language my honourable friend criticizes in this agreement, about "made or to be made".

—between the Government of Canada and the Government of Ontario to facilitate the construction of a connecting link through northern Ontario of a pipe line to transport natural gas from Alberta into central Ontario, the Treasurer of Ontario is hereby authorized to loan from time to time out of the consolidated revenue fund any sum of money, but not more than $35,000,000, to a corporation constituted or to be constituted—

If somebody in the Legislature fell down in the matter of good faith with the Government of Canada.

—on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada and having as a purpose the construction aforesaid.

Then the bill goes on to state the day that the act is to come into force.

Both Mr. Frost and Mr. Porter, together with other members of their cabinet, as well as others of the remaining parties, discussed this question, and in the end gave the measure unanimous support.

Honourable senators, whom are we going to accept as the best authority in circumstances like this? I do not think sufficient consideration has been given to the fact that it is a fine thing when two governments which are completely opposed to each other politically will drop their political animosities and controversies, and for the public good of Canada come together in an arrangement of this kind.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I think it is a tragedy that notwithstanding the unanimous voices of the Conservatives, Liberals and C.C.F.'ers in the Ontario Legislature, we now have an exhibition by Mr. Drew and Mr. Coldwell, as leaders of their two parties.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Order.

Hon. Mr. Farris: No. I am talking about the leaders of the two parties. I do not care where they have spoken. Their position has been taken as the leaders of the two parties in opposition in Canada against the unanimous judgment and wish of the people of Ontario, as represented by the Legislature of that province. I do not think I am trespassing, Mr. Speaker, when I say that.

So much for the Ontario branch of this line. This bill provides for the voting of a sum not to exceed $130 million to this crown corporation, to be reduced in due course by $35 million to be expended by the Ontario Government in partnership with the federal Government. What is there in the bill that could justify the statement of the Leader of the Opposition that there is only one issue here? Well, he can come down and oppose the Ontario Government, if there is an election, and say that the Ontario Government has betrayed the people of Ontario into the hands of these buccaneers and avaricious people down in the United States. His whole argument must point to that conclusion and none other. For the moment, therefore, I leave the Northern Ontario Pipe Line in the hands of the statesmen of the Parliament of Canada and of the Ontario Legislature, who have been big enough, courageous enough, and of large enough vision to say that this partnership is in the interest of the people of Canada. And Ontario happens to be a part of Canada. Those statesmen say, "We will undertake to build this line under those circumstances, with a provision in the bill that it is to be leased to Trans-Canada, with an option for it to take over at a price that will cover all the expenditures at a reasonable rate of interest."

I come now to the second part of the bill, which provides for a temporary loan, not to exceed $80 million, to Trans-Canada for the construction of the western branch of the line.

One would get the impression from some parts of my honourable friend's speech, and also from reading some newspapers, that this was a donation to these wicked Americans, and that they were going to walk off with it. My friends say they want an election. I am sure the reason they want an election quickly is that they have disseminated a false idea among a great number of the people of Canada, and want to get the election over before that false impression has been dissipated.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I often wonder about this unholy alliance between the C.C.F.'ers and the Conservatives. If I may be allowed to get slightly off the track for a minute, I would say that I think Mr. Coldwell is very wise in what he has done. He knows that a C.C.F. government can never get elected in Canada until there are hard times, and he has figured it out that the quickest way to get hard times is to support Mr. Drew.

Now let us be a little more serious. I was talking about this loan to the so-called "pet" of the Government, the Trans-Canada company. There is not a word of truth to support the statement that this company has been a "pet" of the Government. I say that this agreement is about as near a shotgun wedding as anything can be. I cannot find any information to support the suggestion that Trans-Canada wanted to get this loan on the terms that were imposed by Mr. Howe and by the Government. As far as I can learn, this loan was forced on Trans-Canada by Mr. Howe in a spirit of, I was about to say, aggravation; certainly it was in a spirit of determination. He said in effect: "You fellows tell me you have got everything—you have almost everything, except money. But you are not going to delay the construction of this line any longer, if I can help it. You are going to be given the money on a temporary loan for nine months on most drastic conditions of mortgage and charge." At least, they are the most drastic that I, as a lawyer, have ever seen. He further said: "The Government of Canada, through this crown corporation, may, at the end of nine months, if the money is not repaid or if the company defaults in the construction of the line, take everything the company has, lock, stock and barrel."

My honourable friend has given me details of what the company owns. But there is no question about it, the money has to be paid back with 5 per cent interest. I think one of the smartest things Clarence Howe ever did was when he engineered or negotiated that agreement. Read the contract for yourselves, honourable senators! Read the bill now before us.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Will the honourable gentleman permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The shareholders will get their money back?

Hon. Mr. Farris: I am talking about the people of Canada, the consumers, not about any stock market transaction. Apparently my friend tried to get in on some stock market gamble and he was not successful. I do not think that is the basic issue in this case. Rather, it is that the people of Canada are going to get their pipe line in the most expeditious way possible.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I would suggest that the honourable gentleman should either prove his last statement or take it back.

Hon. Mr. Farris: What statement?

Hon. Mr. Haig: That I was in the stock market and did not get my money back.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I thought you were pointing out that the stock market was an issue in this case.

Hon. Mr. Haig: No, not the stock market.

Hon. Mr. Farris: My friend was talking about the money that is going to be made by the holders of the shares in this company.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes, but I was not in the stock market.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I would not accuse my honourable friend of being a stock gambler, any more than the rest of us; we all like to buy stock sometimes and see it go up, but the trouble is it does not always go up. My friend should remember that, like himself, I am getting older, and he should not put me off the track in this way.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I apologize.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I think I can get back on the rails.

Let us look at this question, on either of the alternatives, in an ordinary debating way. Let us first consider what will happen if Trans-Canada repays this money next April. We will then have a pipe line built from Alberta to Winnipeg. Is that not a consummation devoutly to be wished? Surely, everybody wants to see that done. I challenge any member of this house to say that there is any other possible way in which the line can be constructed this year, except to have it done by Trans-Canada. I put the whole case right on that issue.

Hon. Mr. Horner: But the case has not been proven, because nobody else has been given an opportunity to build the pipe line.

Hon. Mr. Farris: My friend makes that statement. I say to him that it is not a question of opportunity. The question is who, at this time, opportunity or no opportunity, can construct the line this year?

Hon. Mr. Howard: Nobody.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I shall debate that point in a moment.

If Trans-Canada carries out its undertaking, the Dominion of Canada will receive back its $80 million with interest at 5 per cent, and a constructed pipe line. Where is the harm there? Where has the taxpayer been sacrificed, if that is done? I know of no harm being done by it; and I shall point out in a moment that this was the only possible and practical way to work out the problem at this time.

My friend may have a good argument on the political platform—I don't know whether I will ever be there again, because they do not seem to want older senators on the platform—to say that there has been a lack of diligence in the past. But that is not the issue before the Senate today. At the present time and under existing circumstances, is there any reasonable alternative to the construction of this pipe line? That is the issue.

Let us take the opposite view, and assume that in April of next year, after the $80 million has been advanced, that because of objections by the Federal Power Commission or for some other reason Trans-Canada is unable to repay that loan. What will happen then? Well, they cannot take the laid pipe line out of Canada, but the federal Government, under this bill, has the power to take over the constructed line—lock, stock and barrel. In those circumstances is the Government going to get its money's worth out of the $80 million loan? Would any honourable senator here seriously suggest that under public ownership or operation we could construct that line any more cheaply than is proposed by this organization which has trained men in that kind of work? I say we would then have the pipe line, plus.

In a long conversation I had with Mr. Howe he told me that he estimates the investment of Trans-Canada will be about $16 million. So what do we get if the company defaults? Are we throwing ourselves to the wolves? No! It looks to me as if the Canadians are the wolves in this case, and Trans-Canada is being thrown to the wolves, because if it defaults it will lose everything and we get the line.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: May I ask a question?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: My friend said a little earlier that this agreement had been forced on Trans-Canada by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Now, if Trans-Canada falls into default, would it be considered equitable under the circumstances for the Government to take over all of the assets—lock, stock and barrel, as he says—of Trans-Canada?

Hon. Mr. Farris: I would certainly say yes to that question. I would be interested to hear my honourable friend make such an argument before the courts on an equitable plea; I am sure he would make a good job of it, even though he is not a lawyer. I do not wish to single out Mr. Howe from the Government, as some Opposition newspapers have done, but if he were answering the question he would say: "I gave these men a full opportunity to go ahead and raise the money elsewhere. They did everything else to the exclusion of an opportunity being extended to anyone else; they made their deal with Alberta, they got their rights of way from that province, they got the markets, the pipe and all the engineering work that was done."

Mr. Howe in effect said, I only forced them into this position, because it was always common ground that they would do that work. When they pointed out that they did not have the money to do it, he replied: "All right, here is the money, get busy and build the line. And you will not take any of that money down to Tennessee or distribute it amongst your fellow Americans; you will utilize it to advantage by putting it into the pipe line, and when that is done you will have an option".

Well, if it was forced on them in a sense, at least they had a choice, and they elected to go ahead. I know my honourable friends who live in Winnipeg are anxious to get gas in that city.

What harm can be done by building the pipe line? We are talking now about the $80 million. We will get it back with 5 per cent interest; on that deal we will make a profit of 1.5 per cent, probably 2 per cent. We will get everything back, or in the alternative we will have the line.

These two companies have amalgamated, so the hose and nozzle will now work together. Some question has been asked about the small section of the line to be built between Winnipeg and the Ontario boundary. Well, honourable senators, these men who are putting their money into this thing are not children, they are not trifling with this undertaking. Do you think for one minute that many millions are going to be expended for construction of a portion of the line, only to cut the hose off at the nozzle?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Then they will be back for more money.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Perhaps if my honourable friend was in office they might get it.

If the Government is called upon to take over this section of the line next April, Mr. Howe, as the minister responsible, says in that event we will have to decide on the policy to be carried out to unify the line and to keep our bargain with Ontario. To do that we will have to come back to Parliament to have the policy ratified and completed. That is all there is to that. This proposition is not a blank cheque. If the time comes when we have to take over, Parliament will have to decide what is to be done ,and it may well be that at that time the Government will decide in favour of a publicly-owned line. I hope it will not. Personally I do not approve of it, but my voice does not count for much. Mr. Frost suggested, as an alternative, that he would have liked all the governments of Canada to come into this scheme. Well, do we see any signs of the other governments being willing to assume their share and to come into this scheme? Have we heard from any of them at all? I do not think that anything in that respect can be more eloquent than the letter from Mr. Manning, read by the leader. Mr. Manning has the reputation of being a pretty hard-headed and courageous businessman when he is not discussing social credit. Is there any suggestion from any quarter that the other provinces will join in this construction? I say no. But that is matter for the expression of the will of the people.

I was interested in a question which my honourable friend from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) asked the Leader of the Opposition, and in the sort of answer he got. I doubt if either of us is any wiser now than before he asked the question. My honourable friend laughs and I appreciate the joke with him. He is too astute to be caught that way. The Leader of the Conservative party has never gone to different parts of Ontario or to any other place that I know of and committed himself with respect to Government ownership. But a gentleman by the name of Fleming made a speech at a labour rally the other day in Toronto and said that the Conservative party was on the verge of going out for Government ownership. Well, after all the talk we have heard in the last five years, that is an interesting observation to make now, two or three days before the bill is to become law, that the party is "on the verge". One of the dictionary meanings of "on the verge", I note, is "to be on the edge, where one is in danger of falling in". The socialists and their leaders at some of the meetings held in various parts of Ontario and other places are almost hysterical about this iniquitous bill; and yet, honourable senators, it is the nearest thing to Government ownership that I know of.

If I were opposing this bill, that would be my ground of objection, that it comes too near, in certain possibilities, to forcing this Government into government ownership. But I do not believe that is going to happen. I cannot imagine that these men who are as smart or as astute as my honourable friend gives them credit for being would put their money into the scheme and take a chance of losing it, unless they see daylight as to how they are going to carry out the undertaking.

I do not believe, when they get right down to it and face the issue, that they will wait until the United States Federal Power Commission grants them permission to export gas to the United States at Emerson before they repay that money. There are enough opportunities in the ultimate returns from this business in Canada to justify them taking a few chances with their money.

Now, honourable senators, I have here a summary of some of the things Mr. Howe told me that he was faced with in handling this speedy construction. I also have some extensive notes supplementing what the Leader of the Government has said about the urgency of this work, and I have some newspaper quotations. It is very significant that, as late as June 2, the Honourable Dana Porter, reiterated in an interview the position of the Ontario Government; and not a word has been heard from any member of that Government in criticism of the method the dominion Government proposes to carry out in partnership with the province. Right in the thick of the fight, on June 2, when Opposition members were going to Toronto and posing as heroes on the strength of the "wonderful fight" they had made, Mr. Porter, with the sanction of Premier Frost, reiterated his Government's position as to the necessity of this line and justified its bargain with the dominion Government.

I have spoken longer than I intended. The discussion is taking up considerable time, but it is important and we should not hesitate to continue it so long as tomorrow's deadline under the agreement is met. I ask honourable senators to bear in mind that no other pipe line company could possibly construct this line this year. The Dominion Government could not do it, no matter what legislation is put through this Parliament. Every step that has been taken would have to be repeated, and there would not be one foot of pipe available for the work. Let us face realities.

I say, therefore, that there is urgency. The will of the popular, parliamentary assembly has been expressed. When the Honourable the Speaker advised us of the bill and the request from the other place that we give it support, that intimation amounted to a constitutional declaration by an elected body to this body—which is not an elected body—that the passage of the bill is in the interest of Canada. The request is backed up by all the Conservative provincial representatives, except the Drew sliver; by all the C.C.F.'ers, and by the Liberals of Ontario. It is supported by the Conservative member who writes for a Calgary newspaper on subjects connected with the oil business, and who is the best authority on the subject in the Conservative party. I commend his writings to all who are interested in the subject.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Do you mean Mr. Nickle?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Yes, I mean Mr. Nickle.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: You do not call him a Conservative at the present time, do you?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Well, my friends may want to read him out of their party. That would not astonish me. If a man is courageous enough to stand up and defy his party on an issue, when he thinks he is right, that may be ground for kicking him out of the party.

In conclusion, I want to say a word or two about the Right Honourable Clarence Howe. There is a Chinese statement that the most sticks and stones will always be found under the best apple tree. Mr. Howe—and, as Minister of Trade and Commerce, properly so—has been the spearhead of the movement to have this line constructed this year, under conditions which preserve the public interest; but in many newspapers of this country and other quarters he has been the target of what I think are very unjust attacks.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Farris: One paper even found fault with him for being American-born. Well, a man has no choice in where he is born, but he can choose where he will live. A century and a half or more ago four members of the Howe family crossed the Atlantic from England. Three of them settled in the United States and one came to Nova Scotia. The Nova Scotian was the ancestor of that great parliamentarian, Joseph Howe. Clarence Howe is a descendant of one of the other brothers. He received his early education in Massachusetts and at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Shortly after he attained his majority he elected to come to Halifax, and ever since he has devoted himself to the public welfare of this country in a manner excelled, in my opinion, by that of no other public man. This contract is one of his crowning achievements.

Joseph Howe, as well as being a statesman, wrote a good deal of poetry, some of which is quoted in his "Life" by the Honourable Mr. Longley. Joseph Howe gave vent to his imagination in the writing of poetry. Clarence Howe is gifted with an imagination greater than Joseph Howe ever had. It envisioned the building of a greater Canada. During the war period his genius was directed to the achievement of victory, and in the result it not only made the Liberal party stronger than it had ever been, but it contributed more to the promotion of the war effort and the welfare of Canada than the work of any other Canadian citizen.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I defy anyone to show that at any time or under any circumstances he has acted otherwise than in a spirit of honest endeavour to serve this country, of which he is such a distinguished citizen. So I close with the words of a rhyme written, not by Joseph Howe, but years ago by a Cornishman, in England. It ended thus:

> And shall Trelawny die,
> And shall Trelawny die,
> Here's twenty thousand Cornishmen
> Will know the reason why.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, I have listened, as we all have, with great interest to the speech made by my honourable friend from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris). He was in great form.

Hon. Mr. Farris: As young fellows always are!

Hon. Mr. Crerar: In fact, never have I seen him in such good form, and I have iistened to him on political platforms for over 40 years. But I am bound to say that his speech contained very little of the "sober second look" which, by tradition and the intention of the founders of our Constitution, this house is supposed to give to legislation.

This measure has aroused a great deal of interest and, unquestionably, a good deal of confusion. I am not for a moment going to discuss anything that occurred in the other end of this building. Our rules wisely provide that we cannot refer to debates in the House of Commons or discuss what took place there. Whatever views each of us may have as to the events that have taken place in that house, they are not, I repeat, a subject for debate in this chamber. I am bound to say that I am not quite so enthusiastic about this measure and the Government's part in it as is my honourable friend from Vancouver South. What is the situation? We have unquestionably a very important bill that was introduced here only this morning, and now this afternoon we are on the discussion on second reading. To do this we have had to suspend certain rules of this house. We are told that there is a deadline, tomorrow evening, by which this legislation must be passed. I wish to enter my protest against that—

Hon. Mr. Horner: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: —and I do so for this reason. It is making a complete nonentity of this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: How are we going to consider the implications of this measure in the time at our disposal? I am in favour of this project, but I say that the Government had no moral right to set a deadline. No Government should ever set a deadline on legislation that has to pass Parliament. It is because we are operating against this deadline that we must give hasty consideration to this measure. If ever there was a bill that should have gone to our Banking and Commerce Committee, it is this one.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: The frost will freeze the west in by next fall.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Let me refer now to an extremely important piece of legislation that came before Parliament ten years ago, the Foreign Exchange Control Bill. Honourable members will recall the debate that took place here on that measure, and will remember that there was much difference of opinion on it in this house. The bill was referred to committee, where witnesses were called and where thorough study was given to it, with the result that more than two score amendments were made to the legislation, and at least one section was thrown out entirely. Our amendments were all accepted by the Government. Now, does any one for a moment say that what the Senate did to the Foreign Exchange Control Bill was not a salutary thing? I deplore and regret that we have to work under a time table that prevents our giving to this bill an examination of the kind we were able to give to the Foreign Exchange Control Bill.

This is not a matter of recent days. It is a matter which has been under the consideration of the country and of the Government for at least two years. We know that for the last five months the Government has been giving consideration as to what could be done in getting this pipe line built, and it was only recently, within the last month, that any decision was reached, and hence we have this haste. Why did the Government not make up its mind earlier? I do wish to register my protest against this. I agree that Mr. Howe has rendered great service to this country, but what has that to do with this measure? The rights of Parliament are paramount rights in any matters that the Government may place before Parliament, and once we lose that sense of proportion, once we lose the understanding of the paramountcy of Parliament, then I do think we are treading on rather dangerous ground.

Everyone is agreed that there should be a pipe line and I think everyone is agreed that the line should be wholly a trans-Canada line. I am in complete favour of that. There was a time when I thought it might be more sensible to build part of the line through the easier territory south of the lakes, as they built the transcontinental oil pipe line, but I am now thoroughly convinced that the route proposed in the legislation for this gas pipe line is the best one. It will go through northern Ontario and service that country. There is no difference of opinion upon that. The whole difference of opinion has been on the method of doing it. Here I do part company absolutely with my friend the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) and some others, in their criticism that this is a proposition which will put money in the pockets of American capitalists.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: In my judgment that has no foundation at all. If that criticism had validity what would have happened to the development that has taken place in the province of Alberta? If we had not had American capital and—I dislike to use the word but it has now become almost common usage, American "knowhow"—the gas and oil would still be wrapped in the womb of the province under its prairies and its foothills.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Any developing country like Canada, where there are no accumulations of capital, should welcome capital and must always be prepared to give investment capital a fair return and a fair deal. On that angle of the question I think the criticism has been without any foundation at all, and I do not care where it comes from.

There is then the other proposition, which is that this line should be a publicly-owned one. I am not in favour of that. There are certain things where public ownership can be applied and applied successfully, but this gas pipe line through to eastern Canada, in my judgment, is not one of those things. Why? Well, let us assume that the federal Government had built the pipe line from Alberta through northern Ontario to Toronto and Montreal. The Government does not own a single cubic foot of the gas that would go through the pipe line, and it has to get that gas in Alberta. It is true that it might set up a servicing organization for consumers and make contracts with consumers for the sale of blocks of gas, but, lacking control of the raw material in Alberta, the position would be impossible. If that happened there would be the worst orgy, in my humble opinion, of political pressure and manoeuvering ever experienced in this country—and heaven knows we have had enough of it at times. Consequently, I am opposed to that. One of the reasons why I spoke so strongly as I did a little earlier about the delay of the Government in bringing this matter forward, and for not giving time for full consideration, was that I feared the danger of public ownership. I will make myself clear on that aspect a little later.

Trans-Canada Pipe Lines' history is worthy of a moment's study. The company is a combination of two other companies amalgamated two years ago for the purpose of building this line. There was no suggestion at that time that Trans-Canada might require any government assistance. The company had permits from the Alberta Government to export the necessary quantity of gas from Alberta across the boundary line into the other provinces. It set about making contracts for the sale of gas, but it had not arranged for its finances. It is common knowledge that the company intended to rely on its ability to export 200 million cubic feet of gas a day at Emerson, Manitoba, on a firm contract, and thus have a basis on which it hoped to be able to sell its securities to the life insurance companies and the public generally. Then a difficulty arose, because imports of gas into the United States must be sanctioned by the Federal Power Commission of that country. One of the promoters or backers of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines is the Tennessee Gas Transmission Company, which secures its gas in Texas, markets it mainly along the Atlantic seaboard states, and, I believe also in Pennsylvania and New York. It seemed clear it proposed to bring gas from Alberta through this pipe line, and export it through Emerson to the mid-western states. There it ran into conflict before the Federal Power Commission with the gas companies that were located in the region of Chicago. The question of how that issue will be finally resolved is very important, and I ask honourable senators to keep it in mind, for I shall say something about it a little later. If the Government had secured a contract from Trans-Canada Pipe Lines to build the prairie section to the Ontario boundary, as far as I was concerned I was wholly in favour of the Dominion and Ontario Governments combining their resources to build the northern Ontario section from the eastern boundary of Manitoba to Kapuskasing. But even when this Ontario section was assured to the company, Trans-Canada was still unable to finance the venture, for it had no assurance that it would be able to export gas to the United States and therefore had no basis for selling securities. Therefore a new situation arose.

There may be a difference of opinion as to how urgent the situation was. I am one who believes that the sky would not fall on western Canada or on Ontario if this pipe line is not built on the prairies this year. But the Government thought otherwise. As the honourable senator from Vancouver South stated—and it is on his authority that I say this—the Government forced this agreement on Trans-Canada and took from Trans-Canada agreements which, according to my honourable friend, were very drastic. I assure honourable senators they are drastic agreements, for I have read them. According to my honourable friend the Government tied up all the assets of Trans-Canada, and not only the assets of the company, but the shares of the individual shareholders.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Are they not allowed credit for the money they have put up.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I will come to that in a moment. This is the position. Now, Trans-Canada can get this 34-inch pipe, and when this bill goes through—and it will be through the day after tomorrow—the corporation will be set up and the money will be advanced to it, and the corporation will be able to loan up to $80 million to Trans-Canada to commence at once laying the pipe across the prairies to Winnipeg. There is no doubt that can take place. But the question that I think we should ask ourselves is this: What is the situation after Trans-Canada gets the pipe line through to Winnipeg? At the present time all that Trans-Canada will have when it get to Winnipeg is debt. The Government and the company may hope that before the end of the year the Federal Power Commission at Washington, after the presidential election is over, will grant the permit to the subsidiary in the United States of Trans-Canada pipe line. However, we have no assurance of that at all. If I were to ask the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), or any member of the Government, "Well what are you going to do, what are the plans, if the import permit is not granted in the United States and you cannot sell gas there?" what would be the answer?We do not know. It is true that the owners of Trans-Canada, including the shareholders, would be liable to very heavy penalty to the Government, under the agreements they have signed. It is true the Government can say, "All right, it is too bad for you, but you will lose $8 million at least, and perhaps $16 million."

Now, I just cannot see the Government doing that. That is why I asked my honourable friend from Vancouver South—and I disliked interrupting him, as I dislike interrupting anyone—what would happen in that contingency. According to his statement the Government has forced this contract on Trans-Canada. If the Government has forced this contract on Trans-Canada, and the company were to get into difficulty when it gets to Winnipeg and cannot go any farther, is it conceivable that the Government would step in and take all its assets? That is a question to which we should have some answer.

There is another question: If Trans-Canada cannot finance and build the line from Winnipeg eastwards, what happens to the agreement with Ontario? The only recourse would be for the backers of Trans-Canada, failing public financing, to put up sufficient of their own money to carry the proposition through, but so far we have no indication that they would do that.

Another supposition is that if the Government took over possession of the western end of the line it might be able to make an arrangement with some new company to complete the undertaking. These are all questions which are clouded with uncertainty. It seems to me, honourable senators, that they are points upon which we should have some information. Is it unreasonable to ask for it? I do not think so. If the Government has finally to complete this line as a public ownership proposition, Parliament will have to put into it anywhere from $375 million to $400 million, because I would expect that under these circumstances, were the federal authorities to finance the whole line, the Ontario agreement would go by the boards. We would then have it under all the disadvantages I mentioned earlier.

I think we should have information on these points. That is why I am critical of the Government in delaying the matter so long. It has been discussing it for months. Had this bill been introduced in Parliament say early in March of this year, there could have been ample time for fair discussion and the bill could have come to us and been considered in our Banking and Commerce Committee and an opportunity given to secure all this important data.

It is not the first time that a government has been dilatory. I was a member of a government for a good many years, and I know in many instances it was dilatory in certain actions. But on a matter of this importance it is most unwise to have a deadline fixed for the passage of the legislation. We can easily establish dangerous precedents. It is not sound practice, and in my humble judgment this house is not being treated with the consideration that is due it and we should say so. I do not like to see a measure such as this, which has aroused a great deal of controversy, put through under the spur of need in two days' time. It is regrettable that the Government did not have this legislation reach Parliament earlier so that we could give it the consideration it deserves.

I am not going to do much more than mention rights of Parliament in this matter. As members we are entitled to a full measure of consideration by any government, I care not what its party complexion may be. I am speaking of the rights of Parliament as a whole in the presentation of legislation. Why are we sent to Parliament, if it is not to debate and consider legislation that may come before us? After all, our parliamentary institutions are the greatest institutions we have in our land. If we look back over the years we will observe that we have reached a degree of perfection in our parliamentary institutions over a very difficult, rocky and sometimes bloody road in the past. And so I do say that Parliament, being the institution by which we govern ourselves and in which we protect the liberties of the subject, cannot lightly disregard its obligations.

After all, Mussolini 30 years or more ago became the dictator of Italy, but he did not usurp the powers of Parliament in doing so; the powers were conferred upon him by his legislature. Hitler, in his rise as a dictator, did not usurp the powers of the German Reichstag; in 1933 that body voted absolute power to Hitler, and never recaptured it. So, Parliament, in a free and democratic country, must always be careful in its insistence that at all times it be treated by whatever government may be in power, with the consideration to which it is entitled. I voice this criticism simply because I believe that we should have had this legislation before Parliament at a much earlier date than we received it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Mr. Speaker, and honourable senators, may I suggest that we now call it six o'clock, adjourn at this time and reassemble at eight o'clock.

Some Hon. Senators: No. Go ahead.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it the pleasure of the house that I see it is six o'clock?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I believe the rules of the house provide that when the house rises at six o'clock it shall stand adjourned until 7.30. My suggestion is that we should continue to sit until six o'clock, and then adjourn until eight o'clock.

Hon. John T. Hackett: Had I caught the Speaker's eye, honourable senators, a little earlier in the afternoon, I would have endeavoured to continue the theme I was pursuing yesterday when it was intimated to me that I might desist from reference to people and events in another arena. My friend the senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) has made reference to the Right Honourable Mr. Howe. I should like to add just a few words with respect to that gentleman. He is a great executive, a great public servant; I know that he has said many things in Parliament concerning the legislation which confronts us, and I do not wish to imply by the excerpts from the Commons Hansard which I intend to read that they are the only things he said. It is not my wish to attempt any special pleading. On May 28 the Right Honourable gentleman said, as reported at page 4405 of the Commons Hansard:

> Now, why are we pressing on; why are we pressing this? Well, I do not know; perhaps I get over-enthusiastic about a project. I have been working on sizeable projects all my life, and somehow I reach a point in the development when I think a project is important; and if it is a serious enough project I begin to think it is the most important thing in the world and it does seem to me it is important that we do not lose a year in undertaking this pipe line.

I think that that is a candid statement of the point of view of the man. I agree with it. I have sat with the Right Honourable gentleman for some years in another arena and I have seen him both at work and at play, but I must say that in admitting his great abilities and services I do believe that he is a dangerous man in that he feels that anything that gets in his way should be removed, should be pulled up by the roots and cast aside. It is that characteristic, I believe, that has caused us to find ourselves discussing this measure in these circumstances at this time.

This legislation was not an avowed policy of the Government, it was not in the Speech from the Throne. It has come, as they say in a neighbouring province, comme un cheveu sur la soupe, which means it has come without very much anticipation or admonition. I will say to the leader of the house, if the expression be parliamentary, that, having been spanked rather mildly by the honourable senator from Vancouver South for making a few remarks on the first reading of the bill, if it is any solace to his aching parts, I joined him in the spanking. I did not think that it was a very serious offence to mention to my own leader something that he told me that he intended to do and that seemed to have escaped his attention at a pertinent moment, while he was engaged in conversation.

Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government gave us information which, as my honourable friend well knows, is usually sought when a bill is given first reading in another place. It is an introductory aperçu of the whole matter at issue, and I found the references and the statements made by the leader helpful. One of the unfortunate characteristics of this legislation is a total absence of information. Information has not been made available. It is true that the honourable senator from Vancouver South has imparted to us some of his recollections of conversations, undated and untimed, with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he has told us some things we did not know before and that we would like the opportunity of investigating a little further, not because we doubt the accuracy of the statements of the honourable gentleman but because some of us have a craving for information, especially with regard to this particular bill. I understood from the leader this morning that the amount which would probably be involved if the Government pursued this undertaking would be something like $375 million for the pipe line alone.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That would be the cost of the pipe line. The amount proposed to be provided for the building of the northern Ontario section is $130 million, one-third of which, up to $35 million, will be paid by the Government of Ontario. It is expected that the western section will cost somewhere between $80 million and $90 million, and 90 per cent of that amount, but not in excess of $80 million, will be loaned to the company by the dominion Government.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But not exceeding $35 million for Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes. Ontario will contribute one-third of $130 million, but not exceeding $35 million.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I am grateful for the gracious way in which the leader has implemented my information. I also understood that further amounts would have to be expended —$1 billion was mentioned as being the cost of distributing lines and other facilities incidental to making the gas useful to the population.

It seems to me that at the beginning of the consideration of this legislation we should recall that we are a very heavily-indebted nation, and that the tax burden upon everyone, from the lowliest worker and the smallest earner to people of greater incomes, is crushing. I am going to submit that it is not in the interests of Canada as a whole to engage upon a venture of the proportions of the one we are discussing until it has been proved beyond a doubt that there is urgent need of it and that Canada has the ability to pay for it. For the moment we are engaged in an enterprise the exact proportions of which have not yet been determined; I refer to the St. Lawrence waterway. That is a great national undertaking; it has been under discussion for many years, and is being proceeded with at very heavy cost—hundreds of millions—much of which will fall upon the Canadian taxpayers. I think also we should ponder our experience in relation to other great enterprises. There was the transcontinental project of the Canadian Pacific Railway which, as all honourable senators know, was under debate for ten to fifteen years. Also the great enterprise which was advocated by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in 1904, was under discussion for many years. A similar or a rival undertaking came along at a later date and caused much havoc and loss, although in the fulness of time the losses were absorbed and the northern half of the continent has been endowed with a useful, though very expensive, railway system.

At the present time what seems most worthy of every consideration is whether this pipe line which has sprung up, in so far as Parliament is concerned, almost overnight, should be entered upon without a mature and full examination of all facts. I submit that members of this Senate, members of the other place and the people at large, should know more about the facts. It is true that letters have been read by the Leader of the House from the Prime Minister of the province which is so richly endowed with this new-found wealth, and other communications from each of two ministers in the province of Ontario. To what extent their appraisal of the situation can be depended upon is still open to debate. I think honourable senators who read the newspapers will have noted that, almost immediately after it was known that Ontario had offered to engage in this project, representatives of the great Hydro-Electric Power Commission stated that Ontario was in no immediate need of this gas, that gas was too expensive, and said quite unequivocally that sufficient hydro-electric power for the needs of the province until 1960 is available; and this, I understand, without taking into consideration the added hydro-electric power which will flow from the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway and the building of the dams along that great waterway in the course of deepening and harnessing it.

All these are questions which should be very closely examined, and it is not possible to do so within the time at the disposal of the house before tomorrow, June 7, the so-called deadline. Witnesses cannot be brought to give the required information; and the proof of urgent need has not been established.

Of course, if war were to come we would meet all the requirements that might be exacted from us. But it has not been proved that this pipe line is an overall project which affects deeply the whole people, and I suggest that the very meagre information that has been placed before Parliament with respect to the bill is hardly enough upon which to reach a decision.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Would the honourable senator permit me to interrupt to ask a question? Does he suggest that this house should conduct an inquiry as to whether the unanimously expressed wish of the Legislature of Ontario is true or false?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: My honourable friend has asked me if I think an inquiry should be held as to whether the legislators of Ontario should be polled one by one. I do not think that, but I do believe the members of the Legislature of Ontario, like the members of this honourable house, are not all skilled or completely informed as to the requirements of their province. I think we should approach this great undertaking in a businesslike way, in a way that my honourable friend from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) would advise for his clients. We should summon the people who know, and find out what the requirements are and what the cost will be, and why this cannot be entered upon by the businessmen of Canada. Why has it been necessary to fall back on the taxpayer, be he big or small?

The Hon. the Speaker: It being 6 o'clock I now leave the chair. The house will resume at the call of the bell, at 8 o'clock.

The Senate adjourned until 8 p.m.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Honourable senators, we have been told in an indirect way that the Government has been thrown into this enterprise because Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited was unable to fulfil its undertaking. If I correctly understood the honourable member from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris), the Government more or less took Trans-Canada by the neck and shook it into this proposition. We have been told per contra, but at the same time, that Trans-Canada did not carry out its undertaking because money was not available.

Some reference was made to higher interest rates and to a central bank. I suppose that the Bank of Canada was meant. Something was said too about the Federal Reserve Bank in the United States. I have not chatted with Mr. Howe, but I think it has been intimated that it was a little difficult to get money from these institutions, including the Chase National Bank of New York. I doubt the accuracy of this information. I doubt it for these very good reasons: It is true that the prevailing interest rate is higher than it was. It is true that banks and lending companies are seeking higher interest on the moneys they lend than they sought a year ago. But I have yet to learn that money is not available. Money is being offered here at home by big investors. We have here on the doorstep of Parliament in this capital city an insurance company which seeks to place its funds so that it may carry out its undertaking with its policy holders and its shareholders. For instance, there is the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, with its head office in New York and its Canadian head office in Ottawa. Then there is the Prudential Life Insurance Company, and the Sun Life Insurance Company. These companies receive hundreds of thousands of dollars a day which they are ready to invest and which they seek to invest. If I am correctly informed, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company has a subdivision of its investing department which devotes its time to assessing the value of securities issued by pipe line companies which are seeking moneys to carry out their enterprises.

Money is available. Those of us who from time to time take a glance at the newspapers know that the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission filled its coffers the other day with abundant funds, although it is true it had to pay a higher interest rate than would have been exacted a year ago. I could go on and cite other enterprises which are finding money. Money is not scarce. But lenders and investors, in the first place, have to determine that the money or funds which have been entrusted to them are placed in sound undertakings which give a promise of return, and to have the assurance that there will be no loss. I am informed that the three great insurance companies that I have mentioned and the Chase Bank have declined loans to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines because the enterprise itself was not considered sound and that the refusal had nothing to do with the interest rate. The reason this enterprise is not considered sound appears to be that within Canada there is not a sufficient demand for the consumption of the product, and until access can be found to broader markets this enterprise will be neither solid or sound. When is this Trans-Canada pipe line to obtain entry into the markets of the United States? When is it going to find a way into the United States, where it is said there are demands for gas?

Perhaps honourable senators will permit me to enumerate some of the obstacles that have come in the way of the Trans-Canada pipe line apart from the profound belief of investors that it cannot repay the capital and cannot pay interest on money borrowed until it gets into the United States and until it is granted franchises there which will enable it to sell its commodities. Among the obstacles it has to encounter is the law of the United States and the opposition that has been raised under the law of that country by competitors that are carrying on business and are striving to retain their own position in United States markets. If I correctly understand the position, it is the fundamental unsoundness, the fundamental weakness of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, its inability to overcome its obstacles and difficulties, that have induced our benevolent Government to dip its hand deep into the pockets of the small taxpayer to advance the money that could not be borrowed elsewhere.

Honourable senators, here are the difficulties that confront Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. It is owned or controlled to a certain extent by Tennessee Gas Transmission and its affiliate, Midwestern Pipe Line. Carrying on business outside of Canada, Midwestern seeks to tap the Trans-Canada gas at Emerson on the boundary of Manitoba and an adjacent state, and carry it to Portland, in Tennessee. In order to reach its destination and do business on the way this company must traverse the territory that has been allotted to several pipe line companies in the United States by the Federal Power Commission of the United States, whose head office and seat of business is in Washington, D.C. The Federal Power Commission was set up to create monopolies in areas allotted to certain power companies best suited to serve customers within a given area. Companies so licensed have a peremptory right—above everyone else—to sell their gas within that area, at rates and under conditions under the control of the Federal Power Commission. To get from Emerson to Portland, Tennessee, Midwestern has to invade the territory allotted to Northern Natural Gas Company, which serves the city of Minneapolis, the city of St. Paul, and the surrounding area; through territory allotted to People's Light and Coke Company, having its head office in Chicago, and said to be one of the greatest utilities in the world, and the territory of Detroit Consolidated Company and affiliate. The companies resist any invasion of their territory.

When a hearing comes on before the Federal Power Commission, representatives of all the power companies assemble at Washington. They are represented by experienced counsel. It seems that the Trans-Canada line, represented by Midwestern, was before that commission for some time—from February until April of this year—when an adjournment took place to enable interested parties to present briefs and prepare for argument. I understand that the rivalries are so keen, the conditions so multiple, the variations so frequent, that determination of a claim before that board is of long duration. And so, when Canadian gas will be permitted to enter the restricted zones of these competing and powerful companies in the United States seems to be a remote and uncertain date.

If this is all true—and there has been no information made available to contradict it—where is Trans-Canada going to find the money to pay back to the crown corporation on April 3 next an amount of $80 million? And where will it find the additional amount necessary to pay the interest thereon and build from Winnipeg to the eastern boundary of Manitoba? I do not know the answer to these questions, but it would seem to me, in view of the difficulties which confront Trans-Canada, that it will be as unable to lay its hands on amounts necessary to repay the crown corporation as it was to carry out the undertaking which it so proudly stated some five years ago it could carry out—namely, that it could build the pipe line from the far west in the province of Alberta to the east in the province of Quebec, as a private enterprise without any governmental assistance. That is a question which may be cleared up in a satisfactory way, but in the interval the answer has not been made very clear to the Senate or to that remote place which we must not mention.

To return to the Federal Power Commission: there is also in support of the statements which I have made a judgment which I offer to honourable senators as a final statement of the law bearing upon the kind of conflict in the United States which emerges occasionally and very tardily from the Federal Power Commission. The Supreme Court of the United States has made a finding in what is called the Panhandle Eastern Corporation case, involving a pipe line company coming up from Texas to serve Detroit and sell off-season gas to southwestern Ontario, and attempting to sell bulk gas to the Ford Motor Car Company in the vicinity of Detroit. The Michigan Public Service Commission refused the admission of the gas, and after many years of conflict the finding of that commission, supported in a way, indirectly by the Federal Power Commission of the United States, found support and final adjudication in the Supreme Court of the United States in what is known as the "Panhandle case".

There is another aspect of this question which seems to me entirely unsatisfactory, and on which we have no information. It is true that letters have been read by the Leader of the Opposition. One honourable senator has referred to a conversation more or less private with another honourable gentleman who is probably very well informed on some of these matters. But there never has been a full statement, nor has there been information such as one elicits in the trial of a case, or such as one expects from Parliament when it is dealing with a matter of such importance as that now before the honourable Senate. The attitude is difficult to understand. One would have thought that when efforts were made to bring the evidence into the open that it would not have been resisted, but it was.

When, as I said a moment ago, these questions go before the Federal Power Commission, the representatives of the companies and their counsel flock to that centre. This case of the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company has been before the Board of Transport Commissioners of Canada on a number of occasions, and yet there is nothing available to show why its licences were extended or its rates approved. We are in complete darkness concerning these matters.

Such information as is available comes to us from the Federal Power Commission of the United States where Trans-Canada, endeavouring to obtain admission to the United States market, has had to give rather full information, information as to contracts, rates, and information, I assume—this I do not know—as to financial capacity, yet it is only on such information as can be derived from sources in the United States that we can depend. It may be a very good source, but it is not a source which flows abundantly, it is not a source which has been open, to this house or to any honourable senator. Despite all that, we are asked to embark on this enterprise with closed eyes and without information. A Canadian statute known as the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act precludes the export of electricity or gas and some other commodities at prices less than they are sold at in Canada. Nevertheless, a study of a schedule secured from the Federal Power Commission of Washington shows that the Tennessee Gas Transmission Company proposes to pay for Canadian gas at Niagara Falls, in the United States, at a lower price than Trans-Canada sells gas to the Union Gas Company at Chatham, Ontario.

Now, honourable senators, to bring my submission to a close: Is this undertaking one which is beneficial to Canada? Is it a proper enterprise in which to engage? We have the fact that a legislature passed a bill in a hurry—

Hon. Mr. Bradette: It was not passed in a hurry.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Is the honourable gentleman a member of the legislature in question?

Hon. Mr. Bradette: No, but I am an Ontarian, and I know that it was thoroughly discussed in the Ontario Legislature.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Probably the honourable gentleman will be glad to make available to the house, and in a hurry, the information that was placed before that Legislature to induce it to enter upon this agreement that has been entered into and which it will be only called upon to carry out if some rather nebulous conditions are fulfilled.

There is one more point I wish to discuss. I had awaited the return to the house of the honourable gentleman from Vancouver South. He made some reference to the fact of majority rule. I do not think anybody doubts that majorities should rule and that majorities do rule, but there is another axiom which plays some part in Canadian life and it is called "the rules of the game". Most people understand what that means, and in dire circumstances, in trying circumstances, those rules should be respected and must be respected if democracy is to persist in Parliament and if in our chamber we are going to maintain the high standard which we wish to maintain here. I submit with great deference that it is well that we have full information before we enter upon an enterprise so uncertain, so free from information, so devoid of general knowledge as the one which is now before this house. The rules of the game exact such information.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, in rising to take part in this debate may I say first of all that in my 26 years in Parliament never have I seen as much interest being taken in a bill as has been taken in the present pipe line bill, both in Parliament and throughout the country. I am frank to admit that the issue has been somewhat confused. When the bill was introduced I did accept with some misgivings the statement that the bill handed out $80 million to United States millionaires. I am of the opinion, however, that the press cannot be altogether exonerated from the charge that it contributed to the confusion which is in the minds of many people, when all they think of is that sentence I have just uttered. Only tonight, if you will look at the Ottawa Citizen you will see an exact exemplification of what I am trying to bring to the attention of honourable senators. You will read there "Gas bill passed the Upper House in six minutes."

Now, honourable senators, every ordinary citizen reading that would say: "So that is how the Senate acts. In six minutes it has passed the bill that has taken three or four weeks' time in the House of Commons". I ask the press, and the Ottawa Citizen in particular, is that fair, is it honest?

Hon. Mr. Bradette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Reid: When all we did in this house was to give the bill first reading, which was agreed to unanimously, and when we were given assurance by the leader of the Senate that ample time would be allowed for debate, that no limit would be put on the speeches in criticism of the bill, I say, honourable senators, that it is hardly fair, to print and publish such a heading. A great deal of the responsibility for the confusion rests on the press.

To confirm the statement that there is in this country a group of citizens who owe allegiance to Soviet Russia rather than to Canada, and at every opportunity are endeavouring to promote friction between Canada and the United States, I may say that some time ago a leader of a communist group in the city of Vancouver made this statement:

> Soviet leaders know that Canada will become a dependency of the United States if it lets Yankee millionaires build this Trans-Canada pipe line.

Hon. Mr. Horner: He was not so far wrong.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Statements of that kind are made, in my opinion, for the sole purpose of creating discord between this country and the United States. There was a similar occurrence only two years ago when a treaty having to do with the North Pacific coast fisheries was entered into between Japan, the United States and Canada. Members of the Fishermen's Union in British Columbia put on a terrific barrage of criticism to the effect that it was wrong for us to be allied with the United States in protecting the fisheries.

I notice that some honourable senators, on both sides of politics, are inclined to adopt a rather more partisan attitude to legislation than I have done since I came here. I am not going to offer any apologies for the attitude I have taken since I entered public life. It has been my endeavour to fight the battles of the people, and for that purpose to try to see things fairly and clearly. I confess that I was grieved when closure was applied in the other place. I sat there in 1932, and when in that year it was proposed by the Conservative Government to apply closure, I made five speeches against it. So, having joined in and supported all the thundering speeches which were made against that proceeding, I find it difficult to agree that it is all right to use closure now. I hope honourable senators will bear with me in the confession that I cannot readily change my opinions on this matter merely to suit the party with which I happen to be associated.

When first I read the bill I had a good deal of misgiving about it, but after listening to all the information which has been recorded in Hansard, including the statements made on behalf of the Government, I will concede that I found more good in the bill than I thought there was at first. But what I do fear—and it is a genuine apprehension—is that the Government may be drawn into the pipe line business. Personally I would deprecate government operation of this service. I am still a Liberal. I do not believe at all in having governments run businesses of this kind. I was well pleased when the Minister of Trade and Commerce admitted, even at this late date, that Trans-Canada Air Lines under private ownership would have done a better job. Some of us endeavoured years ago to tell him that very thing. The Government to my mind has become involved in too many business operations. If it does not apply the throttle to the C.B.C., that organization will ruin this country. Before long it will be demanding a hundred million dollars to be expended, seemingly, with little or no public or governmental control.

The honourable senator from Vancouver South made one observation with which I am in hearty agreement. He said that this bill had been before him for some considerable time, so naturally he was well informed as to its contents. I mention this because, while it is not mandatory on members of this house to read what is going on in the other place, I have taken the attitude that no senator can properly carry out his duties unless he keeps abreast of the legislation before the House of Commons, and follows the discussions, before it comes to this chamber. There is a wrong impression, fostered perhaps both by the press and by others, that the Senate does not give the "second look" at federal legislation. I challenge any honourable senator to rise in his place this evening and admit that he does not know anything about the pipe line bill. Goodness knows the discussion has been going on for three weeks or more.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Four weeks.

Hon. Mr. Reid: If any honourable senator has not read the record in Hansard and the statements in the press concerning this bill he is derelict in his duty.

Speaking personally, when legislation is proceeding in the House of Commons it is my practice, and I know it is that of many other honourable senators who take a real interest in the business of the Senate, to read what is going on in the other place. We inform ourselves, in respect of any particular bill, of the statement of the minister responsible for it, and the criticisms of the opposition, so that when the measure comes before us we are in a first-rate position to know what it is all about and to either accept or reject it. Yet the opinion is widely expressed that in this house only half an hour or half a day is spent in dealing with some important bill, and that it is rushed through without adequate consideration. I think it is time that the facts were made known, both to the country and to the press, and in saying so I am sure I voice the sentiments and the attitude of the majority of my colleagues.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Just when was this before a committee? When was anybody called before a committee to answer questions?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Is the honourable gentleman speaking about this bill?

Hon. Mr. Horner: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Reid: The honourable member has only to wait a few minutes, and we shall go into committee. That is a course I have always advocated. I have protested against the sending of bills to a committee sitting in another room.

Hon. Mr. Horner: What opportunity will there be to call witnesses?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Witnesses will be present. Surely the honourable senator does not admit ignorance of this bill?

Hon. Mr. Horner: No, I do not.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. The honourable senator who is speaking has the floor.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I did not suppose that the honourable senator did not know what it was about.

On one occasion the Leader of the Opposition chastised the Leader of the Government for closing down on a Thursday night and "leaving us with nothing to do" until the following Tuesday.

Perhaps I am speaking just from personal experience, although I do not think so, when I say that we are busy all the time.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Reid: And so are most honourable members. It is a wrong impression that the press gives the country that when the Senate adjourns on Thursday its members have nothing more to do. Oh, I know that some honourable members go to their homes in Ontario and Quebec and perhaps they are learning things there, but the rest of us who stay around can be found reading Hansard, and so on, so that we will be better able to carry out our duties in this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Horner: They all can't play the bagpipes.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, order. One speech at a time.

Hon. Mr. Reid: If you don't like them, that's not my fault.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Some of the rest of us do.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Perhaps my honourable friend does not like good music. At least I don't spend my time playing bridge.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Reid: That brings silence from my honourable friend.

There are many questions which I am sure honourable senators would like to ask in committee. I am particularly interested in some of the sections of the agreements. I do not know how many here have looked them over but I have, and I noticed that members of the House of Commons are debarred from holding shares or getting any benefit arising from the agreement, while members of the Senate are not.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Now, if any member of Parliament should be debarred in this way it should be members of the Senate. I do not say this in a carping sense, but if honourable senators hold shares or directorships in companies they should not speak or vote here on bills involving those companies. I have never had occasion to make this comment before but I make it now in a kindly way and not in a manner of carping criticism. When we get into Committee of the Whole I would like to find out why members of the House of Commons have been debarred from holding shares under this agreement while members of the Senate are not. I should have thought that such a regulation should apply equally to all members of Parliament.

I think that the letter of the Honourable Dana Porter, Premier of Ontario, which was read this afternoon by the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) is rather intriguing. I should like to refer to just one part of it:

> The conditions upon which we agreed to lend money to such a corporation, to the limit of $35 million, were as follows: . . .

And clause 2 reads:

> That we should not be called upon to advance money under commitment until you were able to assure us that all other portions of the entire Trans-Canada line from Alberta to Quebec would be completed and operated.

Honourable senators, I say when we get into committee we should have an explanation about this, for I am wondering if that provision would allow the Province of Ontario to get out from under its obligation of $35 million if the line is not completed and operating to Montreal, Quebec. To my way of thinking that is a very important matter.

The financial success of the venture seems to depend on a decision of the United States Federal Power Commission. This raises a question in my mind, for the line from Winnipeg to Emerson is specifically left out of the agreement. I think it will take some explaining why they have apparently left out all pipe lines heading to the south in Manitoba, including the line from Winnipeg to Emerson. It is difficult for me to understand why this should enter into the agreement as one of the defaults of the company. In other words, if they are going to put in the line from Alberta to Winnipeg on the basis of this $80 million loan, what then has the line to Emerson to do with it when it is omitted entirely from the agreement? I could quote the clause from the agreement, but I would rather leave it until the committee stage. I am just forewarning the Leader of the Government as to what he might expect when we get in committee.

Honourable senators, I have my doubts that the Government would ever take over this scheme. I hope they never will. I cannot see any government taking over all the shares belonging to the company without any recompense. It has never been done by governments. Oh, there was some trouble when the Grand Trunk Pacific took over a defunct railway and confiscated its shares. The controversy and criticism over that lasted for a number of years. But I cannot see any Government of Canada deliberately taking over shares to the extent of some $15 million without making recompense. I hope the line will become a success and things will never reach that stage. If the Government ever enters the pipe line business it will be a long time getting out of it, for it is my experience that once the Government enters into a business it seldom lets go. I am opposed to the Government going into business. Perhaps I am one of those old-time Liberals who find it difficult to change, and so view with alarm the socialistic tendencies that are creeping over this country.

I understand there are quite a number of senators who would like to speak so I will leave the remainder of my remarks until we get into Committee of the Whole.

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches we have heard on this bill. Like the honourable gentleman from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid), when this bill was introduced in the other place I started to look around for a copy of it and I eventually secured one. I thought it was the custom to distribute or mail a copy of each of these bills to the members of the Senate prior to their being introduced in this chamber, but this was not done here. So I made a trip to the distribution office at the other end of the building and obtained a copy. I read it, of course, with very keen interest and I discovered references to a loan agreement. So I started to look around to see if I could find the agreement and I discovered there were two, one a loan agreement with Trans-Canada and the other with the shareholders. Naturally I expected that these agreements would be attached as part of the bill and would become law if and when the bill was enacted. However, the bill merely refers to them. In order to understand the deal fully it is necessary to know what these agreements contain, and I intend to spend a few minutes in dealing with them. Both agreements are dated May 8, 1956. The first one is the loan agreement, consisting of eight pages. The second is the agreement with the shareholders, consisting of six pages, and the information contained therein is very interesting indeed.

Honourable senators, the first agreement, dated May 8, 1956, is between Her Majesty The Queen, represented by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the party of the first part, and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, the party of the second part. The preamble refers to another agreement dated November 21, 1955, as amended April 26, 1956. I have been unable to find those two agreements and do not know what they contain. May I suggest that the Leader of the Government

(Hon. Mr. Macdonald) have this information available when the matter comes up in committee?

I will read the second paragraph of the preamble, because of the statement made by the honourable senator from Vancouver-South (Hon. Mr. Farris). It reads as follows:

> And whereas, although it has not yet been able to arrange for financing of its complete construction program, Trans-Canada has, in addition to options to acquire rights-of-way for the major portion of the all-Canadian pipe line, an option to purchase 34-inch diameter pipe sufficient to build the western section of the all-Canadian pipe line, which pipe is scheduled for delivery in 1956;

That is all the agreement says concerning the fact that the company needs money. I cannot find one word in the agreement to the effect—as the honourable senator from Vancouver-South stated— that the loan was forced on Trans-Canada.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Would my honourable friend permit a question? Can he suggest any reason why a company like Trans-Canada would enter into this kind of a borrowing agreement unless it needed the money?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Well, it would not have entered into the agreement if it had not needed the money to finance the undertaking.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I say the agreement does not say that.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It does not need to.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: And if my honourable friend from Vancouver-South had read the agreement I doubt if he would have made the statement that the company was forced into this position.

The third paragraph of the preamble states that it is in the public interest to complete the western section of this line this year.

The agreement goes on to set out the terms, that the company agrees, if notified by June 7 that a loan of 90 per cent of the cost required to complete the western division from Alberta to Winnipeg, 575 miles, is granted, to do the work by December 31, 1956, and to construct a line with a diameter of at least 34-inches.

In paragraph 2 the Government agrees to recommend to Parliament that loans be authorized to be made to Trans-Canada.

Paragraph 3 describes the route and the form of construction.

Paragraph 4 provides for the hypothecation of all the assets of the company as a security for the line—all the shares, all the contracts, all the options, and the whole line of the company. That is as it should be.

Paragraph 5, which is important, provides that on default the crown company shall take immediate control and possession of the line from Alberta to Winnipeg.

Paragraph 6 makes provision in case the company defaults or fails to pay the money with interest and costs, that is the costs of arranging for the loan, by April 2, 1957, or fails to diligently carry out the construction or fails to complete the work by December 31, or otherwise defaults. The first part of the paragraph reads:

> 6. Trans-Canada shall be in default hereunder, subject to any delay as may be occasioned by force majeure (defined to mean acts of God, strikes, lockouts or other labour or industrial disturbances, civil disturbances, arrests and restraints from rulers and people, interruptions by government or court orders, future valid orders of any regulatory body having jurisdiction, acts of the public enemy, wars, riots, sabotage, blockades, embargoes, insurrections, failure, or inability to secure materials or labour by reason of priority or similar regulations or orders of the government, epidemics, landslides, lightning, earthquakes, fires, storms, floods, washouts or explosions, provided that such event shall be beyond the reasonable control of the party concerned and not due to its fault or negligence, but not to include any orders, rulings or actions, or absence thereof, by the Federal Power Commission of the United States of America, the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada or the Petroleum and Natural Gas Conservation Board of Alberta or tribunals having similar jurisdiction) if it fails:

That is the clause to which I have objection. It seems to me there are many loopholes. For instance, the company may not complete its work in time, or use as an excuse some of those matters to which I have just referred, and then be obliged to go to court, and there might be long litigation over it. Moreover, the agreement does not contain any clause, such as is usually inserted in an agreement of this kind, to the effect that "time is of the essence of the agreement."

Hon. Mr. Farris: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question? Are not those exceptions normal ones in a contract?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think they are normal in contracts that the Government makes with contractors who are doing work for them, but it seems to me that they give the pipe line a great deal of leeway and a chance for subsequent and future litigation which might last for a whole year.

Hon. Mr. Farris: How would my honourable friend correct it?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Well, I would have left the exceptions out.

Honourable senators, I was referring to the time element. This agreement states that the company will start to work on the job and complete it by the 31st day of December. Now, if time is not of the essence of an agreement, our courts as a rule will relieve against forfeiture. So, if the work were not completed in time and if time were not of the essence of the agreement, I doubt very much that the courts would compel the company to give up the shares and the line, in accordance with the second agreement to which I shall refer later. As I say, in the circumstances I mention, the courts as a rule will relieve against forfeiture. I will not say anything further on that point now.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I think you are wise.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is only when default is cured.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am just drawing this matter to the attention of honourable senators so that they will know the thing is not as plain as it might be.

Section 7 of the agreement provides the manner in which funds are to be provided by the government, up to a total of $80 million. Clause 8 provides that the loans are to be made by the crown company mentioned in this bill. It further provides that the costs and expenses of the crown company are to be paid by the pipe line company.

With respect to section 12, which was mentioned by the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid), I am not too sure that it means what he said it meant. It reads:

> Pursuant to the provisions of the statute in such case made and provided, no member of the House of Commons of Canada shall be admitted to any share or part of this agreement or to any benefit to arise therefrom.

Hon. Mr. Farris: It lets out the senators.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not know whether that means that a member of the House could not hold any shares in the company. It may mean that, because it refers to the provisions of the statutes in such case made and provided. That may mean the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Surely.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The members of the Senate are not mentioned, but I think they are prohibited in any event, under the provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act.

In view of the fact that the Government is practically into this pipe line business now, it will at any rate hold the shares and all of the assets of the company in the meantime.

I come next to section 14 of the agreement, by which Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited agrees to obtain all necessary permits, and in which it represents that it has options to purchase substantially all the pipe required for the western section, has the rights of way or options therefor, that no proceedings are pending against it in law or in equity, and that it has power to enter into this agreement. By clause 16, this agreement is not assignable.

I refer now to the second agreement bearing the same date and apparently made at the same time, called the shareholders' agreement. This is a most enlightening document. There are five parties to the agreement: Her Majesty the Queen in the right of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is the party of the first part; Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited is the party of the second part; all of the shareholders who have had shares issued to them at the time the agreement was made are the party of the third part; certain persons in Texas, Calgary and Toronto, who had options to purchase shares are the party of the fourth part; and the Deputy Minister of Finance, called the trustee, is the party of the fifth part. He holds all of the shares and securities which are turned over or hypothecated for the purpose of guaranteeing that the work will be done.

I should like to refer briefly to what the shareholders' agreement does. It is an agreement whereby the shareholders agree to place all of their shares, options to purchase shares and all of their property in escrow with the trustee, who is the Deputy Minister of Finance, and it contains a provision that no more shares shall be issued except subject to the agreement.

Honourable senators, there is another feature of this matter which has been overlooked in the argument so far, namely, the compensation that is to be paid to these people, the shareholders, if the company fails. I should like to put on the record a short extract from an article written by Mr. Dexter, which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press. I quote from this article because it gives some explanation of how these very complicated regulations work out. It is as follows:

> Compensation will be paid to the shareholders and these are the most complicated provisions of the agreements.
> To start with, the shareholders will be credited with the amount they have paid for their shares—$8 per share. From this credit there will be deductions. All sums spent by the company on the western section will be deducted. Also, the cost of raising and administering the money loaned to the company.
> Most likely default will result from the inability of the company to repay the loan after the line to Winnipeg has been completed.
> Suppose this line costs $75 millions and the company then defaults in April.
> The shareholders have paid $15·5 millions for their shares. So the Government takes over the company and sets up a credit of $15·5 millions for the shareholders. From this will be deducted the $7·5 millions the shareholders spent on the western line. Then there will be the interest on $67·5 millions at 5 per cent from December 31, 1956, to the takeover date. Three months interest would run to about $850,000. The expenses of the Crown company in raising and handling the loan of $67·5 millions, might be $50,000. Altogether, therefore, the deductions would be nearly $8·5 millions.

The shareholders would forfeit their shares, the company would pass to the Government, and the shareholders would be paid about $7 millions in total retirement of their interest. They would have lost $8·5 millions and the company.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Or the trustee can return the shares.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: As I understand it, if the Government takes over the company, it would have to pay the shareholders the $7,500,000.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: But it would not have to take over the shares. It could take over all the other assets, but give the shareholders back their shares.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Then the Government would not own the pipe line outright.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It would just own all the assets.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No, I do not agree with that.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is the agreement.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I would not agree to that for a moment.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Will my friend permit a question? When you have a first mortgage on a property and foreclose, is not what you get all that the owner theretofore had?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I understand this agreement provides for the paying of the $7,500,000.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If the crown company retained the shares, then it would pay the $7,500,000, but if it gave the shares back to the shareholders, it would not pay anything.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Those shares would not be worth anything.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: All right.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In my opinion that is not the intent of the agreement.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is the intention and that is the wording.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I don't think any government would do that, not even this government.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am not saying what they would do or would not do; I am explaining to my honourable friend what the agreement contains.

Hon. Mr. Farris: May I ask my honourable friend, does he think the Government should pay the shareholders the $7,500,000?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: He is only interpreting the agreement.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is my interpretation of the agreement.

Hon. Mr. Farris: That is not the question. Silence gives consent.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Before I go further I should like to say a word or two about the bill. If honourable senators will look at it carefully they will find that, at least according to my view, the bill really ends with section 6, that is, when the agreement was made with the Province of Ontario to contribute $35 million and for the Government of Canada to pay the balance.

It was not known at that time apparently that Trans-Canada would not be able to start the construction of the western portion of the line this year. And afterwards part II was added so that this loan of $80 million could be made by the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation out of the money that it is going to obtain from the public treasury.

Before the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation can proceed with the construction of the northern Ontario section that $80 million will have to be repaid or, failing that, it will have to come to Parliament again for more money, because the total amount of the money provided for financing the northern Ontario section, by this bill, amounts to $130 million.

That leads me to refer to something else. If Trans-Canada Pipe Lines builds this line to Winnipeg and finishes it by December 31 it will have carried out the agreement.

Hon. Mr. Farris: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: And if it pays back the money by April 2 next year.

Hon. Mr. Farris: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Then what will happen? There will still be 110 miles to be built from Winnipeg to the eastern boundary of Manitoba where it adjoins Ontario. There is nothing in any of these agreements to say that at that time Trans-Canada Pipe Lines will be able to build that part of the line, and if it does not build it I do not think that Ontario or the federal Government will have the right to go ahead and complete the section from the western Ontario boundary to Kapuskasing until they know that the line in between is going to be built, because it would be absolutely useless in so far as Ontario is concerned and I would not expect Ontario to pay the $35 million. So, if the conditions of financing are such as explained by the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett), and this company raises the $80 million by April 2, 1957, where is it going to get the other money to build the 110 miles from Winnipeg to the western boundary of Ontario? And where is it going to get the money to build that part of the line from Kapuskasing to Toronto? Where is it going to get the money to build the line from Toronto to Montreal?

In my opinion, honourable senators, the whole thing is a mess right from the beginning and I do not like it at all.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Do you like the end?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I was very much pleased with the speech made by the honourable senator from Churchill (honourable Mr. Crerar). I quite frequently agree with what the honourable senator says, but this time I cannot. He said that he intended to vote for the bill and I do not intend to do so, because the whole matter is too complicated. I do not think we have approached it in the proper way. I am glad we are not going to be restricted in debate, but I think the company should have been reorganized with Canadian control and if that could not be done an endeavour should have been made to find people in Canada who would build the line. If that attempt had failed, it would have been time enough then to consider whether Canada would have to build the line herself.

Why all this rush, this haste? This matter has been under consideration for five years or so. Why are we in such a rush to complete it almost over night? This has to do with one of our greatest natural resuorces, and I do not think the world will come to an end if we do not build the line from Alberta to Winnipeg this year.

We have a natural gas line in that part of Saskatchewan where I live. The wells are 40 miles away from my home town: we are on the main line from Brock to Saskatoon. We do not find it very cheap fuel for heating a house. We pay 90 cents per 1,000 cubic feet, which is twice as much as coal would cost that we used to buy in Drumheller. The cost is equal to or more than the cost of heating by fuel oil in the places where they use fuel oil for heating purposes.

Then there is another line from Coleville to Prince Albert. Saskatoon pays 80 cents per 1,000 cubic feet and Prince Albert pays the same. The reason the rates in those cities are lower than ours is that they use a greater load. If they use a certain load they get a certain price and if they use a certain other load the price will be different. The higher the load the lower the price. The reason we pay 10 cents per 1,000 cubic feet higher is that we do not consume as much gas as those cities I have mentioned.

I would like to point out that this gas has been in that country for millions of years. It has been underground. Somewhere I read, not long ago, that these large natural gas companies in the United States near Niagara and Chicago store gas in underground receptacles, in old mines and places like that and use it as the demand requires.

Now, when a company drills a well in our territory and it does not find oil but finds natural gas instead, the well is capped and it remains there forever to be used when required. That has happened all over western Canada. Most of the gas has been found by people who have been drilling for oil.

I remember 20 years ago driving through Turner Valley, and every little while you would see a small flame coming out of the ground, a flame that had been burning for years. When we got to Black Diamond, I think it was, there was a very big flame, such that you could not get within 75 or 100 feet of it because of the heat, and it also had been burning for years. Now, that gas is not going to be piped, as far as I know, into this line we are discussing. In certain other areas nothing but natural gas has been found. The gas in Turner Valley could be refined and made into gasoline and gas and other products. I was in the beautiful town of Medicine Hat in 1922. At that time I did not know the honourable senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw). I looked things over and found there a great greenhouse many acres in extent, and all that had to be done to heat it was to bore a hole about 200 feet deep in the back yard and there was all the gas that was needed. I understand that today things are not so satisfactory, that the supply is beginning to fail.

Hon. Mr. Gershaw: Not at all. There is plenty of gas, but it is more widely distributed.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The field is extended?

Hon. Mr. Gershaw: That is so.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not think that gas went to waste. There are many fields in Alberta—Turner Valley and Pincher Creek, oil fields and gas fields near Edmonton; in British Columbia, Dawson Creek and Fort St. John; in Saskatchewan, the Brock and Colville fields, and at Lloydminster, as well as smaller fields. Although there is a wonderful oil field near Virden, Manitoba has very little natural gas. The point I am trying to make is that this gas is not going to waste: it has been in the ground for millions of years and will remain there, for the most part, whether the pipe line is built or not.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If the pipe line is built a lot of it will come out.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Naturally. I did not mean that all of it will remain in the ground if the pipe line is built. But the gas is not disappearing, and there is no great urgency to use it. Why go to all this fuss and trouble to push this project through so hurriedly? Why cannot the gas be left where it is until the whole question is gone into more fully? Bye and bye, when the markets are available, and a company is ready to build the line, let a bill be brought before Parliament and we will deal with it.

I have been wondering what the senators from the Maritimes intend to do about this bill. There are great coal fields in the Maritime provinces, and if the gas pipe line is built what are the prospects of continuing to export coal, unless it is cheaper, to Quebec and Ontario. The present project will also affect the coal mines of Alberta, in which province, I am told, one-twentieth to one-thirtieth of all the world's known deposits are located.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Is the coal being shipped east?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: They are going to do that next session!

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Also Canada has natural resources other than coal and gas; I mean her forests. I am concerned at the rapidity with which our forests are being depleted. Some areas in Ontario have become complete deserts; I know, because I have been through them. A week ago I was in northern Quebec, in the district from which my honourable friend the Deputy Leader (Hon. Mr. Godbout) comes, and I saw there thousands of acres on which every stick of lumber bigger than one's wrist had been cut and taken away to be pulped.

Hon. Mr. Farris: What has this to do with the present bill?

Hon Mr. Aseltine: I am talking about conservation. I think something should be done about it. If we continue to deplete our forests by taking everything large and small for pulpwood, in 30 to 50 years there will be nothing left.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I asked my honourable friend what has all this to do with the present bill?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Nothing at all; and I am not trying to kill time either. I just wanted to mention these things to show my interest in our gas, our oil, our coal, our forests, and all the other great natural resources which, I believe, we must preserve and conserve.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I believe that at this stage it is almost easier to build a pipe line than it is to find something new to say on the subject of pipe lines.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: In fifteen days of debate in the other place, and half a dozen pretty good, and some excellent, speeches in this house, I have been left with very little scope. Nevertheless I am going to try to say something about this bill which has not yet been mentioned.

Already some beneficial results are on the horizon. The Canadian public have become aware that Parliament is in session, and they have become alert to the issues. On the other hand, they are very confused.

The matter before us is one of considerable public concern. It is also fair to say that it is a matter of table discussion in almost every home in Canada. Certainly it is discussed at social and communal gatherings. It would be a mistake for the Government to underestimate the confusion which exists in this country on this bill and matters related to it. There exists a depth of emotion and concern, and it will take considerable work on the part of members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons to set the matter right.

Today we are in a rather fortunate position. The eyes of Canada are focused on us. I suppose it can be said that the people expect us to do our duty without haste and without heat, in calmness and in fairness, in disregard of private or public pressure, and with dignity.

We cannot avoid awkward issues, nor can we squat on our status quo. Everyone wants a pipe line. Everyone wants it fully completed. The difference between us is as to how it is to be done. Is it to be done under this bill, or are we to have public ownership? The Government, who are in a position to know, say that there is one proposition, and that is the Trans-Canada proposition, that is teed up and can deliver the goods. Three other offers were considered; there was the McMahon offer. Mr. McMahon wanted to send gas to the United States. As a matter of fact I could finance the project if I were allowed to export gas to the United States without regard to what remains in this country. The Gairdner offer had an income tax gimmick; it was quite a good one for him.

And what about the Champion offer? Well, he was championing Champion and no one else. One thing they had in common. They were all Johnnies-come-lately and they were all people who offered you more money for what you had already sold.

My honourable friend from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) said that "Gas has been there for millions of years. What's the hurry? Put it off from year to year. Why this year, why next year, why any year?" I want to draw an analogy I think is suitable on this occasion. We fussed and fumed and fiddled around for twenty years about the St. Lawrence Seaway. Finally there came on the scene men who were determined that it should be accomplished. They are the same people sitting in the same places in the same government who brought about the St. Lawrence Seaway project who say we should have a pipe line now and not twenty years hence.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: What is equally important is that the pipe line is being opposed by the same people who opposed the St. Lawrence Seaway project, the coal people, and the transport people. They are now back for another try. If Trans-Canada cannot deliver the goods we have lost nothing. If we do not get our money back we have got a pipe line. I started out by saying we all wanted a pipe line. So what are we quarreling about?

I belong to the public ownership school. I believe in public ownership. I have urged it and I have counselled it. It is my view that the pipe line should be a national public utility operated by a crown corporation. Gas—and I am not referring to hot air—is a great natural resource. Geography has placed this gas in the western provinces, an area which is somewhat remote from central markets. In a real sense this gas beneficially belongs to all of us. It is a great natural resource and a great national resource.

This pipe line undertaking is of national magnitude, running across five provinces which contain nearly 90 per cent of the population of this country. That is one reason I think the line should be nationally owned. Another is that public ownership has proved itself in Canada. It is efficient and beneficial, and wherever you look around you can find examples of public ownership. I know the arguments have been made that we are faced with tremendous problems which are unsurmountable. One of the main arguments used against public ownership is to say "Why, the Government is going into business". Well, I don't know whether we are supposed to shudder at that or not, but I would remind the house we are in the housing business, the land business, the insurance business, the transportation business and the banking business. Does anybody know what business we are not in as a government? I could name a dozen more.

Hon. Mr. Reid: You are getting closer to the CCF.

Hon. Mr. Haig: What about the liquor business?

Hon. Mr. Croll: The provinces are in that and we get a fair share of it too.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I trust the honourable senator means a fair share of the profits.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I thank the honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) for his correction. As a matter of fact, we do better from liquor taxes than the people who manufacture and sell the product. We talk about the conflict between the producer and the consumer. Well, we fixed the price of butter and floor prices. All these things I agree with. We meet these problems every day in our government business. We have hurdled them many times and we have had much success at it. I said that public ownership was my first choice. I deeply regret that at the present time it appears unobtainable. However, I do not belong to the school that says public ownership or nothing. I am a realist and I am not ready to throw away both the bath water and the baby. I think the public understands my position. My views have not changed since I moved from the other place. It seems very strange to me—and I enjoyed it immensely—when I found that the Tories are now fighting to die for dear old Karl Marx.

This bill proposes to lend public funds to a private corporation. That should be carefully examined. It is done on the theory that the Government must take responsibility for the broad functioning of our economy. That is not a new concept in this country. It is part and parcel of the welfare state and is in no way revolutionary. Canada's greater growth needs three things: men, machines and energy. This bill will supply a vast amount of energy in the central provinces, where it is much needed. Men of little vision who would hamper Canada in its rise to a world power as an industrial giant, who doubt her urgent need for energy now, are nationally nearsighted. What is more, they are full-blooded brothers of the men who said that the C.P.R. would not pay for the axle grease on its trains.

I am one of those who are prepared to emulate the courage of their Canadian ancestors who in another day made a decision which has paid great human dividends. The discussions so far in this house indicate that the Trans-Canada contract as it stands today is about as tough a contract as you can possibly draft. The complaint is that it is too tough. We will have a good chance to carefully examine it tomorrow. We are going to have our first, second and third look at it. The people who were offered an opportunity to look at it wouldn't do so. That is why we have got to be very careful. If the debt to the Government is not repaid there is no reason why we should not foreclose. In a year from now we will either have our money back at 5 per cent interest or we will have a pipe line. I am prepared to accept the pipe line through the back door. I would welcome it through any door. I was very much encouraged by the views of the honourable senators from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) and New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid)—

Hon. Mr. Reid: I still hold that same view.

Hon. Mr. Croll: The honourable senators fear that this will result in public ownership.

Hon. Mr. Reid: And I am against that.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am heartened by their fears, for I want public ownership. I hope it comes about.

Hon. Mr. Reid: You should be in the C.C.F. party.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I have been pretty happy in the Liberal party.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: We are happy to have you.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Thank you. It is only in the Tory party that they disown you when you differ with them. Those who tell a different story are the ones who have been trying in a mad recklessness to plunge this country into the depths of bitterness, intolerance and frustration. The sad part about it is that they have succeeded, they have had much more success than they deserve.

Honourable senators, what does the pipe line mean to Canada? I was a little discouraged when two members of the Opposition in this house looked over to the Maritime members and said, "What are you getting out of this pipe line?" Does everyone have to get something out of everything, or is this a nation in which we try to share?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I have never heard members from the Maritimes express themselves in that way. My desk-mate is a Maritimer, and he did not like it any more than I did.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: It is becoming a bigger and better Canada.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It certainly is. Honourable senators, the province of Alberta has coal in abundance. It is loaded with black diamonds. What is one to do with all that coal? You cannot eat it, and you cannot send it away, because the transportation cost is too high. I remember when I was a youngster in school writing an essay on how to get coal from Alberta to the east. Those were the things we were concerned with in those days. Today gas is going up into smoke at the loss of $50,000 a day. If I were from Alberta I would be very angry with people who stood in the way of the pipe line, for it means wealth to that province and better living for its people. Let us give credit where it is due. They are doing much for the people of Alberta now and will do even more in the future. Mr. Frost, the Premier of my own province, wants no more of the black-out and brown-out which we have had for a considerable length of time. He wants more industry and more work for the people. Premier Campbell wants cheap power in order to balance the economy of his province. Honourable senators, this is a billion dollar industry. I do not know how much $1 billion is, but I say it because that is the best estimate of its value. Anyway, it is a lot of money. What I do know is this, although no one has mentioned it on the floor. At the present time there are in Canada 300,000 unemployed many of whom are drawing unemployment insurance. Unemployment insurance is no substitute for work. What are we doing to make employment for these people? We can build transmission lines, producing, distribution and consuming systems, which can put into circulation within the next 36 months $700 million. Are these unemployed people to be neglected and to be forgotten? Have we so much prosperity in this country that we have not time to look around on behalf of those unfortunates who are out of work?

I gather that the house is now of the view that I am for a pipe line, not in accordance with this bill, but nevertheless I am prepared to accept it. When the bill is passed, and I am sure it will be—

Hon. Mr. Horner: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. Haig: You can be sure of that.

Hon. Mr. Croll: When the bill is passed we will have a pipe line, but let's look what else came with it. Honourable senators, when the pipe line is built the pipe will be buried deep in the ground. What will be left above ground is something ugly and frightening. Those who smugly say, "It can't happen here" ought to start re-examining themselves. I am referring to speeches made outside of Parliament. I refer to a couple of speeches that were made in Toronto last Saturday, and reported in the Toronto Star and in the Toronto Globe and Mail. Even before we have reaped the benefits of the pipe line, those speeches indicated that careers have been shattered, reputations stained and tarnished, and democracy insulted, defied and belittled. I am one of those old-fashioned people who believe in government by government—that is, government by majority. Democracy to me does not mean that we need the consent of the minority to make a law. Minorities have their rights; so have majorities. There can be a tyranny of a minority as well as a tyranny of a majority. In my understanding, obstruction for obstruction's sake is not part of the democratic process. My conception of democracy is such that I do not approve of the indelicate, heavy hand, nor the "Hey, Rube" school of politics. I am hopeful that we will be able to pass the bill in adequate time. I am satisfied that the members of the Opposition are in no way attempting to booby trap the democratic process and stop the passage of the bill in this house.

Honourable senators, let me make this statement—I think it is pertinent and I am within the rules: I do not approve of hooliganism when it occurs in the Montreal Forum. I like it less when it occurs—and you know where.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: The word "closure" was bandied about in this chamber yesterday. I think the members of the Senate understand that this is no place for martyrdom or for political issues. What we do here, we do deliberately, after careful examination, and we judge an issue in the public interest.

I have had ample time to consider this bill. I regret it if any member of this house has not, although I find that hard to believe. The matter has been before the public since May 14. I followed it in Hansard, in common with many honourable senators who spent a great deal of time in the other place listening to the debate, but regretting the performance. I understand the implications of this bill. It is not a bill of my choice. I do not think it is the very best bill that could have been produced. Honourable senators know what I would have liked in the bill. Nevertheless, it is a good bill and one worthy of support on its merits. It is my considered opinion that it is in the public interest, and merits not only the approval and support of the members of this house, but their enthusiasm as being something in the national interest that will benefit all Canadians.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I do not like being forced to rise at this time of the evening, for I am one who is accustomed to getting up at half past five or six o'clock in the morning. It is a severe case of closure as far as I am concerned, to be forced to speak at this hour.

Hon. Mr. Farris: It is early yet.

Hon. Mr. Horner: It is not early; it is late.

Hon. Mr. Farris: The Commons sat until three o'clock in the morning.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Let me repeat what I said to the Leader of the Government, that as far as I am concerned, this is strictly a measure of closure. I would like to be given the privilege of moving the adjournment of the debate rather than speaking at this time.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Horner: All right. Thank you! We have sat here and listened to the honourable senator who is so determined that this debate shall continue. He has made a political speech, pure and simple.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: Not so simple.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I do not mean it in that sense.

While I listened to a letter from Premier Manning being read a short time ago—a man you once denounced—I could not but recall to mind this passage of Scripture:

> ...make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations.

Now you make friends with your former enemies, and quote their words.

The honourable senator who has just taken his seat (Hon. Mr. Croll) has come recently from the other chamber, and naturally he proceeded to make pretty much of a political speech in an effort to get out of the corner he is in with respect to labour, which he represents. They have been wiring him and expecting much from him, and also something from the Senate of Canada, where we are supposed to give serious consideration to legislation which might have vital consequences for Canada. At least, we were supposed to give it some study and thought; but no, there is a continuation of political anxiety and the decrying of anyone who offers any opposition.

Honourable senators, what are we doing? My room-mate made reference in his remarks to this great natural resource, gas. It is one of the most useful substances in the world; it is perfectly safe in the ground. As I stand here tonight I realize that I too have a duty to perform. I have a sizeable family and a number of grandchildren, and I want them to remember and have some respect for the stand I took when I was asked to give away a resource that they will be sadly in need of in the days to come. Make no mistake about it, honourable senators, oil and natural gas are wasting assets. You can quite easily replenish your forests; the trees will reseed themselves. But you cannot reproduce natural gas after it has been removed from the ground.

Why this unseemly rush to pass this legislation? This bill is regarded by some as a political necessity, and nothing else. Gas is in the first place a competitive fuel. What are you doing for the people who depend for their livelihood on the sale of wood and coal for fuel? I have been in homes that use natural gas in their fireplaces. To my mind, it is a cheap fuel if you are near the source, but the smell of burning gas does not compare with the fragrance of a wood fire. When you use it you will certainly find that out.

What have we done with our natural resources so far? I have reached a fair time of life, but I can look back to the days when as a boy I lived in Quebec and saw our natural resources in the form of peeled pulpwood going to the United States at $2 a cord. And what has happened in western Canada? The honourable senator from Northumberland-Miramichi (Hon. Mr. Burchill) told us the other day of a fellow in South Carolina who thought that because the senator came from New Brunswick he lived in the woods. If that man had ever seen the spruce that grew at one time in Saskatchewan, and made such a statement, I would think he had never been out of the bush. We had at one time in Saskatchewan billions of feet of the finest spruce timber to be found anywhere in Canada or on the North American continent.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: You had better build a pulp mill there.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I myself skidded and put into the river one spruce log which scaled 1180 feet of lumber. And who got the billions of feet of lumber that went out of that province? The Americans. And what did they do with it? They slashed through the best of the bush, and left the rest to be struck by lightning and consumed by fire. They built a railway from Prince Albert to Big River at considerable expense, built a town there and slashed all the better timber; then they picked up their mill and moved on to British Columbia.

There is another great natural resource of Western Canada that has been given away, namely the land which Americans bought for $1 or $1.35 an acre. I recall a sorry experience I had through having signed a contract to buy from an American some land he bought for $1 or so an acre. When I came to closing the deal with the old gentleman who owned the land, and who lived at that time in Iowa, I said "Come over to the bank and I will pay you in Canadian money." But he would have none of it. American funds were at that time at a premium of 14 per cent, and he wanted the full price in his own currency. I realized then that I had signed an agreement to pay in gold or its equivalent. I said to him "All right; I am a young man, and I expect this has taught me a lesson." The Americans still own much of the land in the west and take rent from it. Many of them have made little fortunes from it, but they do not want to raise their families in Canada. They just make their money there and go back to the United States.

Now, honourable senators, what have we left? We have been endeavouring to bring people into this country but because of the trend and swing towards the United States, we have lost more than we have gained. It is for that reason that I am suspicious of this whole scheme now before us. It involves Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and this big American, Murchison, who must have a very fine ranch down in Texas at which he can entertain the people he is trading with.

Let us look at what happened with the Trans-Mountain Pipe Line. Canadians could not buy into it, but some Americans got stock at $3 a share; the Redfield Oil Company of California got 50,000 shares at $10, and another American firm got 100,000 shares. That stock today is selling at $66 a share—it has been $67—but Canadians were able to buy very little at $10.

Hon. Mr. Horner: It is only a few years ago that the Premier of Alberta set up two commissions to inquire into the gas reserve situation and to report upon whether any gas should be allowed to leave that province. Only recently has the Government decided that exportation of gas can be permitted.

A great deal of additional use is being made of it in Alberta, by the Sherritt-Gordon mine, the huge chemical plant at Edmonton and many other factories. Some people seem to believe that the Government of Alberta is simply standing by and not getting any by-products from this gas. That is not so. Large quantities of sulphur are being shipped, and there are other by-products. Many new towns are being supplied with gas, and a new pulp mill that is being constructed will use enormous quantities. Furthermore, The Westcoast Transmission pipe line is going to tap the Northern Alberta and Peace River area and take out large quantities of gas. It has been fortunate enough to get permission to export it to Seattle, Portland and other points in the United States where it will find a good market. Only 15 per cent of the stock of that company at the original financing price was available to Canadians.

May I make just one comment on the humiliating position we are placed in. The cream of our resources is being skimmed off. Let us not overlook what is happening throughout the world today. We talk with pride about our DEW line and what we are doing by way of national defence.

I want to tell honourable senators just what is going on, with the rich, the millionaires, increasing their wealth and the poor man being taxed and barred from getting in on any of these tax-free capital gain propositions. That is doing more harm than all the defences and the DEW line and everything like that can possibly prevent It is said that the Americans came here and found this gas. Well, what did the British do in Iran? They spent all the money they could; they built the grandest refinery in the world; they built miles and miles of pipe line. But what happened? The people rebelled. They said, "This is our oil, and you are not paying us enough for it". The oil shipments stopped. Then Premier Mussadiq went to Washington, and the Americans allowed him to weep on their shoulders. They undertook to get the oil moving again, and, incidentally, they got a "slice of the melon". I am not the weeping type, but if I were I could weep for what has taken place in Canada in recent years.

Let us go back still further. What happened in Mexico? Many of you gentlemen will remember that. The British and the Americans spent huge sums of money in developing the mines and the oil resources there, but the Mexicans said: "Get out. We will pay you if we feel like it". It had been said that that could not happen, but it did.

I would like to see an all-Canadian line built, in co-operation with all the provinces. Under this legislation before us Ontario is coming in, but what I would like to see is all the provinces co-operating in an entirely Government-owned pipe line. Under such an arrangement we would have control of our own natural resource.

When anyone tells me that simply because that gas is in Alberta, Premier Manning can sell it to whom he likes, I reply that once the gas crosses the interprovincial boundary it is then entirely under federal control. No one can tell me anything to the contrary. If Premier Manning wants to sell it at all he will have to sell it to the Government or to any company that builds a pipe line, for the province loses control once the gas crosses the provincial boundary. That is a very important point.

Honourable senators have talked about creating work. It has been stated that 800,000 men are out of work.

Hon. Mr. Croll: No; 300,000.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I thought it was 800,000.

Hon. Mr. Croll: You are thinking of the Bennett days.

Hon. Mr. Horner: This bill simply provides work for Americans. The fact of the matter is that they will send their machines in here and lay the pipe in record time. A man in Calgary invented a pipe installation machine equally as good as any American machine, capable of doing the job efficiently, but Americans were in control and they used an American machine. The pipe for this line is supposedly piled up in Indiana.

The balance of trade is still against us. By taking a little time—and I do not see that there is any rush—we could buy the pipe from England and in doing so would create a market for our own products, or we could buy the pipe in Welland, where they will soon be able to roll any kind and type of pipe, and thus create employment for Canadians.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: Are you in favour of the bill?

Hon. Mr. Horner: No, I am not, I certainly am not.

Now, if the United States would rejoin the Commonwealth of Nations in return, so that Canada and the United States would be all one country, I would hold up both hands and immediately move that this house be abolished in order that the union be brought about. The Americans are a great people, yes. But as long as we remain a sovereign country and entitled to carry on our own affairs, I say we should stand up like men and insist that our natural resources be used to serve the people of Canada and not those of the United States, as has been done in the case of the Trans-Mountain pipe line and the Westcoast Transmission pipe line.

Let me emphasize this. There are men in chosen and high places, wealthy millionaires and so on, who get a chance at these choice morsels, while the ordinary man is left out. That is what has caused trouble throughout the world, and unless we guard against that sort of thing all the defences put up by our armed forces and so on will never save us. Changes today are a matter of ideas and ideals, and for a nation like Canada to talk of might is simply inviting disaster. Back in Biblical times there were those who would sell their birthright for a mess of pottage, and all because they were placed on the inside of some great undertaking where they would make a million or two of money. The same thing is true today.

We have a great country. We have great natural resources. So far as Saskatchewan is concerned, we are finding sufficient gas there to serve our needs, but we have no gas for export yet. The city of Regina is going to be served from our own local field. Saskatoon and Prince Albert have gas —the main cities have gas. But, as I said, we have none to export. However, Alberta, through Westcoast Transmission, has been exporting a certain amount down to Montana for a number of years. They got permission from the federal Government during the war, I think, and the arrangement continued afterwards. Evidently the United States had some worth-while use for the gas.

It is beyond my understanding how any person can regard either this bill or this agreement as satisfactory. The bill contains no information of value, though there may be more information in the agreement. A gap is left between the Ontario portion and the western section, and not a word is said as to when it is to be filled. Permission has not yet been obtained to export any gas. The city of Winnipeg is not particularly concerned about getting a supply of gas next year; as a matter of fact it is already provided with oil and cheap coal. What can be gained by this undue haste, when by waiting we could, as I have said, import pipe from England via Churchill, or manufacture it ourselves? But no, there is this mad scramble to pledge $80 million and "buy American". The trend to the United States is noticeable even in the civil service, for the Government at Ottawa is unable to retain a large number of civil servants who, attracted by higher pay, are going across the line. We ship our raw material to the United States and buy it back in the form of manufactured goods.

Let me repeat: with an election due in a year I say, without any fear of successful contradiction, that this bill is a political necessity, and nothing more. Its effect will be to give away Canadian resources and Canadian money to another country and to deny Canadians employment. If the hour were earlier, and I had enough time, I would continue, but in view of the lateness of the hour I shall say no more.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time, on division.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, the Senate went into committee on the bill.

Hon. Mr. Golding in the Chair.

Section 1 stands.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—establishment and constitution:

Hon. Mr. Reid: I do not know when I should ask certain questions on these clauses, but I have one or two queries to put, and if they are not in order the chairman can so advise me. First, is the agreement respecting the loan by the Province of Ontario in the same terms as the agreement made by the dominion Government, except that the loan proposed for the Province of Ontario is $35 million as against $100 million by the dominion? That is, are the terms of the agreements similar all through: if not, what are the differences, and why?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The $35 million to be advanced by Ontario is to be put up on terms similar to the amount put up by the dominion Government.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Has the dominion Government put up its money yet?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No; it cannot do so until this bill is passed. Then the federal Government will advance money as it is required to the crown corporation, which in turn will lend the money to Trans-Canada.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But even though this bill is passed, when there is no provision for building the line from Winnipeg to the Province of Ontario, can the dominion Government put up the money?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As I explained earlier in the day, no money will be advanced for the building of the northern Ontario section until the western branch is built, and the loan repaid.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Assume for argument's sake that the pipe line from Alberta to Winnipeg is built and paid for, at a cost of $80 million. What happens to the eastern section? Does the Government put up another $80 million to the private company?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think the honourable gentleman is referring specially to the line between Winnipeg and the eastern border of Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. Haig: No. As I understand it the bill provides that the aggregate of the amounts borrowed by the corporation and outstanding at any time will not exceed $130 million, and that the aggregate of the amounts loaned by the Minister of Finance and outstanding at any time shall not be in excess of that amount. Now, you are taking $80 million out of that and building the western line from Alberta to Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is correct.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Then, before you can start the rest of the line there will have to be another session of Parliament and more money will have to be voted for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Not necessarily, but if the money is not repaid there would have to be further legislation.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: As I understand it, this $80 million would be a revolving fund in the event it is paid by Trans-Canada by next April.

Hon. Mr. Haig: It cannot revolve unless we put up the money again. Supposing they default. Then the pipe line from Winnipeg east would be short $80 million and Parliament would have to vote that money at another session.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The Leader of the Opposition is right in that respect. There would have to be further legislation if the money is not repaid.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Has the Government any policy? I felt that the honourable member from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) was right in his remarks. My information, although obtained from a different source, is along much the same lines as his. There will be a terrific fight before the Federal Power Commission in the United States before any permit is given allowing gas to enter that country, especially the central part of it. Now, if the statement made by the Leader of the Government is correct, and if that condition exists next April, they will not be able to raise the money unless they get a permit. Apparently that is the answer.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is not necessarily so.

Hon. Mr. Haig: No, but that is the reason they gave for not getting the money. That is my understanding anyway.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: At the present moment that is the condition, but the Canadian market is building up all the time. I do not know what position Trans-Canada will be in financially by March 31 next year.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Does my honourable friend suggest to me that in view of the present money markets in Canada and the fact the Government increased the bank rate of interest to 3 per cent—a rate unheard of before—that by next spring things can change enough and the bank rate will be so satisfactory they will be anxious to lend money to this corporation? My judgment is that the corporation would have a better chance to borrow money in the United States.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable gentleman may be right.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I would think so. Apparently they cannot get that money until the Federal Power Commission in the United States grants them a permit to bring in gas. That is the real problem. I think that was the original intention of the company, for as I said earlier today, most of the right-of-way of the line from Winnipeg to Emerson has been purchased. It is quite plain to me that is where they intended to run the line. These agreements specify that under the contract the line cannot branch off and go from Winnipeg to Emerson. This cannot be done without consent. Has the Government any suggestion as to a policy it might pursue if the Americans do not come in by next spring? That is all I want to know.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With respect to the first question, as to what position Trans-Canada would be in on April 2, 1957, no one can say definitely; but I would state that Trans-Canada now has under contract or clearly in sight from Canadian consumers alone about 75 per cent of the income required to service the debt involved in building its whole Canadian gas transmission system. By the end of its second full year of operation Trans-Canada now expects to be able to come fairly close to meeting all debt services and obligations on Canadian sales alone. What is needed to secure the additional contracts that will protect all debt service is the assurance that the pipe line is under construction. This is the purpose of the legislation which is now before the house.

So I am of the opinion that there is a very good chance of Trans-Canada repaying this loan by April, 1957, even if it does not secure a permit to export gas to the United States.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: If it pays the loan by April 2, 1957, it will own the line between Alberta and Winnipeg. Is that not correct? The company will own the line?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: All right, what happens if it does not do anything after that? There is nothing in these agreements to cover that.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: There is one suggestion I think might be made here. It concerns something that happened out on the west coast. The Westcoast Transmission pipe line Bill received Royal Assent on April 30, 1949, but the company did not get a certificate granted by the Federal Power Commission until 1955, although their first hearing was in 1952. They were engaged in a fight with other interests before the Federal Power Commission. That is what delayed the matter. The same situation is true here. If these interests which are now fighting should get together on this thing, not only would they get their Federal Power Commission permit but they would also get their financing without any trouble at all. That is my opinion. I believe that once this bill is put through and the line gets started, this thing can be brought about. As a result of the delay with respect to the Westcoast Transmission Company's certificate, financing was held up, and the construction of the line was held up. The certificate has been granted now but they are losing a year in supplying the market of Canada. In the interim they are going to get gas from the American side to Vancouver by linking up at Huntingdon with American gas. The gas from the Peace River District in the northern part of British Columbia will not be available until next December. I think the Government was very wise to force the building of this line at the same time that the hearing was going on before the Federal Power Commission in the United States, for I do not think it will be possible, if there is cheap gas available, for the Federal Power Commission to stop it from going into many of the areas that want to get the gas. That is what has happened on the west coast. Now, the company under this contract might get together with its opponents by the end of March and be able to pay off the $80 million and build the pipe line itself without any assistance from the Government whatever.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That does not answer my question.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No. The honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) asked a pertinent question. May I say in passing that during the last few weeks I have been spending considerable time studying this whole question. I have had the benefit of consulting with the officials of the department, and I have also read Hansard of the other house very carefully. But may I say that the questions which are being considered here tonight were not considered at all in the other house. This is the first time that a careful examination of this question has been made.

The honourable senator from Rosetown asked if there is any obligation on the part of Trans-Canada to build the line from Winnipeg to the Ontario-Manitoba border. I understand that is the question?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Well, I said supposing they carry out this agreement under the loan and build to Winnipeg, then the company owns that. Is there any obligation anywhere to compel them to go on from there?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Not of necessity.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There are two obligations. One obligation is under the agreement which they have entered into respecting the Northern Ontario branch of the line. I will read the first clause of the agreement.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is that the agreement I referred to, the one dated November 21, 1955?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is the one.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I was not able to get that agreement.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I tabled it in this house on January 11. I am sorry the honourable gentleman did not speak to me about it earlier.

The first clause reads as follows:

> Trans-Canada will diligently take steps to secure all necessary governmental permits, financing, materials and supplies for and, having attained same, will carry out the aforesaid program of construction and particularly will cause to be constructed in conjunction with the construction of the said northern Ontario section of the said all-Canadian pipe line...

And this is the answer to the honourable gentleman's question.

> . . . from the portions thereof from the vicinity of Winnipeg, Manitoba to the Manitoba-Ontario border, and from the vicinity of Kapuskasing, Ontario to Brooklin, Ontario, so that all portions of the said pipe line to be constructed by Trans-Canada will be ready for operation at the time of completion of the northern Ontario section.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: What is the penalty if it does not do that?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It will have $80 million invested, and no revenue.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Would it not have revenue for the line to Winnipeg?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Practically none in comparison to the investment.

May I add that there is an additional obligation, that the Board of Transport Commissioners makes it a condition that the company will build this line throughout, and if it does not do so it will lose its permit.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: What would be the best revenue it could get per year from the city of Winnipeg alone?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is a difficult question and I afraid that would take a lot of arithmetic and speculation. I am informed that it would be very small compared to the investment.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I was told that it could not go over $4 million.

Hon. Mr. Croll: There is great confusion and misunderstanding throughout this country as to the magic date of June 7. What fixes June 7 as the date? Why not June 14, or June 1. Of course, I know June 7 is in the agreement, but how did it get there?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There are about 120 construction days between July 1st and the end of the year. It will take about three weeks to get the pipe and to hire the contractors and to get started generally.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: To move on to the job.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In other words, it will take about three weeks to move on to the job. Therefore, the work must start on July 1. June 7 was fixed as the date on which the company should know they are going on with the work.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Paragraph 3 of the agreement of May 8 mentioned 720 million cubic feet per day. If I am in order, the first question I wish to ask is this: What quantity of gas has been granted to the company by the province of Alberta? My second question is: Since the line from Winnipeg to Emerson is left out in the agreement, will the 720 million cubic feet per day granted be the amount of the gas for the western line and the northern line to Toronto and Montreal?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The maximum day's capacity that will go through the pipe line is 720 million cubic feet.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Does that apply to the agreement from Alberta?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, the agreement from Alberta is 620 million cubic feet. That is the maximum day. The daily average is about 500 million cubic feet.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Then would they be able to get that amount of gas when the pipe line is built to Winnipeg? Would they be able to supply through Emerson to the United States if they were granted permission by the United States authorities, or will all the gas that is allowed now remain in Canada?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The Government will allow an export into the United States through Emerson up to 200 million cubic feet per day.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Will that come off the 720 cubic feet?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That will come off the 500 million cubic feet, and leave 300 million cubic feet for Canada.

The Hon. The Chairman: Honourable senators, I wonder if we could deal with this bill clause by clause in an orderly way. We have before us at the present time section 3, which deals with establishment of the corporation, its constitution, by-laws, head office, and so on.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I rise on a point of order right there? I have looked over the bill, and I have the agreement here, and I cannot see how I can confine myself to this section if I want to ask questions on what is contained in the agreement, when it has not been placed properly before the Senate. That is why I prefaced my remarks by asking if I was in order to ask the questions.

The Hon. The Chairman: We have been dealing with finances too, and that comes under clause 6.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Mr. Chairman, from reading clause 3 I gather that the Governor in Council will appoint a president and four other directors. No provision is made for a salary for the president. There is a provision for out-of-pocket expenses. I gather that it is intended to appoint civil servants. Is it the intention to appoint civil servants now and continue to appoint civil servants at all times?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: All I can say to the honourable gentleman is that there is no provision in the bill for the payment of the salary to which he refers.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Is it not a fact that crown corporations do not employ civil servants?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: This section of the bill does not provide for the appointment of employees, but for the appointment of a president and four other directors. Of course, there will be employees, and they will be paid, and there will be a general manager who will also be paid.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I understand that; but they will not be selected with the assistance of the Civil Service Commission, or taken from the Civil Service, is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: They may be taken from the Civil Service.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It may be that they would be selected from the Civil Service.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Is it not a fact that crown corporations do not engage civil servants?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If they engage them, they would be subject to the provisions of the crown corporation and not the Civil Service regulations.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: May I ask a further question, which may have been answered when I was absent from the chamber? Is the construction of the line considered to be a sound investment, if American markets are not available?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That question was raised earlier when the honourable gentleman was called from the chamber. I stated that it was my opinion that in due time, after the markets are built up, the line will be economically sound, but that it will probably be several years before that condition will prevail.

The section was agreed to.

On Section 4—body corporate; agent of Her Majesty; property of Her Majesty; proceedings by and against the corporation.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question, and if I am out of order in doing so, I would ask you to rule it out. The agreements which were placed before the house are both dated May 8. The first agreement was signed on November 21, 1955, and apparently it was amended on April 26. What were the chief amendments to that agreement?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The only change made on April 26 was the change of date from May 1 to November 1.

The section was agreed to.

On section 5—Purposes of the corporation.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Read clause 5. What does it cover?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what would be the management costs of the undertaking, if the Government takes possession of it due to the failure of the company to carry out its obligations.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, as I read clause 5 of the bill, it deals with the construction and operation of the northern Ontario section. That is the section in which the dominion and the province of Ontario will be partners in the construction and they will be the owners of that section.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Provided!

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Provided what?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Provided that the conditions stipulated by the Province of Ontario are fulfilled.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Very well, I can be as technical as my friend.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I am not being technical.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Section 5 provides for the construction by the crown company, as agent, on behalf of the crown, of the section known as the northern Ontario section. The crown believes that it has a partner in the Province of Ontario, and if the conditions as laid down by the province are met, it will have a partner which will contribute up to $35 million. But the crown, in the right of the dominion, with or without a partner in the person of the Province of Ontario, will own that section, and leasing arrangements will be made under which Trans-Canada will be entitled to use that section on payment of rent which it is expected will be fixed on a basis which will in time repay the purchase price and interest, as well as a reasonable rent for its use.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: . That is not an answer to the question I have put.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Would the honourable gentleman be good enough to repeat his question?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I am referring to what would happen if the conditions are not met by the company and the Government takes possession. What then will be the yearly cost of management by the Government?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It is very difficult to estimate just what the management costs will be, but it is expected that within a few years after completion, the revenues will be sufficient to pay the administration and operating costs. I think that is as far as I can go.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Can the honourable gentleman say how much gas would have to be sold to meet these charges?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: In the meantime, may I say I think I now understand my honourable friend's question. Let us assume that there is default by Trans-Canada in the repayment of $80 million, and the Government comes into possession of that section from Alberta to Winnipeg. At that time, what is the position of the Government in relation to its commitments for the Ontario section? And if it does go ahead with the building of the rest of the line, what is likely to be the cost of management and operation of that line? Is that the question?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Yes, the yearly cost.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is the information I am endeavouring to get from the experts, but I think on this occasion we may have stumped them.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: While that information is being looked up, Mr. Chairman, could I ask what is the estimated savings to the consumers if they get this cheaper fuel?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is another very difficult question. I do not think even the experts feel they can answer that one.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I attempt to answer the question of my friend from King's (Honourable Mr. McDonald)? In my own house in Winnipeg I use central steam heating. If I took that system out I would lose its value, namely $500, which it cost me to put it in; then I would have to spend another $1,000 to put a gas furnace in. Therefore, I would be out a total of $1,500.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Where did you get that information?

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is the estimate we have received as to the cost of installing gas.

Hon. Mr. Farris: It is not the information I have.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is what it costs to put in a new gas furnace.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Even if the gas furnace cost only $500, there is a question of whether the householder would want to change over from central heat to gas. His decision would depend on a lot of other things than cost. For instance, with central heating there is no danger from fire, because only steam comes into the house. In my own case I would not convert to gas if it was only a quarter of the cost. So, I do not think the experts can answer that question.

I fail to find anything in this bill with respect to the Ontario agreement. I know there has been an exchange of correspondence between Mr. Dana Porter, at one time the Ontario Attorney General and now the Provincial Treasurer, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It may be that they are legally bound by the letters.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: There is a statute.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But where is it covered in this bill?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It is included in clause 5, to which we are now referring, and the agreement with respect to it was tabled in this house on the date that I mentioned a moment ago.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: If my honourable friend will look at section 5 (1) (c) he will see there reference to the agreement with the Government of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We do not have that agreement before us.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It appears in the Minutes of the Proceedings.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: What does it say about Ontario's share in the ownership of the northern Ontario section after it is completed? Are shares being issued to them?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, there are no shares in the northern Ontario section. It is owned by the crown company, and Ontario will have contributed an amount not greater than $35 million.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: What will they have to show for it?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: They will have $35 million in it.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: A $35 million equity?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: An equity, if you will. They will have $35 million in it, the same as if it were privately owned. As I say, that agreement was tabled in the house some time ago.

Now as to the question asked by my honourable friend from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot), I think the answer is set forth in an involved table headed "Wholly-Owned Government Pipe Line Income Projection for the six years ending October 31, 1957 to 1962". It is a lengthy table. Would it be satisfactory to honourable senators if the table appears in Hansard?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

WHOLLY-OWNED GOVERNMENT PIPELINE
INCOME PROJECTION
FOR THE SIX YEARS ENDING OCTOBER 31, 1957 to 1962

	1957	1958	1959	1960	1961	1962
		(all figures in thousands of dollars)
Gross revenues	$ 6,647	$33,836	$43,072	$51,107	$57,816	$61,587
Operating expenses:
Cost of gas	$ 4,646	$11,130	$14,546	$17,530	$20,300	$21,727
Other operations and maintenance	1,200	4,300	5,000	5,200	5,260	5,300

Depreciation at 3½% of cost	$ 4,005	$12,000	$12,453	$12,453	$12,453	$12,453

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I thank you very much. Now that the Leader has given that information would it be possible to know how many consumers are to be served by the pipe line?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have a report here from Clarkson, Gordon and Company, who prepared the statement I am tabling. But I do not see that information in this table. In the meantime this document will appear in Hansard. I will endeavour to obtain an answer to the question as to the number of consumers.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I mean Canadian consumers in the first place, and American consumers in the second place, if there are to be any.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: So far as American consumers are concerned Trans-Canada will deal with one customer only in the United States, and that would be the company that purchased the gas.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: And they will resell it?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes. Trans-Canada will have no customers apart from the one purchaser.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I wish to ask if the document which the Leader has in his hand, which I understand was prepared by Clarkson, Gordon and Company, is based on accurate information or on an estimate or a guess that somebody has made?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It is based on information gathered by this company at the request to the Ontario Government.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Clarkson, Gordon and Company are generally pretty careful about the kind of certificates they give. What do they say on that one, that if the hopes of the company are realized something will happen? How do they work it out?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: All I can say is that this company was retained by the provincial Government to make a study of this question.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Yes, but what do they say in their certificate?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Here is the statement. I can pass it over to my honourable friend. I am sure if I read it to him it will not be very intelligible. It is a statement that was prepared by this very reliable company after a study was made by them.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is there something in the report with reference to that statement?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I am willing to agree that it is a very reliable company; that is why I am particularly interested in the kind of statement they made. It must be predicated on a great many ifs and perhapses.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think it is a quite pertinent question. Probably the best way to answer it would be to read the conclusions in the report.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The report is quite a lengthy one. The conclusions to it read:

> The plan for building the pipe line with Government assistance as proposed appears to be economically feasible if the Company is able to carry out the work on the timetable which it has laid out. However, in view of the many existing uncertainties the Company may well be unable to achieve its timetable. It also appears that an all government-owned pipe line would be economically feasible even though no sales were made to the United States.

That answers another question that was asked.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I continue:

However, because of the problems inherent in government ownership of a pipe line, it would undoubtedly take a considerable length of time for the several governments interested in the project to reach agreement on the terms of a joint government undertaking.

In view of the shortness of time, therefore, the only chance for commencement of the line in 1956 seems to lie in proceeding with the present proposals. A decision to do so should facilitate the company's negotiations with other parties, but it should be pointed out that the proposed agreement of the governments to participate by no means assures the success of the company's plans. It would, therefore, appear desirable that further consideration should be given to the development of a plan of action to be adopted in the event that the company's plans should fail.

The real evidence of the company's ability to carry out its obligations and complete the pipe line as a whole will be in the completion of firm arrangements for the financing of the whole of the expenditures to be undertaken by the company. The over-all cost of the project is estimated at approximately $375,000,000 of which the Northern Ontario section represents an estimated $117,600,000, leaving approximately $257,400,000 to be financed by the company. If the company is unable to produce evidence satisfactory to the Government of Canada that it has arranged for its complete financing before May 1, 1956, the Crown Corporation is free of any obligation to proceed with the construction of the Northern Ontario section. We recommend that the government of Ontario, in turn, before advancing any money, should be satisfied that conclusive proof is available that the company is able to carry out its commitments.

In conclusion, we wish to acknowledge the courtesies and co-operation we have received from officers of the Trans-Canada Company and from officials of the Ontario and Federal Governments.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) Clarkson, Gordon & Co.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Does it not say anything about the schedule you are filing?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I wish to thank the honourable Leader for reading the certificate, which is just about what I thought it would be.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: What protection is the consumer to have against exactions of the company? For instance, our railways come under the jurisdiction of the Board of Transport Commissioners. What regulatory authority will protect the gas consumer?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In each province there is a board having jurisdiction in such matters. In one province it is called the Public Utility Commission. In Ontario there is what is called the Ontario Fuel Board. Boards in the various provinces approve the rates which are to be charged.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Control will be left to the provinces in that regard?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: When the fuel reaches the provinces and is being distributed there it will come under regulations prevailing in that province. My honourable friend asked another question, as to the number of persons to be served. It has been estimated that 70 per cent of the population of Canada will be within range of the pipe line and its proposed branches. We do not have before us any breakdown of this estimate, but I am satisfied that it is approximately correct. It was filed before the Alberta Natural Gas Conservation Board.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: The sum of $375 millions is for the main pipe line, not for the private installations?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: My honourable friend is correct. It is estimated that over $600 million more will be spent on installations and distribution systems and so forth.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: With regard to the point mentioned by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), is it not a fact that, for central heating, there would not be an installation of furnaces in a house, but only an installation of gas in a central heating plant?

Hon. Mr. Molson: May I ask what assurance there is that 51 per cent of the common stock will be offered to Canadian citizens, and whether there is any assurance as to comparability of prices?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That provision appears in the purchase ageement dated February 8, 1956, between Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, Tennessee Gas Transmission Company, Canadian Gulf Oil Company and Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Was that agreement tabled?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, it has not been tabled.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Who sets the price?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The question now is with regard to the stock.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I know, but who sets the price of the stock?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The clause in the agreement is number 6:

6. Trans-Canada declares and agrees that its arrangements for the financing of the costs of construction of the West-East natural gas transmission line proposed to be built by Trans-Canada will include a public offering in Canada of common shares of Trans-Canada's presently unissued capital stock in an amount of not less than 51 (fifty-one) per cent of the total number of common shares of Trans-Canada to be outstanding after such offering has been made, including the shares covered by such offering, and that it is Trans-Canada's intention to effect a wide distribution of such shares throughout Canada.

Hon. Mr. Haig: What is the price at which the stock is to be issued? That is very important.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The proposal is that the shares shall be offered at $10 per share to the public. That is approximately $2 a share more than was paid by the original shareholders.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: How many shares have been issued or are held at the present time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Something less than two million shares.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Who are the big shareholders?

The Chairman: Order. The honourable senator from Bruce (Hon. Mr. Stambaugh) has the floor.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: I would like to make a short statement on the question asked by the honourable senator from King's (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) with regard to what would be the saving to consumers. The part of Alberta where I come from is quite near a natural gas field. We can buy for $3 per ton a quality of lignite coal very similar to what is being used in Winnipeg for its central heating unit. We can buy for about $7 or $8 a ton a good quality bituminous coal which compares very favourably with what is imported from Pennsylvania. Also we have gas, so we have ceased to use coal. Between my place and Edmonton are five little towns. They could buy coal at the prices I have stated, but there is not a single consumer of coal in any of those towns; they are using natural gas. I know we can get natural gas more cheaply than it could be had down here, but I think the cost of gas in the east proportionate to that of coal will be no more than ours.

Hon. Mr. Haig: What is the price?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: A question was asked by the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) as to the names of the shareholders.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The large ones.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I can put the names on Hansard if the honourable gentleman so wishes.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Put all the names on Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I will do so.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It has been stated on behalf of the Government that the retail price of gas will be controlled by the provincial fuel boards. That was the answer to a question as to what protection the retail purchaser would have. No doubt it is a very good protection to the consumer, but what is the protection to the dominion Government or to a provincial Government? What would prevent a fuel board from setting an uneconomic price for the benefit of the consumer if price fixing is in the hands of a provincial fuel board?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The only reason I attempt to deal with this question is that I have been right in the middle of this matter, so far as this kind of distribution is concerned, in Ontario, ranging from Whitby as far as Cornwall, on the basis that Trans-Canada will establish the main line and there will be distribution in each municipality under the Fuel Act of Ontario. In the first instance, if some company is seeking the right to be a distributor in a municipality, it must satisfy the Ontario Fuel Board that the terms and conditions of the proposed agreement under which it will hold the franchise of the municipality are just and reasonable. Once that has been done, and the municipality has voted on and passed the by-law, you have the agreement, and the company must then go back to the fuel board to establish what is known as "public necessity and convenience". That having been done, a certificate is issued which qualifies the company for all purposes, except that, when the gas is coming along, application must be made to the fuel board to have the distribution rate fixed.

My friend asked the question, "What is there to prevent the fuel board in Ontario from fixing an uneconomic price?" The answer is simply this. There is nothing to prevent it except the common sense of the board members. How long would they keep their jobs if they approved an installation and then established an uneconomic price as a result of which the installation could not function?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Has the Government any guarantee that the company will not build a line through Emerson to the United States before serving the eastern part of Canada?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No export permit will be granted to the United States until there is complete assurance that the line will be built across Canada.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: What will the Government do if more revenue is needed to build the missing link between Winnipeg and Ontario? Will the Government supply the money if the work is not completed in due course?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am not prepared to say what the Government will do in that case, but I can say that it would be necessary for the Government to come back to Parliament and get additional authority.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I have three questions to ask and perhaps in order to save time I could ask them together. They all have to do with financing and shares. Will the offer of 51 per cent of the shares be made while all other shares are in escrow to the Government? If they place the shares which they have now in escrow, will they go out into the market and offer more shares? My second question—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Probably I should answer that question first. The company must repay the loan which it receives for building the western line out of its public financing.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I realize what can be done with shares. I know that anyone can come in from the United States or any place else and buy shares. A short time ago the honourable leader said that these shares were going to be offered in Canada. I do not know whether it would be a safeguard but it might be useful to say they are being offered to Canadians, for there is nothing to prevent Americans coming up here and buying shares.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: They could be purchased through Canadians anyway.

Hon. Mr. Reid: My third question is this. What about the provision in the agreement whereby members of the House of Commons are not allowed to buy shares and senators can. What is the answer to that?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: There is no such provision.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The House of Commons Act requires that all such contracts carry such a clause. That is the only reason.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It is a wonder they did not spell it out in the agreement

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If you wanted it to apply to senators you would have to amend the act respecting senators.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Section 4 of the shareholders' agreement reads:

> Trans-Canada agrees not to issue any further shares of its stock unless and until the subscriber has undertaken and agreed to place share certificates representing such shares in escrow, to be dealt with as provided for in this agreement.

According to that they would be able to issue and sell shares, but subject to these agreements.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It is provided they cannot do it until after the loan is repaid, and then this agreement falls.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: There is nothing here to say that.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I understand that the east end of the pipe line will be located in Montreal. I wonder if the people east of Montreal will ever have natural gas from Trans-Canada? Will the line not go farther east than Montreal?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In reply to the honourable gentleman from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), may I say that section 4 of the shareholders' agreement prevents the selling of any shares to the public until the loan is repaid.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I thought that section meant the shares could be sold subject to the agreement.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Let us go back to the Canadian shares. I am a little disturbed about them. Supposing an American comes to a real estate man in Winnipeg and says, "Mr. Brown, you are a real estate man and I understand shares in Trans-Canada Pipe Lines are being put up for sale. I want you to buy me 100,000 shares. Here is the money. Go buy the shares in your own name." There is nothing to prevent that, is there?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Nothing.

Hon. Mr. Haig: A Canadian would be buying them but it would be an American owning them.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The only reply I can make to the Leader of the Opposition is that this provision for making shares available in Canada is directly opposite to the financing of any other pipe line. With respect to all other pipe lines companies that have been financed, the sale of shares has taken place in United States.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Not all.

Hon Mr. Macdonald: Practically all. There may be a few minor exceptions.

Hon. Mr. Gershaw: In reply to the question raised as to the quantity of gas that might reach the eastern part of this dominion, may I say that the reserve in Alberta is now estimated at 16 trillion cubic feet. Now, a trillion is a lot. It is said that 4.45 trillion cubic feet will last the province of Alberta for thirty years. In addition to that they are discovering new pockets of gas at the rate of three-quarters of a trillion cubic feet per year. Therefore there is a tremendous reserve of gas. The 500 million cubic feet which is contracted for here will take only a small portion of the present gas reserve. So the honourable gentleman from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) has a good chance of obtaining Alberta gas.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I thank my honourable friend for his most valuable information. I admit I would have been unable to make that calculation. I am just wondering why this pipe line should stop in Montreal and not go farther east. It should go to Quebec City and on down to the Maritimes. The people there should have an opportunity to benefit from it. I wonder why it is to stop at Montreal?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is a terminal point.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I might say that Montreal is the first target and after that objective has been reached, if there is plenty of gas and it is deemed advisable, it will be piped farther east. I cannot guarantee that, but I think Montreal is a pretty good target at the present time.

The section was agreed to.

On section 7—Loans by corporation to Trans-Canada for construction of western section.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask a question regarding clause 7(2)(e)? Does subparagraph (e) allow the Government to make another agreement without coming to Parliament?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators have noted that in this agreement, in the general terms, the rate of interest, and so forth, has been set out in detail, but there are unforeseen contingencies. I do not think anyone could draw an agreement of this type which would be completely conclusive. There must be a certain amount of flexibility, and it is for that reason, and for that reason only, that this clause appears in the—

Hon. Mr. Reid: Would a new agreement have to come before Parliament?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No. As long as it was within the provisions of the act a new agreement would not have to come before Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Molson: May I ask what the estimated value of imported fuels might be that the Alberta gas would displace?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is a very difficult question. In fact, I do not think I could say just what quantity of any given fuel would be replaced by the gas. I can say this much, that we are importing at the present time about 20 million tons of coal, and the estimate is that the gas would take the place of about possibly 14 million tons of coal. Probably it would replace about two-thirds of the amount of coal which is being imported.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Any oil?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Some oil, but of course we are getting a lot of oil now from western Canada.

Hon. Mr. Molson: We are still importing some.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: And the fuel consumption is going on all the time.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: May I inform the honourable gentleman that I think that in Ontario at the present time 50 per cent of the energy in northern Ontario is developed from the use of imported coal.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: What about hydro-electric power? Heating is done by electricity, and machinery is driven by that power. Is that displaced by coal?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: All I can say in reply to that question is that the hydro-electric companies, in so far as Ontario is concerned, in any event, will welcome the advent of this gas.

The section was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The bill was reported.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Some Hon. Senators: Now.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Haig: My honourable friend from Vancouver-South (Hon. Mr. Farris) can call "Now" if he likes. If that is the feeling of the house, all well and good.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Farris: What is the objection?

Hon. Mr. Haig: If the house is not agreeable to third reading now, I suggest that we meet tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock. I do not want the charge to be laid against this house that the bill was forced through in one day. That just is not done.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There is no doubt that some honourable gentlemen might like to have the bill read the third time now, but many others may think that the hour is late and that we should meet tomorrow morning. Perhaps half-past ten tomorrow morning would be agreeable?

Before the house adjourns I wish to take this opportunity to thank the two gentlemen who are sitting before me now for coming here and rendering valuable assistance, both to me and, indirectly, to the Senate this evening.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: With the consent of the house may I say a word before we adjourn? I wish to thank the Leader of the Government for the splendid way in which he has conducted this Committee of the Whole. It has been a very great pleasure to all of us.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Godbout, that this bill be placed on the Order Paper for third reading at the next sitting of the house.

The motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Is there any statement to be made about adjournment tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I was going to propose that the house should meet tomorrow at 10:30. I presume we cannot have the Royal Assent to the bill before 3 o'clock. The House of Commons will be in session at 2:30, and we might have the Royal Assent at 3 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Haig: You cannot have it in the morning, because the House of Commons will not be sitting then.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No. With regard to adjournment after tomorrow. I cannot say, because I do not know what business the House of Commons will be dealing with.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: What about supply?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As honourable senators know, a very sad incident occurred today. One of the members of the House of Commons, a personal friend of many of us, passed away very suddenly. No doubt tributes to him will be expressed in the Commons tomorrow.

I do not know the position with regard to the interim supply bill in the other house. However, I hope that the Royal Assent will be given tomorrow, and if so I would propose an adjournment over the week-end, but I cannot be definite on the point.

Honourable senators, I move that when this house rises this evening it stand adjourned until tomorrow morning at 10:30 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 10:30 a.m.

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CROWN CORPORATION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the third reading of Bill 298, an Act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, before this bill is given third reading I wish to make my position with respect to it a little clearer, and again to protest its passage.

I have always believed that most business projects can be undertaken perhaps better by private enterprise, but when it comes to an undertaking of the magnitude of this pipe line my opinion is that the speediest possible method of completing this line throughout would be for the Government to build it. Let us take the example of the Canadian National Railways. I say to those who are so much opposed to a Government-built pipe line that the Canadian National Railways Company is not only in the freight carrying business in competition with truckers and the other railroad, but is also in the hotel business and even in the beer parlour and cocktail lounge business.

Yesterday, the leader in justification of the method used for closure in the short debate here referred to a measure that was put through in 1932. Well, I imagine that one of the reasons why there was almost no debate here on that measure was that everyone felt there were no reasonable grounds for opposing the measure. The leader said that the measure was of some magnitude. True. But there was a world-wide depression on at the time, a depression of the severest kind, and the bill provided a method of relief for Canadians. That bill had nothing to do with millionaires whatever.

I may say that, to me, yesterday was the saddest day since I have been in this chamber. I feel in my heart that there are a number of honourable senators in this chamber other than we in this little group who are very doubtful of the wisdom of this undertaking and the method by which it is being proceeded with. It is no wonder that there are articles in the press suggesting that this is an opportunity for the Senate. I had always thought that at some time again the Senate would, as it has done in the past, attempt to do something for the ordinary Canadian citizen, instead of rushing through a bill that, I claim, will largely assist the wealthy, who need no assistance at all. Here in this chamber is an opportunity for me to speak for the common man. Before I take my seat I shall ask for a recorded vote by every honourable senator in this chamber, so that the Canadian people may know exactly where each senator stands on this issue.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I am told that a reply may be made by the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). It is not so long ago since he made a six- or nine-hour speech decrying a government not of his political stripe for arranging for more power, he said, than Ontario needed or could ever use. Now, I suppose, he will get up and talk about the need of industrial capital. In other words, he is going to reverse himself, but that is nothing to him where politics are concerned, because for ever he is a constant Liberal.

What substance is there in this talk about expanding industrial need? I wish I felt as confident as some do that we can continue to dispose of even the volume within our present capacity to produce. I wish I could feel sure that there is a reasonable hope of full employment in industry without any increase of power. What reason have we to expect an expansion of sales abroad? What is the condition of the automobile industry at the present time? Over-production. Yet, in spite of the additional power soon to be provided, as the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) has reminded us, from the St. Lawrence Seaway development, we are told that Ontario needs more power for its industries. To produce what? Goods to be sold to the Canadian people? No: the ruling idea is exports, and, with wage rates higher in Canada than in almost any other part of the world, where and what can we hope to export on a competitive basis?

Another point: if what the honourable member from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) has said is correct, we are unable to build a pipe line without American help. I am astonished to hear such nonsense from a man of his years and ability. The people of the British Commonwealth were building pipe lines before the Americans knew of such things, and we can either use our own domestic labour to manufacture pipe, or import a supply of pipe from the United Kingdom, thereby enlarging a market for products we have to sell and which the British people are anxious to buy. But, no, we must make this grand sell-out. I am still convinced that this proposition should be undertaken jointly by the provinces and the dominion. Together they should build this trunk line and lease distributing rights or sell the gas through distributors to the areas that require it. No one can argue that this would be impossible, for the federal Government has control when the commodity crosses interprovincial lines and it has full power to refuse exports to foreign markets. To say that the Alberta Government is going to sell gas to certain people only is just child's talk. If we are no longer a federal Parliament, then we should dissolve, go home and leave this matter to the provinces.

Honourable senators, as I have said, I would like to see a recorded vote, so that future generations will know just how every senator present voted on this bill.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I have already received a very kind introduction to this audience, and for that I thank the honourable senator who has just sat down. In concluding my remarks of Tuesday on the motion to suspend certain rules I expressed the hope, and I think the expectation, that when this debate ended we would all be proud of the chamber to which we belong. In that regard I based my prognostication upon what has taken place in this chamber over the considerable number of years in which I have been here, and let me hasten to say that I am indeed proud right now of this chamber, and of its performance since this bill was placed before us. I congratulate the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) upon the thorough and clear explanation he gave of this bill yesterday. His knowledge of the subject is positively remarkable.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I would also extend my felicitations to the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) for the splendid way in which he approached the subject, from a different standpoint—

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: —but with that sense of parliamentary dignity which means so much when we are seeking clear thought. As a matter of fact, the entire Opposition is entitled to our appreciation for the work that has been done during these last few hours. Am I wrong when I say that during the very short time in which we have had this bill before us more information and enlightenment have been given to the people of Canada on the pipe line subject than have appeared in the last month or two in the public press and elsewhere?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: For the first time this bill was dispassionately, fully, carefully and wisely considered. In these two days we have shown the need for this chamber and the service it can render to the people of Canada. The advisability of a second chamber and the wisdom of a sober second thought have been amply demonstrated. A great subject has been dealt with in a clear, cool, calm and dispassionate manner.

My good friend from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) anticipated that I would deliver an address. Well, that is not unusual on my part.

Hon. Mr. Horner: No, indeed.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: He recalls that on one occasion I spoke for nine hours on a subject of great industrial importance to the citizens of the province of Ontario. People seem to remember only that I spoke for nine hours, although he might have recalled that for the second two years during which I was the provincial Government representative on the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario we paid just $7 million a year less for the power we purchased than we would have done if I had not been a member of that board. It is still remembered that I spoke for nine hours. I did, and I calculated that the saving I caused to the consumers of power amounted to more than $100,000 an hour. If at any time again I can contribute by an address to the extent that I did on that occasion I shall have no reason for apology.

However, honourable senators, that is quite aside from what we have here before us. The honourable senator from Blaine Lake says that he is in favour of the pipe line. Apparently, we are all in favour of a pipe line. In that, at least, we are unanimous. My friend is not opposed to the private ownership of the pipe line. His one point is, so far as I can gather, that he wants the pipe line built by the speediest method possible.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I want it to be publicly owned.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I wrote his words down, —"the speediest method possible." Well, from all information that is before us in this house, or elsewhere, the speediest method possible of getting that pipe line is by means of the bill. That is the speediest method possible. The need for speed is another matter, but if we are to satisfy the member from Blaine Lake, this is the bill that will do the job; it will give him the pipe line with the greatest assurance and at the greatest speed of any proposition that is before us.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Not at all.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I did not speak yesterday, and I am not going to discuss the pipe line question at any length, because that has been done so thoroughly and so magnificently by speakers who have preceded me, on both sides of the house. The information given yesterday was as complete as could be given at this stage of the undertaking. There will be a time when we shall know more about it. Hindsight is always more effective than foresight, but for the present we have now before us all the information that it is possible to obtain, and, accordingly, I do not intend to thresh old straw by going over the controversy again this morning. But I do want to put myself straight with the district from which I come and the people who look to me for expression of opinion. I too have received many wires and communications from various sources, as has the senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll). I wish to join with him in many of the thoughts to which he gave expression yesterday. While no one ever adopts in full another's speech, his general attitude toward this matter is in very close accord with mine. I wish to make clear to the house, and to those who may be sufficiently interested to learn of what I have said, the position I take with regard to public ownership.

It seems to me there must be a principle by which one can take guidance from time to time. I am not a follower of Karl Marx; I do not think it is wise for governments to engage in what is properly private enterprise. There is an old saying: The government that governs best is the government that governs least. I stand for private enterprise in those things which competition can regulate. I do not believe in setting aside the natural forces called competition and endeavouring to control the economy of the nation by conscious direction from a headquarters. I believe it is much better to allow the individual to use his own enterprise and intelligence, and with the combined enterprise, intelligence and industry of us all achieve the common purpose of a high standard of living.

But while I am for private enterprise where it is possible and can be free, I am not afraid of doing things under public control where it is clear in each instance that the public interest will be served. My friend from Blaine Lake talks about governments selling beer, running hotels and that sort of thing. Well, those are spasmodic, individual instances which may or may not be justified; but which do not interfere with the general principles of the national economy and relationships of man to man, as do the theories of Karl Marx, who would have the government take over all private enterprise, make all people public servants and run everything from a central bureau.

I say there must be some good principle upon which we can depend in these matters. It has been my thought that whenever an industry requires special privileges to operate —such as a railway, which must be franchised—and which cannot be truly competitive, then that is properly a public service and should be at least owned, if not operated, by the public. Look at the many and various things we do by public ownership and without objection, because we have so thoroughly proved and justified our action. It was thought at one time by the advocates of private enterprise that the public could not run a railway. Well, today it runs a railway that is better managed than the privately owned one.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is my opinion. The publicly-owned railway gives just as good service as does the privately-owned railway. We run our schools and our post offices and we build our roads. Fancy private enterprise endeavouring to provide roads, a truly public service!

In the category of public service, in my opinion, a pipe line is to be included. I believe it to be by its nature a public service. I would be much happier if at this moment we were considering a bill for the construction of a publicly owned, and perhaps publicly operated, pipe line to bring gas from the west for service in the east. I do not join with those who yesterday expressed the hope that this deal would not end in public ownership. I assure my fellow senators that I would not be so unkind as to express a hope of failure on the part of this company. That would be entirely wrong. I wish success to their enterprise; if in the course of events they fail, I will regret it; but if it results in public ownership of this pipe line I will find no reason to weep tears. I will think that the natural course of events has brought it about, and that it is in accordance with good principle. I will then hope that we as a nation can make a success of an enterprise in which private individuals have failed. In the meantime, let me wish the company success and not failure.

Having put myself right with my fellow senators and others in the matter of public ownership, let me discuss for a moment the bill itself. My good friend the Leader of the Opposition has announced that he and his followers will vote against the bill. I have been wondering whether he would have, shall I say, the nerve to vote against this measure, and thus deny to the people of his province of Manitoba and his city of Winnipeg the early advantage of this public service, to deny to the people of Alberta the advantages which are evident in this bill, and further to deny to my province of Ontario the industrial advantages of this cheaper fuel. Would he vote to deny these people all these advantages if he thought that his vote would destroy the bill? If he would, he has a good deal more nerve than I have, because I certainly would not do so. My hand would tremble if in those circumstances my cross were to be placed on that side of the ballot.

We all want the gas. The stage is set for the commencement of the work. It is not only a good deal, but it is a hard bargain that has been driven. One of the Opposition members suggested that as an alternative we call for tenders. We know right now that no one is prepared to tender. By calling for tenders we would only delay the commencement of the work. Nobody in this house, other than the senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) and myself, has expressed any desire for public ownership. The Conservative Party may be on the verge of getting up to date, but they have not done so yet.

Hon. Mr. Farris: "Brink" is the word.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I tried to say I was for it, but you must have misunderstood me.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Are you in favour of public ownership?

Hon. Mr. Horner: I certainly am.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Then you had better come over here.

So with all these very complicated circumstances, resolved by a very capable businessman, Mr. Howe, in the best form that apparently is possible, I am not prepared to vote against the measure. There is a responsibility in a big proposition such as this—business is always a risk, every business is a risk, but I am prepared to take the risk and when the vote is called I shall vote in favour of this bill.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, I am not going to make a speech, but I have three things I would like to say. First of all I am going to support this pipe line bill although there are many things about it which I, like some of my friends, am not too happy about.

However, I feel that construction of this line will be a good thing for my native province of Alberta and I think it will be an excellent thing for Canada. In the last few years I have seen what the development of oil and gas has done in my own province, and if you go to that province today you cannot but feel the burgeoning growth on every hand. There is an excitement, a vitality, a virility that is stimulating to all Canadians who visit that area. I am hoping that some of that new vigour and life and vitality, that new energy, will be shoved through the pipe line to this older and quieter and more stable part of Canada. I have felt that what this development has done for Alberta, it will do for eastern Canada.

Secondly, I want to say, along with my honourable friends from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) and Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), that I do not share the fear that some of my colleagues have of public ownership. I would have been happier had this been a public utility, but this situation is a matter of choice and in many cases we are not able to do the thing we would like to do.

This is an age of compromise, and the compromise I think we have to make on this occasion is to make the best of the circumstances in which we find ourselves. So I am going to go along and support this bill and hope the pipe line will be a great success.

Thirdly—and I want to say this with all the emphasis I can—because of a combination of special circumstances it may be too late to do anything else today than put this bill through, but I hope that never again for any reason will any bill of this magnitude and importance come to the Senate with what is in effect an ultimatum that it must be passed by a certain time. There are special circumstances here, we all admit, but I think we must serve notice now without fear of misunderstanding that we in the Senate do not want to see this happen again.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Hear, hear.

Hon. John T. Hackett: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to debate the points of view that the honourable member from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) has set before the house. He favours public ownership; I do not.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: We have been told that information cannot be had because it is too late. That mocking spectre "too late" is always before us when we seek information on matters of importance to those who promote them. No information has been given on which to place any reasonable belief, hope or expectation that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines can find moneys by April next to repay the $80 million that is to be advanced to it for the construction of its line. Neither has any information been given as to the source of the money that will be required to pay the interest on the amounts to be advanced, and, more important still, to complete the pipe line from Winnipeg to the Ontario frontier. Trans-Canada must inevitably fall into the maw of government or of a crown corporation, which means public ownership.

For these reasons I shall oppose the bill and shall vote against it.

I wish to add one word with regard to a newspaper report referred to as containing a speech made in Toronto by a Conservative member of the House of Commons. If the honourable senator who made reference to that speech had read the same newspaper that I read and the same report that I read, he would have seen that what that honourable gentleman said in Toronto was, "We were on the brink of being forced into public ownership". I know that there are many newspapers published, but there was not in the report that I read anything to indicate that the party which Mr. Fleming represents, and to which I belong, favours construction or operation of the pipe line by the Government.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I might say to my honourable friend that I referred to the Montreal Star.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: That in most instances is an excellent journal, but when it is dealing with matters which fringe on party policy and interests it is not from any point of view as entirely reliable as Holy Writ.

Hon. J. Wesley Stambaugh: Honourable senators, I would like to bring out one point that I do not think has been mentioned with regard to this pipe line. If this line is built and millions of cubic feet of gas are exported from Alberta, it will come from what is known as the Pincher Creek area, and gas in that area is very heavily laden with sulphur. To export this gas it will be necessary to scrub or cleanse it, and to do this a large refinery will be built, where thousands of tons of sulphur will be produced. Nearly all the sulphur used in Canada at present is imported from the United States, and it is in short supply; so all that is manufactured will be used in Canada, importations will be unnecessary, and in the result not only Alberta but the whole of Canada will benefit.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, before the debate is closed I should, I think, make a few remarks.

I join with the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) in expressing my great satisfaction at the manner in which this discussion has been carried on. I think this is the first time that the contents and the purposes of the bill have received any real consideration: at least, it is the first time I have been able to obtain a clear impression as to the issues involved in it. Those honourable senators who have been in attendance since yesterday morning will know by now the purpose and the necessity of the line, the conditions under which it is being built, and the circumstances under which the money is to be advanced. We have heard reasons for and against the building of the line. We have spent no time on procedural motions; we have discussed the bill. I am very grateful to all honourable members who have contributed to this debate. Personally, I have learned a great deal about the measure itself and the views held by people throughout the country with respect to it. The debate has indeed been well worth while.

I would like to assure the new member from Alberta, the honourable senator from Banff (Hon. Mr. Cameron), that there is no "ultimatum" that this bill be passed today. When certain rules were suspended I thought I emphasized—I wished to do so—as strongly as I could that so far as I was concerned debate would be curtailed in no way whatsoever.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Hear, hear. You did.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The debate is not being curtailed now. If any honourable senators wish to speak, the rest of the day is available to them. I for one shall not object. The right to take part in the debate is open to every honourable member. So there is no ultimatum, in any event from myself, and, I can say, from the Government, to the effect that the bill must be passed today.

The honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) said he did not get enough information on this matter. Honourable senators will recall that last evening, when the house was in Committee of the Whole, two well-informed officials were present, and after they left the chamber we expressed our appreciation to them for the help they gave us. They answered through me every question that was asked here. They explained that the company had a very good chance of financing this line, even if permission were not granted for exportation of gas to the United States. I put on record last night a statement setting forth the estimated earnings which would enable the company to complete the line without exportations to the United States.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: And without a statement at the time.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Without a statement? The statement I submitted sets forth clearly the amount of revenue with which it is quite possible—as I think any businessman or financier, although I am neither, will agree —that the company can finance this line even if there should be no sales in the United States. If, however, the Federal Power Commission of the United States grants an import licence there can be no doubt about the capacity of the company to finance the line.

There is only one more remark I wish to make, and that is with regard to a statement made by the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner), that this project will be of no benefit to the average man. Honourable senators, it will be of great benefit to all Canada, and therefore it will benefit every citizen of Canada. Do not take my word for it. The Treasurer of the Province of Ontario has said that this is a great national enterprise, and that, as such, it is needed today. Think of the money that will be spent. About $375 million will go for the construction of the line, and practically every cent other than is required for the purchase of pipe will be expended in Canada. Does any honourable senator mean to say that the spending of this vast sum will not be helpful to our working people? It is sure to create employment. Added to that will be the additional cost of installations, of distribution throughout the municipalities, and so forth, aggregating a total expenditure of $1 billion. I am sure that every honourable senator will concede that so large an outlay will be of great benefit, not only to the working people, but to all classes of the community.

I do not wish to delay this debate any longer. I am pleased with the suggestion of the honourable senator from Blaine Lake that there should be a recorded vote, and I shall be happy to record my vote in favour of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Will the honourable gentleman permit one question?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Surely.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: What period of time must elapse, according to the statement of the accountants from Toronto, before the pipe line can become self-supporting if a permit be not received from the United States?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: From memory I would say three years. I may be wrong in that.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: That was your answer last night.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In any event, the statement which I filed sets forth a possible increase in earnings over the next two years which would enable the company to finance the line even if the permit to export gas to the United States is not granted.

Some Hon. Senators: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Are honourable members ready for the question?

Some Hon. Senators: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the question is on the motion of the Honourable Senator Macdonald, seconded by the Honourable Senator Godbout, for the third reading of Bill 298, an Act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Carried.

Hon. Mr. Horner: No.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Let us have a vote.

The motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald was agreed to on the following division:

Bill V-14, an Act for the relief of Lorna Elizabeth Cadorette Belinsky.

Bill W-14, an Act for the relief of Benjamin Franklin Luther.

Bill X-14, an Act for the relief of Gordon Frederick Collins.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Next sitting.

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m.

At 3 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received a communication from the Secretary to the Governor General, acquainting him that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, would proceed to the Senate Chamber this day at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the Royal Assent to certain bills.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, may I draw the attention of honourable members to the fact that very little business remains on the Order Paper. For that reason I do not think it necessary that we should sit tomorrow and Monday. On the other hand, it is possible that other legislation will come over from the House of Commons; for instance, the interim supply bill. I am sure that when that bill reaches this house honourable senators would like to consider it immediately. However, I do not know when it will be dealt with in the Commons, for I have not followed the order of proceedings there during the past few days.

Honourable senators will recall that on March 21 this house authorized His Honour the Speaker to notify honourable senators, during any adjournment period, to reconvene here at a time earlier than that set out in the motion for adjournment, if he deems this action advisable. Later I propose to move that when the house rises this day it stand adjourned until next Tuesday evening, but I feel that I should advise honourable senators that if important legislation should reach us which it is deemed advisable to deal with promptly it might be necessary to ask His Honour the Speaker to reconvene the senate earlier than Tuesday evening.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

APPRECIATION OF SERVICES OF HON. MR. GOLDING

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, we have already expressed our appreciation to all honourable members who took part in the debate on the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation Bill, and to the departmental officials who assisted me here last night. One honourable senator deserves special commendation, for he discharged a most important function very ably. I refer to the honourable senator from Huron-Perth (Hon. Mr. Golding), who acted as chairman when the house was in Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. Reid: None better.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: During my membership in the House of Commons the honourable gentleman had wide experience there, both as Deputy Speaker and as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. I am sure I speak for us all in saying that we are indeed grateful to him for the efficient manner in which he presided over the committee last night.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I would suggest that we rise now, to reassemble at the call of the bell at, say, 5.35 p.m., so that we may be present for the Royal Assent at 5.45 p.m.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Patrick Kerwin, Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

THE SENATE

Tuesday, June 12, 1956

The Senate, which was adjourned until 8 p.m. this day, met at 3 p.m., having been summoned to meet at that hour by The Hon. the Speaker, under the authority of a resolution adopted by the Senate on Wednesday, March 21.

The Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

TARIFF BOARD BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 290, an Act to amend the Tariff Board Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, this bill enlarges the Tariff Board from three members to five members. The Government would like to make the new appointments soon, and if it meets with the general approval of the house I would suggest that the bill might be given the second reading later this afternoon, and if at that time the house is willing to pass the bill it could receive Royal Assent today. The bill was given the second and third readings in the House of Commons yesterday and was unanimously approved by that house. It is not controversial in any way.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What is its purpose?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: To increase the number of members on the board.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, but why is it necessary to increase the number?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: On account of the increased work.

The bill could stand for the present and be called for second reading later this day.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Second reading later this day.

CANADA LANDS SURVEYS BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 254, an Act to amend the Canada Lands Surveys Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 3

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 414, an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1957.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I should like to proceed with the second reading of this bill today. This is an interim supply bill, and if it meets with the approval of the house it will receive Royal Assent later this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Will the Leader of the Government give the usual undertaking that immediate passage of this bill will not in any way preclude discussion of these items when the final supply bill is before the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I would give honourable senators that undertaking. I recall that in March, when I moved second reading of the first interim supply bill of this session, I gave a similar undertaking. The honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) questioned my authority to do so. I may say now that I have no authority to speak for the Senate but, so far as I am concerned, as a member of the Government, I do give the house my assurance that passage of this bill will not prejudice the right and privilege of any honourable senator to discuss and criticize any item when the estimates come before us at any time later in the session.

Honourable senators, I move that this bill be called for second reading later this day.

The motion was agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION REPORT

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a report from the Civil Service Commission.

The Clerk Assistant (reading):

To the Honourable the Members of the Houses of Parliament:

Under the provisions of sections 62 and 11 of the Civil Service Act, and in accordance with the policy and provisions of Treasury Board Minute T.B. 499731 of April 6, 1956, as amended, . . .

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

PRIVATE BILL

FELLOWSHIP OF EVANGELICAL BAPTIST CHURCHES IN CANADA—REFUND OF FEES

Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien, for Hon. John A. McDonald, moved, with leave of the Senate:

That the parliamentary fees paid upon the Bill (F-7) intituled: "An Act to incorporate The Fellowship of Evangelical Baptist Churches in Canada" be refunded to the petitioners, less printing and translation costs.

The motion was agreed to.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY PROJECT

INVITATION TO MAKE TOUR

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I understand that all members of this honourable house have received an invitation to make a tour of the St. Lawrence Seaway project tomorrow. The invitation came from the Honourable Lionel Chevrier, President of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority. A number of senators have spoken to me and expressed their desire to accept the invitation.

The St. Lawrence Seaway project is a very large undertaking, and one of which Canadians may well be proud. I feel that as many senators as possible should take advantage of the opportunity to see the work that is being done. I move, therefore, that when this house rises today it stand adjourned until Thursday afternoon next at 3 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

DOMINION CURLING ASSOCIATION

ALL CANADIAN CLUBS NOW MEMBERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask permission of the house to say a word or two about curling. Today I received the following telegram:

The Canadian Branch of Royal Caledonian Curling Club affiliation approved at meeting on Friday. Curlers from all across Canada now united in Dominion Curling Association.

W. B. Cowan,
Honorary Secretary,
Dominion Curling Association.

This step completes the organization of curlers in every part of Canada. Every organization now comes under the Dominion Curling Association, and we are all affiliated with the Royal Caledonian Curling Club of Scotland, as are all curling organizations throughout the world. So, for the first time since Confederation Canada has one great curling fraternity.

Heretofore there have been one or two organizations of curlers in each province: Saskatchewan one, Manitoba one, Alberta two, British Columbia one, and so on. This step will not disturb those provincial associations, but they will now become affiliated with the parent organization, the Dominion Curling Association. This association was formed 27 years ago, and for all that long time we have waited patiently for clubs in the Montreal area and the Ottawa Valley to join with us. With their participation, we are now organized on a Dominion-wide scale.

I feel very happy about this event. I am the only living member of the Dominion association who was present at its organization meeting 27 years ago. That may not seem long to look back on, but to look ahead, it is a very long time. Curling now becomes a national sport under one organization, and I hope the present spirit of co-operation will be carried with it into every part of Canada. One has only to visit curling associations in such provinces as British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Ontario, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island to know the strong friendly spirit that exists.

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: What about Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. Haig: The strange thing about curling is that no matter what language one speaks, the curling stones seem to obey. It was thought at one time that only the Scottish people could talk properly to a stone. In this respect I am reminded of the bonspiel that took place about ten years ago, when for the first time French Canadians from the eastern part of Quebec participated. French was the native tongue of these men—of course they could speak English well too—and it was interesting to observe that the stone seemed to move at their command in the French language. I concluded then that curling is a truly bilingual sport.

I thank honourable senators for the opportunity of bringing this happy event to their attention.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I do not think I should let this occasion pass without expressing to the honourable Leader of the Opposition the great pride we take in what he has done to bring about this happy conclusion within the curling fraternity. We know that he has given 27 years of his life to this great Canadian curling organization, of which for the first three years he was president and has since been honorary president; and that he has taken a keen interest in the annual play-offs for the Macdonald Brier Trophy. He brings credit to himself and the Senate for what he has done in this respect.

The honourable leader opposite has accomplished many things during his lifetime, and this is not one of the least of them. I know I speak on behalf of all honourable senators when I say we rejoice with him in what has been accomplished this day.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Thank you.

DIVORCE BILLS

THIRD READINGS

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, moved the third reading of the following bills:

Bill K-14, an Act for the relief of Elizabeth Redling Lefebvre.

Bill L-14, an Act for the relief of Marie Cecile Veronique Gaudreau Johnstone, otherwise known as Lucille Goudreau Johnstone.

Bill M-14, an Act for the relief of Claire Esther Cohen Weiner.

Bill N-14, an Act for the relief of Vera Norine Tromley Ashford.

Bill O-14, an Act for the relief of Jacgues Demers.

Bill P-14, an Act for the relief of Virginia Ruth Jones Lord.

Bill Q-14, an Act for the relief of Harold Barnes.

Bill R-14, an Act for the relief of Geraldine Isabella Johnson Mole.

Bill S-14, an Act for the relief of Adam Forbes.

Bill T-14, an Act for the relief of Rose-Anna Rose Crombie.

Bill U-14, an Act for the relief of Esther Phoebe Brunger Abels.

Bill V-14, an Act for the relief of Lorna Elizabeth Cadorette Belinsky.

Bill W-14, an Act for the relief of Benjamin Franklin Luther.

Bill X-14, an Act for the relief of Gordon Frederick Collins.

The motion was agreed and the bills were read the third time, and passed, on division.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 3

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill 414, an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending 31st March, 1957.

He said: Honourable senators, it is customary to pass a bill similar to this one each year before the final estimates have been adopted. This bill provides interim supply for the carrying out of the Government services until the end of June. It is a means whereby the house may vote a sum which is one-twelfth of the items in the main estimates for the fiscal year 1956-57, together with an additional one-twelfth of six special items in the main estimates to provide for services of a seasonal nature on which heaviest payments fall due in the early part of the year, as set out in the schedule to the bill, and one-quarter of all the items in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year 1956-57.

The general proportion of one-twelfth of the main and supplementary estimates is, as I have said, intended to provide all necessary ordinary requirements until the end of June. The higher proportion for the supplementary estimates—honourable senators will recall that I mentioned one-quarter of the supplementary estimates—will effect the release of the same proportion of those estimates as will be released of the main estimates by Appropriation Act No. 1, that is, one-sixth of the main estimates.

It will be noted that the additional proportion requested is for certain special items of a kind for which it has been usual to request an additional proportion at this time. The purpose of this is to meet the seasonal requirements of certain services which send out field survey parties during the spring and early summer. Honourable senators will note in the schedule the type of work for which these additional amounts are required.

I would point out that in no instance is the total of any item being released, and that the form of the bill is the same as that passed at approximately this time last year—May 26, 1955.

In closing, I will refer to the undertaking which was mentioned earlier this day. So far as I am concerned, as Leader of the Government in the Senate, I would state that the passing of this bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of honourable senators to criticize and discuss any item in the estimates which may come up for consideration from time to time during the remainder of the session.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Would we not have the right to do that in any event? The budget debate is a debate in which members can speak on any subject whatsoever: during that debate we can talk about financial or any other matters.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I rather agree with my honourable friend, but for what it is worth I am giving the usual undertaking that such rights and privileges as I have mentioned will be respected by me and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way because of the passage of this measure.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Honourable senators, usually the estimates come down late in the session and very little time is allowed for asking questions. There is a question I would like to ask now, and if the answer cannot be given immediately it could be given at a later date; or perhaps the leader would like to take the question as a notice of inquiry. It has to do with an item on page 2 of the supplementary estimates: a grant of $12 million toward the anticipated deficit arising in 1956-57 from the operation of the television service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

My question is in two parts:

1. What is the total expenditure to be during 1956-57, if there is an anticipated deficit of $12 million?

2. Has a grant been allowed the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to provide for the erection of a modern building to house all departments before the report is made by the Royal Commission?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I will take the question as a notice and will secure an answer as soon as possible.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

TARIFF BOARD BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill No. 290, an Act to amend the Tariff Board Act:

He said: Honourable senators, at the present time the Tariff Board is composed of three members, and the purpose of this bill is to increase the number to five. In answer to the question asked by the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), I may say that the enlarged board is required because of the increased volume of work.

As honourable senators know, the board considers appeals from the Deputy Minister of Customs on customs and excise matters. Also the Government from time to time refers certain questions to the board. At present the board is considering the iron and steel schedules, which have not been changed for many years. They have, I believe, occupied the board's attention for about a year: the whole question is now before it.

It is also the intention of the Government, if I correctly recall the speech of the Minister of Finance on the budget, to refer other matters to the board. The board now consists of a chairman, a vice-chairman, and one member. It is difficult for the board to carry on its sittings in the absence of one of the members who is engaged in giving consideration to this or that question which has been submitted. The proposal is to increase the number of members to five, including the chairman and two vice-chairmen, so that either the chairman or a vice-chairman can preside and there will be a quorum.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: What is the quorum at present? It cannot be more than two.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Two members.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: The quorum is to be raised to three?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Will the leader state the names of the chairman, the vice-chairman, and the member who constitute the present board?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The chairman is Mr. H. B. McKinnon, the vice-chairman is Mr. F. J. Leduc, and the member is Mr. W. W. Buchanan.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It seems a rather remarkable arrangement. There is to be a quorum of three; there will be a chairman and two vice-chairmen, and it will not be possible to have two courts sitting at the one time.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is so.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why have a quorum of three? If the quorum were, say, two, there could be two hearings at the same time, one under the chairman, the other under a vice-chairman. If that is not to be done, why should there be two vice-chairmen?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The board might sit with a vice-chairman and two members, one of whom might be the other vice-chairman; or it could consist of the chairman, a vice-chairman and a member. On the first day of a sitting two members might not take part in the hearing; but next day the board might take up another case, in which event two of the members who sat the preceding day could review evidence given in the first case and the other two members could join the third member who heard the first case and hear the second case. In this way the board would be able to sit continuously. To have two courts sitting concurrently the number of members would have to be increased to seven.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why not six?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In that event, with two concurrent meetings, all the members would be sitting. That is not deemed advisable, because one of the members who hears a case should be in a position to review it and then consult with the other two members so that all the relevant facts will be clearly before them. The honourable senator knows that in most courts there are judges who are not sitting at every hearing, but who, having heard a case, are withdrawn to give special attention to the evidence.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Other than in respect of appeals, a court quorum consists of one.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I was referring to the appeal courts, where usually one or more judges are engaged in reviewing evidence and the cases cited. It is not held that there is enough work to increase the size of the board to seven. But at present there are intervals between the sittings of the board; whereas if the proposed increase is approved it will be possible to hold continuous sittings though not necessarily with all members in attendance.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Does the honourable gentleman recall what is the quorum of the Board of Transport Commissioners? I do not think it is three. I know that sometimes three members sit, but it is my impression that the quorum consists of only two.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Probably that is correct, but I am not too sure on that point.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: For important matters, three members sit.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I believe so; and even when only two sit, it is my impression that they consult with another member.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Are the Tariff Board's sittings always held in Ottawa?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The intention of this bill is to make it possible for the board to move about.

Hon. Mr. Ross: Does the bill contain any provision other than those which the Leader of the Government has referred to?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: What about salaries?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There is a reference to salaries. No change is being made in this respect at the present time. The chairman of the board is paid $16,900; the vice-chairman $14,500; the new vice-chairman will receive $14,500; the present member, Mr. W. W. Buchanan, gets $13,500; and the same salary will be paid to the new member.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It is stated that "the board, with the approval of the Treasury Board," may fix the remuneration of technical personnel. Is that not a change by way of a restriction? Was it necessary previously to have the approval of the Treasury Board?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Previously the Governor in Council appointed specialists to assist the board. It take it that section 2 is what my honourable friend is referring to.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Appointments will now be made by the Tariff Board, with the approval of the Treasury Board. Previously the Governor in Council made the appointments, but it is felt that this is a matter which should be left with the board, which knows what type of experts it requires.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is reasonable.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received a communication from the Secretary to the Governor General, acquainting him that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, would proceed to the Senate Chamber this day at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the Royal Assent to certain bills.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

The Honourable Patrick Kerwin, Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS FINANCING AND GUARANTEE BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 415, an Act to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways System during the calendar year 1956, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

CANADIAN FORCES BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 416, an Act respecting the Canadian Forces.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move that the motion for second reading of this bill be the first order of business when the house next meets.

The motion was agreed to.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 417, an Act to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

CEREMONY AT OFFICIAL REOPENING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, might I draw your attention to the fact that at 6 o'clock on Tuesday next, June 19, the unveiling of plaques commemorating the official opening of the renovated Library of Parliament will take place at the entrance to the library. The ceremony, which will be performed by His Excellency the Governor General, will be followed by a reception given by the Speakers of both houses in the Railway Committee Room of the House of Commons. In due course honourable senators will receive my invitation to attend the reception, but I am notifying the house at this time of the unveiling ceremony, in case I may not have a further opportunity to do so.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce presented the report of the committee on Bill 84.

The report was read by the Clerk as follows:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom was referred the Bill (84) intituled: "An Act to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act", have in obedience to the order of reference of June 4, 1956, examined the said bill and now report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I move the third reading now.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, before this bill receives third reading, may I make a few comments, in view of the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) and the senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) during the debate on second reading. This fall will complete the fiftieth year that I have worked on farms in Saskatchewan, and I am sure that is much longer than those honourable senators have done actual farm work in Manitoba. The Leader of the Opposition said that when he was a boy the farmer used to hire a man in the spring to help him sow, and during June and July for summer-fallowing, and two or three men during August and September to help take off the crop and put it in stacks, and in December he would hire others while the grain was being threshed. My friend went on to say that conditions are different today in the Prairie provinces, that the farmer now goes around the fields with a tractor, and that his wife follows in a truck, that the farmer loads the truck with grain, that his wife delivers it to the elevator and returns to the farm for another load. With reference to very large farm units, that is a greatly overdrawn picture of what actually takes place. It often happens that the grain is flattened out by snow or a rain storm, and it becomes necessary to employ help and invent all manner of devices to save the grain.

However, what I am concerned about is that many men are better suited to operating a small farm than a large one, and their attempts to operate large units may be one of the reasons why we are filling our mental hospitals at present. Many years ago a certain homesteader farmed a piece of land which belonged to the Saskatchewan Valley Land Company. Since the village was developing there I could understand his desire to buy the land. I myself had in mind buying a piece of land there, and I drove around and asked this man for information. I thought that before I bought the land I would call on the man who lived next door, tell him the land was for sale, and see if he wanted to buy it. He said he would like to buy it when he had the cash to pay for it, but he was not going into debt to do so. I pointed out that the property was not being offered for cash. But he told me of having once signed a note and of having been notified about it three times. He went on to say that he would sign no more notes or agreements.

I eventually bought the land around him. He continued to farm his quarter-section in a small way, off which he sold the grain for seed. I believe he kept only one sow, but I often thought he made more money out of her than others made out of twenty. He fed her litters until they were most suitable for the market and brought the best price. He kept a few head of cattle, which were properly cared for, and a few horses, which he took pride in. Well, that gentleman lived a good life. If he wanted to, he could hire a farmer with large equipment to do work for him, because the big operators were always ready to do work for cash when they were slack. He took a mortgage on a farm next to him, and eventually got ownership of it. At 80 years of age he retired to British Columbia, but returned to Saskatchewan to operate this farm; and he lived to be an old man.

I know of many such cases across western Canada. Take, for instance, Dr. Seager Wheeler: he did much for the west by his development of well-known varieties of wheat, oats and barley, and apple and hedge trees; and he did it all on a small farm. I knew his brother, who also farmed in a small way. He too lived a very good life, and he left a nice cash estate.

I have observed throughout my lifetime that while there are some men who are entirely suited to and do not worry unduly about handling large operations, the great majority of men have a better life on a small farm. The Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) said something the other day about the advantage the farmer has in being his own boss. That is true. And the farm is the best place for raising a family. Indeed, farming is a way of life. My object is to laud the small farmers, and I hope we will always have them with us, in both the east and the west.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Horner: They usually look after their farms properly and, in my opinion, are good risks as borrowers. I do not think it is right that we should encourage young people to get the idea that they have to operate a big piece of land in order to succeed. That is quite unnecessary.

I recall a Chautauqua meeting I attended many years ago, where a speaker, talking about farmers, said they just buy more land in order to grow more wheat to buy more land. That was the theme of his speech, and in many cases it is no doubt true. But as we know, when there is a complete crop failure it is the large operator who suffers most and takes longest to recover, while the small farmer can carefully tend his livestock and quickly return to normal.

I think there is much to be said for having people do the thing that best suits them. We have all heard about the way experts are developed by the Hutterites. Everybody knows that these people have acquired large tracts of land in western Canada, and they pay cash for them. Their system of operation is to choose individuals who have a special aptitude for the raising of a certain class of stock, whether it be ducks, pigs or something else, and allow them to specialize in that category; they also choose men best suited for mechanical work and assign them to the job of keeping their machinery and other equipment in repair. So they are succeeding very well—so well, in fact, that provincial governments in western Canada have had to enact certain laws with regard to them. I do not know whether it was thought that they would eventually own the whole province or what, but certain restrictions were placed on them which provided that if they moved they must not go farther than 40 miles away. At any rate, I think this is the limit in Alberta. In addition there is a regulation that within, I think, 90 days after their moving their land must be offered to veterans. However, there has been some evasion of that regulation.

Honourable senators, I merely rose to put in a word for the small farmer, the careful farmer.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, so there will be no misunderstanding I want to correct a statement made by my honourable friend. He indicated that I have never been on a farm or worked on a farm.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Never worked on one.

Hon. Mr. Haig: In 1896 I drove a binder on my father's farm, and in that season I cut 250 acres of crop.

Hon. Mr. Horner: That is more than 50 years ago.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is 60 years ago.

Hon. Mr. Horner: But you have not done any farming within the last 50 years.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I am not talking about 50 years—I said 60 years ago. I cut the crop, for three years running, until I entered university. I was the farm boy on my father's farm until he sold out and went into business. Then I worked for the neighbouring farmer, for the large wage of 75 cents a day.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Were you worth more?

Hon. Mr. Haig: I have no doubt the honourable member from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) knows much more about farming than many other senators do. He came up the hard way, as I did. My father was a homesteader in Manitoba, and while he was a farmer he got a licence to teach school. I did the same. We each in turn taught school in the winter, and in the summer we worked the farm. So I say we really came up the hard road.

But that is not the point of my remarks. In committee this morning we heard the commissioner of the Farm Loan Board, whom I have known for many years. He made it very clear that the board considers every application. If an application is not acceptable, that is clearly indicated to the farmer; and if he insists and pays the $10 fee, the board will make an examination of his place with a view to reconsidering his application.

I am not complaining at all of the big farmer. The Farm Loan Board does not make distinctions in that way. It takes into account the value of the assets. I know this, because the board operates in my province. A man raised on a farm in Manitoba, or in any other province, who goes into the practice of law, can always count a fairly large number of farmers among his clientele. The reason is that they realize he knows more about their background and farm problems generally than does the lawyer who was not brought up on a farm.

Honourable senators, farming is the greatest occupational gamble in the world. Nothing else compares with it. This morning in committee I was anxious to have the bill amended so as to give the local manager of the board a little more authority. I think his present authority is not sufficient to enable him to meet competition. I would like to see the farmers, the small ones as well as the bigger ones, get the advantage of the board's lower interest rate, because while farmers generally have had prosperity in the last 10 years, prices today are slipping. The world is getting loaded down with farm products. Other countries are growing more grain—some countries are bonusing their grain producers—and the competition affects the prices that our farmers receive for their products, especially for grain. For that reason I was anxious that if money could be borrowed at 5 per cent they should get the benefit of that rate. I think that the average rate of interest on mortgages today is around 6 per cent. On mortgages under the National Housing Act the rate is 5¾ per cent.

I think our farmers should be able to get money at the lower rate. The difficulty is that there is not a close enough co-ordination of operations of the board and the provincial managers, who know local conditions. The present commissioner comes from my province and, as I have said, he is well known to me. Having lived on the prairies all his life, he is pretty thoroughly informed on the situation in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, but I doubt if he has experience of the farming backgrounds in Quebec, Ontario, the Maritime provinces and British Columbia. As I have said the man best informed on the local situation is the man on the spot. The last director, Dr. McLean, was a British Columbian, so of course he knew less of conditions on the prairies than a prairie man would know. I am anxious that a little more liberty and authority shall be granted to local managers in order that farmers may adequately benefit from the provisions of the act. Someone has said that the farmers do not want loans, but, speaking as a representative of farmers, in my province anyway, I can say that they do want to get loans at 5 per cent if that be possible.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, I believe difficulties have arisen because the act has not completely fulfilled the purpose for which it was intended. However, it must be recognized that any loaning organization, to keep solvent, must have its loans repaid. I am very glad to have the assurance that during the past year loans have been made available to persons who work irrigated land. It seems to me that that was a wise move, because crops on this class of farm usually are assured, but to make a real success of his operations the young farmer, starting with some arable land and some pasture, needs a little capital to provide feed for his cattle. I am also told that consideration will be given to requests for loans in drought areas, but that will be practicable only if the high standard of qualifications required today is adhered to. I am a little disappointed about the position of applicants whose requests for loans are refused when their land has never been inspected; they feel badly about it. However, we are told that if they pay the $10 charge they will be more likely to get some consideration. I believe that the board, operating under the new plan, will give more satisfaction in future.

Hon. Gray Turgeon: Honourable senators, I merely want to repeat one thing I said this morning in committee—that as far as British Columbia is concerned the operations of the Farm Loan Board have given complete satisfaction to the farmers. At the moment the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) is not in the chamber, but I know that he agrees with me in this. A great part of the agricultural area of British Columbia, which in total is not large, is in the Peace River area; it is prairie land similar to parts of the Prairie provinces; and the farmers there who produce wheat and raise cattle are completely satisfied with the work of the board.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY COMPANY BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the report of the committee on Bill 248.

The report was read by the Clerk as follows:

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to whom was referred the Bill (248) intituled: "An Act respecting the Construction of a line of railway in the Province of New Brunswick by Canadian National Railway Company from a point at or near Bartibog in a westerly direction to the Tomogonops River in the vicinity of Little River Lakes", have in obedience to the order of reference of May 31, 1956, examined the said bill and now report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I move that the bill be now read the third time.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

NIAGARA LOWER ARCH BRIDGE COMPANY LIMITED—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the report of the committee on Bill J-14.

The report was read by the Clerk as follows:

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to whom was referred the Bill (J-14) intituled: "An Act respecting Niagara Lower Arch Bridge Company Limited", have in obedience to the order of reference of June 6, 1956, examined the said bill and now report the same with the following amendment:

Pages 1 and 2: Delete clause 2 and substitute therefor the following:

"2. The Company is hereby authorized and empowered, subject to the rights of any person by way of mortgage, lease, charge or other encumbrance of any kind granted by the Company or its predecessor in title, on or secured by the whole or any part of the hereinafter described properties and assets of the Company, to sell, assign, transfer and convey, to any company, body or commission, its bridge, the approaches thereto, all appurtenant structures, works, undertakings, franchises, privileges, powers, rights and property, real, personal and mixed, so far as the same are located within Canada, possessed by, vested in or to it belonging, or heretofore possessed by, vested in or belonging to The Niagara Falls Suspension Bridge Company, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon by the directors of the Company; Provided that such assignment, transfer or conveyance shall have been first approved by the holders of two-thirds of the shares of the Company at a special general meeting of the shareholders, duly called for the purpose of considering it, at which meeting shareholders representing at least two-thirds in number of the subscribed shares of the Company are present, or represented by proxy, and for the purposes of this section, sections 153 to 155 inclusive of the Railway Act shall not apply."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Next sitting.

NATIONAL PARKS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. T. A. Crerar, Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Natural Resources, presented the report of the committee on Bill P-8.

The report was read by the Clerk as follows:

The Standing Committee on Natural Resources, to whom was referred the Bill (P-8) intituled: "An Act to amend the National Parks Act respecting the boundaries of Cape Breton Highlands National Park", have in obedience to the order of reference of May 31, 1956, examined the said bill and now report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, in view of the announcement made by His Honour the Speaker of the official opening of the renovated Library of Parliament, on Tuesday next at 6 o'clock, and the reception that is to follow it, I feel that we should meet in the afternoon on that day. Therefore, with leave of the Senate, I move that when this house rises today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

The motion was agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—
DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill 165, an Act to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill amends the Industrial Development Bank Act, which was passed by Parliament in 1944, and is chapter 151 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952.

The purpose of the legislation was to fill a gap in the existing financial machinery of the country, and particularly to assist small businesses to secure capital on the security of fixed assets. It was felt that the facilities in this respect which were required by relatively small industrial enterprises were not available from the chartered banks, whose business was mainly that of supplying current loans and demand loans. It was also thought that large industrial and commercial enterprises were able to procure their fixed capital requirements on the general money market by the sale of securities or by large mortgages.

Honourable senators, the bank has been operating now for a period of approximately 12 years. The bill before us contains 12 sections. A number of these provide technical amendments to the existing legislation, and I think it would be inappropriate for me to bother with them at this stage. They are matters which can be readily dealt with in committee. There are, however, in addition to these technical amendments, three significant changes to the act.

First of all, the definition of "industrial enterprise" is enlarged. This in effect means that a larger number of companies would be able to take advantage of the facilities provided by the Industrial Development Bank.

The second significant change arises from the fact that at the present time the board of directors of the bank themselves must pass upon all loans. The change proposed in this respect is that in the interest of efficiency and dispatch some of this power shall be delegated to senior officers of the bank. Perhaps this change is somewhat similar to the suggestion made a few moments ago by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) in connection with the Canadian Farm Loan Board.

The third significant change to be made by this bill arises out of the following circumstances. The lending which is done by the Industrial Development Bank is broadly divided into two categories: loans of over $200,000 and loans below that amount. When the original act was passed, in 1944, there was a limitation in the overall amount of money which could be loaned in units of $200,000 or upwards. This limitation originally was $15 million. In 1949 this limitation was increased to $25 million, and in 1952 to $50 million. It is now proposed that the limitation be further increased to $75 million. Perhaps I should say at this point that the approximate total lending power of the bank is $130 million. So it is proposed that $75 million be made available for loans of over $200,000, and that the remaining $55 million available for lending should go out in loans of less than $200,000.

Honourable senators, these are the main amendments to the act. Before dealing with them in detail I think it might be helpful if I were to supply some information about the function of the bank in the past 12 years. If I could have the unanimous consent of the house—and I think it might be a matter of convenience to honourable senators—I should like to place upon Hansard a table showing the classification of loans, investments, and guarantees, by provinces. This table will show the gross authorizations from the time the bank was established, in 1944, until December 31, 1955. It will also show the amount of loans outstanding at the end of last year. Perhaps it will be still more helpful if I state in round figures what is contained in that table. Up to December 31, 1955, some 1,499 loans were authorized by this bank, to a total of $127,603,075. Those loans were distributed by provinces in this way: There were 4 in Newfoundland, amounting to a little over $1 million gross; 6 in Prince Edward Island, $119,500; 27 in Nova Scotia, $1,890,000; 51 in New Brunswick, $2,890,000; 494 in Quebec, $46,848,000; 466 in Ontario, $37,634,000; 105 in Manitoba, $4,900,000; 35 in Saskatchewan, $4,100,000; 85 in Alberta, $8,700,000; 223 in British Columbia, $19,100,000; and 3 in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, $286,000.

At December 31, 1955, there were 642 loans outstanding, totalling $45,101,364.

If I have the unanimous consent of the house, I will place this table upon Hansard.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The table is as follows:

Classification of Loans, Investments and Guarantees by Provinces

	Gross* authorizations to Dec. 31, 1955		Amount outstanding at Dec. 31, 1955
	No.	Amount	No.	Amount
Newfoundland	4	$ 1,020,000	1	$ 103,000
Prince Edward Island	6	119,500	4	30,000
Nova Scotia	27	1,893,444	10	347,931
New Brunswick	51	2,890,737	24	498,853
Quebec	494	46,848,713	216	17,258,003
Ontario	466	37,634,382	204	15,377,337
Manitoba	105	4,924,126	40	1,261,150
Saskatchewan	35	4,109,111	16	488,454
Alberta	85	8,749,749	37	1,807,070
British Columbia	223	19,127,313	88	7,828,531
Yukon, Northwest Territories	3	286,000	2	101,035
Total	1,499	$127,603,075	642	$45,101,364

*Before any cancellations or reductions in amounts authorized.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Could the honourable senator tell us how many of the 642 loans outstanding are overdue?

Hon. John J. Connolly: I have not that information. I can tell my honourable friend, however, that of the total amount of money lent by this institution only $350,000 has had to be written off. I would suggest that the honourable gentleman ask for detailed information from the officials who will be present in committee.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask the honourable member a question? What is the nature of these loans? I have always been puzzled about that.

Hon. John J. Connolly: If the Leader of the Opposition will allow me first to put some more information upon Hansard, I will then deal precisely with that point.

Because one of the amendments to be made by the bill is in connection with loans of over $200,000, if I may have the unanimous consent of the house again I will place on Hansard another short table showing, by size, the variety of loans made by this bank. The figures in the table are all as at September 30, 1955. I am sorry I cannot get figures to the end of the year. I will summarize the contents, again giving round figures, in this way: There were 11 loans of $5,000 and under, for a total of $46,820; 229 loans between $5,000 and $25,000, for a total of $3,835,000; 170 loans between $25,000 and $50,000 for a total $6,635,000; 137 loans between $50,000 and $100,000, for a total of $10,411,000; 85 loans between $100,000 and $200,000, for a total of $12,718,000; and 62 loans over $200,000, totalling $33,627,000. That is a total of 694 loans or credits, amounting in all to $67,275,134.

With leave of the house I will place the table on Hansard.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The table is as follows:

By size	Current authorizations at September 30, 1955	Number of credits
$ 5,000 and under	$ 46,820	11
5,001 to 25,000	3,835,922	229
25,001 to 50,000	6,635,923	170
50,001 to 100,000	10,411,103	137
100,001 to 200,000	12,718,000	85
Over $200,000	33,627,366	62
	$67,275,134	694

Hon. John J. Connolly: Coming now to the point raised a moment ago by the Leader of the Opposition, it might be helpful if I stated in a general way the amount of money authorized to be lent to various classifications of industrial enterprises from the time the bank was established. I think it will be better to give the amounts in round figures rather than in specific amounts. Detailed information is available in the Annual Report of the Industrial Development Bank for 1955, at page 8.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask another question? What is the general character of these loans? If a loan is made to a manufacturing plant, for instance, what is the reason for the loan, and on what basis is it made? It appears that if one cannot borrow from the chartered banks he can sometimes get money from the Industrial Development Bank. What is the reason for that?

Hon. John. J. Connolly: Perhaps I cannot give a full explanation in answer to the question, but I will try to do so, and what I shall say is based on information given by the president of the bank to the Banking and Commerce Committee of the other place. For the sake of argument, let us say that a certain enterprise manufactures brooms, and needs capital for expansion—to erect a new plant or to install new equipment, or to increase the efficiency or the size of their operations. The industry is too small to go to the money markets and get capital by the sale of bonds or debentures in the way that is done by a large industrial enterprise. In such a case, the enterprise having been refused credit by a charterd bank—I understand that is the sine qua non step—it may go to the Industrial Development Bank with its proposition. It must show what assets and what kind of sales organization it has, and must be able to demonstrate that the organization is a going concern and is likely to succeed. The Industrial Development Bank has on its staff specialists in engineering, insurance, and other fields, people who know these various types of businesses that come before them for consideration. They examine the prospects of the company, and examine its assets. If the loan is deemed to be one that could be entertained by the bank, the machinery to grant a loan is set in motion. Usually the bank takes a mortgage on the fixed assets, namely the buildings and lands, and any fixed chattels, as well as a chattel mortgage on its other assets. The terms of the loan are fixed in the written agreement between the company and the bank, and the company proceeds to get the loan. As a rule the advances are made as the work progresses, and finally the loan is fully advanced when the work is brought to a certain stage of completion. With the expansion of its business, the borrowing company then proceeds to repay its loan out of revenue in the normal way.

I hope that general explanation will be satisfactory to honourable senators. But, again I say, I think the president of the bank would be able to supply a great many more details of this character than I can.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Would my honourable friend clear up one point? Does this loaning facility apply to established organizations only, or would it also apply to a new business enterprise?

Hon. John J. Connolly: A new business could take advantage of the facilities of the act; but, there again, it would have to demonstrate its capacity to handle the amount of credit for which it made application. Even in the case of an existing business, if it borrows to build a new plant and buy new machinery, the assets are not there when the money is borrowed, but they are acquired and thus security is created.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: I take it that a business would have to be in operation for some time to qualify for credit, would it not? A new business could hardly get a loan right at the start?

Hon. Mr. Isnor: That is what I should like to find out.

Hon. John J. Connolly: I do not think there is any question that a new business would be able to qualify. A few years ago it was decided to extend the facilities of this bank to the aircraft industry, to allow owners of commercial planes for the carriage of both passengers and freight to borrow from this bank. Of course, the main purpose of that amendment was to allow such companies to acquire aircraft. In those circumstances many of them started from scratch and carried on after the credit facilities provided by the bank were established.

Perhaps honourable senators would be interested to know of some classes of industry to which credit has been extended in the past 12 years. A few taken at random are:

Industries	An amount in excess of
Foods and beverages	$10 million
Textile products	$ 7½ million
Wood products	$14½ million
Printing establishments	$ 2½ million
Iron and steel	$13 million
Electrical apparatus	$ 3½ million
Chemical products	$10 million
Commercial air services	$ 3 million

The authorized capital of the Industrial Development Bank is $25 million, and all of the shares are owned by the Bank of Canada. The Industrial Development Bank has built up a general reserve fund in excess of $7,300,000 from profits which it has made in the past 12 years, and in addition it has a reserve for losses of some $700,000. As I have already said to the honourable senator from Halifax-Dartmouth (Hon. Mr. Isnor), its write-offs have not been more than $350,000 out of total loans of $127 million.

The Industrial Development Bank was authorized under section 14 of the act to issue and sell debentures not exceeding three times the amount of its paid-up capital and reserve. Under this provision it has issued debentures to the face value of $9½ million; and these also are held by the Bank of Canada.

The President of the Bank is Mr. James E. Coyne, who is also Governor of the Bank of Canada. The General Manager is Mr. D. G. Marble, C.B.E., whose offices are in Montreal. It may be of interest to know that Mr. Marble came from the chartered bank organization of this country. He entered the Royal Bank of Canada in 1913, and served on its inspection staff and in its supervisory department. In 1929 he was at its head office in Montreal, and was appointed Assistant Manager after making an inspection tour of its various European branches. He was staff supervisor from 1933 to 1938, when he became Secretary of the Bank of Canada. He was appointed General Manager of the Industrial Development Bank at the time of the retirement of the first General Manager, Mr. S. R. Noble, O.B.E., in 1953.

As this is the first amendment to the act that has been sought since Mr. Noble's retirement, it would perhaps be well to say something in commendation of the work which he did for this institution. I may say that I do not know Mr. Noble personally, but there are many senators who do, and many more who know him by reputation. Mr. Noble was born in New Brunswick. He joined the staff of the Royal Bank in 1903, and in 1907 went to its head office. He became General Inspector of Foreign Branches in 1917, and was Supervisor of the Cuban branches in 1921 and 1922. In that year he became Assistant General Manager of the bank. Mr. Noble was appointed Sugar Administrator of Canada in 1939; and during the war years he was special adviser to the Wartime Prices and Trade Board. He did many other things on behalf of financial organizations connected with the federal Government's war effort. He became the first General Manager of the Industrial Development Bank when it was established, in 1944, and much of the credit for the success of the bank, which is a special type of institution, is due to his outstanding work. Mr. Noble continued in that office for the first ten years of the bank's existence.

Honourable senators may be interested to know the names of the directors of the bank, because they come from various sections of the country. The President, as I have said, is Mr. James E. Coyne, Governor of the Bank of Canada. The other directors are: J. R. Beattie, member of the Executive Committee, Ottawa; W. D. Black, member of the Executive Committee, Waterdown, Ontario; E. G. Burton, C.B.E., Toronto; J. L. Cavanagh, New Glasgow, Nova Scotia; Dr. A. M. Day, Consort, Alberta; N. A. Hesler, Sackville, New Brunswick; A. Stewart McNichols, Montreal; W. A. Johnston, Q.C., Winnipeg; R. H. Milliken, Q.C., Regina; A. C. Picard, Quebec; H. A. Russell, St John's, Newfoundland; Harold B. Schurman, Summerside, Prince Edward Island; A. C. Taylor, C.B.E., Vancouver; and K. W. Taylor, C.B.E., member of the Executive Committee, Ottawa, who is also Deputy Minister of Finance.

Honourable senators, the net profit of the bank in 1954 was $1,842,571, and in 1955 it was $1,199,057. Until such time as the bank has built up a reserve equal to its paid-up capital of $25 million, it is not permitted by the original legislation to pay any dividends.

The bank, as honourable senators may know, is not a deposit bank, but an investment bank. It now has offices in Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver and Winnipeg. This year it will establish two new offices, one in Halifax and another in Calgary. It has a staff of 100 persons, including engineers, credit officers, lawyers, insurance experts, accountants and clerical help.

It is estimated that the bank processes about four to five loans each week, and that at the present rate of handling it takes somewhere between two and three months to complete the granting of an approved loan. The average term of loans is from six to seven years, and there are few loans for longer than ten years. The interest rate which the bank charges is six per cent.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Does the bank pay any income tax on its large profits?

Hon. John J. Connolly: No, the bank does not pay income tax.

If the bill passes second reading I will propose that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. There not only the main amendments, but the minor and technical amendments which the bill proposes, can be examined.

I think I should say something more about the main amendments. The definition of "industrial enterprise" as contained in the present act is as follows:

> "Industrial enterprise" means a business in which the manufacture, processing or refrigeration of goods, wares and merchandise or the building, alteration or repair of ships or vessels or the generating or distributing of electricity is carried on.

From experience the officers of the bank have found that there are a great many enterprises, although not engaged in processing or manufacturing, which have an industrial character, and the restricted definition now contained in the act made such enterprises ineligible for loans. For example, logging is not eligible, but the processing of logs and the making of lumber is eligible. Quarrying and mining are not eligible, but crushing, screening and similar processes in treating ore are eligible.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What about pipe lines? Are they eligible?

Hon. John J. Connolly: Pipe lines probably will be eligible under the new proposal, but I am afraid that the bank may not have capital enough to be able to assist an enterprise of that size. But there are a great many industrial services such as repairing, reconditioning, packaging, preserving, making technical surveys, doing research, and the like, which are not within the existing definition, although they are important adjuncts of the modern industrial process. All of these functions, it is felt, are operations which, when they are of a moderate size, should qualify for credit under the facilities provided by the Industrial Development Bank. They are to be contrasted with farming, fishing, the retail and wholesale trade, professional services and the like, and they will now be able, as a result of the amended definition of "industrial enterprise" in section 1 of the bill, to get assistance from the Industrial Development Bank if they require it.

I shall not read the new definition. It is long. Honourable senators will be interested enough in reading it for themselves, and when the time comes to discuss the bill in committee, questions can be asked of the officials of the bank as to the adequacy of the proposed new definition.

I now refer to section 5 of the bill, which amends section 15 of the act. The important point about this section is that officers of the bank will be authorized by the board to approve certain loans. Generally speaking, I am informed that the larger loans, of over $100,000 or over $200,000, will still require approval of the Board of Directors. One of the tables that I placed on Hansard indicates that some 240 loans have been authorized by the bank as at the end of September, 1955, in which the amount of each loan was under $25,000. This figure of 240 loans is approximately 30 per cent of the 694 loans then outstanding. It will be clear that for such loans a great deal of time will be saved if the officer in charge of the local offices can give approvals without referring these smaller applications, to, say, Ottawa. I am informed that these officials of the bank have a very deep understanding of the standards which the Board of Directors has from the beginning applied to all loans whether they be great or small.

I personally cannot assure honourable senators that a $25,000 limit will be placed on the discretion of local officers, but it seems to me that a discretion of that kind would be a reasonable type of discretion.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What is the discretion given to the ordinary branch bank manager?

Hon. John J. Connolly: I think that would vary with the place, the size of the branch and the experience of the manager.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It is much less than $25,000.

Hon. Mr. Haig: It depends on the manager.

Hon. John J. Connolly: But of course the type of loan is different too. This is a loan secured on fixed assets. A bank manager's discretion applies to the ordinary commercial loan, where the security perhaps is not as far reaching as this type of security would be. I think the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) is quite right.

Now, honourable senators, I refer you again to section 5 of the bill, which amends section 15 of the act.

I have already said that when the bank was established there was a limitation in the amount of money which could be loaned in blocks of $200,000 or over. Originally, the limitation was $15 million. It is now up as high as $50 million, and it is proposed that it should be further increased to $75 million.

I repeat that the total lending power of the bank today is approximately $130 million. At the end of 1955 there were outstanding loans by the bank in the amount of $45 million. About half of this amount was in loans of under $200,000, and the other half in loans of over $200,000. The bank officials estimate that loans of over $200,000 are increasing at the rate of about $2 million each year. So if authority is given to lend up to $75 million in units of $200,000 or more, there will still be $55 million available for loans below the $200,000 mark. At the present time loans outstanding below the $200,000 amount to less than $25 million. So there seems to be ample room for all the credit requirements of companies of this kind if the change is made.

I would think, honourable senators, that the purpose of the Industrial Development Bank has been justified. It has occupied a field in which the chartered banks on the one hand, do not compete, and which is not serviced by organizations that look after the capital requirements of our great commercial and industrial enterprises.

The bank has been making a profit each year. It is a specialized business, and its overhead is heavy. If and when it reaches the position where it can pay a dividend—and it must have $25 million in its reserve fund before it can do so—its dividend is restricted to 4 per cent of its paid-up capital. Any amount over that must be paid into the reserve.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: What do you mean when you say that its overhead is heavy?

Hon. John J. Connolly: The reason is this. The bank must have on its staff many people who are specialists and who would not be required by the chartered banks, nor perhaps even by the larger commercial loaning organizations. For example, the bank must have engineers. It is an industrial bank, it will make loans mainly to industry; so it must have on its staff people who understand and appreciate the problems of industry, the installations which are proposed to be made, and the like. It must have on its staff insurance experts who are able to estimate and evaluate the risks which have to be taken. It requires its own legal staff to look after legal matters, and, of course an accounting staff. Because it is in a special field, I am informed by officials of the bank, its overhead is higher relatively than the overhead of similar financial institutions.

I hope that the explanation I have given honourable senators is adequate, and if the bill should receive second reading I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I notice that under the new section 16, subsection 1, the bank may take, accept or acquire, and may hold security of any kind. What is the rule with respect to the holding of real estate? Is it the same as applies to an ordinary bank?

Hon. John J. Connolly: Does the honourable gentleman refer to the limitation of time within which the bank must sell any real estate that it holds?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The subsection reads:

> The bank may take, accept or acquire and may hold security of any kind and in any form for the due discharge of obligations . . .

That may or may not include real estate. I am asking whether it does, and, if so, is there any limitation?

Hon. John J. Connolly: I understand that real estate is one of the main forms of security this bank looks for. It takes the security, of course, by way of mortgage. I cannot go further at this time and satisfy the honourable gentleman as to how long, in the event that the mortgage is foreclosed and the bank acquires the fee in the real estate, the bank is entitled to hold that real estate. I will make sure that information is available to the committee.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: How long can the bank hold the mortgage?

Hon. John J. Connolly: As long as the loan is outstanding.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Has the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity read clause 9 of the bill?

Hon. A. Neil McLean: Honourable senators, I would like to make a few remarks on the bill now before this honourable body. I desire to point out that, under section 5, this legislation increases the loaning power of the Industrial Development Bank by 50 per cent. A few days ago the Senate passed a bill greatly increasing the loaning power of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. These increases are being made at a time when the chartered banks are being told to curtail their loans, and it seems apparent that some crown agencies or departments of government are going in different directions, or working at cross-purposes, and some explanation should be given us in this regard, as it is most difficult to understand some of the monetary policies that come before us.

The economy of the country is being interfered with either for better or for worse. It is an easy matter to slow down the economy of the country, but if it goes down too far it is a mighty difficult job to get it back up again.

Let us go back to the first of February, 1955. The bank rate as set by the Bank of Canada was 2 per cent. Money was really easy at that time, but on February 14, 1955, the bank rate was dropped to 1½ per cent, apparently to make money more plentiful. In April, 1955, the Federal Reserve Board in the United States raised its bank rate to 1¾ per cent. On August 5, 1955, the Federal Reserve raised its rate to 2 per cent, and the following day, August 6, the Bank of Canada raised its rate to 2 per cent. On September 9, 1955, the Reserve Board upped its rate to 2¼ per cent and on October 12 we followed suit and our rate was raised to 2¼ per cent. On November 18, 1955, the United States rate went to 2½ per cent, and on November 19 we went one better and raised our bank rate to 2¾ per cent. No more changes took place until April of this year, when the Bank of Canada rate went up to 3 per cent and the United States rate to 2¾ per cent.

Looking at these back and forth changes in bank rates almost reminds one of a jig-saw puzzle, or a race in rates between the countries. It is also noticeable that nearly all these changes were made here when Parliament was not in session.

During the fall of 1955 the chartered banks were directed by the Bank of Canada to cease taking on new commitments for term loans and the banks would no longer make purchases of corporate securities direct from the issuers; also the banks were required to place a large amount of their cash into day-to-day loans and Treasury bills in an endeavour to have a 7 per cent secondary reserve maintained by the banks. These restrictions, although not in the Bank Act, were made effective. The first restriction practically nullified the legislation we put through, after careful consideration, in 1954, allowing the banks to make term loans direct to home-builders, and this good piece of legislation, although the banks did not ask for it, had the approval of the Bank of Canada.

The second restriction, stopping the banks from purchasing corporate securities direct from the issuers, is just the opposite from what the Development Bank is asking for in the present bill before this house; it wants millions more to buy such securities.

The third restriction, that the banks endeavour to maintain a secondary 7 per cent reserve on top of the 8 per cent reserve they already have, drained away many millions of their cash. Chartered bank loans have been restricted from both sides. First, by raising interest rates; and it must be remembered that owing to the action of the Bank of Canada the banks were obliged to raise the interest rate on their customers' loans around 20 per cent. This raised the cost of living and affected practically every man, woman and child in Canada, as nearly every family in our country is a borrower, directly or indirectly. Secondly, by forcing the banks to set up the secondary reserves I have referred to, much of their lending cash that might have gone into housing or the expansion of business, big and small, and industry—which would have meant greater development and more employment—was diverted to Treasury bills and day-to-day loans, i.e., stock market loans, which are the only day-to-day loans I know of. I am not a director of nor interested in any special chartered bank—in fact I have criticized the banks on many occasions—but as an ex-banker I cannot understand an overall policy that cripples the chartered banks for ordinary lending as authorized by law and then permits other crown agencies to get authority to increase their loans. For any purchasing power made available, no matter from what source, has the same effect on the economy.

To set up this secondary reserve the banks had to sell millions of Dominion of Canada bonds and buy Treasury bills. These purchases and sales took place at a time when the Bank of Canada dropped its support of the bond market and prices fell, causing great losses to the banks, as well as to other small holders—and there were many—who were obliged to sell their Government bonds. The small investors did not get the protection they were entitled to. The Bank of Canada's action in draining away cash reserves of the banks to maintain tight money conditions, meant the sale of many more bonds than otherwise would have been necessary to obtain the amount of treasury bills, et cetera, required for the secondary reserve. The lack of cash on the part of the banks is the effective factor on the part of the banks in holding down loans. The full results of this policy on the economy are not yet felt, by any means, and it will be many months before the effects will have permeated through the economy of the whole country. There has been no formal announcement of credit restrictions on the part of the Bank of Canada, and many small businessmen are hardly aware of the situation and find it out with a shock only when they apply for increased loans and discover these cannot be obtained, no matter how credit-worthy they are or how well secured.

In the United States the Federal Reserve Board is responsible directly to Congress and has to keep in close touch with that body, as is evidenced by the Congressional inquiry now going on by the Patman House-Senate Economic Committee which is investigating the Federal Reserve Board's actions with regard to raising the bank rate so high. I will have more to say about this later.

Just what legal authority the Bank of Canada has for dealing with the chartered banks, as they have been doing recently, is rather a mystery to me. I was under the impression that the banks had a charter of their own to act within, which is the Bank Act, given them by Parliament. The Bank of Canada intimates it is acting to prevent inflation because there are more projects being undertaken than we have men and materials to build, but apparently all these are financially possible. The bank's idea seems to be to make it financially impossible to go ahead with these projects. I remember the day when we were told by the financial powers-that-be that needed projects that were physically possible were not financially possible. We know better now. Apparently large corporations with an annual line of credit with the banks, and the Government with large funds at its disposal, can go ahead. The fellow who gets hurt most is the small man. A tight money policy will, no doubt, prevent many of the plans for expansion and development of our country from being carried out.

I have no hesitation in saying that over 90 per cent of the economic system of Canada is absolutely sound; but in order to get at the less than 10 per cent all the economy pays the penalty of higher interest rates and shortage of cash. As things stand now the difficulty is that some of the most essential plans might not be able to be carried out. By creating a shortage of cash, thus preventing banks from increasing their loans, there is no assurance there will be funds available to finance the necessities.

It is often extremely difficult for banks to differentiate between the essential and non-essential, and if the former were to be financed without increasing total loans, advances to the latter would have to be called. This might cause widespread hardship, and, rather than create this, there has come about a general freeze on all types of loans, regardless of merit. There is quite likely to be a drop in home building during 1956. Under its increased powers there is, of course, a possibility of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation increasing its housing loans, direct or indirect, but such action would be in contradiction to the policy of the Bank of Canada as far as the chartered banks are concerned.

If inflation was on the horizon why were the banks asked to go so heavily into the mortgage business a year or so ago? We do not want deflation or inflation in our country, and any interference with the ordinary economy of the country to cause either inflation or deflation is a precarious course which can be embarked upon only with the greatest care and consideration. Whether action as severe as the Bank of Canada has taken—or indeed any action at all—was warranted, can never be told, as once a course is embarked upon no one can tell how far it will go and how much confidence will be undermined. On the other hand, it is difficult to know what would have happened otherwise. Restrictive action applied too long can be far more serious than no restrictions. The essence is that any severe action taken in connection with the economy should not be the decision of one man or even two men. The best brains of the country should be called on, and that would certainly include more than two or three. I well remember that the late President Roosevelt called in the best brains of the world when he needed economic advice.

Canada is like a big business. All our wealth comes from the land, sea and forest. This great flow of wealth pays our bills and gives us our standard of living. If I remember correctly, in the depression of the thirties our national income from our resources went down to between $4 billion and $5 billion per annum. Last year our national income had grown to over $26 billion; this year it will likely be over $27 billion. Now any business or industry that is growing steadily requires more money from year to year with which to finance. I hope to see our national income from our land, sea and forests top $30 billion before long. If so, far more money than we have now in circulation will have to be found and put into circulation to finance such a large production. Nothing, not even money, should stand in the way of progress as far as Canada is concerned. Now, as far as inflation goes, that cry is rather far-fetched, as long as we keep on increasing our flow of real wealth from our resources. As I understand the word "inflation", it means too much money in circulation in comparison with the amount of goods and services being produced—in other words, when production and money get out of equilibrium, we have either inflation or deflation.

Let us take a look at our dollar as it has been the last year or so. If it had shrunk in purchasing power 10 per cent or so, we might have had cause to worry, but it has remained steady. I do not see how we can possibly have inflation when many of our farmers are in a rather bad way, as their income has gone down, also their spending power. We have too much wheat, too much beef, too much pork, too much butter. We certainly have plenty of lumber, and our railways do not seem to be overburdened with freight or they would hardly be looking for such a large increase in freight rates. Our textile industry has certainly all the raw materials it wants and all the men it requires to work in it. The same goes for our coal mines, our fishing industry, our leather industry, our apple and potato industry, and many others. At harvest time last fall the price of potatoes was so deflated that farmers in the Maritimes were offering this product away below cost—and the same was true of apples—and this was at a time the bank rate was being raised. Where have we inflation in our economy? We have a temporary shortage of steel, but this is rapidly being overcome, and it looks as though the United States will soon have surplus steel.

The commercial banks are right at the grass roots of our economy and they would be among the first to know all about inflationary tendencies. Canadian banks have always been rather noted for being conservative. I never knew a time when our large banks have had such able top executives. They are outstanding in their profession and they should be called into serious consultation rather than just being directed what to do, especially when it might mean a right-about-face or possibly the upsetting of the economy of the country.

A year or so ago it was advertised all over the country by the Government, as well as the banks, that the banks would step into the building situation. This made it very convenient for a man in an isolated community to step into the bank and arrange terms for a home-building loan. Now if he goes to the bank he is told the bank cannot help him, and it is a great bulwark against socialism or communism in any country for people to own their own homes. The banks, some years ago, went into the small-loans business, which was a great thing for the country at large, but now this class of business will be greatly curtailed and the small fellow will have to turn to the high-priced money lenders and pay double or more for his needs. Now this is business the banks should be doing for their own benefit and the benefit of the small borrower. If we want to drive the country to socialism we could not do anything more effective than forcing good small borrowers back into a position where they would have to pay more than double bank interest for their small requirements. I wonder if the Bank of Canada weighed the hardship it was causing when it raised the bank rate 100 per cent and curtailed the banks' lending power? Take the 20 per cent raise in interest rates that will add many millions on to the cost of doing business. It will hit small businesses the worst. It will raise the cost of mortgage money, which in turn raises rents and the cost of living which, of course, is inflationary and done by Bank of Canada action. Again, governments are the largest borrowers, and a raise in interest rates will cost all our governments, federal and provincial, many millions per annum, which of course will be added to the tax bill and thus to the cost of living. This is also inflationary and done by bank action.

If our dollar were losing its purchasing power, compared with the United States dollar, we might think there were some signs of inflationary tendencies on the horizon in Canada, but our dollar has been selling above the American dollar for a long time. Even the gold dollar is not worth as much as the Canadian dollar, as we will only pay thirty-four of our dollars for an ounce of gold, when the latter is selling for $35 per ounce on world markets. If gold is supposed to control inflation, we seem to have more deflation than we have inflation, as far as our dollar is concerned.

In the United States this matter of raising the bank rate has caused very serious concern in high quarters and their rate has only gone up a little over 80 per cent, whereas the rate in Canada was raised 100 per cent. The Federal Reserve Board has already started to retrace some of its steps the last week or two by putting several hundred millions of dollars back into circulation by buying back Treasury bills from the commercial banks, and I predict there will be a lowering of the bank rate in the United States before very long.

Three leading members of President Eisenhower's cabinet have expressed their disagreement with such a high rate as set by the Federal Reserve Board. The Secretary of the United States Treasury, Mr. Humphrey, has stated that national conditions in the nation's economy would have shaken out any inflationary excesses without any help from the Reserve Board—and Mr. Humphrey is an outstanding financial man. Commerce Secretary Weeks, Labour Secretary Mitchell and Dr. Arthur Burns, noted economist, and who is Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, have expressed similar views, and President Eisenhower has stated that the situation should be looked into. In consequence of this, Representative Patman of Texas, Chairman of the Congress Economic Committee, has opened a government inquiry into the bank rate situation and the dissatisfaction it has caused throughout the nation.

The Federal Reserve Board is responsible to Congress, and Representative Patman proposes to call Reserve Board Chairman Martin and other witnesses in an endeavour to find out why such a high bank rate is necessary. The inquiry is public, and I have written for a copy of the proceedings.

I intend to vote for the bill now before the Senate, as I did for the Central Mortgage bill, even though this legislation gives the Industrial Development Bank extended powers that have been taken away from the chartered banks. We must remember that this Development Bank was originally set up to make secondary term loans not suitable for the ordinary bank. Now it will be out in front in some phases of the banking business formerly carried on by the chartered banks, and of course we know it is a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada. This would seem to me unfair competition at least.

I have tried to point out what I think are some inconsistencies in connection with certain actions being taken with regard to our country's economy, and the hardships that have followed the maintaining of so high a bank rate and the placing of an embargo on many kinds of bank loans. I do not hesitate to express a strong opinion that at least some of the recent rises in the bank rate were a step in the twilight, if not in the dark, and that quite possibly in the long run this will have a serious effect on the nation's economy. Canada needs adventure capital more than any other country I know of, and high interest rates are certainly not conducive to the flow of such capital into the kind of investments that develop our great natural resources.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Haig, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 19, at 3 p.m.

CANADIAN FORCES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill 416, an Act respecting the Canadian Forces.

He said: Honourable senators, during the past two sessions I had the privilege of explaining bills similar to this one, providing for amendments to legislation affecting the armed forces of Canada.

This Bill No. 416, which was debated in the other place on June 11, 12 and 13, amends two acts. Part 1 of the bill amends the Defence Services Pension Act, which is chapter 63 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. There are three sections of the bill which vary the provisions of that act. Part II of the bill amends 9 sections of the National Defence Act, which is chapter 184 of the Revised Statutes.

As honourable senators know, for a number of years it has been the practice to bring in, each session, a bill of this character, which is in the form of a statute law amendment act, amending different pieces of legislation affecting the armed forces. At times objections have been raised to the form in which these bills have been presented to Parliament. Probably there is something to be said on both sides of the argument, but may I remind honourable senators that for the most part this legislation is of particular interest to the armed forces, and to have all the amendments that affect such legislation contained in one bill every year is a convenience to those who have to deal with the various acts.

I should point out too that the bill now before us is in a form that can very well save Parliament a great deal of time. For example, in 1951, by chapter 7 of the statutes of that year, Parliament passed an act respecting the Canadian Forces, which amended 25 other federal acts. One can readily see what a lengthy procedure and what a relative waste of time there would have been had Parliament considered each of those acts individually, instead of in one bill. I have felt for the past two years that some explanation of this form of legislation was due to the members of this honourable house, because from time to time objections have been made to the way in which the department has proposed the legislation to Parliament.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Does this new procedure to which my honourable friend refers date back prior to 1951?

Hon. John J. Connolly: This procedure has been used since the passage of the National Defence Act, in 1950, when the whole act was revised.

Before I discuss the individual sections of the bill, may I say that with one exception there is no relationship between the sections; and I hope I will not weary the Senate by making too lengthy an explanation on any one of the sections.

I come first to section 2. Perhaps I should remark, by way of introduction, that a pension is something that is paid to an officer or a man, or his dependents, after he leaves the service, usually after having served a minimum of ten years. A pension is paid in monthly instalments after the retirement of the officer or man, and is usually for life. On the other hand, a gratuity is a lump-sum payment which the person retiring from the service receives at the time of his retirement. Now, retirement may be either compulsory or voluntary. When a person retires compulsorily, in the normal case he is entitled to receive one month's pay and allowances for each year of service. For example, if a man retires after having served eight years, and is entitled to a gratuity, he will receive eight months' pay and allowances. Voluntary retirement, on the other hand, involves the payment of a gratuity of only the amount that has been paid into the gratuity fund by the person who is retiring.

As honourable senators know, officers in the services may serve either under what is known as a short-service commission, which consists of a period of engagement of some three to seven years, or under a regular commission, which normally is for life.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question?

Hon. John J. Connolly: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Reid: What happens in the event a man is dismissed for a misdemeanor or a crime—say a theft—and is compulsorily retired? Suppose such a person had eight or ten years of service, would he be paid a gratuity?

Hon. John J. Connolly: I think I should let that question stand for the committee, if the honourable gentleman would not mind, because it may be that in a case of that kind the man would be entitled to only a return of payments. I think perhaps that would be the situation, but frankly I have not that information. I am sorry.

Men serve for the period of their enrolment period, which usually is from three to five years, but they may be re-engaged if their service is satisfactory.

Now I should say this, that officers serving under a short-service commission do not come under the Defence Services Pension Act unless they have previously served in the ranks, but members of the forces other than officers are all covered by the provisions of that act.

Section 2 itself is limited in scope and only provides a benefit for an officer who has been promoted from the ranks. If an officer promoted from the ranks enrols for a fixed term, at the end of that term he may be given a permanent commission or be released, or he may have his fixed-term commission extended. Under the act as it now stands, if at the completion of his fixed term he is offered but does not accept a commission he is deemed to have voluntarily retired from the service and in that circumstance he would get a gratuity based only on the period of his service as an officer. That is done under the pay regulations. He loses the gratuity for his service in the ranks.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The bill does not say that; it seems to say the opposite. It reads:

(2) A contributor, being an officer . . . shall, for the purposes of this part, be deemed to have been (a) compulsorily retired from the forces if (i) he did not accept an offer for a further fixed term of service, or . . .

Hon. John J. Connolly: I am referring to what the act says now. What you are reading is the amendment.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I am reading what the bill says, yes.

Hon. John J. Connolly: As I say, under the present act he is deemed to have voluntarily retired, so he would get a gratuity based only on his service as an officer and would lose the gratuity for his service in the ranks. The amendment provides that under these circumstances he would get a gratuity for not only his service as an officer but as well for the period of his service in the ranks.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It seems a contradiction in terms.

Hon. John J. Connolly: That is why I explained the difference between a pension and a gratuity. Perhaps it might help if I repeated the headings under which I have been discussing the matter: first, the situation as to the payment of a gratuity when the retirement is compulsory, and, in the second place, when it is voluntary; and then, the difference between the various terms of service of an officer and the term of service of a man.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Does this proposed amendment not bear in any aspect on the pension and the amount of it as well?

Hon. John J. Connolly: It might well do that, because this section is intended to clear up a previous section which was not too clear; and I am frank to say that the section as rewritten is not too clear either. But the effect of the change in the wording of the section is to permit an officer who has been in the ranks to get a gratuity based not only on his period of service as an officer but, as well, on the period of his service in the ranks.

The effect of section 3 is to assimilate for pension purposes the position of a warrant officer in the army, a warrant officer in the air force, and a chief petty officer, class 1, in the navy. The reason for the change is this. In the army, in this category of servicemen, there are warrant officers, and, below that rank, staff sergeants; in the air force there are warrant officers, and below that rank, flight sergeants; in the navy there have been warrant officers and chief petty officers just below warrant officers. The navy has abolished the rank of warrant officer and it has been replaced by that of chief petty officer, class 1.

As to section 4: the law as it now stands provides that former members of the forces who may have money due by them to the crown as the result of an overpayment, or perhaps as a result of a claim for damages, can have the money recovered by the crown out of funds payable to them under the provisions of the Defence Forces Pensions Act. Heretofore the act has required that notice must be given to such a pensioner before the deduction can be made. It is now provided—and this is the only purpose of the amendment—that this notice, to any person from whose pension the deduction is to be made, may be given by registered mail, sent to the person's last known address. The amendment has to do only with the kind of notice that is given and the place to which it can be dispatched if the person is not readily available to receive the notice.

Those are the amendments to the Defence Services Pension Act. I now come to the amendments to the National Defence Act.

Section 5 deals with subordinate officers. Perhaps I should preface my explanation by saying that officers are "commissioned" in the service and other ranks are "enrolled" in the service. The term "other ranks" includes subordinate officers. There always seems to be a confusion of terms, and this section is a little difficult to follow because of that. The subordinate officers in the various forces are as follows: in the navy, acting sub-lieutenants, midshipmen or naval cadets; in the army, officer cadets; and in the air force, flight cadets. Heretofore subordinate officers could only be enrolled for a fixed term of service. By the amendments it is proposed that these various classes of subordinate officers may be enrolled for either a fixed or an indefinite term of service. The fixed term is usually a period of three to seven years. Sometimes among these cadets there are some who are felt to be worthy of long-term commissions, and they can be enrolled for an indefinite period as career men in the service. Perhaps honourable senators would be interested to know that there are 578 subordinate officers in the navy, 660 in the army and 1,401 in the air force.

I come now to section 6 of the bill. Either last year or the year before, an amendment was made to the National Defence Act which provided that the dependents of service personnel, and civilians who might be with the forces outside of Canada, were to be made subject to the Code of Service Discipline. This amendment does not vary that position, except that it subjects those civilians to the authority of the commanding officer of the appropriate unit for the purpose of satisfying the requirements of defence or evacuation in the event of an enemy attack, or even the preparation, practice or execution of any plan, arrangement or manoeuvre for defence. There are a good many dependent civilians living with the forces in Europe: wives and children of servicemen, and civil servants who are working with the forces on behalf of the Department of National Defence. Under this amendment the appropriate commanding officer will have authority over these people to deal with them in the circumstances I have outlined. However, I must point out there is one reservation provided in the section: the commanding officer cannot require such persons to bear arms under any circumstances.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I interrupt to ask a question? I take it that when this amendment goes into effect it will be applicable in peacetime as well as in wartime, and that an officer of any of the three forces will be able to order civilians to do certain things other than bear arms or fight the enemy. If a civilian refused to obey such an order would he be penalized?

Hon. John J. Connolly: I must confess that the penalty provisions are not in my mind.

Hon. Mr. Reid: This is a brand new section.

Hon. John J. Connolly: That is right, but in the amendment we passed last year or the year before we subjected these people to the Code of Service Discipline, which provides various penalties. I wish I had anticipated this question, for I might have been able to answer my honourable friend to his satisfaction. This is something, however, that can be readily ascertained in committee.

Section 7 of the bill deals with what lawyers call "parties to an offence". In effect it simply incorporates into the National Defence Act section 21(2) of the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Would my honourable friend suggest a reason for the incorporation of the subsection?

Hon. John J. Connolly: I think it is to bring the penal sections of the National Defence Act into line with the provisions of the Criminal Code. It was something that had not been incorporated before.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: What is the necessity for it?

Hon. John J. Connolly: I think the provision rounds out the Code of Service Discipline just as it rounds out the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Does it apply to civilians?

Hon. John J. Connolly: The National Defence Act applies only to people who are subject to its provisions. The identical section does apply to civilians, however, because it is contained in the Criminal Code.

The provisions of the section are these. If two or more persons form a common intention to carry out some unlawful act and in the process of carrying out that unlawful act a crime is committed, each of the co-conspirators who knew or who ought to have known that a crime was likely to be committed in the performance of the originally planned unlawful act would be guilty of the incidental crime.

Section 8 of the bill is designed to prevent looting. It provides that during wartime operations against an enemy a person who steals from a wounded or a dead man, or who steals unprotected or abandoned property, shall be penalized as described in the section. Ordinary stealing under the act is provided for in section 104, and the penalty is a maximum of seven years if it is theft in the ordinary meaning of the word, or a maximum of fourteen years in the case of theft by a trustee.

The stealing that is in contemplation here, looting, is the type of theft which the authorities seem to feel would jeopardize the security of the forces. That is why it is looked upon as a much more serious type of crime.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask a question? Why is the word "warlike" used instead of the word "wartime"? The honourable senator used the word "wartime" in his explanation, but the act uses the word "warlike". To my way of thinking there is a difference. A warlike operation might take place during peacetime. For instance, the forces could be carrying out warlike exercises.

Hon. John J. Connolly: That is right. I think, too, the same provisions would apply in a warlike operation as in a wartime operation, and the security of the forces could be jeopardized if looting went on.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I am sorry to interrupt my friend again. I presume there is a provision somewhere else in this section making it an offence to steal a protected property. The bill only mentions unprotected property.

Hon. John J. Connolly: I think my honourable friend's assumption is correct. That is one of those matters which might well be looked into if the bill goes to committee. Protected property is just as important to be considered as unprotected property.

Section 9 deals with negligence in the operation of motor vehicles owned or controlled by the armed forces. At the present time if a man drives recklessly, or causes injury or damage as a result of the operation of a motor vehicle, he is guilty under the provisions of the act. But an officer in a vehicle that is driven recklessly and with abandon would be guilty only if there was injury to persons or property. Subsection (1) (a) requires the officer to prevent the reckless driving. In other words, the officer can be found guilty along with the operator of the vehicle if the vehicle is driven recklessly and the man is found guilty of reckless driving, whether injury or damage was occasioned or not.

Subsection (1) (b) of this section deals with the driving of a service vehicle by any person while his ability to drive is impaired. As honourable senators know, section 222 of the Criminal Code deals with driving while intoxicated, or driving under the influence of a drug, and a distinction is made between driving while intoxicated, in section 222, and driving while impaired, in section 223. The distinction comes out in the penalty provisions made in section 222 and in section 223. The latter deals with driving while the ability of the driver is impaired by alcohol or drugs. The amendment incorporates into the Defence Forces Act the provisions of section 223 of the Criminal Code. In other words, it is felt that in the operation of motor vehicles by the services, a man who drives while impaired —perhaps while driving vital material, or engaged in action, or in games or in some kind of exercise—is doing the service a serious harm.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I suppose it is taken for granted that the driver would be operating the vehicle while in the discharge of his regular duties?

Hon. John J. Connolly: Yes.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: What would happen if a member of the forces took out a Defence Department car? Would the public be protected in that case?

Hon. John J. Connolly: Oh, yes, the public would be protected by the provisions of sections 222 and 223 of the Criminal Code. Even if the man were driving on a public highway in a Defence Department vehicle he would still be subject to the provisions of the Criminal Code.

The penalty provided by this subsection is imprisonment up to five years. One of the initial penalties under the Criminal Code for driving while intoxicated is imprisonment for 30 days up to three months for the first offence; and for driving while impaired the penalty is a fine of $50 up to $500, or imprisonment up to three months, or both. Under section 9 of the bill it is considered to be an offence serious enough to warrant the more severe penalty of up to five years.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask the honourable member a question? The section says that a guilty person "is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years or to less punishment." Why are the words "less punishment" added?

Hon. John J. Connolly: Well, it leaves the discretion in the hands of the judicial functionary who tries the case. I think it is desirable to provide that the punishment should always fit the crime, according to the discretion of the court.

Subsection (1) (c) provides that an officer or anyone else in authority who allows a person to drive a service motor vehicle while the ability of that person is impaired by alcohol or drugs, is also chargeable with the offence.

Subsection 2 is an onus section: it provides that if a man occupies the driver's seat of a motor vehicle while impaired he must establish to the satisfaction of the court, when he is charged, that he did not mount the vehicle for the purpose of operating it. If he cannot discharge that onus, then he is presumed to have been in charge of the motor vehicle for the purpose of operating it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable senator a question? If the person sitting in the driver's seat of the vehicle is presumed to be driving or attempting to drive, is he limited to public streets or to public property, or is there any limitation as to place? The section does not seem to say so.

Hon. John J. Connolly: The provision is similar to that of section 224(2) of the Criminal Code. Perhaps that answers the honourable gentleman's question. In other words, this provision is now in the National Defence Act as well as in the Criminal Code, and wherever the offence is committed, if it is on army property, presumably this section would apply. If it were not on army property, then presumably the provisions of the Code would apply. I think a person might be charged either under the National Defence Act or under the Code, depending on where the offence is alleged to have been committed.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Is it not so that the real purpose in incorporating these provisions of the Criminal Code into the National Defence Act is to give the National Defence Act extra-territorial effect? In Canada offenders can always be prosecuted under the Code, but our forces may be stationed in Germany or some other country. I recall that under the Visiting Forces Acts we have agreements with Commonwealth countries, the United States and other NATO countries, whereby these Code provisions, when incorporated in the National Defence Act, will form part of our Code of Service Discipline outside of Canada as well as in Canada.

Hon. John J. Connolly: That is true, and I thank the honourable gentleman for making that point so clearly. Of course, our forces are in many countries, and I think the purpose is to establish in the Code of Service Discipline the provisions of the Canadian civil laws, in so far as they can be established.

Section 10 of the bill deals with the taking of evidence on commission for use at a court martial. By way of preface I may say that the lawyer for an accused is entitled to have a commissioner appointed to take evidence for use at a court martial from a witness who is not readily available to attend the trial. This provision applies in Canada and elsewhere. However, the prosecutor can only take the evidence of a witness for the prosecution on commission if the witness is ill or is absent from the country in which the trial is to take place. Such trials sometimes take place in countries where, under the civil law, witnesses cannot be compelled to attend a Canadian court martial. France is one of those countries, and I am informed by officials in the Judge Advocate General's Branch that such witnesses could not be forced to attend unless there were an amendment to the constitution of France. Section 10 provides that where the prosecution requires the evidence of a witness in a foreign country and that witness cannot readily attend the court martial, the prosecution will be entitled to have his evidence taken on commission and used at the trial. I understand there is ample provision for cross-examination of the witness in such circumstances.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable gentleman if there is any provision for the paying of expenses for the taking of evidence on commission? The section appears to provide only that a qualified person may be appointed as a commissioner, and nothing is said about notifying him of his appointment. The civil law of our provinces contains provisions such as these, but they are quite extensive. Does the act extend these provisions in any way?

Hon. John J. Connolly: There is a great deal more in the act. I do not have the relative sections at hand, but there are provisions as to the method of appointment, the defraying of costs and so on. When the bill is before the committee I shall make a point of having the officials of the department who appear there turn up the sections and have the information available for the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck).

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Thank you.

Hon. John J. Connolly: I come next to section 11, which would add to the act a new section 169A. Subsection 1 thereof defines the place of detention for service persons who are ordered to detention. This is not a new provision; it is contained in subsection 2 of section 178, which is repealed by section 12 of the bill. This provision is placed in this section because it seems the most logical place for it.

Subsection 2 of the new section 169A provides that corrective disciplinary measures imposed upon persons who are in detention are to be subject to the regulations. This is similar to a provision recently added to the United Kingdom Army Act and our Penitentiary Act. Honourable senators will understand that these corrective measures are to be applied to persons who have already been found guilty of an offence and have been placed in detention, and who, while in detention, have committed an offence against the rules of the place of detention.

By subsection 3 the corrective measures by way of punishment for breaking the rules of the place of detention are made quite restrictive. For example, a person may be sentenced to close confinement, or to some dietary punishment such as being put on bread and water for a period of time, or to a loss of privileges; but it specifically prohibits whipping or paddling and any of the punishments provided for major offences against the Code of Service Discipline, which punishments are referred to in section 121 of the act.

Hon. Mr. Smith: What about pack drill?

Hon. John J. Connolly: I can speak only with respect to the navy, in which pack drill was abolished by the late Honourable Angus Macdonald when he was Minister of National Defence (Naval Service).

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am sure some honourable senators can speak from experience of pack drill. Can my honourable friend tell us whether it has been abolished in the three branches of the service?

Hon. John J. Connolly: I cannot answer for the army or the air force, but I know in the navy it has been abolished.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: My observation was with respect to one of the other branches of the service.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Well, if any honourable senator who was in the navy does not remember pack drill with relish, he can take some satisfaction from the fact that no naval rating is subjected to it today.

Section 13 of the bill has to do with the payment of tolls on bridges, wharves, etc., in Canada. The general rule at the present time is that vehicles of the forces do not pay tolls on bridges. There is a wonderful new bridge at Halifax, which has done a great deal for that city, for Dartmouth and the surrounding area,—and

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I ask the honourable gentleman if the compensation provided for is retroactive?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Does my friend suggest that they should pay tolls on the bridges they did not cross?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Hon. John J. Connolly: In the case of the bridge at Halifax, the Department of National Defence sold the land for the approaches to the authority which built and operates the bridge. The Department has felt it was only fair that its own vehicles should pay for the privilege of using the bridge. There is nothing in the act which allows the Treasury Board to approve of any arrangement made by the department for the use of the bridge by service vehicles. This amendment is designed to authorize the board to approve arrangements for payment of tolls.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: May I suggest to my honourable friend that this provides compensation to the commission which is looking after the interests of the Angus L. Macdonald Bridge, but the understanding up to the present time has been that Department of National Defence vehicles would cross the bridge without charge. I was wondering whether the proposed compensation would be retroactive and cover the use of the bridge when no tolls were collected, or will the payment of compensation start only with the passage of this act?

Hon. John J. Connolly: This provision is not retroactive, and I should think that, under the ordinary rules for the interpretation of statutes, it would be effective only from the date on which it was passed.

Honourable senators, my remarks have been lengthy and rambling; however, I trust I have given an adequate explanation of the provisions of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Honourable senators, I withheld my questions until the sponsor of the bill concluded his explanation. With reference to section 2, would the honourable gentleman be good enough to explain the distinction between the two individuals mentioned, namely, officer and man? Why would not the same wording do for both classes?

Hon. John J. Connolly: I think it is because of the nature of the engagement and the type of work that is done, the authority exercised and the like. An officer, as the honourable senator knows perhaps a great deal better than I do, receives a commission under the Royal Seal. As an officer he is vested with certain authority, which he exercises subject to the provisions of the law and the regulations affecting officers. Men on the other hand are not commissioned, they are enrolled in the service, and they are subject to the rules of service discipline.

I must say that I am not too much of an expert on the theory of military law, but perhaps that very simple explanation is what the honourable senator is looking for.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: May I add a comment in that connection? When the original bill was before us there was that distinction between officers and men, and I remember asking at the time why the distinction should be made. I can appreciate that the distinction has to be carried into the amendment because it is in the act, but I do not think that the information given by the honourable senator is an explanation, nor do I think that I got a satisfying explanation when the original legislation was before us. To say that one is commissioned and the other is enrolled, is merely using words. Both are subject to certain penalties if they fail to observe the law. I could see no really good reason for distinguishing between them as we did in the original act, but having done so it is quite reasonable that the distinction should be continued here.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, several sections of this bill deal with pension gratuities. I presume the rates of pay of the various services are fixed by regulations of the department. Has the honourable senator any information as to the bearing that the rates of pay have on enlistments in the various services? Are there any shortages of personnel at the present time due to the rates of pay?

I am also interested in another feature, which I heard of the other day. In the air force, I am informed, $30 per month is paid to members of aircrew as risk pay. This amount is paid to aircrew personnel over and above the pay received by groundcrew personnel. Some of us who live near our great airports see at close hand the training work that is being carried on there all the time, and know of the casualties which, unfortunately, take place from time to time. I do not mean to suggest that we in Canada suffer more—perhaps we suffer less—than any other nation in that regard. But anyone who lives near these airports, who sees and hears these jet-powered planes flying over one's house day and night, is at all familiar with the work being done, cannot fail to realize the hazard that faces a young man who enlists in aircrew. I am wondering just how the sum of $30 a month was decided upon for risk pay. It seems to me that a man who is willing to fly these jets must be motivated by a love of flying and by feelings of patriotism. I am sure it is not the $30 a month which attracts him.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: So, I repeat, I wonder how that particular sum of $30 a month was fixed as the amount of risk pay. I understand that the allotment in some other countries is very different from what it is in Canada. The point, I think, is an interesting one.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. John. J. Connolly: Honourable senators, in reply to the honourable gentleman from Northumberland-Miramichi (Hon. Mr. Burchill), I must confess that I have not at hand the answers to the questions he asked.

The question as to the relationship between the adequacy of pay on the one hand and enlistment on the other, strictly speaking, does not arise out of this bill. I am not saying that is the reason I do not answer it, but I think that it does point up that on a bill of this kind, containing a great many disjointed sections, all kinds of questions can be asked. Honourable senators will agree that it is difficult to answer questions when we have not the assistance of well-informed departmental officials, as the other place has when it is in committee. On the other hand I do say this, that I think the type of discussion that we conduct here in the Senate with reference to bills of this kind, which later go to committee where detailed information can be had from the officials directly, is a very useful way to do the business. I must apologize for not having all the answers, but it is rather difficult to anticipate everything which might be asked.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You did very well.

Hon. John J. Connolly: I will give this assurance to honourable senators, that the departmental officials will prepare the answers to the questions which have been asked, and I hope they will be able to anticipate any other questions that honourable senators may put when the bill is in committee.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: I did not desire to embarrass the honourable senator at all.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. John J. Connolly: If honourable senators so desire, I would move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I would like to make a slight comment in that connection. This bill is part of the Criminal Code of the armed forces and as such is exceedingly important. On two previous occasions in this chamber we have dealt with measures of this nature. One was when we had before us the general Criminal Code revision, which was referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee. That committee referred it to a smaller committee, composed for the most part, though not entirely, of lawyers. In consequence an intensive study was made; not the kind of study which goes on around a table, where a number of people pick up such points as occur to them, but a studious consideration of the bill in all its implications. I think honourable senators will agree with me that through the work we did on that occasion we conferred a very great benefit on the Dominion of Canada. Then followed the general bill with regard to the armed forces to which reference has been made. It went to the Banking and Commerce Committee, which referred it to a smaller committee, where by a painstaking study we corrected and improved it. We changed the bill a good deal.

My suggestion is that, when this bill goes to the Banking and Commerce Committee, it should not be disposed of in a perfunctory manner, but should be referred to a smaller committee of our members by whom it can be carefully considered and an intelligent report presented on proposed amendments.

For instance, it has been noted that a distinction is made between an officer and a man. I drew attention to this in the discussion of the original act; I call attention to it again; and I am not alone in my concern about it. It is a tendency of our times to make the difference between officer and man less, not more, pronounced. The trend is as evident in the British army as it is in our own; and perhaps, in the course of an intensive study of these amendments, we can go further in the same direction. So, to repeat my suggestion: while I am glad that the bill is to be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee I hope that that committee will not pass it perfunctorily.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable members, I cannot say that on this point I agree with the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). I have never placed much reliance on small committees; I have great confidence in the Banking and Commerce Committee, and I believe that every member of that committee and any other honourable senator who wants to attend should have the benefit of a full discussion. We are not so busy that we have not plenty of time to give proper consideration to this bill in committee. The honourable senator alluded to the manner in which the Criminal Code was dealt with. Undoubtedly fine work was done on that occasion, but the legislation was of a special character and of peculiar interest to those who are engaged in criminal law, rather than to the ordinary layman. This bill is of a different kind. The general panorama has been surveyed by the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly), and we are now in a position to consider the bill in detail.

I do not want some honourable senator to reproach me after this fashion: "It is all very well for you to talk, for you are on the committee; but what about the rest of us? All we are likely to get is a perfunctory report from the committee, and then we shall be asked to pass the bill." I entirely agree with that point of view. When I first came to this House I was among the very small fry; I was not even a member of a committee. One day, when I wanted to speak in committee I was not permitted to do so; so when the bill was reported back to the house I refused to let the committee move except in conformity with the rules. The Right Honourable Arthur —Meighen, at that time Government leader, and the Right Honourable Mr. Dandurand, Leader of the Opposition, asked "What is the honourable senator from Winnipeg complaining of?" I said, "If you two distinguished gentlemen want to know, I will tell you. I was at the Banking and Commerce committee meeting this morning but was denied the right to speak or to ask questions on the matter under consideration, which is one I know something about. If I cannot speak there, I can speak here." So, though I am quite willing that this bill be considered by the Banking and Commerce Committee, I want it to be considered by every member of that committee, and not relegated to a subcommittee unless, because of lack of time or some other special factor, this course is absolutely necessary. A great many matters are included in the bill; provisions for dealing with soldiers' pensions and refunds and the rest are very important; so let us bear in mind our responsibility to those concerned, and act accordingly.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 14, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. John J. Connolly for the second reading of Bill 165, an Act to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable members, I do not intend to speak at any great length, because some honourable senators wish to attend committees or have other pressing duties. First, however, may I congratulate the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) and thank him for his explanation of the bill. By and large, I take it the intention is to add to the objects for which money may be loaned, and for these purposes the total sum available will be increased. The details, of course, are reserved for the attention of the committee.

When I learned that the bank is empowered to charge 6 per cent I thought it was a very high interest rate, especially as, unlike a private company, it is not required to pay corporation tax, or any tax at all. I do not know whether the Industrial Development Bank is to pay anything for the money it will get. I can find nothing in the bill to indicate that it will need to do so. Funds will be provided by the Bank of Canada, and the charge, if any, for this service, will certainly be less than 6 per cent. If the bank were privately owned, and it made a profit of, say, $100,000, 47 per cent, or nearly $50,000, would be payable to the treasury. However, at this time I will not go into the details of the bill.

As I listened to the speech of the honourable senator from Southern New Brunswick (Hon. McLean) my mind went back to my university days, for the honourable senator's remarks sounded very much like the lectures I used to hear from our professor of economics. He would argue, as I understood him, that in certain cases two and two would make three, in other cases two and two would make five, but I never caught him admitting that they might make four, as I had been taught at school. Lo and behold, the honourable senator from New Brunswick, after making a number of arguments—far better than I can do—against the bill, said, near the end of his speech, that he would, however, vote for the bill. I knew right away that a politician had written that speech and had read it. I was sure of this when I heard the words "I intend to vote for the bill".

This brings up another point. I think that when a person has become a senator he ought to have reached the stage in public life where he can get up on his feet and address an audience without having to read from a manuscript. A person can always express his real feelings better when he delivers a speech extemporaneously, and will make a deeper impression on his audience than if he read his speech.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Does the Leader of the Opposition want to know why speakers prepare texts?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Why?

Hon. Mr. Reid: So the manuscript can be handed to the press for publicity purposes.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, if a person makes a good speech the press will print it whether or not a text has been prepared, and if a person makes a rotten speech the press won't publish it under any conditions. Except when senators are explaining bills and when new members are addressing the house during their first session, I think we should enforce the rule that speeches be not read in this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Then we would really know what honourable senators have in their minds.

I come now to the bill itself. I wondered why the Bank of Canada increased its bank rate to 3 per cent in April of this year. I have not heard of any explanation in the public press or in the House of Commons why this was done. The only thing I read was that the United States had increased its bank rate and we had followed suit. Surely we did not need to do that. But we did, and what has happened as a result? It is argued that the chartered banks, in turn, increased their rates. Did the Governor of the Bank of Canada direct the chartered banks to increase their rates and to cut down on lending? Did he tell the chartered banks and the insurance companies they did not need to make any more loans on housing? This is what is happening in our country today. How has it come about?

Hundreds of Canadians holding Dominion of Canada bonds in amounts of, say, $1,000 to $2,000, found that the value of their bonds had dropped from two to five points within two weeks of the announcement about the bank rate. I recall a widow coming to me in Winnipeg. She had $5,000 in Dominion of Canada bonds and she was protesting because the value of each $100 bond had dropped to $97. She said she wanted her money back and I told her: "My dear lady, we have a very fine government at Ottawa that believes in helping the poor and needy. You can now sell your bonds at $97 each, but a month ago you could have sold them at $100 each. Why didn't you sell them then?" She replied, "Because everybody told me they were the safest investment I could make and I believed it". Well, that kind of thing has happened to the little people all over this country.

Another effect of this increase in the bank rate has been a tremendous falling off of loans on housing and new buildings. Yet, with a few exceptions, the men who head the Bank of Canada also head this Industrial Development Bank. For example, the Governor of the Bank of Canada is the President of the Industrial Development Bank, and so on. Why do they say they are going to push out more money on one side and yet curtail loans on the other side? That is what I want to know, and so do the people of Canada. I have here an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of last Friday. It also appeared in the Ottawa Journal, the Winnipeg Free Press, the Winnipeg Tribune, the Toronto Globe and Mail, the Toronto Star, the Montreal Gazette, and all other large newspapers in Canada. With the permission of the house I would like to read into Hansard the first part of this article. It is headed, "Trade deficit soars to peak $345 million".

Canada's deficit in foreign trade of goods and services rose to a record $345 million in the first three months of 1956. This was just about double the $174 million deficit in the first three months of 1955 and was financed by imports of short-term and long-term capital, increasing Canada's foreign debt, the Bureau of Statistics reported today.

The article goes on at some length, but the point is that despite this $345 million deficit in the first three months of 1956 the Government, apparently on the advice of the officials of this bank, are asking us to extend their power to lend money. It looks to me as if they are a little "grabby" when they propose to lend money at 6 per cent interest and yet want to pay only 3¼ per cent interest on their own bonds. Sometimes when I sit in the Senate chamber I would if the people of Canada realize this situation.

Britain is in the same position as we are. She is importing more goods than she is exporting, and she is in trouble. It will be argued that hundreds of people will come into Canada and invest money in municipal and city bonds. Take Ontario. Some three months ago the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario borrowed about $50 million from New York investors to help in the seaway power development. That money came into Canada and it helped balance what went out, but it has to be paid back to the New York investors at the rate of 4 per cent interest over the next twenty or thirty years. This money is not being given away, it is being loaned at a certain rate of interest. That is the situation. By this legislation the officials of the Bank of Canada are in effect saying, "We are going to extend credit to everybody." Yet the bank is tightening up on credit too. It has been said that banks are hard to deal with, but that has not been my experience. Let me tell you a personal story. On March 1, 1929, I had a loan of $90,000 from my bank, and the next day it called in the loan. I had stock in my broker's hands. I was speculating; I was gambling. I went to the broker and asked him to sell the stock so that I could get my money, and he said: "Why, Jack, don't be a fool. This stock is going to double in the next six months." I said, "Well, you had better tell that to the manager of the bank I deal with, because he does not think so; he thinks I am going to be broke in six months, and he wants his money." So I sold my stock and paid off the loan. When the six months was up, the stock which I had sold in March for $155,000 could not have been sold for the amount of my investment, and in October I could not have sold them for anything at all. No doubt the people in my home town said, "Haig is a smart fellow, he knows when to sell out."

Honourable senators, we are borrowing large sums of money from the United States. Only the other day the City of Winnipeg borrowed $7½ million from the United States, for the first time in at least ten years, to my knowledge. We were borrowing money then when the rate of discount was 20 per cent against us, and we had to pay that back to the American people.

I am against this kind of lending. I do not think the Government should be in this kind of business, taxing the people of this country to raise money and lend it out like this. If banks or individuals want to lend money for the Government, that is all right. But here the credit of Canada is being used in order to make loans to people who have already been refused loans by the chartered banks. We know very well that if a bank refuses a loan to a man, all he has to do is to go to the Industrial Development Bank and it will lend him the money. It may be said that there are means to prevent abuses. Human nature was never able to prevent them. We often hear people say, "Why has that fellow Jones done so much better than that fellow Smith?" Well, it is because Jones was able to sense trouble coming, but Smith was not, so he had to sell out quickly to save himself.

Here is a department of the Government saying, "We are $355 million short this year." So they borrowed money from the United States, and they invested money in Canada to balance it up. This sort of thing can go only so far. Britain did the same thing, and it has been having trouble ever since.

Honourable senators, I am opposed to this kind of legislation. I am opposed to the Government entering into the business of money lending. It is a precarious business, and always will be; if it was not, there would not be so much money made out of it. Some people are willing to take the risk, and others are not. We are lending money when we cannot finance ourselves, let alone another country. Does all this money have to be loaned in order to carry on the industries of this country? It is said that if a fellow has a good idea he does not even have to own a successful business to get a loan. There might be some reason for lending him money if he already had a successful business. Or a man might be able to get a loan because of having a glib tongue and being able to put on a big show. It might be said the bank would not lend money to such a man, but I am not so sure about that. The men who are at the head of our chartered banks are there because they have ability and have demonstrated it all the way up. The man in the Bank of Commerce or the Bank of Montreal, or any other chartered bank, who has become general manager of vice-president or president, has had to prove his ability to the directors who have control of the money in the bank, and you can be sure that they do not promote to high position anyone who is incapable of filling it efficiently. Every step taken by such a person in the service of the bank has been noted: the record shows what he has done, and the people who judged him for his ability all the way up are the people who lend the money. But in this case the people who make loans are not lending a dollar of their own—it is your money and mine they are lending, and the money of everybody else in the country.

For those reasons I am opposed to this legislation holus-bolus. I was opposed to the original legislation, for I did not see any need for it at all, and I do not see the need now. It is all right to say that the losses have only been so much, but you cannot tell what the losses are until things have quietened down and there is less speculation. I do not think we should pass this bill until Canada is able to sell as much goods to the world as it buys, until we have money for new investment. That might not be for some time. We have doubled our debt to the world this year so far, and I do not know what the situation will be at the end of the year. The country was $174 million short last year, and is $355 million short this year already. Nobody knows how short it will be by the end of the year, but we do know that if our expenses go on in this way and we have to keep borrowing money it will lead to inflation. If by any chance our prosperity slips and we have to borrow in the market, most of us will have to pay the interest in inflated currency.

It must never be forgotten that the Government has to take responsibility for the actions of the Bank of Canada. The Government set the rate of discount in the Bank of Canada at 3 per cent, hoping that would curtail the expenditure of money in this country; that is the reason it was done; yet in defiance of its own argument it proposes to lend money like this.

Honourable senators, for these reasons I oppose the bill. I hope the Government will not push this legislation, and that the bill will not be passed this session.

Hon. Norman P. Lambert: Honourable members, I had not intended to say anything in connection with this bill. No doubt many members who have read the bill would have no difficulty in dissipating some of the fallacies that we have just heard expressed with regard to the Industrial Development Bank Act and the question of balance of trade. My honourable friend the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), while he elaborated on the terrible condition which he tried to depict in connection with the imbalance of imports and exports, neglected to state that today the Canadian dollar is enjoying a premium of 1½ per cent over the American dollar. I think that in itself is a commentary upon his other remarks. In the first place, our trade relations with the United States in the matter of exports and imports have nothing whatever to do with this bill or with the banking system of this country, in any way, shape or form. Certainly it has nothing to do with the Industrial Development Bank, which was established to perform another function than that carried out by our chartered banking system, which is, roughly speaking, a commercial banking system. The chartered banks take care of current loans and help to operate businesses which turn over the output of industry as expeditiously as possible; whereas the Industrial Development Bank was set up to deal with new industries, and to loan money in much the same way as mortgages are given to farmers. In other words, the Farm Loan Board was intended to do the same thing in the agricultural field as was the Industrial Development Bank in the industrial field.

When this bill is in committee I am sure my honourable friend will be able to obtain from the officials of the bank many interesting examples of how it has helped immigrants to get started in business and develop successful industries which give employment to many men and women. The loans made by this bank are for a much longer term than those made by the chartered banks.

One hears on all sides today, and reads in the editorial columns of certain newspapers, particularly those with a prejudiced stripe, that because our imports from the United States are so much greater than our visible exports to that country we are faced with nothing short of ruin and disaster. There is another side to that equation, which is not always visible and is blandly overlooked by most people. I speak of the importation of capital into this country, which has to be serviced. Investment capital that is coming into Canada from the United States, and other countries if you like, far exceeds the deficit which exists in the visible trade balance. In the final analysis that capital investment must make a return to the investors in the form of dividends. Those earnings are not shipped out in the form of gold or paid in cash, but in the export of goods to the country from which the capital was obtained. Any student of primary economics or finance knows that trade cannot be conducted except by way of exchange of goods. That has been true throughout the history of England. In her prime trading days she imported visibly more than she exported. However, that difference was made up by the receipt of earnings on her ships and her investments in countries which, unfortunately, she has since lost as a result of war.

Honourable senators, perhaps I may be pardoned for expressing these fundamental economic and financial principles, but they have a very definite relationship to the remarks that have been made about this bill.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, if the senior senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) qualifies as an expert in economics and finance, I think I could break into that class too. For the life of me, I cannot understand how we can export enough goods to pay interest on the money we borrow, when in the first three months of this year our imports exceeded our exports by $345 million.

I say it is impossible to compare our situation today with that of England some years ago. It is true that that country once had a great income from her investments throughout the world and could make up her deficit on trade by the earnings on her investments abroad. I think my friend is putting the cart before the horse, when he compares our position with that of England, because we have no foreign investments. How are we going to balance our export-import picture when capital investment is coming to this country to maintain us at the present time?

There is also the question of the value of the Canadian dollar in the United States. All we do about it is throw out our chests and boast a bit. Personally, I would prefer to see our dollar at par with the American dollar, or even at a discount of 5 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask my honourable friend how he would explain the fact that the Canadian dollar is today worth more than the American dollar?

Hon. Mr. Horner: I certainly do not pose as an expert on that question. Many things have happened to bring about that situation. I go along with the leader on this side (Hon. Mr. Haig) when he asks why does the Bank of Canada charge the chartered banks 3 per cent interest? It was created for the purpose of providing money to the other banks at a low rate of interest. At the same time we are being asked to extend the operations of the Industrial Development Bank, the Farm Loan Board and such agencies. We hear it said: "What is a million dollars? If a project fails, we lose only a part of the money put into it." But we must consider our future ability to meet all these undertakings. Canada must export in order to live. What is our prospect for the future, and how can we increase the export of any commodity we have to sell? I wish I could be more sure of the future, but I see little ground for optimism.

We are fortunate at the present time to be able to export a fair amount of grain, but this is due in part to the fact that last winter was the most severe that Europe had experienced for a hundred years. So, it is only because of the loss of crops and stock on that continent that we have an opportunity to export some of our grain. And we have no corner on the minerals produced in the world today.

I cannot but feel in discussing this national debt and financing question that it is much like a contagious disease: we continue to inoculate ourselves to prevent the disease from becoming fatal. And we are trying to pull ourselves up by our boot straps. We are told that our vast expenditures will create more employment. Well, I hope it all turns out to the good, but it seems to me it is time we took a closer look at the facts.

If I could find two economists who agreed with each other, I would feel better satisfied as to what is the true picture. But when the experts cannot agree amongst themselves, I do not see how I could be expected to offer a satisfactory theory. However, I at least know that if a business is buying more than it is selling, it is in trouble.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I am somewhat in accord with the statements made by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) and to some extent with those of my friend from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner).

When the Industrial Development Bank legislation was first introduced I looked upon it with a good deal of doubt, and I am now looking with some doubt on this particular bill. I should like to be a little more sure as to what the future holds and how the proposals in the bill will work. It is not an answer to say that the Industrial Development Bank has not had to write off any loans in the past. If in this cycle of a boiling and rising economy it had to write off huge losses, what might we expect should the trend in business turn even slightly in the other direction? As I say, I hope these proposals will work, but I am not sure that they will?

My friend from Blaine Lake raised some question about the logic of my friend from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) who said that because of the flood of investment income and shipping profits from abroad, England was able to buy abroad. What else would she do with the money? What good is money if you do not use it to buy something? Great Britain used these funds to purchase such goods as she wanted, in foreign markets, and the result was that in the peak years of her prosperity her imports were very much greater than her exports, while countries that did not enjoy investments abroad—India, for instance—had an excess balance of exports. There were large British investments in India. India was interested in having such investments—of course she paid interest on them—and the result was that India was exporting more than it imported. It was necessary to do that in order to get the money with which to pay the interest on the investments.

Now, we have a somewhat similar situation here. During this period of boom and expansion money is coming into this country, not perhaps as a result of great investments abroad, although we have some, but for investment in Canada. It is just the same kind of money as it would be if it were the produce of investment. What shall we do with it? Shall we sit on it? Money is no good unless you use it, so we are using that money to buy goods abroad.

Suppose, for instance, American money is invested in the Canadian mining industry. What happens? The mining industry imports from the United States expensive machinery to carry on mining development work. So it follows that our imports of mining machinery, supplies and equipment and that sort of thing are in themselves sufficient to make the balance of trade, so called, against us. We are using that money to buy abroad the things required to carry on our industry here.

The Leader of the Opposition says that this money is not being given to us, that we are borrowing it. Of course we are borrowing it, but have we no confidence in the good judgment of the businessmen who are borrowing that money? Are they borrowing it for fun? No, they are borrowing it because they will make a profit out of it.

Hon. Mr. Horner: They think they will.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Well, let us say they think they will. But is their judgment not as good as yours or mine? Their experience justifies them in thinking that it is good business to borrow. So we are borrowing, and when the time comes to pay back we will repay with the money that the investment has made for us.

Now, what do my two honourable friends suggest? That we cut off investments? That we should stop money coming in here?

Hon. Mr. Haig: I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Well, I ask, what else do you suggest? If borrowing money abroad is a bad thing, let us stop it. If it is not a bad thing, why criticize it, and why use specious arguments with regard to it as applied to this bill?

Hon. Mr. Haig: What happened to the investment that Great Britain made in India?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Much of it was repaid; some of it was not.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Most of it was not.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is my friend drawing any comparison between Canada and India?

Hon. Mr. Haig: No, but that is what happened.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Does my friend suggest that this country of Canada, where the investment is being made, will do what India did? We will pay back every dollar.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The people in Britain thought they were great financiers and that they could not make a mistake in investing money in India; but they did, and so can we.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: My honourable friend ought to go and tell that to the investors in the United States.

Hon. Mr. Haig: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. We must not have three speeches going on at once. Is it the intention of the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) to ask a question?

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Would it be a question to me?

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Yes. With respect to the indebtedness of Great Britain to the United States, it is my understanding that every dollar of that was paid long ago. Is that not so?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: There is some question as to whether all obligations of Great Britain to the United States have been paid, but generally speaking every dollar that was borrowed by Great Britain from the United States or every dollar that the United States borrowed from Great Britain has been paid, and I can stand here in perfect confidence and say to the investors of the United States that what they invest in Canada will be repaid,—not every dollar, perhaps, because all business is not profitable and some of their investments may not work out. That is so even with their local investments.

I do not think we need to concern ourselves about the wisdom of United States citizens investing their money in Canada. They will look after that. We will not receive one single dollar of investment that we in our good judgment do not think is good business on our part, each individual judging for himself. The borrower borrows because he thinks he will make money on the borrowing.

Let me ask, where would Canada have been in the past if we had not had investments from abroad? Could we have built our railroads? Where would the money invested in the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway have come from if not from abroad? From the poor settlers of this country living here at that time, nearly a hundred years ago? They had no money to invest.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Well, the money could have been provided by a central bank, and the Government was the only authority to set up such a source. If it was going to be profitable to build the railroad it would have been possible to get the money.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: All right. I take that as a very good explanation of where the money could have come from, but, unfortunately for my friend's argument, the Industrial Development Bank which he opposes is doing the very thing which he is now advocating. Surely my friend does not suggest that such a method should be used for the financing of all our private enterprises?

Hon. Mr. Horner: No, but the public can get money that way.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Well, if that were the issue I would meet it squarely. It is not the function of the Government to supply capital to private individuals and pay the losses out of taxation. That is why I express doubt about this bill and this method of financing.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: At the outset I said something in that regard. But when it comes to condemning the borrowing of money from abroad, be it from the United States or anywhere else, in broad general terms I cannot go along with it. That is what we have been doing in this country for the past century, with great success, and I do not know how we could have developed Canada to the extent we have if not by means of financial assistance from abroad.

I was a member of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission for a number of years, and during that period we borrowed tremendous sums of money, much of it from the United States. What could we have done without that money? We certainly could never have put hydro-electric lines into practically every rural house in the province of Ontario; we could not have supplied electric service to urban homes, to the factories, and done all the things we did for the enterprise of the province of Ontario if we had not borrowed money from abroad.

What would municipalities all over Canada do were it not possible to obtain money from abroad? How could we have built the underground subway in Toronto if our ability to borrow had been restricted? If you leave it to the businessmen of our country to determine when it is profitable to borrow, and interfere with their freedom as little as possible by government regulation, you will find that in the end they will win the game. The best judgment available to us in these matters is that of our own private citizens who profit by the businesses in which they are engaged.

There is something I wanted to say, apart from this question, in reply to the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition, who would enforce the rule that speeches shall not be read in this chamber. I was in the House of Commons when an attempt was made to enforce that rule. The attempt was not too successful and I did not agree with it. For a number of years I have sat in this house, where we pay little attention to the methods of speech employed by various honourable senators. I have seen no abuse that I would wish to correct in any speech that an honourable senator has delivered during all that time. I suggest to my fellow senators that those who wish to speak extemporaneously, as the Leader of the Opposition has just done with such eloquence, skill and ability, and as I am doing, with all these qualities negated, should proceed as they prefer. There are times when I would be free to read a paragraph which I have carefully prepared. A speech carefully prepared in advance of the sitting is a compliment to those to whom it is delivered. I believe it was the great Webster who said that an unprepared speech was an insult to the audience. I am impressed with that statement. An unprepared and un-thought-about speech is much more objectionable than a carefully prepared and written contribution, even though it be read. Personally, I am satisfied to leave the manner of preparation and delivery of a speech to the good judgment of the senator who undertakes its delivery. If he thinks he can get better results by reading it, or a portion of it, I am entirely satisfied to let him proceed and to listen to him. Far be it from me to suggest the enforcement of any rule to interfere with him or to cramp his style. But this has nothing to do with the subject-matter of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask the honourable senator if he does not think that there is a danger, if speeches are read, of weakening the effect of debate by the introduction of views and opinions of someone other than the speaker himself, and not a member of this body?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I suppose there is a danger of somebody getting assistance from outside and thereby expressing the thoughts of someone else. But is that danger much decreased if the material is unwritten rather than if it is written and read? At this moment I may be expressing opinions which somebody outside has handed to me. Most of our knowledge comes from others and our thoughts are subject to the general thinking and talking of the people of the age in which we live. None of us is very original. So I do not see any great danger of the kind that has been suggested, and—to answer more specifically—in the decade during which I have sat in this chamber I have never found the slightest reason to suppose that any honourable senator was merely parroting opinions written for him by somebody else. I am confident that nothing of that sort will take place, and I am fully content to let my fellow-senators conduct themselves as they deem fit.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Speaker: If the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I have very few remarks to make in conclusion. I do not propose to engage in a discussion of the various questions that arose in connection with the balance of international trade and international payments; but I would say this in connection with that portion of the debate, that the Governor of the Bank of Canada, who is also President of the Industrial Development Bank, and the General manager of the Industrial Development Bank will be before the committee. They are people with whom, I think, these problems can be profitably discussed. Both of them were before the committee of the other place, where the discussion ranged over a great variety of subjects and, I think, very usefully so.

I would point out to the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) that this bill is not, as he knows, for the purpose of increasing the capital or the money available to the bank for the purposes of lending. The amount originally established as available for loans of the character proposed to be made by this bank was, as stated in section 12 of the original legislation, $25 million. That figure has never been changed. Section 14 of the act also states:

> The aggregate of the total direct liabilities of the bank, including bonds and debentures issued by the bank, and of the total contingent liabilities of the bank in the form of guarantees given or underwriting agreements entered into by it, shall not any time exceed three times the aggregate amount of the paid-up capital and the reserve fund . . .

So there is no change in the total capital available to be loaned as a consequence of this legislation.

As a result of the enlargement of the definition of institutions able to qualify for the loans under this bill, it is expected that more lending might well be done in both categories,—below and over $200,000. It is likely that that would have happened anyway in the normal course of events. But I would ask honourable senators to bear in mind that when this bank was established the purpose was to fill what was thought to be a gap in the financial machinery of the country. As the honourable the senior senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) has said, this bank differs from the commercial banks in that it does not make term credit available to borrowers. On the other hand, it was felt that relatively small industries could not have access to the credit they need to get themselves established in all parts of this country if an institution of this kind were not created, and there did not seem to be any incentive for a commercial organization to create such an institution. The chartered banks were doing business on a current loan basis; and the big money lenders, the money markets, operating on the basis of bond issues and large mortgages, were not interested in the requirements of small industrial enterprises. It was just that gap that this institution was created to fill. The fact that it loaned a total of $104 million during those twelve years is something to note. While it may be proper to argue that it is not a complete answer to say it has lost just $350,000,—and I do not suggest it is a complete answer—I do say that the need has been filled to the extent of $104 million. I venture to say that the officials would be able to expand on this point in committee with much more knowledge than I am able to do.

There is only one other point I should like to mention. The people who have administered this institution have not had to prove themselves as a result of its operation. I refer to Mr. S. R. Noble, who was manager of this bank for the first ten or eleven years of its existence. Mr. Noble came from a chartered bank organization, the Royal Bank of Canada, and before he ever came near the Industrial Development Bank his reputation in the banking world had been established. Relatively speaking the same can be said about Mr. D. G. Marble, the present General Manager. He also was a graduate of banking institutions, not only in this country but in South Africa. Therefore, in continuing the operation of this bank, it is not a matter of having the bank run by amateurs or academic people. The two men I have referred to had proved themselves in the banking world of this country before being associated with the Industrial Development Bank.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the question is on the motion of the Honourable Senator Connolly, (Ottawa West), seconded by the Honourable Senator Woodrow, that this bill be now read the second time. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Haig: On division.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I do not intend to discuss the merits of this bill. I merely want to bring to the attention of the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) that I have been notified that the Banking and Commerce Committee will meet tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock and that the Finance Committee will meet at 10:30. As the Canadian Forces Bill and the Industrial Development Bank Bill are being referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee, it will certainly not get through its business in time to permit honourable members to attend the meeting of the Finance Committee.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I notice that the Finance Committee is to meet in camera.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That does not make any difference. The members of that committee will want to be there. I happen to serve on that committee and I want to attend its meeting, but I also want to attend the Banking and Commerce meeting. I have been accused of many things here today, so I have quite a few questions I want to ask in committee about the Industrial Development Bank Bill.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: There is something strange here and I would like an explanation of it. I understand the motion before the house is to refer this bill to the Banking and Commerce Committee, yet I already have in my hand a notice that this committee will meet tomorrow morning. Coming events cast their shadows before them.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: The notice does not specify that the meeting is to deal with any specific legislation.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I would like the chairmen of the Banking and Commerce Committee and the Finance Committee to agree on some policy. The members of the Finance Committee have done a great deal of work this year and I for one want to attend its meeting tomorrow; but the Banking and Commerce Committee will never complete its deliberations in half an hour.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Probably the Banking and Commerce Committee could proceed with the bill respecting the Canadian Forces. I do not think any effort will be made on behalf of the committee to proceed with the Industrial Development Bank Bill right away, and I am satisfied that an arrangement agreeable to all could be made.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is all right.

Hon. John J. Connolly: I would like to suggest that the Industrial Development Bank Bill be not placed on the agenda of the Banking and Commerce Committee tomorrow morning.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The committee members can decide that.

Hon. A. Neil McLean: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words to make my position clear. I have a great regard for the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig). When I came to the Senate I learned much from the older members, of whom he was one.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Who are the older members?

Hon. Mr. McLean: I mean older in point of service. I do not think anybody reading Hansard would say that my speech of last Thursday was a political one, although it may have been quite technical. I have been interested in banking affairs for some fifty years, since I was 16 or 17 years of age. I remember when the Industrial Development Bank was organized. I know it has its place in our economy, just as has the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. We must remember that the chartered banks come to Parliament for incorporation and are accountable to Parliament. I am not a director of any bank and I have no special interest in any bank. In my speech I endeavoured to point out certain inconsistencies, and I think I put on Hansard that while the banks were lending more money and putting it into circulation, Canada's national income has grown to almost $28 billion, and that far more money than we now have in circulation will have to be found and put into circulation in order to finance the great future industrial development of this country.

I recall that when I served on the Royal Commission on Employment, in the hungry thirties, our total national income from goods and services amounted to less than $5 billion. I think at one time it was as low as $4 billion. Now it is up to around $28 billion. We simply must have more money put into circulation. I tried to point out the discrimination against chartered banks, which are really the foundation of our credit system. They created credit, and they should be able to loan money at a good deal less than 6 per cent, which the Industrial Development Bank will charge. They should get this business, but their hands are tied. The Industrial Development Bank is a one hundred per cent subsidiary of the Bank of Canada, which was born in the hungry thirties as a child of deflation. I do not know whom it is accountable to, but apparently it is not accountable even to its own board of directors. I said the other day that:

> During the fall of 1955 the chartered banks were directed by the Bank of Canada to cease taking on new commitments for term loans and the banks would no longer make purchases of corporate securities . . .

The chartered banks are being tied while these other institutions are being given a free hand. I do not disagree with the financing of the Industrial Development Bank, and that is why I am voting for the bill; but I do disagree with the Bank of Canada crippling the chartered banks, and I do not know what power it has to do so. Parliament incorporated the Bank of Canada, as it did the chartered banks. They are, as I have said, accountable to Parliament. Similarly, the Federal Reserve Bank is accountable to the United States Congress. That is why an inquiry is now going on in Congress to find out why the bank is putting up the bank rate without any reference to Congress at all. I have written to the committee to obtain the proceedings of the inquiry.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION REPORT ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Civil Service Commission respecting revisions of salary ranges for the staff of the Library of Parliament.

Hon. Norman P. Lambert moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, this report was placed upon the table by His Honour the Speaker on June 12. It simply represents the Treasury Board minute following upon the act of the Civil Service Commission in increasing the salaries of the Library staff. There are 15 beneficiaries in this particular class. At the end of the report it is stated:

> It is also recommended that the class Assistant Library Clerk-Bookkeeper be abolished, effective April 1, 1956.

The person who formerly occupied that position will now be classified as Library Clerk and Bookkeeper, but there is really very little difference between the old and new salary for the position.

The motion was agreed to and the report was adopted.

PRIVATE BILL

NIAGARA LOWER ARCH BRIDGE COMPANY LIMITED—COMMITTEE AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendment made by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to Bill J-14, an Act respecting Niagara Lower Arch Bridge Company Limited.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, for Hon. Mr. Hugessen, the amendment was concurred in.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Next sitting.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

CEREMONY AT OFFICIAL OPENING

On the motion to adjourn:

The Hon. the Speaker: May I remind honourable senators that the ceremony in connection with the reopening of the Library of Parliament will be held at 6 o'clock this evening, and that all honourable members are invited to attend.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 20, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 208, an Act to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

VETERANS' BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL LOANS BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 253, an Act to amend the Veterans' Business and Professional Loans Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

CANADIAN FORCES BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce presented the report of the committee on Bill 416.

The report was read by the Clerk as follows:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom was referred the Bill (416) intituled: "An Act respecting the Canadian Forces", have in obedience to the order of reference of June 19, 1956, examined the said bill, and now report the same without any amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Hon. Charles G. Hawkins, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, presented the committee's report on the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957.

The Clerk (reading):

The Standing Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957, report as follows:—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hawkins: Next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, is tomorrow not a little too early for consideration of the report? I am sure that anyone who wants to study the report in order to discuss it will not be ready by tomorrow. I suggest that it be considered a little later.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I understand that although the chairman of the committee has asked that consideration of the report be placed on the Order Paper for the next sitting he does not propose to go on with it until some time next week.

Hon. Mr. Hawkins: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, I think that the point of the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) is that we should be provided with copies of the report. The honourable leader did not say anything about providing us with copies.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The rules of the house provide that the report be printed in our Minutes of the Proceedings, which will be distributed tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Hawkins: Honourable senators, I move:

That the report of the Standing Committee on Finance on the expenditures proposed by the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957, together with the exhibits attached thereto be printed as an Appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this date.

The motion was agreed to.

See Appendix "A" to today's Hansard, pp. 753 to 777.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

CEREMONY AT OFFICIAL REOPENING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, yesterday afternoon members of this house were present along with members of the House of Commons upon the occasion of the reopening of the Library of Parliament. I think that honourable senators would like the speeches that were delivered on that occasion to appear as a permanent record of this house, and so I would move:

That the address of His Excellency the Governor General, delivered on Tuesday, June 19, 1956, upon the occasion of the reopening of the Library of Parliament, together with the related speeches of the Honourable the Speakers of both Houses of Parliament and the Honourable the Minister of Public Works, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The motion was agreed to.

See Appendix "B" to today's Hansard, pp. 778 to 779.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Thomas Reid: I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). On June 12 when the interim estimates contained in Appropriation Bill No. 3 were brought down, I asked some questions with regard to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Would the honourable gentleman be good enough to expedite the answers?

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: I have made inquiries, but have not yet obtained the information required. I will try to have it available when the next interim supply bill is presented.

PRIVATE BILL

NIAGARA LOWER ARCH BRIDGE COMPANY LIMITED—THIRD READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the third reading of Bill J-14 an Act respecting Niagara Lower Arch Bridge Company Limited.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

CANADA LANDS SURVEYS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Gray Turgeon moved the second reading of Bill 254, an Act to amend the Canada Lands Surveys Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this amending bill deals with only two sections of the Canada Lands Surveys Act. The proposed changes, which are quite simple, relate to the remuneration of the members of the board, the secretary, and examiners who from time to time are appointed to do work under the act. The fees involved are very minor amounts.

Section 1 of the bill amends section 7 of the present act, which reads:

7. (1) Every member or temporary member of the board who attends a meeting thereof called for the purpose of examining candidates or for any other purpose or who attends as a special examiner at an examination shall receive the sum of fifteen dollars for each day's sitting together with his actual living and travelling expenses incurred through his attendance at such meeting or examination.

(2) The secretary shall receive the sum of ten dollars for each day's sitting of meetings of the board at which he attends together with his actual living and travelling expenses incurred through such attendance and shall, in addition, be paid an annual remuneration of two hundred and fifty dollars.

Section 2 of the bill amends section 9 of the act, which reads:

9. Every special examiner, other than a member of the board, shall receive the sum of twenty-five dollars for each day's sitting of examinations at which he presides together with his actual living and travelling expenses incurred through his attendance at such examinations.

The nature of these examinations is such that it is practically impossible to carry out the work involved at a so-called meeting of the board of examiners. Examinations of this kind require first of all the preparation of the examination papers to be used. These papers must be kept in utter secrecy, with no one except those officially handling them having the faintest knowledge of what they contain. Then there is the holding of the actual examination, followed by the grading of the examination papers submitted by the applicants. This kind of work would be extremely difficult to carry out at what is called a "meeting". Practically all the work is done by members of the board individually, and to some extent by the secretary of the board, during hours that are not ordinary working hours for civil servants. It must be remembered, of course, that the members of the board are civil servants, three of them belonging to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. Each member must do the work in seclusion and in deep concentration, free from any disturbance.

Some time ago the office of the Auditor General suggested that a change should be made in the legislation providing remuneration for this work. It is as a result of that suggestion that we now have this bill, which, as we know, has already passed the other house.

By way of information I would point out that during the last calendar year some 82 candidates of all categories were examined. Thirty examination papers were prepared and 395 answer papers were graded.

The chairman of the board is R. Thistlethwaite, Surveyor General of Canada, and the other members are J. E. R. Ross, Dominion Geodesist, and J. E. Lilly, Assistant Dominion Geodesist. The secretary is A. W. W. Cole, of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

A good many of the examinations are held away from Ottawa, and wherever possible it has been the practice of the department to secure qualified persons to carry on these examinations. They are held in several places —for instance, Vancouver, Edmonton and Winnipeg. Sometimes the examiners are provincial surveyors, and the remuneration given for work of that kind varies in the different provinces. The present legislation which we are asked to amend sets the same figure for every examiner, regardless of the province in which he lives or of the amount of payment provided by that province for men doing a task of that nature. This, together with the nature of the work that is being carried on under the terms of the present legislation, which describes the work as attendance at a meeting, is, I assume, the reason why the Auditor General's office suggested that a change in the legislation should be made. The changes as expressed in this Bill 254 are specified in two sections. If the first section is approved, the new section 7 of the act will read as follows:

7. Every member or temporary member of the board and the secretary of the board, whether or not he is employed or paid in any other capacity in the public service of Canada, may, in respect of the performance of his duties and functions under this act, be paid

(a) remuneration at an annual rate to be fixed by the Treasury Board on the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission; and

(b) his actual living and travelling expenses incurred while away from his normal place of residence.

That would make the payment in line with ordinary remuneration and would dispose of any question as to whether or not the carrying out of the act is in order.

If the second section of the bill is approved, the new section 9 of the act will read as follows:

9. Every special examiner, other than a member of the board, may be paid for each day on which he presides at an examination such fee as may be fixed by the Treasury Board and his actual living and travelling expenses incurred while away from his normal place of residence.

That means that the amounts to be paid will be set by the Treasury Board. So far as the secretary and members of the board are concerned, the Treasury Board will get the advice of the Civil Service Commission before it makes a decision as to the amount that should be paid. I understand that during the last few years the amount paid to each member of the board for work of this kind has averaged about $750 per year.

Honourable senators, that is the general nature of the bill with which we are dealing. The proposed amendment simply provides that the terms of the bill be put into a better form than it is at present, so that there will be no doubt as to the proper procedure in making payments for the carrying out of this work.

I shall be glad to answer any questions which may be asked, if I happen to know the answers.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I wish to ask a question. Am I right in saying that a deputy minister may be a member of this board?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: All members of the boad are dominion Government officials, as is the secretary.

Hon. Mr. Reid: When they serve on the board apart from their normal duties, will they be paid?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: They are paid now. The amendment provides for a different form of payment. At present, payment is at the rate of so many dollars for a meeting, but under the terms of the bill the remuneration will be set by the Treasury Board. The examination work cannot be done by these officials while they are carrying out their ordinary civil service duties. If they were expected to carry out the task of preparation and conduct of examinations while carrying out their civil service duties, their work for the civil service would not be properly done on all days; there is no question of that. So the work is done over and above that performed by these members in their ordinary duties.

Hon. Mr. Reid: But does the Civil Service Commission recommend the payment to the Treasury Board?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Under the proposed new legislation, yes, and the Treasury Board will set the amount.

Hon. Mr. Reid: That is why I am suspicious about it.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: When the Auditor General's Department asks for a change of this kind there cannot be any fear of excessive amounts of money being expended.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is there an association of Canadian land surveyors, just as there are associations of surveyors in the provinces?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: The different types of surveyors all come under the general title of Dominion Land Surveyors. There are three grades of examination, the first being for those not articled to a surveyor, the second for those who are articled, and the third for those who wish to obtain the certificate of topographical surveyor. The third examination is very difficult, and only a few succeed in passing. All members of the board must have the certificate of topographical surveyor.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That does not exactly answer my question. I asked if there is an association of surveyors of this type. I know there are associations in the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Each province has its own association.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Each province has its own association of Canadian land surveyors?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why do they not carry out the examinations and bear the cost?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: I thought I explained that. The examinations of which I am speaking must be held by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. That rule does not apply to general examinations in the provinces, but it does apply to examinations in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, and in other places where there are great national resources. At times examinations might be held for, say, the Indian Affairs Branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration or some other special branch of the dominion Government, rather than a provincial Government, and in order to save expense the board employs qualified examiners—they must be Dominion Land Surveyors —to carry out the work. However, the board has encountered difficulties, because in some provinces the provincially arranged payment is larger than in some other provinces, but the present dominion Statute has a set rate of $25 for everyone. Sending examiners from Ottawa to distant points with all the additional cost of travelling is expensive, and that is why the board, wherever possible, secures provincial surveyors to do the work. But naturally these surveyors want to be paid the rate they could get from their own Government.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Do these men who become Canadian land surveyors work for others besides the department?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: They can become Dominion Land Surveyors, and it is as surveyors that they are working for the department, without question.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Then why should they not run their own affairs? Why should the dominion Government do it?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: The only work that any land surveyors are asked to do under this act is for the federal Government—not for anyone else or any other government—and they are employed to do the work by the federal Government through this board of Dominion Land Surveyors, which employs them and pays them. The payment is set out in the present act, and I have already read the section which is to be repealed. It is obvious that if a job is to be done in Edmonton, for example, and an Alberta land surveyor is called, his travelling expenses would be much less than if a surveyor were sent from Ottawa to Edmonton to do the work. It is difficult at times to secure qualified provincial land surveyors because they can get higher rates of pay for work in a province than the amount allowed by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys under this act.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I am still not clear on this subject. If these men are employed by the federal Government, and the examinations are for the purpose of qualifying them for federal employment—

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Not necessarily so.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: If that is not necessarily the case, then they are in the position of any other land surveyors. The surveyors in the provinces run their own affairs, set their own examinations and pay their own costs. If these candidates you speak of are to work for only the dominion Government, and the examinations are to qualify them for work for which they will be paid out of the federal Treasury, I should think the examinations should be held under the supervision of the Civil Service Commission.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: This proposed amendment would permit the examination work to be paid for by the Treasury Board. I probably did not explain clearly to my honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity that the only work done under this act is federal work; but at times the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys employs, or tries to employ, surveyors outside the department. Some provincial surveyors receive higher pay for doing that kind of wok for their provincial government and therefore they will not work for the federal authorities. Under those circumstances, when there is an examination at a distant point it is necessary to send someone and bear the extra expense. I repeat, the entire work is done under the federal Government.

I understand that these examinations have been carried out in this manner since 1871, when the act was first passed, and that hundreds of examinations have been held in that time.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I have listened to the discussion on this bill, and I say, without any disrespect, that I am a bit confused. Did I understand the honourable senator who explained the bill to say that the civil servants concerned are fully employed by the dominion Government, that in addition to their regular civil service pay they receive extra pay for doing extra work, and that this arrangement has the approval of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: That arrangement has been carried out for years.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I was not here when the arrangement started, so I was not concerned with it at that time. But do I present the problem correctly: three civil servants, fully employed by the Government, are paid regular salaries for doing their work, and in addition they are paid for doing additional work? Is that right?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: My honourable friend asked two questions, one directly and one by implication.

Hon. Mr. Croll: No.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: If I may, I shall attempt to answer both of them. The answer to the direct question is that these persons are doing work now for which they are paid under the provisions of the existing act. Under this amendment that work would be done in the same way, but payment for it would be made by the Treasury Board.

The implied question asked by my friend was whether the work for which they are paid under this act is their regular work. The answer to that is no, because the conducting of examinations is not their regular work. The chairman of the examination board is the Surveyor General of Canada and with him are the Dominion Geodesist and his assistant. The regular work of these men is not conducting examinations, but, rather, survey work under the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. It is a question whether the proposed amendment would make any substantial difference in the amount now paid for examination work, which averages about $750 per year.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I do not quarrel with the amount of the payment; they should receive whatever they are entitled to. My quarrel is with the method of payment, and on that point I am not quite clear about the facts. Did I understand the honourable gentleman to say that they are paid for the regular job they do, and paid in addition for some similar sort of work done at unspecified hours?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: They are paid extra, but not necessarily for a similar kind of work.

Hon. Mr. Croll: For work having to do with examinations?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Surveying is not necessarily the conducting of examinations to qualify surveyors.

Hon. Mr. Croll: When do these people set the examinations? Do they do that work outside their ordinary working hours?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: That is the only time in which they can do it.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Then what they are being paid extra for is homework.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: They are now being paid for homework.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I suggest this bill be referred to a committee.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, I have only a brief comment to make on this bill. As my colleague explained, it is a very simple piece of legislation. All it does is provide a different method of remuneration for those who do certain work. However, I am not at all sure about the wisdom of the proposed change. The act at present specifically defines the remuneration that shall be paid for these particular services which are rendered by members of the board. There is no objection on that point. After all, they are setting examination papers for candidates, and they have to see that the examinations are properly conducted. But by this amendment we propose to remove provision for the remuneration from the statute and say that hereafter the amount will be fixed by the Treasury Board.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With the approval of the Civil Service Commission.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Yes, probably the Treasury Board would rely on the Civil Service Commission.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It surely will.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I can assure the honourable leader that I have had some experience in that field, and that is why I raise a question as to whether or not this is a desirable procedure. I quite agree that the remuneration fixed by statute is at present inadequate. It might need to be doubled or even tripled, but why not continue to have it provided for in the statute rather than leave it to the discretion of the Treasury Board?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: May I ask one question of my friend?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: If it were to be done that way, how would my friend settle on a definition of the term "meeting"? I would point out that at the present time these men are paid so many dollars per meeting, but that only a small percentage of the work is done at meetings. Most of it is done by the individuals who prepare papers and, after the examinations, grade the candidates. In the circumstances my friend suggests, "meeting" would not mean anything. I assume it is because of that awkward situation that the Auditor General has suggested the legislation should be changed.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I do not know the answer to that. It is not really a very important question, and I doubt that it is worth all the discussion we have had on it.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: No, it is not.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: For my part, I would rather see the remuneration fixed at a daily rate, as has been done through the years, and not left to the discretion of either the Treasury Board or the Civil Service Commission. However, in my judgment it is not a very important matter.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I think it is very important. The amount involved is of no consequence, but the procedure raises the principle of whether a civil servant should get two salaries. If it is agreeable with this house that that should be so, it is all right with me, but I suggest that these civil servants be paid for the work they do during evenings, afternoons and off-days in one salary. To pay them more than one salary is wrong in principle. That is the only objection I have.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Well, honourable senators, it has been going on in that way, I take it, since 1871.

During past sessions we have amended certain legislation in order to bring departmental procedure into line with what the Auditor General thought was proper—some post office regulations, for instance, were changed in this way. The bill before us has a similar purpose. As the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) remarked, the amount involved is very small, so I would suggest that the best thing to do is to pass the bill and get it out of the way, and then if any senator wishes to change the whole underlying principle let him bring in at another session a private bill in accord with his views. I think that would be a much better way.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It is a much better way of not getting anything done. It is difficult for a senator to bring in a private bill dealing with money matters. If the present practice is wrong, and if, as the honourable gentleman from Cariboo (Hon. Mr. Turgeon) says, it has been carried on since 1871, I say that 1956 is as good a time as any to bring it to an end. I think the amount involved is of no consequence from a monetary point of view, but the principle is a very serious one and if not corrected this practice will go on and on.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I agree with the view expressed by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll). I do not like any legislative provision whereby a civil servant is to receive two salaries. In my opinion that is not a right principle at all. The three officials mentioned by the sponsor of the bill are already being paid salaries to do a certain job, and by this proposal we say to them, "We will pay you additional remuneration for your services as examiners". I would like to point out how the legal profession handles a similar problem, and I think the same method is followed by the medical profession. In the province of Manitoba certain lawyers volunteer to conduct the examinations set by the Law Society, and in payment for this service the society votes them an honorarium. Of course, there is this difference: the Law Society examiners are not civil servants in receipt of a salary for doing certain work.

I admit that there has been a tremendous demand for surveyors during the past five years. That is true in the city of Winnipeg, and I believe it applies to every city in Canada. A real estate operator who buys a tract of farm land for subdivision purposes may have to wait as long as two or three months to get a land surveyor to do the necessary work. When a qualified surveyor is asked to survey dominion-owned land he generally says he cannot do the work because he is employed full time on other jobs.

I agree with the idea expressed by the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). Why do the dominion land surveyors not have their own organization to do the examining and charge the students a fee for taking the examination? The money which the Law Society receives from examination fees paid by students is used to pay the men who act as examiners. That is how the matter should be handled here. We should not permit federal civil servants to act as examiners; the profession itself should supply them. I also agree with the honourable member from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) that it is difficult for a senator to bring in a money bill.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Honourable senators, I do not suggest the bringing in of a money bill, in the ordinary sense, but rather a bill whose purpose will be the saving of money, and the best place to do it is here.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I would like to have this bill referred to committee, where we could ask the land surveyors why they do not have their own organization to do this work.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why cannot the provincial land surveyors do it?

Hon. Mr. Haig: There is a reason why they cannot. I know a little about that from my own experience. In Manitoba all surveyors are provincial land surveyors originally. In addition a number of them take special examinations which entitle them to be known as Dominion Land Surveyors, and their firms are then known as Dominion and Provincial land surveyors. Generally one member of the firm is a Dominion Land Surveyor and the other members of the firm are Provincial Land Surveyors.

I would say that the honourable member from Toronto-Trinity is right, that Dominion Land Surveyors in such cities as Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal, Calgary, Edmonton and Regina should form a local organization of their own and carry on this work in the same manner as is done by every provincial Law Society or College of Medicine. They have two good examples to follow there. The students themselves should have to pay examination fees, and the money could be used by the association to pay an honorarium to the members composing the board of examiners. I think that would be a far better system than the one followed under this act. What we in effect are saying to our civil servants in this case is that they are not getting paid enough now and we are going to pay them a little more for doing this extra work.

Hon. Mr. Golding: What is wrong with that?

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I do not wish to delay the debate, but may I say that, generally speaking, I agree with those who have expressed the opinion that a civil servant should not be paid two salaries. I think we all agree that that is not desirable. However, occasions may arise when it is necessary to give a civil servant extra pay for extra work he is doing, and this is such an occasion.

Now, honourable senators, this board of examiners is necessary. True, it does not do a great deal of work, but what it does is very important. The Government, of course, could set up a board composed of experts in this field, and they would have to be paid very high salaries.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Lawyers have adopted a different system. They have established their own standards and set up provincial law societies. There is no Dominion Law Society.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, but if there were a Dominion Law Society, a board of examiners would have to be set up, and I think that lawyers who sat on it would demand fairly generous remuneration.

Hon. Mr. Bradette: They certainly would.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: And they would be entitled to it, because their work would be very important. This act, as the honourable senator from Cariboo has so well explained, makes it possible to have examinations conducted without employing additional specialists and paying them very large salaries.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I have been looking up the act which this bill is to amend, and I think that the answer to the question which some honourable senators have raised namely, why should not this work be done by provincial surveyors, is clearly to be found in the act itself. The act deals with surveys of dominion public lands under the control of the Surveyor General of Canada; and under these circumstances it is obvious that he must have control of the people who survey the public lands, particularly those in the Yukon, the Northwest Territories and the national parks. No local association of provincial land surveyors could be controlled by the minister in charge of this act. That, I repeat, is the reason why dominion land surveyors are engaged for the special and particular purpose of surveying dominion lands.

The other question on which there has been a good deal of discussion relates to whether civil servants should draw two salaries. As was pointed out by the honourable senator who explained the bill, the members of the board are civil servants, and I suppose that the board will continue to be composed of civil servants. Let me point out the effect of this amendment. Under the act as it stands, the members of the board —who are civil servants—are entitled to extra pay of $15 per day plus expenses for any time they devote to this particular work. The amendment merely provides that they may be paid such remuneration as the Treasury Board shall fix. It is quite conceivable that the Treasury Board would say to the civil servants who are members of this board, "You are already compensated in your present positions; we will not authorize any further payment." So from the point of view of economy the position may be improved.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Why have not those who are responsible for this bill made a straightforward proposal to increase the remuneration? At present there is provision for $15 per day and all expenses. If it is now intended to change the remuneration to a rate to be fixed by the Treasury Board, it must be with the intention not of reducing the allowance but of increasing it, and the fact should be frankly admitted.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: There is not a word in the bill to support that view.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I know, but it is evident.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: As I have said, the result may be quite the contrary; for the Treasury Board may hold that as these officials are receiving a salary they should not get any more.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I am ready to make a bet that the Treasury Board will not do that.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. My personal opinion is that it could be disposed of at once, but some honourable senators, including the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), wish to have it considered in committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS FINANCING AND GUARANTEE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. T. A. Crerar moved the second reading of Bill 415, an Act to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways System during the calendar year 1956, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

He said: Honourable Senators, for a number of years now we have had bills in similiar form. Without going back over the history of the Canadian National Railways, it might be worth while to mention that in 1952 Parliament passed an act known as the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act. Under that legislation the whole capital structure was reorganized. As a result the Government, who are really the shareholders of the railway on behalf of the people of Canada, took over certain securities, namely, $800 million of preferred stock, carrying a 4 per cent interest rate, and six million shares of common stock of no par value: they also threw into the Canadian National system the investments which the Canadian people had in two Canadian Government railways—the old Intercolonial, and the Transcontinental, between Moncton and Winnipeg. The act contained a provision that, after operating expenses were paid and depreciation charges met, the first charge on profits, if any, would be payment of 4 per cent on the preferred stock held by the Government. All profits remaining were payable annually to the Receiver General of Canada. The principle underlying this arrangement was that Parliament should always have control over what the Canadian National Railways management was doing. As I recall, when the charges I have referred to were met there was no profit to turn over to the Receiver General.

The capital set-up of the Canadian National Railways, which I have briefly outlined, makes it necessary for the management to come to Parliament each year for approval of all capital expenditures—approval of not only the purposes for which the money required can be spent, but of the manner in which the money shall be provided. It is with these objects that the bill has to do.

Section 3 of the bill, which is the first one that needs to be mentioned, authorizes the capital expenditures set out in the explanatory notes.

Section 4 provides that securities may be issued by the railway with the approval of the Governor in Council. For instance, a common method of financing the purchase of locomotives, freight and passenger cars, and so on, that a railway requires, is by the issuance of what are called equipment trust certificates. Section 4 provides that none of these can be issued without the approval of the Governor in Council. In other words, the method by which expenditures are paid has to be approved by the Governor in Council.

Section 5 provides that guarantees of securities may be given by the Governor in Council, or, alternatively, the money might be advanced directly by the Department of Finance. In all cases, I believe, the securities are issued under the guarantee of the Governor in Council.

Section 6 provides that the Governor in Council may make loans of a temporary character to the railway. The financial year of the railway ends on December 31. Orders for the purchase of such equipment as diesel locomotives or freight and passenger cars may be placed for delivery at a later date, and when that time comes the railway must be in a position to make payment for the equipment. Provision is made whereby the Government may advance against earnings over, say, the next six months the moneys to pay for the equipment when it is delivered.

Section 7 empowers the Canadian National Railway Company to aid other companies and railways comprised in its national system. That is to say, the Canadian National Railway Company may spend money on lines that it operates in the United States, or on any line like the Northern Alberta Railways, which is jointly operated under lease by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railway Company. As honourable senators know, the Canadian National has a line operating from Montreal through Toronto to Chicago, and it also operates a few other small branch lines in the Chicago area. The company also operates a line from Montreal through American territory to Portland, Maine. Such equipment as bridges and railway ties may have to be replaced on these lines, and section 7 of the bill empowers the management of the Canadian National Railway Company to provide moneys for this purpose.

Section 8 is the usual type of section found in these bills. If money is raised by guarantee of securities, the money has to be paid under the direction of the Minister of Finance, either into chartered banks or the Bank of Canada. This money can be drawn out only for the purpose of the expenditures I have outlined, and only with the authority of the Minister of Finance.

Section 9 simply authorizes the Minister of Finance to place certain sums at the disposal of the company following the end of the calendar year and before July 1, 1957.

Section 10 authorizes the Canadian National Railway Company to give assistance to Trans-Canada Air Lines, which is constantly expanding and requiring new equipment. The section provides the necessary machinery for making expenditures of a capital nature in this respect.

Section 11 provides for the appointment of George A. Touche and Company, of the cities of Toronto and Montreal, as auditors of the Canadian National Railway Company for the ensuing year. This is a well-known firm of chartered accountants. Prior to last year, I believe, the appointment of the auditors of the Canadian National Railway Company was provided for in a separate bill. Inclusion of provision for the appointment of the auditors in the bill before us is, I think, a desirable departure.

The explanatory notes disclose that the total spending budget for the company is $313,564,000, less depreciation accruals, et cetera, available in relation to the 1956 calendar year, $74,570,000, and depreciation accruals available in relation to the period January 1 to June 30, 1957, $35 million, making a total depreciation of $109,570,000. Therefore the net amount being asked for is $203,994,000. In the matter of rolling stock, whether it is locomotives or freight cars, a certain amount of depreciation is set aside yearly for renewal purposes. That fund is then available when new equipment is needed or existing equipment is worn out.

With respect to gross capital expenditures, a word or two may be said about such items as road property. An amount of $84,077,000 is set aside for such items as replacement of railway ties and rails, construction of new bridges or repair of old ones, and so forth. It also covers the needs of the Alberta Northern Railways, and the American lines of the Canadian National Railways System.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Does it include railway stations?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I am not quite sure, but I should think railway stations would be included under this item, for they do not come appropriately under any of the other headings.

The next item under gross capital expenditures is that of branch line construction, for which $9,875,000 is set aside. The company has almost completed a branch line in British Columbia from its main line to Kitimat to service the plant of the Aluminum Company of Canada at that point. I think a few hundred thousand dollars are required for that purpose. Then there is a new branch line from Hillsport, in northern Ontario, to Manitouwadge, which is some distance east of Port Arthur, Ontario. In the Manitouwadge area very important base metals have been found, and it is the general expectation that there will be substantial development there. The Canadian National line runs north of it and comes in from Hilisport. As a matter of fact, the Canadian Pacific Railway has also built a line, or are constructing one at present, from its main line into the area. It is clear that both railways see immense possibilities in those properties. From all the reports I have received, I believe that to be the case.

The next item, equipment, $116,147,000, includes diesel locomotives and passenger cars, but the largest expenditure is for more than 10,000 freight cars. Work equipment units are also included. If, for instance, a derailment takes place and a track is torn up, the work equipment units do the repair work. I believe those units also lay track on new branch lines.

The next item is hotels, $9,035,000. The greater part of that amount is for the Queen Elizabeth hotel in Montreal. Honourable senators will be interested to note that the total amount spent on that hotel to December 31, 1955, was roughly $4,380,000. It is estimated that in 1956 the expenditure will be $8,200,000 odd, and that in future years it will require to be approximately $7,350,000.

It is expected that the total cost of this hotel when completed, without furnishings of any kind, will be $20 million; and the estimated cost of furnishings is in the neighbourhood of $4,300,000. The hotel will have 1,216 rooms, and will probably be the finest in Canada.

Honourable senators, I feel bound to say that I think these costs are somewhat staggering. It looks to be a matter for criticism to spend $20 million on a hotel. However, I read an item in a newspaper the other day which stated that the Royal York hotel, Toronto, will shortly have an addition of about 450 rooms, and that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which owns the hotel, estimates the cost of the addition at $10 million. All this simply means that costs have advanced enormously since pre-war years and even since the war. There may be some question as to whether the C.N.R. should have a hotel in Montreal. I do not intend to discuss that. As a matter of fact, I do not think it is a part of this proposal, because Parliament has already approved the budget of the Canadian National Railways in which this hotel was included.

Another point of interest is that last year, according to the annual report of the Canadian National Railways, the total profit of all the hotels operated by the railway system, after depreciation, was approximately $1,700,000. Of course, times have been very good for some time; to use a phrase of the economists, "Our economy has been booming", and when our economy is booming the railway hotels, whether C.P.R. or C.N.R. participate in the benefits.

The Canadian National Railway Company's financial year ends on December 31, but it has certain commitments to meet between January 1 and the end of July. I expect those who prepared these estimates assumed that would be a safe margin of time in which to get the Financing and Guarantee Bill for next year through Parliament.

Honourable senators, perhaps that explains, though inadequately, the purposes of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Very fully.

Hon. John T. Haig: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question? I think Parliament put through legislation writing off $1 billion for the year 1952, although I am not sure of the year. At that time the President of the Canadian National Railway Company, who still holds that office told me that would be sufficient to take care of the railroad. I would like to know what the valuation of the road was at that time and what it is today. I would also like to know what the company's debt was after the $1 billion was written off and what the debt is today. I also want to know the operation costs for the year 1955 of the National Transcontinental from Moncton to Winnipeg, and what the operation costs of that line were for the five previous years. I also wish to inquire if the profit of $1,700,000 on hotels takes into account interest, taxation, repairs and depreciation. I also wish to ask if there were any taxes paid on the property during that period. I do not know if that information is available here, but I think the bill should go to committee so that those matters may be inquired into. I doubt if many people in Canada have any idea of how much money is spent per year on the C.N.R. railroad, and I think the public is entitled to know the state of the company's finances and have them presented in a way that can be understood. When an application comes before the Board of Transport Commissioners, the board never takes the C.N.R. as the test of what a well-operated railroad ought to show, but always uses the C.P.R. as the test. The farmers of western Canada, and probably the farmers of eastern Canada as well, insist that the C.P.R. should be used as the yardstick.

I am very disturbed about the fact that four C.N.R. hotels have been sold since 1952, and that the price received was just a little over the depreciated value. In spite of that, the company is adding another hotel to its chain. There are some questions I would like to ask as to the terms of the lease of the Montreal hotel, and so on. Parliament should have that information, and there is no other way of getting it except by inquiry.

I have great confidence in the ability of the President of the Canadian National Railways, and also the new executive assistant, who is one of the outstanding railway men of Canada and will make a strong effort to have the road operated successfully.

I should like to ask some questions about the operation of the road from Winnipeg to Vancouver, formerly known as the Grand Trunk Pacific, and also about the National Transcontinental line from Moncton to Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I did not catch what information my honourable friend wanted in that respect.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I should like to know the operating costs of the Canadian National Railways on the National Transcontinental line from Moncton to Winnipeg over the past ten years, and whether there was a profit or a loss last year; also, whether the figures given include taxes, depreciation and charges of that nature. I particularly want to know if the C.N.R. pays one dollar of tax to the federal, provincial or municipal authorities; also, the amount of the loans the railway has received and what has been paid back, and how much is its present liability to the federal Government.

I do not go back beyond 1952, except with respect to the operations of the Transcontinental line, for the reason that I have already received a specific answer from Mr. Gordon, the president of the system. When he was before our committee in 1952 I put this question to him: "With this write-off of a billion dollars, what about the future operations of the road?" He replied, "If we have normal times we should never have to come back to Parliament for any more write-offs or money to cover depreciation or losses." Now I would like to know what has happened over the past five years, when times have been normal or better.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Honourable senators, I think we had a clear explanation of the purposes of the bill from the sponsor. It is one of those perennial measures that come to us year after year, and I take it there is nothing special in this one.

As I understand it, the railway is asking for $203 million of new money. Following upon what the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) has said, I was wondering if the senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) has the operating figures for the preceding year. If so, can he tell us how much money the railway made or lost last year?

Hon. Mr. Haig: The answers to my questions will bring out that information.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Before the honourable senator from Churchill closes the debate, may I be allowed to make a few observations? He has said that the Queen Elizabeth Hotel without furnishings is to cost $20 million. In the first place, I am opposed to the Government getting into the hotel business. But let me ask how many cocktail lounges are proposed for this new hotel. I imagine that, whatever the number is, they will be elaborately furnished to meet the tastes of the travelling public and glorify the city of Montreal. I note that the railway has recently been granted a temporary increase of 7 per cent in freight rates. It looks as if some of that income will have to go to meet the tremendous expenditure for the construction of this new hotel. First we were told it would cost $20 million, but it would seem to me that the furnishings might well add another $10 million to that amount.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators, may I reply first to the question raised by the senator from Blaine Lake? I gave the estimated cost for furnishings of all kinds as being roughly $4,300,000. Whether the Canadian National Railways should have built this hotel in Montreal is not of concern in the consideration of this bill. That project was before Parliament at an earlier date, and it was discussed in this house, and approved.

Hon. Mr. Horner: We then thought we might be in a position to run it ourselves without going outside.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: My honourable friend from Blaine Lake might be able to run the hotel satisfactorily, but I must say that I could not do so. After all, that is a matter that must be left to the judgment of the people who have the responsibility for management of the hotel. As to the furnishings, I have no reason to think that there will be any wild orgy of extravagance in that respect. But certainly the hotel will need something better than grass mats in its corridors and more than bunks for beds. I am confident the management will handle this matter with discretion. I never expect to be able to stay in the hotel, but perhaps my friend from Blaine Lake will.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Now, now.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: May I ask the honourable senator from Northumberland-Miramichi (Hon. Mr. Burchill) to restate the question he asked earlier?

Hon. Mr. Burchill: With respect to the $203 million of new money, I merely asked if you had any figure as to the results of last year's operations.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I do not have those figures, but my honourable friend will find them in the report of the Canadian National Railways. I may say there was no net profit after payment of operating expenses, depreciation and taxes. Any surplus after these charges was applied to the 4 per cent stock which the Government owns. It should be said that taxes are not included in the proposal in this bill; it is to cover only capital expenditures. After operating expenses, depreciation and taxes are paid, there is a fixed charge of 4 per cent on $800 million worth of preferred stock which the Government owns. The railway sometimes runs out of money before it meets that charge. In the event that in any one year there is an operating deficit after the payment of depreciation, taxes and other charges, the deficit has to be made good by a vote by Parliament. This has happened frequently in the past.

This bill should be considered in committee, where I am sure the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) will be able to get the information he requires. It is a proper subject for inquiry. I repeat, all this bill does is to provide for the capital needs of the Canadian National Railway System for the ensuing year. After all, the system is owned by the people of Canada, whether we like it or not.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Crerar, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

APPENDIX "A"

REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

(Presented by Hon. Mr. Hawkins. See p. 741)

Wednesday, June 20, 1956

The Standing Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957, report as follows:

On February 15, 1956, the following order of reference was adopted by the Senate:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be authorized to examine the expenditures proposed by the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957, in advance of the bills based on the said estimates reaching the Senate; that the said committee be empowered to send for records of revenues from taxation collected by the federal, provincial and municipal Governments in Canada and the incidence of this taxation in its effect upon different income groups, and records of expenditures by such governments, showing sources of income and expenditures of same under appropriate headings, together with estimates of gross national production, net national income and movement of the cost-of-living index, and their relation to such total expenditures, for the year 1939 and for the latest year for which the information is available and such other matters as may be pertinent to the examination of the estimates, and to report upon the same.

That the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records.

In obedience to the foregoing, the committee held a meeting for organization on February 23, 1956, at which the Honourable Senator Turgeon was elected Vice-Chairman, and a steering committee appointed. The steering committee was comprised of the Chairman and the Honourable Senators Beaubien, Burchill, Crerar, Haig and Turgeon.

Subsequently the committee held nine meetings and heard evidence from a compresensive group engaged in the public service. The evidence adduced was sufficient, in the opinion of your committee, to justify the early adoption of the recommendations set forth herein.

1. Gross National Product and Expenditure

Frequently heard in the evidence were such terms as national income, gross national product and gross national expenditure, as set out in Exhibits 1, 2 and 3. Further, evidence was adduced on government expenditures at municipal, provincial and federal levels, expressed in percentage of national income in Exhibits 4 and 5. Your committee feel that a definition of these terms and the relationship they bear to the national economy would be timely.

National income is the total of the annual earnings of Canadian residents from the production of goods and services. As such, it includes salaries, wages and other forms of employee earnings, in cash or in kind, as well as military pay and allowances. It includes also corporation profits, interest, net rent, and the net income of farmers and others who are in business on their own account. If we add to national income the total of indirect taxes less subsidies and the total of depreciation allowances and similar business costs, we arrive at gross national product or the total value at market prices of the goods and services produced in a year. The difference between the two aggregates, national income and gross national product, can be readily seen by examining the costs which go to make up the market price of a particular good which sells for a price of $1.00. Let us say that wage and salary costs throughout the many stages of production and distribution of this article amount to 50 cents. In addition, let us suppose that a further 25 cents goes for interest on investment, rent and profit, and here again these are the earnings associated with all the stages of manufacture, transportation and selling through which the article passes. The earnings on the production of this article total 75 cents and this appears as national income. The price which the consumer pays, however, includes other charges which are not earnings of Canadians: 13 cents for sales, excise, real property and other taxes apart from taxes on net income and 12 cents for depreciation and obsolescence on the plant used to produce the article. These further costs bring the total to $1.00, the market price which the consumer pays, and this new and larger total appears as the gross national product.

The nation, like the individual, has both an income and an expenditure account and these must balance if allowance is made for saving and investment. Thus, gross national expenditure measures the same aggregate as gross national product but in a different way. As indicated above, the gross national product is estimated by adding up all the costs of production to obtain the total value at market prices of the goods and services produced by Canadians in a year. These goods and services must, of course, either be sold at home or abroad or added to inventories. Hence, we can obtain the same total as gross national product by adding together all final sales and adjusting them for imports and for changes in inventories, and this aggregate is referred to as gross national expenditure. In our example above the article which appeared as $1.00 in gross national product because that was the total of its costs of production will also appear as $1.00 in gross national expenditure because that is what the final consumer pays for it. On the one hand, we have the earnings and costs to which Canadian production gives rise or the gross national product and, on the other hand, the disposition that is made of the total Canadian product or the gross national expenditure. Both are useful in a study of the Canadian economy and changes in the totals and in the relationships of their components are worthy of attention.

Exhibit 1 shows national income, gross national product and gross national expenditure for the years 1929, 1939 and 1947-55. The growth in the gross national product was particularly large in 1955 and amounted to 10 per cent over the somewhat reduced output of 1954. This evidence of sharp economic recovery from the hesitation of 1954 is particularly encouraging but we offer only this brief comment on it and turn to the relationship of government taxation and expenditure to the total earnings of Canadians. Exhibit 2 shows the total taxation of all three levels of government in Canada, federal, provincial and municipal, as a percentage of national income for the years 1929, 1939 and 1947 to 1955 with comparable figures for the United Kingdom and the United States. Exhibit 3 shows government defence expenditure, non-defence expenditure on goods and services, and transfer payments and subsidies as percentages of national income for the years 1929, 1939 and 1947 to 1955.

It is perhaps necessary to explain why taxes have been expressed as a percentage of national income rather than as a percentage of gross national product. The reason is simple. Since taxes must be paid out of earnings they should be related to earnings and, as shown above, national income is the total of all the earnings of Canadian residents. The percentage of taxes to national income represents in effect the proportion of their earnings which Canadians choose through their governments to spend collectively for certain agreed ends.

In 1955 Canadians paid to their federal, provincial and municipal governments 31·2 cents out of every $1 earned compared with 22·4 cents in 1939 and 17·3 cents in 1929.* Why has the relative importance of government spending and taxation risen in this fashion?

In 1929, out of every dollar of national income about ·5 cent was spent for defence and in 1939 about 1·6 cents. Today 8·4 cents out of every dollar of national income goes for defence. In 1929, out of every dollar of national income 5 cents went for transfer payments such as old age pensions, veterans' benefits, interest on the unproductive debt which had arisen during periods of deficit financing and for subsidies, but by 1939 this had risen to 8·8 cents. Today about 11·1 cents out of every dollar earned by Canadians goes for these same purposes. For all the other broad purposes of government: law and order, education, health and sanitation, roads, fire protection, etc., 13·8 cents were spent out of every dollar of national income in 1929 compared with 15·2 cents in 1939 and 13·7 cents today. This latter is the only category which has remained relatively stable in relation to national income over the past quarter of a century. Since the pre-war year 1939 almost the whole increase has been in defence expenditure. There has been a moderate increase in the relative importance of transfer payments but this is almost offset by the slight decline in the relative importance of other government expenditure on goods and services.

The second question which naturally arises is the extent of burden represented by government taxation of a little more than 31 cents out of every dollar of national income. This percentage cannot of course be taken by itself as a complete indication of burden. In the first place, the burdensomeness of taxation depends to some extent upon what the taxpayer is left with after paying his taxes. A rich nation like a rich man can pay a higher proportion of income and still retain a much higher absolute amount for private expenditure. That mythical figure, the average Canadian, (man, woman and child) after paying 31 cents in taxes out of every dollar of income, has about $920 per annum left today compared with the $300 per annum left in 1939 after payment of smaller taxes. After making allowance for price increases, real income per capita after payment of all taxes has risen almost 50 per cent between 1939 and 1955.

In the second place it is necessary to examine the kind as well as the amount of government expenditure to get some idea of the degree of burden or of the degree of interference with private business. The percentage which taxation bears to national income is high in this country, as it is in the United States, but not quite so high as in the United Kingdom. The real problem here is how far the percentage of taxes to national income can rise before it interferes with the incentives to produce which are the mainsprings of economic activity and which underlie the growth of income from which taxes are paid. This is a very practical problem of the burden which higher taxation places on our taxing machinery and of the effects it may have, directly and indirectly, on production. But the burden on our tax-collecting machinery is a very different thing than the burden on the Canadian people since many services, such as education, if not performed by government, would have to be paid for directly by private expenditure.

* This is the total tax take for all levels of government in Canada. In addition, governments have available certain investment income such as profits from government corporations and interest on loans. Thus, quite apart from the effect of surpluses or deficits, the total of expenditures shown below will be somewhat different than the total tax take.

In considering the kind as well as the amount of government expenditure, the wider acceptance of the government's role in social welfare has led to a great increase in direct payments to individuals. These are the transfer payments referred to above, and the largest of them are, of course, the family allowances and old age pensions. While a little more than 11 cents out of every dollar of national income is in the first instance taken away from the Canadian people through taxation for these purposes, this same amount is returned as money payments and spent in accordance with individual preferences. When we say that a little over 31 cents out of every dollar of national income is taken in taxation we should remember, therefore, that about one-third of this amount, or a little more than 11 cents, is returned to the Canadian people in the form of money payments to be spent in accordance with individual preferences.

A further consideration with regard to the burden of taxation is that taxation may be more burdensome if it supports expenditure which however necessary does not contribute in a positive fashion to the standard of living of the average Canadian. In this respect there is a fundamental difference between taxation which is used to finance expenditure for education or welfare and expenditure for defence. On this score we would have to say that the burden of taxation has increased in the post-war period. Defence expenditures are today about 25 per cent of total government expenditure for all levels of government in Canada. They are necessary in that they constitute a sort of insurance premium but they involve a diversion of income to what the average Canadian would regard as unproductive use.

The lesson of the above figures is that without the growth in these defence expenditures in the post-war period we would have been able to carry on the broad purposes of government and even to expand, as we have done, our participation in the field of social welfare without materially affecting the relationship of taxes to national income. The fact that increased expenditures for defence and the greater expenditures for other purposes as well have not led to even higher percentages of taxation to national income is because of our great good fortune in the growth of the income of this country. While we all hope and expect that such growth will continue, it would be unwise to take it for granted or to use it as an excuse for extravagance in public spending or in public demands on government. This is particularly true in a period such as now when the resources of the economy are fully employed.

2. Preparation of Estimates

During the examination of the estimates your committee found that, owing to the system followed over the years whereby services supplied to the various departments by Public Works are not charged to the department concerned, the estimates of the various departments do not reflect the actual departmental costs.

The Post Office Department, for example, enjoys services and facilities valued at approximately thirteen million dollars annually, and no items indicating the cost of such service appear in the Post Office estimates.

Your committee therefore recommend that interdepartmental allocations be clearly set out in conjunction with the estimates of the receiving department, in order that the document may more truly reflect the department's operations.

As a corollary to this recommendation, it is urged that the Post Office Department charge all departments of government for the approximately five million dollars which the committee was informed it is obliged to spend annually in carrying the Government's mail.

3. Responsibility for Public Works.

In its 1952 report, your committee found that while the Public Works Department had the responsibility of providing and maintaining all public buildings and works, many departments of government were spending more for these purposes than the Department of Public Works and it was recommended at that time that the practice be halted.

Under the current order of reference your committee has endeavoured to ascertain the extent to which the 1952 recommendations had been implemented. Evidence submitted indicated that this practice is being abandoned and the responsibility being returned to its proper place under the Public Works Department. A number of departments have turned over their works staffs to Public Works and this desirable practice is, we were informed, being steadily extended.

While the committee is gratified by this improved practice and the progress made to date, it is obvious that much remains to be done in this regard. It is again stongly urged, therefore, that efforts be made to accelerate the process.

4. Government Annuities.

Your committee heard evidence with respect to the operation of government annuities, indicating that since its inception, the fund had been subsidized by the Government to the extent of thirty-one million dollars, not including administration costs of over eleven millions for the same period. The annual cost to the taxpayers for the current operation of this service was estimated at approximately one million dollars.

Further inquiries revealed that the estimated deficit ultimately to be faced on the old contracts, which were based on inadequate rates, is of the order of forty million dollars. To put the fund on a sound actuarial basis, provision should now be made for this known future liability instead of waiting year by year for the annual deficits to occur.

While the authors of the Government Annuities Act of 1908 were obviously concerned with the laudable aim of providing, for persons of modest means, a source of security not otherwise available at the time, few such persons now avail themselves of the facility. On the contrary, the service would appear now to be used largely by business organizations concerned with setting up pension funds for their employees.

The advent of old age pensions and the entry by most insurance companies into the annuity field have served to remove the basis on which the Act was established, and your committee is concerned with the justification of continuing, in deficit, a fund which no longer serves its original purpose.

In the light of these considerations, if Parliament is still desirous of continuing the sale of annuities, your committee recommend that the tables of rates for future annuities be revised to provide a revenue sufficient to maintain the fund on a self-supporting basis, including the cost of administration.

5. Land Procurement.

From the evidence obtained on this subject it appears that the responsibility for purchasing land and buildings for government use is spread over many individuals and departments. It is the view of your committee that such diversification tends to defeat the application of an overall policy so necessary in a field where large government spending is indicated.

Your committee therefore recommend the establishment of a Real Estate Procurement Branch, within the Department of Public Works, to be staffed by persons highly qualified in all phases of real estate. This branch would have the responsibility of appraising and purchasing real estate for all departments of government, with the exception of the departments of Transport and National Defence, which at present have statutory authority in this matter, and would ensure the application of a common policy to all such transactions.

6. Rented Accommodation.

Your committee view with concern the extent to which government departments are housed in rented accommodation. It is possible that in long-term lease contracts, or renewable short-term contracts, the amount paid in rent could exceed the original cost or value of the accommodation.

This practice, in your committee's opinion, is uneconomic and should be discouraged.

Where long-term tenancy is indicated, and with regard to the prevailing economic trends in the locality, renting should only be considered when all possibilities of outright purchase or construction have been exhausted.

7. Financial Accounting.

Your committee noted that the cost of capital works such as the construction of new buildings are charged in full to the year in which they are incurred. It is the feeling of some members of your committee that in such cases a capital asset should be set up and subsequently depreciated as would be the case in commercial or business practice.

The present system, established in 1920, is based on the premise that the assets and liabilities of Canada should be set out so as to disclose the amount of the net debt. Therefore assets which are not readily convertible or interest-producing are not considered as a proper offset to the gross liabilities in determining the net debt.

Your committee regrets that time does not permit a comprehensive study of this question and suggests that the Standing Committee on Finance, at the next session of Parliament, consider the matter at length, with a view to possible changes in line with modern accounting methods.

8. Inflation and Export Markets.

Your committee gave some consideration to the danger to Canadian export markets inherent in the inflationary trend, with its higher costs of production.

The danger inherent in this trend is immediately obvious. The ability to compete successfully in foreign markets is based, to a large extent, on the domestic cost of production, and increases in the latter cannot help but have damaging effects on the former.

Your committee feel that a study of all production costs should be made if these inflationary trends are to be curbed and if Canada's valuable export market is to be safeguarded. An exhaustive inquiry into this subject at the next session of Parliament is strongly recommended.

All which is respectfully submitted.

C. G. Hawkins,
Chairman.

NOTES:

(a) The statistics for regular Government Departments include Classified Employees, Prevailing Rate Employees, Casual Employees and Ships' Officers and Crews.

Classified employees comprise those paid on the basis of stated annual salaries, the vast majority being under certificate of the Civil Service Commission, the balance being employed under the authority of other statutes (e.g. staffs of the National Research Council, the National Film Board, and the Canadian Government Elevators).

Prevailing Rate Employees are those whose remuneration is based on the prevailing hourly, daily or monthly rate for similar type of work in the area of employment and who occupy a continuing year round position on the establishment of a Department. Casual Employees are those whose remuneration is based on the prevailing hourly, daily or monthly rate for a similar type of work in the area of employment and who are employed for short periods of time in connection with specific projects.
Ships' Officers and Crews are employed on Canadian Government Vessels.

(b) Excludes revenue postmasters, figures for which are shown separately immediately below the sub-total.

(c) The Crown Corporations for which staff strengths are included in this total are—

Atomic Energy of Canada, Ltd.
Bank of Canada
Canadian Arsenals Ltd.
Canadian Broadcasting Corporation
Canadian Commercial Corporation
Canadian National Railways
Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Ltd.
Canadian Overseas Telecommunication

EXHIBIT No. 8

EXPLANATORY NOTES COVERING THE STANDARD OBJECTS OF EXPENDITURE AND SPECIAL CATEGORIES

STANDARD OBJECTS (Items 1 to 22)

1. Civil Salaries and Wages

Includes salaries and wages, overtime and other special pay of all civilian full time, part time, seasonal and casual personnel normally considered as "Government Employees" (but does not include employees of agency and proprietary Crown corporations) whether paid at hourly, daily, weekly, monthly or annual rates of pay. It also includes Judges' salaries, those of the Governor General and Lieutenant Governors and the indemnities to Members of both Houses of Parliament, but does not include persons engaged for a specific project where pay and other costs would normally enter into the total cost of the project.

2. Civilian Allowances

Includes all types of allowances paid to or in respect of personnel normally considered as "Government Employees", such as Living, Terminable, Officer-in-Charge, Living and Representation Abroad, Special Service, Northern, Isolation, and Board and Subsistence Allowances, Mileage Allowances to Railway Mail Service Staffs, Allowances for Assistants, and other such allowances. Also includes Ministers' Motor Car Allowances, and the Expense Allowances to Senators and Members of the House of Commons.

3. Pay and Allowances—Defence Forces and R.C.M.Police

Includes pay and all types of allowances (except travel allowances included in Item No. 5 below) payable to members of the Defence Forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, including Subsistence Allowances and other perquisites common to such Services.

4. Professional and Special Services

Includes provision for services performed by individuals or organizations outside a particular departmental service, other than such services identified with specific works projects or with projects and programs for which provision is made under Items 9 and 10; payments in the nature of fees, commissions, etc., for legal services, architects', engineers', analysts', accountants', reporters', translators' and writers' services; medical and dental services, doctors and nurses for Veterans Treatment and examination of pension applicants, hospital treatment and care and other outside technical, professional and other expert assistance; annuities and other agents paid on a fee or commission basis, payments to church organizations for Indian education, and Corps of Commissionaires services. It includes armoured car service and other operational and maintenance services performed under contract other than those more properly classified under other Items, such as the Marconi-operated Radio Stations of the Department of Transport which are included in Item No. 8.

5. Travelling and Removal Expenses

Includes travelling and transportation expenses of Government Employees, Members of the Defence Forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, removal expenses of those persons and their dependents, and living and other expenses of such persons on travel status; Judges' travelling expenses and travelling expenses and allowances payable to Senators and Members of the House of Commons. It also includes transportation of persons by contract and chartered facilities or by other means, automobile mileage, aeroplane fares, local transportation, etc., travelling expenses of persons engaged in field survey work, inspections and investigations. Does not include travelling and transportation of other than Government Employees such as travel costs for deports, applicants for treatment or pensions (veterans), etc., which are classified under Item No. 22.

6. Freight, Express and Cartage

Includes the cost of transportation of goods other than initial delivery cost on a purchase which is included in the Object covering the cost of the purchase itself. These costs range from the movement of mails from city Post Offices to the various Government Departments, to the movement of heavy equipment between camps and other establishments of the Defence Services.

7. Postage

Includes ordinary postage, air mail, registered mail, special delivery mail, post office box rentals and any other postal charges. Does not, of course, include provision for mail enjoying the "frank" privilege.

8. Telephones, Telegrams and Other Communication Services

Includes all costs of communication services by telephone, telegram, cable, teletype, radio and wireless communication (tolls, rates, rentals, etc.) and other communication costs such as Courier Services provided by outside agencies and communication services performed under contract or agreement such as the Marconi-operated Radio Stations of the Department of Transport.

9. Publication of Departmental Reports and Other Material

Includes provision for the publication, through the Queen's Printer, of Departmental Reports and other material, including informational and educational bulletins and pamphlets; publications on scientific and technical matters, natural resources, statistics and other such material; Hansard and other Parliamentary Papers; maps, charts, etc. The costs of printing, binding, engraving, lithographing, artwork, mats, writers' fees, and other costs attributable to specific publication projects and programs are included hereunder, with the exception of those belonging under Items 1, 2 and 5. The costs of publications and material produced wholly within a Service are distributed throughout other Items. The printing of forms and other stationery is included under Item No. 11.

10. Exhibits, Advertising, Films, Broadcasting and Displays

Includes provision for exhibits, films, displays and other visual materials; advertising for publicity and general purposes, including advertising for tenders (except that charges directly arising from specific construction projects or purchases are included under such headings). It includes publication of proclamations, announcements, notices, etc., and various forms of educational and informational publicity, by broadcasting, poster, press and other means. The costs of artwork, writers' fees, casual employees hired for a specific project, and other costs attributable to the foregoing are included hereunder with the exception of those belonging under Items Nos. 1, 2 and 5, and the costs of projects or programs produced wholly within a Service where the costs are distributed throughout other Objects. Total provision for the operation of the National Film Board and the International Service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is included under this Item.

11. Office Stationery, Supplies, Equipment and Furnishings

Includes stationery, envelopes, blotting paper and other office supplies such as pens, pencils, erasers, ink, etc.; printed forms, including tax return, statistical and like forms; letterheads, ledgers and ledger sheets, carbon paper, stencils and other paper supplies; the purchase, repair and rentals of office machines and appliances, including typewriters, adding machines, calculators, recording machines, tabulating machines, microfilming equipment and supplies, inter-office communication equipment, postal meter machines, machine records and all other office equipment; also includes desks, chairs, filing cabinets and such office furnishings; books, newspapers and periodicals for office or library use.

It also includes certain payments to Newfoundland under the Terms of Union. In general, it does not include payments made to Provinces for expenditures for specific purposes, some of which are included in Items Nos. 20, 26, 30 and 31.

25. Family Allowances Payments

Payments of monthly allowances authorized by the Family Allowances Act—Chap. 109, Revised Statutes.

26. Old Age Pensions, including Allowances to the Blind and the Disabled

Includes pensions authorized by the Old Age Security Act, payment of the Federal Government's 50% share of old age assistance authorized by the Old Age Assistance Act, payment of the federal Government's 75% share of allowances paid to blind persons under the Blind Persons Act, and payment of the federal Government's 50% share of allowances paid to disabled persons under the Disabled Persons Act.

27. Veterans' Disability Pensions and Other Payments under the Pension Act

Includes pensions and other payments authorized under the Pension Act, the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act and the Civilian Government Employees (War) Compensation Order. Most of these payments arise from service during World Wars I and II.

28. Other Payments to Veterans and Dependents

Includes provision for War Veterans Allowances, including the Assistance Fund, Veterans Treatment and Other Allowances, Unemployment Assistance for Veterans, Rehabilitation Benefits, War Service Gratuities, Re-establishment Credits and other Sundry Items.

29. Government's Contribution to the Unemployment Insurance Fund

Provides for the Government's contribution to the Unemployment Insurance Fund and represents one-fifth of the net amount contributed by employers and employees combined.

30. General Health Grants

Provides for General Health Grants to the Provinces, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory under terms and conditions approved by the Governor in Council to assist in hospital construction, extending and improving health services, prevention of tuberculosis, prevention of mental illness, control of venereal diseases, prevention and treatment of crippling conditions in children, training of health and hospital personnel, programs for the detection and treatment of cancer, public health research, provision of laboratory and radiological diagnostic facilities and services, medical rehabilitation and the improvement of maternity, infant and child care.

31. Trans-Canada Highway Contributions

Covers payments to those Provinces whach have entered into agreements with the Federal Government under the Trans-Canada Highway Act, Chap. 269, Revised Statutes, in respect of the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway.

32. Movement of Mail by Land, Air and Water (Post Office)

Includes provision under the Post Office Department for Mail Service by Air, Water and Ordinary Land Conveyance, including Rural Mail Delivery.

33. Deficits—Government Owned Enterprises

Includes provision for the deficits incurred in the operation of Government Owned Enterprises such as the Hudson Bay Railway, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, the Prince Edward Island Car Ferry and Terminals, the North Sydney, N.S.—Port aux Basques, Nfld., Ferry and Terminals, and Churchill Harbour.

34. Less—Estimated Savings and Recoverable Items

In certain special instances it is necessary for commitment and control purposes to detail total requirements of services but, in order that the actual amount of cash requirement only may be voted, deductions are made of estimated savings or recoverable amounts. Since the Standard Objects are made up of the gross requirements, the total of those Objects must be reduced by these deductions in order to arrive at the total amount provided in the Estimates.

APPENDIX "B"

(See pp. 741-2)

Address of His Excellency the Governor General and Speeches of the Honourable Wishart McL. Robertson, Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable L. René Beaudoin, Speaker of the House of Commons, and the Honourable Robert H. Winters, Minister of Public Works, delivered on the occasion of the

UNVEILING OF THE MEMORIAL PLAQUES at the REOPENING of the
LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT
on
TUESDAY, JUNE 19, 1956

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson (Speaker of the Senate): Your Excellency, Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, ladies and gentlemen: The object of this gathering is to be present at and participate in the official reopening of the Library of Parliament. His Excellency the Governor General has graciously consented to officiate at the reopening of the library and the unveiling of the plaques. The English version of the plaques is as follows:—

Library of Parliament

This building, begun in 1860 and completed in 1876 was opened on February 28, 1876, by the Earl of Dufferin, Governor General of Canada. It survived the great fire which destroyed the Parliament Buildings in February 1916, but was severely damaged by fire in August 1952. After restoration it was reopened on June 19, 1956, by the Right Honourable Vincent Massey, Governor General of Canada.

(Translation):

Hon. L.-René Beaudoin (Speaker of the House of Commons): Your Excellency, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Prime Minister, ladies and gentlemen: We are gathered here today to witness the reopening of our library.

To preside over such an important ceremony, it was fitting that we should invite that personage who symbolizes parliamentary authority. On your behalf and on behalf of the members of the joint library committee, I am happy to thank His Excellency for having so graciously accepted our invitation.

Certain historical notes concerning our library have been transcribed on a plaque commemorating today's solemn event. The inscription reads as follows:

Library of Parliament

This building, begun in 1860 and completed in 1876 was opened on February 28, 1876, by the Earl of Dufferin, Governor General of Canada. It survived the great fire which destroyed the Parliament Buildings in February 1916, but was severely damaged by fire in August 1952. After restoration it was reopened on June 19, 1956, by the Right Honourable Vincent Massey, Governor General of Canada.

From August 1952 until today our librarians and their assistants, in spite of the difficulties and inconveniences of temporary quarters, have managed to provide us with the valuable help to which we had for so long become accustomed on their part.

I am happy, on your behalf, to pay tribute to their devotion and to thank them for their loyal services.

While restoration work was in progress, the library was entrusted to the care of the Honourable the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) who is now pleased to let us resume its use and possession. I congratulate him and thank him for a magnificent achievement on behalf of Parliament, and now invite him to address us.

(Text):

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Your Excellency, Mr. Prime Minister, Honourable Speakers, ladies and gentlemen: The interest of the Department of Public Works in the Library of Parliament goes back as far as 1859, when the erection of the Parliament Buildings was approved. Thanks to the foresight of the architects and the contractor, several steel fire doors were installed in the library when it was built. It was prompt closure of one of these doors that saved the historic building from serious damage, if not total loss, during the disastrous fire of February 3, 1916, which destroyed the centre block.

The second fire, which occurred on August 4, 1952, dealt this historic structure a heavier blow. You know the story of that day—how many thousands of books had to be moved quickly and dried to minimize the damage by water and smoke. Following the immediate investigation into the cause and extent of the fire, the Department of Public Works undertook the removal of everything inside the building and immediately started planning rehabilitation.

This, it subsequently turned out, involved a great deal more than replacement of charred timbers and redecoration of smoke-fumed walls and ceilings. It was discovered that in order to ensure greater protection against further disasters, the entire interior of the building would have to be rebuilt using fire protection methods and materials. One thing led to another, and what was first estimated to be a $1 milion project came to involve an expenditure of approximately $2⅓ million. This is usually the case when large-scale renovations of old buildings are undertaken. But today we see the worth-while results of that expenditure. I am grateful to those members of the press who have conducted their own investigations and reported so favourably upon the quality of the work that has been done. This is one of the rewards for painstaking efforts to rehabilitate the Library of Parliament, to maintain the integrity of design and the ideas which were in the minds of the original architects and builders.

Canadians today are deeply aware of the value of our historic relics, and I am pleased that the Department of Public Works was able to play a role in restoring this fine old structure to the point where you can see it here today, faithfully reproduced, true and unaltered, but strengthened to endure the ravages of accident and time.

Of course it is not yet fully finished. In due course, for example, you will see better and more appropriate furniture in its main reading room. Other finishing touches need to be added, but in the meantime it gives me great pleasure, on behalf of the Department of Public Works, the architects and builders, the prime contractors, the subcontractors and all who have laboured so carefully and efficiently, to turn over to your care again, Messrs. Speakers, this beautiful and beloved old Library of Parliament so that it may render further service to the people of Canada.

Hon. L. René Beaudoin (Speaker of the House of Commons): Ladies and gentlemen, His Excellency the Governor General of Canada.

Right Hon. Vincent Massey (Governor General of Canada): Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. Winters, ladies and gentlemen:

I greatly appreciate the privilege you have given me this afternoon. This is a very important event for all of us, the restoration and reopening of this historic building. It is easy to build a new structure, but it takes faith and courage and a true feeling for the past to treasure and restore an old one such as this. It is not what the architects of today would design for a modern library. It is not streamlined. It is not functional. It has no new look, but it has a very good old look. It is the kind of library that our founding fathers were proud to set on this hill, which was to be the scene of a nation's deliberations.

(Translation):

The Library of Parliament is but one of that large number of institutions which illustrate so well the bilingual character of this country. Among these innumerable works, covering such a wide variety of subjects, there are many which relate, in both our official languages, the history of our nation.

This library, used by representatives of French and English Canada, constitutes, as it were, an official link between Canadians of differing languages. Within its walls, it assembles works which bear upon every aspect of our Canadian life.

We are happy to note that it has been perfectly restored and that it is once more capable of performing, on behalf of our country, the important service expected of it.

(Text):

This library is a Victorian building. Old Ottawa, what is left of it, is a Victorian city. Its architecture expresses many of the qualities of that great era, and reflects a romantic feeling for the past. Such buildings should not, of course, be reproduced or imitated, but when surviving examples are preserved, they give us precious links with our beginnings.

This institution has had a chequered history; legislative libraries in Canada seem often to have had troubled careers. Two were burned, one at York in 1813 as a result of invasion, and the other at Montreal in the riots of 1849. As we have been reminded, this building was menaced dangerously by the great fire of 1916, but it was saved, as we have been told, by a prompt decision on the part of one of the staff when he closed the steel doors without a moment's warning, and as several members of Parliament were at the time in the library, they found themselves, to their surprise, locked in with the books. All were equally safe.

This library was opened in 1876 by one of my predecessors, Lord Dufferin. In the intervening eighty years its services have been of immeasurable importance, and we owe much to the men who have directed its work. Many of these have not been only the custodians of books, but the lovers of books. Some indeed, by their own effort, have contributed ably to our national literature.

I hope that this day will mark the reinvigoration of a great national institution. To those who have been concerned in its restoration, and to the staff who will again carry on in these precincts their invaluable but onerous work, I offer my warmest congratulations and best wishes.

I now have much pleasure in declaring the Library of Parliament officially reopened.

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 21, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I move that when this house rises today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The motion was agreed to.

FEDERAL EXPENDITURE IN PROVINCES

CORRECTED INFORMATION TABLED

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, on May 24 I tabled information requested by the honourable senator from King's (Hon. Mr. McDonald) under the following notice:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a return showing:

1. What was the total expenditure in each province of Canada for the fiscal year 1954-55, by the federal Government, including the statutory subsidy and tax rental agreement payments?

2. What was the total expenditure during the fiscal year 1954-55 in each province by each federal Government department and agency?

I find that some of the information tabled was erroneous, and I now table corrected information.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY ANSWERED

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, on June 12 the honourable senator from New Westminister (Hon. Mr. Reid) asked the following questions:

1. What is the total expenditure to be during 1956-57, if there is an anticipated deficit of $12 million?

2. Has a grant been allowed the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to provide for the erection of a modern building to house all departments before the report is made by the Royal Commission?

I now have the answers, as follows:

1. $38,600,000.
2. No.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Thank you.

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CROWN CORPORATION BILL

PRESS COMMENT ON SENATE ACTION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, during the decade or more that I have been a member of the Senate I have heard one senator after another protest against newspaper articles with respect to the Senate, some of which were decidely —and not a few cruelly—misinformed. I think, therefore, it is in order that I should call to the attention of honourable members an article that appeared in the Financial Times of Montreal, under date of June 15, 1956, signed Tempus, the pseudonym of Mr. Austin Cross, who is a well-known member of the Parliamentary Press Gallery.

May I read just two paragraphs:

What a nasty experience the pipe line debate was. All honour to the Senate that put the thing through in one day—

As a matter of fact, we took two days.

—after the Commons had made a bear garden out of the legislature for three weeks.

The Conservatives talk of reforming the Senate. After the Commons performance it seems they are the ones to be reformed. The Senate can travel on its laurels for years on their calm and dignified conduct. If you want to get things done on Parliament Hill, send the Commons home for a year but keep the Senate here, on a 52 weeks a year shift.

There is more, not equally good, but certainly excellent.

I think it is worth while to call attention to an article of this kind, which does give us some credit, for it is so seldom that we get credit. In the battle for headlines we lose out, but perhaps in the battle for the calm, good, sensible judgment of our fellow-citizens, we win, and this article would appear to show that to be the case.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: If the honourable senator's suggestion is to have the approval of the house, I suggest that it be on division.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Joseph A. Bradette moved the second reading of Bill 417, an Act to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill, briefly stated, is to extend without any change the present provisions of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act and the existing regulations to the years 1957 and 1958. The act first came into operation in 1948, and with certain changes of formula it has been assisting the gold mines since that date.

As you will have noticed, this is a very short bill. The whole tenor of it is given in the explanatory note, which is as follows:

Section 4A, which was enacted by 1955, chapter 19, extended the act to the years 1955 and 1956. The purpose of this bill is to extend the act to the years 1957 and 1958, and the only change in this section is to substitute "1955, 1956, 1957 and 1958" for "1955 and 1956".

The emergency, so far as the gold mines were concerned, was due to rising costs of labour and materials and the fixed price for gold at $35 United States funds per ounce. During the war the gold mines had been restricted in obtaining certain materials, and consequently production was less than it could have been under normal circumstances. The payments under the act were to meet emergency conditions and to compensate, in some measure, for the restrictions that had been imposed.

The emergency, so far as rising costs and the fixed price for gold are concerned, still exists. There are many communities dependent solely or almost exclusively on gold mining and it is proposed, therefore, to extend the period of assistance for another two years, namely, to 1957 and 1958, at the same rate that prevailed for 1955 and this year.

Payments under the act have always been based on a formula which has two factors, namely, the rate of assistance and the number of assistance ounces. The formula now in effect, and which this bill will extend for two years, is two-thirds of the amount by which the average cost of producing an ounce of gold exceeds $26.50, multiplied by two-thirds of the production in the designated year. The maximum assistance payment is $12.33 an ounce.

Applications for payment in any year are received up to June 30 of the following year. Advance payments are made on an 80 per cent basis, pending an audit of the gold mining company's books by the cost inspection and audit division of the Department of Finance. When the audit is completed the final payment of the 20 per cent holdback is approved. Under these conditions final payments are not yet complete for 1955, but they are expected to be in the neighbourhood of $9,300,000.

When subsidies were first proposed for our gold mining industry the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) was Minister of Mines and Resources, and I was a membr of the other house. I recall telling that branch of Parliament that conditions in my district certainly warranted financial assistance to the industry. I felt then, as I do now, that this assistance should be of only a temporary nature, but it so happens that conditions in the industry today are the same as they were then. It seems to me to be paradoxical, if not ironical, that gold, which is synonymous with wealth, should require assistance in its production. However, gold is different from any other metal produced in this country. It is the only metal universally accepted as a monetary basis, and by reason of that fact it plays a major part in the national economy of most nations. How has the price of gold fluctuated over the past twenty-five years? In 1931 the Government of Canada asked the gold producers to send all their gold to the Mint, and by the Gold Export Act of 1932 gold mining companies were compelled to comply with that request. This action was taken when Britain went off the gold standard and when the price of gold was just over $20 an ounce. During the period from 1930 to 1933 the average price of gold increased each year, until in 1933 it reached $28.60 an ounce. That was the maximum price producers could obtain for gold on the world market, regardless of the effect of supply or demand.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Would the honourable member permit a question? Is any information available as to what the price of gold would be if the United States had not set the price at $34 or $35 an ounce?

Hon. Mr. Bradette: I will answer that question a little later on, if I may, because it is quite an involved question, with many ramifications.

Honourable senators, the fact is that since 1941 base metals, food, manufactured products and all other commodities, have increased greatly in price, but the price of gold has remained rigidly pegged at $35.50. As honourable senators know, this precious metal is used not only as the basis of our monetary system, but it is used throughout the world in the making of objects of art and other valuable articles.

Referring to the question put by the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid), I may say it is quite true that the price of gold has been set by the United States. I took it upon myself on two separate occasions to go to Washington to ascertain from the United States Treasury if it would be possible to increase the price of gold by $5 or $10 per ounce, or even by as much as $15, but I was told that it was absolutely impossible. The Treasury had decided that the price should remain as it was, because of the fear that any increase might prove inflationary. Until we had discussed this problem I had not sufficiently realized that gold production is not as important a factor in the American national economy as it is, for instance, in that of Canada or South Africa. However, the fact is that the United States has decided affirmatively that it will not increase the price of gold. The situation is not altogether bad for Canada, for no matter how much gold this country may produce at any time a market can be found at the set price.

I want now to continue my remarks dealing with assistance payments. For 1954, under a formula which gave larger payments, the total cost when the final settlements are made is expected to be about $16,300,000. The payments for 1953 amounted to $14,652,080.26. Payments have varied from a low of slightly under $9 million, for 1950, to a high of more than $16 million, for 1954. The rate of payment per ounce for gold produced in 1954 was $4.22, and in 1953 it was $4.61, the highest rate ever paid.

Payments are made only to mines whose production of gold is 70 per cent of the total value of their output. In 1955 five lode mines suspended operations, and one was absorbed by its parent company. One new lode mine came into production that year, and another elected to sell on the free market and was ineligible for assistance. No mines sold on the free market in 1954. Production of gold eligible for assistance payments under the conditions outlined amounted to 3,795,248 ounces in 1954, and 3,301,501 ounces in 1955. No payments under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act are made for gold produced as a by-product recovered in the smelting of gold-bearing base metals. For instance, the International Nickel Company produces some gold as a by-product, as do some mines in the Rouyn district, but they are not eligible for assistance under this act. Thus, the gold which qualified for assistance in 1954 was 86·9 per cent of the total gold production of 4,366,440 ounces; and in 1955 it was 72·4 per cent of the total gold production of 4,556,400 ounces.

The gold mines have made strenuous efforts to decrease their operating costs, and with marked success. Indeed, they have done very well.

Gold mining is the most outstanding example of industries in Canada which have adopted automation and can carry out large operations with a minimum of manpower and the utilization of huge machines. This is most apparent around the nickel belt, where the International Nickel Company and some gold mines operate. It is a revelation to see two or three men with the use of machinery doing work that would otherwise require a great labour force.

The gold mining industry has always been co-operative in meeting requests made by the federal Government. In the second year of the last war the mines were requested to increase their production, which they did; but less than two years later they were requested by the federal authorities to curtail their activities to some extent because of the shortage of material. In complying with this request they also co-operated fully.

I was interested to note that the Honourable Mr. Prudham, Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, said, after a recent trip through the Red Lake Camp, that many of the mines there had improved their position. One mine in particular in the Northwest Territories has a very high grade of ore and is doing well without gold mining assistance. In 1957 there may be as many as seven mines which, because of decreased costs of production, will receive no assistance, or a very small amount, under this act. Other mines, however, are in a life and death struggle for existence, and some may have to close within the next two years.

I take this opportunity to pay tribute to the people who live in the great mining sections of Canada, particularly in northern Ontario. In the towns and community centres the municipal councils have always been alert to the fact that exploitation of the minerals in the areas would eventually lead to depletion of the mines, and attention has been directed to the formation of new industries to take their place.

I recall vividly the fine historic town of Cobalt, which in my early mining life based its prosperity on the discovery of silver. Eventually it was no longer economic to mine silver, but because of the initiative of the local municipal council and board of trade there have been attracted to that town some new industries which have brought to it the prosperity it had forty years ago. Another example is Dawson City, where there was a large discovery of placer gold which lasted for a limited time. With the decline of mining activities that centre has not disappeared, but rather has had renewed life through other industries and hydro-electric developments.

I wish to make special reference, as I have done before, to the great co-operation between management and labour in the gold mining area which for 27 years I had the honour of representing in the other house. During that time it was the finest mining section of Ontario, if not of all Canada. True, there have been some instances of differences between management and labour, but by and large a fine spirit of co-operation emanated from both sides, and has accrued to the benefit of the communities concerned by providing adequate schools, hospitals and other facilities. These institutions were erected at great cost on account of the rock formations. Towns such as Kirkland Lake, Timmins, Schumacher and South Porcupine have done their utmost, through their municipal councils and boards of trade, to induce other industries to come in, and in this respect they have had some success. I am sure the gold mining industry would be very happy if it were in a position to say to the Government "We do not need your assistance".

But that is not the case: it must have this federal subsidy in order to survive.

May I digress for a moment to pay a warm tribute to the Honourable Leslie Frost, Premier of Ontario, whose personal friendship I have the honour to enjoy. I hope honourable senators will find time to read the report, published by the province, on the inquiry into the gold mining resources of Ontario. It is well worth reading, as it gives an insight into the problems facing the gold mining industry in this province and in Canada as a whole.

As honourable senators know, we in northern Ontario suffer from lack of fuel. Being situated as we are in the central part of Canada, we have tried to obtain fuel from both east and west. We have purchased coal from the Maritimes, but because of the long freight haul the cost is almost prohibitive. We have also attempted to use Alberta coal, but it has proved in part unsuitable to our needs. Now, after three years of continued efforts by our municipal councils, boards of trade, sulphite, newsprint and mining interests we are thankful that Mr. Frost found it possible to have passed at the last session of the provincial Legislature a bill providing the sum of $35 million to assist in the laying of a pipe line which will bring natural gas to northern Ontario—yes, and to the whole province.

It must always be realized, honourable senators, that northern Ontario is really in central Canada. There we are not parochial or narrow in our views; we are well aware of the problems of British Columbia, the Prairie provinces and the Maritimes. We sympathize greatly with the Maritime rights; and when the western farmers are having difficulty harvesting and disposing of their crop, we are much appreciative of their problem. In all, we are an open-minded people, and well aware of the general problems facing Canada as a whole. So it is most encouraging to us to know that within two or three years we will have gas for use as a fuel in the development of agriculture, mining, forestry and other activities in that great section of northern Ontario where the possibilities for new development are almost unlimited.

It has been estimated by officers of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys that if assistance payments were discontinued at the end of 1956, when the present act, if not extended, would expire, 18 or 20 gold mines with an annual production of about 700,000 ounces of gold would quite likely close, after a salvage period of two or three years. During the salvage period the ore now in sight would be mined, but there would be no further exploration for new ore. These mines when closed would be permanently lost to our country's economy. For the past several years there has, in general, been very little prospecting for or development of new gold mines, and in 1955 the number of gold producers dropped to fewer than half the number producing in 1941. It should be noted that most of the potential gold mines which are in the development stage are located in or near proven gold camps, and there appears to be little interest on their part to move beyond those localities. It will be apparent that continuation of the emergency gold mining assistance has aided many of the gold mines to remain in operation, and the communities dependent on them have thus been enabled to maintain a reasonable standard of living. This assistance has also provided money for new mining developments, and they have contributed to the general prosperity that mining is now enjoying, and which is reflected everywhere in the economy of our country.

Many of the gold mining companies have used their surplus funds to undertake ventures in other mining fields, such as iron ore, oil and uranium. I have in mind particularly the Hollinger Company, which used its surplus funds to search for mineral deposits such as copper, iron ore or uranium in other sections of the country. Progressive mines are not satisfied to stay with what they have, they seek to open up new operations. I believe the surplus that the Hollinger Company had on hand amounted to $35 or $45 million, and that accumulated fund was spent in exploring iron ore deposits in Ungava, in northern Quebec. This exploration work was started by the then president of the company, Mr. Noah Timmins, whose friendship I enjoyed, and was continued by his nephew, Mr. Jules Timmins. The Hollinger company may be said to be responsible for the great iron ore development in Ungava which means so much to Canada as a whole. The McIntyre mine too is operating mining enterprises in other sections of Canada, particularly in the Chibougamau area and other parts of northern Quebec, in the new copper mining section. That company is also interested in mines in the Rouyn-Noranda section and, I believe, in the Yukon and British Columbia also.

These mining people are enterprising. They do not want to remain idle or dormant. They have taken gambles in the past and they will continue to do so in the future.

Some persons go so far as to say that the gold mining industry benefits only a few, but I would point out that some 200,000 people derive a livelihood from this industry. At least 20,000 are directly employed in the industry and a great many more benefit by it. In the famous northern Ontario clay belt, which is adjacent to the northern Quebec clay belt, land has been developed for agricultural use because of the market for farm products provided by the gold mining industry; when there is any talk of the gold mines closing down the farmers in that area begin to worry because they see their market threatened. The same misgivings affect the lumber manufacturers in British Columbia. Many millions of feet of lumber and timber from British Columbia and other timber producing sections of our country are sold to the gold mines of Canada. I would say that every element of our population is benefited to some degree by the gold mining industry of Canada because the operations of that industry are linked with many other activities.

Let me place just a few figures on record showing the contribution of our gold mines to the Canadian economy. The amount of new wealth produced in gold in 1955 was valued at $157,305,152. Salaries and wages paid in 1954 were $63,578,156; fuel and electric power purchased amounted to $6,987,528; plant and equipment installed amounted to $6,385,260, and other supplies purchased amounted to $38,814,500. It is estimated that the total number of employees in 1954 was almost 18,500.

Since the inception of the gold mining assistance in 1948 the amount paid out to March 31, 1956, is over $90 million. This applied to 26 million ounces is an average of $3.48 an ounce. It is calculated that payments for 1955 will probably reach $9,300,000, and if production costs remain unchanged in 1956 and 1957 it is estimated that the cost of assistance for those two years will be about $8,900,000 and $8,600,000, respectively. These totals are based on payments at the present rate of assistance, and the estimated decreases from the 1955 total are due to the fact that several mines are now producing higher grade ores and therefore will receive less help, and a few will probably go out of existence.

I do not think I need elaborate at much greater length. Debate was quite extensive in the House of Commons and its record is available to everyone. I shall not burden this august assembly with more figures because they are all available to members of this house. If necessary the bill could be sent to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

However, I will make just one or two more remarks, pertaining to the price of gold. Why has the price of gold remained pegged at the same price for so long a period? What are the factors that keep the American treasury from paying a higher price for gold? In explanation it is sometimes said that if the price of gold were to be raised $10 an ounce the Russians would immediately flood the money market with their gold. I do not believe that situation will ever occur. It is true that Russia has a tremendous hoard of gold: she took a large amount of gold from Spain during the Civil War in that country, and she also took a considerable amount from Italy. We know that men in labour camps in Siberia and the northern parts of Russia, to the number of 10,000, have been engaged in gold mining, and Russia must be in possession of all that gold. However, I do not think Russia desires to see gold depreciated, especially as it might interfere with the development of its five-year programs which have been so successful. We must all realize and admire the great industrial development of Russia; and I believe that because of her present position she would not want to see free world monetary systems destroyed or jeopardized by the dumping of gold on the world market.

I do not think the time is ripe for the Americans to pay a higher price for gold. I say that with some personal knowledge of what is happening in other parts of the world with regard to gold production. Of course, an increase in the price by $10 an ounce would help a lot of people. It certainly would help the gold producer in South Africa, and to some extent Great Britain. There is a lot of gold in Europe, and many countries on that continent would be helped if the price of gold were increased. However, we cannot force the hand of the United States Government on a question of this kind. After all, we are very fortunate in that we have in the United States a ready and steady market where cash is paid on delivery of gold.

Some people may ask, "Why does not the Canadian Government coin or mint gold?" It could be done, but what difference would it make? We might have a gold piece or two in our pockets. Minting is an easy thing to do, but of itself it would not provide any solution of our problem. At the same time, the federal government departments, provincial government departments, and others interested in the mining not only of gold but of all kinds of metal, have been very active. As I mentioned a few moments ago, Premier Leslie Frost of Ontario has done a magnificent job. His attention is continually centred on our mining sections, because he knows how much they mean to the economy, not only of Ontario, but of the whole of Canada.

There are those who ask, "Why is more gold not sold on the open market?" I know that in our section some of the mines tried a recourse to the open market, but not with the success they expected. In 1954 six private firms in London resumed, after a lapse of 13 years, the buying and selling of gold on the open market. When that announcement appeared in the newspapers we had great hopes; we thought there was a chance that the price of gold might be increased by $5 to $10 an ounce. But things did not work out that way. One or two firms in Canada—I have particularly in mind one, whose name, however, I will not mention—sold gold on the open market, and the first difficulty they met with was, what kind of money they were to receive for their gold, what currency could be transferred from another country to our own. Also, the market fluctuated considerably; on some days the price fell below $35, at other times it went as high as $37. The market had none of the steadiness which characterizes it at the present time.

It is the habit of honourable members of this body to give special attention and study to the problems which come before them. I believe that the more thoroughly we examine into what has been done in this connection by the federal Government, the provincial Governments and those elements of the community that are particularly interested in gold mining, the more willing we shall be to have this measure passed unanimously.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: The honourable senator from Cochrane (Hon. Mr. Bradette) has invited us to extend to 1957 and 1958 the assistance provided by this act. Can he give the house any assurance that the industry will be able to continue on its own feet after that time, or is this simply an interim provision which it is expected will need to be renewed?

Hon. Mr. Bradette: If I could give my honourable friend the assurance that further aid will not be required I would be a very happy man, but I am afraid that if the present situation exists two years from now it will be necessary to get another subsidy, as otherwise most of the mines will be, so to speak, engaged in a lost cause.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: I know that we in Alberta have been unable to sell our coal as far east as the Cochrane area; and, as the honourable senator has said, it is not economic for his district to obtain coal from the Maritimes. I believe that most of the coal that his district is using is imported from the United States. Do I understand correctly that when the Trans-Canada pipe line is completed Alberta gas will be used in his section of the country?

Hon. Mr. Bradette: Positively so. I was a member of a delegation which met Premier Frost to discuss the matter, and it was unanimously agreed that Alberta gas will be enormously useful to northern Ontario, as well as, I believe, to many other parts of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Perhaps in this connection a comment or two is due from me. I lived in northern Ontario for a number of years, I was very much interested in the gold mining and other mining industries of that country, and I was highly sympathetic to those enterprises which were finding it difficult to get along. At the same time I have wondered whether the honourable senator from Cochrane realizes that the proposal he has made is uneconomic. As I understand it, this subsidy, amounting to about $9 million a year, is to be paid to mines which, because their operating costs are greater than the returns they get on the product they sell, could not otherwise make a profit. I am reminded of two men, famous in radio, who some years ago were discussing the raising of pigs. One of them explained, "You buy pigs in the fall, carry them over the winter, and sell them at a somewhat lower price in the spring." The other said, "Of course, you can't make money that way;" and his friend replied, "No; we found that out." Similarly, loss. Even though the rest of the citizens of the country make up the deficit, there is still of the country make up deficit, there is still a loss. If the arrangement is a temporary one it can be justified; but is it justifiable to go on year after year supplying the profits or negativing the losses of an industry which it does not pay to operate? It is difficult to face facts, but if those are the facts, and mines are to be run indefinitely at a loss which the rest of us are to make up, is not the law which requires us to do so an uneconomic law? How long is it to continue? Am I right in my statement that without the subsidy these mines would lose money? And are they not losing money for the nation if their profits come from the public treasury?

Although I question this proceeding, I am not going to vote against the bill. I am highly sympathetic to the industry. I want to see it prosper. I would not like to see any mine close down. But if we are to be good economists we must face the facts. We cannot add two and two and get five. If we are going to pass this measure now it should be thoroughly understood that we are not going to carry it on for ever.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I do not think the problem is as simple as the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) is trying to make it. The ordinary rules of economics have to be weighted by a number of other factors. If you study the history of gold mining in Canada you will find there have been periods when this country was very fortunate in having gold mines. It has been said that gold mines prosper most when a country generally is having a bad time. During the war years gold production was of inestimable value to Canada in helping us to deal with our problem of foreign exchange.

Hon. Mr. Bradette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Certainly we were scratching the bottom of the barrel many times, particularly in the first two or three years of the war. The gold mining industry is faced with this difficulty, that there is a fixed price for gold, but production costs are not fixed in relation to that price. They are quite independent. Those costs have mounted very considerably since the end of the war. The question is: should we allow the gold mining industry to be practically wiped out, or should we give it the financial assistance it requires to continue operations? There is more involved in reaching a decision than just pointing out that the industry is losing money on its operations. The fact is that the gold mining industry is well established in various parts of our nation. For example, take northern Ontario, where towns and communities have been developed as a result of that basic income-producing asset. It may be argued that last year it cost the Government some $9 million by way of assistance to the industry, but the problem is so big that it has become a national one, like many other problems. What are we going to do with these communities if we allow to develop a situation that will result in wiping out an industry that contributes so much to the income and living of these communities? In time other industries may be established there. Perhaps economies in the mining operations themselves may become possible. It is not sufficient to say that the cost of operating some mines is so high that they should be closed down. The problem is bigger than that. We have to consider all these communities and the development that has taken place as a result of a once flourishing gold mining industry. Who can peer into the future beyond a year or so and say what the situation is going to be? Perhaps, sooner than we think, gold may again be a valuable asset for Canada so far as our foreign relations are concerned.

I agree that we should examine this sort of legislation whenever it is presented, but at the same time I feel we have to look at the over-all picture. Our action now is a holding one. We should hold on for a little longer to see how the picture will develop.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I would go along with what the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) has said, except his comment that we have a fixed price for gold. Is it not a fact that we recently abandoned the fixed price? True, the United States fixed the price which it will pay, but did we not throw the market open, so that producers may sell wherever they can find buyers?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: There is a choice. A company may sell to the federal authority and qualify under certain conditions for emergency assistance, or it may sell outside the federal authority. However, it cannot do both. I think that many companies which have chosen to sell outside have found themselves in the predicament of the dog that was crossing a bridge with a piece of meat in its mouth. The dog, by opening its mouth to grab the apparently bigger piece of meat reflected in the water, lost the real meat and ended up with nothing. A substantial number of the gold mines have preferred the security that comes from operating within Canada, selling gold to the Government and collecting emergency assistance. Not too many have preferred to take a chance on uncertain and fluctuating gold markets outside of Canada. We sometimes hear about fancy prices for gold on foreign markets, but I wonder just what quantity is involved.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I agree with the honourable senator, but I do not think he should say there is a fixed price. My honourable friend also spoke about the danger of the industry being wiped out. Is it not a fact that this assistance goes to a portion of the industry only, and that the other mines pay their own way?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Some of the very high grade properties are able to operate successfully and do not qualify under the formula for assistance. We might be able to look at the problem differently if more of the high grade mines were located in settled communities, so that the closing down of smaller mines would not affect our economic life to any serious extent. But gold is where you find it.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I agree largely with the remarks just made by the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden). Farmers have settled in many of these mining districts, and of course their market is dependent on the mines.

Some mines with low grade ore were able to operate at a profit before the great rise in production costs, but since then the ore produced has not paid a sufficient return. There is certain potential wealth in the mines, but without financial assistance that wealth must remain in the ground. The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act provides the needed assistance, and that is why I do not object to it. I know of mines that do not need assistance, but many others do. It is a question of some of these companies being enabled to mine gold that would otherwise remain in the ground. I believe some legislation of this nature is essential, and I have no hesitation in supporting the bill. From time to time we can question the usefulness of gold and the necessity for the legislation. Since the beginning of human history, gold has been readily exchanged throughout the world. I think, therefore, that it would be wise to continue some form of assistance to the low grade mines which are already operating.

Hon. Mr. Bradette: May I be permitted to make a few remarks in answer to the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck)?

The Hon. the Speaker: If the honourable senator from Cochrane (Hon. Mr. Bradette) speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Bradette: The honourable member from Toronto-Trinity apparently is under the impression that to subsidize the gold mining industry is an uneconomic procedure. However, I am sure we do not believe that it is a bad investment on behalf of the federal Government to subsidize the coal mining industry of the Maritime provinces.

Earlier this afternoon I summarized the contribution of the gold mines to the Canadian econmy by giving the following figures. The amount of new wealth produced in gold in 1955 was valued at $157,305,152. Salaries and wages paid in 1954 were $63,578,156; fuel and electric power purchased amounted to $6,987,528; plant and equipment installed amounted to $6,385,260, and other supplies purchased amounted to $38,814,500. It is estimated that the total number of employees in 1954 was almost 18,500.

It is clear, therefore, honourable senators, that the subsidies are not by any means all loss. I think it will be found that in a year or two, if new centres of population like Timmins, South Porcupine, Kirkland Lake, Schumacher, and others are established subsidies may not be needed. I hope and pray that within a year or two they may become unnecessary. However, I believe that at the present time there is no other solution of the problem than the subsidies being given under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Bradette: Next sitting.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 26, at 8 p.m.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 435, an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1957.

The bill was read the first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, this is an interim supply bill. I would like to proceed with it now, and if it receives the second and third readings at this sitting it could be given the Royal Assent this evening. I would therefore move the second reading of the bill.

We have already passed two interim supply bills for the year ending March 31, 1957. On March 22 we passed a bill providing supply for the months of April and May, and on June 12 a bill covering the month of June. The first of those bills voted not only two months' general supply, but certain additional amounts for seven special items, with respect to which the expenditures in the early part of the year are larger than those that will have to be made in later months. The bill that we passed on June 12 granted supply for that one month—that is, one-twelfth of all the items—plus one-twelfth of six special items in the main estimates and one-fourth of all the items in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year 1956-57.

The supply bill before us tonight provides for one-twelfth of all items to be voted in the main estimates for the fiscal year 1956-57, together with one-twelfth of all the items in the supplementary estimates for the current fiscal year. In no instance is the total amount of any item being requested.

I have a statement which, for the information of honourable senators and with their consent, I shall place on Hansard. It sets forth the total estimates for the year 1956-57, plus the total supplementary estimates, and also the amounts voted on the two previous appropriation bills, together with the amount which is provided for in this bill.

ESTIMATES, 1956-57

	Total	Of which: Statutory	To be Voted
Main estimates	$5,042,893,969	$1,869,978,290	$3,172,915,679
Supplementary estimates	146,025,513	–	146,025,513
	$5,188,919,482	$1,869,978,290	$3,318,941,192

SUPPLY

Appropriation Act No. 1 (March 22/56)
One-sixth generally (Main estimates)	$528,819,279.84
7 Special items	1,194,760.42	$530,014,040.26
Appropriation Act No. 3 (June 12/56)
One-twelfth generally (Main estimates)	$264,409,639.92
6 Special items	652,148.34
One-fourth generally (Supplementary estimates)	36,506,378.25	$301,568,166.51
Total granted to date		$831,582,206.77
This bill:
One-twelfth generally (Main estimates)	$264,409,639.92
One-twelfth generally (Supplementary estimates)	12,168,792.75	$276,578,432.67
Total supply, including this bill		$1,108,160,639.44

Note: Appropriation Act No. 2 covered the further (final) supplementary estimates (2) for 1955-56.

I will, of course, give the usual undertaking that the passage of this bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of honourable members to discuss these items in full when the estimates come before the house later in the session.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

TABLED

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I have the honour to lay on the table of the house a copy of the International Wheat agreement, 1956, in English and French texts, together with a list of the countries which have signed the agreement.

Hon. John T. Haig: May I ask that it be printed as an appendix to Hansard? It is a very important document.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I shall be glad to make a motion to that effect. With leave, I move, seconded by the honourable the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig):

That the International Wheat Agreement, 1956, and a list of the countries which have signed the agreement be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this date.

The motion was agreed to.

See appendix to today's Hansard, pp. 800-814.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Joseph A. Bradette moved the third reading of Bill 417, an Act to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Hon. A. Neil McLean: Honourable senators, I had intended to say a word or two on this bill last Thursday afternoon, but did not find an opportunity to do so. I am glad to support the bill, for I think the gold mining industry needs support.

The World Bank and International Monetary Fund fix the price of gold. I have noticed that on different occasions South Africa has made very strong representations to the World Bank and International Monetary Fund to have the price of gold raised. Gold is the main product of South Africa and its chief source of income, just as wheat is the main crop of Canada. Although Canada has a director on the World Bank and International Monetary Fund, I do not think this country has given more than mild support, if any, to South Africa in this matter; at least, I have not read of our having done so. South Africa is one of our sister nations in the Commonwealth, and I feel that if Canada vigorously supported her representations it would help to get the price of gold raised. History shows that the price of gold has been increased many times, and I think the time has come for us to take more active steps to have a further increase made. As far as home consumption is concerned we can set the price of gold at whatever price we please, but when we send gold abroad we have to take the export price. Hundreds of millions of dollars in gold have been purchased by our national bank since the war and placed in reserve, sterilized and taken out of circulation. If it fell into the Ottawa river tonight business would probably go on just the same as if no one knew of the loss. We take gold from one hole where we can get it, and place it in another hole where we can't get it. Gold is the only commodity that is being bought at the pre-war price for home use. Certainly wheat is not, nor butter, nor any other commodity that I know of. And all the time while Canada is buying and hoarding all this gold, wage rates are going up. Some day when the price is raised very high profits will be made on the hoards of gold, by Canada and other nations, but these profits will not affect the miners a bit; not one cent will be passed along to those who have mined the gold. I think that for gold taken for home consumption or use we should pay the economic price, and not ask the taxpayer to make up the difference, as is suggested by this bill.

Nevertheless, honourable senators, I support the bill.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Will the honourable senator tell us if there is any market for gold at a price higher than that set by the United States?

Hon. Mr. McLean: There is not. The millions of dollars' worth of gold that we have in reserve is out of circulation. We bought it, as we have bought other commodities, but the price was not an economic one. But the gold that leaves the country is sold at the present world price. We have taken over great quantities of gold for home consumption, for which we paid an uneconomic price, but some day the price will go up and we will realize a profit on it. We know from past experience that the price will be higher in the future than it is today. I do not believe the present price of gold permits the mines to pay fair wages to their employees.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Is the United States still the largest purchaser of gold, or are there other big buyers?

Hon. Mr. McLean: The United States has a great stock of gold, which stays at a level of approximately $22 billion. But the world price for gold is not set by the United States; it is set by the World Bank and International Monetary Fund.

Hon. Mr. Reid: But the United States is still the big buyer of gold from other countries?

Hon. Mr. McLean: That is true, but it must be selling as much as it is buying, for its stocks are not going up.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed, on division.

VETERANS' BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL LOANS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. C. G. Power moved the second reading of Bill 253, an act to amend the Veterans' Business and Professional Loans Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a very short and simple bill, which seeks to amend the Veterans' Business and Professional Loans Act, a companion act of the Veterans' Land Act. The legislation provided financial assistance by way of guaranteed loans to veterans who had no aptitude for farm or agricultural pursuits, but who wished to go into business or one of the professions. I understand it has been beneficial to veterans, advantageous to the community and presumably, since the loans were guaranteed by the Government, highly satisfactory to the banks.

Some difficulty has arisen with regard to the expiry date beyond which veterans are not eligible for loans. Section 4, subsection (1) (l) of the act provides that loans must be made . . .

. . . within a period of ten years from the 1st day of January, 1945, or the date that is the date of his discharge within the meaning of subsection (1) of section 12 of the War Service Grants Act, whichever date is the later.

Delays which have occurred between the receipt of an application for and the processing of a loan have resulted in refusal of the loan. For example, there is on file at the present time the case of a veteran who made application for a loan, let us say, on September 1, 1955, and it was not processed until, say, October 1 of that year; meanwhile, the ten-year period from the date of his discharge expired and his loan could not be granted.

The bill proposes to amend paragraph (l) by substituting for the word "loan" the word "application". The act, as amended, would then provide that if a veteran made application within the required ten-year period he would be eligible for a loan and it would be guaranteed by the Government.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Could the honourable senator tell us how much money has been loaned under this act, and the amount, if any, of loans that have had to be written off?

Hon. Mr. Power: I have before me the answers to certain questions asked in the other house. These disclose the following facts. The total amount loaned to date is $12,549,629.62. The total amount repaid has been $11,114,219.07. The total amount in arrears, covering 124 loans, is $97,574.13. The amount of claims—I take it that these are the loans not repaid—is $222,374.85. There is no amount actually written off as bad debts. A total of $16,735.68 has been recovered, and recoveries are continually being made.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is not a bad showing.

Hon. Mr. Power: No; I would think it is a remarkably good showing.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I do too.

Hon. Mr. Fournier: What is the maximum amount of money that a veteran can borrow under this legislation?

Hon. Mr. Power: I think that previously the maximum amount was $2,500, but it was raised to $5,000. The act provides for loans for the purchase of a business, for the purchase or repair of machinery or tools, instruments, etc., for the construction or alteration of or addition to any building used in business, and for the purpose of making a payment to the funds of a partnership, such as a legal, medical, engineering or agricultural partnership. It has, I know, been very widely used and has served an excellent purpose.

Hon. Mr. Euler: What rate of interest do the veterans pay?

Hon. Mr. Power: The banks cannot charge more than 5 per cent interest, and are not allowed to make any extra charges.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Power: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received a communication from the Secretary to the Governor General, acquainting him that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, would proceed to the Senate Chamber this day at 9.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the Royal Assent to certain bills.

THE ESTIMATES

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON FINANCE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Committee on Finance on the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957.

Hon. Charles G. Hawkins: Honourable senators, in rising to move concurrence in this report, I do so fully conscious of the standards set by my predecessor, the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar). His contribution to public life in Canada, including his work as chairman of this committee, has very justly earned for him a place in the hearts and the minds of Canadians equalled by very few. Further, I wish to thank him for the good advice and many courtesies extended to me personally during the years I have been a member of this house.

Over the course of the years it has become evident that a clear picture of Canada's economy can only be obtained by scrutinizing closely the tables on the national income, gross national production and gross national expenditures. These items appear in the report submitted as exhibits 1, 2 and 3. All three terms have been used loosely and almost interchangeably in public places at various times, frequently without a full appreciation of their true meaning. Indeed we found that the tables of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics upon which they were based were couched in terms and founded on premises which could lead to confusion in the mind of the layman.

Your committee felt that a definition of these items and the relationship they bear to the national economy would be of value. Likewise, exhibits 4 and 5 having to do with government expenditures at municipal, provincial and federal levels, form a part of our submission. The first part of this report is an attempt to explain these terms in language which is as simple and non-technical as possible. Your committee hopes that this will lead to a clearer undertaking of our national outlook by the citizens of Canada generally. This brief summary therefore attempts to clarify the proportional percentage of the total tax taken at all levels of government, which we feel will lead to a better understanding of the tax burden and an appreciation of where the taxpayer's dollar goes.

Your committee felt that it probably would better serve Canadians if, in addition to examining the public accounts and making recommendations with a view to reducing expenditures and improving administrative functions, it could also clarify some of the statistical data on which our economic planning is based. We hope that the purposes for which it is submitted will be fulfilled. This can be achieved only by circulating it as widely as possible, and we hope that from it may emerge a simplification of matters which at first glance may appear too complex for the man who pays the shot.

Preparation of Estimates:

For many years a practice has been followed whereby not all the services used by it are charged to the department concerned. Although I shall cite the Post Office Department as an outstanding example, the practice is generally followed by many other departments. The problem may be briefly and clearly illustrated as follows: Public Works carries the cost of providing office space, char service, upkeep, etc., for the Post Office Department, but these costs do not appear in the Post Office estimates. The committee felt that the practice followed in the United Kingdom Parliament is more desirable. There, in addition to the cost budgeted for in the estimates, the costs supplied by another branch of the Government are shown as a footnote to the estimates of the department concerned. This would give a more realistic picture of the actual cost of each department of government.

Responsibility for public works:

Your committee was very much impressed with the progress made by the Department of Public Works in implementing the recommendations contained in your committee's report for the years 1952 and 1955, and we are pleased to learn that this practice is continuing. We are looking forward to the day in the near future when all such services as Public Works is authorized to perform will be done by Public Works, thereby eliminating duplication of effort.

Government Annuities:

The statute under which the Annuities Branch operates was enacted in 1908, and the purpose for which it was passed is set out in the preamble:

> Whereas it is in the public interest that habits of thrift be promoted and that the people of Canada be encouraged and aided thereto so that provision may be made for old age . . .

This enactment, at the time it was passed, was progressive legislation and made provision for old age that was not available elsewhere. However, because of the advent of old age pensions and the entry of many other organizations to the annuities and pension field, your committee feels that the need to subsidize this scheme has passed. This view is based upon evidence that very few individuals in the low-income group have been using its facilities, and at present the greatest amount of business transacted by the fund comes from business organizations who wish to provide pensions for their staffs. As a result of quite an extensive study of this subject it was disclosed that since the inception of this scheme the sale of government annuities has created a very substantial loss for the Government. We feel that if there is justification for the Government being in this business, there is none for continuing it at a substantial annual loss. Your committee, therefore, urges that the Government reassess the situation to determine whether or not it should continue this practice, and that if it is desirable to do so the table of rates for future annuities be revised to provide a revenue sufficient to maintain the fund, including the cost of administration, on a self-supporting basis.

Land Procurement:

It would seem from our inquiry into this phase of government activities that there is a lack of co-ordinated effort in this field. At present many departments purchase real estate for their own requirements. Honourable senators will agree with me, I am sure, that this is a field which calls for special skills and training. Further, if each and every department is performing this service it must inevitably lead to duplication in administration. Another apparent deficiency is the lack of skilled personnel. The approach in the past on the part of some negotiators has not led to the best relations between the Government and the owners concerned. This cannot but make settlements more difficult than necessary, and it often leads to prolonged litigation. Expropriation of property by the Government in a free enterprise system, while necessary, is drastic and should be avoided wherever possible.

For this and other reasons we submit a recommendation in order that improved policies may be implemented through a straightening out and tightening up of the mechanics of the operation. We regret that time did not permit an inquiry into the procedures used for the acquisition of property by the Departments of Transport and National Defence, which have statutory authority in this matter.

Rented Accommodation:

It is well known to everyone that the Government rents a considerable portion of its accommodation right across the country. In some instances this policy may be more economical than outright ownership of the buildings, but it was felt that in many areas it would be more profitable to own than to rent. Your committee holds that a very close scrutiny should be made of the rental situation in all areas where there is a concentration of government services, and that, where 100 per cent occupancy is assured for government requirements, a policy of building or buying instead of renting accommodation should be followed. There are many reasons for this, the principal one being full occupancy, and the lower interest rates prevailing for government-financed requirements than for those of civilian activities.

National Accounting:

There was considerable discussion on this matter and it was felt by several members of the committee that instead of the costs of capital works, such as construction of new buildings, being charged in full to the year in which they are incurred, they should be set up as a capital asset, and subsequently depreciated, as is the case in commercial and industrial practice. That is, the statement of assets and liabilities should be so set out as to disclose the amount of the net debt. The present policy has been followed since 1920. In the budget speech of May 18, 1920, the following explanation was given by the then Minister of Finance:

> Assets which are not readily convertible as the specie is convertible, or are not interest-producing, are not such assets as ought to be deducted from the gross debts. They are items of such a character as might well be placed in a suspense account. At any rate, whatever may be their future value, whatever that may be, they are not assets of such a character as to directly reduce the gross debt any more than the other capital accounts of the country ought to be deducted from it.

As I have already said, there was some discussion on this, and evidence was given by the Honourable Mr. Harris, the present Minister of Finance, who stated that in his opinion the system at present used is the better one. Your committee felt that a further study of this problem would be necessary before any definite recommendation was made.

Inflation and Export Markets:

This is a large subject, and the realization of its magnitude leads us to recommend further study. Indeed, as chairman I have nothing to add to the recommendation of the committee, but, as a member of this house, I wish to express my personal views, which may or may not coincide with those of others who have worked with me on this report.

Speaking as one who comes from a part of Canada where export markets are vital to our very existence, the continuing inflationary trend leads me to view with alarm the effect of increased production costs on our ability to compete in foreign markets. More than 90 per cent of our exports are products of the forest, the farm, the mine and the sea, and if we are to have continuing outlets for our surplus production in this field it is vital that our costs be kept in a competitive position in world markets.

I want to make a passing reference to the real basis of Canada's wealth—her primary industries. It is not possible to do so without having consideration for the fact that more than 90 per cent of our export markets are for the products of the forest, the farm, the mine and the sea.

Immediately two further considerations arise. One, the necessity for maintaining export outlets for these products; and, second, the dangers which these industries may face in competitive markets abroad if they are subjected to higher production costs.

I should like to deal first with the maintenance of our export outlets and the necessity for trading whenever and wherever possible. It is said almost daily by critics that our trade picture is not what we should expect. We cannot trade with the United Kingdom because our trade position in relation to Britain is not in balance. The same situation exists as regards many other countries. It is also argued that we should not trade with the United States because too much of our trade goes to that country. This is a flimsy proposition: almost the only free market in the world is with our neighbours to the south and it is therefore valuable to us. It is true that they take a great deal of our export goods, but we, in turn, take 18 per cent of their total exports—more than four times as much as they sell to any other country.

No one will deny that our secondary industries are necessary for the development and rounding-out of our economy, but they do not add to our wealth, and in many cases they constitute a charge on our economy because they have to be supported by subsidy and high tariffs. These charges are sometimes reflected in higher costs of production for our primary industries. This should be studiously avoided. It is dangerous to increase such costs of production and place them at the ports of exit, for, as I have already said, we are dependent to the extent of 90 per cent of our export trade on our primary industries, and any tariff increases would only operate to their detriment.

We must not jeopardize our trading position in the world markets. Canada is a vast country. I come from an area located far from large consuming centres. For us the most important thing is the maintenance of traditional markets and the retention of our export outlets for primary goods. We are not greatly disturbed over the theory that Canadians have become hewers of wood and drawers of water. In fact, in the Maritimes, where the early pioneers persevered to establish a civilization in this country, we are proud of our record and feel that we have done much toward building national character. As hewers of wood and drawers of water we have not been doing badly, and we find that the most recent figures show an increase in our gross national product far in excess of any reached in our history.

Just a further word about our secondary industries and their relation to our primary industries. It is in the nature of world trade that we should export the products which we produce most efficiently. There is no use attempting to export a product which is built here under handicaps. Trade is built on the fact that every nation exports the things it can best produce. That is the basis of our trade. In general, secondary industry is able to supply the Canadian market. It is true that some secondary producers in this country are finding difficulty in competition. In most cases, however, this is not due, as is popularly believed, to the fact that Europeans are underselling us on the world market owing to their lower wages and longer hours. Much of this competition is found in the United States and results from the expansion of similar industries there. This is pointed up by our almost insignificant imports from Europe of the type of goods produced by those secondary industries which find themselves in trouble and have to cut back or re-assess their production capacities. The only way to achieve a proper solution to this problem is through natural means. If the Government was to adopt such drastic measures as doubling tariffs there would be no improvement in the particular industry concerned. On the contrary, it would be a sick industry which we would have to support in perpetuity. The natural consequence flowing from that would be to increase the cost of production of our primary industries upon which we rely almost entirely for our existence. By letting the law of supply and demand have its own way we shall maintain the greatest possible efficiency in Canadian industry.

Before I conclude my remarks I wish to express my appreciation to the members of both the full committee and the steering committee for the wonderful co-operation and assistance I received from them, and pay a tribute to the diligent and concentrated effort they gave to their assignment. Also, I wish to say how much we owe the Committees Branch for assistance and guidance, and I would draw your attention to our good fortune in having such a competent group to serve us.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable members, the Senate always finds it exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to deal with the estimates in detail when they come to us from the House of Commons late in the session. This year they probably will not be at our disposal for another two or three weeks, and then we shall be expected to rush through them in a short time. This practice does not give us sufficient opportunity to study the estimates, and it was for this very reason that a few years ago the late Senator King suggested we should refer them to the Finance Committee during the course of the session. This procedure has been followed and has proved highly successful.

An editorial appearing today in one of Ottawa's newspapers criticizes certain aspects of this report, which was submitted to the house last week. As far as I am aware the annual report of the Finance Committee has never set out either to praise or criticize the Government for the manner in which it has conducted its business. That has never been a purpose of the committee, which merely tries to gather and present facts as to Government spending, and so on. For one thing, we try to get figures on the gross national product, and this year our report contains a definition of this term. Our gross national product is the total value at market prices of the goods and services produced by Canadians in a year. Our report also discloses Canada's gross national expenditure, and we try to show how the Government spends certain moneys. While each member of the committee may have his own opinion about this, it is not our purpose to criticize Government action. We merely want to present the facts and show what the Government does with the taxpayer's dollar. I am sure the people of Canada are always desirous of having the fundamental facts at their disposal, for these enable them to determine what would happen if certain proposals were put into effect. For instance, suppose we should have a general election and three or four parties offered candidates. The people know what the policy of the Government is, because of the legislation it has introduced, and they can find out about Conservative, C.C.F. and Social Credit policies through articles and speeches. Then, having before them the facts and figures on Canada's existing financial situation, they can come to some reasonable conclusions as to what to expect should any of these parties go into power. We hope that every person over ten years of age who reads our report will be able to base opinions on it.

We are not proposing a lot of new ways for Government departments to spend money. In 1952 we did suggest that the construction and maintenance of all Government buildings should come under one department. Today the Department of Public Works looks after the maintenance and construction of all Government buildings except those of two departments. This session we have made several other suggestions that should help to create greater efficiency. I want to emphasize, however, that we do not criticize or commend Government policies.

The honourable member from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) and I have served faithfully on this committee for years and we have always been anxious that the press should be able to depend on the accuracy of our committee's report. In Winnipeg the Free Press and the Tribune have regularly published the report and have never disputed its accuracy. It is on this basis that I would like the whole of Canada to accept the report. I have long been a great admirer of the honourable gentleman from Churchill. He is a native of my province and I have known him for some forty years. He may not be one of Canada's outstanding businessmen, but he has a lot of common sense. When the honourable gentleman said this year that he should not be reappointed as chairman of the committee, I looked right at the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and said to myself, "Mr. Leader, you are on the spot." Then he produced the honourable gentleman from Milford-Hants (Hon. Mr. Hawkins), and much to my surprise and delight he became a worthy successor to the former chairman.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: On every subject discussed by the committee the chief financial representative from the Department of Finance was called. This gentleman is so good that the benighted province on the Pacific coast called him there to help it out. We are losing a really good civil servant, but our loss will be British Columbia's gain. He not only gave us valuable information, but he told us how to look for facts and where to find them.

If I may say so, I think that witnesses called before the committee this year were a little more outspoken than in former years. Even the Government, which I sometimes say is over-apprehensive, realizes that our committee is not out to gun it, or to get it on political grounds, but is simply trying to procure facts for presentation to the public. The Government now seems to be quite willing to have its officials come and give us full information on which to found our opinions.

I do not want to discuss all the matters that came before the committee, but I would like to say a word or two about government annuities. Canada as a whole has been very favourable to government annuities. In 1908, when the then minister introduced them, they were a new thing in this country. Since then the life insurance companies have gradually adopted annuity plans. The government scheme is a very fine one, but it has two faults. First, the Government calculated that the money would earn 4 per cent, but that has proved a little too high. Our interest rates gradually went down. Bond rates have been about 3 per cent for some years, and therefore it has been difficult to earn 4 per cent on annuity premiums. Secondly, the death rate changed. Forty years ago a man or woman of 60 years of age probably had a life expectancy of 10 years, but the life expectancy of such a person now is perhaps 20 years. In other words, the average annuitant has to be paid for 10 years longer than the old mortality table indicated. The result is that the Annuities Branch has had to be subsidized to the extent of $31 million to meet the losses incurred. In addition, aside from any new contracts at all, $40 million will have to be put up to pay the cost of management and take care of the loss on existing contracts. The committee heard the evidence of very competent persons, and from what they said I cannot see any way of avoiding a very large loss. The Minister of Labour, who is in charge of this branch, frankly admitted all these facts. I was greatly impressed by the straightforward way in which he gave his evidence.

Honourable senators, our committee recommends one of two courses of action: either wind up the business as far as that can be done, or if it is to be carried on let new contracts be put on a self-sustained basis, in the same way as is done by the life insurance companies, and make some arrangement about catching up with the arrears. For some years since 1908, when government annuities were first sold, it was the labouring people and others of small means who bought annuities. Gradually that custom changed.

May I make a personal reference? In 1931 I came to Ottawa and saw the then Prime Minister about a young lawyer in one of the rural parts of Manitoba who was having a hard time making things go. I had known him and his family for a long time, and I thought a lot of the young fellow. I asked the Prime Minister if it would be possible to put him in the Annuities Branch to sell annuities. He said, "Well, Mr. Haig, we could guarantee him only $125 a month for the first six months, and then he would have to depend on commissions." I pointed out that the young man was a pretty good salesman. Well, he was taken on, and the first year he made $5,000, the next year $15,000. Then the rate of commission was reduced. He so impressed the third largest life insurance company in Canada that it made him its supervisor for the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: How much did he lose for the country?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, quite a bit. However, he complied with the law, and he did a lot of business.

About the year 1931 or 1932 well-to-do people started to buy annuities. I recall that one could buy up to $5,000 or $6,000 then.

Hon. Mr. Euler: $5,000.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Very well, $5,000. A friend of mine, a broker, whose only dependent was his wife, said to me one day, "I have bought an annuity for $5,000 a year, which I will start receiving when I reach 60 years of age, and my wife will receive the same amount after I die.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Do you mean $5,000 a year?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes, $5,000 a year. I believe the man is dead now, but his wife is still living. We are paying that annuity today on the basis of 4 per cent money, and the woman is well past her life expectancy under the old mortality table.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The rates are changed now.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes, but the old contracts are not affected.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The annuity is a contract, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes, all these annuities are under contract. I am a bit of a saver myself sometimes. I bought an annuity for each one of my children, for the small amount of $300 a year when they reach the age of 60. That was all I could afford when I bought the annuities in 1917 or 1918, and I am paying quite low premiums for them. Last evening a member of the House of Commons told me how he had provided for his family by means of annuities. They are a mighty good investment. The difficulty is that the government annuities were based on earnings of 4 per cent, but for years bonds did not earn that much. Life insurance companies have had the same trouble.

Honourable senators, we have got to bring annuities in line with what they actually cost. That is the fair thing to do. If we were dealing with old age pensions it would be a different matter. But the Government is selling annuities in competition with insurance companies. If it is to continue to offer annuities for sale, it should do so on a strictly business basis and the purchasers should pay the full cost of them. In those circumstances if the people still want to buy annuities from the Government instead of from private companies, I would have no objection.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I interrupt my friend? I do not have the report before me, but did the committee not ascertain the amount of loss suffered at the present rate?

Hon. Mr. Haig: No. But the Minister told us that to continue the present policy of the Annuities Branch with respect to existing contracts would cost about $40 million.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is over a long period of time.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is to finish out the contracts.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Until all present annuitants die.

Hon. Mr. Haig: It will cost that much to carry the existing contracts to maturity.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That would include annuities of up to $5,000 a year?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes. I am not critizing the Government for what was done then. We cannot avoid that loss, but we should not let it happen again. If it is the wish of the people that the Annuities Branch be wound up, we will not quarrel with them; but if it is going to be continued, it should be operated on a straight business basis.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Opposition a question? When he refers to losses, suffered over a long period, is he taking into account the change in the dollar value? For instance, I bought an annuity many years ago for which I paid money that had a high purchasing value, and that annuity is now being repaid in money with a low purchasing value. Is any consideration given to the fact that annuities may be bought with heavy money and repaid with light money?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: That is true of all life insurance.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is of course true of all life insurance, but is it taken into consideration when a mathematical calculation of losses is made?

Hon. Mr. Haig: My fellow members on the committee will support me when I say we did not make any calculations with respect to losses. We asked the minister to give us the figures, and after consulting with his staff, he told us that the cost of subsidizing the fund, not including administration costs, was $31 million; he later told us that it would cost about $40 million to carry the present contracts to maturity.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is just the money cost?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes. The question of changes in the buying power of money can be applied to almost any commodity.

Honourable senators, before concluding my remarks I should like to refer to an editorial which appeared in this afternoon's Ottawa Journal. That editorial, which I believe was written under a misapprehension, suggested that the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) would have done a better job than that done by the present chairman of the committee (Hon. Mr. Hawkins). May I say that I sat on the committee under the chairmanship of both these honourable gentlemen, and I regard them as equally competent; I have complete confidence in both. I know that when the present chairman met with the steering committee he was very careful to place all the facts before us, and it was up to the committee to decide who should be heard and what should go into the report.

I recall one occasion in the steering committee when, after we had heard from several senators, I started to express my views, and the senator from Churchill remarked "Now we will hear from the Government". I said "I am not here to protect the Government, but to see that our report truthfully states the information as we find it, not what somebody thinks it should be".

May I say that the committee received every assistance from the Minister of Finance and his officials; in fact, he went out of his way to facilitate us in getting the information we required. His co-operation was very much appreciated.

Finally, may I emphasize that the report now before the house can be taken by honourable senators as containing the facts as we found them. Whether my honourable friends will agree with its recommendations is a different matter. There are two points which time did not permit the committee to consider this session, but which it is intended should be studied next year. We felt that it was perhaps better to concentrate our efforts this year on a few things, and leave certain other questions for future study.

With those words, honourable senators, I take great pleasure in supporting the report.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, my remarks will be very brief. In the first place, I should like to support what the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) has said with regard to the work of the chairman of the Finance Committee. As all senators know, I have a very high regard for my desk-mate (Hon. Mr. Crerar); at the same time I do not think the Leader of the Government need have any regret in having nominated the senator from Milford-Hants (Hon. Mr. Hawkins) as chairman. In my view, he has done a fine job.

I rise to make one or two remarks with regard to government annuities. I can remember well when one could obtain annuities for $5,000. It was the Conservative Government under Mr. Bennett that reduced the amount to $1,200. As a member of the Commons at that time, I supported Mr. Bennett in that move because I felt that while perhaps it was all right for the Government to help people with modest incomes by making available to them annuities of $1,200, persons who were in a position to buy annuities of $5,000 were not in need of financial help from the Government.

It was about twenty years ago that annuities of $1,200 were made available to the public. The Government was still losing money at that rate, largely, I think, because of the fact that it paid the administration costs. However, the system had some problems that perhaps went a little deeper than the administration costs. It was heavily in arrears at that time, and although amounts have been voted from year to year to try to wipe out that deficit, I believe some still exists.

As my honourable friend has said, the committee could choose to recommend either that the annuity premiums be increased to make the system carry itself, or that the Government go out of the business altogether. I was wondering what method my friend had in mind for getting the Government out of this business. I assume he did not think that it should close out existing contracts. Perhaps I have a little more than a casual interest in this subject because of my association with an insurance company which sells annuities, and the insurance companies generally do not like the Government to be in competition with them. I am not going to say anything along that line. However, I would like to know what my honourable friend thinks about the Government getting out of the annuity business altogether. Some of these annuities will run for many years. Are you going to suggest the keeping up of the establishment just for the purpose of administering existing contracts and not for taking on any additional contracts? I suppose that would be your thought?

Hon. Mr. Haig: The committee did not discuss that point at all, and I would not have been in favour of discussing it, because I thought that we were going far enough into this whole matter on our first attempt. I have my own personal opinion as to what should be done, but I am not going to state it.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I will state one fact as a matter of information, although I do not know if it is in the interest of the Government that I should do so. As I said before, originally a person could contract for an annuity payment of $5,000 a year, if he paid in sufficient money. That contract can still be had by those who started paying premiums but did not contract for the full $5,000. For instance, a person who took out an annuity for $1,200 at a time when he could have taken out one for $5,000, can still have it brought up to the full $5,000 at the old rates.

Hon. Mr. Haig: If he still has a policy in existence.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Perhaps I should not have disclosed that, because some of the earlier annuitants may now apply for additional annuities up to the total of $5,000. I do not know how an application from such a person could be refused, because there is a contract.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Let me answer my honourable friend, if I have the permission of the house.

Hon. Senators: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That information was given by the department in reply to a question that I asked. We were told that if a policy was issued and as much as $10 was paid on it, an annuity up to $5,000 could be taken out at the present time.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I should be sorry if the discussion on this very valuable report went off on one of its very minor features, one of the small recommendations at the end of it, in connection with this question of government annuities.

We have heard from the Chairman of the Finance Committee, and we have heard from the Leader of the Opposition, who is and has at all times been a very active and energetic member of that committee, and I think now perhaps it is time for somebody who is not a member of the committee to express on behalf of other honourable senators a few words of thanks and admiration to the committee for a most valuable and informative report.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: During the week-end I read over this report a couple of times. The chairman mentioned that the committee took great care to use non-technical terms. That I think is a perfectly true statement. Certainly in my own case I must admit that for the first time I got at least moderately clear in my own mind just what the terms "national income", "gross national product" and "gross national expenditure", respectively, mean.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: We are constantly hearing these terms, particularly in connection with reports which we receive from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, and I think it is an excellent thing for a short, concise and easily understandable report of this kind to go out from the Senate telling the people of the country just what these terms mean.

The report raises a number of points which are worthy of consideration, and indeed not only the report itself but some of the financial tables and schedules appended to it are themselves full of invaluable information. One sentence which appears in the report struck me as being very significant, as bringing to a head and explaining to the people of the country just what is the present incidence of their taxation as compared with the revenue which they have at their disposal to meet that taxation and to use for their ordinary expenditures.

At page 754 of our Senate Hansard I read:

> That mythical figure, the average Canadian, (man, woman and child) after paying 31 cents in taxes out of every dollar of income, has about $920 per annum left today compared with the $300 per annum left in 1939 after payment of similar taxes. After making allowance for price increases, real income per capita after payment of all taxes has risen almost 50 per cent between 1939 and 1955.

Well, that crystallizes in one sentence just what has been happening in this country over the last 15 years. It tells us that despite the increase in taxes our country is developing at such a rate and becoming so much wealthier that regardless of the increase in taxes over that period the average man and woman in this country has 50 per cent more money to spend on the necessaries and conveniences of life than he or she had 15 years ago. That part of the report which gives a picture of the financial position, and the way our money is collected and spent, is, I think, most invaluable; I do trust that it will be widely circulated and will receive as much publicity in the press of this country as have previous reports by the same committee when it was under the chairmanship of the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar).

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Would my honourable friend permit me to ask him a question? Does he not think it would be well, if his suggestion be carried out, that the drop in value of the money be expressed at the same time, so as to reflect the purchasing power of the dollar today?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That is exactly what is stated in this paragraph. Let me read it again:

> After making allowance for price increases, real income per capita after payment of all taxes has risen almost 50 per cent between 1939 and 1955.

That states the position as clearly as anybody could do; and I am quite sure that my honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) can understand it as well as I can.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I cannot understand it as clearly as the honourable gentleman himself has stated it, as distinguished from the report.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I suggest that my honourable friend from Victoria make it the subject of profound cogitation!

I have nothing further to say on this report; but I felt that it was only right and proper that a member of the house who is not a member of the Finance Committee should congratulate the chairman and the members of the committee upon this most cogent and excellent report which they have submitted for our consideration.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Croll, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

APPENDIX

(See p. 789)

International Wheat Agreement, 1956, and list of countries which have signed the agreement.

Note: The following is the text of the International Wheat Agreement which was adopted at the United Nations Wheat Conference which concluded on 25 April 1956. In accordance with a resolution of the Conference, the text is forwarded to all Governments invited to the Conference for their consideration. The Conference requested the Government of the United States to arrange for the agreement to be open for signature in Washington until and including 18 May 1956.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT, 1956

The Governments signatory to this Agreement,

Considering that the International Wheat Agreement which was opened for signature at Washington on 23 March 1949 was entered into in order to overcome the serious hardship caused to producers and consumers by burdensome surpluses and critical shortages of wheat, and

Considering that the 1949 Agreement was revised and renewed at Washington on 13 April 1953, and

Considering that it is desirable that the International Wheat Agreement be again renewed, with certain modifications, for a further period, and

Having decided to conclude for that purpose this Agreement revising and renewing the International Wheat Agreement,

Have agreed as follows:

PART I—GENERAL

ARTICLE I

Objectives

The objectives of this Agreement are to assure supplies of wheat to importing countries and markets for wheat to exporting countries at equitable and stable prices.

ARTICLE II

Definitions

1. For the purposes of this Agreement:

"Advisory Committee on Price Equivalents" means the Committee established under Article XV.

"Bushel" means 60 pounds avoirdupois or 27·2155 . . . kilogrammes.

"Carrying charges" means the costs incurred for storage, interest and insurance in holding wheat.

"C. and f." means cost and freight.

"Council" means the International Wheat Council established by Article XIII.

"Crop-year" means the period from 1 August to 31 July, except that in Article VII it means in respect of Argentina and Australia the period from 1 December to 30 November, and in respect of the United States of America the period from 1 July to 30 June.

"Executive Committee" means the Committee established under Article XIV.

"Exporting country" means, as the context requires, either (i) the Government of a country listed in Annex B to Article III which has accepted or acceded to this Agreement and has not withdrawn therefrom, or (ii) that country itself and the territories in respect of which the rights and obligations of its Government under this Agreement apply.

"F.a.q." means fair average quality.

"F.o.b." means free on board ocean vessel and, in the case of

(i) French wheat delivered at a Rhine port, free on board river craft,

(ii) Swedish wheat, free on board seagoing vessel.

"Guaranteed quantity" means in relation to an importing country its guaranteed purchases for a crop-year and in relation to an exporting country its guaranteed sales for a crop-year.

"Importing country" means, as the context requires, either (i) the Government of a country listed in Annex A to Article III which has accepted or acceded to this Agreement and has not withdrawn therefrom, or (ii) that country itself and the territories in respect of which the rights and obligations of its Government under this Agreement apply.

"Marketing costs" means all usual charges incurred in marketing, chartering, and forwarding.

"Metric ton", or 1,000 kilograms, means 36·74371 bushels.

"Old crop wheat" means wheat harvested more than two months prior to the beginning of the current crop-year of the exporting country concerned.

"Territory" in relation to an exporting or importing country includes any territory in respect of which the rights and obligations under this Agreement of the Government of that country apply under Article XXIII.

"Transaction" means a sale for import into an importing country of wheat exported or to be exported from an exporting country, or the quantity of such wheat so sold, as the context requires. Where reference is made in this Agreement to a transaction between an exporting country and an importing country, it shall be understood to refer not only to transactions between the Government of an exporting country and the Government of an importing country but also to transactions between private traders and to transactions between a private trader and the Government of an exporting or an importing country. In this definition "Government" shall be deemed to include the Government of any territory in respect of which the rights and obligations of any Government accepting or acceding to this Agreement apply under Article XXIII.

"Unfulfilled guaranteed quantity" means, in the case of an exporting country, the difference between the quantities entered in the Council's records in accordance with Article IV in respect of that country for a crop-year and its guaranteed sales for that crop-year and, in the case of an importing country, the difference between the quantities entered in the Council's records in accordance with Article IV in respect of that country for a crop-year and that portion of its guaranteed purchases for that crop-year which it is, at the relevant time, entitled to purchase having regard to paragraph 9 of Article III.

"Wheat" includes wheat grain and, except in Article VI, wheat-flour.

2. (a) All calculations of the wheat equivalent of guaranteed purchases or guaranteed sales of wheat-flour shall be made on the basis of the rate of extraction specified in the contract between the buyer and the seller.

(b) If no such rate is specified, seventy-two units by weight of wheat-flour shall for the purpose of such calculations be deemed to be equivalent to one hundred units by weight of wheat grain unless the Council decides otherwise.

PART 2—RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS

ARTICLE III

Guaranteed Purchases and Guaranteed Sales

1. The quantities of wheat set out in Annex A to this Article for each importing country represent, subject to any increase or reduction made in accordance with the provisions of Part 3 of this Agreement, the guaranteed purchases of that country for each of the crop-years covered by this Agreement.

2. The quantities of wheat set out in Annex B to this Article for each exporting country represent, subject to any increase or reduction made in accordance with the provisions of Part 3 of this Agreement, the guaranteed sales of that country for each of the crop-years covered by this Agreement.

3. The guaranteed purchases of an importing country represent the maximum quantity of wheat which, subject to deduction of the amount of the transactions entered in the Council's records in accordance with Article IV against those guaranteed purchases,

(a) that importing country may be required by the Council, as provided in Article V, to purchase from the exporting countries at prices consistent with the minimum prices specified in or determined under Article VI, or

(b) the exporting countries may be required by the Council, as provided in Article V, to sell to that importing country at prices consistent with the maximum prices specified in or determined under Article VI.

4. The guaranteed sales of an exporting country represent the maximum quantity of wheat which, subject to deduction of the amount of the transactions entered in the Council's records in accordance with Article IV against those guaranteed sales,

(a) that exporting country may be required by the Council, as provided in Article V, to sell to the importing countries at prices consistent with the maximum prices specified in or determined under Article VI, or

(b) the importing countries may be required by the Council, as provided in Article V, to purchase from that exporting country at prices consistent with the minimum prices specified in or determined under Article VI.

5. If an importing country finds difficulty in exercising its right to purchase its unfulfilled guaranteed quantity at prices consistent with the maximum prices specified in or determined under Article VI or an exporting country finds difficulty in exercising its right to sell its unfulfilled guaranteed quantity at prices consistent with the minimum prices so specified or determined, it may have resort to the procedure in Article V.

6. Exporting countries are under no obligation to sell any wheat under this Agreement unless required to do so as provided in Article V at prices consistent with the maximum prices specified in or determined under Article VI. Importing countries are under no obligation to purchase any wheat under this Agreement unless required to do so as provided in Article V at prices consistent with the minimum prices specified in or determined under Article VI.

7. The quantity, if any, of wheat-flour to be supplied by the exporting country and accepted by the importing country against their respective guaranteed quantities shall, subject to the provisions of Article V, be determined by agreement between the buyer and seller in each transaction.

8. Exporting and importing countries shall be free to fulfil their guaranteed quantities through private trade channels or otherwise.

67513—51

Nothing in this Agreement shall be construed to exempt any private trader from any laws or regulations to which he is otherwise subject.

9. The Council may, at its discretion, require that no importing country shall purchase and no exporting country shall sell under this Agreement more than 90 per cent of its guaranteed quantity for any crop-year before 28 February of that crop-year.

ARTICLE IV

Recording of Transactions against Guaranteed Quantities

1. The Council shall keep records for each crop-year of those transactions and parts of transactions in wheat which are part of the guaranteed quantities in Annexes A and B to Article III.

2. A transaction or part of a transaction in wheat grain between an exporting country and an importing country shall be entered in the Council's records against the guaranteed quantities of those countries for a crop-year:

(a) provided that (i) it is at a price not higher than the maximum nor lower than the minimum specified in or determined under Article VI, and (ii) the exporting country and the importing country have not agreed that it shall not be entered against their guaranteed quantities; and

(b) to the extent that (i) both the exporting and the importing country concerned have unfulfilled guaranteed quantities for that crop-year, and (ii) the loading period specified in the transaction falls within that crop-year.

3. A transaction or part of a transaction for the purchase and sale of wheat shall be eligible for entry in the Council's records against the guaranteed quantities of the exporting and importing countries concerned on the conditions specified in this Article, notwithstanding that the transaction has been entered into before the deposit of its instrument of acceptance of this Agreement by either or both of those countries.

4. If a commercial contract or governmental agreement on the sale and purchase of wheat-flour contains a statement, or if the exporting country and the importing country concerned inform the Council that they are agreed, that the price of such wheat-flour is consistent with the prices specified in or determined under Article VI, the wheat grain equivalent of such wheat-flour shall, subject to the conditions prescribed in (a) (ii) and (b) of paragraph 2 of this Article, be entered in the Council's records against the guaranteed quantities of those countries. If the commercial contract or governmental agreement does not contain a statement of the nature referred to above and the exporting country and the importing country concerned do not agree that the price of the wheat-flour is consistent with the prices specified in or determined under Article VI, either of those countries may, unless they have agreed that the wheat grain equivalent of that wheat-flour shall not be entered in the Council's records against their guaranteed quantities, request the Council to decide the issue. Should the Council, on consideration of such a request, decide that the price of such wheat-flour is consistent with the prices specified in or determined under Article VI, the wheat grain equivalent of the wheat-flour shall be entered against the guaranteed quantities of the exporting and importing countries concerned, subject to the conditions prescribed in (b) of paragraph 2 of this Article. Should the Council, on consideration of such a request, decide that the price of such wheat-flour is inconsistent with the prices specified in or determined under Article VI, the wheat grain equivalent of the wheat-flour shall not be so entered.

5. Provided that the conditions prescribed in paragraph 2 or 4 of this Article, other than that in (b) (ii) of paragraph 2, are satisfied, the Council may authorize transactions to be recorded against guaranteed quantities for a crop-year if (a) the loading period specified in the transaction is within a reasonable time up to one month, to be decided by the Council, before the beginning or after the end of that crop-year, and (b) the exporting and importing country concerned so agree.

6. For the period of closed navigation between Fort William/Port Arthur and the Canadian Atlantic ports, a transaction or part of a transaction shall, notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 4 of Article VI, be eligible for entry in the Council's records against the guaranteed quantity of the exporting country and the importing country concerned if it relates to

(a) Canadian wheat which is moved by an all-rail route from Fort William/Port Arthur to Canadian Atlantic ports, or

(b) United States wheat which, except for conditions beyond the control of the buyer and the seller, would be moved by lake and rail to United States Atlantic ports and which, because it cannot be so moved, is moved by an all-rail route to United States Atlantic ports, provided that payment of the extra transportation cost thereby incurred is agreed between the buyer and the seller.

7. The Council shall prescribe rules of procedure, in accordance with the following provisions, for the reporting and recording of transactions which are part of the guaranteed quantities:

(a) Any transaction or part of a transaction, between an exporting country and an importing country, qualifying under paragraph 2, 3 or 4 of this Article to form part of the guaranteed quantities of those countries shall be reported to the Council within such period and in such detail and by one or both of those countries as the Council shall lay down in its rules of procedure.

(b) Any transaction or part of a transaction reported in accordance with the provisions of sub-paragraph (a) shall be entered in the Council's records against the guaranteed quantities of the exporting country and the importing country between which the transaction is made.

(c) The order in which transactions and parts of transactions shall be entered in the Council's records against the guaranteed quantities shall be prescribed by the Council in its rules of procedure.

(d) The Council shall, within a time to be prescribed in its rules of procedure, notify each exporting country and each importing country of the entry of any transaction or part of a transaction in the Council's records against their guaranteed quantities.

(e) If, within a period which the Council shall prescribe in its rules of procedure, the importing country or the exporting country concerned objects in any respect to the entry of a transaction or part of a transaction in the Council's records against its guaranteed quantity, the Council shall review the matter and, if it decides that the objection is well founded, shall amend its records accordingly.

(f) If any exporting or importing country considers it probable that the full amount of wheat already entered in the Council's records against its guaranteed quantity for the current crop-year will not be loaded within that crop-year, that country may request the Council to make appropriate reductions in the amounts entered in its records. The Council shall consider the matter and, if it decides that the request is justified, shall amend its records accordingly.

(g) Any wheat purchased by an importing country from an exporting country and resold to another importing country may, by agreement of the importing countries concerned, be entered against the unfulfilled guaranteed purchases of the importing country to which the wheat is finally resold, provided that a corresponding reduction is made in the amount entered against the guaranteed purchases of the first importing country.

(h) The Council shall send to all exporting and importing countries weekly, or at such other interval as the Council may prescribe in its rules of procedure, a statement of the amounts entered in its records against guaranteed quantities.

(i) The Council shall notify all exporting and importing countries immediately when the guaranteed quantity of any exporting or importing country for any crop-year has been fulfilled.

8. Each exporting country and each importing country may be permitted, in the fulfilment of its guaranteed quantity, a degree of tolerance to be prescribed by the Council for that country on the basis of its guaranteed quantity and other relevant factors.

ARTICLE V

Enforcement of Rights

1. (a) Any importing country which finds difficulty in purchasing its unfulfilled guaranteed quantity for any crop-year at prices consistent with the maximum prices specified in or determined under Article VI may request the Council's help in making the desired purchases.

(b) Within three days of the receipt of a request under subparagraph (a) the Secretary of the Council shall notify those exporting countries which have unfulfilled guaranteed quantities for the relevant crop-year of the amount of the unfulfilled guaranteed quantity of the importing country which has requested the Council's help and invite them to offer to sell wheat at prices consistent with the maximum prices specified in or determined under Article VI.

(c) If within twenty days of the notification by the Secretary of the Council under subparagraph (b) the whole of the unfulfilled guaranteed quantity of the importing country concerned, or such part thereof as in the opinion of the Council is reasonable at the time the request is made, has not been offered for sale, the Council shall as soon as possible decide:

(i) the quantities
and also, if requested,
(ii) the quality and grade
of wheat grain and/or wheat-flour which each or any of the exporting countries is required to offer to sell to that importing country for loading during the relevant crop-year or within such time thereafter, not exceeding one month, as the Council may decide.

The Council shall decide on (i) and (ii) above after receiving an assurance, if requested, that the wheat grain or wheat-flour is to be used for consumption in the importing country or for normal or traditional trade; and in reaching its decision the Council shall also take into account any circumstances which the exporting and the importing countries may submit, including:

(iii) the normal traditional volume and ratio of imports of wheat-flour and wheat grain and the quality and grade of wheat-flour and wheat grain imported by the importing country, and

(iv) the proportion of each exporting country's guaranteed quantity already sold at the time the request is made.

(d) Each exporting country required by the Council's decision under subparagraph (c) to offer quantities of wheat grain and/or wheat-flour for sale to the importing country shall, within thirty days from the date of that decision, offer to sell those quantities to such importing country for loading during the period provided under subparagraph (c) at prices consistent with the maximum prices specified in or determined under Article VI and, unless those countries agree otherwise, on the same conditions regarding the currency in which payment is to be made as prevail generally between them at that time.

(e) In case of disagreement between an exporting country and an importing country on the allowance for difference in quality to be made in the price of wheat or on the quantity or price of wheat-flour to be included in a particular transaction being negotiated in compliance with the Council's decision under subparagraph (c), or on the relation of the price of such wheat-flour to the maximum prices of wheat grain specified in or determined under Article VI, or on the conditions on which the wheat grain and/or wheat-flour shall be bought and sold, the matter shall be referred to the Council for decision.

2. (a) Any exporting country which finds difficulty in selling its unfulfilled guaranteed quantity for any crop-year at prices consistent with the minimum prices specified in or determined under Article VI may request the Council's help in making the desired sales.

(b) Within three days of the receipt of a request under subparagraph (a) the Secretary of the Council shall notify those importing countries which have unfulfilled guaranteed quantities for the relevant crop-year of the amount of the unfulfilled guaranteed quantity of the exporting country which has requested the Council's help and invite them to offer to purchase wheat at prices consistent with the minimum prices specified in or determined under Article VI.

(c) If within twenty days of the notification by the Secretary of the Council under subparagraph (b) the whole of the unfulfilled guaranteed quantity of the exporting country concerned, or such part thereof as in the opinion of the Council is reasonable at the time the request is made, has not been purchased, the Council shall as soon as possible decide:

(i) the quantities
and also, if requested,
(ii) the quality and grade
of wheat grain and/or wheat-flour which each or any of the importing countries is required to offer to purchase from that exporting country for loading during the relevant crop-year or within such time thereafter, not exceeding one month, as the Council may decide.

In reaching its decision on (i) and (ii) above, the Council shall take into account any circumstances which the exporting and the importing countries may submit, including in the case of each importing country:

(iii) the normal traditional volume and ratio of its imports of wheat-flour and wheat grain and the quality and grade of wheat-flour and wheat grain imported, and
(iv) the proportion of its guaranteed quantity already purchased at the time the request is made.

(d) Each importing country required by the Council's decision under subparagraph (c) to offer to purchase quantities of wheat grain and/or wheat-flour from the exporting country shall, within thirty days from the date of that decision, offer to purchase those quantities from such exporting country for loading during the period provided under subparagraph (c) at prices consistent with the minimum prices specified in or determined under Article VI and, unless those countries agree otherwise, on the same conditions regarding the currency in which payment is to be made as prevail generally between them at that time.

(e) In case of disagreement between an exporting country and an importing country on the allowance for difference in quality to be made in the price of wheat or on the quantity or price of wheat-flour to be included in a particular transaction being negotiated in compliance with the Council's decision under subparagraph (c), or on the relation of the price of such wheat-flour to the minimum prices of wheat grain specified in or determined under Article VI, or on the conditions on which the wheat grain and/or wheat-flour shall be bought and sold, the matter shall be referred to the Council for decision.

3. For the purposes of this Article Port Churchill shall not be a port of shipment.

ARTICLE VI

Prices

1. (a) The basic minimum and maximum prices for the duration of this Agreement shall be:

Minimum	$1.50
Maximum	$2.00

Canadian currency per bushel at the parity for the Canadian dollar, determined for the purposes of the International Monetary Fund as at 1 March 1949, for No. 1 Manitoba Northern wheat in bulk in store Fort William/Port Arthur. The basic minimum and maximum prices, and the equivalents thereof hereafter referred to, shall exclude such carrying charges and marketing costs as may be agreed between the buyer and the seller.

(b) Carrying charges as agreed between the buyer and seller may accrue for the buyer's account only after an agreed date specified in the contract under which the wheat is sold.

2. The equivalent maximum prices for bulk wheat for:

(a) No. 1 Manitoba Northern wheat in store Vancouver shall be the maximum price for No. 1 Manitoba Northern wheat in bulk in store Fort William/Port Arthur specified in paragraph 1 of this Article;

(b) No. 1 Manitoba Northern wheat f.o.b. Port Churchill, Manitoba, shall be the price equivalent to the c. and f. price in the country of destination of the maximum price for No. 1 Manitoba Northern wheat in bulk in store Fort William/Port Arthur specified in paragraph 1 of this Article, computed by using currently prevailing transportation costs and exchange rates;

(c) Argentine wheat in store ocean ports shall be the maximum price for No. 1 Manitoba Northern wheat in bulk in store Fort William/Port Arthur specified in paragraph 1 of this Article, converted into Argentine currency at the prevailing rate of exchange, making such allowance for difference in quality as may be agreed between the exporting country and the importing country concerned;

(d) f.a.q. Australian wheat in store ocean ports shall be the maximum price for No. 1 Manitoba Northern wheat in bulk in store Fort William/Port Arthur specified in paragraph 1 of this Article, converted into Australian currency at the prevailing rate of exchange, making such allowance for difference in quality as may be agreed between the exporting country and the importing country concerned;

(e) French wheat on sample or on description f.o.b. French seaports or at the French border (whichever is applicable) shall be

(i) if the country of destination has a sea coast, the c. and f. price in the country of destination of No. 1 Manitoba Northern wheat in bulk in store Fort William/Port Arthur at the maximum price specified in paragraph 1 of this Article, less the cost of transportation from the French coast to the coast of the country of destination,

(ii) if the country of destination has no sea coast, the price at the French border equal to the price determined as at (i) above in relation to a delivery of wheat at Hamburg, computed by using currently prevailing transportation costs and exchange rates and by making such allowance for difference in quality as may be agreed between the exporting country and the importing country concerned;

(f) Swedish wheat on sample or on description f.o.b. Swedish ports between Stockholm and Gothenburg, both included, shall be the price equivalent to the c. and f. price in the country of destination of the maximum price for No. 1 Manitoba Northern wheat in bulk in store Fort William/Port Arthur specified in paragraph 1 of this Article, computed by using currently prevailing transportation costs and exchange rates and by making such allowance for difference in quality as may be agreed between the exporting country and the importing country concerned;

(g) No. 1 Hard Winter wheat f.o.b. Gulf/Atlantic ports of the United States of America shall be the price equivalent to the c. and f. price in the country of destination of the maximum price for No. 1 Manitoba Northern wheat in bulk in store Fort William/Port Arthur specified in paragraph 1 of this Article, computed by using currently prevailing transportation costs and exchange rates and by making such allowance for difference in quality as may be agreed between the exporting country and the importing country concerned; and

(h) No. 1 Soft White wheat or No. 1 Hard Winter wheat in store Pacific ports of the United States of America shall be the maximum price for No. 1 Manitoba Northern wheat in bulk in store Fort William/Port Arthur specified in paragraph 1 of this Article, computed by using the prevailing rate of exchange and by making such allowance for difference in quality as may be agreed between the exporting country and the importing country concerned.

3. The equivalent minimum price for bulk wheat for:

(a) No. 1 Manitoba Northern wheat f.o.b. Vancouver,

(b) No. 1 Manitoba Northern wheat f.o.b. Port Churchill, Manitoba,

(c) Argentine wheat f.o.b. Argentina,

(d) f.a.q. wheat f.o.b. Australia,

(e) French wheat on sample or on description f.o.b. French ports,

(f) Swedish wheat on sample or on description f.o.b. Swedish ports between Stockholm and Gothenburg, both included,

(g) No. 1 Hard Winter wheat f.o.b. Gulf/Atlantic ports of the United States of America, and

(h) No. 1 Soft White wheat or No. 1 Hard Winter wheat f.o.b. Pacific ports of the United States of America, shall be respectively:

the f.o.b. prices Vancouver, Port Churchill, Argentina, Australia, France, Swedish ports between Stockholm and Gothenburg, both included, United States of America Gulf/Atlantic ports and United States of America Pacific ports equivalent to the c. and f. prices in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland of the minimum prices for No. 1 Manitoba Northern wheat in bulk in store Fort William/Port Arthur specified in paragraph 1 of this Article, computed by using currently prevailing transportation costs and exchange rates and by making such allowance for difference in quality as may be agreed between the exporting country and the importing country concerned.

4. For the period of closed navigation between Fort William/Port Arthur and the Canadian Atlantic ports, equivalent maximum and minimum prices shall be determined by reference only to the lake and rail movement of wheat from Fort William/Port Arthur to Canadian winter ports.

5. The Executive Committee may, in consultation with the Advisory Committee on Price Equivalents, determine the minimum and maximum price equivalents for wheat at points other than those specified above and may also designate any description, type, class or grade of wheat other than those specified in paragraphs 2 and 3 above and determine the minimum and maximum price equivalents thereof; provided that, in the case of any other wheat the price equivalent of which has not yet been determined, the minimum and maximum prices for the time being shall be derived from the minimum and maximum prices of the description, type, class or grade of wheat specified in this Article, or subsequently designated by the Executive Committee in consultation with the Advisory Committee on Price Equivalents, which is most closely comparable to such other wheat by the addition of an appropriate premium or by the deduction of an appropriate discount.

6. If any exporting or importing country represents to the Executive Committee that any price equivalent established under paragraph 2, 3 or 5 of this Article is, in the light of current transportation or exchange rates or market premiums or discounts, no longer fair, the Executive Committee shall consider the matter and may, in consultation with the Advisory Committee on Price Equivalents, make such adjustment as it considers desirable.

7. In establishing equivalent minimum and maximum prices under paragraph 2, 3, 5 or 6 above, no allowance for difference in quality shall be made which would result in the equivalent minimum and maximum price of wheat of any description, type, class or grade being fixed at a level higher than the basic minimum or maximum price, respectively, specified in paragraph 1 above.

8. If a dispute arises as to what premium or discount is appropriate for the purposes of paragraphs 5 and 6 of this Article in respect of any description of wheat specified in paragraph 2 or 3 or designated under paragraph 5 of this Article, the Executive Committee, in consultation with the Advisory Committee on Price Equivalents, shall on the request of the exporting or importing country concerned decide the issue.

9. All decisions of the Executive Committee under paragraphs 5, 6 and 8 of this Article shall be binding on all exporting and importing countries, provided that any of those countries which considers that any such decision is disadvantageous to it may ask the Council to review that decision.

ARTICLE VII

Stocks

1. In order to assure supplies of wheat to importing countries, each exporting country shall endeavour to maintain stocks of old crop wheat at the end of its crop-year at a level adequate to ensure that it will fulfil its guaranteed sales under this Agreement in each subsequent crop-year.

2. In the event of a short crop being harvested by an exporting country, particular consideration shall be given by the Council to the efforts made by that exporting country to maintain adequate stocks as required by paragraph 1 of this Article before that country is relieved of any of its obligations under Article X.

3. In order to avoid disproportionate purchases of wheat at the beginning and end of a crop-year, which might prejudice the stabilization of prices under this Agreement and render difficult the fulfilment of the obligations of all exporting and importing countries, importing countries shall endeavour to maintain adequate stocks at all times.

4. In the event of an appeal by an importing country under Article XII, particular consideration shall be given by the Council to the efforts made by that importing country to maintain adequate stocks as required by paragraph 3 of this Article before it decides in favour of such an appeal.

ARTICLE VIII

Information to be Supplied to the Council

The exporting and importing countries shall report to the Council, within the time prescribed by it, such information as the Council may request in connection with the administration of this Agreement.

PART 3—ADJUSTMENT OF GUARANTEED QUANTITIES

ARTICLE IX

Adjustments in Case of Non-participation or Withdrawal of Countries

1. In the event of any difference occurring between the total of the guaranteed purchases in Annex A to Article III and the total of the guaranteed sales in Annex B to Article III as a result of any country listed in Annex A or Annex B (a) not signing or (b) not depositing an instrument of acceptance of or (c) withdrawing under paragraph 5, 6 or 7 of Article XXII from or (d) being expelled under Article XIX from or (e) being found by the Council under Article XIX to be in default of the whole or part of its guaranteed quantity under this Agreement, the Council shall, without prejudice to the right of any country to withdraw from this Agreement under paragraph 6 of Article XXII, adjust the remaining guaranteed quantities so as to make the total in the one Annex equal to the total in the other Annex.

2. The adjustment under this Article shall, unless the Council decides otherwise by two-thirds of the votes cast by the exporting countries and two-thirds of the votes cast by the importing countries, be made by reducing pro rata the guaranteed quantities in Annex A or Annex B, as the case may be, by the amount necessary to make the total in the one Annex equal to the total in the other Annex.

3. In making adjustments under this Article, the Council shall keep in mind the general desirability of maintaining the total guaranteed purchases and the total guaranteed sales at the highest possible level.

ARTICLE X

Adjustment in Case of Short Crop or Necessity to Safeguard Balance of Payments of Monetary Reserves

1. Any exporting or importing country which fears that it may be prevented, by a short crop in the case of an exporting country or the necessity to safeguard its balance of payments or monetary reserves in the case of an importing country, from carrying out its obligations under this Agreement in respect of a particular crop-year shall report the matter to the Council at the earliest possible date and apply to the Council to be relieved of the whole or a part of its obligations for that crop-year. An application made to the Council pursuant to this paragraph shall be heard without delay.

2. If the matter relates to a short crop, the Council shall, in dealing with the request for relief, review the reporting country's supply situation.

3. If the matter relates to balance of payments or monetary reserves, the Council shall seek and take into account, together with all facts which it considers relevant, the opinion of the International Monetary Fund, as far as the matter concerns a country which is a member of the Fund, on the existence and extent of the necessity referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article.

4. The Council shall, in dealing with a request for relief under this Article, adhere to the principle that the country concerned will to the maximum extent feasible, if it is an exporting country, make sales to meet its obligations under this Agreement and, if it is an importing country, make purchases to meet its obligations under this Agreement.

5. The Council shall decide whether the reporting country's representations are well founded. If it finds they are well founded, it shall decide to what extent and on what conditions the reporting country shall be relieved of its guaranteed quantity for the crop-year concerned. The Council shall inform the reporting country of its decision.

6. If the Council decides that the reporting country shall be relieved of the whole or part of its guaranteed quantity for the crop-year concerned, the following procedure shall apply:

(a) The Council shall, if the reporting country is an importing country, invite the other importing countries, or, if the reporting country is an exporting country, invite the other exporting countries, to increase their guaranteed quantities for the crop-year concerned up to the amount of the guaranteed quantity of which the reporting country is relieved. Any increase in guaranteed quantities under this sub-paragraph shall require the approval of the Council.

(b) If the amount of which the reporting country is relieved cannot be fully offset in the manner provided in (a) of this paragraph, the Council shall invite the exporting countries, if the reporting country is an importing country, or the importing countries, if the reporting country is an exporting country, to accept a reduction of their guaranteed quantities for the crop-year concerned up to the amount of the guaranteed quantity of which the reporting country is relieved, after taking account of any adjustments made under (a) of this paragraph.

(c) If the total offers received by the Council from the exporting and importing countries to increase their guaranteed quantities under (a) of this paragraph or to reduce their guaranteed quantities under (b) of this paragraph exceed the amount of the guaranteed quantity of which the reporting country is relieved, their guaranteed quantities shall, unless the Council decides otherwise, be increased or reduced, as the case may be, on a pro rata basis, provided that the increase or reduction of the guaranteed quantity of any such country shall not exceed its offer.

(d) If the amount of the guaranteed quantity of which the reporting country is relieved cannot be fully offset in the manner provided in (a) and (b) of this paragraph, the Council shall reduce the guaranteed quantities in Annex A to Article III, if the reporting country is an exporting country, or in Annex B to Article III, if the reporting country is an importing country, for the crop-year concerned by the amount necessary to make the total in the one Annex equal to the total in the other Annex. Unless the exporting countries in the case of a reduction in Annex B, or the importing countries in case of a reduction in Annex A, agree otherwise, the reduction shall be made on a pro rata basis, account being taken of any reduction already made under (b) of this paragraph.

ARTICLE XI

Adjustments of Guaranteed Quantities by Consent

1. The Council, when requested to do so by the exporting and importing countries whose guaranteed quantities would thereby be changed, may approve increases in the guaranteed quantities in one Annex to Article III for the remaining period of the Agreement together with equivalent increases in the guaranteed quantities in the other Annex for that period.

2. An exporting country may transfer part of its guaranteed quantity to another exporting country and an importing country may transfer part of its guaranteed quantity to another importing country for one or more crop-years, subject to approval by the Council by a majority of the votes cast by the exporting countries and a majority of the votes cast by the importing countries.

3. The guaranteed quantity of any country acceding under Article XXI of this Agreement shall be offset by appropriate adjustments by way of increase or decrease of the guaranteed quantities of one or more other countries in Annexes A and B to Article III. Such adjustments shall not be approved unless each exporting or importing country whose guaranteed quantity is thereby changed has consented.

ARTICLE XII

Additional Purchases in Case of Critical Need

In order to meet a critical need which has arisen or threatens to arise in its territory, an importing country may appeal to the Council for assistance in obtaining supplies of wheat in addition to its guaranteed purchases. On consideration of such an appeal the Council may reduce pro rata the guaranteed quantities of the other importing countries in order to provide the quantity of wheat which it determines to be necessary to relieve the mergency created by the critical need, provided that it considers that such emergency cannot be met in any other manner. Two-thirds of the votes cast by the exporting countries and two-thirds of the votes cast by the importing countries shall be required for any reduction of guaranteed purchases under this paragraph.

67513—52

PART 4—ADMINISTRATION

ARTICLE XIII

The Council

A. Constitution

1. The International Wheat Council, established by the International Wheat Agreement which was opened for signature in Washington on 23 March 1949, shall continue in being for the purpose of administering the present Agreement.

2. Each exporting country and each importing country shall be a voting member of the Council and may be represented at its meetings by one delegate, alternates, and advisers.

3. Such inter-governmental organizations as the Council may decide to invite may each have one non-voting representative in attendance at meetings of the Council.

4. The Council shall elect for each crop-year a Chairman and a Vice-Chairman.

B. Powers and Functions

5. The Council shall establish its rules of procedure.

6. The Council shall keep such records as are required by the terms of this Agreement and may keep such other records as it considers desirable.

7. (a) The Council may study any aspect of the world wheat situation and may sponsor exchanges of information and inter-governmental consultations relating thereto. The Council may make such arrangements as it considers desirable with the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations and with other inter-governmental organizations, and also with Governments not party to this Agreement which have a substantial interest in the international trade in wheat, for co-operation in any of these activities.

(b) The exporting and importing countries reserve to themselves complete liberty of action in the determination and administration of their internal agricultural and price policies.

8. The Council shall publish an annual report and may publish any other information concerning matters within the scope of this Agreement.

9. The Council shall have such other powers and perform such other functions as it may deem necessary to carry out the terms of this Agreement.

10. The Council may, by two-thirds of the votes cast by the exporting countries and two-thirds of the votes cast by the importing countries, delegate the exercise of any of its powers or functions. The Council may at any time revoke such delegation by a majority of the votes cast. Any decision made under any powers or functions delegated by the Council in accordance with this paragraph shall be subject to review by the Council at the request of any exporting or importing country made within a period which the Council shall prescribe. Any decision in respect of which no request for review has been made within the prescribed period shall be binding on all exporting and importing countries.

C. Voting

11. (a) Subject to the provisions of subparagraphs (b) and (c) of this paragraph, the importing countries shall hold 1,000 votes, which shall be distributed among them in the proportions which their respective guaranteed purchases for the current crop-year bear to the total of the guaranteed purchases for that crop-year. The exporting countries shall also hold 1,000 votes, which shall be distributed among them in the proportions which their respective guaranteed sales for the current crop-year bear to the total of the guaranteed sales for that crop-year.

(b) If at any Session of the Council an importing country or an exporting country is not represented by an accredited delegate and has not authorized another country to exercise its votes in accordance with paragraph 16 of this Article, the total votes to be exercised by the exporting countries shall be adjusted to a figure equal to the total of votes to be exercised at that Session by the importing countries and redistributed among exporting countries in proportion to their guaranteed sales.

(c) No exporting country or importing country shall have less than one vote and there shall be no fractional votes.

12. The Council shall redistribute the votes in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 11 of this Article whenever there is any change in the guaranteed purchases or guaranteed sales for the current crop-year.

13. If an exporting or an importing country forfeits its votes under paragraph 5 of Article XVII or is deprived of its votes under paragraph 7 of Article XIX, the Council shall redistribute the votes as if that country had no guaranteed quantity for the current crop-year.

14. Any reduction in its guaranteed quantity accepted by an exporting country or an importing country under paragraph 6(b) of Article X and any transfer of part of a country's guaranteed quantity for only one crop-year under paragraph 2 of Article XI shall be disregarded for the purpose of redistributing votes under this Article.

15. Except where otherwise specified in this Agreement, decisions of the Council shall be by a majority of the total votes cast.

16. Any exporting country may authorize any other exporting country, and any importing country may authorize any other importing country, to represent its interests and to exercise its votes at any meeting or meetings of the Council. Evidence of such authorization satisfactory to the Council shall be submitted to the Council.

D. Sessions

17. The Council shall meet at least once during each half of each crop-year and at such other times as the Chairman may decide.

18. The Chairman shall convene a Session of the Council if so requested by (a) five countries or (b) one or more countries holding a total of not less than 10 per cent of the total votes or (c) the Executive Committee.

E. Quorum

19. The presence of delegates with a majority of the votes held by the exporting countries and a majority of the votes held by the importing countries prior to any adjustment of votes under paragraph 11(b) of this Article shall be necessary to constitute a quorum at any meeting of the Council.

F. Seat

20. The seat of the Council shall be London unless the Council decides otherwise by a majority of the votes cast by the exporting countries and a majority of the votes cast by the importing countries.

G. Legal Capacity

21. The Council shall have in the territory of each exporting and importing country such legal capacity as may be necessary for the exercise of its functions under this Agreement.

H. Decisions

22. Each exporting and importing country undertakes to accept as binding all decisions of the Council under the provisions of this Agreement.

ARTICLE XIV

Executive Committee

1. The Council shall establish an Executive Committee. The members of the Executive Committee shall be not more than four exporting countries elected annually by the exporting countries and not more than eight importing countries elected annually by the importing countries. The Council shall appoint the Chairman of the Executive Committee and may appoint a Vice-Chairman.

2. The Executive Committee shall be responsible to and work under the general direction of the Council. It shall have such powers and functions as are expressly assigned to it under this Agreement and such other powers and functions as the Council may delegate to it under paragraph 10 of Article XIII.

3. The exporting countries on the Executive Committee shall have the same total number of votes as the importing countries. The votes of the exporting countries shall be diivded among them as they shall decide, provided that no exporting country shall have more than 40 per cent of the total votes of the exporting countries. The votes of the importing countries shall be divided among them as they shall decide, provided that no importing country shall have more than 40 per cent of the total votes of the importing countries.

4. The Council shall prescribe rules and procedure regarding voting in the Executive Committee and may make such other provisions regarding rules of procedure in the Executive Committee as it thinks fit. A decision of the Executive Committee shall require the same majority of votes as this Agreement prescribes for the Council when making a decision on a similar matter.

5. Any exporting or importing country which is not a member of the Executive Committee may participate, without voting, in the discussion of any question before the Executive Committee whenever the latter considers that the interests of that country are affected.

ARTICLE XV

Advisory Committee on Price Equivalents

The Council shall establish an Advisory Committee on Price Equivalents consisting of representatives of not more than three exporting countries and of not more than three importing countries. The Committee shall advise the Council and the Executive Committee on the matters referred to in paragraphs 5, 6 and 8 of Article VI and on such other questions as the Council or the Executive Committee may refer to it. The Chairman of the Committee shall be appointed by the Council.

ARTICLE XVI

The Secretariat

1. The Council shall have a Secretariat consisting of a Secretary and such staff as may be required for the work of the Council and of its committees.

2. The Council shall appoint the Secretary and determine his duties.

3. The staff shall be appointed in accordance with regulations established by the Council.

ARTICLE XVII

Finance

1. The expenses of delegations to the Council, of representatives on the Executive Committee, and of representatives on the Advisory Committee on Price Equivalents shall be met by their respective Governments. The other expenses necessary for the administration of this Agreement, including those of the Secretariat and any remuneration which the Council may decide to pay to its Chairman or its Vice-Chairman, shall be met by annual contributions from the exporting and importing countries. The contribution of each such country for each crop-year shall be in the proportion which its guaranteed quantity bears to the total guaranteed sales or purchases at the beginning of that crop-year.

2. At its first session after this Agreement comes into force, the Council shall approve its budget for the period ending 31 July 1957 and assess the contribution to be paid by each exporting and importing country.

3. The Council shall, at a session during the second half of each crop-year, approve its budget for the following crop-year and assess the contribution to be paid by each exporting and importing country for that crop-year.

4. The initial contribution of any exporting or importing country acceding to this Agreement under Article XXI shall be assessed by the Council on the basis of the guaranteed quantity to be held by it and the period remaining in the current crop-year, but the assessments made upon other exporting and importing countries for the current crop-year shall not be altered.

5. Contributions shall be payable immediately upon assessment. Any exporting or importing country failing to pay its contribution within one year of its assessment shall forfeit its voting rights until its contribution is paid, but shall not be deprived of its other rights nor relieved of its obligations under this Agreement. In the event of any exporting or importing country forfeiting its voting rights under this paragraph its votes shall be redistributed as provided in paragraph 13 of Article XIII.

6. The Council shall, each crop-year, publish an audited statement of its receipts and expenditures in the previous crop-year.

7. The Government of the country where the seat of the Council is situated shall grant exemption from taxation on the salaries paid by the Council to its employees except that such exemption need not apply to the nationals of that country.

8. The Council shall, prior to its dissolution, provide for the settlement of its liabilities and the disposal of its records and assets.

ARTICLE XVIII

Co-operation with other Inter-Governmental Organizations

1. The Council may make whatever arrangements are desirable for consultation and co-operation with the appropriate organs of the United Nations and its specialized agencies and with other inter-governmental organizations.

2. If the Council finds that any terms of this Agreement are materially inconsistent with such requirements as may be laid down by the United Nations or through its appropriate organs and specialized agencies regarding inter-governmental commodity agreements, the inconsistency shall be deemed to be a circumstance affecting adversely the operation of this Agreement and the procedure prescribed in paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 of Article XXII shall be applied.

ARTICLE XIX

Disputes and Complaints

1. Any dispute concerning the interpretation or application of this Agreement which is not settled by negotiations shall, at the request of any country party to the dispute, be referred to the Council for decision.

2. In any case where a dispute has been referred to the Council under paragraph 1 of this Article, a majority of countries, or any countries holding not less than one-third of the total votes, may require the Council, after full discussion, to seek the opinion of the advisory panel referred to in paragraph 3 of this Article on the issues in dispute before giving its decision.

3. (a) Unless the Council unanimously agrees otherwise, the panel shall consist of:

(i) two persons, one having wide experience in matters of the kind in dispute and the other having legal standing and experience, nominated by the exporting countries;

(ii) two such persons nominated by the importing countries; and

(iii) a chairman selected unanimously by the four persons nominated under (i) and (ii) or, if they fail to agree, by the Chairman of the International Wheat Council.

(b) Persons from countries whose Governments are parties to this Agreement shall be eligible to serve on the advisory panel, and persons appointed to the advisory panel shall act in their personal capacities and without instructions from any Government.

(c) The expenses of the advisory panel shall be paid by the Council.

4. The opinion of the advisory panel and the reasons therefor shall be submitted to the Council which, after considering all the relevant information, shall decide the dispute.

5. Any complaint that any exporting or importing country has failed to fulfil its obligations under this Agreement shall, at the request of the country making the complaint, be referred to the Council which shall make a decision on the matter.

6. No exporting or importing country shall be found to have committed a breach of this Agreement except by a majority of the votes held by the exporting countries and a majority of the votes held by the importing countries. Any finding that an exporting or importing country is in breach of this Agreement shall specify the nature of the breach and, if the breach involves default by that country in its guaranteed quantity, the extent of such default.

7. If the Council finds that an exporting country or an importing country has committed a breach of this Agreement it may, by a majority of the votes held by the exporting countries and a majority of the votes held by the importing countries, deprive the country concerned of its voting rights until it fulfils its obligations or expel that country from the Agreement.

8. If any exporting or importing country is deprived of its votes under this Article, the votes shall be redistributed as provided in paragraph 13 of Article XIII. If any exporting or importing country is found in default of the whole or part of its guaranteed quantity, or is expelled from this Agreement, the remaining guaranteed quantities shall be adjusted as provided in Article IX.

PART 5—FINAL PROVISIONS

ARTICLE XX

Signature, Acceptance, and Entry into Force

1. This Agreement shall be open for signature in Washington until and including 18 May 1956 by the Governments of the countries listed in Annex A and Annex B to Article III.

2. This Agreement shall be subject to acceptance by signatory Governments in accordance with their respective constitutional procedures. Subject to the provisions of paragraph 5 of this Article, instruments of acceptance shall be deposited with the Government of the United States of America not later than 16 July 1956 provided, however, that a notification by any signatory Government to the Government of the United States of America by 16 July 1956 of an intention to accept this Agreement, followed by the deposit of an instrument of acceptance not later than 1 December 1956 in fulfilment of that intention, shall be deemed to constitute acceptance on 16 July 1956 for the purposes of this Article.

3. Provided that the Governments of countries listed in Annex A to Article III responsible for not less than two-thirds of the guaranteed purchases and the Governments of countries listed in Annex B to Article III responsible for not less than two-thirds of the guaranteed sales have accepted this Agreement by 16 July 1956, Parts 1, 3, 4 and 5 of the Agreement shall enter into force on 16 July 1956 and Part 2 on 1 August 1956 for those Governments which have accepted the Agreement.

4. If by 16 July 1956 the conditions laid down in the preceding paragraph for the entering into force of this Agreement are not fulfilled, the Governments of those countries which by the same date have accepted this Agreement as provided in paragraph 2 of this Article may decide by mutual consent that it shall enter into force between them, or alternatively may take whatever other action they consider the situation requires.

5. Any signatory Government which has not accepted this Agreement by 16 July 1956 as provided in paragraph 2 of this Article may be granted by the Council an extension of time after that date for depositing its instrument of acceptance. Parts 1, 3, 4 and 5 of this Agreement shall enter into force for that Government on the date of the deposit of its instrument of acceptance, and Part 2 of the Agreement shall enter into force on 1 August 1956 or on the date of the deposit of its instrument of acceptance, whichever is later.

6. The Government of the United States of America will notify all signatory Governments of each signature and acceptance of this Agreement.

ARTICLE XXI

Accession

The Council may, by two-thirds of the votes cast by the exporting countries and two-thirds of the votes cast by the importing countries, approve accession to this Agreement by any Government not already a party to it and prescribe conditions for such accession; provided, however, that the Council shall not approve the accession of any Government under this Article unless at the same time it approves adjustments of the guaranteed quantities in Annexes A and B to Article III in accordance with paragraph 3 of Article XI. Accession shall be effected by depositing an instrument of accession with the Government of the United States of America, which will notify all signatory and acceding Governments of each such accession.

ARTICLE XXII

Duration, Amendment, Withdrawal and Termination

1. This Agreement shall remain in force until and including 31 July 1959.

2. (a) The Council shall, at such time as it considers appropriate, communicate to the exporting and importing countries its recommendations regarding renewal or replacement of this Agreement.

(b) The Council may invite any Government not party to this Agreement which has a substantial interest in the international trade in wheat to participate in its discussions in connection with such renewal or replacement.

3. The Council may, by a majority of the votes held by the exporting countries and a majority of the votes held by the importing countries, recommend an amendment of this Agreement to the exporting and importing countries.

4. The Council may fix a time within which each exporting and importing country shall notify the Government of the United States of America whether or not it accepts the amendment. The amendment shall become effective upon its acceptance by exporting countries which hold two-thirds of the votes of the exporting countries and by importing countries which hold two-thirds of the votes of the importing countries.

5. Any exporting or importing country which has not notified the Government of the United States of America of its acceptance of an amendment by the date on which such amendment becomes effective may, after giving such written notice of withdrawal to the Government of the United States of America as the Council may require in each case, withdraw from this Agreement at the end of the current crop-year, but shall not thereby be released from any obligations under this Agreement which have not been discharged by the end of that crop-year.

6. Any exporting country which considers its interests to be seriously prejudiced by the non-participation in or withdrawal from this Agreement of any country listed in Annex A to Article III responsible for more than 5 per cent of the guaranteed quantities in that Annex, or any importing country which considers its interests to be seriously prejudiced by the non-participation in or withdrawal from the Agreement of any country listed in Annex B to Article III responsible for more than 5 per cent of the guaranteed quantities in that Annex, may withdraw from this Agreement by giving written notice of withdrawal to the Government of the United States of America before 1 August 1956.

7. Any exporting or importing country which considers its national security to be endangered by the outbreak of hostilities may withdraw from this Agreement by giving thirty days' written notice of withdrawal to the Government of the United States of America.

8. The Government of the United States of America will inform all signatory and acceding Governments of each notification and notice received under this Article.

ARTICLE XXIII

Territorial Application

1. Any Government may, at the time of signature or acceptance of or accession to this Agreement, declare that its rights and obligations under the Agreement shall not apply in respect of all or any of the overseas territories for the foreign relations of which it is responsible.

2. With the exception of territories in respect of which a declaration has been made in accordance with paragraph 1 of this Article, the rights and obligations of any Government under this Agreement shall apply in respect of all territories for the foreign relations of which that Government is responsible.

3. Any Government may, at any time after its acceptance of or accession to this Agreement, by notification to the Government of the United States of America, declare that its rights and obligations under the Agreement shall apply in respect of all or any of the territories regarding which it has made a declaration in accordance with paragraph 1 of this Article.

4. Any Government may, by giving notification of withdrawal to the Government of the United States of America, withdraw from this Agreement separately in respect of all or any of the overseas territories for whose foreign relations it is responsible.

5. The Government of the United States of America will inform all signatory and acceding Governments of any declaration or notification made under this Article.

In Witness Whereof the undersigned, having been duly authorized to this effect by their respective Governments, have signed this Agreement on the dates appearing opposite their signatures.

The texts of this Agreement in the English, French and Spanish languages shall be all equally authentic, the original to be deposited in the archives of the Government of the United States of America, which shall transmit certified copies thereof to each signatory and acceding Government.

CANADA LANDS SURVEYS BILL

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I am exceedingly sorry to have to rise on a question of privilege this afternoon. I happen to be a member of the Banking and Commerce Committee, a sitting of which I attended this morning in room 262 of this building. The bill which was before the committee was Bill 254, which contains what is in my opinion a bad amendment to a good act—the Canada Lands Surveys Act. I regret to inform honourable senators that I was precluded by the chairman of the committee from asking pertinent questions of the witness. I regret that very much, and while I do not ask for a sanction I have raised this question of privilege to acquaint the house with the point that I want to establish, that in my opinion the amendment is a bad amendment to a good act. I shall do so in due course today. I will not persist now, but it has been a great humiliation to me to have been denied the freedom of speech which until now has been the greatest asset of the Senate.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, as I was the chairman of the committee in question I desire to offer a few words in reply to my friend's suggestion that he was precluded by any comment of mine from asking pertinent questions, or that any freedom has ceased to exist in the conduct of the Senate or of its committees.

Let me just recount what happened for the benefit of those who were not there this morning. We were discussing Bill 254, an Act to amend the Canada Lands Surveys Act. After some lengthy discussion my friend rose and asked the witness a question which in effect was really asking the witness to reflect upon the qualifications of the Civil Service Commission. I indicated that I thought it was unfair to expect the witness to answer such a question, but the witness went ahead and answered. My friend then continued berating the Civil Service Commission, whereupon I referred him to the particular paragraph in the bill which contained the only reference to Civil Service Commission. I suggested that he keep his remarks within the ambit of that particular paragraph in so far as anything that he had to say with reference to the Civil Service Commission was concerned. My friend then continued. Mind you, honourable senators, these were not questions. On the contrary, they were statements, delivered in my friend's best fashion, for he was really warming up to the subject. He proceeded to berate the Civil Service Commission further. I have no brief for the commission, but I could not see why in the consideration of this bill it should be imported and its qualifications made the subject-matter of a speech. I therefore told my friend that as far as I was concerned my ruling was that he was out of order in discussing the Civil Service Commission in that connection and in that fashion. My friend took umbrage and left the room.

At no time did I say to my friend, "You cannot speak further". I would not assume to do that. All I did was to make a ruling upon the particular statements that he was making at the time in relation to the Civil Service Commission. There was no ban on my friend's continuing, and if he had been in order there would have been no objection. I even offered him the privilege of testing the ruling that I had made by putting it to the committee. I said, "This is my view on the point, and this is my ruling, but here is the committee; ask the committee what it thinks about it".

Honourable senators, that is the sum and substance of the matter. I could not let the occasion pass without making an explanation, because it is the first time this has occurred. I have known my friend for a great number of years, and I had always felt there was some spirit of friendship existing between us. I can assure him that if that spirit of friendship seems to have retreated, the retreat proceeds from his side and not from mine. However, I cannot allow to go unchallenged a statement regarding any supposed act of mine which is alleged to have precluded him from asking pertinent questions. I have no way of determining what the questions were; therefore, I do not know whether or not they were pertinent. That is the only submission I have to make on this point.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, now that the senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) has stated his question of privilege, and the Chairman of the Committee (Hon. Mr. Hayden) has expressed his views with regard to it, the matter might well be left to the committee itself, which is primarily concerned.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Joint Chairman of the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on capital and corporal punishment and lotteries, presented the second report of the committee.

He said: Honourable senators, this report constitutes the committee's final report on the question of capital punishment only. The report is being presented in English at this time; the French version will be presented later. No motion is now being made for adoption of the report. I therefore move that this report do lie on the table, and that it be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this date.

The motion was agreed to.

See appendix to today's Hansard, pp. 824-54.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the report of the committee on Bill 165.

The report was read by the Clerk as follows:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom was referred the Bill (165) intituled: "An Act to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act", have in obedience to the order of reference of June 19, 1956, examined the said bill and now report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

CANADA LANDS SURVEYS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Hayden presented the report of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce on Bill 254.

The report was read by the Clerk as follows:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom was referred the Bill (254) intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Lands Surveys Act", have in obedience to the order of reference of June 20, 1956, examined the said bill and now report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, I move the third reading now.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I opposed this bill when it was debated on second reading in the house and again this morning in committee. I am opposing it on three grounds. In the first place, I believe that land surveyors should be granted certificates of qualifications under university standards recognized throughout Canada. That is the procedure in such professions as law, medicine, and accountancy, and I see no reason why there should be an exception as regards the profession of surveying.

My second objection, I admit, is not quite so important. It is based on the principle that people who apply for examination in a profession should do what university students are required to do, that is, pay a fee sufficient to take care of the cost of their examination. It is only in connection with the surveying profession that the taxpayers are required to pay the costs of examinations.

My third objection is that under this bill extra pay will be received by one class of civil servants. That is a practice to which I am opposed. If a civil servant is paid a salary which is less than his services to the country are worth, the discrepancy should be adjusted by an increase in salary, not through extraneous payments.

The honourable senator who sponsored this bill in committee stated that as a consequence of it fewer dominion surveyors would be required in the Northwest Territories. The bill does not affect in any way the number of dominion surveyors; all it does is to increase the pay of certain civil servants who are to act as special examiners. This class of work should be the function of the universities. On this matter I entirely agree with the honourable senator from St. Boniface (Hon. Mr. Howden), and I speak from some experience in the matter. I have the honour to be the chairman of one of the boards of our affiliated universities in Manitoba, and my knowledge of university matters extends over fifty years. One main concern of our province, and in fact of all the provinces, is to emphasize the primary importance of education. The president of the Royal Bank of Canada, who returned from Russia only the other day, stressed the great efforts which the Russian people are making to extend higher education. Now here in Canada, what should be the function of a degree-conferring university is to be done by subterfuge, through federal civil servants going around and examining candidates. This ought not to be permitted. Someone has asked me why I do not move an amendment. No amendment can be moved to this bill. All I can say is that I am opposed to the bill, and if I had sufficient support I would move that it be not reported. I did so in committee this morning, but the majority was against the motion.

I hold that this house should give careful consideration to the question whether men and women should be granted professional standing without having received university training and examination. I say they should not. I say further that civil servants should not be given subsidiary jobs beyond the regular scope of their occupation. If they are properly performing the work for which they are paid, the doing of it takes up all their knowledge and time. The more additional occupations a man has, the less time and ability he has left to concentrate on his main employment. We all know that one of life's problems is that of the man who, in any line of endeavour, carries too large a volume of work on his shoulders and cannot give proper time and thought to any of the matters he has to consider.

For these reasons I object to the bill. I think it should never have been introduced, and that it should not be passed.

Hon. John P. Howden: Honourable senators, I supported the stand of the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) this morning when this bill was before the committee. I am a graduate of a university, and I know that practically all the sciences are, in matters of organization, salaries and the like, controlled through the universities. In committee I inquired whether the proceedings under the bill would be controlled by any board of education of a university. Though I could not get a direct reply, I gathered that they would not be, and therefore I objected: I said, as I have said before, that the teaching and the assessment of qualifications in the sciences should be controlled by a university board. Also in this case there appears to be no definite tariff: one charge may be imposed today, another tomorrow. If the matter were controlled by a university board, specific regulations would be laid down and the people concerned would have to follow them. This is a matter which should be seriously dealt with. I hope we shall have an end of bills such as the one before us.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, on the second reading of this bill we were told that the discussion in this chamber would be shortened because members of the committee would have full opportunity to discuss it. I appreciate what has been said by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) and by my old friend the honourable senator from St. Boniface (Hon. Mr. Howden) as regards the qualifications of the surveyors to be appointed by the board. But the issue is much deeper; it goes to the manner in which these surveyors are to be appointed.

As a rule, civil servants are appointed by the Civil Service Commission, and in a very strange way, namely, by boards composed of civil servants. A long time ago—in 1938—the report of the Civil Service Commission carried an appendix with a list of special and advisory examiners; and although it was difficult for me to paddle against the current I succeeded in asking a witness on the stand—I do not know who he was; probably a public servant in the Mines and Technical Surveys Department—if there was anybody in the Civil Service Commission qualified to appoint surveyors. His answer was that there was not.

My objection to this bill is that the Civil Service Commission is brought in to establish the rate of salaries to be paid to successful candidates. The Canada Lands Surveys Act was passed in 1951. I was delighted to vote for it, because it was in accordance with my personal conviction that the determination of appointments should be upon the recommendation of the ministerial head of the department, not the Civil Service Commission. As that method conforms to an old conviction of mine, I was elated when the bill which gave recognition to it was passed by the House of Commons. It is to be remembered that the minister is the person responsible to Parliament and to the people for bills which affect his department. It is only legitimate that he should appoint those under him. This was the procedure laid down by the act of 1951. Very good. But this bill repeals section 7 of the act and replaces it with the following:

> Every member or temporary member of the board and the secretary of the board, whether or not he is employed or paid in any other capacity in the public service of Canada, may, in respect of the performance of his duties and functions under this act, be paid
> (a) remuneration at an annual rate to be fixed by the Treasury Board on the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission; and
> (b) his actual living and travelling expenses incurred while away from his normal place of residence.

My objection is that the Civil Service Commission, being unqualified to make the appointments, is no more qualified to fix the rate of salary. This should be done by the Treasury Board upon the recommendation of the minister.

My statement before the committee this morning and which I wish to repeat here, under the protection of the Chair, is that the Civil Service Commission is just a smoke screen—so, much so that in many cases when the deputy minister of a department asks the commission to make an appointment and the commission holds a competition, there is no one within the commission itself qualified to decide upon the merits of the candidates, so it asks the deputy minister to recommend someone qualified to do the job. Well, that is ridiculous. It is just red tape. Some years ago the reports of the Civil Service Commission used to contain long lists of civil servants, from the Governor of the Bank of Canada down to minor technicians and clerks, who were available in their respective departments to conduct examinations for the commission, but the number of positions for which candidates have to be examined in this way has become so large that for some years now the commission has not published them. The commission is ashamed to publish a list containing so many names of departmental officials who act as examiners. Of course the pretext is that the Civil Service Commission does the examining. Why not be frank? The act itself is all right. It provides that the making of appointments shall be the responsibility of the minister. If the appointments are good, so much the better for the minister; and if the appointments are bad, then the minister will be to blame. I agree with that idea. Why should the Civil Service Commission, which is not competent to make the appointments, establish the salaries of these examiners? That is my objection.

If I had a seconder I would move that the words "Civil Service Commission" be deleted from the proposed new section 7(a) and that the words "the minister" be substituted. I wonder if any honourable senator would support me in that amendment. In my opinion there is a principle at stake. I had some preliminaries to my question in committee and I was perfectly in order in acting as I did. I have never been steam-rollered by the chairman of any committee, and I am too old to embark on such a career now. The chairman and I may not hold the same view, but I consider that the remuneration now paid special examiners is sufficient. The act provides that:

> The secretary shall receive the sum of ten dollars for each day's sitting of meetings of the board at which he attends together with his actual living and travelling expenses incurred through such attendance . . .

That remuneration of $10 is an extra, as has been said. The men doing this work hold down regular jobs in the Civil Service at so much a year. Why should they be given a bonus to fulfil their departmental duties? Is it not ridiculous that a man employed in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys at a salary of so much a year should get an extra amount for saying that "John was a better candidate than Tom in an examination for the job of surveyor"? This is part of his job and his remuneration for it should be within his regular salary. There is no reason to increase the amount already paid him, which is most generous. The simplest way to deal with this question is not to move an amendment but to vote against the bill, and that is what I intend to do.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I had not intended to say anything on the motion for third reading, but in view of what has taken place I should like to make a reference to the statute which the bill seeks to amend. I was pleased to note from the remarks of the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) that he supported the original Canada Lands Surveys Bill when it came before Parliament in 1951. That bill was passed and is the present act. I would like to point out to him that Part I of the act provides that:

> The Governor in Council shall appoint a Board of Examiners consisting of the Surveyor General who shall be chairman and two other members.

Under section 7 of the act statutory provision is made for the payment of remuneration to the members of this board for such services as they may render to it. Now, so far as my honourable friend's opposition to paying a bonus is concerned, I would point out that if the payment is to be considered a bonus because the members of the board are already employed in the Civil Service, then the statute itself also provides for a bonus. There is no difference. I rather gathered that my honourable friend's real objection was not to the payment of these men but to the manner in which the payment is to be made. The act now provides for payment and it fixes the rate of so much per diem, but the bill proposes that the rate be fixed by the Treasury Board on the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission. The Treasury Board should certainly be in a position to make some determination of what would be adequate rates of pay for such services as the members of the Board of Examiners perform. The Treasury Board is a well-informed organization which functions independently, and I can see no reason for a storm developing over the new method of payment proposed by the bill. If the Civil Service Commission made a recommendation which the Treasury Board thought was either too high or too low, I take it that the board would not act on that recommendation. The Treasury Board being, as I say an independent authority, I am perfectly happy to have it make the final determination as to what remuneration shall be paid to the examiners.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the question is on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald for the third reading of Bill 254, intituled an Act to amend the Canada Lands Surveys Act. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Haig: On division.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed, on division.

CRIMINAL LAW

JOINT COMMITTEE ON CERTAIN QUESTIONS—SUBSTITUTION OF COMMONS MEMBER

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a message has been received from the House of Commons in the following words:

That the name of Miss Bennett be substituted for that of Miss Aitken on the special Joint Committee of both houses of Parliament appointed to inquire and report upon the questions of capital punishment, corporal punishment and lotteries; and

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours thereof.

ADDITION TO SENATE MEMBERS

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, although I may not be following the order of procedure, following upon the message received from the House of Commons I would move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig):

That the names of the Honourable Senators Bishop, Connolly (Ottawa West) and Wilson be added to the list of senators serving on the Joint Committee on Capital and Corporal Punishment and Lotteries; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that house accordingly.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, may I ask the reason for proposing these additions to the membership of the committee so late in the session, and at so late an hour this afternoon? The committee's report on capital punishment was tabled here today, and the committee is not likely to hold many more meetings. I am curious to know why new members are being added now.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I cannot give the reason for the change in membership made by the other house.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I know the reason for that change. Miss Bennett was on the committee formerly. I am interested only in the addition of the three members of this house.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The purpose in appointing additional members is to facilitate meetings of the committee in the event that this house should be adjourned. We would not want our adjournment to delay the work of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask if that is the reason why members from Ottawa were selected?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, that is the reason. They live in Ottawa and will be available whenever a committee meeting is called. I am informed it is unlikely that there will be many meetings of this committee during any adjournment we might have, but in any event we want to ensure that the work of the committee will not be delayed.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: If I am not out of order, I would like to point out to the honourable leader that probably the only matters that will come up for discussion at the committee are our final decisions on corporal punishment and lotteries, and those decisions will probably be made during the next few meetings.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Not on lotteries.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: My point is that members who have not attended the meetings which have been held during the last three sessions will not really be in a position to vote on these matters. I think that members who have attended the meetings regularly should be the ones to express their opinions.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I quite agree that those who have been attending the meetings should express their opinions, but may I point out to the honourable senator that the proceedings of the committee have been printed during the three sessions, and that the honourable senators now proposed as additional members of the committee have followed the reports very carefully and are quite familiar with the subjects under discussion.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

JOINT COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION—ADDITION TO SENATE MEMBERS

Hon. Mr. Macdonald, with leave of the Senate, moved:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Bishop, Croll and Wilson be added to the list of senators serving on the Joint Committee on the Federal District Commission; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that house accordingly.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

RECIPROCAL TAX AGREEMENTS

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of June 14:

1. What countries, with which Canada trades, have reciprocal tax agreements?
2. Give names of countries and dates on which agreements were made.

3. Is Canada trading with any country, to any extent, which imposes double taxation?
4. If so, what action, if any, is being taken to overcome the double taxation problem?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry is as follows:

1 and 2. Canada-United Kingdom, June 5, 1945; Canada-United States, March 4, 1942, Amended June 12, 1950; Canada-New Zealand, March 12, 1948; Canada-France, March 16, 1951; Canada-Sweden, April 6, 1951; Canada-Ireland, October 28, 1954; Canada-Denmark, September 30, 1955.

3 and 4. Although Canada imposes tax on the entire income from all sources received by a resident of Canada, nevertheless from the tax so paid there may be deducted an allowance for foreign income tax paid on income from foreign sources. This allowance may not exceed the Canadian tax payable on such foreign income. As a result of this provision under our law, double taxation of residents of Canada is avoided.

In view of the fact that our law protects our own residents from double taxation no further action by means of agreement is necessary on our part to accomplish this purpose. We are, however, always prepared to negotiate an agreement with any country which wishes to do so for the benefit of its own residents.

CLERK ASSISTANT OF THE SENATE

EXPRESSION OF SYMPATHY IN ILLNESS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. John P. Howden: Honourable senators, I am sure most of us have observed that a highly esteemed member of the Staff of the Senate has not been present for several days while the house has been sitting. Lieutenant-Colonel Rodolphe Larose, the Clerk Assistant, has long been a familiar figure in this chamber. It was only within the past day or two that I learned of his indisposition. I do not know what communications may have been sent to him or to his home by members of this house, but it occurs to me that sympathetic notice should be taken of the fact that he is indisposed.

Therefore, with leave, I beg to move, seconded by my desk-mate (Hon. Mr. Gershaw):

That the Senate, having heard with regret of the indisposition of its popular Clerk Assistant, Lieutenant Colonel Rodolphe Larose, trusts that his illness may prove to be of a transient nature and hopes to welcome him back in the near future, completely restored to health; and

That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to Lieutenant Colonel Larose forthwith by the Clerk of the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The motion was agreed to.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard moved the second reading of Bill S, an Act to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill, which is not very complicated, seeks to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act in two respects. First, it would increase the deposit required to be made before a foreign insurance company can be registered to do fire or life insurance business in Canada; and secondly, it would change the date at which these companies must file their annual reports with the Department of Insurance.

There are three types of companies doing insurance business in Canada: Canadian, British and foreign companies. The foreign companies, which are incorporated outside the British commonwealth, are the only companies affected by the amendments proposed by this bill.

Prior to 1927 the amount of deposit required to be made by foreign companies doing life or fire insurance business in Canada was $50,000; in 1927 it was increased to $100,000, and since that date there has been no change. The bill now proposes that it be increased to $200,000. The reason for the proposed increase is a simple one. The insurance business in Canada, both as to fire and life, has increased tremendously over the past few years. For instance, while a life insurance policy of $10,000 may have provided sufficient protection for a man in 1927, today a policy of $20,000 would be required to give comparable protection. With respect to fire insurance, the volume of business has grown greatly by reason of the development of the country and the increase in property values since 1927. Consequently, for the protection of life and fire policyholders, the department feels the time has come when the amount of the deposit should be increased.

As further justification of the increased deposit I would point out that Canadian insurance companies which do fire or life business must have their shareholders subscribe and pay a minimum capital of $200,000. Therefore, it seems only just that foreign companies should be asked to increase their deposit for the security of the policyholders.

The second amendment which the bill proposes has to do with the annual statements which foreign companies have to make to the department. On or before March 1 each year the companies now must file a report covering their volume of business done in Canada in the preceding year. The bill makes no change in that respect, but foreign companies which do reinsurance business are given until March 15 to file their report. The reason for the additional fifteen days is that these companies have to obtain reports from other companies which they re-insure, and it is difficult to file statements within the shorter time.

Foreign companies are also required to file a report as to their general business in the same way as they report to their shareholders. At the present time the report must be deposited with the department one month after it was filed with the government of the country in which the company's head office is located; and if filing is not required by that government the report must be filed with our department one month after the company reported to its shareholders, and in any event not later than June 30 of each year. Under those conditions the Department has been put to a good deal of trouble because of delays and postponements in the holding of shareholders' meetings. Further, it was impossible for companies whose fiscal year ended on June 30 to file their report with the department as of that date. Because of these difficulties the Department is attempting by this bill to remove some administrative obstacles. It is now proposed that the general report of a foreign company be made to the department in the month following the filing of the report with the foreign government concerned, and if that government does not require the report to be filed it must be in the hands of our department within six months after the end of the company's fiscal year. That seems to be a very simple arrangement and involves no shareholders' meetings or other complications.

Honourable senators, I have touched on all the amendments which the bill proposes. May I add that this bill has been on the Order Paper for the past six months, and in all that time not one objection to the deposit has been made by any company to the Insurance Department. Further, not only is there no objection to the deposit, but it has no retroactive effect. That is to say, the foreign companies which have been registered up to date, having deposited $100,000, will not have to increase that deposit. Nor is it necessary, because they have been doing business in Canada for a long time, and they are required to have in Canadian assets in this country an amount equivalent to their liabilities here.

I do not know that any further explanation is needed. It was not my intention to move that the bill be referred to a committee, because its terms are simple and its purpose is evident, but I am willing, if I can, to give honourable senators any additional information for which they may ask.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard moved the second reading of Bill T, an Act to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is very similar to the one which has just been under discussion, except that it concerns Canadian and British insurance companies. In so far as deposits are concerned, the amount of the deposit of a Canadian company with the Minister of Finance is increased from $50,000 to $100,000: that is to say, it is doubled. It should be remembered, however, that these companies are required to have subscribed and paid up a minimum of $200,000, and that the deposit of $100,000 is made from that subscription.

In so far as British life or fire insurance companies are concerned—that is to say, companies incorporated outside Canada but within the British commonwealth—the amount of deposit is to be increased from $100,000 to $200,000. The reasons here applicable are the same as I have just mentioned in the case of foreign companies. The only security of British companies available to their Canadian policyholders is the amount deposited with the Minister of Finance: all their other assets are held either in Britain or elsewhere in the world where they do business. It is important that Canadian policyholders be protected, and the increased deposit puts British companies in the same category as Canadian companies. It would be invidious if Canadian companies were required to provide security of $200,000 and only $100,000 were required from British companies.

As regards the filing of annual statements, the fiscal year of a Canadian company is always equivalent to the calendar year. Canadian insurance companies do not have to make two reports: they report only on their activities in Canada, and their statement of the business they have done in the preceding calendar year must be filed with the Minister of Finance on or before the first of March following. In so far as Canadian reinsurance companies are concerned, there is allowed a delay to the 15th of March each year, for the same reasons applicable to foreign reinsurance companies. Reinsurance companies, whether Canadian, British or foreign, need time to get reports from the various companies with which they have reinsured or which they have reinsured, and that is why they are allowed the additional 15 days within which to file their reports.

In so far as British companies are concerned, they, like foreign companies, have to make two reports. They have to file an annual statement of their Canadian business by the first of March, or, in the case of a reinsurance company, not later than the 15th of March. Their statement of general business must be deposited in the department one month after they have furnished their report to their own Government, and, if such a report is not required, then within six months after the expiration of their fiscal year. So there will be no reason for the department to make inquiry as to the date of a shareholders' meeting, whether it be on the advertised date, or after adjournment: the time for filing is six months after the close of the fiscal year. In this respect, British, Canadian and foreign companies are in exactly the same position. The purpose of these provisions is to protect Canadian policyholders, if they are insured in a British or foreign company, to the same degree as if they are insured in a Canadian company.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I understand from the remarks of the honourable senator that there is an obligation on foreign insurance companies to have in Canada assets at least equal to their liabilities. Does the same requirement apply to British companies?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Exactly the same. For a long time it was permissible for British companies to hold assets in sterling in London, which were deposited with the Bank of Montreal, acting as an agent of the Minister of Finance. This has not been changed, but the new companies are obliged to take Canadian assets and deposit them in Canada. The old companies are permitted to continue to operate as they have in the past. Mind you, the British companies are desirous of transferring their British assets into Canadian assets, but they cannot do so all at once. They have to proceed slowly.

Hon. Mr. Power: Are the British companies restricted in doing this by exchange regulations set up by the British Government?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: They have to get permission from the British Government, and they cannot transfer their assets very quickly. I would point out that out of a total of $2 billion assets now in the hands of the Minister of Finance, only $76 million is in sterling, as against $88 million in 1954 and $76 million in 1955. The department's 1956 report has not yet been published, but the figures I have given indicate that the amount of sterling assets is decreasing all the time. That, of course, is the desire of the British companies. They would rather have their assets and their deposits in Canadian money, but they cannot make the transfer all at once, and I do not think the Government would force these companies into a bad position.

Hon. Mr. Power: What is the situation with respect to foreign companies? Are their assets in the currencies of their own countries?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: They were in the past, but at present the amount of deposits in their own currencies is extremely small. They all want to get into Canadian business. If foreign or British countries make a deposit in their own currency, then their deposit, based on the value of the Canadian dollar, must equal their liabilities in this country. Therefore, if the value of their currency should decrease they would have to deposit more assets, so that their assets would always equal the amount of their liabilities in Canada.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. William H. Taylor moved the second reading of Bill 208, an Act to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) was kind enough to ask me to explain this bill on second reading. I take it that his request was made because of my long experience in farming operations, not because of any experience I may have had in interpreting law.

The Farm Improvement Loans Act became law in 1945, as chapter 41 of the Statutes of Canada, 1944-45. From that date until 1954 chartered banks have made farm improvement loans under the act totalling more than $513 million. The Government has provided a guarantee of 10 per cent of the aggregate loans granted by the banks, and the total amount guaranteed during the period from 1945 to 1954 was approximately $50 million. In spite of this large guarantee and the very large sums loaned by the banks, the losses in that period were very trivial, amounting to less than $150,000. Thus the Government's experience in this field has been excellent.

The purpose of the bill before the house is very simple and I will not take much of your time to explain the proposed changes to the act. First of all, the bill increases the individual loan by the banker to the borrower from $4,000 to $5,000. By the statutes of 1952-53 the act was extended for a three-year period terminating on March 31, 1956, and the bill would extend it for a further three-year period, terminating on March 31, 1959. The bill also continues a revolving fund of $300 million that was provided in previous legislation for the aggregate loan.

The bill also provides a maximum penalty of $500 to be imposed on persons summarily convicted before a magistrate of making false statements in applying for a loan. A further amendment is that proceedings for an offence under section 8 of the act may be commenced at any time within twelve months from the day on which evidence, sufficient in the opinion of the minister to justify prosecution for the offence, comes to his knowledge. The minister will be required to certify as to the date on which the evidence in question came to his knowledge. Proceedings in respect of an offence under section 8 of the act may not be taken later than three years from the time when the subject-matter of the proceedings first arose.

The final section of the bill provides that the act shall be deemed to have come into force on April 1, 1956, the date on which the guarantee would otherwise expire.

Honourable senators, I hope my explanation has been sufficient and that you will endorse the second reading of this bill.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, although I do not say I am going to oppose this bill, I have never liked this type of legislation. I was a member of the Senate when this act came into force and I was opposed to it then. I still dislike the legislation, although I will admit that it has enabled many people to buy new high-powered farm machinery. In certain parts of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta it is necessary to have that kind of machinery, but it cannot be denied that the rural character of the areas where the machinery is used has been changed by reason of it. That is the march of progress, and no one can stop it. The half-section farm of the past has now become a section or a section and a half, and by reason of machinery our rural population has become markedly reduced.

Honourable senators, I have never been sure that the privilege of borrowing money too easily has helped the borrower. My experience in the city has been that more people have been ruined by banks lending them too much money than by refusing to lend them any money at all. To my knowledge some farmers are also in that position. It may be technically correct to say that the banks lose only 10 per cent, but that statement does not give the true story. If a bank lends $400,000, a loss of $40,000 on that amount would not mean a 10 per cent loss on ten separate machines or ten separate deals; it would be a loss on the gross amount loaned. I was in a bank at Virden recently, and the chief accountant said to me, "We made 73 loans yesterday and today". I asked him what kind of loans were made, and he told me that they were loans on machinery. I remarked that that was a large number of loans to make in two days, and he said, "Yes, but we have the Government guarantee". I asked him if the 10 per cent guaranteed by the Government covered each separate loan. He replied, "Oh, no, it covers 10 per cent of the total number of loans made". He said that if 75 loans were made, 10 per cent of the aggregate amount would be the maximum amount that could be lost. Until we get the final settlement it will not be clear how much the loss or gain is.

Honourable senators, I am not opposing the bill. The law is there, and it is being acted upon. With present crop conditions in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, it looks as if there will be a demand for machinery this fall, but I do not like this system of loaning, for I am not sure that it is a good plan for the farmer who has to borrow money.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Taylor: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Capital and Corporal Punishment and Lotteries begs leave to present herewith its

of the current session, being the Committee's final report upon the question whether the criminal law of Canada relating to capital punishment should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent.

The Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence tabled on June 29, 1955, by the preceding Committee were referred to this Committee; and, at this time, the Committee is returning only that portion applicable to the question of capital punishment. At the current session, no further evidence was printed and all proceedings were conducted in camera.

The sources of the evidence taken and witnesses heard on capital punishment during the first two sessions are listed alphabetically in Number 21 of the Committee's 1955 printed Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence, and a chronological schedule of the sittings of the Committee for the same period appears at page 830 of the same number.

The Committee proposes to report later on the questions of corporal punishment and lotteries, as well as to report generally on its activities, procedure, and matters relating thereto.

Respectfully submitted,

SALTER A. HAYDEN,
Joint Chairman representing the Senate.

DON. F. BROWN,
Joint Chairman representing the House of Commons.

*The first report of the Committee was a recommendation concerning its quorum, made on March 21, 1956.

FINAL REPORT ON CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

CHAPTER I

SCOPE OF INQUIRY

1. The Committee endeavoured to give consideration to all aspects of the question of capital punishment. In addition to its study of the principal issue of abolition or retention, it considered proposals for limiting or modifying capital punishment by changes in law or procedure and gave special consideration to methods of executing the sentence of capital punishment. The Committee, however, expressly excluded from its inquiry any consideration of the defence of insanity and related problems arising from mental abnormality of accused persons because these questions were being investigated concurrently by a Royal Commission specially appointed for that purpose.

CHAPTER II

EXISTING LAW AND PRACTICE

Section 1: Present Provisions for Capital Punishment

2. Treason, piracy, and murder are the only capital offences prescribed in the present Canadian Criminal Code. The revised Criminal Code, which was enacted in 1954 and came into force in 1955, abolished capital punishment for rape. In practice, capital punishment has significance only as the punishment for murder. There was no recent example of its use as punishment for other crimes.

3. The sections of the Criminal Code defining the crime of murder and related homicidal offences are set forth in Appendix "A". Canadian law differs in some important respects from the common-law definition of murder. It is based on Stephen's draft Criminal Code of 1879 which was not adopted in the United Kingdom and, consequently, some of the detailed proposals for the change of the law recently made in the United Kingdom are not relevant to Canada.

4. Capital punishment is mandatory as the penalty upon conviction for murder and there is no discretion to impose any lesser sentence. Hanging is the only method prescribed for execution (Section 642).

Section 2: Trial and Procedure

(1) Trial

5. The responsibility for the investigation and prosecution of criminal offences is vested in the provinces. A charge of murder is first heard by a magistrate at a preliminary hearing and is proceeded with if the magistrate commits the accused for trial. In provinces retaining the grand jury, a true bill must also be found by the grand jury before the accused is tried. The charge is dealt with under the law and procedure governing indictable offences.

6. Jury trial is mandatory for murder charges except in the Province of Alberta where the accused may elect to be tried by a superior court judge without a jury. Upon a charge of murder the jury may convict, acquit, or convict for a lesser offence such as manslaughter or infanticide. In some cases, juries attach a recommendation to mercy to a murder verdict but it is not the practice for judges to instruct them that this course is open. On rare occasions a person convicted of murder has insisted on entering a plea of guilty. In these cases the courts have insisted on the production of sufficient crown evidence to assure that the charge was well founded.

7. It was apparent to the Committee that special importance is attached to murder trials because of the gravity of the sentence. In particular, arrangements appear to exist in most provinces, either through provincial governments or Law Societies, for the provision of counsel for the accused and, in some instances, for other assistance in the preparation of the defence against a charge of murder.

(2) Appeals to Provincial Courts of Appeal

8. The evidence indicated that most convictions of murder are appealed to provincial courts of appeal. The procedure is the same as for other indictable offences and an appeal lies as of right on a question of law and, with leave of the court appealed to, on a mixed question of law and fact or any other ground. The detailed rules governing appeals, including the time within which an appeal or application for leave may be brought, are established by the court of appeal rules of the different provinces. The Criminal Code, however, expressly prohibits the courts from granting any extension of time for appeal or leave to appeal in capital cases, although this right exists for all other convictions.

(3) Appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada

9. A person whose conviction is upheld by a provincial court of appeal may appeal as of right to the Supreme Court of Canada where there is a dissent on a question of law in the lower court. Otherwise, a convicted person may apply to a single judge of the Supreme Court of Canada for leave to appeal on a question of law.

(4) The Royal Prerogative of Mercy

10. The Criminal Code specifically preserves the Royal Prerogative of Mercy (Section 658). In addition, the Minister of Justice may direct a new trial or refer the whole of the case to a provincial appeal court or refer any question upon which he desires assistance to a provincial appeal court for opinion (Section 596). These latter provisions have been used infrequently. Nine new trials have been ordered since 1892 of which five have resulted in acquittals, three in convictions and one where the accused was found unfit to stand trial because of insanity. Five appeals have been referred to provincial courts of appeal of which four were dismissed and one resulted in a new trial.

11. The procedure governing commutation is based partly on statute but principally on established practice. The Governor in Council is authorized to commute the death sentence to life imprisonment or any lesser sentence. The same procedure applies to every capital case whether or not the convicted person applies for commutation. As soon as practicable after trial, the judge is required to send a complete transcript of the trial together with his own report to the Remission Service of the Department of Justice. As is the practice in the United Kingdom, the Canadian Remission Service is not confined to the record of trial and appeal. Accordingly, it seeks additional evidence and information about the convicted person's background, character, personality, conduct in prison, and other relevant matters from police, custodial officers and other responsible sources. Where there is the slightest question of mental abnormality, special psychiatric reports are obtained from consulting psychiatrists employed by the Remission Service. In addition, careful consideration is given to the representations of defence counsel and friends and all points of fact and detail raised are carefully investigated to ensure that no factor favouring clemency is overlooked. In the conduct of their investigation, officers of the Remission Service and the responsible Minister, now the Solicitor General, make themselves freely available to hear oral representations on behalf of the convicted person. The officers of the Remission Service make their recommendation to the responsible Minister who, in turn, will present the case to Cabinet, indicating whether he concurs in or disagrees with their recommendation. Each capital case is considered by Cabinet which has the final decision whether the sentence of death should be carried out or commuted.

12. Since each case is judged on its own merits, the practice governing remission cannot be reduced to a statement of settled principles. The decision in many cases necessitates a review of varying circumstances and, not infrequently, the weighing of conflicting considerations. It would defeat the purpose of the exercise of the prerogative of mercy to attempt to codify the instances in which it might be invoked. The only safe and fair generalization that can be made is that commutation occurs in all cases where extenuating circumstances of a substantial nature exist or the degree of moral culpability is not sufficient to warrant the supreme penalty.

13. The prerogative is not to be exercised where the circumstances show design and premeditation unqualified by any extenuating feature or where a murder is deliberately committed either to facilitate the commission of another crime or to avoid arrest following another crime. In general, it seemed that the same grounds are urged in requests for commutation as are urged as defences at trial. The executive, however, is not bound by the same strict rules as a court and jury in giving effect to them.

14. It appeared that certain considerations have substantial weight in relation to commutation. Unlike the United Kingdom, where the law prohibits the execution of a person who commits murder while under 18, no minimum age limit is prescribed in Canada. In practice, it appeared that youth is always taken into account. Only three persons, under the age of 18 when the offence was committed, have been executed in Canada. Since 1947, only one person under the age of 20 when the offence was committed has been executed and he was 19 years and 11 months of age. Prior to 1947, the preponderance of convicted murderers under 20 had their sentences commuted.

15. Mental abnormality falling short of the legal defence of insanity is a frequent factor in commutation, and to a lesser extent drunkenness falling short of the legal defence. There is some reluctance to override a jury's finding on a specific defence such as provocation. However, provocation carries more weight if it is coupled with factors like youth, instability, intoxication, or if the provocation itself has persisted over a long period. Mercy killings and genuine suicide pacts generally result in commutation. Where a murder conviction results from a killing committed in the course of another crime, consideration is given to the degree of moral culpability of an accomplice who did not actually commit the killing but who, in law, is equally guilty of the crime of murder.

16. Careful consideration is given to every recommendation to mercy by a jury. In many instances such recommendations will cover the various circumstances outlined in preceding paragraphs; but such recommendations occur also in a general residue of cases not falling in the above categories. In the 30-year period 1920-49, such recommendations were added in 135 out of a total of 597 sentences. Subsequently, 42 of these cases were disposed of by courts of appeal and of the balance, 69 or virtually 75 per cent were commuted. On the other hand, less than 25 per cent of the cases were commuted where no recommendation to mercy occurred. A recommendation to mercy is not automatically accepted as grounds for commutation because it is regarded as only one of the important factors affecting the final decision on commutation and may be outweighed by other considerations.

17. Convictions of murder against women are not common. Most homicide convictions against women are for the reduced offences of manslaughter, infanticide, or concealment of birth. Where women are convicted of murder, there is usually a lesser degree of moral culpability. In the 30-year period 1920-49, only 14 convictions of females were considered by the Cabinet and 9 or 64·3 per cent were commuted. In the same period, 456 male cases were considered of which only 32·5 per cent or 148 were commuted. In all, 157 or 33.4 per cent of the 470 cases considered in this period were commuted.

18. The figures referred to in the preceding paragraph indicate the disposition of cases which actually reach Cabinet. They do not take account of murder convictions which are set aside on appeal either by acquittal, order of a new trial, or substitution of a conviction for a lesser offence. The overall disposition of murder convictions by 10-year groupings in the period 1920-49 is indicated by the following table:

M—Male

* From statistical data presented to the Committee by the Remission Service of the Department of Justice. (See Appendix "B", which is an extract from and extension of the Committee's Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence No. 12 of 1954 and No. 20 of 1955).

 A complete record of the disposition of capital cases from 1867 to 1954 appears as Table A in Appendix "B". This record indicates that prior to 1920 commutation occurred in a higher proportion of cases than in the 30-year period 1920 to 1949 covered by the above Table. The Committee considered that the record for the years 1920 to 1949 gives a more accurate picture of the present extent of commutation and that the inclusion of the earlier years would create a misleading impression of the proportion of cases in which commutation has occurred and is likely to occur.

19. In this 30-year period, the sentences of 25.8 per cent of the males and 37.5 per cent of the females or 26.3 per cent of the total sentenced to death were commuted. This may be compared with the 50-year period 1900-49 in the United Kingdom where, out of a total of 1,210 capital sentences (1,080 male and 130 female), 45.7 per cent were commuted representing 40.3 per cent of the males and 90.8 per cent of the females. After allowance is made for 20.4 per cent of the males, 41.7 per cent of the females or 21.3 percent of the total whose sentences were reversed by courts of appeal as indicated in paragraph 17, 33.4 per cent of all sentences actually reviewed by Cabinet were commuted. The percentage of commutations in cases considered by Cabinet was considerably higher in the 1920's (42.5%) than in the 1930's (25.2%) rising substantially in the 1940's to a point (32.6%) approximating the 30-year average.

20. On the whole, no serious criticism was offered against present remission procedures and policies. Later paragraphs of this report will indicate the Committee's view that the exercise of the prerogative of mercy is a necessary and indispensable feature of the mandatory sentence of capital punishment for murder and that, by its use, the severity of the punishment can be mitigated in appropriate cases.

Section 3: Statistics on Incidence of Murder and Homicide.

21. The Committee considered carefully, during the course of its inquiry, statistical material relating to the incidence of murder and homicide in Canada and other countries. The Committee concluded that there are gaps in Canadian statistics which cannot be filled and, from the evidence presented to it, assumes that, apart from the United Kingdom and a few other jurisdictions, this lack of complete statistical data is common to most countries.

22. The most reliable Canadian figures are those relating to the disposition of sentences of capital punishment referred to in paragraph 18. They do not give the whole story. A complete picture would include the number of suspected murders, the number solved by arrest or otherwise and the disposition of charges whether by conviction, acquittal or conviction for a lesser offence such as manslaughter. The interim recommendation made by the Committee in 1954 suggesting a revision of statistical method had been anticipated by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics but the revised and improved statistical tables now being developed did not provide sufficient perspective to assist the Committee in its decision.

23. A general impression of the incidence of murder in Canada and the disposition of charges of murder is given by the following table:

(1) Figures from 1930 to 1950 inclusive respecting charges, convictions, acquittals, commutations and executions are for the judicial year. All other figures are for the calendar year.

(2) Figures prior to 1951 are not available.

(3) Figures include charges which resulted in conviction, acquittal, jury disagreement, stay of proceedings, no bill and nolle prosequi; but do not include charges resulting in convictions for lesser offence of manslaughter (See footnote (6)) (Columns H and I).

(4) The figure for 1952 includes one sentence of death commuted to life imprisonment.

(5) Includes acquittals, jury disagreements, stay of proceedings, no bill and nolle prosequi.

(6) Figures prior to 1953 are not available. The murder charges resulting in convictions for the lesser offence of manslaughter are additional to the number of charges of murder listed under the column "Number of Charges of Murder" (See footnote (3)) (Column D).

(7) Figures prior to 1938 are not available. The figures shown cover the calendar year.

(8) Figures represent commutations and executions that took place the year mentioned regardless of the year sentences of death were imposed.

24. The statistics summarized in the preceding table are incomplete and the figures appearing under different heads were gathered by different agencies and are not related to each other. Because statistics were referred to extensively in presentations made to the Committee, it seemed desirable to set forth available Canadian statistics and to indicate their limitations.

25. The United Kingdom Royal Commission on Capital Punishment concluded that the most accurate assessment of the incidence of murder was given by a count of murders known to the police. Figures under this head have been published in Canadian Police Statistics only since 1951 and are set forth in the preceding table in column "B". Insufficient data are available to indicate any trend, but the figures do suggest that murder is not a common crime. The figures included in the column of murders known to the police include reports from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Ontario Provincial Police, and all large municipal police forces in Canada. They do not include reports from the Quebec Provincial Police or police forces in municipalities under 4,000 population.

26. Another method of statistical comparison used before the Committee was based on the number of charges of murder, tracing the disposition of those charges by conviction, acquittal or otherwise. Under the best of circumstances, an analysis of the incidence of murder based only on the number of murder charges would necessarily be incomplete because it would deal only with murders which result in prosecutions and would not include unsolved murders or cases where the suspected murderer never comes to trial because of suicide or mental incapacity. In addition, in Canada, the statistics reporting the number of charges of murder did not, until 1953, include murder charges which resulted in conviction for the lesser offence of manslaughter. The preceding table indicates that in the years 1953 and 1954 the number of charges of murder reduced to manslaughter (columns "H" and "I") approximates the number of charges of murder dealt with as such (column "D"). This means that over the years there must have been a much higher ratio of convictions in murder charges either for murder or for the reduced offence of manslaughter than is indicated by an analysis of the available statistics relating to the charges of murder only and their disposition. It should also be mentioned that, because of differences in reporting procedures, the number of convictions for murder shown in the preceding table does not coincide with the figures based on the actual cases disposed of by the Remission Service and referred to in paragraph 18.

27. The only other method of statistical comparison available is that provided by the record of homicides in ordinary vital statistics. These are open to question because they are based on the cause of death immediately recorded; frequently before the police have determined whether or not death was due to murder. These statistics are set forth in column "A" of the preceding table. They include all cases where intentional homicide was suspected as the cause of death but do not include cases where death resulted from negligence and more particularly from motor accidents. A similar reporting procedure is used in most other countries. When allowance is made for the incompleteness of vital statistics on homicides, a further complication is introduced because homicide is a broader term than murder. Professor Sellin, in presenting statistical material to the Committee, pointed out these difficulties and indicated that the validity of comparisons, based upon statistical records of killings or homicides, depended upon the number of murders in relation to total homicides remaining constant over a period of years. It seemed to the Committee as well, that an assumption has to be made that inaccuracies and omissions in statistical reporting would also balance out.

28. The Committee considered that it is necessary to emphasize the lack of complete statistical information on the crime of murder in Canada if only to indicate that other countries are in somewhat the same position,. The Committee shared the view expressed by representatives of the police that any consideration of the problems of murder and the death penalty, now or in the future, would be greatly facilitated by more and better statistical information. The Committee concluded, as a result of its consideration of the problems created by incomplete statistical information in Canada and elsewhere, that caution has to be used in interpreting statistical information from most other countries. This caution is added to that ordinarily required in comparing nations with different traditions and standards of law enforcement and becomes more significant because of the markedly different definitions of murder and related offences used by various countries.

CHAPTER III
RETENTION OR ABOLITION

Section 1: Arguments for Retention

(1) Deterrence

29. The Committee was impressed by the support of the death penalty by those having responsibility for law enforcement including all provincial attorneys general except the attorney general of Saskatchewan. The experience of the officials supporting this view indicated it was an effective deterrent to murder. They considered that it was particularly effective in deterring professional criminals from carrying weapons and committing crimes of violence. In addition, it was contended that abolition would endanger police because a criminal seeking to avoid arrest would have much less fear of the consequences of the use of firearms or violence. Capital punishment was also said to be an integral part of Canada's respected structure of law enforcement which probably deters a substantial number of professional criminals from entering Canada.

(2) Retribution

30. Capital punishment was said to be a just and appropriate punishment for murder. It was claimed that, above all other punishment, it marks society's detestation and abhorrence of the taking of life and its revulsion against the "crime of crimes". In the retributive sense, capital punishment was supported not because of a desire for revenge but rather as society's reprobation of the grave crime of murder. It was also argued that, as a result of capital punishment, there had developed over a long period of time, in the words of the United Kingdom Royal Commission, "a deep feeling of peculiar abhorrence for the crime of murder".

(3) Public Opinion

31. It was contended that public opinion in Canada remained substantially in favour of capital punishment and that it would be unwise for the Canadian Parliament to abolish capital punishment contrary to the wishes of a majority of the Canadian citizens.

(4) Prison Administration

32. It was claimed that additional administrative problems would arise in penitentiaries if all convicted murderers were imprisoned. The conduct in prison of murderers, whose death penalties had for extenuating reasons been commuted to life imprisonment, was said to be no reliable guide to the conduct of persons in respect of whose capital offences there had been no sufficiently extenuating circumstances to warrant commutation.

33. The Commissioner of Penitentiaries, who expressed no view on the principle of abolition of capital punishment, suggested that consideration should be given to the retention of capital punishment for the convicted murderer who commits a subsequent murder in prison or in the course of an escape. He said that, if this existing deterrent were removed, apprehension would exist concerning the safety of the prison staff and the general public from prisoners for whom, because they were already serving life sentences, a further sentence of imprisonment could have no deterrent effect.

34. One related argument, which has been made in other jurisdictions to the effect that capital punishment in a painless and humane form is less cruel than punishment by life-long imprisonment, was not put to this Committee.

(5) Propensity to Crimes of Violence

35. It was also suggested that care should be used in making comparisons with the experiences of the United Kingdom and other countries in Western Europe which have been longer established and are more homogeneous as regards the racial origin, the language, the religion and outlook of their citizens than Canada. In a young and growing country like Canada, with a mixed population representing many nationalities, there was a greater need for the deterrent control provided by capital punishment. The murder rate, however it was measured, was said to be appreciably higher in both the United States and Canada than in Western Europe, as was the proportion of deliberately planned homicides. Hence, it was argued, that greater danger exists on this continent of an increase in violent crime if capital punishment were abandoned. Moreover, it was contended that professional criminals were more likely to resort to violence. To this class of criminal, capital punishment was a more effective deterrent than mere imprisonment to which they were already hardened and which they tended to regard as an occupational hazard.

Section 2: Arguments for Abolition

(1) Not an Effective Deterrent

36. Capital punishment was said to have no unique deterrent effect which would not be accomplished by imprisonment. It was claimed that a considerable proportion of murders are committed in circumstances of sudden passion and such murderers cannot be deterred by threat of the consequences. In contrast, those who carefully plan a murder or a crime like robbery from which murder results, were alleged to plan deliberately to avoid detection and are not influenced by the threat of the death penalty. In effect it was claimed that the only person who might be deterred is the normal law-abiding citizen, who would not murder in any case. In substance, the argument was that certainty of detection and apprehension is a more effective deterrent than severe punishment. This argument was reinforced by reference to some theories of the behaviour sciences which indicate that capital punishment has no special deterrent effect against those who expose themselves to it. Apart from those who can meet the test of the legal defence of insanity, it was also contended that a considerable proportion of murderers are not fully responsible and cannot be restrained by the threat of a particular punishment. The argument denying any effective deterrent influence of capital punishment was supported by statistical references which were said to prove that capital punishment exercises no deterrent effect and that variations in the incidence of murder are not affected by the presence or absence of capital punishment. These statistics are discussed more fully in the next section of this chapter.

(2) Morally Wrong

37. It was contended that it is morally wrong for the state, as well as an individual, to take human life. The punishment was said to be at variance not only with the principles of Christianity but also with the humanitarian and social developments which characterize the modern world. It was alleged to be an obsolete, barbarous punishment which has been successfully dispensed with in most civilized countries and that it is out of step with modern morality and thought. It was also claimed that the public is revolted by the barbarous nature of the punishment.

(3) Based on Revenge

38. It was alleged that the death penalty is not justified as a deterrent and is retained only as a retributive punishment in the worst sense of expressing society's revenge against the murderer. It was contended that revenge should not be part of any just punishment and that the death penalty fails completely to afford any special protection to society.

(4) Morbid Aspects

39. It was contended that capital punishment is not only unjust to the murderer and ineffective as a deterrent, but is brutalizing in that it has a bad effect, not only upon prisoners and staff of the institutions where it takes place, but on society at large. It was said that the disproportionate publicity which surrounds a murder trial and an execution reflects the morbid instincts aroused by the death penalty. The shocking scenes which have accompanied some executions were cited in proof of these assertions as to the degenerative influence of capital punishment.

(5) Risk of Error

40. The punishment is irrevocable and the risk of executing an innocent person was alleged to justify abolition.

(6) Adverse Effect upon Administration of Justice

41. On the other hand, it was argued that guilty persons sometimes go free because juries are unduly swayed in their verdicts by fear of the death penalty. The punishment was criticized as unequal because the accused person who is able to employ competent counsel is much less likely to be exposed to it than the indigent person.

(7) Prison Administration

42. Opponents of the death penalty alleged that the incarceration of all convicted murderers will pose no special problems for prison administration and argued that, as a class, murderers have a superior record to other types of prisoners. Some also urged that, even if the housing of all convicted murderers presented difficulties, it would be improper to permit mere administrative considerations to stand in the way of abolition which was justified on broad grounds of public policy.

Section 3: Statistics relating to Deterrence

43. Throughout the literature on this subject and in many of its early hearings, the committee noted references to the statistical studies of Professor Thorsten Sellin and the Committee was fortunate in arranging for his attendance. His evidence presented statistical surveys comparing homicide rates (as defined in paragraph 27) in various jurisdictions in relation to the use of capital punishment.

44. Professor Sellin's oral evidence fell into three categories and was later supplemented by written evidence on a fourth matter. First, he compared homicide rates in several groups of states in the United States having similar social and economic characteristics, including in each group both states which have abolished and states which have retained capital punishment. In this way he sought to avoid the danger of comparing homicide rates in states with different traditions and social conditions. These comparisons indicate that homicide rates are similar in the various groups of states in which traditions and social conditions are substantially the same regardless of whether these states have retained or abolished the death penalty.

45. Professor Sellin's second group of comparisons traced the pattern of homicide rates, before and after abolition, in jurisdictions which have abolished the death penalty and included information on jurisdictions where capital punishment was restored after a period of abolition. These statistics also indicate that the trend of homicide rates does not appear to be affected appreciably by the presence or absence of capital punishment, and that no significant change in the rates followed abolition or reimposition of the death penalty.

46. His third group of statistics related to the incidence of homicide in Philadelphia before and after well-publicized executions and indicated that the executions appear to have had no appreciable effect on the number of homicides reported.

47. Finally, Professor Sellin and the Reverend Father Donald J. Campion submitted written studies of police killings in certain United States jurisdictions including both abolition and retention states. These studies, while comprehensive for the jurisdictions covered, did not contain data from some important states and municipalities. They indicated that the rate of police killings does not appear to be affected appreciably by the presence or absence of capital punishment.

48. The interpretation of this statistical data involves difficulty because the figures cannot express the differences in tradition, standards of law enforcement, social conditions and other factors in various countries or even regions within a country. It seems impossible to determine to what extent the movement of homicide rates may have been influenced by causes other than abolition or by a combination of abolition and other causes. However, the figures from other countries indicate that homicide rates are influenced by factors other than the death penalty, which are not easily measured or assessed, and this makes it difficult to deduce from the statistics available that abolition in Canada would not influence the homicide rate.

49. The Committee noted that Professor Sellin went farther in his presentation to it than in his presentation to the United Kingdom Royal Commission on Capital Punishment (1). In his evidence before the Royal Commission he stated in answer to a question that it could not be concluded from his statistical studies that capital punishment had no deterrent effect. In his evidence to this Committee he stated (2): "What the statistics prove is not the case for or against the death penalty, but the case against the general deterrent effect of that penalty".

50. While the Committee recognized that this statistical information assists in an understanding of this subject, it shared the opinion of the United Kingdom Royal Commission that too much should not be read into the failure to find a correlation between the death penalty and homicide rates in these statistical surveys. The Royal Commission concluded its survey of these statistics as follows: "The negative conclusion we draw from the figures does not of course imply a conclusion that the deterrent effect of the death penalty cannot be greater than that of any other punishment. It means only that the figures afford no reliable evidence one way or the other. It would no doubt be equally difficult to find statistical evidence of any direct relationship between the severity of any other punishment and the rise or fall of the crime to which it relates. Too many other factors come into the question. All we can say is that the deterrent value of punishment in general is probably liable to be exaggerated, and the effect of capital punishment specially so because of its drastic and sensational character".

Section 4: Conclusions

51. Abolition of capital punishment would involve a major change in the law and the Committee considered that it must approach this question on the basis of whether or not such a change would prejudice the safety and well-being of the public.

52. In considering the arguments for and against abolition, the Committee was conscious of the view of the provincial attorneys general and other officials responsible for law enforcement from whom it received evidence that capital punishment is an important and necessary deterrent to murder. As indicated in paragraph 50, the Committee did not consider that this opinion is displaced by other evidence based upon statistical comparisons, and the Committee has concluded that capital punishment does exercise a deterrent effect, which would not result from imprisonment or other forms of punishment.

53. The failures of capital punishment as a deterrent are obvious from the number of murders still committed. Its successes are unknown because it is impossible to determine the number of persons it has deterred from murder. One measure of its deterrent effect was afforded by an analysis of murders which indicated that a considerable proportion, probably in excess of half, are committed under the compulsion of overwhelming passion or anger where no deterrent could have been effective. This would seem to demonstrate that the death penalty, coupled with the excellent standards of law enforcement prevailing in Canada, has been successful in deterring the commission of deliberate, premeditated murders and reducing their incidence to minimum proportions. The deterrent effect may also be indicated by the widespread association of the crime of murder with the death penalty which is undoubtedly one reason why murder is regarded as such a grave and abhorrent crime.

(2) 1954 Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence, No. 17, p. 671 (Queen's Printer, Ottawa).

54. The Committee has already indicated in paragraph 28 that comparisons between different countries on the basis of available statistics must, of necessity, be made with reservations. However, the Committee considered that criminals in North America appear more prone to the use of firearms and violence than European criminals. The Committee does not attempt to explain why this should be so, although it appears likely that it results from the comparative youthfulness of North American society and the variegated nature of its population. Whatever the reason may be, the Committee is of the opinion that it is obviously more imperative to retain the stern penalty of capital punishment as a continuing restraint against the use of violence by professional criminals.

55. The Committee also noted a difference in the types of murder committed in Canada and the United Kingdom. In the United Kingdom, murders of the familial-passion type which are not subject to control by the death penalty or any other penalty, constitute an appreciably higher proportion. In contrast, it seems that, proportionately, twice as many Canadian murders are committed in connection with robbery which indicates that, on the whole, Canadian murders are committed more frequently by professional criminals. The Committee has concluded that the death penalty is most likely to operate as a restraint and a deterrent to professional criminals who are obviously not deterred from crime by the risk of imprisonment alone, and that it is necessary to retain capital punishment to minimize the tendency of Canadian criminals to use violence in the commission of other crimes.

56. The Committee, while recognizing the substantial support given by many persons to the abolition of capital punishment, considered there is a still wider group who support and accept capital punishment. This support reflects the public's revulsion against murder, the "crime of crimes". Equally, the Committee considered that the public abhorrence of murder reflects a traditional attitude built up by the reservation of capital punishment for this particular crime. The abolition of a penalty traditionally accepted as a just and effective deterrent could only be recommended if the evidence clearly established that the ordinary citizen's view of its efficacy was demonstrably wrong. The experience of other jurisdictions shows that abolition, in the face of strong public support of capital punishment, might lead to confusion and doubt which adversely affect the administration of justice.

57. The Committee, in reaching the conclusion that it is in the public interest to retain capital punishment, took into account additional considerations relating to the apprehension, trial, and custody of accused persons upon which it desired to record its views.

58. The Committee was of the opinion that capital punishment does protect the police to a greater extent than imprisonment alone would do by deterring criminals from using firearms or violence to facilitate the commission of crimes, or escapes from arrest or attempted apprehension.

59. Some witnesses suggested that juries might be swayed by fear of the death sentence, and refuse to render murder verdicts in appropriate cases with the result that the guilty are not punished. The Committee, however, accepted the view of most law-enforcement authorities appearing before it that the great majority of jurors do not shrink from their duty because of fear of accepting responsibility for a sentence of capital punishment. While there is ample evidence that court and jury alike insist on the highest standards of proof in murder trials, the Committee did not consider that the existence of the death sentence interferes with the administration of justice. There are undoubtedly cases where the verdicts of juries, either acquitting or convicting for a lesser offence, are not easily reconciled with the evidence, but the Committee considered that, in these instances, juries may have been moved by their sympathy with the accused rather than by any reluctance to impose capital punishment.

60. Considerable emphasis was put on the risk of irrevocable error in capital convictions. The fact that there was no known Canadian instance of the execution of an innocent person indicated the effectiveness of present procedures by way of trial and executive review and this suggests that the risk of error does not present a reasonable argument for abolition in Canada.

61. The Committee considered that the proper management of prisons and executions can and does prevent adverse effects on prisoners and the public generally, and there was no evidence that properly trained and selected personnel, charged with the duty of superintending all details of executions, are left with any lasting ill effects.

62. The Committee took note of both the report of the United Kingdom Royal Commission on Capital Punishment, 1949-53, and the subsequent debates in the United Kingdom Parliament. Recently the British House of Commons approved the abolition of capital punishment. The Committee did not consider that the recent decisions of the United Kingdom House of Commons afford any compelling reason for it to reconsider its decision.

There are obvious differences between the two countries which may indicate that capital punishment is necessary and more effective in Canada. Moreover, the Committee noted that the votes in favour of abolition were carried by small majorities and that public opinion in the United Kingdom appears divided on the question. If the United Kingdom Parliament abolishes capital punishment, the experience of that country after abolition may be of assistance to Canada in the event that this question is studied again, as this Committee considers it should be, within the next decade.

63. While the Committee considered that capital punishment should be subjected to periodic review by Parliament, it recommends that the death penalty should be retained as the mandatory punishment for the crime of murder.

CHAPTER IV

SPECIFIC PROPOSALS FOR LIMITATION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Section 1: Crimes other than Murder

64. The Committee is of the opinion that capital punishment should not be extended to cover any crimes for which it is not at present a penalty. Specifically, the Committee approved of the deletion in the new Criminal Code of capital punishment as a penalty for rape.

65. The Committee believed that capital punishment should be retained as a punishment for treason and piracy. The latter offence is virtually obsolete but the retention of the grave penalty conforms to the general practice of common-law jurisdictions. The penalties for treason were carefully considered by Parliament during the enactment of the new Criminal Code and the use of capital punishment was suitably restricted to the most serious types of treasonable activity.

Section 2: Redefinition of the Crime of Murder

66. No specific proposal was put forward to the Committee for the redefinition of the crime of murder. Some witnesses, however, expressed the opinion that the crime might be redefined so that it would be limited to cases involving the greatest degree of moral culpability. The Committee recognized that murder is a many-sided crime. Many murders arise in circumstances where no premeditation is possible and where the killing follows suddenly from the passions of the moment. Other murders are premeditated, but not ignobly motivated, an example being what is called a "mercy killing". Some are not premeditated in the sense of representing the combination of a long and deliberately-planned scheme of killing but nonetheless are reprehensible because they arise from a wanton disregard of human life, an example being the killing committed in the course of an armed robbery. These examples are mentioned simply to show that any attempt to redefine murder rigidly in terms of specific premeditation or intent is not likely to accomplish fully the purpose of excluding killings involving little moral culpability and including only killings involving grave moral culpability. In this connection the Committee noted the many proposals considered in the United Kingdom in the past 80 years. It shares the conclusion of the United Kingdom Royal Commission on Capital Punishment that the various proposals for the redefinition of the crime of murder are not wholly satisfactory and cannot recommend any for the favourable consideration of Parliament.

67. The Canadian law of murder is not altogether comparable with that of the United Kingdom because, as mentioned in the opening sections of this report, the Canadian Criminal Code incorporates the codification proposed by Stephen in 1879 which was never accepted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. This results, in practice, in two substantial differences between the Canadian and United Kingdom law of murder which did not appear to be appreciated by all witnesses who appeared before the Committee. In the first place, the defence of provocation has a wider ambit in Canada, and includes provocation by words as well as by deeds. Secondly, the concept of constructive murder is narrower in Canada than in the United Kingdom and, in general, is limited to killings arising in the commission or attempted commission of specified crimes of violence or in the course of escape from apprehension following such crimes or attempted crimes.

68. The Committee was of the opinion that no useful purpose would be served in attempting to specify, to any greater degree than at present, the responsibility of accomplices in crimes from which killing results. Since the type of murder which presents a peculiar problem in Canada is that arising in the course of a robbery, the Committee considers that the present law serves a useful purpose in making it clear that all those, who knowingly participate in an armed robbery in which it is clearly contemplated that violence will be used if necessary, should know that they are all equally liable to be charged with murder if killing results.

69. In practice, the Committee considered that any redefinition of the crime of murder should conform closely to the present practice in commuting sentences of capital punishment. Having concluded that it is not practicable to achieve a satisfactory redefinition of murder, the Committee also decided that differences between murders can only be recognized by granting commutation in suitable circumstances. Since differentiation in the crime of murder depends to a considerable extent upon the assessment of moral culpability of a crime, the Committee is of the opinion that the ends of justice are best served by the continuation of the present practice of mitigating the rigour of the law in appropriate cases by the exercise of executive clemency.

Section 3: Degrees of Murder

70. Several witnesses suggested that consideration might be given to the creation of degrees of murder which would take into account the difference in moral culpability between different types of homicides. All witnesses representing law-enforcement authorities opposed the establishment of degrees of murder. The Committee shares the conclusions of the United Kingdom Royal Commission on this question. The Committee is of the opinion that the present distinction between murder and manslaughter is quite clear and straightforward. It considers that any attempt to break murder down into degrees may lead to the creation of technical and confusing distinctions without, at the same time, creating any precise delineation between murders of differing degrees of moral culpability.

71. The experience of the United States seemed to suggest that, in the last analysis, the selection between the different degrees of murder is made by juries for reasons which are not too clear and which, in the words of the late Mr. Justice Cardozo, are shrouded in a cloud of words. In fact, in most jurisdictions in the United States the creation of degrees of murder has been accompanied in late years by the conferring of a discretion on the judge or jury to dispense with capital punishment for first-degree murder. Some reference was also made to the practice in some American jurisdictions of trafficking in the degrees of murder and accepting pleas of guilty for the lesser degree in place of prosecuting first-degree murder charges in serious cases. While this result might not occur in Canada, it suggests an added reason for caution in creating degrees of murder.

Section 4: Discretion as to Sentence

72. The Committee considered, as another method of limiting the rigour of capital punishment, the possibility of reposing discretion as to sentence in either the judge or the jury. The Committee noted that the United Kingdom Royal Commission on Capital Punishment concluded that permitting the jury to exercise discretion as to whether or not capital punishment should be imposed was the only practicable method of limiting the operation of capital punishment aside from complete reliance on executive clemency.

73. The Committee considers that it would be inappropriate and inadvisable to leave any discretion as to sentence to the judge. Apart from the difficulty of placing such an onerous responsibility upon one judge, there is the danger that inconsistency and lack of certainty might develop in practice as a result of differing policies followed by different judges.

74. The Committee does not favour the granting of discretion as to sentence to the jury because it does not conform to the traditional function of the jury which is to decide whether a person is guilty or innocent as charged. The Committee also considers that the exercise of a jury's discretion on the question of sentence would result in inconsistency and uncertainty in the administration of the law.

Section 5: Limitation in respect of Women and Young Persons

75. The commission of murder by women is rare and usually occurs in circumstances which warrant the exercise of the Royal Prerogative of Mercy. In the few cases where commutation of the death sentence was not warranted, the Committee can see no justification for treating women any differently from men.

76. The Committee noticed that the invariable practice has been to commute the sentence of all persons under 18 and that, since 1945, the sentence has rarely been executed against a person 20 years and under. The Committee balanced the consideration, that youth must always be a mitigating factor, against the fact that some of the most callous crimes are committed by young offenders showing a total disrespect for life or property. The Committee noted that the United Kingdom Royal Commission on Capital Punishment unanimously favoured the retention of the present United Kingdom law prohibiting the execution of offenders under 18 but was almost equally divided in considering whether the exemption should be raised to 21. The Committee concluded that it would be proper to amend the law to provide that the death penalty should not apply to a person of the age of 18 years or less at the time of the commission of the offence and recommends strongly that, except in extraordinary cases, the present practice of commuting most death sentences passed on persons under 21 years be continued.

CHAPTER V

PROPOSALS AFFECTING TRIAL AND APPEAL

Section 1: Trial

77. The Committee gave consideration to all aspects of the procedure in capital cases at trial and on appeal and concluded that certain procedural changes are desirable if capital punishment is retained.

78. The Committee considered that two essential conditions should be met in all murder trials. First, the accused should be fully advised of the facts upon which the prosecution will base its case. Secondly, the accused should have the benefit of the advice and defence of competent, experienced counsel at all stages including the preliminary hearing, trial, and appeal and should have facilities and funds to procure evidence and witnesses essential to a proper defence.

79. The Committee has already mentioned the differences of opinion expressed about the efficiency of present procedures in ensuring that the defence is given proper notice of the essentials of the case for the prosecution. The Committee considers that no room for doubt should exist in capital cases and that the Criminal Code should be amended to provide that all facts upon which the prosecution proposes to base its case are disclosed to the defence in advance of trial.

80. The view was expressed by some witnesses that an accused person, who is able to employ competent counsel, has a better chance of acquittal than an indigent person. While the Committee was aware of no specific instance where an accused may have suffered because of an inadequate defence, it concluded that the present system of providing assistance to the defence in capital cases is based too much on the charity and spirit of public service of the bar and prosecuting authorities. The Committee recognized that the provision of counsel and other aids to the accused is the responsibility of provincial authorities but nevertheless respectfully recommends that existing arrangements should be reviewed. Specifically, the Committee recommends, for the consideration of provincial authorities, that arrangements be made for the employment and payment of competent counsel at all stages in a capital case and that funds and facilities be made available, where necessary, to assist the defence in procuring evidence and otherwise preparing its case for trial.

81. The Committee has already noted that it is possible for an accused to plead guilty in a capital case. The Committee believes that it is extremely undesirable to admit pleas of guilty in capital cases because the capacity of the accused must always be taken as doubtful and the acceptance of the plea almost makes the court privy to a scheme for self-destruction. Thus, the Committee recommends that the law be amended to provide that all murder trials proceed as if a plea of not guilty were entered.

Section 2: Appeals to Provincial Courts of Appeal

82. There was evidence that the present law, which prohibits the extension of the time prescribed for bringing an appeal in applications for leave to appeal in capital cases, may cause both injustice and embarrassment. The possibility exists that a technical slip may deprive an accused of his right to appeal. Extraordinary devices, such as the reference of a case to a provincial appeal court by the Minister of Justice, have been employed to circumvent this strict rule. The Committee considered that no technical barrier should prevent the review of every capital conviction by a provincial Court of Appeal. Equally, the Committee recognized the desirability of avoiding unnecessary delay in the disposition of capital cases and noted the experience of other jurisdictions where technical procedural delaying actions have frustrated the course of justice.

83. In the Committee's opinion, it is necessary to provide for an appeal procedure open to all, but which will not be prolonged or rendered uncertain in its effectiveness by procedural technicalities. The Committee concluded that this purpose can best be achieved by providing for an automatic appeal to a provincial appellate court after every capital conviction. The Committee contemplates that after conviction the record will be transmitted to the appellate court which will then be able to govern the conduct of the appeal by its own rules. Under this procedure, the Committee would expect provincial authorities, in all necessary cases, to arrange for the provision of competent counsel and the preparation of all materials and documents required for the appeal. The Committee recommends that the Criminal Code be amended to provide for an automatic appeal to a provincial

Court of Appeal in capital cases and respectfully commends, for the consideration of provincial authorities, its views on the provision of assistance to an accused in the conduct of his appeal.

Section 3: Appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada

84. At present, appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada are limited to appeals as of right where there is a dissent on a question of law in the provincial Court of Appeal. Otherwise an appeal may be taken only on a question of law if leave is obtained from one judge of the Supreme Court of Canada. Because of the gravity of the crime and sentence, the Committee considered it proper that an opportunity to be heard by the court of last resort should be open to every person subject to a capital sentence and recommends that the law be amended to provide for an appeal as of right in such event to the Supreme Court of Canada.

CHAPTER VI

METHOD OF EXECUTION

Section 1: Present Practice

85. Executions are now carried out by hanging. In Quebec and the four Western Provinces, hangings take place at central prisons, while in Ontario and New Brunswick they take place in county jails. Where centralized facilities are available they appear to be satisfactory, but there was considerable criticism of the temporary facilities which have to be erected in county jails. These are objectionable from several standpoints. The erection of the facilities naturally disturbs the condemned man and other prisoners. The occurrence of a hanging in the smaller centre, usually in a jail which is centrally located, awakens the morbid instincts of a section of the public. The fact that the facilities have to be hastily constructed frequently means that the condemned person must walk a considerable distance from his cell to the gallows. There was also the suggestion that personnel are not necessarily so well trained as in the centralized locations, and this may affect not only the conduct of the execution itself but the aftermath caused by the reaction left with officials present at the execution.

86. Generally speaking, in all provinces the same rules seem to govern the custody of the condemned man and the events immediately preceding execution. The condemned person is kept in a cell segregated from the rest of the prison, is afforded more privileges than the ordinary prisoner and is kept under extremely close surveillance. Under the authority of regulations issued by the Governor in Council, hangings now take place immediately after midnight on the day fixed for execution and are conducted as much as possible to avoid disturbance to other prisoners and to eliminate undue public attention. The conduct of executions is the responsibility of provincial officials. Two provinces had official hangmen who are available to serve in other jurisdictions when required.

87. Because it was not the practice to conduct post-mortems after executions by hanging, there appeared to be some uncertainty as to the exact causes of death in all cases, although the general presumption was that it occurred because of a fracture of the spinal column and injury to the spinal cord. The Committee recommends that, if hanging is retained, the law be amended to provide for post-mortems to ascertain the precise cause of death.

Section 2: Place of Execution

88. The Committee considers that the responsibility for providing facilities for execution should remain with the provinces and that all executions should be held in central locations in each province. The Criminal Code at present permits provincial authorities to designate central places of execution. The Committee is of the opinion that executions in central locations would be conducted with greater despatch and efficiency and in an atmosphere of greater decency and dignity than is the case with executions in local jails.

Section 3: Method of Execution

89. The Committee considered the merits of four different methods of execution, namely, hanging, electrocution, the gas chamber and lethal injection. Evidence on hanging was received from several prison officials and medical officers who had witnessed hangings in Canada as well as from the executioner who had officiated at most recent Canadian hangings. The Warden of Illinois State Penitentiary described the process of electrocution carried on in his institution and a description of execution by gas chamber was given by the former Warden of San Quentin Penitentiary in California. In addition, independent expert evidence on the effects and implications of the various methods of execution was presented by two leaders in the field of pharmacology and neurology who has been invited to appear before the Committee.

90. It was apparent that serious practical difficulties would arise if lethal injection by hypodermic needle were adopted as the method of execution and because of this the Committee gave less consideration to this method than the other three. The virtue alleged for execution by lethal injection was that it ensured instantaneous and painless death free from the fears aroused by other methods of execution. The Committee ascertained that this could only be accomplished by intravenous injection and that skill was required to give such an injection. The Committee considered that it was not reasonable to expect a medical doctor to perform a task so repugnant to the tradition of the medical profession. Moreover, an intravenous injection is a delicate operation requiring the subject to keep absolutely still, and even if other skilled personnel were trained for the task, there would be substantial risk of mishap unless the condemned person was entirely acquiescent. The Committee thus concluded that lethal injection was not a practical method of execution.

91. The Committee considered that one of the principal objections to hanging was that so much depended upon the personal competence of the hangman, leaving a greater margin for error than in the case of execution by electrocution or the gas chamber. It may be that a hanging, conducted efficiently and with proper facilities, may be accomplished more quickly and with less anguish to the condemned person than the other two methods of execution. The Committee noted that, for this reason, the United Kingdom Royal Commission concluded that hanging should be retained. The evidence of medical witnesses and others, however, indicated that hangings in Canada were not conducted with the same degree of precision as in the United Kingdom and that there was no way of knowing, in some cases, how death was caused and whether loss of consciousness had been instantaneous. Examples of bungled hangings were brought to the Committee's attention. Moreover the Committee sensed from the evidence given by experienced officials and others, that hanging was regarded generally as being an obsolete, if not a barbaric method of execution. The Committee has concluded, after weighing these considerations, that hanging is not the most satisfactory method of execution which might be employed and, accordingly, recommends its abolition.

92. The advantage of both electrocution and the gas chamber is that they avoid the worst psychological associations connected with hanging and are also proof, to a much greater extent, against human frailty and error. The criticisms made of electrocution were that in some United States jurisdictions it had resulted in burning and mutilation of the body of the condemned person. No such problems arose from execution by the inhalation of lethal gas and the former warden of San Quentin Penitentiary contended that it was the least objectionable method of execution from the standpoint of both the condemned person and officials. On the other hand the gas chamber was criticized because of the danger to which it exposed the prison staff and because of the final strain it put on the condemned person. It was said that after lethal gas was released into the gas chamber the condemned person would be tempted to hold his breath for as long as possible.

93. In considering the merits of the two methods of execution, the Committee was influenced, to a substantial degree, by the evidence of the independent medical experts who both recommended electrocution as the most satisfactory method. Their recommendation was based on the extensive experience resulting from the use of electric shock treatments for mental diseases. This experience indicated that the application of even a small charge of electricity would produce instantaneous unconsciousness. It is the only method of execution where it could be established that unconsciousness was produced instantaneously and that death was painless. Moreover, the experts maintained that if properly conducted an electrocution would not result in any burning or mutilation of the body. Scientific knowledge indicated that life could be terminated by a series of shocks of alternating low and high voltages and that massive shocks which might result in burning were not necessary. The evidence of the warden of Illinois Penitentiary supported this view and his experience was that the application of carefully regulated alternating shocks resulted in instantaneous unconsciousness and speedy termination of life without any burning or mutilation. The medical experts suggested that electrocution need not be carried out in an electric chair and that simpler and less repulsive facilities might be employed.

94. The Committee concluded that the most satisfactory method of execution is by electrocution and, accordingly, recommends that the law be amended to replace hanging by electrocution. This recommendation, however, is premised on the evidence that modern methods of electrocution can produce instantaneous unconsciousness and painless death without any of the evil effects traditionally associated with the electric chair. If further investigation should create doubt as to the possibility of employing electrocution in this manner then the Committee considers it would be preferable to substitute the gas chamber as the method of execution.

CHAPTER VII

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

95. A summary of the Committee's recommendations is as follows:

(1) Retention of Capital Punishment as mandatory penalty for murder (paragraph 63).

(2) Retention of Capital Punishment for treason and piracy (paragraph 65).
(3) No change in definition of murder (paragraph 69).
(4) No "degrees of murder" (paragraphs 70-71).
(5) No special provision for women (paragraph 75).
(6) Abolition of Capital Punishment for offenders under 18 and restriction for offenders under 21 (paragraph 76).
(7) Full disclosure of Crown's case to accused (paragraph 79).
(8) Provision of competent counsel and assistance in producing evidence(paragraph 80).
(9) Mandatory plea of "not guilty" in Capital Cases (paragraph 81).
(10) Automatic appeal to provincial Court of Appeal in all Capital Cases (paragraph 83).
(11) Appeal as of Right by a Convicted Person to Supreme Court of Canada (paragraph 84).
(12) Centralized places of execution in each province (paragraph 88).
(13) Abolition of Hanging—Replacement by Electrocution with alternative of the Gas Chamber (paragraphs 91-94).

96. Appendices "A" and "B" are annexed hereto.

Respectfully submitted,

SALTER A. HAYDEN
Joint Chairman representing the Senate.

DON. F. BROWN,
Joint Chairman representing the House of Commons.

APPENDIX "A"

CRIMINAL CODE SECTIONS DEFINING THE CRIME OF MURDER AND RELATED HOMICIDAL OFFENCES

MURDER, MANSLAUGHTER AND INFANTICIDE

Murder

201. Culpable homicide is murder

(a) where the person who causes the death of a human being
  (i) means to cause his death, or
  (ii) means to cause him bodily harm that he knows is likely to cause his death, and is reckless whether death ensues or not;

(b) where a person, meaning to cause death to a human being or meaning to cause him bodily harm that he knows is likely to cause his death, and being reckless whether death ensues or not, by accident or mistake causes death to another human being, notwithstanding that he does not mean to cause death or bodily harm to that human being; or

(c) where a person, for an unlawful object, does anything that he knows or ought to know is likely to cause death, and thereby causes death to a human being, notwithstanding that he desires to effect his object without causing death or bodily harm to any human being.

Murder in commission of offences

202. Culpable homicide is murder where a person causes the death of a human being while committing or attempting to commit treason or an offence mentioned in section 52, piracy, escape or rescue from prison or lawful custody, resisting lawful arrest, rape, indecent assault, forcible abduction, robbery, burglary or arson, whether or not the person means to cause death to any human being and whether or not he knows that death is likely to be caused to any human being, if

Intention to cause bodily harm

(a) he means to cause bodily harm for the purpose of
  (i) facilitating the commission of the offence, or
  (ii) facilitating his flight after committing or attempting to commit the offence, and the death ensues from the bodily harm;

Administering overpowering thing

(b) he administers a stupefying or overpowering thing for a purpose mentioned in paragraph (a), and the death ensues therefrom;

Stopping the breath

(c) he wilfully stops, by any means, the breath of a human being for a purpose mentioned in paragraph (a), and the death ensues therefrom; or

Using weapon

(d) he uses a weapon or has it upon his person

(i) during or at the time he commits or attempts to commit the offence, or

(ii) during or at the time of his flight after committing or attempting to commit the offence, and the death ensues as a consequence.

Murder reduced to manslaughter

203. (1) Culpable homicide that otherwise would be murder may be reduced to manslaughter if the person who committed it did so in the heat of passion caused by sudden provocation.

What is provocation

(2) A wrongful act or insult that is of such a nature as to be sufficient to deprive an ordinary person of the power of self-control is provocation for the purposes of this section if the accused acted upon it on the sudden and before there was time for his passion to cool.

Questions of fact

(3) For the purposes of this section the questions

(a) whether a particular wrongful act or insult amounted to provocation, and

(b) whether the accused was deprived of the power of self-control by the provocation that he alleges he received, are questions of fact, but no one shall be deemed to have given provocation to another by doing anything that he had a legal right to do, or by doing anything that the accused incited him to do in order to provide the accused with an excuse for causing death or bodily harm to any human being.

Death during illegal arrest

(4) Culpable homicide that otherwise would be murder is not necessarily manslaughter by reason only that it was committed by a person who was being arrested illegally, but the fact that the illegality of the arrest was known to the accused may be evidence of provocation for the purpose of this section.

Infanticide

204. A female person commits infanticide when by a wilful act or omission she causes the death of her newly-born child, if at the time of the act or omission she is not fully recovered from the effect of giving birth to the child and by reason thereof or of the effect of lactation consequent on the birth of the child her mind is then disturbed.

Manslaughter

205. Culpable homicide thas is not murder or infanticide is manslaughter.

Punishment of murder

206. Every one who commits murder is guilty of an indictable offence and shall be sentenced to death.

Punishment for manslaughter

207. Every one who commits manslaughter is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.

Punishment for infanticide

208. Every female person who commits infanticide is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years.

Killing unborn child

209. (1) Every one who causes the death of a child that has not become a human being, in such a manner that, if the child were a human being, he would be guilty of murder, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.

Saving

(2) This section does not apply to a person who, by means that, in good faith, he considers necessary to preserve the life of the mother of a child that has not become a human being, causes the death of the child.

Attempt to commit murder

210. Every one who attempts by any means to commit murder is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.

Accessory after fact to murder

211. Every one who is an accessory after the fact to murder is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.

SUICIDE

Counselling or aiding suicide

212. Every one who

(a) counsels or procures a person to commit suicide, or

(b) aids or abets a person to commit suicide, whether suicide ensues or not, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for fourteen years.

Attempt to commit suicide

213. Every one who attempts to commit suicide is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

POWERS OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Powers of Minister of Justice

596. The Minister of Justice may, upon an application for the mercy of the Crown by or on behalf of a person who has been convicted in proceedings by indictment,

(a) direct, by order in writing, a new trial before any court that he thinks proper, if after inquiry he is satisfied that in the circumstances a new trial should be directed;

(b) refer the matter at any time to the court of appeal for hearing and determination by that court as if it were an appeal by the convicted person; or

(c) refer to the court of appeal at any time, for its opinion, any question upon which he desires the assistance of that court, and the court shall furnish its opinion accordingly.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Form of sentence

642. The sentence to be pronounced against a person who is sentenced to death shall be that he shall be hanged by the neck until he is dead.

Royal prerogative

658. Nothing in this Act in any manner limits or affects Her Majesty's royal prerogative of mercy.

TABLE D.

PROPORTION OF COMMUTATIONS (1920–1949)

This table shows the number of persons whose sentences were, during the relevant period, commuted to sentences of life imprisonment. It is the counterpart of Table III of the United Kingdom Royal Commission Report, at page 13. This table is to be distinguished from Table E which deals not with all sentences of death imposed during the relevant period, but only with those that came before the Governor in Council for decision on the question of commutation.

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS FINANCING AND GUARANTEE BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the report of the committee on Bill 415.

The report was read by the Clerk as follows:

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to whom was referred the Bill 415 intituled: "An Act to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways System during the calendar year 1956, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company", have in obedience to the order of reference of June 20, 1956, examined the said bill and now report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators will have observed that only one item stands for consideration on our Order Paper, namely, the report of the Standing Committee on Finance. It is altogether likely that the discussion on this report will be concluded today, thereby clearing our Order Paper of any business.

Hon. Mr. Reid: We had better leave it on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am unable to say when we may receive any legislation from the other house, and I do not know of any Government legislation to be introduced here during the remainder of this session. We are therefore in the position of having no business on our Order Paper and no prospects of receiving legislation shortly from the other house. In those circumstances I feel it is in order for the Senate to adjourn for a week, or perhaps two weeks.

We do not want to hold up the work of Parliament, and we are ready to consider any legislation as soon as we receive it. It will be recalled that in March we passed a motion authorizing His Honour the Speaker to summon honourable members back into session during any adjournment if an emergency should arise. In moving a two-weeks' adjournment today I am doing so on the distinct understanding that if legislation comes over from the House of Commons while the Senate is adjourned His Honour may deem it advisable to request honourable senators to return here before the date specified in the motion. Subject to that proviso, I now move that when this house adjourns today it stand adjourned until Tuesday evening, July 17, at 8 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON FINANCE CONCURRED IN

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, June 26, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hawkins, seconded by Hon. Mr. Isnor, for concurrence in the report of the Standing Committee on Finance on the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I rise at this time for the purpose of praising the report. I do not intend to criticize it, but I do intend to dissent from it in part. I think the over-all report is an excellent one; it is factual and enlightening; and I commend the chairman and the members of the committee for the work they have done on it. One of the things I like about it is that it is couched in understandable language. One paragraph particularly will remain with us for a very long time, and I concur in the remarks of the honourable senator for Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) who called it to the attention of this house a few days ago. I think that that particular paragraph is cogent, lucid and potent, and it seems to me that it is a memorable contribution to the deliberations of the Senate.

I address myself to that portion of the report dealing with annuities, because this is a reflective body, and the recommendations made by the committee are serious ones and intended to be dealt with on a serious basis, not in a sort of greeting-card fashion.

I think something should be said with particular emphasis on the recommendation made on annuities. It is not a new one. It reflects an annuity outlook which has emanated from the Senate almost annually. But the recommendation has not been reflected either in the country or in the House of Commons. The theme which is expressed in the commitee's report and which, as I have said, has been here supported on other occasions, was taken up in February last year by Mr. William M. Anderson, President of the North America Life Assurance Company and President of the Life Insurance Companies Association. He said that they take exception to handicaps and competition which are created by the incidence of taxation. At the same time, according to the newspaper reports, it was intimated that business for the life insurance companies had never been better.

I repeat that the recommendation in the committee's report has not been reflected in the House of Commons. Last year, in that house, a member presented all the arguments that appear on the record—as well as some that do not—of the hearings before the Senate Finance Committee, and moved that the estimate for annuities be reduced. I remember that very well, because I made sure that I was there to vote. It will interest this house to know that the vote was 213 against the motion, and one in favour. That indicates the attitude of the House of Commons with respect to government annuities.

The Government Annuities Act was introduced into Parliament by a Liberal Government, and passed in 1908. Its main purpose was to encourage thrift amongst people of modest means. In the field of annuities the Government was a pioneer, and had the field to itself for nearly 30 years. It was not until the forties that life insurance and other companies entered the field. The Government of 1908 agreed to assume administration costs and to make the interest rates attractive. Nothing has happened since to change that. It is my view that there is a greater need for annuities today than ever before. Time has proved that government annuities are attractive in price and beneficial in results. They offer the very best deal in annuities in Canada today, and my only regret is that more people have not taken advantage of this excellent social measure.

To suggest, as has been suggested, that the $40 a month old age pension justifies doing away with government annuities is the height of something or other. I am not prepared to cut the cost of government by starting on those annuitants who are saving and providing for their old age so that they may not become either a government or a family responsibility. People who provide security at their own expense are reducing the cost of government assistance.

Yet, honourable senators, I am not in agreement with the act as it is at the present time. In my opinion, the present limitation of $1,200 is totally inadequate. The decline in the purchasing power of the dollar demands that the original purpose of the act be widened. The present limit is out of line with real values which prevailed when the limit was set, which I believe was some time in the thirties. I think the maximum amount of annuity obtainable should be increased to $2,400.

It is not true that government annuities are being used as an investment. May I quote from the Department of Labour's Annual Report, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1955, page 27:

> From September 1, 1908, the date of the inception of the Annuities Branch, up to and inclusive of March 31, 1955, the total number of new individual contracts and certificates issued was 393,232.

Farther down on the same page the report states:

> The number of contracts analyzed was 60,198—an increase of 3,461 or 6·1 per cent over the number for the previous year. From Table 4 (A), which shows the distribution of contracts by amount of annuity, it may be seen that 65·3 per cent of the annuities were for amounts under $600, 21·7 per cent for $600 but less than $1,200 and 13 per cent for $1,200 or over.

The cost of administration last year was $1,648,820. I think the house will agree with me that thrift is a social virtue. Ten cents per capita—for that is all it costs—is a small price to pay for encouraging Canadians to practise thrift—it is merely the price of a cup of coffee, a glass of milk, a chocolate bar, or an ice cream cone.

In short, I do not believe the Government is spending too much money for this purpose, as some members of this house have suggested. On the contrary, I think the Government is spending too little. In the long run, no matter how much is spent the taxpayer will save money by encouraging people to provide for their old age. "Safeguard your future with government annuities" is a fine slogan. I repeat that this is the best annuity deal on the market; it is cheaper and safer than other plans of thrift. This should be untouchable legislation. Improve it, if you like; ignore it, if you like; but don't destroy it.

The point has been made in the house that government annuities are subsidized. I do not deny that. I am not one of those who are opposed to subsidies, for I supported them all the time I was in the House of Commons; wherever subsidies are warranted they are entitled to support.

While talking about subsidies, let me remind this house that last week I voted in favour of the gold mining subsidy, which provides for the payment of about $9 million a year to assist a portion of Ontario, a portion of Quebec, and a portion of British Columbia. I think that assistance is essential to the existence of certain mining communities. Well, the gold mining subsidy is four and a half times the amount of the annuities subsidy. Last week we had before us a supply bill which included a butter subsidy of $3 million for this year. I do not know what the egg subsidy is, but the feed grains subsidy is $16 million, and the wheat subsidy is $35 million for storage charges. I gladly support those subsidies, and I wonder why there should be objection to a small subsidy for annuities. In this house are men who have served here for a great many years, to the credit of the house—and I mean that—but I wonder if they know that for 25 years there has been a subsidy of hundreds of thousands of dollars on pails used for collecting sap for the maple sugar industry. Perhaps the Finance Committee should single out that subsidy for criticism rather than the subsidy on annuities.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: The item to which my friend refers was introduced by the late Honourable Mr. Fisher, Minister of Agriculture, for the benefit of the Eastern Townships.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I do not complain about it. All I am saying is that if we are trying to cut down on subsidies, I would have thought that maple sap buckets offered better opportunity for this purpose than annuities. I do not quarrel with the subsidy on the buckets; indeed, I voted for it year after year while a member of the other house. However, I am told that it will disappear from the estimates this year; but that is a matter for departmental judgment. To sum up: every department has subsidies, of one kind or another, and I cannot understand why we should single out this bit of social legislation for criticism. It seems to me particularly inappropriate in the circumstances.

Honourable senators may ask who needs these annuities. Let me try to answer that question. There are in this country 860,000 people receiving old age security benefits, of whom 200,000 are in need of additional income; and the recipients of old age assistance payments, disability allowances and blind persons' allowances number 130,000. Indications are that more than a quarter of a million Canadians now receiving allowances are in need of additional income and could very well use these cheap annuities. It might be argued that they have not bought annuities. That is true, but if we continue to make annuities available there is at least a possibility that the children of these people may take advantage of them. After all, what we are talking about is an annuity of only $100 per month, and that is not very much money these days. Certainly, it is not enough to retire on. But the question is, where can these people get the wherewithal to buy an annuity of any amount?

It may be of interest to point out that the joint committee which recommended the old age security legislation considered that the $40 a month was to match the government annuity program. That was discussed at the time. We felt that some people could buy an annuity with the $40 a month, and still be able to live fairly decently in their old age.

Honourable senators, business is good today, profits are lush and costs are passed on to the customer. But there may come a day when business will have to count its costs and be a little more efficient. If that happens, business will be looking for a cheap annuity for pension purposes; in fact, the availability of a cheap annuity may mean the difference between a pension plan and no pension plan.

The government annuity is good because it has no cash surrender value; it cannot be pledged and it cannot be seized; it will yield an income to the annuitant in good days and in bad days.

It should be made clear that we who support government annuities are trying not to repeal the laws of economics, but to provide built-in economic stabilizers. Our economy is in constant need of built-in minimums.

It is of interest to note that in 1954 the Income Tax Act was amended to allow an employer and an employee to deduct for income tax purposes, in order to provide a superannuation scheme or pension plan, not $900 but $1,500. Previously the deduction was calculated at 6 per cent on $15,000, which was $900; under the amendment it is 6 per cent on $25,000, which is $1,500. Also, whereas formerly it was not possible to buy a pension for more than $5,000, the limit is now $9,000. The reason given for the change was that salaries and wages had increased. The amendment provided a direct advantage to the person in the high-income bracket, who can now provide himself with a pension of $9,000 instead of $5,000, and deduct $1,500 instead of $900. But in spite of that change in the Income Tax Act, the maximum amount of government annuity remains at $1,200, and the committee's report suggests that we should do something about even that.

I believe this house has the right to come to the conclusion that government annuities are a good thing. I believe that the present annuity scheme, subsidized to the extent of the price of a cup of coffee per capita, is not too much to expect from the Government of Canada, particularly when the scheme gives people an opportunity to provide for themselves.

Honourable senators, I have said all that I wished to say about the committee's report just now. I only wish I had time to go through it more thoroughly, because it deserves closer attention than we are able to give it today. We could profitably discuss it at length. I hope there will be another opportunity to consider it and discuss the broad aspects of our economy, instead of concentrating on the small but important matter of annuities.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I have only a few words to say. One feature of the annuities plan which troubles me is the large commission said to be paid for selling annuities which are losing money for the Government and are bargains for the purchaser.

The honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) has mentioned subsidies, and in particular the storage bill on wheat.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I did not object to it.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I can go back to the days when the people of Canada were getting grain for almost a dollar a bushel—

Hon. Mr. Croll: May I interrupt my friend to say that my reference was to the amount of $35 million for storage purposes, voted earlier this year. I know about the other debt to which my friend refers.

Hon. Mr. Horner: To paraphrase a sentiment expressed by the late Dr. Motherwell, one time Minister of Agriculture from Saskatchewan, I would be satisfied if I could be sure that the people who need the annuities most are the ones who buy them and benefit by them. But it seems to me that most of the purchasers of these government annuities are persons of ample means, and that the people who really need them generally do not know they are available. I agree entirely with the report on the point that the Government should not continue to spend money on this losing operation.

Whether the present old age pension is sufficient for those who have no other means, is entirely another question. If it is inadequate, the whole question of pensions for the aged should be reviewed in Parliament. But as we have been selling annuities to potential millionaires, and paying fat commissions to the salesmen, and especially as the business has brought about a loss to the federal treasury, I think the committee is to be complimented on the finding it has made with respect to annuities.

I realize that the thorough study of a subject like this by a committee of the Senate involves a tremendous amount of work; and I must apologize for not having given the chairman the assistance that I should have given him.

If the Finance Committee were to bring in every year a report which in effect endorses every solitary thing the Government does, even when it disregards economics, what would be the object of appointing the committee? There would be no point in choosing a capable chairman if the committee intended to approve all government activities. Now I want to congratulate the chairman, the honourable senator from Milford-Hants (Hon. Mr. Hawkins), and the whole committee upon their excellent report. I was really amazed at the extent of it. I endorse it, particularly that part which deals with annuities.

I have indicated the kind of report that I think the Finance Committee should make if it is to perform a useful purpose. The Senate is composed of able and experienced men and women who are quite capable of examining the whole economy of the country. I think, however, that this report, without its reference to annuities, would have been rather lame and impotent. So, honourable senators, I say again that I endorse particularly the paragraph dealing with annuities.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, before the debate closes I wish to say that I join with the honourable gentleman from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) in expressing to the chairman (Hon. Mr. Hawkins) and the other members of the Finance Committee deep appreciation of their very important work. I do not know whether all honourable senators realize the time and effort that the members of this committee devoted to their work, but a reading of the report gives some indication of the careful study that was made of the matters under consideration.

We all are aware, of course, of the splendid work done by the committee in past sessions, under its former chairman, the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar). When he desired to be relieved of his duties as chairman it was indeed difficult to replace him, but I think all honourable senators will agree that we did find an excellent replacement.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There has been considerable discussion of the report, and I do not wish to continue it at this time. This afternoon we discussed one feature only, government annuities. Now, the examination into annuities formed a very small part of the work of the committee. I glanced at the report again this afternoon and I find the part devoted to annuities covers only half a page in our Hansard, whereas the total report, with the exhibits, extends to about 25 pages. So the part devoted to annuities is only one-fiftieth of the whole.

There are a great many other subjects in the report worthy of the consideration of members of this house and of the public generally. The report, as I read it, does not approve of many things that the Government has done, and it directs the attention of Parliament to certain matters in particular. For instance, it discusses in considerable detail, yet in readable language, the subject of the gross national product. Surely anybody who reads the report will be compelled to ponder on whether we should not give more consideration to the way in which the gross national product is increasing from year to year. The report gives certain information, and also certain warnings. It is not a political document in any way whatsoever: it received the approval of all members of the committee.

But, as I have said, my purpose at this time is not to discuss the report, but simply to express, as one of the members of this honourable house, appreciation to the chairman and members of the committee, and also our great satisfaction at the way they have continued the work which was so well begun and carried on by their predecessors.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Charles G. Hawkins: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: If the honourable senator from Milford-Hants (Hon. Mr. Hawkins) speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Hawkins: I wish to express my appreciation of the many generous things which have been said about the part I have taken in connection with this report. When I assumed the chairmanship of the committee I advised the members that I felt it was my responsibility to be, not the committee, but its chairman, and, in the discharge of that function, to facilitate inquiries and do all those things which are usually called "footwork" in connection with its activities; also, to assist in writing the report and take responsibility for it when it was presented to the house. I take full responsibility for this report and I do not think there could be more general endorsation of the work of the committee than it has received.

There is one remark I wish to make concerning a statement of the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner). If I heard him correctly, he remarked that he would not be concerned about Government annuities if he were sure that the people who received them were the ones who needed them.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Who needed them most.

Hon. Mr. Hawkins: Who needed them most, or, who needed them. Our report is based on the evidence we received. It was adopted by the committee, and it states—I do not know whether I need read the exact words, but they are here—that evidence was given that the large bulk of the annuities was not being received, nor contracted for, by people of modest means, but that the system is being used by companies who seek to set up pension schemes for their staffs, and also by persons of rather more than moderate means. However, the phrase "moderate means" is one which can be bandied about with little regard to exactness. One person with an income of $2,000 may be regarded as a man of moderate means; someone else with an income of $10,000 may consider himself to be in the same category. In any case, as I have said, this report is based on the facts presented to the committee. Whether it is right or wrong I am not in a position to say; but we received the evidence, weighed it, and came to what we thought were the correct conclusions.

One other reference may be permitted. Before the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) left to fulfil an engagement of long standing he came to my office and expressed to me his general approval of the report. Although, he said, if he had written the report he would have varied it in some respects, in general he agreed with it; and he said he would like me to express to the house his regret that he could not be present and participate in the debate.

The motion was agreed to, and the report was concurred in.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, July 17, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, July 10, 1956

The Senate, which was adjourned until 8 p.m. Tuesday, July 17, met at 8 p.m. today, having been summoned to meet at this time by the Hon. the Speaker, under the authority of a resolution adopted by the Senate on Wednesday, March 21.

Hon. Thomas Vien, P.C., Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

PRIVATE BILL

NIAGARA LOWER ARCH BRIDGE COMPANY LIMITED—COMMONS AMENDMENT

A message was received from the House of Commons returning Bill J-14, an Act respecting Niagara Lower Arch Bridge Company Limited, and acquainting the Senate that they have passed this bill with an amendment, to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The amendment was read by the Clerk as follows:

Page 2, line 1. After the word "such" insert the word "sale,".

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this amendment be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The sponsor of this bill is not in the chamber at present.

An Hon. Senator: Next sitting.

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 436, an Act to authorize contributions by Canada in respect of unemployment assistance costs in the provinces.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I would ask to have it called for second reading later this day.

COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS

STATEMENT ON MEETING

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators have noticed, no doubt, that the Prime Minister made a statement in the House of Commons on the meeting of the Commonwealth Prime Ministers in London. It occurred to me that honourable senators would like to have this statement appear in our records. I therefore move that it be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this date.

The motion was agreed to.

See appendix "A" to today's Hansard, pp. 868-9.

HON. MR. MARCOTTE

TWENTY-FIFTH YEAR AS MEMBER OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I do not think I should let this occasion go by without bringing to your attention the fact that one of our members was appointed to this house twenty-five years ago on Friday last. I refer to the honourable senator from Ponteix (Hon. Mr. Marcotte), to whom I express our very best wishes and the hope that he will be with us for years to come.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

SENATE POSTMARK

INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) when the Senate Post Office will have its new stamping machine?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The design for the new machine is receiving consideration by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts. I expect the committee will meet shortly, after which it will make a report to the Senate on this matter.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: So it has not been ordered yet?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The final order has not been given for the machine because the design has not yet been approved by the committee.

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill 436, an Act to authorize contributions by Canada in respect of unemployment assistance costs in the provinces.

He said: Honourable senators, in introducing the Unemployment Assistance Bill at this time there is no thought on the part of the Government that the legislation is required because of any anticipated weakening in the overall employment situation in the coming months. Rather, the legislation is designed to fill a gap in the existing federal and provincial contributions for taking care of unemployed persons, on the one hand, and those requiring welfare assistance, on the other.

The overall employment situation this year is improved over that of a year ago, as is indicated by the latest figures from both the monthly sample labour force survey and the National Employment Service offices across the country.

According to the latest joint release on employment by the Department of Labour and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, there were some 175,000 more workers employed throughout Canada in May of this year than at the same time last year.

Both the number of persons without jobs and seeking work and the number registered for jobs at National Employment Service offices are down by about 50,000 from May, 1955. I might add that the percentage of those without jobs and seeking work for May, 1956, was 2·9 per cent of the total labour force. This percentage is lower than in any month of May since 1953, when the corresponding figure was 2·1 per cent.

Barring any prolonged reactions in Canada from the steel strike in the United States, the general economic outlook continues to be unusually good. This, in turn, means that employment is continuing to expand.

Honourable senators, this bill rounds out fairly well our social welfare program. By that I do not mean to say there will not be further social security measures introduced, nor do I say this is the last social welfare measure, but it does round out that program fairly well. I refer to such measures as unemployment insurance, supplementary benefits, the Disabled Persons Act, old age pensions, family allowances, pensions for the blind, and mothers' allowances.

This bill authorizes the federal Government to enter into agreement with the provinces to provide for contributions out of the federal treasury to the provinces for moneys paid by the provinces and the municipalities in respect of unemployed employables and unemployables. The form of the agreement is included in the bill and is a schedule to it. Six provinces have already entered into and signed an agreement, namely, Newfoundland, British Columbia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island,, Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

The bill does these things:

1. It gives authority to the federal Government to enter into the agreements.

2. It specifies certain types of costs which may or may not be included in the claims submitted for certain disbursements which will or will not be permitted.

3. It gives retroactive effect for a period of one year to any agreements entered into but, in any event, the retroactive effect cannot go behind July 1955.

4. It confirms any agreement already made, and provides that unemployment assistance costs covered by the bill will be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Honourable senators, these agreements and this bill have resulted from numerous conferences held over the years between the federal Government and the provinces. We can recall the difficult days between 1930 and 1934 when large numbers of people were out of work. The problem then was whether they were the responsibility of the federal, provincial or municipal governments. Then in 1941 the Rowell-Sirois Commission was set up, and it brought in certain recommendations. Certain further proposals were made by the federal Government in 1945 regarding the unemployment problem. However, nothing definite was done until quite recently. I must say that the proposals contained in the agreements and the bill are much wider than any which were recommended by or which came about as a result of the royal commission or the federal Government's declaration of 1945. The proposals of that time did not provide for assistance for unemployable persons, self-employed persons, fishermen, or farmers.

One strong feature of this bill is that it makes no distinction between employables and unemployables, as far as the federal Government assistance is concerned. Honourable senators will realize how difficult it is to determine when an unemployed person is unemployable. It will be recalled that during the war years many persons thought they were unemployable, but eventually they got jobs and became employable. This bill does away with the distinction between those two classes and provides assistance for both. Thus, it terminates a controversy which has been going on in this country for at least a decade as to the responsibility of the several jurisdictions involved in what we call the residual assistance. Upon the passage of this legislation organized assistance will be available to unemployed persons in all parts of Canada who do not qualify for assistance under existing social welfare legislation.

Honourable senators, may I now refer to the general proposal. It is that the federal Government shall pay half the cost of providing assistance for the persons I have mentioned when their numbers become ·45 per cent of the population of the province concerned. That provision is set forth in the agreements, and affects all provinces except Nova Scotia, with respect to which the federal Government will pay its share when the percentage of qualified persons reaches ·30 per cent of the population. However, that percentage will increase over the years until it reaches ·45 per cent, which applies to the other provinces.

Honourable senators may ask me how much money is involved in the federal Government's share. My answer is that it depends on the amounts paid by the individual provinces. I have before me a statement which sets forth ·45 per cent of the total population of each province, and if it is the wish of the house I shall read it.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The information is as follows:

Newfoundland	1,854
Prince Edward Island	486
Nova Scotia	3,073
New Brunswick	2,511
Quebec	20,340
Ontario	23,323
Manitoba	3,820
Saskatchewan	4,000
Alberta	4,797
British Columbia	5,872

I mentioned a moment ago that the provinces of Newfoundland and British Columbia had already signed agreements with the federal authorities. I have a table which sets forth, by months, the federal share of the claims received to date from those provinces, which claims will be paid shortly after this bill is passed and receives Royal Assent. With the permission of the house, I shall place the table on Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: What period do these claims cover?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: They cover from July 1955 to February 1956.

1955	Newfoundland	British Columbia
July	$ 76,370.81	$ 200,991.84
August	78,422.24	181,175.04
September	80,664.02	175,338.94
October	92,241.53	172,132.63
November	110,799.83	175,139.02
December	128,306.47	206,917.91
1956
January	133,450.81	201,885.11
February	101,574.95	-
	$801,830.66	$1,313,580.49

I have before me another table which gives the total number of unemployed persons assisted in the provinces of Newfoundland and British Columbia in the period July 1955 to February 1956. With the permission of the house, I shall place this table on Hansard:

1955	Newfoundland	British Columbia
July	16,721	20,372
August	16,672	18,960
September	16,919	18,485
October	19,293	18,227
November	24,309	18,645
December	29,128	20,271
1956
January	30,686	20,626
February	20,958	-

Finally, I have a statement covering the average cost per person in these two provinces. I would remind honourable senators that the federal Government pays half of the cost of the assistance after the total of unemployed and unemployables has reached ·45 per cent of the population of the province concerned. This statement sets forth the amount paid in Newfoundland and in British Columbia.

Average cost per person

1955	Newfoundland	British Columbia
July	$11.01	$30.46
August	11.34	30.75
September	11.46	31.01
October	11.21	31.15
November	10.32	30.55
December	9.76	31.60
1956
January	9.59	30.02
February	11.21	-

In general terms, this is an explanation of the bill, but I might run rather quickly through it and refer to various clauses. I realize that that is not the usual course on second reading, and I will not proceed if any honourable senator objects. I thought it might be helpful.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Before the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) goes beyond the outline he has just given, I should like to ask him a question. He mentioned two provinces, British Columbia and Newfoundland. Previously he mentioned seven.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Six; or I intended to say six.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I thought I heard them all but Alberta, Quebec and Manitoba. I may be wrong. Have all the provinces, except four, signed?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is so. Does the honourable gentleman wish me to repeat the names of the provinces whose Governments have signed?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: If he mentions the names of the four that have not signed, that will do.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: By a process of elimination, as I have a list of the six, it will not be difficult for me to do that. Nova Scotia, Quebec, Ontario and Alberta have not signed.

The bill empowers the federal Government to enter into agreements with the provinces. The forms of agreement are attached as schedules A and B to the bill. The only difference between the two schedules is that, in respect of all the provinces except Nova Scotia, the percentage of unemployed employables and unemployables starts with .45 per cent, whereas in the case of Nova Scotia it begins at .30 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Why the difference?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Schedule B embodies the agreement which was worked out with Nova Scotia and the federal Government, and not too much exception was taken to it, I understand, by the other provinces. The employment and unemployment situation in the various provinces was considered, and in the light of the employment situation in Nova Scotia and the other provinces it was thought better that the deduction from the reimbursement claim, as provided in paragraph 11, should begin, in respect of Nova Scotia, at .30 per cent of the population.

Hon. Mr. Howden: Should not this bill be sent to committee? It looks as though it has been sent to us to be ratified without debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If the house wants the bill to go to committee I have no objection to that course. When I have completed my explanation, if there is any question which I have not answered satisfactorily, or if the honourable senator wants any more information, I am sure the house will not object to reference of the bill to committee. But would it not be better, before that question is decided, to wait until I have finished my remarks?

There is a provision that contributions by the federal Government shall not exceed one-half the amount paid by the provinces on the .45 per cent basis.

Clause 4 sets forth what is included in the agreement. I will not read all the provisions, but I may point out that by paragraph (e) of subsection (1) it is provided that the term of an agreement shall be fixed at not more than five years and thereafter until terminated by either party giving to the other party one year's notice in writing. Such provinces as have signed, have signed for five years, except Saskatchewan, which has signed for three years only. It was within its rights to do so, but why it fixed the term of agreement at three rather than five years I cannot say.

By paragraph (a) of clause 4 (2) the agreement excludes from unemployment assistance costs, payments made to or on behalf of persons who are inmates of any institution or class of institution maintained in whole or in part out of funds provided by Canada, a province, a municipality or a charitable organization.

By the same subsection there are exempted from the benefits of this bill persons in receipt of financial assistance under any provincial legislation the cost of which is shared by the Federal Government. A person who is receiving an old age pension is not included within the ·45 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Would the right be denied if an individual was receiving benefits under legislation of a province?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If the province was not receiving any financial assistance toward that benefit, the person concerned could be included in the ·45 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Will those who receive a pension from a local pension tribunal—under, for instance, the Needy Mothers Assistance Act, or others who are in receipt of annuities from the province—be entitled to benefit under this bill?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Persons who receive a mother's allowance, as referred to by my honourable friend, will not be eligible for benefits under the bill. That is specifically spelled out in clause 4(2), which reads:

> Except as provided in subsection (3), an agreement shall, for the purposes of this act, exclude from unemployment assistance costs . . .
> (c) payments made to persons by way of mothers' allowance . . .

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: What about those who receive a pension from a provincial Government or from a corporation?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Such persons would qualify for benefits under the act but the assistance they would receive would undoubtedly be considerably less than that received by the average unemployed person, and the total payment to the province concerned would be reduced accordingly. If a province paid $50 to an unemployed person who received an additional $10 from another source, the $10 would be included in the total amount paid by the province, but the recipient would count as one person and the average amount paid would be reduced accordingly. I hope I have made myself clear.

The costs of administration of the legislation are provided for by the provinces and the municipalities. Here I would refer honourable members to clause 4(3):

> An agreement may include as unemployment assistance costs
> (a) payments made to or on behalf of persons who are inmates of homes for special care and who would not normally be cared for in general, acute, chronic or convalescent hospitals, tuberculosis sanatoria, mental institutions, institutions for incurables, orphanages or child welfare institutions . . .

Generally speaking, persons in hospitals or sanatoria are not included, but where there are unemployed persons who would not normally be confined to a hospital or sanatorium the assistance which is given to them can be included in the amount claimed by a province when its unemployment figure exceeds ·45 per cent of its population.

Travelling costs are allowed in certain cases. For instance, the travelling expenses incurred by somebody who is sent from City "A" to City "B" to get a job may be included in the amount claimed by the province.

The next clause of interest is clause 5:

An agreement may provide for contributions in respect of unemployment assistance costs that were incurred within a period of one year prior to the execution thereof but after the first day of July, 1955.

I would point out that when a province enters into an agreement it does not have to provide for contributions in respect of unemployment assistance costs incurred one year prior to the execution of the agreement. For instance, New Brunswick requested that its agreement be dated as of January 1, 1956, for it did not feel it advisable to go back beyond that time.

I trust I have made the provisions of the bill clear to honourable senators. When this legislation first came to my attention I thought it was terribly involved, but after studying it I found it to be otherwise. Representatives of federal and provincial Governments have attempted for a long time to settle the question of just who is responsible for our unemployment problem.

Hon. Mr. Baird: As I understand it, the federal Government is really providing a certain amount of unemployment insurance to the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Unemployment insurance comes under separate legislation. Persons who have paid into the unemployment insurance fund may, when they become unemployed, claim certain unemployment insurance benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act. However, there have always been these questions. What happens to a person when his claim runs out? What happens in the case of a person who has never paid into the unemployment insurance fund and becomes unemployed? What happens in the case of a person who is unemployable? There has been a lot of controversy over the years as to who is responsible for these matters. Some say the municipalities are responsible, others say the provincial Government, and still others say the federal Government. The bill now before us represents an attempt to solve this problem. The arrangement that has been worked out is that where more than ·45 per cent of the population of a province becomes unemployed, either by reason of persons not being able to find work or being unemployable, the federal Government will step in and pay its share of assistance costs.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Could the honourable Leader of the Government give a brief explanation as to the machinery that is set up within a province to administer unemployment insurance payments? Does a municipality make payments direct or is this done by the provincial Government? Is some board set up to determine who qualifies under various classes?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It is a matter entirely for the provinces. No doubt the federal Government takes an interest in how the payments are made, receiving an accounting from the provinces as to the number of persons given assistance, the total amount of that assistance, the average cost per person, and so on. The total assistance is calculated and the net reimbursement claim is then arrived at, of which the federal Government pays 50 per cent. The administration is entirely in the hands of the provinces, as is the actual payment of the assistance. When it is paid and the accounts are sent in, the dominion Government pays 50 per cent of the amount arrived at on the basis of the ·45 per cent calculation.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: The honourable gentleman has spoken of ·45 per cent. Does that mean a fraction of 1 per cent?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, a fraction of 1 per cent. I happen to remember that ·45 per cent of the population of British Columbia, for example, is 5,000. There are now about 20,000 unemployed in that province, and therefore the federal Government's share would be 50 per cent of the amount paid to 15,000 people.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Can the honourable gentleman say what is the normal proportion of unemployed employables? I had assumed, without knowledge, that a percentage of people who are able to work do not work, that there was no time when 100 per cent of those who could work had employment.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As the honourable senator has stated, a certain number of people are always unemployed, and probably it was felt by the different provinces that ·45 per cent of the population would represent the general unemployment situation in Canada even in good times. No one can arrive at a definite figure; at one time it might have been 50 per cent, at another time it might have been 30 per cent, but after discussions for years this proposal has generally been accepted by the provinces. As I have stated, six provinces have entered into the agreement, and it is expected that others will follow. Why the ·45 per cent was decided upon, rather than, say, ·46 per cent or ·44 per cent, I cannot say; I know only that it was the percentage which the various provinces agreed upon.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: The only exception is Nova Scotia?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The only exception is Nova Scotia, and that is a temporary condition.

Hon. Mr. Baird: Am I right in assuming that under this legislation no person will be considered unemployable?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Oh, no. There still will be people considered unemployable.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Except those classes barred from the benefits of the legislation?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I should not have used the word "unemployable". Even if a person is unemployable he may still be able to get assistance within his province. If within a province the percentage of unemployed employables and unemployables reaches ·45 per cent, the federal Government will contribute.

Hon. Harold Connolly: In effect, then, so far as those people are concerned the federal Government will be taking up part of the load ordinarily carried by poor relief?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The federal government will take up the load which has previously been borne by the provinces and the municipalities.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Or, in many cases, by the Community Chests.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not think this should discourage the Community Chests, but the municipalities may take Community Chests assistance into consideration when helping persons who have received it. If a Community Chest paid an unemployed person $15 a week, and the municipality paid $10 a week, the provincial Government could not show that he had been paid $25 a week; it could show a payment of only $10 a week. This would not affect the number of persons receiving assistance, but it would bring down the average amount paid to each person under this legislation.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, when discussing this matter I think we should bear in mind that by and large the agencies which participate in what is generally understood to be the Community Chests do not provide direct relief. They are agencies which provide services—the Children's Aid Society, the Family Welfare Society, the Y.M.C.A. and the Y.W.C.A., and so on. I would be very much concerned if word were to go out that the Senate understood that such agencies provided direct relief, or that anything done under this legislation might adversely affect the appeals of the various Community Chests throughout the country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John J. Connolly: I am sure no member of the Senate would want that misunderstanding to be broadcast. I am not absolutely certain that no agency participating in the Community Chests provides direct relief, but I think I am right.

If I may, I should like to mention another point. Incidentally, I think perhaps we are operating as if we were in Committee of the Whole. I rather dislike subjecting the honourable leader to further questioning.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not mind.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Before the leader closes would he mind saying what provision there is to ensure that the contributions which the federal Government makes under this legislation are proper and not excessive?

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I am very glad that the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) said what he did about the Community Chests, and I want to support his remarks in that connection. As he said, the work of the Community Chests is largely connected with services to unfortunate members of the community, and the participating agencies do not, as a general rule, attempt to provide direct relief. That came very forcibly to my attention several years ago in Montreal when the first unemployment insurance legislation was passed by Parliament. I had the impression at that time that once the legislation was put on the statute books it would be of considerable help to the charitable agencies in Montreal. I was surprised to find that that was not so in any way, shape or form, and that the charitable agencies did not, and in fact could not, attempt to deal with relief on a general scale in such a way as unemployment insurance deals with it. So, I agree with the honourable senator from Ottawa West that we should not expect this legislation to cause any decline in the appeals for the various Community Chests across the country.

I was interested in the question asked by the honourable senator from Northumberland-Miramichi (Hon. Mr. Burchill) as to the actual operation of this legislation after it is passed. While Parliament passes it, the people whom we are really concerned with are the individuals in the local towns and villages who are going to benefit by it. The honourable senator particularly asked how the legislation would work out as between the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities. I would suggest that the answer is found in the form of agreement which appears as Schedule A to the bill. It will be observed by section 3 of the agreement that the province undertakes to "make all the necessary arrangements for (a) the receipt, by itself or by municipalities, of applicants for assistance . . . and (b) the verification of the representations made by applicants . . ." in the province. The section contains this important additional undertaking: ". . . the province shall assume responsibility for the correctness of such representations". After all, it must be remembered that the province is paying 50 per cent of the claims, and naturally it has a very direct interest in seeing that they are genuine.

By section 4 of the agreement the province undertakes to ". . . make available to officials of Canada particulars of (a) conditions prescribed by" the province "or by municipalities under which assistance may be given . . ."

By section 6 the province undertakes to "deliver to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, at Ottawa, a monthly statement . . ." showing the way in which the reimbursement claim by the province is made up.

The only other section of the agreement which occurred to me as being significant in that connection is section 14, which requires that the claim for reimbursement must contain a certificate signed by the provincial auditor, certifying that the claim has been prepared in accordance with the terms and conditions of the agreement made with the dominion; and upon receipt of a reimbursement claim so certified, Canada shall make payment of 50 per cent of the total claim.

I suppose it is conceivable that a dispute might arise between Canada and a province as to whether the province had complied strictly with the provisions of the agreement. I observe that section 16 provides that in the event of any controversy arising with respect to this agreement, either party may submit such controversy to the Exchequer Court of Canada for determination.

Honourable senators, that seems to be a pretty clear picture of the manner in which this legislation will operate, starting with the unfortunate individual who makes his claim to his municipality, and following it through to the time when that application, and others from the same province, are processed here in Ottawa.

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, I would not want anybody to think that this legislation was intended to harm or interfere in any way with the good work being done by the Community Chests and other charitable organizations in the various communities. As the senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) has said, the Community Chests render a fine service. I have in mind the charitable organization in my own province known as the St. Vincent de Paul Society, and the other provinces have similar organizations which do good work. These societies are operated by volunteer workers who go about among poor families and discover many people who are in need of fuel, food or clothing, some of whom are too proud to ask for assistance. It is only by the good work of these energetic volunteers that some people receive help in most serious difficulties. I strongly hope that this legislation, which will render public support to people in difficulty, will not in any way discourage support of such charitable organizations as the St. Vincent de Paul Society and the Community Chests.

I am satisfied that this is good legislation. It has been discussed by the various provinces, and accepted by six of them. While it will be of great assistance to people over long periods of unemployment, I trust it will not replace the work being done, without hope of reward, by the charitable organizations to which I have referred. Let us hope that the legislation will not tend to replace good and necessary charitable organizations.

Hon. John T. Hackett: Honourable senators, I have a word to say about the principle of this bill. It smacks very much of legislation that is already enacted and in force, such as old age pensions and family allowances, and I submit that it is another offering to the individual which makes him dependent upon the federal Government. In my view it is in conflict with the spirit of Confederation, and to an extent submits the requirements, the needs and, above all, the wants, of the individual to a central organism. I think this is contrary to the very genesis of our federal system, and in the long run it may result in conflict between the different elements of the country, depending upon the proportion which they deem they have received or will receive, and influenced, no doubt, by considerations other than their needs.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I would like to point out that if the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) speaks now, he will conclude the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I was asked by the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) a question with respect to the correctness of the statements which are submitted by the provinces.

I think it was answered fully by the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), but I might add that the amount payable by the federal Government will be limited only by the willingness of the provincial and municipal governments to pay their share. So I am sure that the federal Government is protected with respect to any payments which are to be made by it. As the honourable senator from Inkerman has said, the bill spells out how statements will be prepared, how they are to be sent in, and how payments will be made.

The honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) said that this legislation "smacked" of other legislation which Parliament has passed. I do not know what he intends to convey by the word "smacked". I believe our social welfare legislation is excellent, and I do not believe that the honourable senator himself would want to repeal any of it; on the contrary, I believe that he would join with us in insisting that it remain on the statute books. One class, however, which was omitted from previous legislation is that of the unemployed, some of whom are able to work and some unable. What has been their position hitherto? They have been provided for largely by municipal and provincial governments, and these authorities have felt that, at times when there is more unemployment than usual, the dominion Government should bear a share of the costs. This legislation does not relieve the municipalities or provincial governments of their obligation under our constitution to provide in normal times for the unemployed, whether unemployable or employable. The agreements to be made under this bill will come into effect only when the percentage of the population which is unemployed exceeds ·45 per cent. It is felt that a lesser number than this figure represents would be a normal number of unemployed; and in those circumstances the responsibility will remain with the provinces.

In my opinion the greatest value that attaches to this legislation is that it does away with the controversy which has been going on for some time as to who should look after these people. It is now settled, and, I feel, very satisfactorily. I trust the bill will receive the unanimous support of the house.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

APPENDIX "A"

(See p. 860)

STATEMENT ON MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS

During the past ten days Commonwealth Prime Ministers have together reviewed the current state of international affairs. Their discussions have again revealed a sense of common purpose in their approach to the major problems of the day. The peoples of the Commonwealth all share the common heritage of parliamentary democracy. They respect aspirations for freedom and self-government, and they take pride in what they themselves have done in helping to fulfil those aspirations.

This meeting has been held at a significant stage in the development of international relations. A new element has been introduced by the growing recognition of the devastating power of thermonuclear weapons. Other developments of importance have taken place in the world, including changes in the Soviet Union. The common understanding which the Prime Ministers have reached in their review will form a valuable background which will assist each Government in the formulation and pursuit of its national policies.

Despite the high hopes with which the world emerged from the last war, new international tensions developed. These have given rise to increasing fears and suspicion. They have resulted in vast expenditures on armaments and economic distortions which have delayed the full development of the world's natural resources for the common good.

The Governments and peoples of the Commonwealth are united in their desire for peace. They seek friendly relations with all the peoples of the world and have no aggressive intent or design. War would bring disaster for many; world war could mean destruction for all. The policies of all Commonwealth countries will at all times be devoted to preserving and consolidating world peace. The Prime Ministers emphasized the importance they attach to the search for a comprehensive disarmament agreement.

The Commonwealth Governments will strive for a progressive improvement in the standards of life of their own peoples and will assist in similar efforts in other parts of the world. Since the end of the war, in addition to furthering their own economic development, they have done much to assist the development of other countries, through the United Nations and such organizations as the Colombo Plan, the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara and by other means. They will continue in their efforts to secure prosperity as well as peace for all the peoples of the world.

In the course of the meeting the Prime Ministers reviewed the significant developments in the Soviet Union in the context of international relations and world affairs. In this assessment they were helped by the reports made by those ministers who have recently visited the Soviet Union or have held elsewhere personal discussions with the new Soviet leaders. The Prime Ministers considered the recent decisions of the Soviet Government to reduce the numbers of their armed forces, their willingness to facilitate increased contacts between the Soviet Union and other countries, and their expressed desire for improved relations with other Governments. They welcomed these developments. A progressive improvement in the relations between the Soviet Union and the other great powers would help to remove the fear of war and serve the interests of world peace. They believe, however, that the removal of the causes of tension and the creation of mutual confidence and good will are essential if peace is to rest on secure foundations. The Governments of the Commonwealth countries will persevere in the search for just and lasting settlements of outstanding international problems. Unless such settlements can be reached, resources which might otherwise be used to improve the lot of man will continue to be devoted to armaments; and the fears which impel the peoples of the world to accept the burdens of defence will continue to distract and weaken mankind.

The Prime Ministers noted with regret that, since their last meeting, no progress had been made towards German unity. They were informed of current proposals regarding the political and economic activities of the North Atlantic Alliance and the development of closer economic co-operation in Europe.

The Prime Ministers considered the situation in the Middle East. They reaffirmed their interest in the peace and stability of this area. They welcomed the efforts of the Secretary General of the United Nations to ensure observance of the terms of the armistice agreements between Israel and the neighbouring Arab States. They agreed that all practicable steps should be urgently taken to consolidate the progress thus made and to seek a lasting settlement of this dispute.

The Prime Ministers were informed of the situation in Cyprus, and welcomed the unceasing efforts of the United Kingdom Government to find a solution acceptable to all concerned.

The Prime Ministers reviewed the situation in the Far East and South East Asia. They noted the part which was being played by certain Commonwealth Governments in seeking to maintain peace in Indo-China. They looked forward to a continuing relaxation of tension in the Formosa area, and expressed the hope that unremitting efforts would be made to this end. Peaceful settlements of the problems in this area are imperative for stability in the Far East and for removing the dangers of conflict which would frustrate the hopes of peace. The Prime Ministers heard with interest a report from the Prime Minister of New Zealand on his recent visit to Japan. They were informed of the progress of constitutional advance in Malaya and of the negotiations on constitutional development in Singapore.

The Prime Ministers noted with satisfaction that Ceylon and certain other countries had recently been admitted to the United Nations. They recognized the important part which members of the Commonwealth had played in securing this extension of the Organization. They expressed the hope that its membership could be broadened still further so that it might command a wider allegiance throughout the world.

The Prime Ministers agreed that it was of first importance for their countries to maintain and increase their economic strength. Each country, through sound internal economic policies and steady development of its resources and earning power, could help to strengthen the Commonwealth and the sterling area, and move steadily towards the agreed objective of the widest practicable system of trade and payments. The Prime Ministers noted with satisfaction the United Kingdom's determination to maintain and improve its capacity to serve as a source of capital for development in Commonwealth countries. They received reports on the development programmes of certain members of the Commonwealth.

The Prime Ministers exchanged views on the development of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes. They agreed that the civil use of nuclear energy constituted a valuable new sphere of co-operation within the Commonwealth, as well as with other countries, and they noted with satisfaction the progress already made in this field. The Commonwealth countries are already a major source of world supplies of uranium and thorium, and their resources in these materials are increasing. In most of these countries research organizations have been established to develop the use of nuclear energy as a source of power.

During the course of the meeting, the Prime Minister of Ceylon stated that, in accordance with their declared policy, the Ceylon Government proposed to introduce in due course a republican constitution for Ceylon. He also stated that it was their intention that Ceylon should continue to be a member of the Commonwealth. The other Prime Ministers took note of this statement, and expressed their agreement to Ceylon's remaining a member of the Commonwealth.

The Prime Ministers considered the particular position of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland in relation to meetings of Commonwealth Prime Ministers. Taking into account the 20 years' attendance first by the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia and now by the Prime Minister of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, they agreed that they would welcome the continued participation of the Prime Minister of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland in meetings of Commonwealth Prime Ministers.

Apart from the consideration of matters which are of common concern to all Commonwealth countries, these meetings also afford opportunities for discussions outside the formal sessions. Advantage has been taken of these opportunities on this occasion. The continuing exchange of views on matters of common concern is an important element in the relationship between the member countries of the Commonwealth. It is of the utmost value that this should be supplemented at intervals by personal contacts between the political leaders of the Commonwealth countries, and in a rapidly changing world the need for these direct consultations has assumed a new importance.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, July 11, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., Hon. Thomas Vien, P.C., Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker informed the Senate that he had received a communication from the Secretary to the Governor General, acquainting him that the Honourable C. H. Locke, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, would proceed to the Senate Chamber this day at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the Royal Assent to certain bills.

CRIMINAL LAW

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT—REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. John A. McDonald, for Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Joint Chairman of the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on capital and corporal punishment and lotteries, presented the third report of the committee.

He said: Honourable senators, this report constitutes the committee's final report on the question of corporal punishment only. I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fergusson, that the report do lie on the table, and that it be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this date.

The motion was agreed to.

See appendix to today's Hansard, pp. 872-85.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: I understood that the report was to lie on the table until some future date. Is it intended that it be considered during this session?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I doubt very much that it will be considered in detail this session.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators will observe that there are only two items on the Order Paper for today. The first item is the third reading of Bill 436, an Act to authorize contributions by Canada in respect of unemployment assistance costs in the provinces. Doubtless that bill will be disposed of today, and if so it will be given the Royal Assent by the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General at a quarter to six.

The remaining item on the Order Paper is consideration of an amendment made by the House of Commons to Bill J-14, an Act respecting Niagara Lower Arch Bridge Company Limited. My information from the deputy of the sponsor of that bill is that this item will also be disposed of today.

The honourable member from King's (Hon. Mr. McDonald) stated that the joint committee's report on corporal punishment, which was tabled today, is not likely to be considered this session.

Accordingly, there will be no further business left on the Order Paper for the Senate to consider until other legislation is received from the House of Commons.

I am informed that the House of Commons will be dealing with the estimates today and will probably continue to do so for the remainder of this week. Of course, I do not know when other legislation will be passed by that house, but it is doubtful if any bills will come over to the Senate during the early part of next week, in any event.

Honourable senators, I now move that when this house rises today it stand adjourned until Tuesday evening, July 24, at 8 o'clock. I would remind the house that during this adjournment period honourable senators are subject to recall at any time, should His Honour the Speaker deem this advisable.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Before the motion is agreed to, may I ask the honourable leader why we were called back under the powers of the War Measures Act before the expiration of the last adjournment? The wording of the telegram which was sent to honourable senators was to the effect that the Clerk had been instructed by His Honour the Speaker, in virtue of the War Measures Act, to summon us back to Ottawa on Tuesday, July 10, a week earlier than the date that had been fixed for our return here. I am at a loss to know what the War Measures Act has to do with sittings of the Senate, which are peaceful gatherings.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Regardless of the wording of the telegram, I am pleased that my honourable friend did respond to it.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, may I say that the telegram I received was sent in virtue of the powers vested in His Honour the Speaker, pursuant to a motion passed by this house, authorizing him to recall the Senate at any time during an adjournment if there arose an emergency which in his opinion made this course advisable.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Honourable senators, I have here the telegram which I received, and I assume the same message was sent to all senators. It reads:

I am directed by the Honourable the Speaker to inform you that under the emergency powers vested in him he has called the Senate to meet at eight o'clock p.m. July tenth to consider the Unemployment Assistance Act and such other matters as may come before the Senate.

J. F. MacNeill,
Clerk of the Senate.

I merely read the telegram so that its form may be before the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. Macdonald moved the third reading of Bill 436, an act to authorize contributions by Canada in respect of unemployment assistance costs in the provinces.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

NIAGARA LOWER ARCH BRIDGE COMPANY LIMITED—COMMONS AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendment made by the House of Commons to Bill J-14, an Act respecting the Niagara Lower Arch Bridge Company Limited.

Hon. John J. Connolly moved that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable C. H. Locke, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Acting Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to cause Letters Patent to be issued under his Sign Manual and Signet constituting the Honourable Charles Holland Locke, a Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, his Deputy, to do in His Excellency's name all acts on his part necessary to be done during His Excellency's pleasure.

The Commission was read by the Clerk.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act.

An Act to amend the Canada Lands Surveys Act.

An Act to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

An Act to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways System during the calendar year 1956, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

An Act respecting Niagara Lower Arch Bridge Company Limited.

An Act to authorize contributions by Canada in respect of unemployment assistance costs in the provinces.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, July 24, at 8 p.m.

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT

The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Capital and Corporal Punishment and Lotteries begs leave to present its

THIRD REPORT*

of the current session, being the Committee's final report upon the question whether the criminal law of Canada relating to corporal punishment should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent.

The Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence tabled on June 29, 1955, by the preceding Committee were referred to this Committee; and, at this time, the Committee is returning only that portion applicable to the question of corporal punishment. At the current session, no further evidence was printed and all proceedings were conducted in camera.

The sources of evidence taken and witnesses heard on corporal punishment during the first two sessions are listed alphabetically in Number 21 of the Committee's 1955 printed Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence, and a chronological schedule of the sittings of the Committee for the same period appears in the same Number.

The Committee proposes to report later on the question of lotteries, as well as to report generally on its activities, procedure and matters relating thereto.

Respectfully submitted,

SALTER A. HAYDEN
Joint Chairman representing the Senate.

DON. F. BROWN
Joint Chairman representing the House of Commons.

The First Report of the Committee was a recommendation concerning its quorum presented on March 21, 1956. The Second Report was the Final Report on Capital Punishment presented on June 27, 1956.*

FINAL REPORT ON CORPORAL PUNISHMENT

CHAPTER I

SCOPE OF INQUIRY

1. The Committee considered that it was authorized to inquire into corporal punishment both as a sentence imposed by the courts and as a penalty for breaches of disciplinary rules in federal and provincial penal institutions. This report will deal in turn with these two aspects of corporal punishment.

CHAPTER II

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT AS A COURT SENTENCE

Section 1: Existing Law

2. The Canadian Criminal Code provides for punishment by whipping for the following offences:

1. rape and attempted rape (Sections 136 and 137)
2. sexual intercourse with female under fourteen (Section 138)
3. indecent assault on female (Section 141)
4. incest (Section 142)
5. indecent assault on male (Section 148)
6. overcoming resistance to commission of offence by choking, drugs, etc. (Section 218)
7. robbery (Section 289)
8. armed burglary (Section 292(3))

3. The revised Criminal Code, which was enacted in 1954 and came into force in 1955, abolished corporal punishment for the following offences:

1. assault on sovereign (Section 49)
2. acts of gross indecency (Section 149)
3. assaults on wife or other female.

The special section of the previous Criminal Code which dealt with assaults on wives or females was deleted and these offences are now governed by the general prohibitions against common or aggravated assaults for which corporal punishment is not a penalty.

4. Juvenile offenders under the age of 16 and females are not subject to corporal punishment.

Section 2: Procedure

(1) Time

5. The sentence may direct whipping on one, two, or three occasions during imprisonment, but the time of execution is left to the discretion of the prison authorities. The present practice in penitentiaries is to administer corporal punishment early in a sentence. It appeared that provincial prison authorities are less inclined to disregard court sentences ordering part of the whipping late in the sentence, although this practice was almost universally condemned as being destructive of the success achieved in reform and rehabilitation during imprisonment.

(2) Method

6. A whipping is administered by the "cat-o'-nine-tails", commonly called the lash, unless otherwise specified. In practice, most courts order strapping or paddling which is administered by a leather strap across the buttocks. No specifications for the size or use of either instrument are provided in the Criminal Code. It appeared, however, that there is substantial similarity in the instruments, methods, and routine employed in the different federal penitentiaries and provincial institutions. Although no evidence of cutting or any other type of disfiguration or injury from corporal punishment was presented to the Committee, conflicting views were offered on the best method of avoiding a break in the skin. A perforated strap is employed in the penitentiaries because it is considered the perforations will prevent the strap from turning and cutting. A contrary view is held by the provincial institutions, where a plain strap is used, because it is feared the perforations might cause injury.

7. The whipping or strapping is always preceded by a medical examination and, in the penitentiaries and many provincial institutions, a doctor is in attendance during execution of the sentence. Where the medical examination reveals physical or mental incapacity, the sentence is not administered, and in most cases an application is made for remission of the sentence of corporal punishment.

8. Some witnesses considered there might be more fear of the lash than the strap and it was agreed that most courts regarded the strap as a lesser punishment. The evidence suggested, however, that, in fact, a strapping is a more severe punishment than whipping and is so regarded by experienced criminals.

Section 3: Use of Corporal Punishment

9. There has been a substantial decrease in the use of corporal punishment as a court sentence in the past generation. As the following table shows, in the peak year, 1931, corporal punishment was imposed in 165 cases or 12·1 per cent of the 1,360 sentences for offences for which it might have been awarded; and in 1932, 1933, and 1934 the number and rate of sentences of corporal punishment were respectively 116 (9·7%), 118 (9·6%), and 84 (8·2%). By 1954, the number of sentences of corporal punishment had declined to 14, representing only 0·6 percent of the 2,344 sentences for which it might have been imposed. The decline in the use of corporal punishment has been persistent over the past twenty years, subject to some variation in particular years, and, since 1950, it has been applied in only 1·5 percent of the sentences where its use might have been authorized.

*This table is based on the statistics appearing in the Appendix to this Report prepared by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

10. Corporal punishment is used as part of a court sentence in relatively few other jurisdictions. Since abolition in the United Kingdom in 1948, its use has been restricted to the State of Delaware, Canada, The Union of South Africa, Egypt, and certain colonial territories. In other jurisdictions it appears to have been abolished after an extended period of decreasing use.

Section 4: Summary of Arguments Advanced by Witnesses for Retention of Corporal Punishment

11. The attorneys general of most provinces, the police, and other law-enforcement agencies favoured the retention of corporal punishment. Their experience indicated that it operates as a deterrent to serious crime by imposing a lesson on the particular offenders subjected to it and by the fear it creates in the criminal class. Apart from its deterrent effect, there appeared to be some support for corporal punishment as a just punishment for serious crime. It was regarded by some as a proper retribution, a mark of the community's revulsion against vicious offences; and a grave punishment, the justice of which would be recognized alike by the community and the offender.

12. Those favouring retention of corporal punishment stated discrimination and care should be used in its administration. There was general agreement with the view expressed by representatives of the police that it was not effective against the recidivist, the hardened criminal, or the sexual criminal. It is not, for example, uncommon for an experienced criminal to request a sentence with corporal punishment instead of a long term of imprisonment. The present Criminal Code provisions for indefinite detention of habitual criminals and criminal sexual psychopaths appeared to be a more realistic method of dealing with these offenders because experience indicated they are not likely to be influenced by corporal punishment.

13. It was considered that corporal punishment could be used to best advantage against young offenders. There was little support for its use against first-offenders but it was suggested that it might be used against young offenders who had not been influenced by reasonable efforts at rehabilitation by means of probation and other methods but who could not be considered to be hardened criminals. Particular concern was expressed about offenders showing a persistent disregard for the safety and property of others: members of street gangs, whether called "zoot-suiters" or "leather jackets", whose conduct was described by one witness as "hooliganism". Several witnesses suggested corporal punishment might be particularly effective against this type of offender because it would humiliate him in the eyes of his companions and take away the false glamour attached to a person who had been unaffected by lesser punishments.

14. The danger of doing more harm than good to particular offenders was recognized by those who favoured retention, particularly for young offenders. Some form of presentence investigation and report was suggested which would take into account physical, mental, emotional, environmental, and other relevant factors in the background of the offender. This was considered to be necessary, particularly in the case of young offenders who had not proven amenable to other methods of correction and who might be so constituted as to suffer grave harm from the infliction of corporal punishment.

Section 5: Summary of Arguments Advanced by Witnesses for Abolition of Corporal Punishment

15. Those opposing corporal punishment contended that it had no unique deterrent influence. In view of the importance of this consideration, it is discussed in the next section of this report. It was contended that corporal punishment was not reformative and the Committee was impressed by the evidence of the Commissioner of Penitentiaries and others who stated that it counteracted the attempts made at reform and rehabilitation during imprisonment. Because of this, it was suggested that some penal officials were reluctant to carry out sentences of corporal punishment awarded by the courts and, in the words of one witness, "only went through the motions" in administering this punishment. The opinion was also expressed that, in addition to impeding reform, it did positive harm by embittering some offenders. Some, who considered corporal punishment might be helpful if administered immediately after the offence, contended that the delay, imposed by the necessity of allowing time for trial and appeal, destroyed the value which the punishment might otherwise have achieved. Those favouring abolition, in general, considered that corporal punishment could only be justified as a punitive, retributive measure which was considered to be out of step with modern penal theory. Considerable emphasis was placed by some on the fact that Canada was one of very few countries in the democratic world still using corporal punishment.

16. The special considerations affecting young offenders are discussed in a subsequent section. Generally, in relation to all types of offenders, those favouring abolition argued that corporal punishment could produce no quick cure and was apt to do positive harm. The rarity of the sentence in Canada meant that its imposition was inconsistent and inequitable, a factor recognized by representatives of the police. Its imposition, under present conditions, depended upon the views of particular judges and, perphaps, also the swings of public opinion; and sometimes bore little relation to the nature of offences or offenders. It was considered a degrading punishment; and, since it was more likely to arouse feelings of resentment and revenge, it was urged that public humiliation of offenders could not be a proper foundation for their reform. To bring out the best in young offenders, better methods of treatment could be employed and, to protect society from recidivists and sexual offenders, isolation and segregation could be used to greater effect. Although no specific evidence was produced, the opinion was expressed that corporal punishment might adversely affect prison officials either by bringing out sadistic impulses or discouraging the application of positive reformative measures.

Section 6: Considerations Relating to Deterrence

17. There are two aspects of deterrence: First, the prevention of the repetition of a similar or other offence by the person punished; and, secondly, its effect on the conduct of the public in general. All punishments are designed to deter and the proper approach, therefore, is to determine, if possible, whether there is any unique deterrent quality in corporal punishment which is not possessed by imprisonment, probation, or other methods of punishment and treatment.

18. Conflicting opinions were offered to the Committee by those experienced in dealing with offenders. The police and prosecuting authorities were of the opinion that corporal punishment was an important deterrent. Some prison authorities, prison psychiatrists, prisoners-aid officials and others in close contact with offenders were firmly convinced that it had no special deterrent effect. The ordinary citizen might expect that criminals would carefully consider the painful effect of corporal punishment before committing a crime for which it can be imposed. The evidence indicated, however, that, in general, the concern of offenders is to avoid arrest and imprisonment, and that they do not delicately balance their intended crimes against the prospect of corporal punishment.

19. Apart from these expressions of opinion based on contact with offenders and knowledge of the behaviour sciences, there is some factual evidence available for consideration. The deterrent quality of corporal punishment in relation to the subsequent conduct of an individual offender can only be measured by relating his conduct to that of similarly-placed persons who have not experienced corporal punishment. In considering the deterrent effect of corporal punishment on individual offenders, it is not possible to form any judgment based solely on the subsequent careers of persons who have experienced it. The Committee was aware of the existence of two studies based on statistics from the United Kingdom and the State of Delaware comparing the subsequent conduct of persons sentenced to corporal punishment for robbery with those not sentenced to corporal punishment for the same offence. No comparable studies have been made in Canada and the available Canadian statistical material, in the opinion of the Committee, is not sufficient to provide a basis for similar surveys in this country. The results of these studies, which are included in the evidence[1], indicated that there is an appreciably higher proportion of recidivism among those who have been sentenced to corporal punishment. When allowance is made for the fact that those sentenced to corporal punishment may have included some of the worst offenders (as well as a surprising proportion of first-offenders), it appeared from this evidence that no unique deterrent effect was exercised by corporal punishment.

20. The second aspect of deterrence, that of restraining the commission of particular offences by the general public, likewise has received little objective investigation. The Committee was impressed with the results of a study of the incidence of robbery with violence in the United Kingdom for the period 1864 to 1936[2]. This study was offered as an indication that the incidence of robbery with violence was little influenced by the proportion of cases in which corporal punishment was awarded as a penalty. Evidence was given also about the recent experience of the United Kingdom where, prior to the abolition of corporal punishment in 1948[3], there had been a substantial increase in robberies with violence during the war and immediate post-war years notwithstanding the greatly increased use of corporal punishment by the courts. Since 1948, there has been a substantial decrease in the number of robberies with violence. The Committee considered that the evidence referred to in this paragraph and in the preceding paragraph must be interpreted carefully because statistics cannot describe all the factors shaping individual conduct or the developments in society at large which affect the incidence of particular crimes. Nevertheless, the Committee was of the opinion this evidence suggests that the incidence of robbery with violence in the United Kingdom was not appreciably influenced by the presence or absence of corporal punishment.

21. The evidence also suggested that the crime rate in other democratic countries of the Western World, as in the United Kingdom, has not been affected by the presence or absence of corporal punishment.

[3] Mr. J. A. Edmison at page 201 of Committee's 1955 Evidence, No. 7.

22. The Committee concluded, after consideration of evidence and opinion on deterrence, that corporal punishment does not exercise any unique deterrent effect in addition to that provided by other methods of punishment.

Section 7: Corporal Punishment of Young Offenders

23. The Committee gave special consideration to the problem of young offenders. Some of the arguments for extending the use of corporal punishment to young offenders as an effective deterrent against subsequent offences are reviewed in paragraph 13. The only suggestions made for increased use of corporal punishment were made by those who favoured its use for particular types of young offenders. The view was expressed that youths who had persisted, despite reasonable efforts at reform by probation and other methods, in offences against the person, property or public order, most commonly associated with street-corner gangs, might be brought to their senses by the administration of corporal punishment. In this way, it was contended, they might be saved from a prison sentence which would probably lead to a confirmed criminal career.

24. The Committee cannot accept these views. The evidence presented to the Committee indicated that the special provisions formerly made in the United Kingdom for the caning or birching of young offenders were not effective and were gradually abandoned, in practice, in favour of probation and other methods of treatment which were found to be much more effective. The United Kingdom Departmental Committee on Corporal Punishment (1938) recommended abolition of caning young offenders. This recommendation was carried into effect in 1948, by which time caning had become virtually obsolete as a method of treatment or punishment.

25. Medical and psychiatric evidence presented to the Committee suggested that little, if any, advantage would come from increased use of corporal punishment against young offenders. It was stated that such punishment would create an attitude of aggressive hostility in many cases which would militate against reform; and the experience of the Juvenile and Family Court of Toronto with corporal punishment of juveniles supported this contention. The danger exists that any increased use of corporal punishment for young offenders might undermine and destroy the positive attempts made towards their reform and rehabilitation. It was also considered that the delay resulting from the necessity of allowing for a proper trial and appeal would destroy any good which an immediate application of corporal punishment might accomplish.

26. The Committee does not believe that any convincing case was made for extending the use of corporal punishment to young offenders.

Section 8: Conclusions and Recommendations

27. The Committee kept two considerations in mind throughout its inquiry into corporal punishment as a part of the sentence of the court. The first was whether it deters those subjected to it from further crime and, secondly, whether it deters the public generally to a greater extent than other methods of punishment. The evidence did not justify the view that it will exercise any special reformative or deterrent influence on individuals upon whom it is administered and, on the whole, it appears to have the contrary effect. The Committee concluded that the existence of corporal punishment affords no unique deterrence to crime. Accordingly, the Committee recommends that corporal punishment be abolished for any of the offences for which it is presently prescribed in the Criminal Code.

28. The Committee considered that a change can be more readily recommended because the courts in recent years have made little use of corporal punishment as part of a sentence. In this respect, Canada would appear to be in line with other democratic countries which abandoned corporal punishment after its use had steadily decreased over a considerable period of time.

Section 9: Alternative Recommendations

29. In the event that the recommendation of this Committee is not accepted, the Committee makes the following alternative recommendations. First, that the law be amended to provide that corporal punishment should be imposed only after courts receive and consider full reports on the background of offenders which would indicate its suitability as a punishment in each case. Secondly, the Committee considers that corporal punishment should be administered early in each sentence and that it is inappropriate to couple it with a long sentence. Thirdly, since the strap is the instrument most commonly used, that it should be used exclusively and that uniform specifications for the construction and use of the strap should be made and enforced.

CHAPTER III

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT FOR PENITENTIARY AND PRISON OFFENCES

Section 1: Law and Offences

(1) General

30. Offenders sentenced to less than two years' imprisonment for offences under the Criminal Code or other federal statutes serve their sentences in provincial prisons and those sentenced to two years or more serve their sentences in federal penitentiaries. The Penitentiaries Act confers power on the Commissioner of Penitentiaries to make rules for the administration, management, and discipline of the penitentiaries. The Prisons and Reformatories Act provides that any person sentenced to a provincial prison is subject to all lawful rules and regulations governing its operation. Under the authority of these statutes, offenders are liable to receive corporal punishment for violation of penitentiary or prison regulations.

(2) Penitentiaries

31. The penitentiary regulations prescribe flogging or strapping, in addition to any other punishment, for the following offences:

1. Personal violence to a fellow convict;
2. Grossly offensive or abusive language to any officer;
3. Wilfully or wantonly breaking or otherwise destroying any penitentiary property;
4. When undergoing punishment, wilfully making a disturbance tending to interrupt the good order and discipline of the penitentiary;
5. Any act of gross misconduct or insubordination requiring to be suppressed by extraordinary means;
6. Escaping, or attempting or plotting to escape from the penitentiary;
7. Gross personal violence to any officer;
8. Revolt, insurrection, or mutiny, or incitement to the same;
9. Attempts to do any of the foregoing things.

(3) Provincial Prisons

32. Corporal punishment is not used as a disciplinary measure in provincial prisons in Alberta, Saskatchewan, New Brunswick and Newfoundland. No particulars were available concerning its use in Quebec, Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island.

33. In Manitoba its use is confined to an assault on an officer, mutiny or incitement to mutiny. In British Columbia it may be awarded for any of the offences specified in the regulations, namely:

1. Disobedience of the rules and regulations of the gaol;
2. Common assault by one prisoner upon another;
3. Cursing or using profane language;
4. Indecent behaviour or language toward another prisoner, toward any officer of the gaol, or toward a visitor;
5. Idleness or negligence at work;
6. Wilfully destroying or defacing gaol property;
7. Insubordination of any sort.

In Ontario it may be awarded for the following offences:

1. Assault with violence on officers;
2. Assault with violence on other inmates;
3. Continued course of bad conduct;
4. Escape or attempted escape;
5. Malicious destruction of or injury to machinery or other property;
6. Malingering to evade work;
7. Mutinous conduct;
8. Repeated fighting after warning;
9. Refusal to work after warning;
10. Repeated insolence to officers;
11. Riotous conduct in dormitories, cells, working gang or elsewhere;
12. Attempting to commit sodomy and other unmentionable crimes of like character.

Section 2: Procedure

(1) Penitentiaries

34. In penitentiaries, an inmate charged with an offence is tried in the Warden's Court. Evidence is taken on oath from the officers, and the inmate is given a fair opportunity to present his own side of the case. A summary of evidence is taken and is forwarded to the Commissioner of Penitentiaries with the warden's recommendation. It is not uncommon for the commissioner to direct the withholding of all or part of the sentence during good behaviour.

35. Before administration of the sentence, the inmate is examined by the institution's physician and psychiatrist. The sentence is carried out with a physician in attendance.

(2) Provincial Prisons

36. In none of the provinces using corporal punishment for prison offences is it necessary for the head of the institution to obtain approval of higher authority before the sentence is administered. Before administration in British Columbia, Manitoba and

Ontario, the medical officer must certify the fitness of the prisoner to endure punishment, and in Manitoba and Ontario the regulations require the medical officer to be present during execution of the punishment.

(3) General

37. Basically, the same procedure is employed in the administration of corporal punishment for prison offences and court sentences. The standard practice is to use the strap. As indicated in paragraph 15, some witnesses testified that, in their opinion, the administration of corporal punishment as a court sentence was less severe than when it was administered for a prison offence.

Section 3: Extent of Use

(1) Penitentiaries

38. In the federal penitentiaries, the use of corporal punishment has varied considerably. It declined from a rate in excess of 50 per year in the early 1930's to under 30 per year in the late 1930's and war years. After the war it rose to 63 in 1949 and then it declined in 1951 and 1952 to 8 and 7 respectively, rising again in 1953 and 1954 to 23 and 26 respectively. The decline in the post-war years was attributed to the new penal policies introduced after the delayed implementation of the Archambault Report[1] of 1938, which brought about a more relaxed feeling in the institutions. The rise in the last two years is attributed to the general unrest prevalent in the United States prisons which communicated itself to Canadian institutions.

39. In practice, corporal punishment is not awarded for all the offences listed in penitentiary regulation 165 quoted in paragraph 31. Corporal punishment is limited and is used as a penalty of last resort in cases of mutiny, incitement to mutiny, and gross personal violence to a penitentiary officer or servant or to another inmate.

(2) Provincial Prisons

40. In Manitoba, corporal punishment is restricted to the serious offences outlined in the Archambault Report and has only been imposed once in the last eight years. In British Columbia, it was until recently used to a considerable extent as a method of control at Oakalla Prison. No statistics were available but it is understood that because of improved conditions in the prison it has been virtually eliminated. According to information supplied by Ontario, approximately 250 prisoners received corporal punishment in each of the years 1949 and 1950; the number dropped to 200 in 1951 and 105 in 1952 but rose to 250 in 1953. In this period, those punished represented from 0·2 per cent to 0·5 per cent of all prisoners in custody.

Section 4: Conclusions and Recommendations

(1) Retention in Penitentiaries

41. The Committee considered that different considerations apply to corporal punishment for prison offences than to corporal punishment as a court sentence. Several witnesses, including the Commissioner of Penitentiaries and other experienced prison administrators who advocated the abolition of corporal punishment as a penalty under the Criminal Code, insisted that it was a necessary disciplinary measure in penal institutions.

42. The Committee considered, as the previous paragraphs of this report indicate, that the greatest deterrent to crime is the fear of apprehension and imprisonment. These deterrents are not effective against a person undergoing sentence and must be replaced by others. The Committee also considered that, because of the knowledge which prison authorities should possess about each prisoner, there is much less danger of corporal punishment for prison offences being applied in circumstances where it is either unsuitable or even dangerous to the offender. While the Committee did not think that corporal punishment is likely to be reformative, it considered that a prisoner rendering himself liable to such punishment has failed to take advantage of the reformative influences afforded by the prison. Accordingly, the punishment will not run entirely counter to the reformative policies of the institution.

43. The Committee does not favour indiscriminate use of corporal punishment. Too frequent use of this drastic punishment is likely to reduce its significance and render it less effective than it is if reserved for only the most serious offences. It should be regarded, as it is now in most Canadian penal institutions, as a punishment to be applied only as a last resort when all other penalties are judged to be ineffective.

44. The Committee was impressed by the evidence of the effects of the post-war changes in penal policy. The emphasis on the positive elements of reform and education and the elimination of some of the stricter features of the former discipline appear to have produced a much more relaxed attitude in the penitentiaries. In this atmosphere, it appears effective in many cases to use punishment in the positive sense of encouraging good behaviour by withdrawing various privileges, such as smoking, reading, hobbies, and other amenities, as the penalty for disciplinary offences. Other types of punishment are available in more serious cases. The loss of earned remission, although not particularly effective at the start of a long sentence, becomes a grave punishment towards the end of sentence. Deprivation of diet and various types of detention and restriction of movement in the institution, including segregation and isolation in serious cases, are traditional punishments which are extremely effective. There was evidence that some offenders are more likely to be restrained and deterred by solitary confinement than by corporal punishment, and its use is to be preferred in all proper cases because it does not arouse the same degree of resentment and anger as corporal punishment which might provoke further outbursts against the regulations.

45. Effective as these other punishments are, the Committee was impressed by the argument that the ultimate threat of corporal punishment must be held in reserve as a deterrent to serious outbursts in the institution. It is also necessary that prison officers be assured that any attack on their person will be met by stern and appropriate punishment extending even to corporal punishment. In this sense it is an important part of prison administration.

46. Opinions differed as to the deterrent effect of the punishment on the offender and this Committee noted the conclusion of the United Kingdom Committee on Corporal Punishment (1938) that it does not prevent further rule-breaking. There was evidence that a prisoner, after corporal punishment, is more discreet and prison-wise in his non-conformity, if any, and less prone to open acts of defiance. Moreover, the evidence established that the present penitentiary system of withholding all or part of a disciplinary sentence of corporal punishment during good behaviour has considerable deterrent value.

47. As indicated above, the significance of this punishment is lost, if it is applied too frequently and without proper deliberation. The Committee agrees that sentences of corporal punishment should continue to be reviewed by higher authority in Canadian penitentiaries as in the United Kingdom. This not only eliminates some of the danger of impulsive action or rashness, but also emphasizes to the offender and the prison population the importance of the punishment.

48. Subject to the exception hereinafter stated, the Committee considers that the recommendations of the Archambault Report prescribe reasonable limits in the application of corporal punishment in penitentiaries and that its use should be limited to mutiny, incitement to mutiny, and to serious assaults on penitentiary officers and servants. Further, however, the Committee considers that corporal punishment should be available for punishment of those persons who are guilty of acts of violence against fellow prisoners or causing or attempting serious damage to penitentiary property.

(2) Provincial Prisons

49. The Committee recognized that the administration of provincial prisons and the punishment for breaches of their regulations remain a provincial responsibilty. Nevertheless, it considers that the considerations affecting the application of corporal punishment for penitentiary offences apply with equal force to provincial institutions. Particularly, the Committee commends to the consideration of provincial governments its report and recommendations on the subject of the use of corporal punishment for prison offences.

*APPENDIX

TO

FINAL REPORT ON CORPORAL PUNISHMENT

(Prepared by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics)

The data included in the tables show, for each year from 1930 to 1954, the total number of convictions under certain sections of the Canadian Criminal Code (Table 1) and, separately, the number of these convictions where there was an extra sentence of corporal punishment (Table 2). In Table 3, the number of convictions with extra sentence of corporal punishment, for each year, is expressed as a percentage of the total number of convictions. For example, in 1930 there were 45 convictions under Section 204 of the Criminal Code; of these, 6, or 13·3 per cent, were convictions with extra sentence of corporal punishment. In 1952, under the same section, there were 31 convictions; and, of these, 1, or 3·2 per cent, was a conviction with extra sentence. In Tables 4, 5 and 6, the data of the preceding tables have been grouped into five-year intervals, thus permitting the calculation of an annual average for each of the five groups shown. Tables 7 and 8 show the number of remissions of corporal punishment by years and five-year groups respectively.

Data were requested under specified sections of the Canadian Criminal Code. For statistical purposes, certain of these sections are classified as distinct and separate categories; others are included in broad groups embracing several sections of the Code. Sections 80, 204 and 300 are shown separately; the remainder are included in groups which are indicated in the footnotes to Table 1.

No offences have been reported under section 80 for the years shown. As pointed out in Table 1, section 276 is included in the general category "wounding and shooting", together with sections 273, 274 and 275. No conviction with extra sentence of corporal punishment has been recorded under this heading from 1930 to 1954. The data on the total number of convictions under this heading have, therefore, been omitted from Table 1.

* All convictions under the Sections specified, including those with extra sentence of corporal punishment.

 Corporal Punishment deleted.

[1] No offences reported under Section 80.

[2] Includes convictions under Sections 206, 202, 203 and 293, but from 1950 to 1952 inclusive, convictions under Section 293 are excluded.

[3] Section 276 is coded under the general heading "wounding and shooting", which also includes Sections 273, 274 and 275. No conviction with extra sentence of corporal punishment has been recorded under this heading from 1930 to 1954 and therefore the total number of convictions have not been shown.

[4] Includes convictions under Sections 292 (a), (b) and (c), 294 and 773 (d), and from 1950 to 1952 inclusive, Section 293. (See footnote (2)).

[5] Includes convictions under Section 299.

[6] Includes convictions under Sections 301 and 302.

[7] Includes convictions under Sections 447, 445, 446 (a), (b) and (c), 448 and 449.

CRIMINAL LAW

JOINT COMMITTEE ON CERTAIN QUESTIONS—SUBSTITUTION OF COMMONS MEMBER

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a message has been received from the House of Commons in the following words:

That this house has substituted the name of Miss Aitken for that of Miss Bennett on the special Joint Committee of both houses of Parliament on capital punishment, corporal punishment and lotteries.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, there are no items on the order paper and consequently there is no business for us to consider this evening. I have just returned from visiting the chamber of the House of Commons. At the present time that house is in committee, considering the bill with respect to federal-provincial taxation arrangements, and there is practically no possibility of the bill being passed this evening. I read in the Commons Hansard a statement by the leader of the house that tomorrow, after consideration of the interim supply bill, the house will go into committee on the estimates. It will probably continue on them for the next few days. We have completed all the business which initiated in this house, and there will be nothing for us to deal with until further legislation is received from the Commons. After giving the matter careful consideration, I am of the opinion that no legislation is likely to come over to us this week.

Honourable senators, I therefore move that when the Senate rises this evening it stand adjourned until Monday evening next at 8 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

DISARMAMENT

CORRESPONDENCE WITH RUSSIA

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, recently the Prime Minister received a letter from His Excellency Nikolai Bulganin, Chairman of the Council of Ministers, at the Kremlin, Moscow. I am sure honourable senators would be interested in reading the Prime Minister's reply to it. Accordingly, I will now table a copy of his letter, and I would move, seconded by the senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner), that it appear as an appendix to today's Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: May we also see a copy of the letter written by Mr. Bulganin?

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Will the letter from the Soviet, to which the Prime Minister has replied, also be printed?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As I have not a copy of that letter available, perhaps with the permission of the house I could withdraw my motion and table both Mr. Bulganin's letter and the Prime Minister's reply next week.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

REMISSION SERVICE

REPORT TABLED

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I have a number of documents to lay on the table, among which is a copy of the report, in English and in French, of the Fauteux Committee which was appointed to investigate and report upon the principles and procedures followed in the Remission Service of the Department of Justice. I requested the Department of Justice to send to the Senate enough copies of the report for distribution to all honourable members. I understand that every senator has received a copy, but if anyone has been overlooked he should apply to the Clerk.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: May I ask the leader if it would be possible to call a meeting of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy for next Tuesday, if the Senate is to sit that day?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It might be possible to call a meeting of that committee for next Tuesday or for another day next week. I will consult with the Clerk of the Senate as to that possibility.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

NOTICE OF RESOLUTION OF APPROVAL

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators will recall that some time ago I laid on the table of the house a copy of the International Wheat Agreement. I now give notice that I propose to move on Monday, July 30:

That it is expedient that the Houses of Parliament do approve the International Wheat Agreement opened for signature at Washington on May 14, 1956 and that this house do approve the same.

THE LATE SENATOR CALDER

TRIBUTES TO HIS MEMORY

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure we were all saddened when we learned, the latter part of last week, that one of our colleagues, the Honourable Senator James A. Calder, had passed away. He had been a member of the Sente for many years. In fact, he was the dean of this house. He had a most interesting career. Although born in eastern Canada, he was essentially a westerner, and his name will always be associated with the history of western Canada. He was one of the early settlers of the old Northwest Territories, which at the time he moved to the west included not only the area now known by that name but also the present provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Senator Calder, while not a great orator, was an excellent speaker. He was always clear and incisive in his remarks, and when he had finished speaking no one was left in any doubt as to what he meant to say. He was outspoken over a long period of years, and he contributed in large measure to the debates of this house. He had not taken much part in the debates since I came to this chamber, but I have read with interest in our Hansard his speeches during previous years.

Our late colleague saw during his lifetime what are probably the greatest changes that have taken place in the development of our country. His activities led him from an older-settled part of this country to newer areas, and, through pioneering hardships, to a high place in government—all of which testified to a stout heart and a strong purpose. He is without a doubt to be numbered prominently among the legion of men and women who have helped to build this nation into the great force it is today. In the days of his youth he saw the possibilities of the Canadian West, and he was bold enough to go out and face the vicissitudes connected with western development. Indeed, many of the western enterprises in which he was interested are only now coming to fruition.

He was born in Ingersoll, Ontario, about 87 years ago. At an early age he moved with his family to the city of Winnipeg, then merely a frontier town. Having been educated in the high schools of that city, he graduated in science from the University of Manitoba, and then embarked on a teaching career. For a number of years he was Principal of the High School at Moose Jaw; afterwards he became Inspector of Schools in the Northwest Territories, and from 1901 to 1905 he was also Deputy Commissioner of Education for the Territories. Having decided to give up teaching and enter the legal profession, he was called to the bar in the year 1906. This launched him on a new career which led to high public office. In fact, even before he was called to the bar he had been elected to the first Legislature of Saskatchewan, in 1905, and upon the formation of the Scott ministry in that year he was appointed Provincial Treasurer and Commissioner of Education. He continued to serve in the provincial Government until 1917, becoming Minister of Railways, Telephones and Highways in 1912. When the Union Government was formed in Ottawa, in 1917, he was brought here by Sir Robert Borden as Minister of Immigration and Colonization. Subsequent to the Union Government's period of office he remained in the Meighen administration, during which time he was Minister of Immigration, President of the Privy Council and Minister in charge of the Department of Health. He was summoned to the Senate of Canada on September 21, 1921. It was not my privilege to be here during the time he was an active member of this house, but the records show the interest which he continued to take in the public affairs of Canada and the great contribution which he made as a senator to the work of Parliament.

I think honourable senators will agree that it is given to few Canadians to have the opportunity of serving so long and so well their country and their fellow citizens. Senator Calder enjoyed the highest esteem and honour which could be bestowed upon him by his contemporaries. He served Canada long and well, and we extend to his widow and his son our deepest sympathy in their sad bereavement.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I would like to add a few fords of tribute to the memory of Senator Calder. I always knew him to be a very capable man, but on one occasion he absolutely amazed me. That was in one of the early years of the last war, when he took part in a debate on the mobilization of man-power. After speaking for an hour without notes he requested that he be permittted to continue the next day, and when he resumed his speech he continued from exactly where he had left off, again speaking for an hour without notes. He certainly had exceptional ability.

He often told me that the time of his life he enjoyed most was when he was an inspector of schools. There were no motor cars in those days and he carried his tent with him on his democrat, pulled by a rugged pair of ponies. He was a rugged man himself. The democrat served as his temporary home, and he travelled in it over vast distances of that country.

I am sure the older inhabitants of Saskatchewan still feel that there was no finer person who could have occupied the position of inspector of schools than our late colleague. He and I were on opposite political sides in the early days, but I always admired his many talents. Although he had a long life we cannot help regretting that men of his great ability must pass on. I would like to take this opportunity to extend to his wife and son my sincere sympathy.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, July 30, at 8 p.m.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION—SUBSTITUTION OF COMMONS MEMBER

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a message has been received from the House of Commons in the following words:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house has substituted the name of Mr. Low for that of Mr. Hansell on the Joint Committee of both houses of Parliament on the Federal District Commission.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a report of the Civil Service Commission recommending that certain new classes be established for the staff of the Library of Parliament; that certain salary ranges be revised; and that the establishment for the Library of Parliament be amended by deleting the present classified positions and substituting therefor a new classification.

The Clerk (reading):

To the Honourable the Members of both Houses of Parliament:

The Civil Service Commission, at the request of the Library of Parliament, and in accordance with the provisions of sections 9 and 62 of the Civil Service Act, submits the following for approval:

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Next sitting.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 5

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 444, an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1957.

The bill was read the first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, we have already passed three interim supply bills for the current fiscal year, and this is the fourth such bill. It provides for one-twelfth of all the items to be voted in the main estimates for the fiscal year 1956-57, together with one-twelfth of all the items in the supplementary estimates for the same period.

The bill provides for all necessary ordinary requirements during the month of August. There are no additional proportions being asked for at this time. I should add that in no instance is the total amount of any item being requested. And of course I give the undertaking which it is usual to give when we are passing interim supply bills.

Honourable senators will probably be interested in a statement which sets forth the total amount requested in the main estimates and the supplementary estimates, and also the amounts which have been voted under the previous three interim supply bills for this year. With leave of the house I would have this statement appear in Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Is it very lengthy?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, but there are a lot of figures in it. It sets forth the amount of the main estimates for the year, totalling $5,042,893,969. From that sum is deducted the statutory payments, $1,869,978,290, which makes the net amount of main estimates to be voted this year $3,172,915,679. There are also supplementary estimates of $146,025,513. The total of these two figures is $3,318,941,192.

With the approval of the house I will place the statement on Hansard.

NOTE: Appropriation Act No. 2 covered the further (final) supplementary estimates (2) for 1955–56.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 442, an Act to authorize the Minister of Finance to make payments to the Governments of the provinces and to authorize the Government of Canada to enter into fiscal agreements with the Governments of the provinces. The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Later this day.

DISARMAMENT

CORRESPONDENCE WITH RUSSIA

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators will recall that at our last sitting I proposed, and the proposal was accepted by the house, that a copy of the reply by the Prime Minister to a letter from His Excellency Nikolai Bulganin should appear as an Appendix to Hansard. It was then suggested that a copy of the letter written by Mr. Bulganin should be included, so I recommended that publication of the reply should be withheld until I had obtained a copy of Mr. Bulganin's letter. I have now received it, and I move, seconded by the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig):

That the letter, dated June 6, 1956, and accompanying statement dated May 14, 1956, on the subject of disarmament addressed to the Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent, Prime Minister of Canada, by His Excellency Nikolai Bulganin, Chairman of the Council of Ministers, at The Kremlin, Moscow, and the reply thereto, dated July 16, 1956, of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Canada, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this date.

The motion was agreed to.

See Appendix to today's Hansard, p.p. 903-8.

FEDERAL—PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill 442, an Act to authorize the Minister of Finance to make payments to the Governments of the provinces and to authorize the Government of Canada to enter into fiscal agreements with the Governments of the provinces.

He said: Honourable senators, when this type of legislation was conceived its one objective which was paramount above all others was to pay the provinces on a basis of relative equality in respect to the revenue derived from personal and corporation income taxes and succession duties. The method followed in this legislation is to bring the income of the rest of the provinces up to the average of the combined income of Ontario and British Columbia in these three tax fields. This should result in all the provinces deriving in one way or another as much revenue as they would get if they had a taxable capacity comparable to the taxable capacity of the two wealthiest provines combined.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: What two are those?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Ontario and British Columbia. The purpose of this legislation, then, is to make it financially possible for all provinces, whatever their tax base, to perform their constitutional functions themselves and to provide a reasonable Canadian level of provincial services without an abnormal burden of taxation. In other words, we are maintaining the federal system of government rather than a unitary system. We avoid centralization, but at the same time the provinces receive an equal sum on a per capita basis from the revenue which comes from the three tax fields which I have just mentioned. That amount per capita, as I have just said, is substantially the same no matter whether a province is richly endowed by nature or not.

The administration of a federal state is never an easy one. The facts of history prove to us that the federal state is always a complex problem in government. In Canada this has been due not so much to its structure as to the basic facts that led to the adoption of this form of government in the first place. The Fathers of Confederation were drawn together by like interests of economics and security, but were kept from becoming more closely aligned in a unitary state by differences of geography, race, and religion and by a desire to preserve a well-developed sense of identity. In view of the economic and political differences which existed in the governments that came together in Confederation in 1867, it is perhaps surprising that an agreement was possible in the first place and that the structure has been strengthened during these past ninety years.

The difficulty in financing the various provincial governments was realized at the time of the formation of Confederation. Honourable senators will recall that section 118 of the British North America Act provides for the payment of subsidies to the provinces. These statutory subsidies have been revised from time to time and are still in existence, but I should point out here that the amounts which the provinces receive as subsidies under the British North America Act are not affected by any amounts they will receive under this legislation. I have a statement showing the amount of the statutory subsidies to the provinces for the years 1954-55. With the approval of the house this statement could appear on Hansard.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Perhaps the honourable leader would read the statement?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I shall be very glad to do so. It is as follows:

Newfoundland	$1,569,133
Prince Edward Island	656,932
Nova Scotia	2,056,838
New Brunswick	1,679,022
Quebec	3,300,869
Ontario	3,640,940
Manitoba	1,852,468
Saskatchewan	2,087,844
Alberta	2,228,374
British Columbia	1,281,319

As I have already stated, those amounts are not included in the amounts which are paid to any province under the provisions of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Horner: They are not affected by it?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: They are not affected by it one way or another. I will put it this way: Since Confederation this problem of payments to the provinces has been a continuous one. I will not go over the years since 1867, but I would remind honourable senators of the Duncan and White Commission awards. The awards provided for payments to the three Maritime provinces. Actually, they were subsidy adjustments, and therefore it was necessary to amend the British North America Act in order to bring them into effect. Then in 1937 the Rowell-Sirois Commission was set up to investigate and report on the economic and financial basis of Confederation and on the distribution of legislative powers. The commission went into the whole question of Canadian economics very carefully; it sat for over two years, and brought down its report in 1940. Among its recommendations were that personal and corporation income taxes and the succession duties should be levied by the federal Government only, and that the federal Government should assume unemployment and relief costs, and also that "national adjustment grants" should be made to the provinces. The report was considered by the provinces, but not accepted by them. It was definitely refused by Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario.

Then the war came along, and the very fact of war made it obvious that even if the long-term view could not be taken the financial needs of war would soon force taxes to levels beyond previous experience, and this would not fail to have a real effect upon provincial finances. Mr. Ilsley, who was Minister of Finance at that time, made it quite clear that the inequity of overall tax levels between provinces caused him much concern, and to avoid this he proposed that the dominion pay to each province a rental payment for the personal income and corporation income tax fields in each year. This proposal was accepted by the provinces and put into effect through agreements with the provinces and by legislation passed by Parliament and by the various legislatures throughout the country. The annual payments made in respect of the agreements total about $100 million a year. The provinces were also reimbursed for the loss of revenue due to gasoline shortage to the extent of about $33 million during the period of these agreements. That arrangement was acceptable to the provinces because they felt that every effort should be put forth to win the war, and the question of provincial and dominion rights was not as important in those days when we were faced with an enemy at times almost at our door.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question? Did all the provinces accept that?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, all the provinces accepted that agreement. That arrangement lasted during the period of the war. Toward the end of the war there was a conference on reconstruction, held in 1945, the purpose of which was to devise something that would meet more adequately the needs of the country in the post-war world. There were months of discussion, but now that the war was over the provinces were unable to reach an agreement. The dominion Government made certain proposals which appear in a document generally referred to as "The Green Book". Among the proposals was one that the federal Government should assume the unemployment burden, and should have absolute control of personal and corporation income taxes and succession duties. However, that was not acceptable to some provinces, and the conference broke up. The federal Government then offered the provinces what are known as tax rental agreements. In return for the payments to the provinces, the provinces were to retire temporarily from the fields of personal and corporation income tax and succession duty. The provinces, with the exception of Ontario and Quebec, accepted the proposals made by the Government known as the tax rental agreements. Under those agreements subsidy payments on a scale substantially higher than the amount which could be received by the provinces in those three fields were offered to the provinces. At that time—namely, 1947—certain basic payments were guaranteed to the provinces, and the income to the provinces was to be increased in relation to the gross national product and population. Honourable senators will recall that at that time the federal Government retired from the fields of taxation on gasoline, electricity, gas and amusements. Those agreements remained in force over the five-year period from 1947 to 1952.

A conference was called in 1950 with a view to working out agreements which would be acceptable to all provinces. As a result of numerous meetings held between the representatives of the provinces and the federal authority, in 1952 the federal Government assumed the full cost of the pensions paid to citizens who had reached the age of 70 years. If my memory serves me rightly, prior to that time the federal Government's share was 75 per cent and the provinces bore 25 per cent of the cost; and I think when the old age legislation first came into being the cost was shared equally between the provinces and the dominion.

In 1952 provision was also made whereby the federal Government would pay 50 per cent of the cost of pensions paid to persons between the ages of 65 and 70 years, on a means test basis.

Also the basic guaranteed minimum payments to the provinces were increased from those of the 1947 agreements.

In 1952 all the provinces except Quebec entered into agreements. The agreement with Ontario differed from that with the other provinces in that it did not rent its succession duties.

I come now to the present agreements. As I have said, the last mentioned tax rental agreements came into effect in 1952 and will expire in 1957.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: May I ask the honourable leader if he can give us the amounts that went to the provinces under the 1952 agreements, and those under the proposed agreements?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I do not have a statement of the amounts which have been paid to the provinces over those years. However, the information I have is that the amounts proposed under the new agreements are larger than under the former agreements. As this debate will not likely conclude this evening, I shall endeavour to get some statistics which would assist me in answering the question asked by my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Perhaps honourable senators would be interested in having the amounts covered by the former agreements and those proposed by the new agreements so that they could look at them together.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Would the honourable leader permit me to ask two questions to be answered later on, if not now? First, did the honourable gentleman say that the two most wealthy provinces of the ten are Ontario and British Columbia? And if he did say that, how is that rating arrived at?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: What I intended to say was that the amounts received in those provinces per capita by way of personal income taxes, corporation income taxes and succession duties were greater than in the other eight provinces.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Greater per capita?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, per capita. That is to say, the amount per capita from those three sources is greater in those two provinces than in the other eight provinces.

Perhaps I should clear up the point that the proportion which the federal Government repays to the provinces is not the total amount that would be received from those fields. As honourable senators will observe from the bill, it is 10 per cent of the personal income tax, 9 percentage points of corporate income tax and 50 per cent of succession duty tax. It is in that respect that those two provinces are wealthier, in that they get more money from those three taxation fields than do the other provinces.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: If the honourable gentleman will permit me a further question, may I ask if that is accurate as a bald statement, or does it mean those two provinces have greater incomes per capita? Is the gross amount received in each of those two provinces greater than the gross amount received in each of the other eight provinces?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No. It is the per capita amount and not the gross amount.

The present bill contains a provision with respect to tax equalization payments in the three fields which I have mentioned. That means that a payment is made to each of the provinces in which the per capita yield is not as high as in those two provinces with the greater yield. The purpose of making those payments is to equalize the amount of taxation in those fields for each province. It is not a very technical point, but is somewhat difficult to explain. If any honourable senator does not understand the effect of the provision, I hope he will question me on it, and I shall try to clear up any point that is not understood. That provision brings the amount per capita in all provinces to approximately the same figure from those three sources, and is the first important feature of this bill.

The bill provides further for provincial revenue stabilization payments with respect to such taxation. I will explain that section further when we come to the details of the bill. Its purpose is to place a floor under the amounts of money the provinces will receive covering the five-year period of this legislation.

The bill also provides that a province can continue to deal with the federal Government under a tax rental agreement as has been done in the past. One interesting feature of the bill is that no province is required to enter into an agreement with the federal Government in order to benefit from the provisions of this legislation. Whether a provincial Government enters into an agreement with the dominion Government or not, the province will receive an equalization payment and will also have the benefit of the stabilization provisions in the bill. However, if the province wants to, it can enter into an agreement or can carry on under a tax rental agreement.

Honourable senators might be interested in a statement that I have here. The figures are estimates, because we do not know exactly how much money will be received from the three fields during the coming year, that is during the year 1957-58. This act will not come into effect until the commencement of that fiscal year, and the statement is an estimate of the operation of financial arrangements under the act for the fiscal year 1957-58, under certain assumed economic conditions. Honourable senators, I am sure, will understand why it has to be under assumed economic conditions. The statement is quite a long one, so I do not intend to read it, but I can explain briefly what it is. It sets forth the estimated population, in 1957, of each of the provinces. It then shows the estimated amount that each province would receive from these three fields which we call standard taxes. Then the per capita yield is worked out, and the amount that is necessary to bring that per capita yield up to the average per capita yield of the two top provinces. Then there is set out the equalization payment which each province will receive during the year 1957-58.

I will not endeavour to explain the statement any further, but from what I have said honourable senators will realize that it is very interesting and contains some useful information. With the consent of the house I would place the statement on Hansard.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The yield of standard taxes and the insurance premium tax have been increased by 6% per annum over the basic 1955 data. The distribution of taxable incomes, profits and successions between provinces is on the basis of data presently available. 1956 Federal rates for individual income tax and succession duty have been used.

This statement is for illustrative purposes only

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Now, honourable senators, may I briefly run over the provisions of the bill? I shall not go into them in too great detail.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Would the honourable leader permit me one more question? Does the statement which he has just put on Hansard mean that the provinces which have the largest percentage of juveniles, of non-earning children, have the lowest per capita income?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It would not necessarily follow.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: But that factor would naturally be an ingredient?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Oh yes, it would be an ingredient.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: A new-born babe is a Canadian citizen?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It depends on where the new-born babe is born. If he is born under the provisions of the Canadian Citizenship Act he is a Canadian citizen.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: My honourable friend was naturally not speaking of new-born babes in Africa or Asia.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, just in the provinces of Canada.

I will endeavour to explain this bill clause by clause without delaying too long or going into too many technicalities.

The first clause is the short title. The second is the interpretation clause.

I should refer to clause 2 (d), in which the marginal note reads "Standard corporation income tax". The standard corporation income tax is 9 per cent of a corporation's taxable income earned, but that is actually 20 per cent of the federal effective rate, because the income taxation rate is about 45 per cent on a corporation's income, and 9 percentage points of that is one-fifth of 45, which is 20 per cent.

In clause 2 (f), the marginal note is "Standard individual income tax". The standard individual income tax is equal to 10 per cent of the total amount of tax payable under the Income Tax Act.

The standard succession duty rate referred to in clause 2(i) means 50 per cent of the total amount of the federal succession duty payable.

As honourable senators will recall, those are the three fields in which there was a rental to the dominion by the provinces.

The provision with respect to income taxes, both corporation and personal, is for the calendar year, but in so far as succession duty is concerned it is on a three-year average fiscal year basis.

In clause 2 (3) there is a provision that the dollar amount that is paid under these acts is static. That is to say, if a person pays a tax of 10 per cent on his income and there is a change in the rate of income tax—let us say it is reduced—that would not affect the payments to the provinces under this measure. They are calculated on the rates in effect at the time the province enters into the agreement.

As stated in clause 3, payments will be made in respect of any fiscal year from 1957 to 1962.

The next clause of interest has to do with the basis on which the equalization payment is made. Under clause 5 the floor or minimum payments are described. Various options are available to the provinces. This matter is rather technical. A province is guaranteed as much in the first fiscal year as it would have received if the tax rental agreement had been in effect.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Which tax agreement does the honourable leader refer to?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The tax rental agreement of 1952 to 1957. If a province under this new arrangement does not receive as much as it would have received under the tax rental agreement it gets an additional sum to bring it up to that amount. Later, the province has an option to accept either what it would have received on the average of the two years immediately preceding, or as though the tax rental agreements had been continued. In other words, a province will not get a smaller amount in the first year than it would have had under a tax rental agreement, and on and after the third year it will be entitled to not less than 95 per cent of the average of the total of the two previous years. That is spelled out in the bill.

Hon. Mr. Power: I quite understand there are definitions of "standard taxes", "standard individual income tax" and "standard corporation income tax", but where in the bill is authority to be found to permit an ordinary citizen to deduct 10 per cent, and a corporation to deduct 9 per cent?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If there is a tax rental agreement between the province and the dominion, there would not be a deduction.

Hon. John J. Connolly: I wonder whether I may interject a remark. Perhaps the answer to the question of the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power) is this. It will be remembered that a year ago the Prime Minister, after negotiations with the Premier of Quebec, announced in the other place that legislation would be introduced—and later it was introduced—permiting taxpayers in any province which levied income tax to deduct from their federal income tax the amount of provincial tax up to 10 per cent of the federal tax. I believe, though I speak subject to correction, that this provision was inserted in the Income Tax Act last year.

Hon. Mr. Gouin: That is so.

Hon. Mr. Power: I do not recall that there is in the Income Tax Act any such definition of "standard corporation income tax" or "standard individual income tax", and if I understand the purpose of this bill it is to deal with the particular things which the bill defines.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable senator is right. I do not believe there is a clause in the Income Tax Act defining "standard corporation income tax", but it is set forth in the interpretation clause of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Power: But where do we find what we are to do about the standard individual income tax, now that it is defined?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As the honourable senator for Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) has said, that information is contained in the Income Tax Act.

Hon. Mr. Power: I do not think the Income Tax Act contains any definition relating either to standard individual income tax or standard corporation income tax. At least, that is my recollection. These are new terms. How are they being made to apply to the individual or the corporation that pays income tax? I want to see what there is in this bill which makes them applicable.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Tomorrow I shall have a copy of the Income Tax Act, and I shall then be glad to furnish an explanation. It is difficult to explain the matter when the act is not before me. I am glad the question has been raised, and if there are any other matters on which honourable senators desire information, perhaps they could be mentioned at this time.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I take it that a province will only be entitled to this allowance after an agreement in that respect has been made by it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No.

Hon. Mr. Power: That has nothing to do with it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As the honourable senator from Gulf has said, that has nothing to do with the agreement. A province, without entering into an agreement, can collect 10 per cent, of personal income tax, 9 percentage points on corporate profits, and 50 per cent of succession duty. If a tax rental agreement is entered into, it has not the right to collect these amounts directly.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: In all the agreements that have been signed it was included to the extent of 5 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That has now been changed from 5 per cent to 10 per cent.

Hon. John J. Connolly: May I ask a question for the purpose of getting information at a later time? I understand that most of the provinces do not disagree with the principle of this legislation. Perhaps it is fair to say that none of them disagree with it. Some of them are not in accord on the question of quantum, of how much money they should get. The formula proposed in one branch of the legislation is 10, 9 and 50 per cent of the tax takes in the three fields in question; but I understand that some of the provincial premiers have been holding out for tax takes of 15, 15 and 50 per cent to be assigned to them. Might it be possible at a later time for the leader to supply figures indicating how much it would amount to in terms of dollars if the provinces had their payments in this respect made on the basis of 10, 9 and 50 per cent in one case and 15, 15 and 50 per cent in the other case?

Hon. Mr. Power: It is not a case of payments made. This has nothing to do with payments. It is that the province may collect and its citizens may deduct from federal tax either 10, 9 and 50 per cent or 15, 15 and 50 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: A deduction may be made from federal income tax on account of income tax paid to a province.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If the amounts were increased to 15, 15 and 50 per cent I could get a statement as to how much money would be involved, but I think I should make the following explanation. The equalization payments are made with respect to the total amount received by the provinces on 10 per cent of the income tax, 9 percentage points of the corporation tax and 50 per cent of the succession duties. It is the total yield of that percentage of the tax of the two wealthiest provinces, Ontario and British Columbia, that is determined. It is not the amount which the provinces receive from all income tax; it is just 10 per cent of the income tax, 9 percentage points of the corporation profits, and 50 per cent of the succession duties. The average comes to somewhere around $38 or $40 per head in those two provinces. The amount which any province would collect less than $38 or $40 a head would be given to that province to bring it up to the amount per capita which the two wealthiest provinces would have collected. So what this comes down to is that the two wealthiest provinces get that amount back from the income tax and succession duties which were collected, and the other provinces get their amount plus the difference between their amount and the amount per capita of the wealthiest provinces.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government a question on this point? Let us say that the people of British Columbia contribute $100 million per annum in the fields of income tax, corporation tax and succession duty tax. Is this calculated on the basis of the number of people who pay in or on the whole population per capita?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It is on the whole population.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Then if there are many large families in British Columbia the per capita tax would be small. If there are a lot of young and elderly people the tax would be large. Am I right? The provinces of Manitoba and Quebec, which have large young populations, would never be considered on this basis as rich provinces. Is that not what it means? The point I am trying to make is that the standard for British Columbia is a false one. A great many people from Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta move to British Columbia when they retire.

Hon. Mr. Horner: And they take their wealth with them.

Hon. Mr. Haig: They are elderly people and they move to British Columbia, taking with them not great wealth but a certain amount of money that goes into income tax and succession duties, and so on. I do not want to argue the point at this time. I just want to make sure of the facts. As I understand it, the calculation is based on the total amount given, divided amongst the population.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is correct. It is not a division on the basis of the number of people who pay individual income tax. I do not see how that would very well be feasible in connection with corporations.

Hon. Mr. Power: It is "the sum of the standard taxes".

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, it is the total of the amounts received from the personal income tax, the corporation income tax and the succession duties on a per capita basis. It is on a per capita basis, and in no case is it on a basis of individual payments. I should also point out that the amount arrived at is not calculated on British Columbia alone; it is on British Columbia and Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes, I know that. It applies equally to both.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It is on those two provinces because they have the highest payments.

Honourable senators, I have endeavoured to give a clear explanation of this bill, which though not too complicated is very difficult to explain. I can only hope that honourable members have a better grasp of it now than when I started. I trust I have not confused the issue. I shall endeavour to get further information, and I shall reconsider the questions that have been asked. If any of my answers have not been correct or not clear enough I shall endeavour to rectify matters when closing the debate.

I feel this is a great step forward in our relations with the provinces. I do not think anyone in Canada wants to have a great centralized state. There are some democratic countries where the federal state says to the provincial or junior states: "You get so much money and we will tell you how you can spend it. You cannot tax in certain places." In this legislation the federal Government takes no such stand. If the provincial governments do not like this way of doing business they can still go on and tax; and if they want to avoid double taxation then we feel we are leaving the way open for them to do so by providing the abatements of 10 per cent, 9 percentage points and 50 per cent. No province is being forced into an agreement, and every province, whether or not it enters into an agreement, will receive an equalization payment.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Why are the agreements for five years? Why are they not for three years? Is it a five-year plan?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The previous agreements have been for a period of five years. Of course, this legislation could be amended during the five year period if it were discovered that it was not working equitably. Some period of time has to be agreed upon, and it was felt that five years was better than ten years, and perhaps better than three years. Whether we are right or not I cannot say, but I think it is a fair period of time in which to put this proposal into operation and see the effects of it.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I just do not like the sound of five years.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: We could have changed the period to six, four, or some other number of years. At least the five-year period was acceptable to nine provinces as the term of the last preceding agreements.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: You might say 60 months!

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I extend my congratulations to the honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) for having explained this legislation just as clearly as it could be done. It is a difficult piece of legislation, which has been inspired by good will.

I hope I will be permitted by the honourable leader and other honourable senators to revert to fundamentals in this age of public bargaining and auctioneering.

It is strange to think that Canada can deal with outside powers, in what we call "external affairs", but is legally powerless to deal with the provinces in internal affairs. However, the statute which is called The Statute of Westminster—there are tens of thousands of statutes of Westminster, but I mean the one of 1931—gives certain powers to the countries in the Commonwealth with regard to external affairs, but none concerning the various states or provinces that exist within any one country of the Commonwealth; and if Canada can deal with foreign countries it is because the matter has not been foreseen in the British North America Act, which is our Constitution. On the other hand, the B. N. A. Act ties Canada and ties the provinces in a way that cannot be overlooked. Our Constitution is a pact wrapped up in an Imperial statute, and every time that a change to the Constitution has been legally made it has been made by another statute of the British Parliament.

Before addressing you, honourable senators, I wanted to make sure of the meaning of the word "exclusive" that is repeated so often in the vital part of the Constitution, which concerns the powers of the Government of Canada and of the provinces. According to the Oxford Dictionary the word "exclusive" means "debarring from participation." If we take section 91 of the B. N. A. Act, entitled, "Powers of the Parliament", we find that it says:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislature of the Provinces, and for greater Certainty, but not so as to restrict the Generality of the foregoing Terms in this Section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; . . .

I will not read all the remainder of the section because every honourable senator is perfectly familiar with the wording of it, but I would draw attention to subsection 29, which reads thus:

> Such Classes of subjects as are expressly excepted in the Enumeration of the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces.

And the last paragraph of section 91 is as follows:

> And any Matter coming within any of the Classes of Subjects enumerated in this Section shall not be deemed to come within the Class of Matters of a local or private Nature comprised in the Enumeration of the Classes of the Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces.

Honourable senators will see that the words "exclusive" and "exclusively" are used several times in section 91, which decides what are the powers of the Parliament of Canada. The British Parliament has said that the Canadian Parliament can have exclusive powers that shall not infringe upon the powers expressly conferred upon the provinces. Following section 91 is section 92, entitled, "Exclusive Powers of Provincial Legislatures." There is the word "exclusive" again. "Exclusive" means that the Government at Ottawa, in virtue of the Constitution, has exclusive powers in certain jurisdictions and the provinces are debarred from participation in them; and on the other hand, the provinces are given exclusive powers in certain jurisdictions from participation in which the Government of Canada is debarred.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: I am sure my honourable friend knows that in many instances the Privy Council has interpreted these sections of the British North America Act. Would he be good enough, if he has them, to cite from some of those judgments the meaning placed by the Privy Council on the word "exclusive"?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I have not brought with me my collection of judgments of the Privy Council. However, I would remind my honourable friend of the numerous cases won by Sir Oliver Mowat, when he was Premier of Ontario, on the question of the sovereignty of the provinces and the sovereignty of the Government at Ottawa. To put the meaning of the word "exclusive" in simple language—it might not be the language used by the highest courts—it is that each body shall not mind the other body's business. I think it cannot be expressed more clearly.

May I point out that the British North America Act has never been amended, except at times for particular cases such as to cover the question of unemployment insurance. But the basic sections of the act have not been amended, and Canada today, with respect to the various jurisdictions as between the federal Government and the provincial legislatures, stands in the same position as it did in the day of Sir John Macdonald and Sir George Cartier. The Constitution is the same, although the interpretation of it has at times been different. Those different interpretations have not been due to judgments of the courts of this land or of the Privy Council, but to the fact that the governments have decided to deal together in spite of the clear wording of the Constitution.

Let us see what are the exclusive powers of the provinces under section 92:

> In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say—

The section lists the various jurisdictions of the legislatures.

Section 93 gives the same exclusive jurisdiction to the provincial legislatures with respect to education. It reads:

> In and for each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Education, subject and according to the following Provisions—

That means that the Parliament of Canada has nothing to do with the matter of education.

In about 1938, at the time of the sitting of the Rowell-Sirois Commission, a new fashion was established with respect to dealings between the provinces and the federal Government. Indeed, it started in 1935, under the Conservative Government, for the purpose of helping to relieve unemployment. My contention is that all those dealings with the provinces were illegal because they were against the principles set down in the Constitution itself. What was the basis for the so-called agreements with the provinces? Was it a question of law? Was it a question of fact? No, not at all. It was a question of auctioneering or bargaining. The provinces, with the exception of Quebec, came one after the other and said they wanted more. They were not satisfied; they were gluttons. Such dealing was a question of expediency and not of principle.

I understand it is a fine idea to share the wealth by tax rentals, but what legal basis is there for it? Is that the right way of doing it? Why is it that the B.N.A. Act has been amended with respect to the census, redistribution, unemployment, and the creation of a new province, but has not been amended with respect to the dealings of the Parliament of Canada with the provinces?

The last understanding or agreement between the federal authorities and the provinces that was legal was the one having to do with the transfer of natural resources by Canada to the provinces in 1930, under a Liberal government.

Hon. Mr. Horner: No, it was under a Conservative government.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: But it was already arranged by the Liberal government. The Conservative Government did not do too much in that way, and for that I give them credit. But I am not talking politically now.

The amendments that have been made to the act do not change the relationship between Canada and the provinces. I wonder why we do not amend the act for the purpose of dealing with provinces as we amended it to deal with these other matters. That is my point.

On October 7, 1954, a very bright newspaper, the Ottawa Journal, printed an editorial under the heading "Mr. Frost's Move Next". It reads:

> When Ontario's Premier Leslie Frost signed a tax rental agreement with the Dominion, he said—he has emphasized it since—that it was only a "stop-gap".

In French we say bouche-trou.

> Now that Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Duplessis sensibly have broken the too-prolonged fiscal deadlock between Quebec and Ottawa—deadlock over an issue that concerned Ontario and the other provinces as much as it concerned Quebec—Mr. Frost has an opportunity of helping with something concrete to replace his "stop-gap".
>
> Mr. Frost, we think, should get going without delay on this concrete something. For if a dominion-provincial conference is held within the next few months (Mr. St. Laurent indicates it may come as early as January), it will not be enough for Mr. Frost to come to it with but pious platitudes and a plea that there was time for little else.
> A dominion-provincial conference requires preplanning. If therefore Mr. Duplessis gets the "working papers" of his new tax proposals into the hands of Mr. St. Laurent within a few weeks and they should prove acceptable as a basis for a meeting with all the provinces, Mr. Frost should move immediately for a revival of the Economic Committee which was set up at the 1945-46 conference but died with the conference itself, though it was supposed to be continuing machinery.

It is a very nice article, but I do not want to read all of it.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: What is the date?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: October 7, 1954. It is a very fine article.

The Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons lacks imagination. The Ottawa Journal of July 16 carried the following heading:

> Drew Asks New Tax Parley.
> Would Halt Tax-Sharing Proposals.
> Tells Commons Scheme is Just Another "Stop-Gap".

He repeated that two years after Mr. Frost had made his great discovery.

Then the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons condemned the proposal and called for new talks, complaining that there was not enough given to the provinces. I find it quite interesting that on July 17 the Montreal Gazette carried a front page headline reading:

Frost Pledges Active Campaign For PCs.
Federal Election Aid Promised In Ontario.

I will not say that it was blackmail but I find it strange diplomacy for Mr. Frost to threaten the Government of Canada with reprisals if the provinces did not receive more, and for him to say that he would fight for the Drew party, the PCs, if he did not get what he wanted. I could not believe that Mr. Frost, who is a pleasant gentleman, had used such language or had made such a promise. I thought it was beneath him to use such tactics in the last stages of his bargaining, and he did not go quite as far as that. After an interview that he gave to the press the Gazette carried a dispatch headlined as follows:

Frost Urges Tax-Sharing "Realism".
B.N.A. Terms Ignored in Offer.

He is the one who ignores the terms of the British North America Act. Would it be fair, honourable senators, for us to bear the odium and opprobrium of taxation to make gifts to Mr. Frost because he spends too much? He has a way out. He has only to use his power to impose his own income tax legislation, and then he may have as much money as he needs. Why should the Government of Canada pay for the broken jars of Mr. Frost in the province of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Why doesn't he seize the Welland Canal?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Oh, yes, he has power to do all sorts of things. He can say, "I can be extravagant, the Government of Ontario can spend money like drunken sailors and Ottawa will pay for it". Why should we, honourable senators, suffer the odium of collecting taxes, not for legal expenditures in virtue of the provisions of the B.N.A. Act but for the benefit of Mr. Frost and in contravention of that act? He has the power to get all he wants, so why should he come to us for it? It is very strange. I know Mr. Frost personally; I think he is a fine gentleman. I feel he has been misquoted, but if he actually said what he is reported to have said he is entirely wrong. Why does he speak of the terms of the British North America Act? I wonder if he has read the act? I will send him a copy of my speech so that he will have an opportunity of reading the essential wording of that statute.

What does he need more money for? For one thing, he needs it for education. In an interview published in the Gazette of Thursday, July 19, Mr. Frost said that he needs it to pay for increased costs of primary and secondary schools. He said that primary and secondary schools now had a combined enrolment of 1 million, and that in 10 years the enrolment would reach 1,750,000. He needs it for universities, in which 20,000 students were enrolled, and in 20 years there would be 90,000. He needs it for water pollution control, partly caused by the growth of industry. He needs it for hospitals, highways and public buildings, and for welfare services.

I have no objection to Mr. Frost spending any amount of money that he decides to spend in the province of Ontario. On the other hand, I wonder why Ottawa should tax the Canadian people because Mr. Frost is afraid to tax them, because Mr. Frost is unwilling to tax them.

Hon. Mr. Horner: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question? Is he in favour of this legislation or is he opposed to it?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Wait and see. I thank my honourable colleague for listening to my speech; I am sure that he is greatly interested, and he will be the more so because, if I am not mistaken, he was born in the province of Quebec, and I will have something to say about his native province.

Mr. Frost should remember that the greatest and most illustrious Premier of Ontario was none other than the Honourable Sir Oliver Mowat. He was premier of that province from 1872 to 1896, and was the first Minister of Justice in the Laurier cabinet. The story of his life is most interesting, and I suggest that Premier Frost should read it. To quote from the Encyclopaedia Britannica:

In eight important cases which he argued before the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council, he established, as against the contention of Sir John A. Macdonald, the proposition that the provincial legislatures were co-ordinate with and not subordinate to the parliament of Canada. To weaken his influence the Conservatives at Ottawa attempted to extend the boundaries of Manitoba, thereby reducing the area of Ontario; but Mr. Mowat again appealed to the Judicial Committee and was again successful. According to Sir John A. Macdonald, Ontario contained under the "Quebec Act" only 116,782 sq. m.; but Mr. Mowat gave it an area of 260,862 sq. m. When he returned home after this great victory he received an ovation unparalleled in the history of any Canadian statesman.

Sir Oliver Mowat championed the sovereignty of the province of Ontario, contending that it was free to do, within the provisions of the imperial statute, whatever it liked.

What is the difference between the province of Ontario and the other provinces?

It is not a question of expediency; it is a question of principle. We have certain rights in virtue of the Constitution, but there are other rights which we do not have. We of the province of Quebec have rights which we cherish, and we do not want to lose them for the benefit of any other province or of the Government of Canada: they have existed since the time of Confederation, and the Province of Quebec will not sacrifice any of them unless they are changed by amendment of the British North America Act. It is in accordance with these principles that certain income tax legislation has been adopted by the Province of Quebec. The Ontario Government could follow the same course if it had the courage to do so. It would merely be acting within its rights; for although its revenue is bigger than ever, if it is insufficient Ontario also can have recourse to an income tax levy.

I could say much more along these lines, honourable senators, but I will conclude by pointing out that the Government of Canada has not imposed terms upon the provinces but has made offers to them in order to help them, which they can accept if they see fit. Although I have strong doubts about the legality of this legislation, I consider that its purpose is a good one. I hope no one will speak to me about "the poor provinces". It does not get into my head; it does not carry conviction when one thinks of the wealth of the Prairie provinces, and also of the Maritimes. Not long ago a man died leaving a fortune of $60 million, of which the province's share is probably around $20 million. One might say it comes from heaven; it is a very nice windfall. We know that there are wealthy Canadians in other parts of the country. So I hope that when the representatives of the provinces appear in Ottawa they will come as men and not as beggars; that they will bear in mind the workings of our Constitution, and take into account that taxation is very heavy. Some provincial premiers who complain that the grants they receive are insufficient, insist also that taxation should not be raised. It is not logical.

I wanted to refer to some of the fundamentals of this question. I have done so; and I thank my honourable colleagues for having done me the honour of listening.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Haig, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

Letter dated June 6, 1956, and accompanying statement dated May 14, 1956, on disarmament, addressed to the Prime Minister by His Excellency Nikolai Bulganin, Chairman of the Council of Ministers, the Kremlin, Moscow, and the Prime Minister's reply, dated July 16, 1956.

(Translation)

THE KREMLIN, MOSCOW

JUNE 6, 1956.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister,

I would like to exchange views with you on such an important international problem as that of disarmament in consideration of which both our countries are taking part in the Subcommittee of the United Nations Disarmament Commission.

It must be said now with regret that the discussions on this question which have been carried on in the United Nations for many years have failed to yield positive results. However, we cannot but recognize that the solution of this problem, especially with the appearance of such new weapons of mass destruction as the atomic and hydrogen bombs, is becoming more and more imperative.

I believe you will agree with me, Mr. Prime Minister, that in the present conditions of a definite relaxation of international tension there are favourable opportunities for the carrying out by States of concrete measures for the reduction of armaments and armed forces. The Soviet Government noted with satisfaction the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada made in the House of Commons on March 20, that Canada will do her utmost towards bringing about effective disarmament which would contribute to diminishing international tension and facilitate the settlement of other oustanding issues.

We are firmly convinced that the implementation by states of measures for reducing their armaments and armed forces, before an international agreement on this problem has been reached, would contribute to strengthening confidence between states and to consolidating peace throughout the world. Guided by these very considerations the Soviet Government has taken a decision about a new and considerable reduction of armed forces of the Soviet Union by 1,200,000 men accompanied by a corresponding reduction in armaments and military expenditures, over and above the previously effected reduction of the Soviet armed forces by 640,000 men.

Addressing this message to you, I express the hope that the Government of Canada, which is represented in the United Nations Subcommittee on disarmament and bears a special responsibility for an early solution of the disarmament problem, will examine with all attention the enclosed statement of the Soviet Government of May 14 on the question of disarmament and will find it possible to undertake such steps as would facilitate the solution of the problem of disarmament in the interests of consolidating peace and the universal security of peoples.

With sincere respect,

(Original signed by)

N. Bulganin.

His Excellency,
Right Hon. Louis Stephen St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

STATEMENT OF THE SOVIET GOVERNMENT ON DISARMAMENT

Today it is recognized by all that a relaxation in international tension has been achieved lately. The hotbeds of war which but recently threatened to flare up into another world conflagration have been stamped out. Definite results have been attained in settling certain outstanding political issues in Asia and Europe. This has been achieved through negotiations between the countries concerned.

Relations between states have been considerably extended of late, meetings and contacts between statesmen of the Great Powers have been resumed. At these meetings discussions have been initiated of important international problems, including outstanding questions, and ways for coordinating the views and positions of states with different social systems are being explored with greater vigour.

The positions of the supporters of international co-operation are growing stronger in all countries. A vast zone of peace has been formed including big and small states and embracing the majority of the world's population.

All this has promoted a lessening of international tension and strengthening of peace. This is the result not only of the activities of governments.

A great influence has been exerted by the growth of the forces of the peoples and their striving for peace, for peaceful coexistence of states. This is an important result of the many efforts of the peoples to consolidate peace, to ensure the development of international co-operation in promoting peaceful construction and the advance of the peoples' living standards.

There must, however, be no contentment with what has been achieved. International tension has not been eliminated as yet, the necessary confidence in relations between states has not been built up while the aggressive forces of certain countries seek to continue their old line which is hostile to peace.

The main obstacle to the further easing of international tension is the continued arms race. Notwithstanding the indisputable improvement of the international situation achieved lately, states still maintain inflated armed forces. The stockpiling of atomic and hydrogen bombs continues. Millions of young men have been placed under arms and torn away from peaceful constructive labour.

Influential circles and, first and foremost, the big monopolies which produce arms and make huge profits on arms deliveries are interested in the continuation of the arms race and the spread of militarism. It is those aggressive circles which enjoy big influence in some countries that are trying now to prevent a further relaxation of international tension and to preserve the artificial war boom.

Associated with the activities of these circles is the continuation of such measures of the cold war as the building up and extension of aggressive military groupings, in a number of world areas, the organization of military bases on foreign territories and the inflation of military budgets.

Such a situation of course assures unprecedented profits to the big monopolies but it is incompatible with the vital interests of the masses. The present inordinately inflated military budgets of the capitalist countries mean high taxes on the earnings and incomes of the working people, a further rise in prices of consumer goods and a deterioration of the living conditions of the masses. The more money goes for piling up armaments, the less funds remain for peaceful construction, for economic development, for the needs of education and the public health services, for the assistance to the under-developed countries and areas.

The peoples of the world cannot tolerate such a situation caused by the growing burden imposed on them by the monstrously bloated militarism.

But if not peaceful requirements but the arms race becomes the foundation for economic development, if ever more material values are swallowed up by the inflated national armed forces, and many thousands of millions are spent annually only to replace the arms produced only yesterday and which today are already obsolete by new arms, such an economy rests on a shaky, unreliable foundation. It is fraught with dangerous instability and economic disaster.

It is a matter of record that in the past the arms race led ultimately to war. This is shown by the experience of both the first and second world wars. The peoples themselves suffered the full brunt of those wars. They took a toll of many million human lives, inflicted on the peoples colossal misfortunes, resulted in the devastation of thousands of cities and dozens of thousands of rural communities in Europe, Asia and Africa, and the destruction of the wealth created by the labour of a number of generations. The outbreak of a third world war in present-day conditions when there are such types of weapons as atomic and hydrogen bombs and such means of their delivery as long-range bombers, as ballistic rockets capable of bringing those weapons to any point on the globe, would lead to much greater loss of human lives, incomparably bigger material losses, the destruction of major cities and industrial centres, the devastation of entire districts and areas, particularly in industrially highly developed and densely populated countries.

The present situation demands that the peoples and governments responsible for the destinies of their countries take effective measures to end the arms race and to prevent the possibility of an outbreak of another war.

A further improvement of the international situation can and should be achieved first and foremost through reduction of armaments, through effective measures aimed at disarmament. As for the Soviet Union, it carried out, as soon as the second world war ended, a number of measures for a decided reduction of its war-time armed forces, demobilizing from the Soviet Army thirty-three age groups.

Moreover ever since the war the Soviet Union has been persistently working in the United Nations for international agreement on disarmament, submitting the corresponding proposals to this end.

At the proposal of the Soviet Union, the General Assembly passed as early as 1946 a resolution on a general reduction of armaments and prohibition of atomic weapons. But to this day this resolution has not been implemented. When the matter of working out concrete measures in the implementation of this resolution came up, the Western powers began putting forth all kinds of objections to it.

The Soviet Government has always maintained and continues to maintain that the solution of the disarmament problem would make for the prohibition of atomic and hydrogen weapons and a strong reduction in conventional armaments and armed forces. It has always striven for all these measures to be carried out by states under appropriate international control. The Soviet Government has proposed that international control be set up at all big air fields, in ports and railway junctions to make it possible to forestall a sudden attack by an aggressor.

Taking into account the fact that in the present conditions atomic war represents a particular danger to the peoples, the Soviet Government attaches the greatest importance to prohibiting atomic and hydrogen weapons. That is precisely why we proposed, and continue to propose to decide at once to fully ban atomic and hydrogen weapons, discontinue their manufacture and destroy the stocks of these weapons so that atomic energy, that great discovery of mankind, serves peaceful purposes alone. This Soviet proposal encountered objections on the part of the United States and other Western Powers. These objections are raised time and again under the pretext of its allegedly being impossible to reach agreement on the establishment of international control, although the Soviet Union far from objecting to such control has insisted upon the need for its institution. The Soviet Union's proposal to prohibit atomic and hydrogen weapon tests are also rejected.

As is known, the Soviet Union did not confine itself to proposals on the full and unqualified prohibition of atomic weapons and their removal from national armaments. Seeing no desire forthcoming on the part of the United States and other Western Powers to take to this road, the U.S.S.R. Government has proposed that at least the first step be made in this direction. The Soviet Government has proposed the Great Powers solemnly declare they will not employ atomic weapons and renounce their use. The adoption by the powers of such a commitment would imply the political and moral condemnation of atomic weapons. This commitment could be assumed without any delay and could, naturally, play an important part in banishing the threat of atomic war.

These proposals of the Soviet Union, which are fully supported by China, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and the other People's Democracies as well as by a number of other states, accorded with the well-known international agreement adopted after the first world war by many states not to use chemical and bacteriological weapons, which, as is known, played a positive role and deterred the use of these weapons. Without question, renunciation of the use of atomic weapons accords with the interests of all peoples; moreover, the assumption of such a commitment by the states, the Great Powers first and foremost, would result in an amelioration of the international climate. The Western Powers did not accept this proposal either, though in this case they could not refer to the difficulties of instituting international control since the point concerned solely a moral and political obligation and the idea of getting the Great Powers to reach, without further procrastination, the first agreement directed against atomic war.

All this shows that the Soviet Union has always sought, and continues to seek, an immediate solution of the question of banning atomic and hydrogen weapons and of taking already now the first steps in this direction.

So far no such agreements have been reached because of the negative stand taken by the United States and its Western partners.

Refusing to embark on the path of prohibiting atomic and hydrogen weapons, the Western Powers argue that the Soviet Union has an advantage over the Western Powers in conventional armaments and that they could agree to the prohibition of atomic weapons only after a substantial reduction of conventional armaments. To this end they introduced a proposal on the establishment of maximum levels of the armed forces for the five great powers; namely, from one million to 1·5 million men for the U.S.S.R., the U.S.A., and China, and 650,000 men for Britain and France. In order not to delay a solution of disarmament problems and to achieve certain important successes in ending the arms race, the Soviet Union expressed its agreement with this proposal of the Western Powers. It seemed as though now a definite agreement could be reached. But matters took a different turn. As soon as the Soviet Union expressed agreement with this proposal the Western Powers began to disown it, hunting up all kinds of pretexts to bury their own proposal.

Last autumn at the Four-Power Foreign Ministers' Conference in Geneva, the Western Powers made a proposal to begin settling the disarmament problem by reducing conventional armaments, without tying this up with the prohibition of atomic weapons. Such was the proposal of Britain. The British Foreign Secretary made this proposal in the House of Commons last February. The Soviet Union expressed agreement with this proposal as well.

When the United Nations Disarmament Subcommittee met in London two months ago, the Soviet Union submitted for its consideration a plan for reduction of conventional armaments and armed forces, which could be carried out without waiting for agreement on atomic weapons since the divergencies in the positions of the Soviet Union and the Western Powers on banning atomic weapons had become the main obstacle to agreement. But this proposal of the Soviet Union too ran up against the resistance of the Western Powers. It turned out that the Western Powers spoke about giving priority to reduction of conventional armaments so long as they thought that the U.S.S.R. would reject such a proposal.

As soon as we submitted a concrete plan for reducing conventional armaments the Western Powers, including Britain which had formerly made this proposal, retreated and refused to accept the proposals designed to implement these measures. This time they began to say that the question of reducing conventional armaments cannot be examined without settling the question of atomic weapons. They contradicted what they themselves said but yesterday. Thereby, the disarmament problem has again entered a vicious circle where no headway is made either in settling the question of banning the atomic weapons or of reducing conventional armaments and armed forces.

After this, the futility of the entire work of the United Nations Disarmament Subcommittee is not surprising. The Subcommittee was set up under the high-sounding name of Disarmament Subcommittee. Actually, however, it has become merely a screen for covering up the arms race. It is also clear who is responsible for this situation.

Now ever new pretexts are being invented for the Disarmament Subcommittee to engage in anything but in ending the arms race, or reducing armaments. Much is being spoken, for example, about it being untimely to end the arms race since a number of political problems have not been settled. It is openly said that it is impossible to end the arms race without beforehand settling the German problem as well as Near and Middle Eastern and Far Eastern issues. It goes without saying that the Soviet Union is ready to continue to contribute actively to the adjustment of this and other political problems. And it is no fault of the Soviet Union that the German and some other international problems have not yet been settled. If, under these conditions, the Western Powers make the solution of the disarmament problem dependent upon the adjustment of the German question, and have, in doing so, already embarked upon the restoration of militarism in Western Germany, this shows that the question of Germany is being used as a bargaining pawn in order to clear the stage for the implementation of the plans of reviving German militarism and including a United Germany in the Western military alignments.

It is clear that such an approach cannot be conducive to either the solution of the German problem or the termination of the arms race.

Much is being said about the so-called aerial photography in which certain intelligence services are known to be interested. It is perfectly obvious, however, that all this aerial photography has nothing to do with the reduction of armaments or the establishment of control over the reduction of armaments. On the contrary, it can only increase the apprehensions of the peoples concerning the plans of the aggressive circles and lead to the further intensification of the arms race.

Not the least reason for the futility of the work of the United Nations Disarmament Subcommittee is that all its members, with the exception of the U.S.S.R., are active members of the Atlantic bloc. Judging by the sessions of the Atlantic Council held recently in Paris, the principal members of this bloc are colluding among themselves with a view to preventing the reduction of armaments, to including the atomic weapons in the armaments of the armies of this bloc and enacting measures for the further growth of armaments. In pursuing such a policy, the Atlantic bloc powers consider, obviously, that their task in the Disarmament Subcommittee is to camouflage this policy and, at the same time, prevent an international agreement on disarmament. That is why the Subcommittee is running idle and the questions of disarmament remain at a deadlock.

The Soviet Government holds that the time has come for the United Nations Disarmament Commission to consider the results of the work of the above Subcommittee, giving wide publicity to its findings, so that everyone could see who contributes to and who impedes the termination of the arms race, and indicate the ways to the practical implementation of the General Assembly's decisions on disarmament, adopted as long as ten years ago.

The present state of affairs in the sphere of disarmament does not correspond to either the present state of international relations or the demands of the peoples who are vitally interested in a further easing of international tension. It is evident likewise that the efforts of certain powers to impose on other states, including small and under-developed countries, a high level of military expenditures are alien to the interests of the people and to the interests of consolidating world peace.

The Soviet Government will continue to press resolutely for a mutually acceptable international agreement on the reduction of the armed forces of the states and an agreement on the prohibition of atomic and hydrogen (thermonuclear) weapons. The Soviet Government holds at the same time that the present situation calls, first and foremost, for practical measures that could promote the solution of the task of a substantial reduction of armaments of the states and the termination of the arms race.

These practical measures—that would lift the question of the reduction of armaments from the plane of general and sterile talks to the plane of concrete deeds for the reduction of the armed forces—are, in the present conditions, the best means of further easing international tensions and of promoting reciprocal confidence between states.

The peoples of the Soviet Union are engrossed in peaceful creative labour. They want the maximum of their energy, efforts and material means to be directed to the construction of new factories, plants, electric stations, mines, housing, hospitals, schools and universities. Making an ever greater use of the tremendous riches of their vast country, the Soviet people strive to live in peace and friendship with all their neighbours, with all the peoples of the world. They are confident that the universal expansion of peaceful production will benefit all peoples.

Upholding the cause of peaceful international co-operation, the Soviet Union stands for the expansion of international economic and trade relations. It stands for the abolition of all manner of artificial obstacles which have been raised by certain powers and which retard the development of international trade. It is our belief that this is in the interest not only of the Soviet Union but of all other countries and peoples, since the termination of the arms race and expansion of international trade and economic ties among countries would open up greater opportunities for raising the well-being of the peoples and contribute to the establishment of friendly co-operation among all peoples, big and small.

For its part, the Soviet Union is ready to expand all-round trade with other countries on the basis of mutual advantage and of lifting the existing restrictions.

Seeking to make a new contribution to the cause of disarmament and maintenance of peace and seeking to create still more favourable conditions for peaceful economic and cultural construction in the Soviet Union, the Government of the U.S.S.R. has taken the following decision:

1. To carry out in the course of one year, by May 1, 1957, another and even greater reduction of the armed forces of the Soviet Union, namely by 1,200,000 men, in addition to the reduction of the armed forces of the U.S.S.R. by 640,000 men carried out in 1955.

2. To disband in this connection 63 divisions and separate brigades, including three air divisions and other military units with the strength of over 30,000 men now stationed in the German Democratic Republic.

To disband also a part of the military schools of the Soviet Army.

To put into reserve 373 naval vessels.

3. To reduce accordingly the armaments and military equipment of the U.S.S.R.'s armed forces and the military expenditures of the Soviet Union under the U.S.S.R. state budget.

4. To enable the servicemen discharged from the armed forces to find work in industry and agriculture.

Undertaking this new, highly substantial reduction of the Soviet armed forces and armaments, the Soviet Government seeks to contribute to the practical implementation of the disarmament programme which is now before the United Nations. The new reduction in the strength of the Soviet forces and armaments shows better than any words that the Soviet Union is a sincere and true champion of peace, a sincere and true champion of the relaxation of international tension.

In adopting this decision, the Soviet Government takes into account the fact that, as far as it concerns Europe, the French people, the British people, and the peoples of the Soviet Union and other peaceable European states do not want war, whose dire consequences they still feel, and that they are striving for an improvement in international relations for the all-round development of international co-operation.

The other governments, including the Governments of the United States, France and Britain cannot fail to follow this example if they sincerely wish to contribute to the strengthening of peace.

The Soviet Government is ready to consider the question of the further reduction of the armed forces of the U.S.S.R. if the Western Powers—the United States, Britain and France—carry out, on their part, appropriate reductions of their armed forces and armaments.

Implementation of these measures would be an important step towards the implementation of an all-embracing programme of disarmament and would create effective prerequisites for accelerating the solution of the question of prohibiting atomic and hydrogen weapons.

In adopting the above decision, the Soviet Government proceeds from the fact that the demobilization of 1,200,000 Soviet citizens and their return to peaceful, socially useful labour will be a new tremendous contribution to the further advancement of all branches of the U.S.S.R. national economy and will greatly step up the creation of material and cultural values for the good of our socialist society.

At the same time, further reduction of military expenditures under the U.S.S.R. state budget will make it possible to use the funds released for peaceful construction so as to carry out with even greater success the plans of the socialist development of our country, of raising the well-being of the Soviet people.

In carrying out a new major reduction of the Soviet armed forces and armaments, the Soviet Government proceeds from the fact that the forces of peace have grown much stronger now, that they are better organized and dispose of many means of giving a worthy rebuff to any attempts to violate peace. The Soviet Government expresses confidence at the same time that the armed forces of the Soviet Union will reliably guard the peaceful labour of our people and that the Soviet people and the peaceful peoples of other countries will not relax their vigilance and will be alert to the intrigues of the forces hostile to the cause of peace and peaceful international co-operation.

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER
CANADA

Ottawa,
July 16, 1956.

His Excellency
Nikolai Bulganin,
Chairman of the Council of Ministers,
The Kremlin,
Moscow,
U.S.S.R.

Dear Mr. Chairman:

Thank you for your letter of June 6 on the question of disarmament with which you forwarded the statement of May 14 of the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The Government of Canada has given earnest consideration to the contents of your letter and the accompanying document.

We have noted with interest the announcement of reductions in the armed forces of the Soviet Union to which you refer in your letter. However, our satisfaction over the announcement is somewhat tempered by the reflection that these reductions would have been more timely ten years ago, when the Western Powers demobilized the great armies they had brought together in the common interest of the United Nations, and that the Soviet Union will continue, even after the reductions, to dispose of a far greater number of divisions in Europe than those which the Western Powers have stationed there. We have also, of course, considered your letter and the related documents in the light of a number of recent statements on the part of Soviet authorities concerning the modernization and expanding might of the Soviet armed forces.

It is because of such considerations that Canadian representatives have consistently expressed our firmly held view that, if they are to contribute to international confidence, reductions in forces should be part of an agreement providing for machinery to reassure all signatories that the reduction measures are in fact carried out. We believe that the need for such controls together with an adequate system for warning of preparations for surprise attack has become more pressing during the past few years when, as you observe in your letter, new and increasingly destructive weapons have been developed.

As you are aware, Mr. Chairman, Canada has been directly associated with the search for an agreement ever since the United Nations General Assembly in its first resolution created the Atomic Energy Commission and laid upon Canada, as a permanent member of the Commission, a part of the continuing responsibility for finding a solution to the problem of disarmament. Our participation in the negotiations in that Commission and more recently in the Disarmament Commission and its Subcommittee has made us acutely aware of the difficulties which beset the problem; it has also enabled us to associate ourselves intimately with the repeated efforts and initiatives on the part of the Western Powers to bring about a general disarmament agreement. This is not the place to recapitulate these successive endeavours which stand in the records of the United Nations. However, you will understand, Mr. Chairman, that my colleagues and I are impelled to state that we cannot accept the charge of a negative stand, as alleged in your Government's statement of May 14, on the part either of Canada or of the other Western Powers.

The Government of Canada shares the regrets you have expressed that the discussions on disarmament have not been productive of agreement. However, it is our impression that the more recent negotiations, particularly in the Subcommittee of the Disarmament Commission, have given some cause for encouragement. We therefore differ with the stated views of your Government that the discussions in the Subcommittee have been marked by futility. It would, in our opinion, be unfortunate if these negotiations were to be interrupted. We favour the continuation of efforts through the United Nations to reach an agreement covering limitation, reduction and control of armaments including nuclear weapons. We consider the discussions in the Subcommittee of the Disarmament Commission as well as in the Commission itself are more than ever necessary in order to reach an agreement which will ensure the security of all by means of an adequate system of international control.

It is the belief of the Government of Canada that the international situation which we hope ultimately to achieve can be created only through the establishment of greater mutual confidence progressively and by stages. In any comprehensive program directed to that end there should be arrangements designed not only to cover disarmament and control but also to solve urgent political questions, in particular the reunification of Germany and the problem of European security.

The Government of Canada is strongly of the opinion that if a mutually satisfactory agreement on disarmament can be negotiated an important contribution will have been made to the development of greater confidence between nations. I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that for our part, we will continue to exert every effort in negotiations within the framework of the United Nations to draw closer to an agreed solution. We are the more prepared to make these efforts to reach agreement because of our conviction that the disarmament problem is becoming even more intractable with the passage of time but that, if there is a corresponding willingness to co-operate in these negotiations on the part of the Soviet Government, significant and gratifying results can still be attained.

Yours sincerely,

(Original signed by)

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received a communication from the Private Secretary to the Chief Justice of Canada, acquainting him that the Honourable Mr. Justice C. H. Locke, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, would proceed to the Senate Chamber this day at 9.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving the Royal Assent to certain bills.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES POWER COMMISSION BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 250, an Act to amend the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

CRIMINAL LAW

LOTTERIES—REPORTS OF JOINT COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Charles L. Bishop: Honourable senators, on behalf of the Honourable Senator Hayden, I have the honour to present the fourth, and fifth—and final—reports of the Special Joint Committee on capital and corporal punishment and lotteries.

I move, seconded by the honourable senator from King's (Hon. Mr. McDonald), that the said reports do lie on the Table; and, with leave of the Senate, that they be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this date.

The motion was agreed to.

See appendix to today's Hansard, pp. 927-44.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of a report of the Civil Service Commission respecting the staff of the Library of Parliament.

Hon. Norman P. Lambert moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, a word of explanation of this report is due because it recommends not only a new scale of salaries for the Library staff but also a reorganization and reclassification of the staff itself. The Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament has unanimously approved this report of the Civil Service Commission, the details of which are set forth in the Minutes of the Proceedings of yesterday, and the report was passed unanimously by the House of Commons yesterday. Some time ago the two Librarians petitioned the Civil Service Commission to have changes made in the classification and pay of the Library staff. The Joint Committee of both houses met and recommended a schedule, which was later confirmed and approved by the Civil Service Commission. At the last meeting of the Joint Committee, when this report now before the Senate was submitted, there were present the representatives of the Civil Service Commission who had dealt with the petition of the two Librarians in the first place.

About six weeks ago I had the privilege of moving in the Senate adoption of a report that followed on a minute from the Treasury Board increasing the salaries of 15 employees of the Library staff who had not been included in the previously announced salary increase for all members of the junior service. Basically the purpose was to establish the Library staff on an equality with other branches of the service.

I think it might be worth while noting that the present establishment of the Library consists of 68 positions, of which 27 are classified as permanent, 19 as temporary, and 22 as casual. The Treasury Board has established a distinction between what are called temporary positions, being those of a continuing nature but temporary in status, and casual positions, being those which in the the opinion of the Librarians would be abolished eventually.

The present distribution of the staff in permanent, temporary and casual positions, as defined, is, in the opinion of the Librarians, inadequate and should be rearranged and reclassified. I shall not attempt to go into the details of the proposed new classes and salary ranges, because they are set forth in the Minutes of the Proceedings. However, I think it should be stated that at the time of the fire in 1952 the staff consisted of 37 employees, of whom 22 were permanent and 15 temporary. After the fire the staff was increased, first to cope with the situation arising from the fire, such as the removal and repairing of books, and the restoration of the shelves in order to accommodate the books after they had been rehabilitated; secondly, to expedite the recataloguing of the collection according to more modern techniques than those which prevailed previously; and in the third place, there was the transfer of the staff of the Reading Room of the House of Commons to the Library of Parliament; and fourthly, the transfer of the char service from the staff of the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Commons to the Library.

Owing to those changes, the number of positions was increased to 68. It is estimated that the total strength which the Library requires in order to operate efficiently after the proposed changes have been made, and modern techniques adopted, would be approximately 58.

At present the Library has a staff of 68, of which number only ten or twelve of the 22 casual positions should be dispensed with immediately, and the rest later. With those changes the staff would consist of 58 members, made up of permanent positions, some 12 casual positions and the remainder temporary positions. Apparently because of pension contributions and other considerations, certain persons choose to remain on a temporary basis rather than take advantage of promotion to permanent positions.

Honourable senators, I think that is a sufficient explanation of the report. The present estimates for the Library for the current fiscal year, 1956-57, amount to $311,121, and the adoption of the report would increase that amount by some $10,000 or $12,000.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, I should like to take this opportunity as a member of the Senate to say a word about the advantages and privileges which the Library gives to members of Parliament in Ottawa, and to support the motion of the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) for adoption of the report.

During my experience in Ottawa my association with the Library has been a most happy one. I should like to commend the chief Librarian, Mr. Hardy—most of my dealings are with him—and his associate chief and their staffs for the great courtesy, helpfulness and co-operation which I have at all times received from them. Certainly, the Library gives us the privilege of access to the great treasures which it houses.

The growing movement across Canada today of establishing libraries throughout communities, both rural and urban, is most commendable. The educational advantages which a library offers to a community cannot be over-estimated. To the town near where I live—Newcastle, New Brunswick—Lord Beaverbrook, the most famous and illustrious son of our province, has given—amongst his many generous gifts—a library, which he made possible by converting the manse where he lived as a boy into a modern institution. Of course, a library cannot be operated by gifts alone. There we have the great advantage of the services of a very talented lady, Miss Manny, who has undertaken, with the help of a voluntary staff of ladies, to direct, supervise and organize the library. The extent to which that library is patronized by the young people of Newcastle has made me realize the valuable acquisition it has been to that community. It has made a great contribution to the town.

The Library of Parliament has made its own great contribution to the efficiency and worthwhileness of our duties as parliamentarians here in Ottawa.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I never miss an opportunity to express my appreciation to the two Librarians of Parliament and their staff for the very valuable help they have given and are giving to all of us. The Library is now up to date. However, they have experienced some difficulties in the past.

Some years ago I suggested that the library should be made fireproof. The then Minister of Public Works told me that the floor was so beautiful it had to be kept as it was. Apparently he considered the floor more important than the books that were on the shelves. Since that time there have been two fires which have damaged the library, but not to such an extent that the books were lost.

I must say to honourable senators that if the staff of the Library had not so well provided me with books and information I would not have been able to make many of the speeches which I have made.

Hon. Mr. Hawkins: They would have been lost to posterity.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: May I say that I was very indignant when I heard some unpleasant remarks about the staff of the Library. They are above reproach; they are all good servants of the country; they are the best staff in the public service—next to the staff of the Senate, naturally. I wish them well.

With respect to the promotion and reclassification of the staff, as recommended in the report, honourable senators may be assured that it is well deserved.

The motion for adoption of the report was agreed to.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald for the second reading of Bill 442, an Act to authorize the Minister of Finance to make payments to the Governments of the provinces and to authorize the Government of Canada to enter into fiscal agreements with the Governments of the provinces.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, before the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) proceeds, may I be permitted to answer several questions which were asked yesterday? I can best do so by means of statistical tables which I have obtained.

The honourable senator from King's (Hon. Mr. McDonald) requested a statement of the amounts paid to the provinces under the 1952 tax rental agreements. I have that information in a document headed "Payments made or available to provinces under the 1952 tax rental agreements and the proposed tax-sharing arrangements for 1957-58". That gives the information for all the years covered by the 1952 agreements. My recollection is that the table I put on the record yesterday related only to the last year during which those agreements have been in effect.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: May I inquire whether this table gives not only the amount to which the various provinces are entitled, but the amounts that were paid them?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Generally speaking, it gives both. Of course the Province of Quebec did not enter into an agreement, but this table sets forth the amount to which that province would have been entitled if it had entered into an agreement; also it shows for most of the years the exact amounts paid. The method used is that an estimate is established as to the amount which is likely to be due to each province at the end of the fiscal year. At that time all the returns are not in, so in the last year the amount is not included. These figures will need to be checked with the actual figures when the amounts are reported to the dominion Government. With the consent of the house I will place this statement on Hansard.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(See page 912 for table)

Hon. Mr. Crerar: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) what the increase in the total payments to all provinces will be under the new arrangement as against, say, the final year of the last arrangement?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That appears in a table which I put on Hansard yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Very good. I have not seen yesterday's Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think the honourable senator's question can be answered more effectively by reference to the table than if were I to quote various figures.

I have here also a statement showing the components of the standard taxes for 1957-58, the three fields being subdivided to show the rates of 10, 9 and 50 per cent respectively. There is shown the total standard taxes which will be received from each province, and from all the provinces; also the amount in connection with each tax; that is the 1952 personal income tax, the corporation income tax, and the succession duties.

(See page 912 for table)

Another question was, what the amount would be if the rates, instead of being 10, 9 and 50 per cent, were 15, 15 and 50 per cent. I have here a comparison of the federal proposal for sharing income taxes and succession duties at rates of 10, 9 and 10 and the Ontario proposal for sharing at rates of 15, 15 and 50 per cent, for the fiscal year 1957-58.

(See page 913 for table)

I have an additional statement which shows the difference between the federal proposal for sharing income taxes and succession duties at the rates of 10, 9 and 50 per cent and the Ontario proposal for sharing them at the rates of 15, 15 and 50 per cent, for the fiscal year 1957-58.

(1) The stabilization payment would bring the total payments up to the tax rental payment available in 1957-58 if the 1952 agreements were extended. This payment would be made only under the 10-10-50 proposal and not under the 15-15-50 proposal since the latter brings the total payment up to a level far above that of the 1957-58 payment under the projected 1952 tax rental agreement.

NOTES. The yield of standard taxes has been increased by 6% per annum from the basic 1955 data. The distribution of taxable incomes, profits and successions between provinces is on the basis of data presently available. 1956 Federal rates for individual income tax and succession duty have been used. The revenue available from a 2% provincial insurance premium income tax has not been shown, since it is the same under both proposals.

One other question was raised, I believe by the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power), with respect to the authority for claiming credit for income taxes paid. As the honourable member from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) said, the requisite provision is in the Income Tax Act; it is, in fact, in several acts, but with respect to personal income tax it first appears in section 33, subparagraphs (b) and (c) of the Income Tax Act. Actually the provision as regards corporation tax is not yet in effect, but it is contained in section 9, at page 7, of Bill No. 418, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, which is now being considered by the House of Commons. The provision with respect to succession duties is to be found in the Dominion Succession Duties Act, section 11(a).

I believe, honourable senators, I have now answered all the questions which were asked of me yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Would the honourable leader state the difference in the aggregate between the amount payable to the provinces now and the amount payable in 1957, as outlined in the document to which he has made reference; that is, the 15, 15 and 50 per cent as compared with the 10, 9 and 50 per cent?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That appears in the table which I put on Hansard yesterday. The total revenue available for 1957-58 is $653,065,000, and the rental payment available for 1956-57 is $512,415,000. The increase in the proposed formula in 1957-58 over the 1952 agreement formula in 1957-58 is $114,860,000, approximately 21 per cent.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I was a little doubtful whether I would have to adjourn the debate until tomorrow but I think I will be able to carry on now. I am not going to follow the usual procedure taken in a debate of this character. I want to go back into history for a few minutes and try to get our minds on the situation which existed at the time when the British North America Act went into effect. Last night the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) referred to the B.N.A. Act, but I do not intend to follow his line of thought. Neither do I intend to follow the line taken by the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald).

At the outset let me say quite candidly that I have never been in favour of one government levying taxes and another government spending the tax revenues. No experienced parliamentarian could ever really favour such a policy, but that is the underlying principle of this legislation. It must be remembered that the B.N.A. Act was drawn up by men who were chiefly pro-federal in their outlook. It is true that Macdonald and Brown came from Ontario, and Cartier and Galt came from Quebec, and others came from the Maritime provinces, but they all knew that if Confederation became a reality they were the men who would form the dominion Government. That becomes quite evident if you read the Confederation debates and the debates which followed. No matter what relative positions those men held in their own provinces it was evident that they would form the federal Government. And it is apparent from the British North America Act that the Fathers of Confederation intended that the authority for raising money was to be vested in the dominion, and the provinces were looked upon in much the same way as municipal councils are looked upon today by the provinces.

Who started this idea of paying money to the provinces anyway? I suggest that the idea originated with the late John W. Dafoe, who for many years was the distinguished editor of the Winnipeg Free Press. The three Prairie provinces had always bought a lot of farm implements, and owing to a protective tariff most of them were purchased from Ontario and some from Quebec. Now, the profit made on the sale of those implements in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta was not reported to the provinces in which it was earned but to Ontario and Quebec, where it became part of the provincial wealth. As the editor of a great newspaper Mr. Dafoe agitated for an investigation into the question of what relief the federal Government could give the provinces in respect to income. It was the same idea that is embodied in this legislation wherein the federal treasury gives money to the poorer provinces to put their standard of living on the same basis as that enjoyed by the wealthier provinces. Last night the honourable Leader of the Government told us that Ontario and British Columbia are the two richest provinces, and the income of the other provinces is to be raised, so that all Canadians may enjoy the same amenities of life. That was the fundamental idea in the beginning; there was no thought of there being a vast rental agreement or anything else.

During World War II the Minister of Finance found that the Government required more money than it was getting, and he conceived the idea—which I say without hesitation was a very clever one—of getting the provinces to accept a certain rental agreement with respect to income and corporation taxes and succession duties. The provinces were to be given a certain recompense in exchange for the exclusive use of these taxation fields by the federal Government. The minister would be in a position to raise the taxes as he saw fit, and this he proceeded to do. That is how this came about.

I am not going to find fault with the Rowell-Sirois Report, which I like to think of as the Dafoe Report. I cannot see anything seriously wrong with it. The province of Ontario does not pay any more money because it is one of the richer provinces; it pays more because a greater proportion of its people pay income tax under the general law of Canada. The same is true of British Columbia. The people of the other provinces do not pay a cent less in taxes than the people of Ontario and British Columbia. For instance, if personal income tax is based on 10 per cent of taxable income, then a person will pay 10 per cent, no matter where he lives in Canada, provided his income puts him in that class. If his income puts him in a class that makes him liable to a 50 per cent tax, even if he lives in the lowest earning province—let us say it is Manitoba—he has to pay 50 per cent just the same. Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia get their just share of corporation taxes, and I realize there should be some levelling up of taxation in relation to the other provinces. That was the Dafoe idea. I can follow the logic of it, although not entirely. If I lived in Ontario, and not in Manitoba, I probably would not agree with it. However, I can see no justification for taking away the powers of Manitoba to levy income and corporation taxes and succession duties.

Honourable senators, at every federal election after this deal the Opposition parties in Parliament will promise that if elected to office they will increase the amount of money that is now being given to the poorer provinces. Human nature is what it is, and it will never change. The men and women who run for the Opposition parties in the various provinces will come forward and say' "The Government gave the provinces $652 million this year, but if you put us in office we will raise it to $1 billion". That is bound to be the issue. Do you think that Liberal members will get up on the platform and say it cannot be done? When Mr. Jones, Mr. Smith, and Mr. Haig of Manitoba are being convassed at election time they will be told that if that province is now getting $34 million, it will get $54 million, or an even larger amount. The candidates will say: "Why shouldn't you have it? We are going to elect ten members of the party; that party will control, and then we can deliver the goods." That is bound to happen. It amounts to buying people with their own money. It is a challenge that you cannot answer. That is different from promising to build railroads, highways, bridges and canals. There might be some argument about that, but there can be no argument against these government grants, because large amounts of money have already been given. If I were running in, say, Selkirk, Winnipeg, Brandon, Le Pas, or Marquette, I would say to the people: "The Liberals claim they cannot raise the amount. Of course they can, but they are just pikers. We will give you double and make those big fellows in Quebec and Ontario pay the shot."

Honourable senators, that is the situation that we have to face when considering this bill. I congratulate the Leader of the Government upon having delivered an able speech. He explained the matter as clearly as it could be explained. However, it is really not complicated when it is realized that no principle is involved. It is true that the Government set out what it thought to be a principle in arriving at the amounts it felt should be paid. I venture to say that not one-third of the provinces are satisfied with what they have received under these agreements. They took the money more or less under compulsion—they could not help it, but they are not satisfied. You will not find Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, or British Columbia saying it is satisfied with what it got out of the deal.

Honourable senators, I am opposed to the bill. I think the fundamental principle is wrong.

I wish to raise another point. What possible control have we over Manitoba giving help to the municipalities out of the $34 million given to her by the federal Government? Which are suffering more in Canada today, the provincial governments or the municipalities? I say without fear of contradiction that it is the muncipalities which are suffering more. My memory runs back to the year 1908, when we built a twelve-room school in Winnipeg at a cost of $60,000. To build a twelve-room school there today would cost $150,000. And who pays the shot, the provincial Government? Oh, no; the property owners of the city of Winnipeg—nobody else. Who helps the rural municipalities when they are in financial trouble? The Government does a little, but the municipalities get nothing like the fancy sums that are being paid to the provinces. If you want to give $34 million to the province of Manitoba, or any other province, a proportion of that must be given to the municipalities for certain purposes.

I am going to say something now which is not good politics, but to me it is great common sense. Canada is a country of two languages. The Fathers of Confederation recognized that principle and made it part of our Constitution. They said that certain things should be left to the provinces, and one of them was education. Education in Canada today is being starved. Is that the fault of the municipalities? No, for they have not got the money. They are doing the very best they can in spite of that. In the past we were paying our teachers abominable salaries. When I left the school board in 1921 I hoped that I had done a little bit for my boys and girls by getting teachers of good moral character, good education, good training and ability appointed in the schools of Winnipeg. I think I did a little toward that, and I am prouder of that than of anything else I have done in my life, because our children can now be educated by capable teachers. The people in the province of Quebec have their own system of schooling, and I agree with them. Their fundamental rights are part of our Constitution which were recognized by Confederation. However, the universities are being starved today. Men are leaving the universities and going out into industry, working for private corporations and other people. I have the honour to be Chairman of the Board of Regents of the United College, which is an affiliate of the University of Manitoba. My friend from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) knows that college very well. It has the largest attendance of any affiliated college in the province of Manitoba, and is one of the largest in the dominion. There we have a very fine teaching staff of young men and women who would be a credit to any university in Canada. As chairman of the board, I know that they are receiving from $1,000 to $2,000 a year less than they should get, but we do not have the money to increase their salaries. We are taking every dollar we can get our hands on to try to retain this fine staff. They are loyal to the church of which the college is a part, and to the University of Manitoba with which it is affiliated, and we want to keep them in the classrooms of our college.

I can point today to many young men and women throughout Canada who have graduated from that institution, and they are a credit to us. But I hesitate to think what our predicament would be if we did not get a grant from the dominion Government. I thank the Government for that; it is one of the finest things it has ever done. As honourable senators know, the Government gives a grant based on 50 cents per person of the population of each province to be divided among the provinces proportionately. That is to say, Canada having a population of about 16 million, some $8 million is distributed by way of university grants. If Manitoba has a population of 800,000, it gets $400,000, and that amount is divided among the university and the colleges associated with it on the basis of the number of students registered.

I say most emphatically, that if it were not for the grant our college would have to close its doors. Now, honourable senators, that should not be so. I am not accusing the Government of exerting any influence upon us. As chairman of the board I know that we have not been interfered with. The Government grant is much appreciated by our college, as I am sure it is by all institutions that receive it. My point is that the grant should not be necessary. The province has jurisdiction over matters of education, and it should have sufficient funds to take care of the cost. If it were not for the fact that the dominion Government wants to control all the taxing powers in the province we would not need the grant. Therefore, I am opposed to the spirit of the legislation.

It may be that in opposing the bill I am taking an unpopular stand, but as a senator I do not think I should vote for legislation which I believe will ultimately not be good for the country. It seems to me that if the men who framed the British North America Act—and they were all pro-dominion—had wanted to give the dominion absolute power to control the taxing powers they would have done so. But rather, they chose to give the provinces the right of taxation in certain fields. I admit it is limited to direct taxation; it does not extend to hidden taxes such as excise duties and that kind of thing. Now, the dominion has the right to impose not only indirect taxes, but direct taxes as well. Therefore I think the principle underlying this legislation is wrong, and I must oppose it. I am sure that after the next federal election it will be seen that a good many more people in Canada agree with the stand I have taken. As soon as there is an election campaign—whenever that happens—the clamouring by the municipalities for more income will be intensified. The people in my city have trouble paying their taxes; the farmer and everybody else is in difficulty; all these people are going to demand legislation which will give them more general taxation in wider fields to cover such matters as education. In that way only can the municipalities take care of their expanded needs, and that will bring us back to a consideration of this whole question.

Honourable senators, my statement explains my position. I speak for nobody but myself, but I speak from long experience in municipal and provincial life, and now in the dominion sphere. I believe it is wrong in principle for one body to collect money and place it in the hands of another to spend. That is what we are doing here. The dominion Government is taking control of taxation from the people who need it most, the people who are closer to unemployment and to education and who know best what the needs are. I repeat, I am opposed to this bill.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Opposition a question? He has said that certain things must not be: that municipalities must not be made poor and universities impoverished. If this legislation which aims at distributing the national income does not help to solve the problem, will he be good enough to tell us what would?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Give the provinces the right to collect more money by way of taxation.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: But they are now taxing everything they can.

Hon. Mr. Haig: No; they cannot collect taxes from the fields which this legislation covers.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: I know the province of New Brunswick is taxing everything it can.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The Province of Quebec can take part of the money from these fields, but it cannot take it all. Certainly the collection of income tax is a provincial matter, and the province has a legal right to it, since the income was made in the province. That is not so true of corporate tax, because the money in many cases comes from outside the province. But it is true of succession duties. When a man or woman dies in Manitoba, for instance, the estate consists of assets created in that province, and the province should be entitled to the succession duties. I am not suggesting that we should increase taxes. The time may come when Canada will be in the position of Great Britain: that is, when there will be not so much for the central government and a little more for the municipal and provincial governments.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I should like to ask the honourable Leader of the Opposition a question. He said he was not in favour of one body collecting taxes and another spending them.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I would like to ask him who collects the money for the university grants, which he favours so much.

Hon. Mr. Haig: In my province?

Hon. Mr. Isnor: In your province or in any other province.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The dominion Government collects it.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: And you accept them.

Hon. Mr. Haig: We certainly do.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Then that is against your suggested policy.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I am not going to look a gift horse in the mouth. I say, give Manitoba the right to collect income tax and we won't need a cent of your dirty money; we will raise the money in our own province.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, my remarks on this bill will not be extensive. It is a rather complicated measure, almost beyond my capacity of comprehension.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: The general purpose of the bill is most laudable, but it does seem to me that in this legislation we are not finding any permanent solution to the problem of the financial relationships of the provinces with the federal Government. It is on that aspect of the question that I wish to address a few remarks to this honourable house.

At the time of Confederation undoubtedly our forefathers were living in an age that was much more sedate—much more leisurely, if you like—than the days in which their descendants now have the responsibility of administration. In the framing of our Constitution arrangements were made whereby certain responsibilities were assigned to the provinces, and the federal Government occupied the rest of the field. The activities of the federal Government had to do mainly with external relations—or the relations with, as they were at that time, the British Government—and with matters of the trade and commerce and the levying of customs duties. Customs duties as between the colonies which preceded Confederation had existed in some instances. These were ruled out. Federal responsibilities had also to do in the main with transportation in the large field, and successive judgments of the Privy Council—to illustrate, in the matter of air transportation—confirmed what was the original intention of the Fathers of Confederation. We continued in rather leisurely fashion until the outbreak of the First World War. It is interesting to think back and recall that as late as forty years ago there were in this country no personal income taxes, no corporation taxes, no sales taxes and, I believe I am correct in saying, no succession duty taxes.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The provinces had them.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Yes, but I am surveying the federal picture. Two wars have changed all that. The first war brought about the personal income tax. I recall that when that tax was proposed there were suggestions that this was a field for the provinces, because under the Constitution the provinces could not levy indirect taxes but they could levy direct taxes. The needs of the federal authorities continued to expand. Then came the period between the two wars, and, finally, preparations for the last war. We emerged from the Second World War with an immense debt. Also, during the period between the wars, there occurred what is commonly called "the great depression"; and those of us who are old enough still have vivid recollections of that period in our history.

Reference was made by the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) in his explanatory remarks yesterday to the Rowell-Sirois commission. I happened to be a member of the Government at the time that commission was put on its way; and I venture to say that if the depression had not been so severe the Rowell-Sirois commission would probably not have been appointed. But what happened in those years? Ottawa was very adversely affected, but its avenues for taxation were wider than those of the provinces. Many of the provinces were in dire financial straits. Alberta repudiated the interest on its bonds. Manitoba, as my honourable friend the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) knows, was in a very severe financial condition, and was only enabled to carry on by means of drastic taxation and the most rigid economy, which included, if my memory serves me—and the honourable Leader of the Opposition will correct me if I am wrong—voluntary reductions in salaries on the part of ministers of the provincial Government and in the indemnities of members of the Legislature.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I say quite frankly that that was an attack on the problem from the right angle. The Rowell-Sirois commission was set up in 1937 because of these conditions. Its purpose was to examine the whole economic structure of Canada and to make suggestions as to how there could be a better division of the total revenues collected by all governments, so that each of the provinces, and the large municipalities too, would be enabled to carry on with a reasonable degree of satisfaction and contentment.

Since then conditions have changed enormously. Repudiation by the province of Alberta was one of the main factors in promoting the Rowell-Sirois commission. Does anyone imagine for a moment that if the picture as it has unfolded in Alberta since that date had been apparent then, it would not have affected he judgment of the commission? That province, which only twenty years ago was in default on its bonds, its credit for the time being gone, its bonds selling at somewhere around less than two-thirds of their face value, is today in a position to pay off its entire debt if it wishes to do so. Why? Because of the enormous wealth which has been generated through the discovery of oil and gas and the revenues which, under a very sensible basis of development, have accrued to the Government. Saskatchewan also has benefited greatly from oil revenues; even the province of Manitoba will probably produce this year within its own borders two-thirds of its oil requirements. These are facts which of course were unknown to the commission which inquired into the position of the provinces and, on the facts then available to it, brought in a report. That report, nevertheless, was a great state document, and provided an excellent review of all the economic relationships with and between the provinces.

We hear a great deal today in various quarters about the so-called niggardliness of the federal Government in its dealings with the provinces. From time to time—in the path of duty, as I have regarded it—I have found occasion to be critical of some of the things the Government has done. But I say now that the charge of niggardliness against Ottawa in its financial dealings with the provinces has no real foundation. Let me justify that statement. Under our Constitution such matters as unemployment, family allowances, old age pensions, and matters affecting health are the responsibilities of the provinces. At least they were the direct responsibilities of the provinces; but when we adopted the welfare state philosophy—and, believe me, this country has yet to see the full effects this will ultimately produce—the provinces found themselves wholly unable to carry these charges. What happened? The federal Government first took over the whole field of family allowances, which is now costing the federal treasury somewhere in the neighbourhood of $400 million per annum. Then in 1949 we obligingly took over old age pensions and we pay them to everyone over 70 years of age, to millionaires and paupers alike. This item costs the dominion about $380 million or $390 million a year and will steadily increase. We also took over a large share of the responsibility for unemployment.

And now in the generosity of Ottawa we are talking about a national health insurance scheme that will again impose hundreds of millions of dollars of additional taxes on this country. It is true that Ottawa proposes to pay only 50 per cent. Certain provinces that want Ottawa to come into the picture of health insurance schemes went off the deep end, if I may use that slang expression in this house, in elaborate plans of their own and now want Ottawa to bail them out.

But most of the provinces are afraid of this. I put this simple question to the house. Suppose we go into a national health insurance scheme which costs the provinces scores of millions of dollars. I have seen an estimate, for instance, that such a scheme would cost the province of Manitoba some $5 million or $6 million a year. Where are the provinces going to get this kind of money, without asking where Ottawa is going to get it? In the end it will force these provinces to come to Ottawa for more financial assistance. Let me say that I doubt whether there is anything more important than the health of our people; but worthy as health insurance schemes may be, let us carry them out through means which are already well on their way. It is estimated that nearly two-thirds of the population of Manitoba are already covered by voluntary insurance schemes. That seems to me like the sensible way to develop this important matter.

The total amount by which the federal Government has relieved the provinces in the last ten or twelve years in matters which were their constitutional responsibility is probably in the order of over $1 billion a year. Surely no one can complain that Ottawa has been niggardly under those circumstances. Criticism does not lie in that direction. I was glad to hear the Leader of the Opposition bring forward a point of very considerable importance. When the next federal election is held—I do not know when it will be—one of the things discussed will be the alleged parsimony of the federal Government, in face of the facts I have just mentioned. Why? I am afraid it is because in our political discussions today, rather than centring them around great questions of principle on which policies can be based, we have come to believe that the only way to win elections is to hold out promises of cash benefits to people and to tell them what already has been done for them. If there is any more certain way of undermining freedom and democratic government I would like to hear about it.

There is one other thing we should know. These arrangements provide that a certain percentage of personal income tax, corporate income tax and succession duties will go to the provinces. Suppose an individual dies and leaves an estate of $500,000 that is taxable. The federal Government, under existing law, will collect 50 per cent of the tax. Say the succession duties on the estate are $100,000. The province will get 50 per cent and the federal Government will get 50 per cent. Is that stating it correctly?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That might be correct. It would depend on the figure.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I am using it as an illustration.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If the amount of the provincial tax is only 50 per cent of the federal tax, the province can retain that 50 per cent; at least, it gets credit for that 50 per cent. On the other hand, if the provincial tax is more than 50 per cent of the federal tax, the province can get credit for only an amount equal to 50 per cent of the federal amount.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Very good. My honourable friend the Leader of the Government has enlightened me. That is precisely what I wanted to say. The point is this. If the province increased its succession duties rates, that would put a heavier burden on the estate, because the federal Government would not relinquish its share.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: The same may be true with respect to corporation taxes. As I understand it, the federal Government taxes corporations and says to a province, "You can tax the corporation up to 9 per cent of what the corporation owes annually to the federal Government". But suppose a province says, "All right, you can take off 9 per cent for us, but we are going to put on another 20 per cent". It could do that if it needed the revenue. I see nothing in this legislation to prevent that.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, there is nothing to prevent it.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That is something worth considering.

Now, an astonishing thing in our economy, notwithstanding all our expenditures, is the increase in the total volume of savings of Canadians. Recently I saw a statement made by Mr. Gilbert Jackson, a very prominent economist in Canada, who has appeared before our Finance Committee on several occasions, to the effect that of the total investment made in Canada today, 90 per cent of it will be financed by Canadians and 10 per cent from the outside. We hear a great deal more about the 10 per cent that comes from the outside than about the 90 per cent which Canadians themselves provide. What I am trying to do, in a rather maladroit fashion, perhaps, is to impress on the house the importance of taxation in the development of our economy. We have a sort of free and easy attitude to taxation today, and it appears to me, at any rate, that that has largely grown out of the welfare state philosophy. When I say that, do not imagine at the moment I am arguing against the welfare state idea. I have very definite views on it, and I have no hesitation in saying so, but I am not at the moment arguing against it. What I am saying is that the welfare state breeds a sort of psychological state of mind in the public generally that leads people more and more to look to governments for benefits. In history that has been true everywhere it has been tried, and it will be true in this country. To my way of thinking it constitutes a danger that we should guard against as far as it is possible to do so.

Honourable senators, there are other objections to this scheme. For instance, the federal Government collects revenue and pays it over to the provinces. Next year I believe it will do so to the extent of some $650 million or thereabouts, under the new agreements. That is a very substantial increase over what has been paid to the provinces under the existing agreement. My observation, reading and experience have convinced me of this fact, that it is a dangerous thing to have one authority raising money and another spending it. If you are going to get the best results the people who do the spending should have the responsibility for finding the funds they spend. This method violates that sound principle. No doubt someone will reply to me by saying, "These provinces must have the funds necessary to carry on a reasonable way of living, and we do not want double taxation, so what are we going to do?" Well, I have a suggestion to make, and I think that sooner or later we shall have to come to it. I have never ceased in my admiration for the Fathers of Confederation—those old pioneers in nationhood—for the work they did, which stands as a magnificent example and as a tribute to their foresight and ability; but they could not possibly have foreseen the conditions of today, for new conditions have arisen. My suggestion is this, that through a conference we should surely be able to find a way to amend our Constitution in respect of these matters, to define the responsibility that should rest with the provinces and the responsibility that should rest with the federal Government. Once we have done that, then in a sensible manner we should try to give to the provinces the revenues to enable them to discharge these responsibilities, and to the federal Government the revenues to enable it to discharge its responsibilities. That would be a sensible way to go about it. We would then get away from this continual bickering between Ottawa and the provinces.

Someone has said, and rightly said, that Canada is an extraordinarily difficult country to govern. One of the reasons for the difficulty is that the country stretches from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Ocean, a distance of some 4,000 miles. What do the people of British Columbia know about the people of Nova Scotia, or Newfoundland, or even of New Brunswick or Quebec?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Not enough.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: What do we in the east know about the far west? They have their problems; they are remote from us; yet we are all part of one confederation. I say here with all the force that I can, that there is no greater task of statesmanship in this country than to try to find and shape policies to draw this country closer together, and not push it further asunder. These taxation agreements are not the answer to the financial problem. You cannot have a province urging and arguing that it has been unfairly treated by Ottawa, appealing to its provincial electors in the fashion outlined by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) for a mandate against the parsimony of Ottawa. Honourable senators, that is not the way to build up national unity, and national unity is one of the most essential things that we must try to maintain in this country. Policies sometimes have a great effect on national unity. That great nation builder Sir John A. Macdonald had the vision to see that if we were to hold this country together, even in the earliest stages, we must have a transportation system across Canada. His sponsoring of such a system was a great act of statesmanship. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, coming after Macdonald, realized the full force of this when he said, "If we are to build this country into a united nation we must fill up the western prairies". He adopted policies to that effect, with the result that a tremendous expansion in Canada's history followed, which has continued to this day.

It is policies like these that our statesmen must seek and find; they must get away as far as possible from the small things that divide us, and try to find the things that unite us. I have great faith in the Canadian people; I have said that more than once. I am confident that among our public men in all levels of government are patriotic citizens who want to do well by their country. I do think that these agreements, useful as they may be for the time being, are not the answer, and that they constitute a real danger in the long run to the unity of this country.

(Translation):

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, I will not say, as the Leader of the Opposition did, that I disapprove of the bill; on the contrary, I approve of it without reservation, for I feel that it is an improvement over former agreements.

The provinces are not satisfied with the arrangements offered them by the federal Government. Naturally, each one of them looks after its own interests, but the federal Government must speak and act for the whole country. Had the provincial authorities, when they met here in Ottawa, been willing for instance to take over all social security measures, the federal Government might have presented a different act from the one it is submitting today. But in my opinion social security legislation should be controlled and administered by one central authority.

I would like to commend the Government of Canada, and especially our Prime Minister, for having presented this bill on tax-sharing. Although it is not perfect—what human law is ever perfect?—it is an improvement over present agreements. In five years' time, when the act expires, it will be possible to remedy its shortcomings.

When the provincial premiers of Canada met, each province was bent on obtaining the most advantages possible from the federal Government, but was unwilling to accept any responsibility. For instance, the provinces refuse to assume the cost of social services which, strictly speaking, come under their jurisdiction. It seems fair and reasonable that the federal Government should retain the responsibility for social services, because that is the proper way to ensure that all Canadian citizens are treated fairly. It would be unfair to condemn the resident of an industrially underdeveloped province to live more meagerly than his fellow-citizen of some more prosperous province. If the three provinces of Canada where most of our industries are concentrated gain much more revenue than the others, it seems only fair and equitable that they should help the less fortunate provinces. That is only justice. Although the Maritime provinces are less industrialized than the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia, they must nevertheless buy manufactured goods from those three larger provinces; the prosperity of the three great provinces therefore depends upon the smaller provinces.

The provinces have rights but, like every citizen, they also have duties. The right to prosper and to amass riches implies the duty to help those who have contributed to such prosperity. Is that not what Christ himself taught when He said: "Love thy neighbour as thyself"?

There are those who wonder whether the federal Government has not overstepped its rights in imposing direct taxation. But section 91 of the British North America Act is quite explicit. It reads:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make Laws for the Peace, Order and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces, and for greater Certainty, but not so as to restrict the Generality of the foregoing Terms in this Section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say, . . . paragraph 3: The raising of Money by any Mode or System of Taxation.

Section 92 of the Act is no less clear. The second paragraph provides:

> 1. The Amendment from Time to Time, notwithstanding anything in this Act, of the Constitution of the Province, except as regards the Office of Lieutenant-Governor.
> 2. Direct Taxation within the Province in order to the Raising of a Revenue for Provincial Purposes . . .

I am no legal expert, but those terms seem clear and precise to me. The provinces have the right to levy direct taxes and the federal Government has the right to levy taxes in all fields for the welfare and prosperity of the country as a whole.

It was only after the war that the provinces availed themselves of this right of direct taxation. Before the first Great War there were no old age pensions, while family allowances were only inaugurated after the second Great War. Formerly, there was no direct taxation whatever, because there was no need for it. The federal Government now has to collect direct taxes in order to pay the cost of social security.

Today, who would dare, in order to reduce taxes, do away with family allowance, old age pensions, unemployment insurance and the other benefits enjoyed by the Canadian people?

So that this double taxation will not be too hard on Canadian citizens, the federal government returns part of these taxes to the provinces, under bill 442, and thus makes it possible for the less fortunate provinces to benefit from the revenues of the whole nation.

Such a gesture denotes in our Prime Minister the sense of honesty and justice which has characterized his whole career.

(Text):

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, I have very few remarks to make on this measure. Coming as I do from one of the poorer provinces, I feel something should be said, and I say it with some trepidation, because I see before me a former Minister of Health of the province of New Brunswick (Hon. Mr. McGrand), a former Premier of the province of Nova Scotia (Hon. Harold Connolly), and a former Minister of Agriculture of that province (Hon. Mr. McDonald). I am quite sure that these honourable gentlemen could testify very aptly this afternoon to the difficulties of financing either Nova Scotia or New Brunswick without some help from the federal treasury. I am quite sure they could tell a story that would make us all realize that under the present administration in Ottawa these provinces are absolutely dependent upon receiving revenue from the federal treasury.

I agree with what the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) has said, and I am fully in accord with the proposal that a conference should be called to see if some method could be worked out whereby forces would be generated which would tie Canada together in greater unity, rather than divide us, as the present method tends to do. Above all else, Canada today needs national unity. International developments call for a united Canada. But we cannot be united if we have prosperous conditions in one part of Canada while in another part there are distressed areas; we cannot have one standard of living for Ontario and British Columbia and a lower standard for New Brunswick. As long as a person has the right to call himself a Canadian, I claim he should have the right and privilege of enjoying what Canadian citizenship means, namely, one standard of living which should be the same from Newfoundland to British Columbia. The people in the Maritime provinces are just as entitled to the advantages of education and other privileges that come with Canadian citizenship as are the people in other parts of Canada. We resented very much an implication which appeared in the press some time ago to the effect that there might now be two classes of Canadians, a first class and a second class. It is quite true, as my honourable colleague from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) said last night, we have wandered a long way from the plan that our forefathers had when they brought about Confederation. In our present mode of living we have departed in a great many ways from the habits of those days.

It might be well to remind this honourable chamber that there always have been economic problems in the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. From 1854 to 1856 we in the Maritimes enjoyed trade reciprocity with the United States, and for long afterwards those twelve years were referred to in my province as "the good days". In 1866 the United States abrogated the reciprocity agreement. This led to the calling of a conference in Charlottetown by the legislators of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island for the purpose of forming a union of the Maritimes. This action was taken before Confederation; and it was only after plans had been made for a conference in Charlottetown to unite the three Maritime provinces, as a protective measure against what looked like dire economic distress—because things were then in a bad way—that the emissaries of the Fathers of Confederation came down from Upper Canada, outlined the larger scheme of a confederation of the whole Dominion, and induced the Maritimers to drop the idea of a union of their provinces and join hands with Sir John A. Macdonald and his associates to form the Dominion of Canada.

I will not take time this afternoon to trace what has happened since the days of Confederation, but I might mention that there are yet people in the Maritime provinces who think that the worst thing that ever happened to the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick was their entry into Confederation, and that had the original scheme of union of the three provinces been adopted the course of their history would have been very different.

The honourable Leader of the Opposition suggested that the proposals we are discussing have come about because of the dissatisfaction of the farmers of the west with the prices they have had to pay implement manufacturers in Toronto and Montreal. The honourable gentleman must have forgotten the Sir Andrew Rae Duncan commission, which was appointed because of a series of grave complaints in the Maritime provinces that almost bubbled over into a revoluton. Delegations from Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick travelled by special train to Ottawa to present those complaints. The most representative men who could be selected from every community in those three provinces came here to protest against the conditions which then obtained in the Maritimes, and as a result the Duncan commission was set up.

The honourable Leader of the Opposition reminded us this afternoon that practically all manufactured goods come from industrial concerns located in the rich provinces of central Canada. The profits are accumulated at the head offices of the companies and taxed by the provinces in which those headquarters are located. The Atlantic provinces do not enjoy any returns by way of taxes on the incomes of these corporations. The position is much the same as the honourable Leader of the Opposition described as prevailing in the middle west.

The bill before us represents an attempt to remedy that situation. I am quite ready to support the suggestion of the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) and to say "Let us have a conference, by all means, to see if some more equitable method can be worked out". But until we have a more equitable method, honourable senators, something must be done to redistribute the national income, in order to keep Canada united. I say that this legislation is cement, the very cement that binds Canada in unity, and that without something of this kind there might be serious trouble in holding this nation together.

The honourable Leader of the Opposition says, "Let the provinces tax their people". Honourable senators, New Brunswick is taking every dollar in taxation it can collect from the people of that province. I could quote figures which show what our taxable capacity is. I assure you that in New Brunswick the problem of financing has been a headache with our authorities for decades, and that the problem will continue indefinitely until some means of solving it can be found. As a citizen of New Brunswick I welcome this legislation, and I regard it not only as a necessity but as a "must".

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, although I had not intended to take part in this discussion, I feel after listening to some of the remarks which have been made, particularly by the honourable senator who has just taken his seat, that there is something I should say.

In the first place, no one can foresee what will be necessary five years from now. Vast changes are taking place in our country and in the world today. We have agreements which do not expire until next spring; so why, instead of legislating at the present time, could there not have been further conferences and further studies as to the necessity for these provisions? A further effort might have been made to bring the provinces to full agreement. No doubt, if necessary, there could have been presented when the house meets this fall a bill which would be more in line with the wishes of the provinces.

I come from Saskatchewan, which has problems that are peculiar to itself. For one thing we have, per capita, a much larger mileage of roads to maintain than any other province has. The reason is, of course, that so large a part of our area is wholly agricultural, and every farmer requires a road. The province also contains a great many small villages, most of which are trying to build modern schools: our municipal taxation is heavy, and some of the cities are in desperate straits. Also our people have difficulty in providing and maintaining their university buildings and other public facilities.

I rose at this time to ask this question: Since we have adopted the theory of the welfare state, where has it led us? Perhaps honourable senators will permit a personal reference. I went out to western Canada fifty years ago and I sometimes have wondered what would have become of me had we had a so-called welfare state at that time. People nowadays think it is the duty of the Government to find them employment, and it must be suitable employment at that. Farmers find it difficult to get help because of unemployment insurance regulations. People would rather get work where they can collect unemployment insurance stamps, which will enable them to draw unemployment insurance benefits in the winter months. This particular social legislation is certainly being abused. I hesitate to think what might have happened to me had this sort of thing been going on when I was a young man out west. I remember working in the woods one winter when the temperature sometimes dropped to 70 below zero. I doubt whether I considered that suitable employment, but it never entered my head that it was the duty of any government to see that I survived at all. I thought that was entirely up to myself.

I would point out to the honourable gentleman from Northumberland-Miramichi (Hon. Mr. Burchill) that thousands of men from his province have gone west. You would not call them poor relations today, but had there been a welfare state at that time those same people might still be dabbling in the ocean, fishing away until this day. But they felt that western Canada was a great country and they believed they could get a better living out there. They persevered and today many of them are wealthy and leading citizens from Manitoba to British Columbia. I have always felt that social welfare legislation performs little service for the people of our country, and it creates many disadvantages for them. I know that I might never have got where I did had I not believed in free enterprise.

As my honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Haig) pointed out, it is the federal Government that desires this legislation. I am not going to accuse the Government of being niggardly; indeed, I accuse it of being extravagant with the taxpayers' money. I hesitate to mention various projects it has undertaken which have proven absolutely worthless. I hesitate, too, to mention the many so-called defence schemes, costing hundreds of millions of dollars, that are not worth a nickel now. I like to be satisfied that money being taken from our taxpayers is being wisely spent. Some of the money spent on our national defence schemes could have been more wisely spent on the construction of President Nasser's Aswan dam in Egypt. I am sure it would have done more for world peace.

This legislation is untimely and I am opposed to it. I think a greater effort should have been made to secure the good will of the provinces. Rather than acting as a cement that will bind Canada in unity, the legislation is more likely to make unity in this country more difficult.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) speaks he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have very few remarks to make. I think the debate has been a useful one. We have had the benefit of views that differ in many respects. I am inclined to agree with the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) and others who stated that the best policy is for the collector of taxes to make expenditures. Generally speaking, I do not think it is a good plan for one Government to collect and another to spend. I also agree with the Leader of the Opposition that municipalities should have more money; I think everyone would agree with that view. But how are they to get it? This legislation provides one way in which the municipalities in certain provinces will get more money. Although we agree that municipalities should have more money, and that the Government which collects should also spend, we must be practical about this. It would be absolutely impossible for certain provinces to provide those things to which their citizens are entitled if there were not legislation of this kind. The honourable senator from Northumberland-Miramichi (Hon. Mr. Burchill) has shown very clearly that certain provinces must have additional revenue if their people are to enjoy a standard of living comparable at all to that enjoyed by the citizens of other provinces.

It has been said by several speakers this afternoon that what is proposed by this legislation is all right but that it should be carried out in a different way. Well, what is that different way? It has also been suggested that we should hold a conference and settle this matter. But we have been holding conferences since 1923 and have not arrived at a permanent solution. I am not suggesting this legislation is a permanent solution, but it is the nearest we could come to a solution which would be reasonably satisfactory to the dominion and the provinces. Of course, the provinces are not entirely satisfied. I suppose all the provinces want more money. One has said "We should have $200 million more". Where are we going to get that money from? The only way we can get it, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, is by raising taxes. It should be noted that two or three of the provinces would have to pay a larger share of the extra $200 million raised by taxes, so the burden on those provinces would be greater than on others.

It has been suggested that we should have another conference. We had the Duncan and White Royal Commissions, the Rowell-Sirois Royal Commission; we had a conference in 1945, another in 1950, and one in 1955, which extended into 1956. Is it suggested that we should not proceed with this legislation now until we have had another conference? Honourable senators, I am afraid that if we did we would not get anywhere. May I point out, however, that it is not the view of the Government that the conference of 1955-56 will be the last conference.

We realize that this is not a permanent solution, but, as I have said, it is the best solution we can find at the present time. I can assure honourable senators that meetings at the official level between representatives of the federal and provincial Governments will continue throughout the life of these agreements, and when the day comes for renewal—and we do not necessarily have to wait five years—we hope we shall be able to arrive at a solution that will be more acceptable to all the people of Canada.

Honourable senators, I agree with those who have said that this legislation helps in the unification of Canada, and I am hoping that this house will be united in giving the second reading to this bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it has been moved by the honourable Senator Macdonald, seconded by the honourable Senator Godbout, that this bill be now read the second time. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Haig: On division.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move the third reading now.

Hon. Mr. Haig: On division again.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed, on division.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I suggest that this house rise now, and return at the call of the bell at approximately 9:35 this evening.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 9:35 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

TELEGRAPHS BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 212, an Act to amend the Telegraphs Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Godbout: Next sitting.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 447, an Act to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Godbout: Next sitting.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Mr. Justice C. H. Locke, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act.

An Act to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

An Act to amend the National Parks Act respecting the boundaries of Cape Breton Highlands National Park.

An Act to authorize the Minister of Finance to make payments to the Governments of the provinces and to authorize the Government of Canada to enter into fiscal agreements with the Governments of the provinces.

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1957.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

LOTTERIES

Tuesday, July 31, 1956

The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Capital and Corporal Punishment and Lotteries begs leave to present its

of the current session, being the Committee's final report upon the question whether the criminal law of Canada relating to lotteries should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent. The first report of the Committee was a recommendation concerning its quorum, presented on March 21, 1956. The second and third reports were, in that order, the final reports on capital and corporal punishment and were presented on June 27, 1956, and July 11, 1956, respectively.

The Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence tabled in both houses on June 29, 1955, by the preceding Committee were referred to this Committee; and, at this time, the Committee is returning the remaining portion which is applicable to the question of lotteries. At the current session, no further evidence was printed and all proceedings were conducted in camera.

The sources of evidence taken and witnesses heard on the lotteries question during the first two sessions are listed alphabetically in Number 21 of the Committee's 1955 printed Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence, and a chronological schedule of the sittings of the Committee for the same period appears in the same number.

Respectfully submitted,

SALTER A. HAYDEN,
Joint Chairman representing the Senate.

DON F. BROWN,
Joint Chairman representing the House of Commons.

FINAL REPORT ON LOTTERIES

CHAPTER I

SCOPE OF INQUIRY

1. The Committee confined itself to a study of the operation of the laws governing lotteries in Canada and other jurisdictions. Other aspects of gambling were beyond its terms of reference. It considered, however, that the game of "Bingo" and similar games were within its terms of reference even though, legally, such games are regarded as games of chance and not as lotteries. They were included because they are not dissimilar to lotteries in operation and, moreover, they are games usually arranged and played by organizations having similar purposes to those organizing lotteries for benevolent purposes, which have been the main concern of the Committee's inquiry.

CHAPTER II

PRESENT LAW

2. The English Statutes prohibiting lotteries, enacted in the early part of the nineteenth century, were extended to Canada and these prohibitions were codified in 1886 in a general act relating to lotteries. This statute was substantially re-enacted in the first Criminal Code of 1892. The section of the present Criminal Code dealing with lotteries is section 179. It prohibits lotteries in general and exempts certain types of lotteries from this general prohibition. The section is basically the same as the corresponding section in the 1892 Code, but contains many additions and changes made in the intervening years. The section has always been dealt with piecemeal and has never had a thorough overall revision.

3. It is clear that the federal Parliament has power to enact laws prohibiting and regulating lotteries by virtue of its jurisdiction over criminal law. The courts have held that provincial Legislatures have no jurisdiction to permit the operation of lotteries forbidden by the Criminal Code.

4. The governing provisions of the Criminal Code are set forth as an appendix. The effect of the main section dealing with lotteries, namely section 179, may be summarized as follows:

(1) Offences Relating to Lotteries:

(a) Publishing, advertising or printing lottery scheme; source, 1892 Code; Criminal Code, s. 179(1)(a).

(b) Selling or otherwise disposing of lottery tickets; source, 1892 Code; Criminal Code, s. 179(1)(b).

(c) Sending, transmitting or otherwise delivering or knowingly accepting for conveyance any tickets or articles connected with a lottery; source, 1932, c. 8, s. 1, to supplement the prohibitions contained in the Post Office Act by covering other modes of transmission such as express; Criminal Code, s. 179(1)(c).

(d) Conducting or managing a lottery; source, 1895, c. 40, s. 1; revised 1943-44, c. 23, s. 8; Criminal Code, s. 179(1)(d).

(e) Conducting any scheme for disposing of property under which one contributor may receive a larger amount than paid in because others have contributed to the scheme even though the outcome depends on skill; source, 1935, c. 56, s. 3; Criminal Code, s. 179(1)(e).

(f) Disposing of goods, wares or merchandise by any mode of chance or mixed chance and skill, where the competitor pays valuable consideration; source, 1922, c. 16, s. 11; Criminal Code, s. 179(1)(f).

(g) Inducing the staking of money on gambling devices such as punch boards, shell games or wheels of fortune, and playing three-card monte; source, 1922, c. 16, s. 11; Criminal Code, s. 179(1)(g-j).

(h) Buying lottery tickets; source, 1892 Code; Criminal Code, s. 179(4).

(i) Foreign lotteries prohibited; source, 1892 Code; Criminal Code, s. 179(7).

(2) Exemptions:

(a) Games and contests prohibited by s. 179(1)(f) and (g) are permitted at agricultural fairs, (except dice and other specified games); proviso enacted 1925, c. 38, s. 4; Criminal Code, s. 179(3).

(b) Small raffles at bazaars, held for religious or charitable objects, where permission to hold the same has been granted by the municipality and the prize is first offered for sale and does not exceed $50.00; source, 1892 Code; Criminal Code, s. 179(8)(b).

(c) The division of property by lot by joint tenants; recalling securities by lot and other lesser exemptions; source, 1892 Code; Criminal Code, s. 179(8).

(3) Other Penalties:

(a) Apart from fine and imprisonment, property (including money) connected with a lottery is subject to forfeiture; Criminal Code, s. 179(5).

(b) Search warrants may be obtained when an offence is suspected and persons and property may be detained thereunder. If not claimed, the property is subject to forfeiture. Telephone and Telegraph equipment may not be interfered with; Criminal Code, s. 171.

5. The game of bingo, which the courts have declared to be a game of chance, falls under the prohibition of section 176 of the Criminal Code which makes the keeping of a common gaming house an offence. A common gaming house is defined in section 168. This definition is subject to an important proviso which specifies that a place is not a common gaming house while used "occasionally" by charitable or religious organizations for the purpose of playing games for which a direct fee is charged if the proceeds are used for charitable or religious objects. The interpretation of the word "occasional" has been a source of continual difficulty and it appears to have justified, in some areas, the holding of bingos with a remarkable degree of regularity. While, ordinarily, bingo games, for which a fee is paid and for which prizes are offered, would fall within the prohibition of the Gaming Section of the Criminal Code, they are usually held in circumstances which bring them within the indefinite scope of the exemption covering games played "occasionally" for charitable or religious purposes.

CHAPTER III

OPERATION AND ENFORCEMENT OF LOTTERY LAWS

Section 1: Lotteries in Canada

6. There appeared to be widespread support for lotteries organized for charitable and benevolent purposes. These lotteries, although usually of doubtful legality, take many forms in Canada and are relatively common in their occurrence. The purpose may be to support some community project, such as the building of a rink or a hall or some charity of general benefit to the community. Not infrequently a lottery of this type is based upon the award of an automobile as the first prize and sometimes lesser prizes consisting of television sets, refrigerators, and other valuable durable goods. Many of these lotteries are run by churches, service clubs, and other reputable voluntary organizations and receive widespread support from the community in general. Fund-raising schemes based on lotteries of this kind are frequently parallelled by large bingo games operated by charitable or religious organizations for worthy purposes. In some parts of Canada the prizes awarded at bingo games are very substantial. Particulars were obtained from organizations regularly sponsoring bingo games in one larger Canadian city indicating that it was not uncommon for two or more automobiles to be awarded during the night's play together with a wide range of valuable and less expensive prizes. The widespread occurrence of lotteries and bingos of this type poses the most acute problem of control. There was evidence that sales-promotion contests, in the nature of lotteries, carried on by press, radio and other means were increasing in volume and created an equally difficult problem of control under the present law.

Section 2: Results of Inconsistencies and Anomalies in Present Law

7. There was general agreement that the lack of clarity in the present lotteries provisions made efficient enforcement impossible. This defect arises from the lack of integration of the present provisions referred to in paragraph 2 and from the contradictions and uncertainties resulting from judicial interpretation. The Committee is of the opinion that the present law ought to be carefully redrafted to eliminate the ambiguities and inconsistencies which have militated against proper enforcement. The main problems created by the unsatisfactory wording of the present law are set forth in Chapter VI which contains the Committee's proposals for amendment.

Section 3: Lack of Public Support for Lottery Laws

8. The Committee is of the opinion that the enforcement of the present provisions is a matter of concern in all parts of Canada. It appears that the standards of enforcement vary from province to province and that considerable variations occur within provinces reflecting to some extent the differing opinions of various communities on lotteries. Whatever the variations in standards of enforcement, the Committee notes that there is widespread difficulty in enforcement and it is disposed to accept the statement of the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that there is lack of support for the present prohibitory laws and that they cannot be enforced in the face of adverse public opinion.

9. The effect of this lack of public support for the present lotteries law is observable in many parts of Canada. There is a fairly widespread violation, not only of the spirit but the letter of the lotteries law, frequently by organizations representative of the community in general and motivated by worthy purposes of community improvement or charity. The committee has little doubt that the results of this evasion of the lotteries law are serious in that the law and law enforcement in general are thus brought into contempt.

Section 4: Fraudulent Lotteries

10. An unsatisfactory by-product of the present situation is the existence of fraudulent lotteries which law-enforcement agencies are unable or unwilling to control. This being so, it is difficult to protect the public from fraudulent lottery schemes where all or the major portions of the proceeds are taken by promoters operating under the guise of charity. Several types of fraud were brought to the Committee's attention. There was evidence of widespread sales of counterfeit Irish Sweepstakes tickets. Lotteries had been promoted by professional operators, hidden by some spurious charitable organization or purpose, all the proceeds of which were taken by the promoters. Some lotteries, organized by reputable organizations for worthy purposes, had been entrusted to the management of professional promoters who had retained most of the proceeds. There was evidence that professional operators had conspired to manipulate and cheat at bingo games and thereby gain valuable prizes. It is difficult to control these frauds under the existing laws.

Section 5: Conclusions

11. The Committee recognized that there are many differences of opinion on lotteries in Canada. Nevertheless, the Committee received sufficiently clear indications of opinion from most law-enforcement agencies to indicate their dissatisfaction with the present situation and their view that some substantial changes in the law are required in order to correct it. In particular, the Committee is under the impression that most law-enforcement agencies consider that clarification of the existing lotteries provisions will not, of itself, solve the difficulty and that some new departure in policy is required to bring order into the administration of the lotteries law.

CHAPTER IV

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS AFFECTING LOTTERY LAWS

Section 1: Introduction

12. The Committee received expressions of opinion from law-enforcement agencies and organizations representative of all sections of Canada, and, in addition, heard evidence on the history and effect of lottery laws in the United States and other countries from Virgil W. Peterson of the Chicago Crime Commission. Through the co-operation of the Department of External Affairs, it obtained particulars of the lottery laws of seventeen foreign countries and a special presentation on Australian lottery laws was made by Miss Isobel Atkinson and was later commented on by the Australian government. The presentations covered all aspects of the lottery problem and it is only possible to summarize their effect in general terms.

Section 2: Submissions and Arguments favouring Relaxation of Existing Prohibitions

13. The Attorneys General of most provinces, the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police and the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, all representing the preponderant view of law-enforcement agencies, favoured clarification and some relaxation of the present prohibitions against lotteries. They were supported by the Canadian Legion, the Trades and Labour Congress, and to a lesser extent by the Canadian Association of Exhibitions and allied organizations who sought an extension and clarification of the existing exemptions in favour of agricultural fairs.

14. The considerations mentioned in Chapter III were urged as the principal reasons for relaxing existing prohibitions against lotteries. It was contended that lack of public support for existing prohibitions had resulted in inability to enforce the law and this in turn had tended to bring the law into disrepute. Relaxation, which would bring the law into step with public opinion, was urged as the solution for the present difficulty. Those favouring this course drew a parallel with the attempted prohibition of the sale of alcoholic beverages. Prohibition had failed and had been replaced by licensing and control laws which were said to be relatively more enforceable. A new system of control based on these premises would enable the authorities to control promoters of lotteries and prevent individuals from profiteering from charitable lotteries. It was also contended that charitable and worthy causes would benefit from amendments which would legalize the holding of lotteries for these purposes.

Section 3: Submissions and Arguments favouring Maintenance or Extension of Existing Prohibitions

15. Relaxation of the existing prohibitions was opposed by the Canadian Council of Churches, representing the principal Protestant churches in Canada and also, in separate submissions by the United Church of Canada and the Anglican Church. The Canadian Welfare Council, which was supported in its representation by the Assistant Director of Police for the City of Montreal and the Police Chief of Hull, opposed relaxation and proposed further restrictions, as did the Retail Merchants' Association of Canada. The presentation of Virgil W. Peterson favoured maintenance of strict prohibitory laws because, in his view, history indicated that attempts to control the problem by regulating legalized lotteries or other forms of gambling would fail.

16. Those opposed to lotteries raised both moral and practical arguments against relaxing existing prohibitions. From the standpoint of moral principle it was urged that lotteries were inherently wrong because they were based on chance. They had adverse effects on both the individual and the nation because they fostered a desire "to obtain something for nothing" and were disruptive in their social and economic consequences. They set a poor example for young people. It was alleged that lotteries had been abolished in the United States and the United Kingdom in the nineteenth century for practical and not moral or religious reasons because experience had shown that they produced disastrous economic and social consequences.

17. It was also contended that experience in other jurisdictions had demonstrated that any attempt to achieve better control through licensing or other similar devices was not likely to succeed and that the only effective way of dealing with lotteries was by strict enforcement of prohibitory provisions. Organized gambling in any form was a focus of criminal activity in the community and the extension of lotteries would create new opportunities for exploitation by the criminal element. The door would be opened to profiteering and professional promoters. Further, it was maintained that the creation of new opportunities for legalized gambling through lotteries would not stop illegal sales of foreign sweepstakes tickets or fraudulent lotteries.

18. Lotteries were also condemned as an unsatisfactory and inefficient method of raising money for charity. Under the best of circumstances, an unduly high proportion of the money raised was devoted to prizes and expenses. Experience indicated that, where competition existed between lotteries, expenditures for prizes to attract patronage were increased and the balance available for charity tended to decrease. There was also the danger that charitable lotteries would undermine charitable giving generally because purchasers of lottery tickets would refrain from making substantial donations to worthy causes. It was claimed that lotteries preyed on the poor, that they were patronized by persons least able to afford them; and that some families had suffered because of overindulgence in lotteries and bingo.

19. Contests, in the nature of lotteries designed to promote sales of merchandise, were condemned because they diverted attention from normal values, led to higher prices, and placed small independent merchants, who were in no position to offer elaborate prizes, at a disadvantage. The widespread occurrence of this type of contest fostered a gambling spirit and made enforcement of the ordinary lottery laws more difficult.

Section 4: Conclusions

20. The Committee is impressed, above all else, by the unsatisfactory condition which now exists and which tended to worsen during the time the Committee had the subject under study. It is the Committee's belief that the principal aim of new legislation should be to provide workable laws which will receive public support and which can be effectively enforced.

21. The Committee does not wish in any way to give countenance to or encourage widespread organized gambling through lotteries or other means. It recognizes that unrestrained gambling would produce grave moral, social and economic effects in the community and it is of the opinion that the duty of the state is to ensure that lotteries and other forms of gambling are kept within limited bounds. This desirable result has not been achieved and, in the Committee's opinion, cannot be achieved within the framework of the present law.

22. The Committee, therefore, considers that the law should be amended with three purposes in view. First, the prohibitions against lotteries must be clearly stated; second, the inconsistencies in the present law must be eliminated; and third, the types of lotteries to be permitted must be clearly defined and subjected to effective supervision and control. The implementation of this policy will result in the effective prohibition and restriction of several types of lotteries now carried on in spite of their dubious legality. It will also result in some relaxation of existing prohibitions to permit adequate and workable control. It is precisely because the Committee has concluded that the present prohibitory laws do not protect the public that it is disposed to recommend some relaxation in line with the same reforms introduced with respect to the control, sale, and consumption of alcoholic beverages. Prohibition proved unworkable and led to many serious abuses; but the present system of licensing and control, which is supported by the main body of public opinion, has worked satisfactorily and on the whole appears to have contributed to efficient law enforcement.

CHAPTER V

STATE LOTTERIES

23. Only one representation was received by the Committee favouring state lotteries. The Committee considers that there is no widespread support or demand for state-operated lotteries in Canada. It, accordingly, does not recommend any state lotteries.

24. The Committee noted that state lotteries are operated in many countries of radically different racial origins and traditions. Where state lotteries occur, they are usually acknowledged to be a facility created by the state for the purpose of directing the gambling instincts of the public into a controlled channel. It should be noted that the common impression, that state lotteries provide substantial revenues and significantly relieve the burden of taxation in countries where they are held, is not supported by the evidence received by the Committee. In countries holding state lotteries, the revenue derived from such lotteries is generally very small in comparison with total government expenditure. Only a few nations attempt to justify the existence of state lotteries on the ground of their relatively insignificant contribution either to the total national revenue or to specific purposes such as health, education or charity. The organization which advocated a state lottery in Canada frankly intended that it should be set up for the purpose of providing facilities for gambling and not as a means of raising revenue for any purpose.

25. The Committee has concluded that no useful purpose could be achieved by the institution of a state lottery in Canada. It considers that the proper role of the state is to control and regulate such gambling activity as is permitted to private citizens by the general law, and that it is not appropriate for the state to provide facilities for gambling to the public. The Committee includes, in the prohibition of state lotteries in Canada, those which might be operated by provincial and municipal Governments as well as the federal Government.

CHAPTER VI

CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

Section 1: Lotteries Prohibited Subject to Clearly-defined Exceptions

26. The Committee considers that all lotteries should be prohibited except to the extent that their operation is authorized by clearly limited and defined exceptions contained in the Criminal Code. The exceptions which the Committee recommends are described in Section 3 of this Chapter.

Section 2: Specific Proposals to make Prohibition Effective

(a) Repeal and Re-enactment of all Lottery Provisions

27. In order to carry into effect the proposal contained in paragraph 25, the Committee considers that the anomalies, ambiguities and inconsistencies in the present law will have to be eliminated. No further patching of the numerous paragraphs enumerated in paragraph 4 can accomplish any useful purpose and the Committee recommends that the present lottery provisions be repealed in their entirety and replaced by completely new provisions carrying into effect the policies recommended in this Chapter. In particular, to avoid some of the major causes of uncertainty and confusion arising from the present provisions, the Committee recommends that the detailed changes discussed in the following paragraphs be incorporated in the new lotteries law.

(b) "Consideration" not an Element in Lottery

28. Doubt exists whether the paying of consideration by a participant in a lottery is an essential element of the offence. Because of this uncertainty, various types of contests in the nature of lotteries, where consideration is not specifically paid by the participant, have been upheld; while, in other cases, courts have either stated that consideration is not an element or have held that consideration of an intangible kind has in fact been given. The Committee considers that the hallmark of a lottery is the disposal of prizes of goods or money by any mode of chance and that the presence or absence of consideration is an irrelevant consideration. Accordingly, it recommends that the law be clarified by clearly specifying that consideration is not an essential element of a lottery.

(c) Prohibition of Pools and Sweepstakes

29. The law at present prohibits pools, sweepstakes and similar schemes where the award of prizes is dependent upon the result of a horse race, sports contest or other uncertain event. The Committee considers that the law prohibiting lotteries should continue to apply to such schemes regardless of whether the award of the prize is dependent upon chance, skill or a mixture of chance and skill. The Committee further considers that such pools, sweepstakes and similar schemes should not be included within the category of permitted lotteries described in Section 3.

(d) Lotteries to include Bingo

30. The Committee has already noted that at least one important judicial decision has held that bingo is a game of chance and falls under the Gaming Section of the Criminal Code. Other decisions have held that bingo is a lottery. The Committee considers that in its essence bingo is more accurately described as a lottery in which prizes are distributed by means of chance rather than as a game in which players pit their skill and luck against each other. In addition, it appeared to the Committee that in practice voluntary organizations regarded bingos and lotteries as alternative methods of raising funds for worthy purposes. The Committee recommends that the law be clarified to insure that bingo and similar games be subjected to the same prohibitions and controls as apply to lotteries.

(e) Advertising Contests

31. The Committee noted the prevalence of a great variety of advertising and promotion contests in the nature of lotteries. These contests are conducted on business premises and by means of press, radio and television. Because the present provisions are so uncertain in their effect, difficulty has been experienced in controlling such contests. Several problems may be mentioned. The present section prohibits the disposal of goods by any game of mixed chance and skill, but does not prohibit the award of money prizes. In most commercial contests, doubt exists as to whether consideration is given by the contestant and, for the reasons outlined in paragraph 28, it is difficult to secure a conviction in such circumstances. In other cases doubt exists where the final award of the prize is made dependent upon some alleged exercise of skill although in fact the winner is selected by chance; an obvious example being where a name is drawn and the person is required to answer an extremely simple question to obtain the prize. There are other contests in which skill ostensibly plays a part but which in fact are conducted like lotteries with the award depending almost solely on chance. An example is the completion of an advertising slogan where the winner is chosen by casual selection from among thousands of contestants. Still other contests depend for their apparent legality on the completion of some fictitious or nominal purchase or sale when in fact a winner is selected by lot. An example is afforded by the "photo-nite contests" in vogue in some motion-picture theatres.

32. The Committee considers that the prevalence of this type of advertising contest is not beneficial to the community. These contests are purely commercial in their inspiration and confer no social benefit. They appeal to the gambling instinct and, because they are so widespread, undoubtedly stimulate it. While commercial lotteries of this type are operated, it is and will continue to be extremely difficult to enforce prohibitions and restrictions against lotteries organized by reputable groups for charitable and community purposes. Moreover, the Committee is impressed by the evidence that the operation of such commercial contests distorts the community's sense of values, diverts attention from prices and quality of merchandise, and may enhance the cost of goods. In addition, the Committee considers that such contests place the small, independent merchant at a disadvantage in relation to large stores which can absorb more easily the cost of prizes and the extra overhead expense which such promotions inevitably create.

33. The Committee recommends that the laws prohibiting lotteries should apply equally to advertising and promotion contests which involve any element of chance.

(f) Games Played "occasionally" for Charitable Purposes

34. One of the most confusing provisions in the existing law is the proviso excepting, from the definition of a common gaming house in section 168(2)(b), a place used "occasionally" by charitable or religious organizations for games for which a direct fee is charged when the proceeds are used for charitable or religious objects. The Committee noted that the uncertainty of the meaning of the word "occasionally" made it difficult for law-enforcement authorities or the courts to establish any standards by which the propriety of bingo games conducted for charitable purposes could be judged. It was the general conclusion that the unsatisfactory nature of this exempting provision made effective enforcement difficult. In view of the recommendations contained in Section 3 of this Chapter, which clearly specify the conditions under which lotteries, including bingo games, can be lawfully held, the Committee recommends that this proviso be deleted and be replaced by one which states that the holding of such authorized lotteries would not bring premises within the definition of a common gaming house.

Section 3: Proposals in Aid of Enforcement

(a) Prosecution of Winners and Confiscation of Prizes

35. Some witnesses drew the Committee's attention to the fact that winners of large lotteries and sweepstakes receive considerable publicity and are apparently never prosecuted for particiaption in illegal activities. The present law prohibits the possession of illegal lottery tickets and also provides for the confiscation and forfeiture of property, including prize, connected with a lottery. The Committee is of the opinion that the apparent immunity from prosecution enjoyed by winners of large illegal lotteries and sweepstakes militates against effective enforcement. Accordingly, it recommends that the provisions prohibiting the acquisition and possession of lottery tickets and authorizing the confiscation of prizes and other property connected with lotteries be more consistently enforced by the responsible law-enforcement authorities, and that the provisions be clarified to the extent necessary to facilitate effective enforcement.

(b) Importation of Foreign Lottery Tickets

36. Although foreign lotteries, including sweepstakes, are prohibited in Canada, the Committee noted that no specific prohibition existed against the importation of foreign lottery tickets. The Committee recommends that appropriate amendments be made to the customs laws to prohibit the importation of foreign lottery tickets and any advertising and other material connected with such lotteries.

Section 4: Exemptions

(a) Lotteries in Aid of Charitable, Religious, and Community Purposes

37. The Committee considers that the present exemption which authorizes the holding of raffles at bazaars with the consent of municipal authorities is no longer workable. Prizes, although not limited in number, cannot exceed $50.00 in value and must first be offered for sale. The limitation on the value of prizes is unrealistic in terms of today's values and the restriction of permitted lotteries to bazaars where the prizes are first offered for sale does not reflect the present habits of the Canadian people.

38. The Committee considers that some adequate provision should be made for the holding of lotteries in support of charitable, religious, and other community purposes. Such lotteries appear to command widespread support among the Canadian public and the present law, to a considerable extent, has been rendered unenforceable because of this public sentiment.

39. Certain general observations apply to such lotteries. Experience shows that any attempt to draft unduly severe laws restraining lotteries and other indulgencies tends to create disrespect for the law in general. It is equally true that failure to impose proper restraints on such lotteries will make them attractive to professional promoters. Prizes, although sufficient to attract patronage, should not be permitted to become so valuable as to create large lotteries because large lotteries inevitably attract professional operators. Essential expenses for printing and other necessities must be met but expenses for advertising should be curtailed and no payment by way of wages, commission or otherwise should be permitted for services of individuals in the promotion or conduct of the lottery. It is essential to provide for some type of supervision and auditing. This involves licensing and inspection, two functions not traditionally associated with criminal law but which appear essential to effective enforcement.

40. The Committee, with the above principles in view, recommends that the law be amended to provide that lotteries organized and conducted under the conditions set forth in the following paragraphs be exempted from the general prohibition against lotteries.

(i) Licence

41. Each lottery must be licensed by competent provincial authority or by such municipal authority as the province may designate. The licence must be conditional on the observance of the conditions recommended in the following paragraphs and the licensing authority, after proper investigation, having satisfied itself of the qualifications of the applicant. In the preparation of legislation, some consideration should be given to provision for an appeal from or review of decisions of licensing authorities.

(ii) Eligible Organizations and Purposes

42. Only organizations having charitable, religious or other purposes beneficial to the community at large should be eligible for licences. Such organizations need not be incorporated. Specifically, it should be a condition of each licence that the net proceeds of the lottery should be devoted to charity, religion or community welfare.

(iii) Restrictions on Licence

43. No organization should be permitted to conduct concurrent lotteries. No subsequent licence should be issued to any organization unless and until all reports and requirements connected with its previous lottery are completed to the satisfaction of the licensing authority. Any organization which violated the terms of its licence would be ineligible for a subsequent licence for a period of five years.

(iv) Prize Limits

44. The Committee gave careful consideration to the best method of limiting lotteries. It recognized that in some areas regular lotteries or bingos for small prizes were held for worthy purposes while in other parts of Canada large lotteries were held at less frequent intervals. The Committee reached the conclusion that it would not be realistic to attempt to limit the number of lotteries which any organization might hold in a year because such an arbitrary limitation would invite evasion by small groups which would be no easier to prevent than the present violation of the lottery laws. The Committee considered that it would be more realistic to limit the total value of prizes which any organization could dispose of by lotteries in any calendar year to $5,000. This limit would permit the award of an automobile, a most popular type of prize for the larger type of raffle, or, alternatively, the holding of a considerable number of lotteries for more modest prizes. Prizes, whether purchased or donated, would be valued at their retail list price at the time the lottery was conducted.

45. It is necessary to prohibit the holding of joint lotteries by two or more organizations or any similar practice designed to pyramid the value of prizes awarded on one occasion above the maximum of $5,000 prescribed for a single organization.

46. For the purpose of computing prize limits, the value of prizes awarded by a group of organizations connected with or part of the same institution would have to be added together so that no institution could evade the prize limit by the conduct of numerous yearly lotteries by subsidiary or affiliated organizations.

(v) Expenses Limited

47. Limitation of expense is necessary to prevent the incursion of professional operators by making permitted lotteries unprofitable and unattractive to them. Likewise, limitation of expense is essential to ensure that a reasonable proportion of the proceeds is devoted to the purposes for which it is organized. For example, the evidence presented with reference to large bingo games operated by service clubs in one larger Canadian city indicated that an increasing proportion of the proceeds was devoted to prizes and other expenses as a result of competition to attract patronage. The result was that less than one-fifth of the gross proceeds on the average was ultimately available for charitable and other worthy purposes.

48. The Committee gave careful consideration to the possibility of limiting expenses, apart from prizes, by specifying a fixed dollar-limit or a ceiling based on a percentage of prizes or gross receipts. The Committee recognized that the percentage or absolute levels of expense appropriated for a small lottery would not be suitable for a larger lottery. Moreover, it considered that any percentage limitation based on gross proceeds could not be met if patronage were limited by circumstances beyond the control of the organization. Because of this, fixed expense limits did not appear realistic and the Committee considered they would not be enforceable.

49. The Committee concluded that the most realistic method of controlling expense was by the prohibition or limitation of certain types of disbursement. In reaching this conclusion, the Committee also was influenced by the consideration that the ceiling on prizes would effectively limit the gross proceeds and provide a practical limit to indiscriminate expense.

50. The Committee recommends that no fee, commission, salary or any other type of remuneration be paid to any individual in cash or in kind or in free lottery tickets or in any other manner for any services performed in promoting, organizing, or conducting the lottery. This prohibition would not extend to bona fide tradesmen's accounts for the supply of essential services and supplies, janitor service, or auditing service. The prohibition is intended to eliminate the professional promoter. It is also intended to ensure that lotteries promoted by organizations for the benefit of the community are in fact operated by the voluntary effort of members of those organizations and are not turned over to the management of outside parties.

51. Special restrictions are necessary to ensure that the proceeds are not appropriated under the guise of rent either for equipment or premises. The experience of other jurisdictions indicates that rental of lottery equipment should be prohibited because the operation of such rental services attracts an undesirable element who would acquire a vested interest in the continuance of lotteries. Likewise, it is essential to limit the payment of rent for premises to a fixed sum and to prohibit any rent based on a percentage of the proceeds. The rent should be the fair economic rent ordinarily charged for such premises. Consideration should be given in framing any legislation to the prevention of holding lotteries in premises which may have been acquired, as has happened in other jurisdictions, by professional operators with the intent of obtaining an undue percentage of lottery proceeds.

52. The Committee considers that the size of a lottery can be effectively limited if advertising is restricted. Restriction on advertising will also avoid the dissipation of proceeds in costly competition for patronage.

The Committee recommends that advertising be restricted to posters attached to the premises occupied by the organization conducting the lottery, the place where the lottery is to be held, and the place where the prizes are displayed. The display of prizes outside the area covered by the licence should be prohibited. Advertising through the mails, or by the distribution of handbills, or by sound truck should be prohibited. Advertising by radio, television, or newspaper should be restricted to three newspaper advertisements of not more than one-eighth page each and three spot advertisements by radio or television prior to the holding of the lottery.

(vi) Area of Operation

53. The licensing authority must specify the area within which lottery tickets may be offered for sale by the licensee. The restrictions on prizes and expense recommended above will assist in confining lotteries to their prescribed areas.

(vii) Report

54. Within a specified period after the holding of the lottery, the licensee must submit to the licensing authority a report, verified to the satisfaction of the authority, indicating, in detail, gross receipts, disbursements for prizes and other expenses, net proceeds available for charitable, religious or community purposes. Such reports must be kept available for inspection and publication. An annual summary of the results of such lotteries should be submitted by each licensing authority to the Minister of Justice to facilitate the compilation of statistics.

(viii) Enforcement

55. The violation of any of the conditions outlined above, as well as any conditions attaching to small lotteries and agricultural fairs, would be an offence for which the chief officers of the organization would be held responsible.

(b) Small Lotteries

56. The Committee noted that it was not uncommon for organizations holding meetings, bazaars, or social gatherings to have incidental raffles. Frequently, a small door prize is raffled and sometimes food and other small articles are raffled as a means of disposing of them at the end of the gathering. The Committee considered that it is not practicable to subject raffles of this type to the licensing provisions outlined in the preceding paragraphs. Accordingly, it recommends that small raffles be exempted from such licensing provisions and be authorized as exceptions to the general prohibition against lotteries if they meet the following conditions:

(i) The raffle is not the main purpose of the meeting or gathering and is merely incidental thereto.

(ii) Only goods may be raffled and the total value of such goods should not exceed $50.00; cash may not be given in place of goods.

(iii) The meeting or gathering must be held for non-commercial purposes.

(c) Agricultural Fairs

57. At present, agricultural fairs are dealt with under the Lotteries Section and are exempted from the provisions of both the Lotteries and Gaming Sections. With the exception of certain notorious games, all the usual games of chance found on the midway of an exhibition are legalized. In recent years, doubt has arisen as to whether the pre-sale of admission tickets off the exhibition premises, upon which draws for valuable prizes are based, is authorized by the exemption. It has been strongly represented to the Committee that such pre-sale is essential to some exhibitions as a form of rain insurance and as a means of guaranteeing a satisfactory crowd at such exhibitions.

58. The Committee has concluded that it is desirable to clarify the law by specifying that the pre-sale of exhibition tickets to which a lottery is attached is lawful. Such pre-sale can only be undertaken by an agricultural exhibition association recognized as such by the federal or a provincial Government. The association must obtain a licence from the licensing authority vested with responsibility for licensing the lotteries referred to it Section 1 of this Chapter. The restrictions and conditions governing such lotteries would apply to any lottery scheme attached to the pre-sale of exhibition admission tickets with the exception that the licensing authority may permit expenditures to cover the cost of ticket sales on such scale as it may deem appropriate and also may authorize expenditures for prizes of a value not exceeding $10,000.

CHAPTER VII

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

59. The Committee's recommendations may be summarized as follows:

(1) All lotteries should be prohibited except those which are clearly and definitely exempted. The recommended exemptions are set forth in item (5) below.—(See paragraph 26)

(2) To give effect to the above principal recommendation of the Committee, the following specific proposals are made:

(a) The existing lottery provisions in the Criminal Code should be repealed in their entirety and re-enacted to eliminate ambiguities and inconsistencies.—(See paragraph 27)

(b) It should be made clear that "consideration" is not to be an essential element of lotteries.—(See paragraph 28)

(c) The existing prohibition against sweepstakes, pools, and similar schemes should be continued, strengthened, and enforced.—(See paragraph 29)

(d) Bingo and similar games should be dealt with on the same basis as lotteries.—(See paragraph 30)

(e) All types of advertising contests in which chance plays any part should be clearly prohibited.—(See paragraph 33)

(f) The existing exemption of games of chance played "occasionally" for charitable purposes should be replaced by the exemption set forth in item (5) below.—(See paragraph 34)

(3) The importation of foreign lottery tickets should be prohibited.—(See paragraph 36)

(4) State lotteries should be prohibited as at present.—(See paragraphs 23-25)

(5) Exemption of three types of lotteries is recommended, as follows:

(a) Lotteries licensed by provincial or delegated authority in aid of charitable, religious, and community purposes if they meet the following conditions:

(i) Retail value of prizes offered by any one organization not to exceed $5,000 in any year.—(See paragraphs 37-55)

(ii) Expense to be limited by prohibition against payments to promoters or any other persons for services performed in connection with the lottery; by the limitation of rent and similar charges; and the restriction of advertising.—(See paragraphs 47-52)

(iii) Properly audited reports on the operation of each such lottery to be submitted to the licensing authority prior to the issue of a subsequent licence.—(See paragraph 54)

(b) Small raffles of goods only may be held without licence in connection with non-commercial gatherings provided that the raffle is merely incidental to the gathering and the prizes do not exceed $50.00 in total value.—(See paragraph 56)

(c) The present exemption permitting the operation of midways at agricultural fairs to be continued, and agricultural fair associations to be permitted, if licensed, to hold lotteries for prizes not exceeding a total of $10,000 yearly in connection with the pre-sale of admission tickets.—(See paragraphs 57-58)

APPENDIX

CRIMINAL CODE PROVISIONS GOVERNING LOTTERIES

(2-3 Eliz. II, Chapter 51, 1953-54)

INTERPRETATION

168. (1) In this Part,

(a) "bet" means a bet that is placed on any contingency or event that is to take place in or out of Canada, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, includes a bet that is placed on any contingency relating to a horse-race, fight, match or sporting event that is to take place in or out of Canada; Bet.

(b) "common bawdy-house" means a place that is
(i) kept or occupied, or
(ii) resorted to by one or more persons for the purpose of prostitution or the practice of acts of indecency; Common bawdy-house.

Common betting house.

(c) "common betting house" means a place that is opened, kept or used for the purpose of

(i) enabling, encouraging or assisting persons who resort thereto to bet between themselves or with the keeper, or

(ii) enabling any person to receive, record, register, transmit or pay bets or to announce the results of betting;

Common gaming house.

(d) "common gaming house" means a place that is

(i) kept for gain to which persons resort for the purpose of playing games; or

(ii) kept or used for the purpose of playing games

(A) in which a bank is kept by one or more but not all of the players,

(B) in which all or any portion of the bets on or proceeds from a game is paid, directly or indirectly, to the keeper of the place,

(C) in which, directly or indirectly, a fee is charged to or paid by the players for the privilege of playing or participating in a game or using gaming equipment, or

(D) in which the chances of winning are not equally favourable to all persons who play the game, including the person, if any, who conducts the game;

Disorderly house.

(e) "disorderly house" means a common bawdy-house, a common betting house or a common gaming house;

Game.

(f) "game" means a game of chance or mixed chance and skill;

Gaming equipment.

(g) "gaming equipment" means anything that is or may be used for the purpose of playing games or for betting;

Keeper.

(h) "keeper" includes a person who

(i) is an owner or occupier of a place,

(ii) assists or acts on behalf of an owner or occupier of a place,

(iii) appears to be, or to assist or act on behalf of an owner or occupier of a place,

(iv) has the care or management of a place, or

(v) uses a place permanently or temporarily, with or without the consent of the owner or occupier; and Place.

(i) "place" includes any place, whether or not

(i) it is covered or enclosed,

(ii) it is used permanently or temporarily, or

(iii) any person has an exclusive right of user with respect to it.

Exception.

(2) A place is not a common gaming house within the meaning of subparagraph (i) or clause (B) or (C) of subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (d) of subsection (1)

(a) while it is occupied and used by an incorporated bona fide social club or branch thereof if

(i) the whole or any portion of the bets on or proceeds from games played therein is not directly or indirectly paid to the keeper thereof, and

(ii) no fee in excess of ten cents an hour or fifty cents a day is charged to persons for the right or privilege of participating in the games played therein; or

Charitable organizations.

(b) while occasionally it is used by charitable or religious organizations for the purpose of playing games for which a direct fee is charged to persons for the right or privilege of playing, if the proceeds from the games are to be used for a charitable or religious object.

Onus.

(3) The onus of proving that, by virtue of subsection (2), a place is not a common gaming house is on the accused.

Effect when game partly played on premises.

(4) A place may be a common gaming house notwithstanding that

(a) it is used for the purpose of playing part of a game and another part of the game is played elsewhere; or

(b) the stake that is played for is in some other place.

SEARCH

Warrant to search.

171. (1) A justice who receives from a peace officer a report in writing that he has reasonable ground to believe and does believe that an offence under section 176, 177, 179 or 182 is being committed at any place within the jurisdiction of the justice, may issue a warrant under his hand authorizing a peace officer to enter and search the place by day or night and seize anything found therein that may be evidence that an offence under section 176, 177, 179 or 182, as the case may be, is being committed at that place, and to take into custody all persons who are found in or at that place and requiring those persons and things to be brought before him or before another justice having jurisdiction, to be dealt with according to law.

Search without warrant, seizure and arrest.

(2) A peace officer may, whether or not he is acting under a warrant issued pursuant to this section, take into custody any person whom he finds keeping a common gaming house and any person whom he finds therein, and may seize anything that may be evidence that such an offence is being committed and shall bring those persons and things before a justice having jurisdiction, to be dealt with according to law.

Disposal of property seized.

(3) Except where otherwise expressly provided by law, a court, judge, justice or magistrate before whom anything that is seized under this section is brought may

(a) declare that any money or security for money so seized is forfeited, and

(b) direct that anything so seized, other than money or security for money, shall be destroyed, if no person shows sufficient cause why it should not be forfeited or destroyed, as the case may be.

When declaration or direction may be made.

(4) No declaration or direction shall be made pursuant to subsection (3) in respect of anything seized under this section until

(a) it is no longer required as evidence in any proceedings that are instituted pursuant to the seizure, or

(b) the expiration of thirty days from the time of seizure where it is not required as evidence in any proceedings.

Converting security into money.

(5) Where any security for money is forfeited under this section, the Attorney General may, for the purpose of converting the security into money, deal with the security in all respects as if he were the person entitled to the proceeds thereof.

Telephones exempt from seizure.

(6) Nothing in this section or in section 431 authorizes the seizure, forfeiture or destruction of telephone, telegraph or other communication facilities or equipment that may be evidence of or that may have been used in the commission of an offence under section 176, 177, 179 or 182 and that is owned by a person engaged in providing telephone, telegraph or other communication service to the public or forming part of the telephone, telegraph or other communication service or system of such a person.

Lotteries.

179. (1) Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years who Publishing lottery scheme.

(a) makes, prints, advertises or publishes, or causes or procures to be made, printed, advertised or published, any proposal, scheme or plan for advancing, lending, giving, selling or in any way disposing of any property, by lots, cards, tickets, or any mode of chance whatsoever;

Disposing of lottery tickets.

(b) sells, barters, exchanges or otherwise disposes of, or causes or procures, or aids or assists in, the sale, barter, exchange or other disposal of, or offers for sale, barter or exchange, any lot, card, ticket or other means or device for advancing, lending, giving, selling or otherwise disposing of any property, by lots, tickets or any mode of chance whatsoever;

Conveyance of material for lottery.

(c) knowingly sends, transmits, mails, ships, delivers or allows to be sent, transmitted, mailed, shipped or delivered, or knowingly accepts for carriage or transport or conveys any article that is used or intended for use in carrying out any device, proposal, scheme or plan for advancing, lending, giving, selling or otherwise disposing of any property by any mode of chance whatsoever;

Conducting lottery scheme.

(d) conducts or manages any scheme, contrivance or operation of any kind for the purpose of determining who, or the holders of what lots, tickets, numbers or chances, are the winners of any property so proposed to be advanced, loaned, given, sold or disposed of;

Conducting scheme for disposal of property.

(e) conducts, manages or is a party to any scheme, contrivance or operation of any kind by which any person, upon payment of any sum of money, or the giving of any valuable security, or by obligating himself to pay any sum of money or give any valuable security, shall become entitled under the scheme, contrivance or operation, to receive from the person conducting or managing the scheme, contrivance or operation, or any other person, a larger sum of money or amount of valuable security than the sum or amount paid or given, or to be paid or given, by reason of the fact that other persons have paid or given, or obligated themselves to pay or give any sum of money or valuable security under the scheme, contrivance or operation;

Disposal of goods by game of chance.

(f) disposes of any goods, wares or merchandise by any game of chance or any game of mixed chance and skill in which the contestant or competitor pays money or other valuable consideration;

Inducing persons to stake money.

(g) induces any person to stake or hazard any money or other valuable property or thing on the result of any dice game, three-card monte, punch board, coin table or on the operation of a wheel of fortune;

Playing three-card monte.

(h) for valuable consideration carries on or plays or offers to carry on or to play, or employs any person to carry on or play in a public place or a place to which the public have access, the game of three-card monte;

Receiving bets on three-card monte.

(i) receives bets of any kind on the outcome of a game of three-card monte; or Permitting three-card monte.

(j) being the owner of a place, permits any person to play the game of three-card monte therein.

"Three-card monte."

(2) In this section "three-card monte" means the game commonly known as three-card monte and includes any other game that is similar to it, whether or not the game is played with cards and notwithstanding the number of cards or other things that are used for the purpose of playing.

Exemption of agricultural fairs.

(3) Paragraphs (f) and (g) of subsection (1), in so far as they do not relate to a dice game, three-card monte, punch board or coin table, do not apply to an agricultural fair or exhibition, or to any operator of a concession leased by an agricultural fair or exhibition board within its own grounds and operated during the period of the annual fair on those grounds.

Offence.

(4) Every one who buys, takes or receives a lot, ticket or other device mentioned in subsection (1) is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Lottery sale void.

(5) Every sale, loan, gift, barter or exchange of any property, by any lottery, ticket, card or other mode of chance depending upon or to be determined by chance or lot, is void, and all property so sold, lent, given, bartered or exchanged, is forfeited to Her Majesty.

Bona fide purchase.

(6) Subsection (5) does not affect any right or title to property acquired by any bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration without notice.

Foreign lottery included.

(7) This section applies to the printing or publishing, or causing to be printed or published, of any advertisement, scheme, proposal or plan of any foreign lottery, and the sale or offer for sale of any ticket, chance or share, in any such lottery, or the advertisement for sale of such ticket, chance or share, and the conducting or managing of any such scheme, contrivance or operation for determining the winners in any such lottery.

Saving.

(8) This section does not apply to Dividing property by lot.

(a) the division by lot or chance of any property by joint tenants or tenants in common, or persons having joint interests in any such property;

Raffles at church bazaars.

(b) raffles for prizes of small value at any bazaar held for any charitable or religious object, if permission to hold same has been obtained from the city or other municipal council, or from the mayor, reeve or other chief officer of the city, town or other municipality, wherein such bazaar is held, and the articles raffled for thereat have first been offered for sale and none of them has a value exceeding fifty dollars;

Rewards to promote thrift.

(c) the distribution by lot of premiums given as rewards to promote thrift by punctuality in making periodical deposits of weekly savings in any chartered savings bank; or

Recalling securities by lot.

(d) bonds, debentures, debenture stock or other securities recallable by drawing of lots and redeemable with interest and providing for payment of premiums upon redemption or otherwise.

The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Capital and Corporal Punishment and Lotteries begs leave to present the following as its being the Fifth Report of the current session. This report contains no further recommendations on the three questions referred to the Committee but is limited to an account of its organization, activities, procedure, and certain observations thereon. The First Report, presented on March 21, 1956, was a recommendation concerning the Committee's quorum. The Second, Third, and Fourth Reports, presented on June 27, July 11, and July 31, 1956, were, in that order, the Final Reports on Capital Punishment, Corporal Punishment, and Lotteries.

Establishment of Committee

1. The establishment of the Joint Committee on the three questions of capital punishment, corporal punishment, and lotteries stems from a recommendation of the Special Committee on the Criminal Law made to the House of Commons on May 4, 1953.

2. On January 12, 1954, during the First Session of the present Parliament, the House of Commons initiated the resolution to constitute the Committee, and in this proposal the Senate concurred on February 10, 1954. The Committee's report on its organization and activities during its first year was presented to both Houses on June 16, 1954.

3. At the Second Session of this Parliament, the Committee was reconstituted to resume these inquiries. This action was initiated by the House of Commons on January 14, 1955, with which the Senate united on January 25, 1955. The report of the Committee on its reorganization and second year of activity was presented to both Houses on June 29, 1955.

4. During the present session, the Committee was reconstituted for the purpose of completing its final reports to Parliament. The reconstitution of the Committee was initiated by the House of Commons on March 7, 1956, and this action was confirmed by the Senate on March 14, 1956.

Terms of Reference and Membership

5. The Orders of Reference from both Houses, here consolidated as of the present session, were as follows:

That a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament be appointed to inquire into and report upon the questions whether the criminal law of Canada relating to (a) capital punishment, (b) corporal punishment or (c) lotteries should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent;

That Miss Bennett, Messrs. Boisvert, Brown (Essex West), Brown (Brantford), Cameron (High Park), Castleden, Fairey, Garson, Leduc (Verdun), Lusby, Mitchell (London), Montgomery, Murphy (Westmorland), Mrs. Shipley, and Messrs. Thatcher, Thomas, Valois, and Winch be members of the Joint Committee on the part of the House of Commons; that the quorum of the said Committee be 9 members thereof; and that Standing Order 67 of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the following Senators be appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the said Joint Committee, namely, the Honourable Senators Aseltine, Bouffard, Farris, Fergusson, Hayden, Hodges, McDonald, Roebuck, Veniot and Vien;

That the Committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable or necessary; to call for persons, papers and records; to sit while both Houses are sitting and during adjournments of the Senate, and to report from time to time;

That the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the Special Committees appointed at the last two sessions to inquire into and report upon the foregoing questions, together with all papers and records laid before them, be referred to the said Committee;

That the Committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee for the use of the Committee and of Parliament and that Standing Order 66 of the House of Commons and Rule 100 of the Senate be suspended in relation thereto; and

That the Committee have power to engage the services of Counsel.

Other members who served temporarily on this Committee during the three-year period were: The Honourable Senators Beauregard, Bishop, Connolly (Ottawa West), Tremblay, Wilson, and the following Members of Parliament: Miss Aitken, Messrs. Decore, Dupuis, Fulton, Johnston (Bow River), and Shaw.

6. At the present session of Parliament, the Committee held its first sitting for preliminary reorganization on March 20, 1956, when the Honourable Senator Salter A. Hayden and Mr. Don. F. Brown, M.P., were re-elected Joint Chairmen for the third consecutive session. At that meeting, the Subcommittee on Agenda and Procedure was again re-appointed and the services of Mr. D. Gordon Blair, Barrister and Solicitor of Ottawa, were again retained as Counsel to the Committee.

7. The activities of the Committees during the first two sessions have been summarized in greater detail in Reports to both Houses on June 16, 1954, and on June 29, 1955. Excluding 14 sittings during the present session (which were devoted entirely to deliberations on the final reports), 59 meetings were held during the previous two sessions at which the question of capital punishment was considered on 45 occasions; the question of corporal punishment on 35 occasions; and the lotteries question on 27 occasions. During the first two sessions, the Subcommittee on Agenda and Procedure met on 31 occasions; and at the present session, in connection entirely with the procedure and preparation of the final reports, it met on 28 occasions.

8. A schedule of the meetings of the Committees of the first and second sessions of Parliament appears in Appendix D of Number 21 of the Committee's 1955 printed Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence.

9. The printed evidence, upon which the final reports were mainly based, was all taken during the first two sessions and consists of over 1,500 pages. The sources of the evidence taken at both sessions are listed alphabetically for each subject in Appendix E of Number 21 of the Committee's 1955 printed Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence.

10. In addition to the printed evidence, a large number of miscellaneous representations in the form of briefs, letters, resolutions and petitions were received relating to one or more of the three questions under study. These were examined and analyzed for further sources of information.

11. The Committee obtained reference lists and assistance from the Parliamentary Library and also ordered certain publications for the use of Committee members, such as United Kingdom Hansard and proposed legislation, Departmental and Royal Commission Reports, etc., relating to the three questions under review.

12. Prior to the current session, the External Affairs Department, on request of the Committee, gathered material on foreign lotteries through its missions abroad in respect of the following countries: Argentina, Austria, Belgium, Chile, Denmark, France, Ireland, Italy, Mexico, The Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, South Africa, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Uruguay, and the U.S.S.R. This material has not been printed with the evidence.

13. The approach to and method of inquiry followed was reported to both Houses on June 29, 1955. At that time, reconstitution of the Committee was recommended for the current session, with substantially the same powers and membership, to complete the final reports on the three questions. At this session, the Committee at its first meeting instructed the Subcommittee on Agenda and Procedure to perform the preparatory work relating to the final reports and submit recommendations to the Committee for consideration after the Easter recess of Parliament.

Appreciation of Assistance

14. The Committee records its gratitude to individuals, organizations, agencies and departments of federal and provincial Governments, including foreign contributors, for their oral or written representations, or assistance rendered in other ways, to the Committtee. The principal contributors are listed in the schedule of sittings and also alphabetically in Appendices D and E respectively of Number 21 of the Committee's 1955 printed Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence.

15. The Committee wishes to record its gratitude for the painstaking and efficient service rendered to it by its Counsel, Mr. D. Gordon Blair, during its three years of sittings. It also wishes to commend the faithful and untiring service rendered by the Committee's Clerk, Mr. Alexander Small, and other members of the staffs of both Houses.

16. The Committee noted the extensive and fair coverage given its proceedings by the press, radio, and television across Canada. The Committee recognized the importance of a well-informed public opinion on these questions and credits this objective to these agences.

Observations on Joint Committee's Procedure

17. The Committee observed, from time to time during the course of its three-year inquiry, that the Rules, Standing Orders, procedures and practices of both Houses relating to Special Joint Committees are in need of re-examination and revision to effect greater efficiency, uniformity and clarity. As this subject is beyond the scope of your Committee's powers, no recommendations are being submitted other than to draw these observations to the attention of both Houses.

Printing of Final Reports

18. The Final Reports on Capital Punishment, Corporal Punishment, and Lotteries presented on June 27, July 11 and 31, 1956, respectively, have been printed in both languages as an Appendix to the Debates of the Senate, the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, and in the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons; and this final report will be available in the corresponding printed records of both Houses for this day. The Committee, as authorized by its Orders of Reference, has ordered that 2,000 copies of these final reports, after being re-edited against original transcripts for accuracy and elimination of printing errors, be re-published as a single bilingual publication in blue-book form for the use of Parliament.

Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence

19. The Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence for 1954 and 1955, tabled in both Houses on June 29, 1955, and referred to this Committee, were returned to both Houses at this session on presentation of the Final Reports on Capital Punishment, Corporal Punishment, and Lotteries; namely, the Second, Third, and Fourth Reports respectively. At the current session, no evidence was printed and, as all proceedings were held in camera, the minutes thereof have been filed with the Committee's papers and records.

Respectfully submitted,

SALTER A. HAYDEN,
Joint Chairman representing the Senate.

DON. F. BROWN,
Joint Chairman representing the House of Commons.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, August 1, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

ORDER PAPER

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, a point of privilege. I do not find the Order Paper for today on my desk.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: I also have not received a copy, and upon making inquiry I found that there has been some delay at the Printing Bureau. I hope honourable senators will not be inconvenienced.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts, presented the ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth reports of the committee.

He said: Honourable senators, these reports will appear tomorrow in the Minutes of Proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these reports be considered?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Tomorrow.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION TABLED

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I beg leave to table the report of the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons appointed to review and report upon the progress and programs of the Federal District Commission in developing and implementing the plan of the National Capital. I am tabling this report on behalf of Senator Gershaw, Joint Chairman of the committee.

I move, seconded by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of this date.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) if it is proposed to concur in the report of this Joint Committee before the end of the session?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The chairman of the committee is not here: I cannot make a statement in that connection.

The motion was agreed to.

See appendix to today's Hansard, pp. 949-54.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I also lay on the table of the house the printed proceedings and evidence taken at the committee's hearings.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, the honourable gentleman from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) has kindly consented to explain the Northwest Territories Power Commission Bill, and he is ready to proceed this afternoon. I would therefore suggest that we go on with this bill today, and take up the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Bill tomorrow.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES POWER COMMISSION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. T. A. Crerar moved the second reading of Bill 250, an Act to amend the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act. The Northwest Territories Power Commission was created by legislation passed in 1948, for the purpose of establishing some power sites, especially in relation to the development of the gold mining industry on Yellowknife Bay, on the northern shores of Great Slave Lake. In 1952 the act was amended to include the Yukon, which is under a separate administration from that of the Northwest Territories. This bill carries the amendment of the act one step farther.

In the first place, it proposes that the name be changed from the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act to the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, a name which is more appropriate, since both the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories are under the commission's jurisdiction.

The bill then proceeds to make some further changes in the existing legislation. The present powers of the commission are limited to the building of plants for the generation of electrical energy and its distribution to the places where it is to be used. Under the amendments the commission's powers are considerably extended. The bill would authorize it to build not only power plants but also such facilities as those necessary for providing water and sanitation services in certain villages in the Northwest Territories. It would also be given authority to develop power outside the Northwest Territories itself. That is necessary, I am informed, primarily because one of the bodies associated with the air service is located in the province of Alberta, three miles this side of the boundary between Alberta and the Northwest Territories, in the Fort Smith district on the Great Slave River.

At present the power commission has three power generating plants: one is on the Snare River, about 90 miles from the mining camps at present operating in the Yellowknife district; another is a diesel power unit in the village of Fort Smith which, by the way, is the headquarters for the administration of the Northwest Territories; and the third is a hydro plant in British Columbia, some 150 miles from Whitehorse, in a mining district where substantial lode mining is going on. To bring it to honourable senators' attention I might mention that the mine in question is the United Keno Hill Mine.

The commission finds it necessary to convey this power from the Fort Smith generating plant to this unit in Northern Alberta, and that involves making arrangements for a power line of three miles in the province of Alberta. I am informed that that is the primary reason at the moment for seeking this additional power, but the provision in this bill would enable the Commission to develop, for instance, a power plant on the Slave River between Fort Fitzgerald, in the province of Alberta, and Fort Smith. There are a series of rapids in that stretch of river, and it is estimated that several hundred thousand horsepower of electrical energy can be procured by developing them.

In the offing are new developments of a substantial character. North of Lake Athabaska the discovery of uranium deposits has led to the establishment of several very important mines which are being supplied at the moment by diesel generated power. There is also a definite possibility that on the south side of Great Slave Lake, at a place called Pine Point, located about 150 miles from the rapids on the Slave River, the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company may ultimately come to develop what promises to be a very large base metal property. Before that can be done a railway would have to be built into it, which would be an extension of one of the existing northern railways in the province of Alberta.

I should have said that the uranium mining developments on the north shore of Lake Athabaska are about 100 miles from the Slave River rapids, which, as I said a moment ago, probably could develop several hundred thousand horsepower.

Now all this is looking into the future, but it is possible that with the discovery of other mining prospects in this particular area there will be justification for the building of a power plant of sufficient capacity to supply the needs of the district; and since this is an area where operations might be conducted by different mining companies it is scarcely likely that one company would carry out this large development. At any rate, whether wisely or unwisely, this bill gives authority to the Northern Canada Power Commission, as it will be designated, to examine the potentialities and, if found advisable, to develop power—with the approval of the Government and of Parliament, of course, for it would have to get the funds from Parliament before any development could be proceeded with.

There are some other amendments of a more or less minor character that will enable the commission to carry on investigations into possible power developments, and generally to do the things that are necessary in relation thereto.

There is also provision that, if thought advisable, diesel power generating units could be located at additional points. What is particularly in mind there is a development at Aklavik. Honourable senators are aware of the proposal that has been made to move to higher ground the hamlet or village of Aklavik, which is situated on low ground on the delta of the Mackenzie River. I remember passing a rather disagreeable day there quite a number of years ago. The project is to move the residents to higher ground, and to a location where it would be possible to build a permanent airfield. At the present time Aklavik is served in the summertime by a freighting service down the Athabaska River from waterways into Great Slave Lake and from Great Slave Lake down the Mackenzie to the delta.

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: Up, not down.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable senator from Edmonton (Hon. Mr. MacKinnon) says it is up.

Hon. Mr. Power: Does the river run up or down?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That is a question that I would have to submit to my honourable colleague from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power) or perhaps to the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner). The general assumption is that rivers run down and not up, but this particular river may be different in that respect.

If the village of Aklavik is moved to a new location it may develop into a centre of some importance years from now. However, I am bound to say quite frankly to the house that at the moment I remain quite unconvinced of the need of spending several million dollars to move 600 or 700 people from their present location in Aklavik to some point 40 or 50 miles distant. That is a proposal that should receive careful thought, and I hope it will be probed a bit when this bill goes before a committee.

That covers the main purposes of this bill. It might be interesting for honourable senators to have given to them in a general way the financial results of the operation of this Northwest Territories Power Commission as it has existed up to the present time. I was rather surprised when I examined its balance sheet. I have no hesitation in saying the impression I get is that it has been very well managed indeed. Reports as required by law have been submitted to both houses of Parliament, the last printed one being for the year ended March 31, 1955. I am assuming of course that all honourable senators have read and digested these reports, as no doubt they do with nearly all reports, so I shall deal only with the record for the year ended March 31, 1956. It is in pro forma outline, not having yet been printed, although I believe the document was tabled by the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and is somewhere in our records.

The total advances made by the Government to the Northwest Territories Power Commission appear to be about $8,900,000. This expenditure developed the various plants which I mentioned earlier. Deductible from this sum is depreciation amounting to $1,698,000 which has accumulated over the period of operations, and which amount has been paid to the treasury. In addition, the commission has paid the Government interest at the rate of, I believe, 3⅜ per cent on the advances made to it.

For the year ended March 31, 1956 the commission's total revenue was $980,000. What may be called the operating expenses amounted to $140,000. There is an item of $115,000 for maintenance; there were administrative expenses, that is, the allocation of charges against the department at Ottawa, of $36,000; and interest of $242,000 which was paid on the balance of advances owing to the Government. Also there is provision for depreciation, in other words repayment to the Government, for the year, of $385,000. I also find by reference to the balance sheet that the commission has not only paid interest on the Government loan, and $1,698,000 on the capital advanced, but has accumulated a contingency reserve of nearly $400,000, which it has invested in Government bonds. This reserve is a wise provision, for if any damage should happen to one of the plants the commission has the funds necessary to re-establish it.

If honourable senators will refer to their files and look up the commission's report for the year ended March 31, 1955 they will find its operations down to that date set out very clearly, with a certificate of the Auditor General that he has examined the records and that everything has been kept in order and in accordance with the law.

The impression I got from my examination of these reports is that the operations have been very well managed up to the present time, and that the commission is proceeding upon essentially sound lines.

Before closing, I would like to emphasize the importance of carrying on further development, where necessary, in the Northwest Territories. There has always been a question in my mind as to how far the generation of electric power, which of its nature is a monopoly, should be in private hands. I think that in certain circumstances public ownership and operation are well justified. In the far Northwest Territories it is difficult to find owners of private capital prepared to take the risk. They do not know the country; they think of it as a land of snow and ice and Eskimos and Indians—which in some respects it is. I believe Parliament was fully justified in establishing in 1948 this Northwest Territories Power Commission. Its activities have contributed very definitely to the development of that particular part of Canada; consequently it has added to our wealth, and to the volume of our employment. If it continues to be operated on the lines on which it has been conducted so far we can look to the future with confidence, and with a realization that it is likely ultimately to make an even greater contribution to the development to that part of this vast north country of ours.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Crerar, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

POWERS OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Thomas Vien: Honourable senators, I beg the unanimous consent of the house for leave to refer to a debate which took place the other day when a question was raised by the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) concerning the power of the Parliament of Canada to legislate and/or to grant funds with respect to provincial matters. In the honourable senator's opinion, sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act, properly construed, lead to a negative answer. I think honourable senators will be interested to note that the British North America Act was amended in that regard. The Unemployment Insurance Act had been declared ultra vires by the Supreme Court and by the Privy Council, on the ground that it affected contracts between employer and employee, certain deductions from wages being forcibly made. It was held that a contract of hiring of services fell under the provision of section 92, which gives exclusive jurisdiction to provincial legislatures in matters of property and civil rights.

A controversy arose as a result of these judgments and the British North America Act, with the consent of the provinces, was amended by adding clause 2A to section 91. This had the effect of giving Parliament the exclusive right to legislate on unemployment insurance.

In the matter which had come before the Supreme Court and the Privy Council by way of an Order of Reference the question raised by the honourable senator from De la Durantaye as regards the power of Parliament to grant funds for provincial purposes was also dealt with. The reference is: Supreme Court of Canada Reports, 1936, page 430, and following, especially at page 431, where it was held, in point of strict law, that Parliament has authority to make grants out of public moneys to individual inhabitants, corporations or other public bodies for any object deemed desirable by Parliament in its wisdom. This decision of the Supreme Court was maintained by the Privy Council. I refer to the White Paper published on that occasion, at page 79. Their Lordships held that, in that regard, the powers of Parliament could not as a general proposition be denied.

In view of the debate which took place the other day, I thought that it might be of interest to honourable senators if I placed on Hansard a reference to these decisions concerning the proper construction to be given to these sections of the British North America Act giving Parliament power to raise money by any mode or system of taxation, and to grant funds for any object deemed desirable, in its discretion, and now also exclusive jurisdiction on the subject of unemployment insurance.

THE ACTING SPEAKER

HON. THOMAS VIEN, P.C.

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I would like to point out that His Honour the Speaker will be absent from the chamber until some time next week. With the unanimous consent of the house, I now move, seconded by the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), that during the absence of His Honour the Speaker the Honourable Senator Vien, P.C., act as Speaker of this house.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Agreed.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 945)

NATIONAL CAPITAL

The Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons appointed to review and report upon the progress and programs of the Federal District Commission in developing and implementing the plan of the National Capital beg leave to present the following as their

SECOND AND FINAL REPORT

The first meeting was held on March 21, 1956. The last of thirty-two sessions for the hearing of evidence was on June 29, 1956. Attached hereto as appendix "A" is a list of the presentations which were made. Private sessions of the Committee have also been held to consider the evidence, make recommendations and discuss the drafting of a report to Parliament.

In addition, the Committee visited the offices of the Federal District Commission, the railway installation at Walkley Road, the parkways in Hull, the town of Aylmer, and it made a one-day tour of some of the important portions of Gatineau Park.

PART II

The last Parliamentary Committee to review the work of the Federal District Commission was appointed on May 29, 1944, and it reported to Parliament on August 1 of the same year. Its Order of Reference was the following:

> That a Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to review the special problems arising out of the location of the seat of government in the city of Ottawa and to report on the relations between the federal Government and municipal authorities of the said city and their relative responsibilities in respect of such problems with power to inquire into the matter and things referred to—

Since the time of the last report the most significant event in the history of the Federal District Commission was the completion of the National Capital Plan under the supervision of M. Jacques Greber. We have received no evidence to suggest that plan should be abandoned. Since ours is the first Committee to have it, we desire to say we believe that, from it, a National Capital worthy of this country and of its people can be fashioned. We believe that when it is implemented it will be a monument around which and within which the historical and cultural interests and activities of our people can be developed. In its preparation studies were made involving geography, topography, history, population, land uses, climate, traffic and transportation, location of parks and public buildings, architecture and other aspects of the problems involved in the creation of the capital of a country. It involves the location and architecture of buildings for Government and other requirements, including buildings devoted to the cultural side of our national life, such as the National Library, the Library of Parliament, the National Gallery and the like.

PART III

It is clear from the evidence supplied that the cost of the proposed development of the National Capital will be great. The expenditures contemplated must commend themselves to Parliament. They must be expenditures undertaken in the national interests. Here a series of jurisdictional problems arise. The proposed National Capital area includes portions of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. It is superimposed upon certain municipal organization within each province. As the Plan is brought to fruition, works must be undertaken which affect the sphere of provincial or municipal responsibility. But because they are conceived as part of a scheme for the creation of a national rather than a provincial or municipal development, these works may be more elaborate than would be required for provincial or municipal purposes. Again, since they are to be installed within populous municipalities, they have a bearing upon the works required by these municipalities for their own development. Sometimes, as in the case of driveways and parks, they add improvement which the municipality would not instal, or if it were installed it would be installed upon a more modest scale. At other times the creation of the work of the National Capital imposes upon the municipality concerned the burden of additional services or the building of works of greater magnitude than the municipality alone might undertake.

For the resolution of these conflicts, co-operation between the three levels of jurisdiction is essential. Hitherto, the emphasis is upon co-operation between the Federal District Commission and the municipalities concerned. A greater measure of integration of planning with the provincial authorities should emerge.

PART IV

Since the last report of a Joint Committee of Parliament in 1944 there have been some noteworthy changes in the law bearing upon matters relating to the Federal District Commission.

(1) The Municipal Grants Act, 1950, as amended.

The 1944 report of the Joint Committee of Parliament recommended that the annual grant made to the City of Ottawa by the Federal Government be $300,000 for a period of five years and at the end of that period that it should be reviewed. In 1950 Parliament passed the Municipal Grants Act, whereunder the federal Government was authorized to make grants in lieu of taxes to all municipalities throughout Canada wherein a relatively high concentration of federal Government real estate was located. Under this legislation and under the amendment which was made in 1954, the City of Ottawa has received the following amounts in the years stated:

1950	$ 962,000
1951	$1,176,000
1952	$1,392,000
1953	$1,438,000
1954	$1,427,000
1955	$2,795,000

The City argued strongly for changes both in the legislation and in the administration thereof to permit increases in the amounts of these payments. We consider that it is not within the terms of reference of this Committee to consider changes in the Municipal Grants Act or its administration. Applications of this character should be directed to the Department of Finance under which the amendment and the administration of the Municipal Grants Act would fall. We must observe, however, that insofar as the City of Ottawa is concerned, the position now is vastly better than it was in 1944 when $300,000 was the amount of the federal payment to the municipal corporation and, indeed, it is better now than it was in 1954 when $1,427,000 was the payment authorized under the Municipal Grants Act. In 1955, the payment under the amended act was $2,795,000.

(2) The Planning Act (Statutes of Ontario 1955, Ch. 61)

This significant Ontario legislation was originally passed in 1946—two years after the last report of a Joint Committee of Parliament. It had been amended at various times and it was re-enacted in 1955. Under it a municipality or a group of municipalities may, within the framework of provincial law, adopt plans for a designated planning area and enforce such plans. This legislation is in addition to the power of a municipality to enact zoning by-laws under section 390 of the Municipal Act (R.S.O. 1950—Ch. 243). The Planning Act contemplates that Ontario municipalities might make broader and more long-range plans than those which could be made under a zoning by-law pursuant to the provisions of the Municipal Act.

The Planning Act has been invoked for use in the Ontario section of the National Capital area by the creation of the Ottawa Planning Area Board. It seems not too much to say that Ontario municipalities have an onus cast upon them to avail themselves of the provisions of this Act and to establish long-range and far-reaching plans for their future development thereunder. Even if Ottawa were not a Federal Capital it might still be expected that the municipal corporations in the area should invoke the provisions of the Act.

But for the Ottawa area more is available, namely the National Capital Plan. It is not imposed upon the area by any Statute which superimposes upon the City and its environs an additional plan for beautification over and above any municipal plan. As we see it, this National Capital Plan should be developed as far as possible without infringing upon either provincial or municipal prerogatives, without imposing burdens upon activities of either jurisdiction, but also without assuming obligations proper to the Province or the municipalities concerned. Sometimes it is difficult to draw the line.

In the province of Quebec the provisions of section 426 of The Cities and Towns Act (R.S.Q. 1941, C. 233) and the provisions of section 392a of the Municipal Code are available to municipalities for zoning purposes. Within the Quebec Department of Municipal Affairs there is also a Provincial Town Planning Branch which assists municipalities in an advisory capacity to carry out municipal planning.

We think, that the realization of the National Capital Plan must imply the co-operation of federal, provincial and municipal authorities. In many respects such co-operation is not wanting; in others there is much to be desired. We believe that a series of local demands by individual municipalities or groups of municipalities is no substitute for the reasoned provisions of the National Capital Plan.

The Committee is of the opinion that the overall plan of the National Capital should be submitted to both the Ontario Minister of Planning and Development and the Quebec Minister of Municipal Affairs. This, if agreement is possible, should be regarded as the background against which all individual cases should be dealt with as they arise. At the same time we think that an appropriate representative of the government of Canada should consult with the above provincial authorities in view of determining ways and means of implementing the plan, and we feel that this could be achieved in such a way that it would be fair to all concerned.

PART V

Planning

We have already indicated that we consider the provisions of the National Capital Plan of 1950 to be the basis for the future development of the National Capital. We would hope that Parliament would continue to vote an annual amount to be used by the Federal District Commission for the construction of the capital works involved in the plan. Some portions of the plan, however, appear to your committee to be of more urgent importance than others. While we select six works for special consideration we think that as time progresses others may become of increasing importance.

1. We think that a project of basic importance to be undertaken and completed in the National Capital area should be the elimination of the causes of pollution in the Ottawa River. It seems to your committee that the purpose of the beautification of a capital district would be frustrated if the pollution of this great water resource were allowed to continue unabated. Raw sewage and industrial wastes are dumped into the stream without control and with alarming results.

The Committee had the benefit of the evidence of Dr. A. E. Berry, Director of Sanitary Engineering in the Ontario Department of Health. We desire to record our deep appreciation of the assistance given by Dr. Berry and our admiration for the work he and his department have done in dealing with the problem of pollution. The fact that this evidence before the Committee represented the result of an intensive investigation and research extending over five years, the first official presentation of which was made before us, is recognized as a public spirited service of first class importance.

While we do not have the benefit of evidence from the public health authorities of the Province of Quebec we have been led to believe that their appreciation of the problem and their anxiety to supply a remedy is equally great. At the last session of the Quebec Legislature, an Act known as "An Act respecting the pollution of water" was passed, which, when invoked, promises to supply much relief for the problem.

The solution will not come from action on the part of the municipalities, alone, on either side of the river both upstream and downstream from and including Ottawa and Hull nor will it come from the industries, alone, which are contributing to the pollution. We believe that leadership in the form of comprehensive and concrete programs must emanate from the two provincial authorities concerned. The Ontario Water Resources Commission Act which was passed by the Legislature of Ontario in 1956 seems to us to be a most encouraging step.

We would hope that in so far as the Federal District Commission could help accelerate the installation of the required facilities for Ottawa and Hull they would do so. As has been noted, such projects are primarily of concern to provincial and municipal authorities. However, because of the interest of the federal authorities in the creation of a National Capital in the area and, because of the federal ownership and interest in the shores of the Ottawa River in the district, we recommend that the good offices of the Federal District Commission and financial assistance that could be given to such projects would be made available.

2. Another project of importance for the development of the National Capital Plan, in our opinion, is the completion of the ten-mile section of the essential elements of the Queensway within the City of Ottawa. A substantial start should be made upon this project almost immediately. Here again the interest is not mainly federal. But it is hoped that in addition to the contribution already proposed by the Federal District Commission in the matter of right-of-way, some formula can be evolved to permit of a suitable contribution under the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

3. The Federal District Commission is to be commended for the action it has taken to establish rail-freight facilities in the Walkley Road area, thus completing the first stage of the railway relocation program. We strongly recommend that the Commission be authorized to proceed immediately with the second stage of the program as outlined in its brief. The completion of this part of the program will permit the removal of the railroad tracks from the Interprovincial Bridge, the abandonment of the Sussex Street branch of the C.P.R., the abandonment of the C.P.R. main line along the Ottawa River west of the Ottawa West Station and the elimination of many dangerous level crossings in the west end of the Capital. Included, also, in this stage is the renovation of the Union Station and the removal of local freight sheds and yards to a site immediately east of Hurdman's bridge thus permitting greatly-needed improvements to be made to the present congested and inconvenient passenger and express arrangements.

4. Bridge facilities across the Ottawa River are now inadequate in the downtown sections of Ottawa and Hull. The provision to this requirement again involves the co-operation of two provinces and of a municipality in each province. It is not a federal responsibility. But the need is great. Some help has arisen from the improvements made at the Chaudiere by the Federal District Commission in 1955 and 1956. The acute congestion at rush hours would be greatly relieved if the tracks were removed from the Interprovincial Bridge. Adequate approaches to the bridge on both Ottawa and Hull sides should be constructed at once. An entirely new bridge should be built as soon as possible to take the place of the old bridge.

5. The Green Belt which could be better described as the Intermediate Zone between the urban and rural areas is a strip of land approximately one and one-half miles wide extending from the outer limits of Ottawa and Hull. It was the subject of much discussion during our sittings.

The Green Belt area is a proposal contained in the National Capital Plan of 1950. We have seen no evidence to disprove its validity.

In the absence of any alternative to the National Capital Plan the Federal District Commission urge the establishment of the restrictions they propose in the Green Belt area at a very early date. Otherwise, one of the important features of the National Capital Plan will be frustrated. Zoning under section 390 of the Ontario Municipal Act, unless it were carried out pursuant to the recommendations of the National Capital Plan touching the Green Belt area would not be acceptable to the Federal District Commission. Such by-laws can be readily amended if they are to be passed at all. The Federal District Commission urge that it be authorized to expropriate the property in the area, hold it, and sell it subject to restrictive covenants as to land use which the Federal District Commission would prescribe.

Evidence given to the committee warrants our hope that some workable arrangement could be made with the municipalities concerned. The Federal District Commission is willing to try to work out a compromise. We urge that an attempt be made to resolve the differences. However, should these negotiations fail, resort might be had to the Minister of Planning and Development for Ontario. It might be possible to invoke the provisions of the Planning Act of Ontario either as drawn or under suitable amendments to provide for the special circumstances arising in the National Capital area and arising particularly out of the recommendations contained in the National Capital Plan of 1950. We would suggest that this avenue be explored before an expropriation program proceeds.

6. Gatineau Park. Considerable evidence was adduced with reference to this park area which lies in the province of Quebec to the north of the City of Hull. We observe that provision for Gatineau Park forms an important part of the National Capital Plan. Already a considerable tract of land has been acquired and some facilities have been installed. We note with satisfaction the plan of the Federal District Commission at an early date to complete the portion of the proposed parkway along the escarpment overlooking the Ottawa River. We believe this will be an attractive feature of the National Capital Plan and, in time, the remaining segment of the parkway can be completed. We think that the policy applied to Gatineau Park by the Federal District Commission has been wise and we say so bearing in mind the onerous financial implications involved in the development of the National Capital Plan within the urban sections of the National Capital area.

The Committee wishes to make certain other recommendations as follows:

(a) With a view of preserving the beauty and dignity of Parliament Hill, we believe that steps should be taken progressively to eliminate as much of the parking of automobiles on the Hill as can be eliminated. We recognize that this involves a study of the parking facilities provided on federal properties throughout Ottawa.

(b) In keeping with the character of Canada, we recommend that all literature, signs and advertising of the Federal District Commission be bilingual.

(c) The abandonment of the Sussex Drive branch of the C.P.R. will no doubt result in some vacant land which will be available for purchase between Botelier Street and Redpath Street. We are of the opinion that the triangle of land formed by Sussex Drive, King Edward Avenue and Botelier Street should be acquired by the federal Government for future government buildings. In fact, a somewhat larger triangle, extending up to Cathcart Street, and possibly to St. Patrick Street, might well be developed as a unit, having due regard of course for those uses of the land that ought properly be retained (e.g. the hospital and various properties used for religious purposes).

(d) We recommend that the Government give consideration to architectural harmony in each district in which new buildings will be located.

PART VI

We would recommend that the Federal District Commission Act be revised. Since the present Act was drafted the country and the National Capital have developed and it is now appropriate that the Act be revised to bring the definition of the powers, duties and responsibilities of the Commission in line with the development of the National Capital area.

We recommend that the name of the Act be changed to the National Capital Act; that the Commission be called the National Capital Commission.

In view of the magnitude of the plan for the National Capital, and the amount of money involved in developing it, we recommend that the Chairman of the Commission be employed full time at a salary and with a status commensurate with those of a Deputy Minister.

Since one of the main matters in the development of the National Capital area in a way worthy of the National Capital is the control of land use, this inevitably raises a basic issue not only of policy but also of jurisdiction. We feel that continuous efforts are required to solve these problems. We urge that the federal policy be exercised as far as possible through the ownership and use of property. The major objectives now required appear to be capable of a reasonable measure of fulfilment by these means, plus co-operation with the bodies having jurisdiction in the provincial and municipal field.

Acquisition of Land

The acquisition of land by the Commission involves the use of power of expropriation. When the Federal District Commission Act is being revised we would recommend that the expropriation legislation be also considered, and that the principles on which compensation to an owner whose property is expropriated be re-examined and revised to remove any existing injustices. We recommend that power of expropriation be used where necessary after other means of acquisition have been exhausted.

PART VII

Financial

(a) In the provision of monies to cover the current cost of operation and maintenance for Federal District Commission properties we believe that the practice providing for a fixed statutory grant should be discontinued. In its place we recommend that the Federal District Commission submit its budget annually to Parliament indicating the nature of the work to be undertaken, the cost thereof and the annual income to be derived from rentals and other sources.

(b) We would agree with the recommendation of the Federal District Commission that expenditures under the National Capital Fund be withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the Financial Administration Act.

(c) Much evidence was adduced by the Federal District Commission as to the adequacy of the annual payments into the National Capital Fund. Since 1948 these payments have amounted to 2½ million dollars per annum. Evidence supplied by the Commission indicates that if this annual amount were doubled the increase would do little more than compensate for increases in costs of the capital expenditures of the Federal District Commission over the level which prevailed therefor for 1948.

As noted previously, certain projects in our opinion should be brought to fruition at a date earlier than contemplated by the Federal District Commission in view of the monies available to it from the National Capital Fund. Accordingly it would appear to be reasonable to recommend that from 1957 onward the payments into the National Capital Fund should be commensurate with present conditions as to increased costs of materials and wages, and if the views of the Committee with reference to the acceleration of certain projects be accepted by the Government, then the payments into the fund should be increased accordingly, subject always to the approval of Parliament.

In view of the continuing development of the National Capital we recommend that a Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to deal with the matter be appointed more frequently.

A printed copy of the evidence adduced is appended hereto.

Respectfully submitted,

F. W. GERSHAW,
Joint Chairman representing
the Senate.

ARMAND DUMAS,
Joint Chairman representing the House of Commons.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES POWER COMMISSION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Charles G. Hawkins, Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the report of the committee on Bill 250.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom was referred the Bill (250) intituled: "An Act to amend the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act", have in obedience to the order of reference of August 1, 1956, examined the said bill, and now report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I move that when this house rises today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The motion was agreed to.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. J. Adelard Godbout moved the second reading of Bill 447, an Act to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to amend subsection (1) of section 14A of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act. A bill which we passed earlier this session authorized the building of a bridge over Pollys Gut in the St. Lawrence River, from Cornwall Island to the United States mainland. It was thought that a low-level bridge could be conveniently built in that location, because there is no navigation there. The proposed bridge was to replace the existing span of the Roosevelt Bridge over the south channel in the St. Lawrence River, which has to be removed so as to allow shipping to have access to the new Long Sault Canal. But the proposed bridge would have increased by about six miles the route used by the Indians from the St. Regis reserve to Cornwall, where they go for their daily supplies, to attend schools, get hospital care and so on. Also, the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation reached the decision that such a bridge, having to support highway and railway traffic over a span of about one-third of a mile, would be very costly, if not impossible to construct.

Recently, the New York Central Railway has indicated that it proposes to abandon its line between Cornwall and Helena, New York, and to serve the territory in question by bringing in a spur from its main line.

The officials of both the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation now feel that it would be more practical and economical to build a high-level highway suspension bridge for the passage of pedestrians and vehicles over the south channel, a short distance west of the site of the present bridge.

The present bill would authorize the Seaway Authority to build a bridge in that location, or alternatively to build one where proposed in the earlier bill. In other words, the Seaway Authority would simply be empowered to choose the better of two locations. It has been estimated that this alternative bridge will cost about a million dollars less than the one formerly planned. Also its location would shorten the distance between Cornwall and the United States mainland for general traffic, and would be especially convenient for the Indians. This bill was passed unanimously in the other house.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Did the honourable gentleman say that the newly proposed bridge is to be exclusively for highway traffic and not to be used for both railway and highway traffic?

Hon. Mr. Godbout: It was at first thought that a bridge would have to be built to accommodate both highway and railway traffic, but as the railway now proposes to abandon its line it is planned to build a high-level suspension type bridge, which would cost less than a bridge built to accommodate both railway and highway traffic.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Has authorization to abandon that line of railway been given by the authorities in both countries?

Hon. Mr. Godbout: I would say that that has been done, but not officially as yet. The understanding is that the line will be abandoned, but in any event the bill would make it possible to exercise a choice as to which bridge it is better to build.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I do not want to speak about this bill, but I wish to take the opportunity of thanking the Seaway Authority for having invited the members of the Senate and the House of Commons, some weeks ago, to visit the seaway works. We had a very pleasant visit indeed, although it was, I admit, a warm day. We saw enough of the enterprise to enable me, at any rate, to understand what is going on. I am not an expert on engineering, so that my impressions of the project are not those of an engineer, but I enjoyed the tour, I appreciated the hospitality which was extended to us, and I am sure that honourable senators who were fortunate enough to be present know much more about the seaway than they knew before. To those who missed the opportunity I say that they really missed something.

I suggest to the honourable Leader of the Government in this house (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) that early next session, whenever that may be—and I am not assuming we shall be called together again in November—that sometime in February or March we could revisit the seaway project and see what further improvements have been made. This is a tremendous undertaking. I do not know how the sight of it affected others, but it made me very proud, as a Canadian, to realize that our people are engaged in so great an enterprise—one which will rank, I believe, among the outstanding engineering feats on this continent.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: I assure the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) that I shall bear his suggestion in mind. If we have a warm day, or at any rate if we avoid a hurricane, in February or March it may be that honourable senators will be able to visit as a group the great development to which he has referred. I am sure the Seaway Authority will be pleased to read his remarks, and I shall be very glad to forward to the President of the Authority a copy of today's Hansard.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Godbout: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the ninth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators will notice from the Order Paper that there are six reports of this committee for consideration. If it meets with the pleasure of the house I will move the adoption of them all.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I want to say a word on one matter which was considered by the committee. I do so not to cause any dispute, but to bring to the attention of honourable senators who are not members of the committee the importance of this particular matter. I have reference to improvements in the lighting, the ventilation, the decorations and the acoustic properties of this chamber.

The subject has received much consideration during the session from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Several meetings were held and the committee reported its findings to the Committee on Internal Economy. A subcommittee composed of the honourable Leader of the Government, (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), the Chairman of the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee (Hon. Mr. Dessureault), and the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) was appointed with power to act. It will deal with lighting and ventilation, the provision of a new carpet for the Senate chamber, and, most important of all, the installation of an acoustic system which will enable us to hear what is said by honourable senators in every part of the chamber, The subcommittee will also have regard to the paintings and seats. The important thing, however, is to improve the acoustic properties.

I want to particularly stress the fact that this is a most beautiful chamber. People who visit Ottawa from abroad or from other parts of Canada are much impressed with it. I have seen the State Legislature building at Minneapolis; I was in the Reichstag at Berlin before it was burnt; I have seen the Parliament Buildings at Westminster and practically all the legislative buildings in Canada; but our chamber has always seemed to me to be excelled by none. Certainly it is a gem in our parliamentary setting; and nothing should be done by way of acoustic developments in this chamber which will lessen its beauty, although to avoid some disfigurement is difficult.

We are fortunate in the membership of this subcommittee. Its chairman, the honourable Leader of the Government in this house, was, as honourable senators know, the Speaker of the other house at the time when the improvement of its acoustics was under consideration. As a fellow-member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I can testify that its distinguished chairman has devoted exceptional attention to the matters in question. The honourable senator from Ottawa West is a young man who expects—and he may be right—to be here when most of us have gone. My honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) remarks that he is not so sure about that.

Let me say to all honourable senators—and I am not urging others to do what I would not do myself—that if the subcommittee finds that it cannot decide what should be done and that therefore it should invite honourable senators to come to Ottawa some time this fall to give their assistance, every member who can possibly come here should do so. The subcommittee has authority to act without such advice, but if it should get into any difficulty we will give all the assistance we can. We want good acoustics in this chamber without in any way spoiling its appearance. I hope that will be kept in mind. The subcommittee may decide that it should have the advice of all honourable members before taking action on a particular matter, and if so I for one would be in favour of coming here during the recess, even at some personal inconvenience. This is a very important matter for our house, and for the public who come to listen to the proceedings. Once the matter is settled it will not have to be dealt with again for a long time.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I wish to thank the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) for the confidence he has expressed in me personally and the other two members of the subcommittee. I assure him that when this matter comes before us we shall not forget his remarks today, nor the remarks which were made in this connection at the recent meeting of the Internal Economy Committee.

There are problems to be dealt with here. I think we are all agreed that we must have a better system of voice-carrying. In certain parts of the chamber, I understand, it is impossible at times to hear an honourable senator distinctly. However, we want to retain the beauty of the chamber, and we must not allow it to be marred by any equipment. In committee we have already discussed what might be done, and the Leader of the Opposition was present at the time. I feel it is possible to have installed here a system which will be in keeping with the surroundings.

I join with the Leader of the Opposition and, I am sure, all members of this house, in expressing appreciation to the honourable senator from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Dessureault) for his deep interest in this matter. He has been very active in connection with improvements to not only this chamber but to the exterior of the building and also the grounds. He has also given careful consideration to the difficult problem of parking. The honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) has been associated with him. I hope the subcommittee will be able to come to an agreement on what should be done, but we would be delighted to have the advice of the other members of the house in deciding these very important questions.

May I add that the subcommittee has already considered the question of the equipment for a voice-carrying system. We have also considered the question of proper lighting in the chamber, and we have decided that the carpet must be replaced.

I assure honourable members that we shall try to bring about only such changes as will meet with their approval, so that when all the work is done this chamber will be just as beautiful as it is now.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The motion was agreed to, and the committee's ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth reports were adopted.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, August 7, at 8 p.m.

SMALL LOANS BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 51, an Act to amend the Small Loans Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Later this day.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 446, an Act to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Later this day.

CANADA SHIPPING BILL

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

A message was received from the House of Commons returning Bill H-7, an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act, and acquainting the Senate that they have passed the said bill with certain amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The amendments were read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

1. Page 4, lines 3 to 26. Delete section 119 and substitute the following therefor:

"119. (1) Every British subject who

(a) served as a master of a home-trade, inland waters or minor waters steamship of over ten tons, gross tonnage, for a full period of twelve months within the ten years immediately preceding the date of his application for a certificate of service,

(b) produces satisfactory evidence of his sobriety, experience, ability and general good conduct on board ship, and

(c) passes the prescribed examination is entitled, on payment of the prescribed fee, to a certificate of service as master of a steamship not exceeding three hundred and fifty tons gross tonnage, not carrying passengers and not being a tug, within the limits prescribed by the Minister and specified in the certificate.

(2) The holder of a certificate of service as master of a steamship not exceeding one hundred and fifty tons gross tonnage in force at the date of the coming into force of this subsection retains all the rights and privileges he had under that certificate immediately before that date."

2. Page 8, lines 15 to 30. Delete section 495A and substitute the following therefor:

"495A. (1) The International Convention for the Prevention of Pollution of the Sea by Oil, 1954, set out in the Fourteenth Schedule, (hereinafter called the Convention), is approved.

(2) The Governor in Council may make regulations

(a) to carry out and give effect to the provisions of the convention;

(b) for regulating and preventing the pollution of oil from ships of any inland, minor or other waters of Canada; and

(c) prescribing a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or imprisonment not exceeding six months or both fine and imprisonment to be imposed upon summary conviction as a penalty for violation of a regulation made under this section."

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these amendments be considered?

Hon. John J. Kinley moved that the amendments be concurred in.

He said: Honourable senators, these two amendments made by the House of Commons are simple. The first has to do with the granting of certificates to masters on the basis of service and experience. It was felt by some members of the other house that there should be some definition of the area in which a master was certified, and that he should be familiar with the waters in that area. Some members from western Canada felt that certificates granted on this basis for service on the east coast should not apply to the west coast. For that reason the bill was amended to permit the minister to define the area in which a master is certified.

The second amendment has to do with part VIIA of the act, section 495A. It separates the two steps provided for in the opening paragraph. That is to say, the proposed new subsection 1 gives approval to the International Convention for the Prevention of Pollution of the Sea by Oil, 1954; and the proposed new subsection 2 gives the Governor in Council power to make regulations. I think that change is an improvement.

Honourable senators, that is the effect of the amendments.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendments were concurred in.

SUPREME COURT BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House to be an enexcusable breach of faith with my the Supreme Court Act and the Criminal Code.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION BILL

COMMONS AMENDMENT

A message was received from the House of Commons returning Bill O-8, an Act to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act, and acquainting the Senate that they have passed this bill with two amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The amendments were read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

1. Page 3, line 20. Delete the words "and in section 10".
2. Page 3, lines 23 to 31. Delete clause 6.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these amendments be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

FEMALE EMPLOYEES EQUAL PAY BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 445, an Act to promote equal pay for female employees.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

CUSTOMS TARIFF BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 448, an Act to amend the Customs Tariff.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 440, an Act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

EXCHEQUER COURT (DIVORCE JURISDICTION) BILL

PAIRING—PRIVILEGE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, as a matter of privilege may I be permitted to make reference to an occurrence which took place some weeks ago, in connection with the Exchequer Court (Divorce Jurisdiction) Bill, which was sponsored by the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine)?

Early in the debate on the second reading of that bill the honourable senator from Kennebec (Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt) asked me whether I would pair with him when the matter came to a vote, as he was leaving for Europe very shortly. As I have a very high regard for my good friend—although we do not always see eye to eye on such subjects as divorce and margarine—I readily agreed to his request. Some days ago I received a letter from him in which he reminded me of this agreement, and then added that when he returned from abroad he read the Senate Hansard and discovered that I had voted for the bill.

I am sure honourable senators will believe me when I say that I was greatly mortified, humiliated and distressed at what appeared to be an inexcusable breach of faith with my honourable friend. Perhaps, if I were in the mood, I might say by way of extenuation that even Homer is said to have nodded occasionally. Also I might point out that pairing is rare in this chamber, and that the debate was postponed because of the fact that the sponsor of the bill was absent in the west and it was felt that the debate should not proceed until he was present to close it. But these, after all, would only be excuses and not very good reasons. As a matter of fact, I have to make an admission, which I do more or less reluctantly. My memory is just not good as it ought to be, or even as good as it used to be, and frankly I entirely forgot the commitment that I had made to my honourable friend. I think he believes what I say. Fortunately, the practical result of breaking my pair had no serious effects, for the bill was defeated by a very substantial majority. In that respect it was not entirely like a similar incident that occurred in the House of Commons some thirty years ago, when the Government's fate rested upon a single vote. I well remember the occasion—and there may be senators present who recall it better than I do—when on a motion that involved a question of confidence in the Government a member forgot his pair and his vote defeated the Government.

I make this statement tonight in justice to my good friend from Kennebec, for I think he is entitled to have a clear record of his position on Hansard. I offer to him and to the house my sincere apology for my inadvertent offence, and I give you the assurance with all the confidence in the world that I will never do it again.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

TELEGRAPHS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill 212, an Act to amend the Telegraphs Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a short bill which provides for the control of submarine cables terminating in or passing through Canadian territory. An external submarine cable is a telecommunication service by submarine cable between any place in Canada and any place outside Canada or between places outside Canada through Canada. However, this does not apply to any service by submarine cable wholly under fresh water.

The Telegraphs Act which is being amended was passed in 1875, and since that time there has been no vital amendment to the act in so far as it relates to cables. In 1875 it was provided that anyone seeking permission to operate an external submarine cable should apply to the Governor in Council. The application would of necessity be accompanied by a plan or survey showing the point of exit in Canada and the terminal point. If the application were approved, certain conditions would sometimes be attached to the approval, and when the Governor in Council was satisfied that these conditions had been carried out the applicant could commence to carry on business. The point is that once the application was granted there was no further control over the cable as to increases or decreases in the number of messages carried.

As I have said, there have been very few changes in the act since 1875, although there have been great improvements in sending messages by telegraph and other means. In 1875 there were two simplex circuits which were capable of carrying 25 words each per minute, so that 50 words per minute could be carried over the cable in operation at that time. By 1925 the number of circuits in a cable had been greatly increased, as was the speed of transmission, and it was then possible to carry by cable about 400 words per minute. There had also been considerable development in radio and telephone communication systems, to say nothing of wireless telegraphy, and consequently a great increase in the number of messages which could be carried in one way or another across the Atlantic and the Pacific; but still there was no change in the Telegraphs Act.

In 1950 the first submerged repeater was developed and placed in operation, which made it possible to send even more messages over one cable. In fact, it doubled or tripled the speed by which messages could be sent. It will be seen that this was far beyond what was contemplated when the original Telegraphs Act was passed, in 1875. I would remind the house that a company which received a charter in 1875 could make use of all these developments without the consent and knowledge of the Government. Coaxial cables with submerged repeaters were put into effect within the last few years.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Would the honourable leader be willing to explain what is meant by coaxial cables?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not pride myself on being a technician in any respect, but on making inquiries I was informed that a coaxial cable is a larger cable with better or different types of insulation, with built-in repeaters. On the other cable the repeaters are attached on the outside of the cable, usually at each end. The building of repeaters into the cable greatly increases its capacity, both as to number of messages and the speed at which they can be sent. We are just at the beginning of this great improvement and we cannot foresee what effect it will have in the future, but those who have studied this problem believe that in years to come there will be even much greater speed in the sending of messages than there is at present.

May I also remind honourable senators that at the present time there is being built a new transatlantic telephone cable between Newfoundland and Scotland with a capacity forty times that of all existing transatlantic cables. In the Toronto Globe and Mail of July 3, 1956, there was a Reuter's dispatch from London, dated July 2, under the heading "British ship sets out to lay Atlantic cable", and it is so interesting that I would like to read it to the house:

> Telephone calls between London and Montreal or Toronto as clear as local ones came a step nearer today when the British cable ship Monarch sailed from London to lay 1,300 miles of a second trans-Atlantic telephone cable.
> The Monarch will let out the cable across the Atlantic bottom in the deep sea portion of the link between Clarenville, Newfoundland and Oban, Scotland. The first cable between the two points, 2,250 miles apart, was laid last year. Each cable carries a voice only one way.

Honourable senators will realize that it is necessary to have two cables, as each carries the voice in one direction only.

When the linkup is completed this fall, for the first time trans-Atlantic calls can be made without the fading and squawking of present radio-telephone communications.

The $40 million project is being jointly financed by the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation and the British Post Office.

Present overseas telephone calls are carried on only 16 radio-telephone circuits, which are always subject to fading. The number of circuits cannot be increased because not enough wave lengths are available.

The new cable will have 35 high quality telephone circuits, 29 to New York and six to Montreal. One further circuit will be divided into at least 18 telegraph channels, for use mainly to Canada.

Although telegraph cables have spanned the Atlantic since 1866, it was not until scientists solved the problem of perfecting a repeater that would withstand the great pressures of the ocean bottom that the direct telephone link became feasible.

The repeater is a device that boosts sound on a long cable by amplifying it at regular intervals. It is needed to strengthen the wide modulation of the human voice.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I understood the honourable leader to say that this line extended from Scotland to Newfoundland, but I was under the impression that it carried right through to Sydney, Nova Scotia, as provided in the Act of 1953.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: This article refers to the Atlantic portion of the line. Of course, the cable will not end at Newfoundland, but will have to carry further along. Just what equipment is being used in that respect, I do not know.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: It was definitely stated in the 1953 bill that the cable would connect the mainland with Nova Scotia, and would extend from Newfoundland to Scotland.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not think there is any doubt of that, but this article refers only to the cable which is being placed at the bottom of the ocean, between Scotland and Newfoundland. However, as the honourable senator from Halifax-Dartmouth has said, there is provision for carrying the wires to the mainland via Cape Breton.

The last paragraph of the article says:

When the cable is finally in operation, it will be possible for someone in San Francisco to speak to someone in Bombay by direct telephone line.

Honourable senators, I merely mention this to impress upon you the great development that has taken place in the transmission of messages overseas since 1875.

This bill will provide a licensing system which will enable the Governor in Council to deal with applications, control the opening of circuits into Canada, and regulate the increases in the capacity of the cables once they are installed. It seems to me that we should pass this bill, because of the importance of telephone and cable communications in this day and generation between Canada and other parts of the world. If the bill receives second reading I shall propose that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, for there are certain questions of a technical nature which no doubt some members will desire to discuss.

Hon. John T. Hackett: Honourable senators, I am delighted to know that this bill is going to a committee. It deals, I think, with a matter of utmost importance, that of a system of communication between parts of the world which frequently have important messages to send to one another.

I have read with interest, but without entire comprehension, some of the debates that have taken place in the other house and some of the evidence that was given before a committee of that house. The disputants represented private interests. I have no interests other than that of the business of Parliament, and of the Senate in particular. So, I am very glad that we shall be able to learn more about this important question before we are asked to express an opinion on the passage of the bill.

One of the cable companies which was prominent in the dispute was the Commercial Cable Company. That is a company which spread a cable from England to Canada in 1884. In all, six cables have been laid: two in 1884, one in 1894, one in 1900, one in 1905 and another in 1923.

Last year this company asked the Government for the right to lay another cable, and the Minister of Transport replied by letter, the substance of which will be found at page 6721 of the Hansard of the House of Commons for July 31. It reads:

I refer to your letter of January 28, 1955, and previous correspondence in connection with the application of Commercial Cable Company to land on the coast of Canada a new trans-Atlantic coaxial cable.

The Government is prepared, subject to compliance by the company with all statutory requirements, to grant authority for the landing of the proposed cable, subject to certain technical and related stipulations the details of which are now being worked out; and subject to the conditions that no circuits shall be terminated in Canada except for:

(1) Purposes of defence communication from Canada to points outside Canada, so far as other available circuits are insufficient.

(2) Commercial purposes in respect of circuits leased to Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation.

Now, it would seem that the condition exacted by the Governor in Council was that there shall be no interference with defence, and that all messages which come over these cables shall be transmitted beyond the point of arrival through the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation.

Hon. M. Euler: Is the Commercial Cable Company a Canadian or an American company?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: That company, as the debate indicates, is owned almost entirely by Americans. It has the requisite representatives, a president and perhaps some officers who are domiciled in Montreal, and an office in that city; but I think the company is owned by American capital. I should have stated that it operates only a transatlantic cable, and when messages carried over it reach Canada they are made over to the Canadian Pacific Telegraph Company and carried on to their destinations in Canada by that company.

The bill now before us amends the Telegraphs Act, R.S.C., Chapter 262, which was divided into three parts. Part I dealt with secrecy; messages confided to the company had to be held secret and could not be divulged. That, I think, is the general rule with respect to all companies carrying on that type of business. Part II had to do with the electric telegraph companies, and defined how they could be built. As I have said, the company in question restricted its operations to a transatlantic telegraph line. It came under Part III, marine electric telegraph companies. Part IV is in the form of the bill now before us. It stipulates that there shall be control by the Governor in Council of external submarine cables. A licence must be obtained.

Now, if the Governor in Council is to exercise control, as he appears to have stipulated in the letter which was directed to this cable company by the Minister of Transport, it would mean that any messages which come through the cable, and which would have to be carried on a telegraph wire or by telephone to other destinations, would have to be carried through the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, which is a crown company, set up in 1949 for the purpose of taking over a commercial company which was acquired at that time and which has since been operated by this crown company, the C.O.T.C.

I noticed that throughout the debate in the other place, in so far as the witnesses were concerned, they seemed to be pretty strictly aligned in one camp or the other. I submit that this is a most important matter and one which is worthy of very careful consideration by this house. I am delighted that the honourable leader has suggested that further information is to be made available to this house by referring the bill to a committee where some questions like the one I asked a few moments ago, as to the meaning of coaxial and other technical terms may be explained, as well as the purpose of restricting the messages that may come across on this cable to the C.O.T.C. I believe there is a royal commission engaged at the present time in examining whether one of our crown corporations should at the same time be judge and jury as well as a competitor. I refer to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and the royal commission known by some as the Fowler Commission, which has been looking into the details of the operation of that crown company.

Communication is a matter of tremendous importance. This company has apparently felt that it needed to enlarge its means of communication on the sea bottom, but apparently it has been told that when its messages arrive here they must come into C.O.T.C. for telegraphic transmission over land or be stymied. It is true that when they come across the ocean now they go to the Canadian Pacific Telegraph Company, but that is a matter of contract. I have not any views to express at this moment, because of lack of information about the matter. I trust that within the next few days I, like others—if there be others who are not completely informed as to the matter at issue before this house—may be able to formulate and express an opinion.

I think it rather unfortunate that a matter of this importance should come to us in what some of us hope are the very last days of the session. The matter is a far-reaching one which goes far beyond the issues that may have caused the contending parties to lock horns. It is something in which we are all deeply interested.

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor: Honourable senators, like the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett), I am interested in this bill, but from a different angle: the effect that it might have on my city, Halifax. We have cable ships operating out of that city, one a Commercial Cable ship and two other ships of the Western Union. I very well recall the passage in 1953 of a private bill to amend the Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company Act, with its combination of interests at that time, which gave that company authority to lay submarine cables from Sydney, Nova Scotia, to Newfoundland, and from Newfoundland on to Scotland. That was an enterprising scheme to give faster cable service between Canada, the United States and Great Britain.

I am concerned about this particular bill and the powers it would grant. I realize there is criticism of the C.B.C.'s position in regard to monopoly—I hesitate to use that word in so far as controlling communication is concerned, and this situation bears a very close resemblance to it. But I will come to that shortly.

I said I was interested, and perhaps it is from a selfish standpoint, because each one of these cable ships based on Halifax represents an annual expenditure in that city, for upkeep and ordinary expenses, of something like three-quarters of a million dollars. That aggregates for the three ships an outlay of over two million dollars a year. So this is a really important industry as far as the port of Halifax and the province at large are concerned: the effects are felt right down through to the Cape Breton area. I fully realize that there must be some control. But I hesitate to think that a government or any single body should control not only its own particular lines of communication but also those of its competitors to such an extent as may, instead of bringing about greater efficiency, curtail the activities of other companies. So I hold that we should carefully scrutinize the provision of this bill; and I was very pleased to hear the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) state that if the bill is given second reading he will move to refer it to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

One matter in which I am particularly interested, and which I think has something to do with the principle of the bill, although perhaps I should not deal with individual clauses, is the issuing of licences. I hope that the Leader of the Government will explain one or two points which rather trouble me. Section 41 states:

> No person shall in Canada
> (a) operate an external submarine cable; or
> (b) construct, alter, maintain or operate any works or facilities for the purpose of operating an external submarine cable.

I refer to the second word in paragraph (b), namely, "alter". I do not see how any existing company can improve its system—and I understand the Commercial Cable Company, to which the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) referred, has extensive plans to enlarge and improve its service—or operate satisfactorily if it must apply for a licence and if the Government or the crown company replies, "You shall not alter or improve your system". I do not see how under those circumstances we can pursue a free enterprise policy such as we enjoy in this country. I am just a little concerned about that, and I would invite the honourable Leader of the Government to give an explanation that would enable me to see whether my concern is justified.

As has already been stated by the honourable senator from Victoria, the Commercial Cable Company has been operating continuously since 1884. Another United States company, the American Telegraph and Telephone Company, is linked up with the Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company, which has its head office in Halifax. The Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company is joined or amalgamated with the British Post Office, the C.O.T.C., and the A.T.T. to make the more modern connections referred to by the Leader of the Government. If I am not mistaken, it is hoped that the 32 circuits on which building operations were commenced in 1954 will be completed by November of the present year. I do not know whether this work is in fact now completed, but the original plans called for the carrying out of this program, and it is my impression that something like $30 million to $40 million was to be expended in connection with these developments.

Another matter about which I am concerned is the proposed new section 45 of the act, dealing with existing services. I listened attentively to and followed as well as I could the debate in the other place. The section reads:

> For a period of four months after the day on which this Part comes into force this Part does not apply to any external submarine cable existing on that day.

As far as I am able to recall, this particular section was not referred to in the other place, nor was it mentioned this evening by my honourable friend from Victoria. I thought he would ask the Leader of the Government to explain just what it means. I take it, from a layman's point of view, that if the existing company has a certain number of cables in operation, and it begins to lay additional cables, and the work is not finished within four months, the project is not likely to be approved. If that is what is intended, it would place the company in a very, very unfair position. I have no brief for the company. I have not been asked to speak on this bill, but I am doing so because, as a representative from Halifax, I feel it is my duty to safeguard our interests in so far as two old companies are concerned. They are the Commercial Cable Company—which, let me mention, for the information of the honourable senator from Victoria, who spoke only of Montreal, has an office at Halifax—and the Western Union, whose cable ships operate out of the port of Halifax. I would appreciate it if the Leader of the Government, when he closes the debate, would explain just what is the meaning of the two clauses to which I have referred. If it is suggested that these are matters for consideration by the committee and that I should not be taking up the bill clause by clause, may I point out that to my mind the whole principle of the bill rests in these particular paragraphs, relating to the manner in which companies will be permitted to carry on improvements of their systems, and the effect that interference of some competitor might have on their operations.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I have no special interest in this bill, certainly no private interest. I do not hold stock in any of the companies which may be affected by it, nor do I expect to; nor have I been approached by any of the various parties who are interested in the bill. In that, I resemble my honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett); and I have nothing like as much knowledge of the industry as is possessed by my honourable friend from Halifax-Dartmouth (Hon. Mr. Isnor). But what I wish to do in connection with the bill is, as I so frequently do under similar circumstances, to question the form of it. This is an amendment to the Telegraphs Act; and the licence provision states:

> No person shall in Canada
> (a) operate an external submarine cable; or
> (b) construct, alter, maintain or operate any works or facilities for the purpose of operating an external submarine cable > except and in accordance with a licence . . .

—which must be got from the Governor in Council.

Section 42 reads:

> The Governor in Council may make regulations
> (c) prescribing the duration, terms and conditions of licences and the fees for the issue thereof . . .

And the bill provides that any person who violates any of the provisions of the new part or of the regulations is guilty of an offence and is liable to penalties.

It does seem to me that this is taking from the rule of law, which operates in Canada in most matters, and from Parliament, the right of legislating and ruling and, in the form of this bill, transforming it into rule in camera. That is what I object to so frequently on the floor of this house. I wish the sponsor of the bill, the Government Leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) would explain to us, before we are asked to vote on even the second reading, why it is necessary to transfer absolute, arbitrary power of this kind to the executive, and why it is that submarine cables are different in this respect from any other kind of cables. If it is a telegraph company which proposes to construct a line in Canada it will be subject to the provisions of the Telegraphs Act. If it is a railway company it will be subject to the provisions of the Railway Act, and so on. These are public enactments and perhaps the parties will come to Parliament and ask for a charter giving them power to operate. Then, it may be they will go to a public body, such as the Board of Transport Commissioners, and there in public reveal what is required by them and what they propose to do. They can operate in accordance with the provisions laid down by that tribunal announced in public, and then they can act in accordance with the rule of law. That is the kind of rule that I like in Canada; and the kind of rule I do not like is one that is carried on behind closed doors, be it ever so good, so high-minded and disinterested and done with all the rectitude in the world. Why is it necessary to transfer all this power to be exercised behind closed doors? Why is it not possible in submarine cables as it is in other monopolistic enterprises of this kind—public services of this kind—to govern it by the rule of law that applies to everybody and which anybody who wishes to build a cable may read, so that one person is not given preference over another person; so that there are no special privileges so far as we can prevent them, and so that we all stand on the same level as citizens of Canada or businessmen operating in this country?

Why is this tendency growing in Canada of transferring the powers of Parliament to the executive? I do not think it is a party matter at all. It is perhaps the tendency of our times and of the world at large, but that does not excuse it.

Why are we so often asked to set Parliament aside and to transfer government in Canada behind closed doors to the executive? In my view, it is unnecessary and it is not good democracy. It will not lead to the happiness of the country if we continue this tendency. I apologize to the house for so often raising this same point. I suppose I have done it three or four times this session and I shall continue to do it as occasions of this kind present themselves to us.

I congratulate the people who are engaged in this industry on the advances in the technique that have been described by the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). I am glad to see progress of this kind, and it does appeal to me that perhaps this cable business will become more important as the years go by, and so my objection becomes more important too, and the necessity for conducting it in the blazing light of day becomes more essential.

I hope the Leader of the Government will please tell us why the bill is in this form instead of being in the usual form that we have followed in Canada in years gone by.

Hon. John J. Kinley: Honourable senators, I have no intimate knowledge of this legislation, but I did discuss on one occasion the factors in connection with bringing opposition to this bill before Parliament. In discussing some features of this bill tonight the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) led us to believe, I think, that the bill is concerned with Canadian business. Then when the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) asked if it concerned an American company I think the honourable senator from Victoria, while he did not answer directly, left the impression that it is indeed an American company.

We know that the geography of the North Atlantic and this continent makes it almost necessary for submarine cables to serve the continent of America by way of Newfoundland and then Nova Scotia. This being the case, it is important that the people who have put their money into the cable business in the past should not be prejudiced to any extent. If they are looking for competition in Canadian business, that is one thing; but if it is just a passing of a line of communication through Canada and through the United States, then it seems to me it would be a splendid thing to co-operate with our American friends and enable them to take advantage of the fact that our land projects away out into the Atlantic. We should co-operate with them so that they can bring this cable service to America through eastern Canada.

I do not know the details as to the necessity of this legislation, but I can see some objections being raised by people who have been in the business a long time if it means restricting the progress—and I think it is progress—they wish to make in telegraph and telephone communications. For this reason I am glad that the bill is going to be referred to committee. I hope it will be given the consideration it deserves, for I understand that the legislation is of considerable interest to people both inside and outside Canada. It certainly concerns the interest of people on the Atlantic coast, for if the service is to be centralized in Halifax it will create business there. It will also have the effect of making the Canadian company, which I am told is a crown company, more alert; and perhaps the competition will result in our getting a better overall service. However, I think the rights of Canadians should be maintained, and I do not feel we should surrender anything to others at the expense of our own people. If there is a question of subsidies and the foreign company is highly subsidized, this factor might come out in committee. This is an important piece of legislation and I hope it will be given every consideration in committee.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I want to add a word or two to what has been said. I always enjoy hearing from my friend, the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). In this particular case I am not so much concerned as he is with what is in the bill as I am bothered by what is not in the bill. I have had the oportunity to examine the statute in force at the present time, which this bill proposes to amend by adding another part. That statute was passed by the Parliament of Canada some years ago. Section 17 (a) of part III of the act reads in part as follows:

> This part applies to every company
> (a) authorized after the 8th day of April, 1875, by any special or general Act of the Parliament of Canada, or under the provisions of this part to construct or maintain telegraphic wires or cables, in, upon, under or across any gulf, bay or branch of any sea or any tidal water . . .

It is further provided in that statute that before construction can be undertaken certain permission must be obtained from the Governor in Council, and that he may impose conditions. In the proposed new part IV I find amendments dealing with the licensing of companies which wish to operate, and may at the present time be operating, or new companies which may seek to come into being, and I am concerned about what may happen to existing companies if these amendments become law. What will happen to existing companies if they must obtain a licence? I am not objecting, if that is the Government's policy; and I would not be too much concerned about the Government taking to itself the power of licensing, as it has under this statute, if I could be sure that the power is used in such a way that it does not amount to a prohibition of the use of facilities which at present are owned and operated under the law of Canada as it now exists. What bothers me is the power to license without any apparent recourse to a person who may be adversely affected and who is at present operating within the law of Canada. What recourse has he if he is refused a licence or if terms are imposed which are tantamount to refusal of a licence? It appears to me that if we are to subscribe to this principle of licensing there should be some provision for review, so as to present an arbitrary decision from resulting in refusal to grant a licence.

If some such recourse were provided in the bill, the thing that is bothering me would disappear, for I would not pretend to question at this time the policy of the Government if it is embarking on this business of submarine telecommunication and wishes ultimately to occupy the whole field. I am not so shocked by that as is the honourable senator who made a comparison with the C.B.C., because I do not think the two are similar. It is like comparing elephants with rabbits to suggest any comparison between the C.B.C. method of operation, and what it entails, and a system which has to do with the dispatching and study of telecommunications.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: There is a principle involved.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Well, the word "principle" in itself has no particular connotation. I have to take it in the context in which it appears.

So far as the C.B.C. is concerned—and I am not going to incorporate my views as to the C.B.C. into this debate—I would point out that that corporation is operating in a field where the formation of public opinion and the communication of various forms of entertainment may be done directly in competition with those companies that the corporation seeks to regulate. But the business with which this bill is concerned is the dispatch and receipt of messages. If the Government is in that business, and private individuals also are in it and find it is economic, there is no reason why they cannot operate side by side. If, however, as a matter of policy, the Government decides that it wants to take the whole field unto itself, then I think it should be made clear that a licensing section is intended to be only that, and not a section which would prohibit any economic operation by those now in the field. For that reason I should think that a suggestion such as I have made, that a person refused a licence should be able to have the refusal examined and decided by an independent body, would be aceptable. I would be perfectly satisfied then.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable member if he does not mean that the granting or refusing of licences should be in accordance with the rule of law rather than done by arbitrary powers such as are granted in this bill? And if so, is he not in entire agreement with what I said a few moments ago?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: If by "in accordance with the rule of law" my friend means an applicant should have the right to test whether or not the decision in his case has been made in accordance with the rule of law, I would subscribe to that; but my main concern is that there should be some machinery for review of a decision not to grant a licence.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is exactly what I said.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It must be a matter of law, certainly.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I do not quite follow my friend from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden). I understood the honourable member from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) to say that the proposal is not only for licensing, but that all cables that come over the ocean via the old company must be transferred to some company other than the one the old company is now dealing with. No question of improper dealing with the present company has been raised. What about that?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I do not find anything in the bill which deals with that point. The licensing provision is simply that you cannot construct, alter, maintain or operate any works or facilities without a licence. What the honourable senator from Victoria was referring to was an application which, I take it, antedated the introduction of this bill, and certain terms and conditions were sought to be imposed upon an existing company. Presumably it had to do with some proposed alteration of the works.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I do not think that is quite correct. The company asked the Governor in Council for a licence, and it was told that there was no reason for granting—

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: No, not under this bill.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I am quite aware that it was not under this bill. My reason for attempting to speak to the subject was to get clarification. I merely gave an instance in which a company had asked for a licence and received a reply; and I quoted from the minister's letter.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I did not think the company was asking for a licence.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No. It asked for the right to land on the coast of Canada a new transatlantic coaxial cable, in accordance with the act now in effect.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government if at the present time the Government can direct the cable company which is now delivering its messages through the Canadian Pacific Telegraph Company or the Canadian National Telegraph Company, to forward them through some other company? Under the present law can it be compelled to do that?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have not the act before me.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: May I read section 22 of the act? It says:

> The company shall not exercise any of the powers by this part conferred until

(a) the company has submitted to the Governor in Council, a plan and survey of the proposed site . . .

That has been done. And until

(b) such plan, site and location have been approved by the Governor in Council, and

(c) such conditions as he—

That is the Governor in Council.

—thinks fit for the public good to impose touching the said telegraph and works, have been complied with.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is what has been done in the past.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: These are the conditions. The Governor in Council has power to impose such conditions as he may think are necessary for the public good. Now he is imposing those conditions. His powers to impose conditions for the public good seem unlimited, and these conditions have been imposed.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But they are imposed before the company gets the licence.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: There is no licence involved.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Then call it a permit to do something.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: It is a permit for the right to land a cable.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is a licence.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No. The licence refers to the operation of the business after it has been established.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It is a distinction without a difference.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: No.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, may I say a word about this bill? Having listened to the discussion here and read what was said in the other house, I must come to the conclusion that the purpose of this measure is to take the business of carrying messages from the company now carrying them and give it to the crown company to which reference has been made. The contents of the letter referred to by my honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) can only lead one to that conclusion. It is for that reason that I am pleased that this bill is going to a committee, for I want to have the opportunity of asking the minister to explain it. The information he put on Hansard of the other house was not approved at all. I have been very uneasy about the whole matter.

I am at a loss to know why the Government wants this legislation passed. There do not seem to have been any complaints about the delivery of telegrams in Canada by the Canadian Pacific Telegraph Company or the Canadian National Telegraph Company. Obviously, the intention is to compel this cable company to forward its telegrams, when they have landed in Canada, through the crown corporation. If that is the policy of the Government, let it say so, and we will know what we are being asked to vote on. Then, if the majority are in favour of such a policy, there is no question about it. I am generally in the minority, so it does not make much difference; however, I want to have a clear understanding of what I am being asked to vote on.

I was quite familiar with the Winnipeg representatives of the company which was taken over by the crown. They did a very large business in that city. If we believe in private enterprise, we should stand up in this house and vote against this kind of legislation which gives crown companies a monopoly. Let us not hide the true purpose of this legislation in a lot of verbiage. Let the Leader of the Government, when this bill is in committee, come out and say what its true purpose is. As I have said, I can only conclude that its intention is to give the distribution of telegrams from this cable in Canada solely to the crown company.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Of course, that is not its purpose at all.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is what it looks like to me.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: What did the Minister of Transport say?

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is what the minister said.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: He said just the opposite.

Hon. Mr. Haig: If that is the intention of this legislation, I want to know, and I shall vote against it. I do not want to see private enterprise in this country curtailed or controlled by the Government. If private business is not handling the work properly, that is a different matter. The question of Government monopoly in broadcasting was raised by my honourable friend from Halifax-Dartmouth (Hon. Mr. Isnor). Let us not bury our head in the sand about these things. A violent fight has been going on in Canada for some years over whether a governmental body should control the broadcasting rights of private companies. What the recommendation of the present royal commission on broadcasting will be, we do not know, but there is very strong feeling across the country against the present set-up.

The same objection is taken to government control of telegraphic communications in Canada. I agree wholeheartedly with what my friend from Victoria has said; and I repeat that I am glad this bill will go to committee, where some facts can be brought out.

I also concur in the remarks made by the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). No matter whether we call it the rule of law or something else, a standard should be set so that when a person applies for something he should know what his rights are. They should not be based on the whims of a parliamentary committee as to what should or should not be done. It is not a question of whether or not its members are honest men; it is a question of establishing freedom by laying down a proper rule. That is why we have courts of law in this country, to lay down principles for the guidance of our people. I hope that in my lifetime I will see some progress made towards clarification of proper rules for guidance in a situation such as this.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, I must confess at once that I have not had much opportunity to study this measure, nor have I read the debate that took place in the other house. But it does seem to me that there is something to be said for the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), and for the criticism expressed by the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). I do not entirely agree with my honourable friend, whom I should call the senior senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden), that there is no similarity between what this legislation proposes and what is being done by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The C.B.C. is a broadcasting agency, a Government broadcasting agency. It licenses its competitors and makes the regulations that control them. Under this bill the Governor in Council will make the regulations. It gets control by licensing, and that is a very effective method of control. Through the licence mechanism it can control and even harass its competitors. Is this desirable?

In the early days in western Canada when grain elevators were unregulated, grain elevators and the movement of grain were declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada, and the system of licensing for control was imposed, which produced nothing but the most beneficent results. But the Government was not then in the grain elevator business. We have another parallel here. For instance, the dominion Government later spent tens of millions of dollars in building terminal grain elevators. The dominion grain elevators have to be licensed, but their operation is not subject to the control of the Governor in Council. Under the Grain Act it is under the control and direction of the Board of Grain Commissioners of Canada, in the same way that the operation of every other elevator is.

It does appear to me that there is a principle involved here and that it is sound. I have no objection at all to the Government being in the telecommunications business on land and over the sea or under the sea, but it does not appeal to my sense of fairness and justice that private companies can be—and I think the possibility lies here—subjected to hardship if some Government in the future wishes to impose it. On that point I agree wholly with the senator from Toronto that there should be an appeal from the conditions that may be imposed under these regulations. There should be some appeal, for instance, to such a body as the Board of Transport Commissioners. That would be a perfectly logical thing to provide. If there were such a provision in this act, a private operating company which felt it had been subjected to hardship could appeal to the board, argue its case and have it dealt with in public.

That is the principle that applies today in the matter of freight rates. The Government did not say to the Canadian National Railway "We are going to determine what rates you must charge." That company files its rates with the independent Board of Transport Commissioners for approval, and interested parties can appear before the board and argue as to whether the proposed rates are fair and reasonable or not. An ultimate appeal does lie from the Board of Transport Commissioners to the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Just the reverse of what you are suggesting.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I would not object if there were provision for an appeal of that kind in this bill, giving the right of appeal to the Governor in Council from a decision of the Board of Transport Commissioners. The point that I am making is that there does seem to me to be an element of unfairness or the possibility of unfairness in applying regulations to a company which has no recourse of appeal to anyone. It is a principle that has crept into a good deal of our legislation in recent years and I think it is one greatly to be deplored.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that if the honourable leader speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think, honourable senators, that there is a misapprehension as to the purpose of this bill. The purpose of this bill is not to grant to the Government company a monopoly. I assure the Leader of the Opposition that the minister when speaking in the other house also emphasized the fact that no monopoly is being sought.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: May I ask my honourable friend a question at this point? I quite agree with what he states, but this Government may not last for ever and another Government may come into power and operate under this legislation. Would it give them the power to impose a monopoly? That is my question.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I doubt if this bill would give them the power to impose a monopoly. All this bill does is to permit the Governor in Council to have some control over cable companies, once the companies are established.

My friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) raised the question as to why there are so many regulations. All I can say to him is that the operation of a cable company is a technical matter and it would be impossible to spell out all the regulations in a bill. There is no secrecy about the regulations. My friend asked, "Why is all this done behind closed doors?" There is no intention of doing anything behind closed doors. Regulations will be published and the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity, as well as all other senators, will be able to read what they are. I doubt if it would be possible for an application to be considered in accordance with the wording of an Act of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: If it is possible to spell out the regulations and publish them, why is it not possible to spell them out in the bill and pass it in that form?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As I said before, the operation of a telegraph or cable company is a technical one. I do not think it is practicable nor that it would be advisable to do it in the manner in which the honourable senator suggests.

Let me return to the question of monopoly. I take it that my honourable friend from Halifax-Dartmouth (Hon. Mr. Isnor) fears that the company which is operating there will be put out of business.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I just have concern, that is all.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I can assure him that there is no intention to do so by means of this bill. He referred to the clause which states:

> No person shall in Canada
> (a) operate an external submarine cable . . . except under and in accordance with a licence issued under this Part.

That does not mean that if a company makes application for permission to alter its cable the application will be refused. Certainly an application will not necessarily be refused. But if this bill is passed, a company will not be able to increase the carrying powers of its cable or to make additions or alterations without anyone knowing anything about it. All this measure is intended to do is to regulate the operation of cables.

It was suggested that the C.O.T.C., which operates a company, will also issue licences; and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was mentioned. The C.O.T.C. will not issue licences. The licences will be issued by the Governor in Council; and I take it that if the C.O.T.C. wants to alter its cable in order to increase the number of messages which can be carried, or to effect a decrease, or lay a new cable, it will have to apply for a licence. It will not have power either to grant or refuse licences; it will act under the provisions of this bill.

I would also like to assure honourable senators that under the bill there will be supervision of any changes which are made in the present cable construction, and a scrutiny of changes which may be made in connection with any other cables which are laid from time to time. I cannot emphasize too strongly that there is no intention, by means of this measure, nor do I see any power in it, to grant a monopoly to the C.O.T.C. That company and all others, if this bill is passed, will be subject to licence.

No doubt honourable senators will want to ask a number of other questions of the experts when in committee; and as I have said, if this bill should receive second reading, I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Does the honourable leader intend to refer to the clause relating to the four-month period?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I propose to refer the whole bill to committee.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: But does the honourable leader propose to make any reference to it at the present time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I assume that the clause is regarded as a fair one, in that it will enable any company which has commenced to make any changes at the present time to complete them within the four-month period.

Let me point out to the honourable senator that the next and final clause, section 2, provides that—

This act shall come into force on a date to be fixed by proclamation of the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Yes, but what I want to know relates to the four-month period. It took the American Telephone and Telegraph Company two years to lay its cables.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I think I can explain the reason for the period of four months. The bill provides that no person shall in Canada do so and so; that is, operate or improve a submarine cable. Section 45 states that for a period of four months after the act comes into force this provision shall not apply to an existing cable. All that the section does is to prescribe a period of four months within which a licence will not be required.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I may be out of order; but I fear that, the parent company having completed its cable, the other company, not having completed its and perhaps not being able to do so for a year, would not be granted a licence. It might be barred because of that provision.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That is perfectly right. I just wanted to point out that the period of four months is inserted to allow that time after the act comes into force for an existing cable company to get its permit.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It is four months from the date the act comes into force, and it will not come into effect until it receives the Royal Assent.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: That might be next week.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Well, it might be, but the act will come into force by proclamation of the Governor in Council, and for four months thereafter a company will not be subject to this provision of the act. To my mind that assures the companies that there is a desire to be fair to them. They will not be cut off immediately the bill receives the Royal Assent.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

SMALL LOANS BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—
DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Charles G. Hawkins moved the second reading of Bill 51, an Act to amend the Small Loans Act.

He said: Honourable senators, because of the rush of bills that have been passed in the other house lately the Printing Bureau has been unable to supply the Senate with copies of this bill as passed by the House of Commons. If this bill is given second reading tonight I intend to refer it to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for consideration tomorrow. I am sure that at that time there will be plenty of copies available for distribution.

The Small Loans Act, which this bill seeks to amend, came into effect on January 1, 1940. For some time the Association of Licensed Lenders have been asking for revision of this act; also many demands have been made by the public generally. The Small Loans Act does not apply to banks, pawn brokers or to money lenders whose charges do not exceed 12 per cent per annum. Neither does it apply to loans made beyond $500. The original act stipulates that lenders of between $1 and $500, who have in mind a charge in excess of 12 per cent per annum, must obtain a licence and report to the Department of Insurance with respect to their transactions. Interest and all other charges in connection with the accommodation to the borrower must not exceed 2 per cent per month.

During the first year of supervision, namely 1940, the total volume of business was about $20 million. The volume transacted in 1955 was probably in the order of $200 million. This will give honourable senators an idea of both the volume and the increase in the past fifteen years in this field. At the present time there is no regulation over lending when the amount loaned exceeds $500. Since there is no regulation for amounts exceeding $500, there is no compulsion on the part of lenders to report their activities in this field. However, many of the companies supply the Department of Insurance with information covering all their activities. The Licensed Lenders Association have themselves indicated that because of excessive charges sometimes made by unlicensed lenders the act should be amended so as to bring such lenders under Government regulations for amounts exceeding $500. In addition, there has been representation from time to time by members of Parliament and the public generally for an overhauling of the act.

Earlier I mentioned the Money Lenders Act, which was originally passed in 1906 and is still in existence. For all practical purposes it has been superseded by the Small Loans Act, and the present bill proposes to repeal it. As these amendments are of a somewhat technical nature, and there are available to committees of this house witnesses especially competent to deal with the details of the act, I propose when the bill receives second reading to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, on behalf of the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) I move the adjournment of the debate. He would speak when the order is called tomorrow, and the bill could go to committee immediately after the Senate rises.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It occurs to me there may be other senators who wish to speak.

Hon. Mr. Haig: They could speak now.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If no honourable senator wishes to speak on the bill now I would concur in the motion moved by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig).

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Some honourable senator may wish to speak after hearing the honourable senator from Blaine Lake.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Haig, for Hon. Mr. Horner, the debate was adjourned.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill 446, an Act to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a short bill, and although the hour is late I thought we might dispose of it this evening. The purpose of the bill is set out quite clearly in the explanatory notes. At the present time there is a provision in the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Defence Services Pension Act with respect to the payment of succession duties out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and then charging the amount in instalments against the pension or allowance which may be paid to the one entitled to it.

This bill eases the hardship on a widow who might be called upon to pay succession duties and has not got the full amount in cash. This measure would enable the Government to pay succession duties in such cases and recover the amount out of the pension or allowance.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Can the honourable gentleman say if this applies to officers killed in service and to those who die from natural causes?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am not sure. I do not think it goes back to the period of the war when men were killed in action.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: What I had in mind was men who were killed in the service of the R.C.M.P.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It will apply to the beneficiaries of men killed while serving with the R.C.M.P.

Clause 2 of the bill enables men who have come into the force from the British Columbia Provincial Police to include for pension purposes all the time that could be included for pension purposes under the law of the province. Certain members of the Provincial Police Force of British Columbia were taken into the R.C.M.P., and under the provisions of this bill the time they served with the provincial police will be included for pension purposes under the R.C.M.P. Act. I am told there are about fifteen men who will be affected by this clause.

There is a similar provision with respect to members of the police force of Newfoundland, who were taken under this act by the terms of union.

The fourth provision of the bill is to enable funds for additional liability to the R.C.M.P. pension account to be paid by the Government.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. M. Macdonald: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, August 8, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Hon. Thomas Vien, P.C., Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

INCOME TAX BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 418, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I would ask that this bill be the order of business after consideration of the Small Loans Bill later this day.

INDIAN BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 439, an Act to amend the Indian Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 449, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

EXCISE TAX BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 450, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

TELEGRAPHS BILL

On Reports of Committees:

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I am expecting momentarily to receive the report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications in connection with the Telegraphs Bill. It is not in hand yet. Perhaps, with the consent of the house, it could be presented later this day?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: We shall revert to reports of committees at a later hour.

POLITICAL RIGHTS OF WOMEN

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I realize it is late in the session for questions. However, in view of the interest shown by a large number of women's organizations in the United Nations Convention on the Political Rights of Women, I would like to have answers to the following questions:

1. Has the Government done anything to determine whether or not the provinces are in favour of ratification of the United Nations Convention on the Political Rights of Women?
2. (a) Has there been any approach made by the Government to any provincial Government regarding the United Nations Convention on the Political Rights of Women?
   (b) If so, what was the response?
3. (a) If no steps have been taken by the Government has there been any approach or inquiry regarding the United Nations Convention on the Political Rights of Women made to the Government by any of the provincial Governments?
   (b) If so, which provinces made such approach or inquiry?
4. If nothing has been done by either the Government or any provincial Governments toward securing the approval of ratification of this convention by the provinces, does the Government propose to pursue the matter?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, there are a number of points involved and of course I have not the information at hand. I can tell the honourable senator that the Government, as she so well knows, has taken quite an interest in women during the present year and has brought in a bill entitled "An Act to promote equal pay for female employees". I do not know if there is any relationship between the contents of that bill and the questions which the honourable lady has asked. However, I shall endeavour to get the information which she seeks and table it as soon as possible.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

POWERS OF PARLIAMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I rise on a matter of personal explanation and correction, which is tantamount to a question of privilege. Last Wednesday I was unavoidably absent, owing to my attendance at the funeral of a very dear friend who had been my loyal supporter for more than 30 years, and on my return to Ottawa I read with interest the statement made by the honourable senator for De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Vien) on the interpretation of the British North America Act, our Constitution. It appears on pages 947 and 948 of the Senate Hansard. In the first column on page 948 there is the following:

> The reference is: Supreme Court of Canada Reports, 1936, page 430, and following, especially at page 431, where it was held, in point of strict law, that Parliament has authority to make grants out of public moneys to individual inhabitants, corporations or other public bodies for any object deemed desirable by Parliament in its wisdom.

The words "it was held" may be misleading, because in order for an opinion to constitute res judicata it must be held by a majority of the judges of the court concerned. In this instance, to my great surprise, the quotation refers to a dissenting opinion of one of the two minority judges. Since I have been in the Senate I am always learning something; and this time I have discovered that learned gentlemen may take the opinions of a dissenting judge for a judgment.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I think we can consider the incident closed.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: It would have been better if you had not risen about it. If everyone minded his own business, everything would be better.

SMALL LOANS BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hawkins, seconded by Hon. Mr. Isnor, for the second reading of Bill 51, an Act to amend the Small Loans Act.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, perhaps I should say at the outset that I do not rise to oppose the reduction of interest rate as proposed by this bill: I merely wish to make a few remarks which, though they may not be beneficial or useful to honourable members of this chamber, might be helpful to others, particularly young people, throughout the length and breadth of our land.

I am sure that if the figures were examined it would be found that there has been an immense increase in various types of the small-loans business, as a result of so much radio and other advertising, since the institution of the baby bonus and the old age pension. Wherever a young couple has a family of small children, there is a cheque arriving each month. In many instances the recipients of the cheques are sought out, and we have this plague of instalment buying, which, to my mind, is wholly injurious. People operating this kind of business are often called sharks and parasites. Well, even under this amended legislation the interest charged is 2 per cent per month on the first $300. That amounts to 24 per cent per annum. How can any young couple living on a tight budget make a loan and hope to get along if they have to pay out almost a quarter of their entire earnings in interest charges? It is an impossibility. Talk about loan sharks! I know that in western Canada, where we didn't blush at even 8 or 10 per cent interest rates in the early days, if a man in a community is known to charge above 7 per cent he is ostracized and condemned by the whole district.

The ability of the borrower to pay back must be taken into consideration. I have always advised people to do their financing through a bank, to get their affairs in such a position that they can go and present their proposition to a banker. As a young man I never participated in any small loans type of financing. When a young man goes to the bank to borrow money it is the duty of the banker to talk to him and probe into his background. He might even tell the prospective borrower that his proposition is not a sound one, just to find out how determined the young man is and how he plans to pay back the loan. If the banker is not satisfied with the young man's plans for repaying the loan, it is not granted.

In the August edition of Reader's Digest I read an interesting article about a school teacher living in Montana near the Alberta boundary. Before his students graduated he helped them to acquire livestock, taught them how to keep accounts, and so on. Then as a group they began to develop land that had been considered useless, and when the land became profitable the young men went to a banker and presented their case so well that they got a loan of $5,000 to buy farm equipment. They had figured everything out, right down to the last quart of oil their machinery would require. Well, things progressed until finally the loan reached the proportions of $200,000 and the fruits of their enterprise turned the whole countryside, which was a poor grain growing district, into a prosperous mixed-farming community.

As elder statesmen we talk a lot about everybody being given an equal opportunity in this country. Just how equal is it? A wealthy man can borrow money at 4 per cent interest, but the sorry part of all this nefarious small loans business is that the poorer man often pays 24 per cent. I would not object too strenuously to cases where people borrowed a few hundred dollars for, say, two months, but a far greater number of borrowers probably hold the money for a longer period than it is loaned for. I do not know how other honourable senators feel about it, but to me it seems rather shocking that our poorer citizens, who can ill afford to pay such a high rate of interest, should have to do so. In the province of Quebec, for instance, there are credit unions, which are operating to some extent in Saskatchewan also, and I am sure that they would not contemplate any such charge as 2 per cent a month.

As far as our chartered banks are concerned, it used to be that they could not take the security that most small borrowers offered. Later the Bank Act was amended. I think that possibly the banks are somewhat to blame for the fact that these small loans companies are doing so much business. I feel that a considerable portion of the business that this bill deals with should be done by the banks. They should make a greater effort to accommodate the general public in this regard.

I want to do my part in warning young people starting out in life to buy less on credit, to defer buying when possible until they have the cash to pay. If they do that they can obtain discounts, instead of paying 24 per cent interest on loans. Honourable senators, if I have managed to say anything that might be of some assistance to someone, I am satisfied. I am certainly not opposing the reduction or regulation specified in the bill.

Hon. Charles B. Howard: Honourable senators, after the remarks that have just been made by the honourable senator from Blaine Lake I would like to say a few words. In the first place, I want to congratulate the small loans companies throughout this country upon the splendid work they are doing in supplying necessary funds to people who need money but cannot borrow from the chartered banks, either because of lack of security or for other reasons. And certainly I want to commend this Government for bringing in another bill to supplement the many pieces of legislation that have been placed on the statute books of this country in the interest of the common people throughout the length and breadth of this land.

It is unfortunate that the small borrower has to pay a rate of interest much higher than the large borrower pays, but that is true in all lines of enterprise. And although we may not like it, after all it is only fair and just, because, as everybody knows, it costs more proportionately to make and collect a loan of, say, $300 than one of $1,000 or $1,500.

It has been suggested that the reduction of the interest rate by this bill to one-half of one per cent per month on the portion of any loan in excess of $1,000 means that the small loans companies will not make any loans over that amount. I feel that they will not. In fact, I am one of those who believe that if the small loans companies in this country were restricted to the making of loans of up to $1,000, that limitation would be practically high enough, because the proper place for anyone to go to for a loan of over $1,000 is a chartered bank. I would have no objection, therefore, if the bill fixed the maximum amount that can be borrowed from a small loans company at $1,000. However, I am satisfied to vote for the bill as it is.

I think the small-loans companies should get their capital, as other corporations do, in the ordinary way. Some time ago the chartered banks loaned these finance companies $30 million in a group deal at 4½ per cent interest, and that rate has since been increased to 5 per cent. The finance companies re-loan the money to borrowers at 2 per cent per month, or 24 per cent per annum, and while that is absolutely legal I do not think it is in the best interests of this country; it is one of those unfortunate things which I personally deprecate very much.

I do not agree with the honourable senator from Blaine Lake when he says that he does not like family allowances.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. Howard: I think the Family Allowances Act is one of the greatest pieces of legislation on the statute books.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I did not say I disliked family allowances; I did not say any such thing. I said there had been a big increase in the small loans business since the start of family allowances and old age security.

Hon. Mr. Howard: The honourable gentleman said they were the cause of the increase in the small loans business. However, I am glad the honourable member has changed his mind on that subject.

Honourable senators, I am willing to support the bill as it is, because I believe that the small loans companies fulfil a very fine and necessary function in the economy of Canada, and their operations are hardly to be criticized. However, for loans above $1,000, as I have stated, I think borrowers should go to the chartered banks.

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, I think I should say a few words on this bill, because I have been connected with the Caisses Populaires small loans organization for 50 years, and with other welfare organizations for 40 years. Before 1936 the interest rate charged by the small loans companies under this act was 3 per cent a month, I believe.

Hon. Mr. Howard: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: In 1936 the law reduced it to 2 per cent per month. That is enough— and not only enough, but I think it is too much. As we say in French, "C'est un mal nécessaire". But the statement that it is a necessary evil is not an explanation. The Caisses Populaires lend as much as $200 million and $300 million a year, one-quarter of it on short-term notes of from $1 to $300. We borrow our money at 5 per cent, and at the end of the year some Caisses Populaires—such as, for instance, the one at Lévis—will return a patronage dividend of three-quarters of one per cent.

The Board of Directors of this organization give their services entirely free. They labour for the benefit of the people without charge. I recall an occasion back in 1931 when the Caisses Populaires had a discussion with my honourable colleague Senator Euler, who was then Minister of National Revenue. We met him at his office and discussed the question of whether the profits of the Caisses Populaires were subject to income tax. We assured him, to his surprise, that the directors of the organization were working without remuneration in the interests of the common people, trying to teach them how to manage their incomes and thereby lead a more satisfactory life.

We are today facing the great threat of inflation. One has only to tune in the radio, watch the television or read a newspaper to learn of opportunities to buy goods without making a down payment. Many people in the lower middle class are attracted by advertising of this kind, and they do not always realize that when they buy something without paying any money at the time, they will be obliged to pay later. It is unfortunate that the federal Government cannot do something to control such credit arrangements, but this is a matter that comes within the jurisdiction of the provinces and must be settled by them. Regardless of whose responsibility it is to curtail credit, I believe very strongly that a customer should be required to pay at least 5 or 10 per cent of the value of an article upon purchase and to settle the balance within a reasonable time. I noticed just yesterday an advertisement by a small loans company headed "Vacation loans".

Hon. Mr. Howard: "Pay when you come back".

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Yes. Now, if the people in low income brackets do not have money to pay for a vacation before they go away, how can they have it when they return home, after having incurred additional expenses while away?

After the committee of the House of Commons which considered this bill presented its report I received a visit from a veteran. This is his story: Last May he borrowed the sum of $567.42 from one of the larger small loans organizations. His arrangement was to repay the amount in 24 monthly instalments of $30 each. That would have meant a total payment of $720, or an additional $152.58 by way of interest for two years. However, in May his wife took ill, and his circumstances forced him to interview the company to see if it was possible to suspend his monthly payments for four months. The company said that could be done, but that he would be obliged to repay his loan commencing September 1 in the amount of $40 per month for twenty months. Under that arrangement he would be obliged to pay $232.58 by way of interest on the $567. That meant an even higher rate than 24 per cent—it was about one-third of the principal amount. Under such circumstances the company explains that it is put to some trouble in changing his papers and so on, and so attempts to justify the high charges.

I recently had a visit from a man who had moved to Ottawa from London. While in that city he had borrowed from a small loans organization, and was making repayment in instalments on the 15th of each month. He found when he arrived in Ottawa that it was not convenient for him to pay on that date, and he asked that the date be changed from the 15th to the 18th of the month. The company said it would permit him to do that, but that the change in date would necessitate an extra charge of $2 per month. That, I think, is unjustifiable.

It has been said that if Parliament passes this bill the large companies will be able to carry on but the small ones will have to go out of business. An investigation conducted by the Insurance Department has indicated that passage of this bill will cause not more than 10 per cent of the small organizations to disappear. After all, honourable senators, we are here to protect not 50 or 60 small loans companies, but the people of Canada. Let us do our best for them.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Hawkins: Honourable senators, when I introduced this bill I indicated that upon its receiving second reading I would move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. Is it the wish of the house that it should be so referred?

Hon. Senators: Yes.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hawkins, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

INCOME TAX BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill 418, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill, which amends the Income Tax Act, reflects the budget resolutions which were brought down in April of this year. The bill contains some thirty sections, few of which have any relation one to the other. There is little in the way of principle running through the entire bill, and for that reason it presents somewhat of a problem to know how to explain it without entering into too much detail before second reading is given. However, if the bill receives second reading today I will move thereafter that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

A great many of the changes that are proposed in the bill arise out of decisions which have been handed down by various courts, including the Income Tax Appeal Board, and because I know the Senate has a very deep interest in not only the functioning but the original set-up of the Income Tax Appeal Board, I thought it might be interesting at the outset to say something about that board. As honourable senators know, it was established in 1948. From 1949 to 1955 some 2,463 appeals were filed with the board. Of these, 873 were allowed in full or in part and 1,265 were dismissed. To put it another way, of the 2,138 appeals which were disposed of by the Income Tax Appeal Board a little over 40 per cent were allowed in whole or in part and a little more than 59 per cent were dismissed. I have here a table showing the number of appeals filed in each of the calendar years from 1949 to 1955, the numbers allowed in part or in full, and the number of dismissals; and I also have a table showing the number of appeals disposed of by the board, by provinces. It might be of interest to honourable senators if these two tables were placed upon record, by unanimous consent of the house.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Will the honourable gentleman permit a question before he files the tables? Do they show the number of appeals lodged in each of the years referred to and still pending?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think perhaps a simple operation in subtraction would produce that figure. The number of appeals filed was 2,463, the number disposed of was 2,138, and the difference would be the number of appeals that had not been dealt with by the board. Perhaps that answers the honourable senator's question.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It does not mean that they are pending. They might have been settled.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It does not mean they are pending, nor does it always mean that they are settled, because I understand that the rule is—it is not observed in every case—that when there is a settlement the parties go to the board and get a consent order. Now, that is not always done but it is done in many cases.

The tables are as follows:

Calendar Year	Appeals Filed	Allowed in Part or in Full	Dismissed
1949	122	6	32
1950	423	62	196
1951	469	180	233

With a view to simplifying the explanation of this bill I would propose to deal with it under a few headings, under which I would group sections which appear to be related. I will deal, first of all, with sections which provide some relief for the taxpayer; secondly, with sections having to do with federal-provincial fiscal arrangements arising mainly if not exclusively out of the bill we passed here last week; thirdly, with changes in income tax law as it affects the petroleum industry; fourthly, with changes respecting pensions plans; fifthly, with changes respecting profit-sharing plans, and then with some miscellaneous provisions. that cannot be classified under one heading. And finally I will refer only to certain sections dealing with the handling of undistributed surpluses accumulated by companies.

Now dealing first with the amendments which provide relief, I would refer to section 6, which provides that the cost of oxygen shall be added to a list of the five medicines which are allowable as a medical expense under section 27 (1) (c) (vii) of the Income Tax Act. As honourable senators know, amounts expended for medical purposes in excess of 3 per cent of the taxpayer's income are deductible. The cost of oxygen will be now eligible for inclusion in this category.

Section 3 (4) of the bill allows the deduction of reasonable expenses incurred by a taxpayer in attending two business or professional conventions in any one year. He must, of course, provide vouchers. The conventions need not be held in Canada; they may be held here or in other countries.

Section 25 (1) of the bill allows a farmer's son who acquires his father's farm to depreciate the depreciable property of that farm by starting with the lesser of either the purchase price or the fair market value of that depreciable property. In other words, the sale between the farmer and his son is assimilated to an arm's length transaction, and the purpose of it is to promote the practice, which is quite common in the agricultural community, of allowing a father to dispose of such property to his son and to do so without imposing any burden upon the son.

Section 5 of the bill deals with allowances paid to the children of immigrants in the first year of their residence or sojourn in Canada. Under a vote of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, in the first year of the residence of an immigrant family in Canada the children under 16 receive an allowance of $5 per month. Now, for the purpose of the tax return of the parent, these immigrant children's allowances are assimilated to the position of allowances paid under the Family Allowances Act. As honourable senators know, if a child is not qualified to receive a family allowance, the parent or the guardian upon whom that child is dependent is allowed for income tax purposes a deduction of $400 for such child. If a family allowance is paid in respect of such child, the allowance is $150 per annum, and that $150 will be the allowance in the case of an immigrant father for whose child the payment of $5 a month is to be made.

Section 11 is also a relieving section. It reduces from six to four years the period within which the minister may reassess any return.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: What section is that?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Section 11.

Section 13 of the bill, also, is a relieving section. It extends from one year to two years the period within which a taxpayer may apply for a refund.

I come to the second heading under which I propose to discuss this measure. It deals with sections consequent upon legislation touching the fiscal arrangements between the federal authority and the provincial authorities.

As honourable senators know, in 1955 an amendment was placed in the Income Tax Act with reference to personal income tax exemptions allowed under federal legislation when a province levied a personal income tax. The present amendment provides for an abatement of 10 per cent of the federal income tax payable by a taxpayer who is resident in any province which levies personal income tax. Now, for a taxpayer who is employed or who carries on business in a province which levies personal income tax, the abatement is 10 per cent of the tax on the income derived by such taxpayer from such province.

Let me give an example of that. Say the income of a taxpayer from a province levying provincial income tax is a quarter of his entire income. The federal tax is levied on the entire income first of all: 10 per cent of the federal tax is then computed. A quarter of this 10 per cent is deductible under the section.

I come to perhaps the most complicated of all the sections in the amending bill;—those which deal with corporation income taxes.

Hon. Mr. Howard: What are the numbers?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Sections 4 and 9 deal with corporation income taxes and other special corporation taxes. As honourable senators know, the provinces have power to levy corporation income tax and other special corporation taxes, such as a place of business tax or a capital stock tax, because they are direct taxes competent for a province to levy. All the provinces which have had agreements with the federal authorities have given up, for the period of these agreements, the right to levy these taxes; but these agreements are about to expire, and by January 1, 1957 all will have expired. By this amendment the federal Government has increased the tax credit of 5 per cent and 7 per cent in the case of different types of corporations, as it now exists, to 9 per cent of a corporation's taxable income earned in any province.

Let me give an example of that situation.

If a corporation's income from a given province is $100,000, the federal rate now is 47 per cent. Under the amendment, instead of 47 per cent, it will be 38 per cent, or a reduction of nine percentage points. This credit of nine percentage points is given whether the province levies a corporation tax of 9 per cent or less. Say a given province levies a 6 per cent corporation income tax, and also imposes other special corporation taxes amounting to say 3 per cent of the taxable income of the corporation. In that event the corporation would pay 38 per cent to the federal Government and 9 per cent to the provincial Government. So in effect what the federal Government is doing by this rule is vacating these two portions of the corporation tax field, to the extent of nine percentage points.

There is a further factor to consider. If a province levies a special corporation tax plus a corporation income tax in excess of 9 per cent of the corporation's taxable income earned in the province, obviously there will be some double taxation. To reduce the amount of that double taxation, the excess of the tax paid to the provinces over and above the 9 per cent is allowed as a deduction in computing the income for federal tax purposes of that corporation.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Is that a distinction between the individual who is personally taxed and the corporation?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes; it is quite obvious that is the main distinction.

Let us take by way of example a situation where a corporation must pay to a province a 6 per cent corporation income tax and special corporation taxes of the character I have just described, such as a tax on a place of business, amounting to, say, 5 per cent of the income which it earns in the province. The total therefore paid to the province is 11 per cent of the income which it earns there. This is 2 per cent more than the 9 per cent tax credit allowable by the federal authorities. Now, say that that 2 per cent amounts to the sum of $1,500: under this amendment the federal authority will allow the company to deduct that $1,500 when it computes its income for federal tax purposes.

Hon. Mr. Euler: It allows that deduction from the income, not from the tax itself?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Not from the tax, from the income. It is a deductible expense allowed to the corporation.

Hon. Mr. Euler: It gets you coming and going.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes.

Hon. Mr. Howard: We shall need another Senate committee.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am glad the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) asked that question. It was a problem which gave me trouble. Originally, I had thought it was a deduction from the tax, and I believe there is a general opinion abroad that that is so; but it is allowed as an expense to the company paying the tax.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I do not think anyone can understand why it is done, except that the Government will get more money.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I suppose that is the reason.

So much for the amendments dealing with federal-provincial fiscal arrangements.

The next heading under which I would discuss the amendments proposed in this legislation affects the petroleum industry. The first of these is to be found in section 3, subsection 6. It arises out of a case decided by the Supreme Court of Canada in the fall of 1955 called the Home Oil Company versus the Minister of National Revenue. By way of preface I might say that the income tax law has always allowed the oil companies and the mining companies, first of all, to deduct exploration and drilling expenses incurred by them as a cost of doing their business, and, secondly, to claim a depletion allowance of 33⅓ per cent of the net profits from either oil or mining production. The depletion of 33⅓ per cent is given in view of the fact that in both industries the asset is considered to be a wasting asset. It was always believed that the law provided for these deductions to be taken in this order. It was also always believed, and it was the intention of the legislation, that the operations of an oil company or of a mining company should be looked at as a unit.

To shorten the explanation, may I say that the Supreme Court of Canada in the Home Oil case said: "Although that may be the understanding, that is not what the law says." The understanding of the department may have been that way, but the legislation did not say it that way and therefore this company and indeed any company for the years 1949 and 1950—because there were special regulations for those two years—is entitled to deduct its exploration and drilling expenses and its depletion allowances on the basis of its well-by-well operations. However, the Department resisted the argument through to the Supreme Court of Canada, and finally, having found that the decision was against it, the department now proposes to clarify the law by having it say precisely what it believed it stated before the litigation was undertaken.

I may say that the proposed amendments are to apply from the year 1956 on, and it is believed that the regulations in effect between 1951 and 1955 are in accordance with the understanding that has always prevailed in the Department of National Revenue.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Before the honourable senator leaves this clause will he deal with subclause (c) relating to coal? I understand that is a new provision; that the word "coal" is included.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I would ask the honourable senator to raise that question in committee. The section has to do with the allocation of depletion as between lessors and lessees in coal mines. It is a detail upon which the officials of the Department will give a much better explanation than I can here, if the honourable senator does not mind.

I come now to section 23 of the bill. Previously an oil company or a mining company which took over the business of another oil or mining company could get no benefit from the accumulation of pre-production expenses incurred for drilling and exploration by the company which was taken over. Under this amendment, it is proposed that this be changed and that in any one year, if the pre-production expenses are less than the income derived from the properties acquired, the company acquiring the business of the other company may take advantage of the amount of such accumulated pre-production expenses. Those expenses must be related to the properties which have been acquired by the purchasing company. In other words, it is now permissible to use the pre-production expenses of the acquired company up to the limit of the profits which are to be derived or are derived from the properties of the company which has been acquired.

This new rule is restricted to certain types of mergers which are described in the section and with which I will not further weary the house.

The next heading under which I would discuss the further amendments proposed by this legislation has to do with pension plans. As honourable senators know, under the regulations any money that is paid into a legitimate or recognized pension fund, either by an employer or by an employee, is exempt from taxation in the year in which it is paid into the fund. When it is paid out to the pensioners, the amount so paid is taxable in the hands of the pensioners. They are then receiving the pension benefits.

There are a number of sections in which honourable senators will find a change underlined, changing the word "approved" to the word "registered". These are sections 1, 3, 14, 29 and 30. Heretofore these legitimate pension plans have been described in the act as "approved" pension plans. I think the department is a little concerned that the word "approved" might carry the implication they are not only Government approved but perhaps Government guaranteed. So to avoid any possibility of that interpretation it proposes that the name be changed from "approved" superannuation or pension fund or plan to "registered" superannuation or pension fund or plan.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: May I inquire as to who will register? Will it be the insurance company or the employer?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Usually it is the employer company that takes the initiative in having a plan approved. Sometimes the plan is one that is worked out with an insurance company. Sometimes it is done simply by the employer and the employees establishing a trustee and paying the money into a fund. I think the important thing about these pension plans is the fact there must be a devesting by both the employer and employee of the moneys paid in to the pension fund, and a vesting in the trustee of the fund, so that the employer and employee lose all control of the money. The employee's benefits develop either when he reaches the pensionable age or when, for example, the plan is dissolved or when he discontinues his membership in the plan, and so on.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: How about a plan that is supported entirely by an employer? The income tax would not affect the employees in such a case.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): There are rules contained in a little blue booklet that deal exhaustively with the conditions under which plans can be approved for the purposes of the Income Tax Act. As I have already said, the plans are approved or registered by the department, and once a plan is approved and registered by the department, the payments that are made into it are deductible, whether made by an employer or by an employee or by an employer and an employee. The important thing, of course, is the deductibility from the point of view of the employer.

It was provided, I think last year or possibly two years ago, that the maximum amount which might be paid into a pension plan on behalf of an individual employee was $1,500 in any one year. However, some of the group plans make it impossible to determine on whose particular personal account some or all of these moneys may be paid in. So it is felt advisable to set an aggregate maximum beyond which payments cannot be made or cannot be recognized for deduction purposes under the act. The new rule is this, that the aggregate in any year can never be more than $1,500 multiplied by the number of employees under a plan.

Sections 12 and 21 deal with a new concept in the Income Tax Act, described as supplementary unemployment benefit plans. These are usually plans which result from negotiated arrangements between employers and employees, and, perhaps I may say, are related to the idea of the guaranteed annual wage. Under it, employers pay into a fund managed by a trustee an amount of money to protect themselves against the time when people who are covered by the collective agreement and by the supplementary unemployment benefit plan will be able to receive payments in the event of unemployment. If the money is paid into a trust fund of this kind the trustee is not to be taxed with any income which is received by the fund; the amount paid in by the employer is deductible from his income as a cost of doing business, but when it is paid out to the employees under the plan it is taxable in their hands, and if a tax deduction at the source is required, then that also must be made.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Who collects the tax from the employer who makes the return to the income tax authorities?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): If there is a tax deduction on the amount that is paid out by the trustee in the event of unemployment, that deduction would be made by the trustee and remitted to the Department of National Revenue, in the same way that any employer would make the tax deduction at the source from his employee and remit it to the department.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: May I point out that if you already have the moneys in trust the employer has no further control.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is right, the employer has no further control over the money. The employer is divested of the money; it is to be used in accordance with the plan itself and will only be disbursed by the trustee at the time the unemployment arises, and at the rate provided in the plan.

Now I deal with changes touching legislation affecting profit-sharing plans, and these are mentioned in sections 2, 3 and 20. As honourable senators know, a profit-sharing plan is different from a pension plan. The amount paid into a profit-sharing plan by an employer is a deductible expense of the employer, but it is taxed against the employees in the years in which it is paid into the fund.

The amendments provided this year are briefly as follows: Any recoveries from profit-sharing plans that are made by an employer are taxable in the year in which he might receive any of those benefits back. In the second place, it is possible for subsidiary companies to join the profit-sharing plans established by parent companies, and in this way I think the value of the plan, the solidity of the plan, might very well be strengthened considerably. In the third place, it is provided that gains, including capital gains and losses arising from the investment of funds held by a trustee under a profit sharing plan, are not to affect the employee's income or the tax thereon. In other words, if my employer paid $50 this year into a profit-sharing plan on my behalf I would be assessed with the tax on that $50 for the year in which it is paid in. If the trustee takes that $50, and perhaps thousands of other dollars, and invests the money in such a way that he makes a capital gain, the capital gain is not going to affect my tax position. My tax position is determined once the money has been paid in and I have paid my tax on that benefit, except for income earned thereon.

Under the new rules the employer can pay into a profit-sharing plan in 120 days from the end of a taxation year. Heretofore he has had to do it within 60 days.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Is that amount payable to the family of a deceased, in the event of his death, and if so is any succession duty payable?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think it would be an asset of the estate in the event of death. As to whether it is payable to the estate or the heirs would largely depend, I think, upon the provisions of the plan, because there is another amendment, to which I was not going to refer, but I will mention it now. Apparently there are plans under which an employee can get benefits and then may decide that he wants to drop out of the plan. Sometimes the benefits that have been built up for him in the plan cannot be withdrawn, but he has paid the tax on it. The department now proposes by a further amending section in the bill to allow him a tax credit of 15 per cent of the amount that is left in the plan which he cannot recover.

Section 24 of the bill deals with depreciation for railway tracks, railway grading and railway crossings. Heretofore, the replacement cost of these items was charged to expense. Now it is proposed that it be done under rules respecting depreciation. For the information of lawyers and accountants in the chamber, the class within which this will fall will be class 4 and the rate will be 6 per cent.

I come now to section 1 of the bill, upon which there has been a good deal of discussion. It provides that board, lodging and other benefits "of any kind whatsoever" received in the course of employment shall be taxable. This amendment arises in a curious way. A decision handed down by the Income Tax Appeal Board in the case called the Windsor Hospital case, held that board and lodging and "other benefits" means "any other kind of benefit". Subsequent to that, there was an off-the-record remark made in another decision of the Income Tax Appeal Board, by another one of its members, in which he expressed the opinion that what the lawyer calls the ejusdem generis rule should apply. In other words, he thought that "board, lodging and other benefits" might mean "board and lodging and other benefits like board and lodging". The department felt that if there was that doubt, it might result in some litigation, and that that expense should if possible be avoided. So it is being made abundantly clear by the words "board, lodging and other benefits of any kind whatsoever." That would take it out of the realm of doubt.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: May I ask the honourable gentleman if he can tell me what has been the practice of the department up to the present time in its interpretation of "board and lodging" from the standpoint of taxation?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I do not believe I can give an adequate answer to that question. I have read the explanation given by the minister in the other place. He said it was not proposed to change the existing practice. But, to my mind, there has never been any doubt about it: this legislation gives the department plenary power to decide what benefits an employee is taking in any given instance. That would include, I suppose, a casual Christmas present such as a turkey or small radio, or any other gift received by the employee, including money. Certainly, this is a basket into which everything can fall.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It could include the purchase of products by an employee at the employer's price as against the retail price?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, that could be included within this basket provision. It is far reaching, but in practice I understand it is not proposed that it should be so used.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Is it not also true that the department would have no discretion in the matter? That is to say, it would have to impose the tax in such circumstances as have been described, and the minister is given no discretion in the matter.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think most of the discretionary powers that were enjoyed by the Minister were long since taken from him; and perhaps I might add, largely at the instance of this honourable chamber.

Subsection 5 of section 3 also deals with board and lodging benefits, particularly as they relate to clergymen. This is the one exception proposed in the legislation. However I may say that clergymen, qua clergymen, do not acquire the benefit automatically; if, for example, they are teachers or professors they are not entitled to the benefit.

Section 28 contains a provision with reference to the solicitor and client privilege which might obtain in the event of documents being in the possession of a lawyer, or communications of any kind from a taxpayer client whose activity the department might be interested in investigating, and in the course of which the department might want to seize the records of the lawyer. Now the lawyer, knowing of the privilege—and it is the privilege of the client, not of the lawyer—can take advantage of a procedure and apply to a court and be relieved of the responsibility which he might otherwise have under provincial law by reason of the existence of the privilege. So far as the legal profession is concerned, I understand that the proposals carry the approval of a special committee of the Canadian Bar Association which has been dealing with the matter for a number of years, and finally this is the solution which has been adopted.

Honourable senators, I do not propose to discuss the details of the amendments dealing with undistributed surplus, contained in sections 22 and 26. I think those are sections which might properly and more helpfully be discussed in a committee when the officials are present. I am sorry to have taken so much time to deal with this bill, but I hope that by making the groupings that I have made, I have shortened the explanation to some extent.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Will the honourable gentleman permit a question? He has said there is a distinction between the amounts paid to a province by a corporation and those paid to a province under personal income tax levy. In the latter case I understand that an amount of 10 per cent of the federal tax may alone be deducted even though the taxpayer would have to pay twice that amount under provincial tax legislation. Is that the fact?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is right.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: May I ask a further question? Is there anything in the bill relating to pensions that may be purchased by self-employed people such as lawyers, doctors and other professional men, the cost of which may be deducted from income for tax purposes?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No, there is nothing in the bill with reference to pension payments made by self-employed persons such as professional people or small businessmen. That is a matter of the financial policy of the Government. I think there is great need for such a provision. That question was discussed at great length in the other place, and I understand the Minister said he was giving the matter consideration.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Honourable senators, arising out of the question asked by the senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard), it is interesting to note that I think for the first time action has been taken by the British Government in this respect. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his recent budget, introduced proposals for allowances for pensions purchased by self-employed people. I think it would be well if the Government would take note of what has been done and see whether next year the provisions brought in in the British budget could not be made applicable under similar circumstances in this country.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I quite agree with that suggestion.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, when explaining this bill the senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) said he found it difficult to discern some principle in the bill upon which he could reasonably discuss its overall significance. I have some sympathy with him when I discover there does not seem to be any particular principle running through the various clauses.

The bill contains some provisions of which I do not approve. I am not going into detail, because ordinarily the clauses should come under discussion more particularly in committee, and I presume this bill will be referred to committee. But I wish to make reference to one or two clauses. One of them makes a very fine gesture by providing that a farmer who has both a farm and a son may sell the farm to his son at a depreciated value. Is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is not right.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Well, it seems to me that is the most extreme sort of class legislation. I can see why a man might want to sell his property to his son at less than its real value; he might even want to give it to him as a gift. I can quite understand that fatherly feeling, but why in the world should the right to exercise it be allowed to farmers only? If I happen to have a son and a business—be it a grocery store, a bookstore or any other business—and I want to sell it to my son at a depreciated figure, why should I not have the same privilege as the farmer and his son are given under this amendment? This clause seems to me to be truly lacking in the right principle.

Then the honourable senator from Ottawa West described the consideration to be given to people who attend conventions: they will be allowed to deduct from their taxable income the expense of attending conventions, if they have vouchers, which they can get very easily. Does that arrangement also apply to an investor, to a person who happens to own stock in a company and who attends the company's annual meeting?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is not a convention.

Hon. Mr. Euler: But the amendment that seems to be the most inexcusable is this one: that if the income tax paid to a province by a corporation exceeds 9 per cent of taxable income—I think I am right—the excess may be deducted from the taxable income but not from the tax. But that excess of 9 per cent was taxation that was paid, so why should the corporation not be allowed to deduct the excess from the taxes instead of from the taxable income? In my opinion that is an indefensible case of double taxation.

That is all I have to say. I am not often very critical of this Government, but I have seldom seen a piece of legislation in which there are so many indefensible clauses on principle.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Did I understand the honourable senator from Ottawa West to say that a corporation carrying on a business in a province which has a corporation income tax may deduct from the tax which it pays to the federal authority an amount equal to 9 per cent of the tax which it pays the provincial authorities?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No, that is not what I said. What I said was that a corporation will pay to the federal Government not the federal rate, but 9 percentage points less than the federal rate, and then it will pay to the province 9 per cent of its taxable income, if it levies that much, or less than that, if it levies less than that. If the province levies more than that, then the additional percentage or amount is a deduction from taxable income, and not from the tax. That is not a simple clause. As a matter of fact it may be the core of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Bill that we discussed here last week, in so far as corporation taxes are concerned, but it is not a generally understood thing. I hope I have explained it faithfully.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, on the question of a point of order which was raised by the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler), I would point out that the principle of this bill, entitled an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, is reflected in each section. The bill has no general principle other than the necessity of raising money. I agree that a great deal of latitude has been given, but it must necessarily be given to the honourable senator who is charged with the duty of explaining such a bill to the house.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I am not objecting.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West), the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

SUPREME COURT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill 443, an Act to amend the Supreme Court Act and the Criminal Code.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill provides for the appointment of a deputy registrar for the Supreme Court of Canada and makes certain provisions regarding the bringing of appeals to the court.

Section 1 refers to the appointment of a deputy registrar. In the future there is to be a registrar and a deputy registrar of the court. At the present time there is only a registrar. One reason for the appointment of a deputy is that the work of the court, which is the highest court of appeal in our country, is increasing; another reason is the feeling that the judgments of the court should be prepared by an official of the court. This bill stipulates that the reports shall be prepared by the registrar or the deputy registrar. I believe the intention is that the deputy registrar shall do this work.

The next provision I wish to mention is contained in sections 2, 3, 4 and 5, which provide for the bringing of appeals. At the present time, in civil cases, an appeal can be brought where the amount involved is $2,000. It is proposed to increase the amount to $10,000. It is provided also that an appeal can be brought where the amount involved is less than $10,000, but only by leave, and application for leave is to be made to the court, of which the quorum is three, although of course more than three judges may sit. In criminal cases, at the present time, an appeal where there has been a dissenting judgment in a lower court can be brought only by leave, application for which is to be made before one judge. In capital cases, after this bill comes into effect, an application for leave to appeal must be made to the court, of which a quorum is five. In other than capital cases the quorum is three.

The remaining clauses are procedural, probably with the exception of clause 21, which provides that leave to appeal in criminal appeals now pending will be made to the court with a quorum of five. In one capital case only, application for leave is now before the court, and that application is to be heard by a quorum of five.

I believe, honourable senators, that sufficiently explains the bill.

Hon. John T. Hackett: In cases where there is not an appeal as of right, applications have, according to practice, been made to the court which rendered the decision. I speak now of the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is, in civil cases.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Yes. Where the appeal does not lie as of right to the Supreme Court, the petition for leave to appeal to that court has to be made to the court which rendered the judgment. There have been exceptions to the rule, but almost invariably the court which rendered the judgment has refused the petition, and an application for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court has had to be made to that court. Of course the proposed legislation, wherein the amount involved is increased from $2,000 to $10,000, will weed out most or many of the cases which have been carried from the provincial court of appeal to the Supreme Court.

As regards the right to appeal to the Supreme Court in capital cases, I am inclined to think the legislation entails duplication. Previously a judge of the Supreme Court determined whether or not there was a question of law at issue. If the whole question must be submitted to a bench of at least five—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In criminal cases, three, except in capital cases.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I am speaking of capital cases only. If the appeal can be heard only by the full bench, the case is bound to be argued twice before a bench of the same number, and as I say, it would seem to me that that is undue duplication.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Louder, please.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: The simple question of whether the issue presented is one of law or of fact should be susceptible of determination by any one of the learned judges. If there be a dissent on that question, there may be a recurrence of some of the difficulties which have recently not added much to the stature of the final court of appeal. One judge should be capable of determining, as he has in the past, whether the issue is one which can properly be heard by the Supreme Court.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourale senators, I regret that I could not hear the honourable gentleman who has just sat down. It sounds rude to shout "louder", but I wanted to follow his reasoning.

I am not at all satisfied with the bill. There is not much I can do at this time to correct it, but I regret that in this day and age there is not an automatic appeal in every case involving a charge of a capital offence. I think that in these cases there should be an appeal as of right: not only that, but the state should supply copies of the transcript of evidence, pay the costs, and provide counsel. We are dealing with a very serious matter when we deal with a capital charge.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: We are dealing with murder.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Quite right; and the accused may not be guilty; and until such time as he is proven guilty beyond a shadow of a doubt he has the right to ask and to receive the protection of the Government, representing his fellow-citizens. So he ought to have an appeal as of right. It should not be dependent upon whether he is capable of hiring a lawyer, or whether there is a question of fact or a question of law. That is another matter entirely. I am not addressing myself to civil matters; I am addressing myself to a criminal appeal involving a capital offence. I say that I regret very much that at this stage these appeals do not come as a matter of right. There are states in the American Union that are far advanced beyond us in this. They not only provide counsel but they pay the fee for transcribing the evidence and all other costs that are assessable. In such circumstances a man who is finally convicted probably has no one to blame but himself. He has been given the full benefit of the law. I hope that the next time we improve the act —and it needs considerable improving yet— more will be said in favour of providing for an appeal as of right to everyone convicted of a capital offence.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I am very glad to hear my friend the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) express these views. Recently there was tabled in the Senate a report from a joint committee of both Houses of Parliament dealing with the subject of capital punishment. The report contained the recommendation that after a conviction for murder there should be an automatic right of appeal, whether the convicted person raises his hand or not; that the transcript of evidence and the record, and so on, should be forwarded to the court of appeal in the province concerned, and that proper and adequate counsel should be provided.

The committee made the further recommendation that an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada should be an appeal as of right; that is to say, a convicted person may not choose to exercise his right, but he should have a right of appeal without having in the first instance to make an application for leave.

I agree in part with what the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) said, that if you are going to argue the matter of leave to appeal before five judges in the Supreme Court of Canada, it will be difficult not to have a full-dress rehearsal of all the facts and points involved. It does seem to be fanning the air a bit to come back before a court of five or seven judges, as the case may be, and then hear the case on the merits. I think it would be more expeditious to have an appeal as of right. It would be fairer from the public point of view, because the issue involved is one of the life or death of an individual.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I would point out that if the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I agree to a large extent with what has been said as to appeals in capital cases. My recollection is that the report of the joint committee of Parliament on capital punishment recommended that after a man has been found guilty of murder, the record, including the transcript of evidence, should be referred to the court of appeal of the province concerned. Just what that court of appeal would do with the record I do not know; neither do I recall if there is any direction in the report of the committee as to this. I presume that if the court of appeal felt a case should be reheard, a direction would be given to that effect.

It is also proposed that there be an appeal of right from the provincial court to the Supreme Court of Canada. Among the documents that have been recently tabled in this house is the report of the Fauteux Committee, which contains many recommendations as to the parole and the care of prisoners in penal institutions. These matters cannot be considered by Parliament alone, for many of them are the direct responsibility of provincial Governments. It has therefore been proposed by the Minister of Justice that a meeting be called between representatives of the provinces and representatives of the Dominion to go over that report very carefully. The cost of the administration of justice is the responsibility of the provinces. The Minister of Justice did not think it would be proper to recommend in this legislation, without consulting the provinces, that an appeal as of right be made from a provincial court to the Supreme Court of Canada. He did not think it would be proper to saddle that expense on the provinces without at least consulting them. The minister has assured Parliament—and I repeat his assurance—that this whole question will be reviewed, to see if it is advisable and feasible to have an appeal as of right from the provincial courts to the Supreme Court of Canada in capital cases.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, the question is on the second reading of Bill 443, an Act to amend the Supreme Court Act and the Criminal Code. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: On division.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed, on division.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION BILL

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill O-8, an Act to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved concurrence in the amendments.

He said: Honourable senators, I should point out that the chief amendment is to strike out section 6 of the bill in the form in which it was originally presented to this house. Section 6 repealed section 10 of the act and gave the minister the right to make certain regulations. Under the original act it was the Governor in Council that had the right to make the regulations. The Commons felt that the power to make the regulations should preferably be with the Governor in Council rather than the minister. Accordingly, they struck out section 6 of the bill, which has the effect of leaving section 10 in the statute in its present form.

Section 5 of the bill has been amended in part by the Commons consequential to their striking out section 6, because section 5 had a reference to section 10 as enacted by this bill.

Honourable senators, those are the two amendments and the purport of them.

The motion for concurrence in the amendments was agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill 448, an Act to amend the Customs Tariff.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is very short but the schedules attached are quite long. However, I will try to explain the bill briefly.

I would like first to deal with sections 2, 3, 4 and 5, and then come back to section 1.

Section 2 simply provides for the striking out of certain items in Schedule A to the French version, and reinstating them, because certain misprints occurred in the text in the course of the revision at the time of the consolidation of the statute.

Section 3 deals with item 1209, which in the Customs Act is entitled "Prohibited Goods", and which defines certain classes of prohibited goods. The amendment is necessary by reason of an order made under the Trade Marks Act and which came into force a year ago. Under item 1209, the customs officer could refuse to admit goods bearing a trade mark or name registered or held by some person in Canada. Under the new Trade Marks Act, section 51, the holder or user of a registered trade mark or trade name may secure a court order confirming his position. Then under the act proposed to be amended here the customs officer is entitled to refuse entry of goods bearing that trade mark or trade name.

Section 4 also deals with a revision of the French version; it amends Schedule C to the French version by striking out item 1215 and by inserting therein the item specified in Schedule D. The only change is that in the French version the word "or" should read "and", as in the English version. The purpose is to correct a misprint.

Section 5 deals with the date of the coming into force of the various sections. It will be observed that sections 1, 2 and 4 came into force on March 21, 1956, and that section 3, the section that is prompted mainly by the new Trade Marks Act, comes into force six months after the day on which Royal Assent is given, the reason being that people who heretofore were refused the entry of goods bearing a trade mark or name registered in Canada may go to a competent court and get an order to present to the customs officer upon which he may thereafter act.

I would be glad to tell the whys and wherefores of each item of Schedule A, but let me say generally that the main items dealt with in that schedule arising under section 1 of the bill have to do with rewording and clarification. In one or two instances reductions in duty are involved. In no instances are there increases in duty. In one or two instances the revisions are necessary because of decisions given by the Tariff Board and with which the Government policy does not agree, and therefore there is a clarification of the item so as to conform with Government policy and to get away from the judicial interpretation given by the Tariff Board.

If there is any particular item which any senator wants to refer to, I will try to give the reason for it, otherwise I propose to illustrate by referring to several items. I go first to item 137a, the second item in Schedule A. Last year there was a revision of the tariff item with regard to sugar and molasses, and all reference to molasses powder was omitted entirely. This item reinstates molasses powder. It has a small use in Canada, I understand, chiefly as a component of a paste in the preparation of ginger.

Items 409f and 409g apply to agricultural implements. It was felt necessary to restate the items because of an interpretation by the Tariff Board. Item 409f contains a long list of farm machinery and implements. Part way down the list the following words appear: "All the foregoing for use on the farm for farm purposes only". So that a particular list of machines and implements which are for use on the farm for farm purposes only are admitted under this item free of duty. Shortly after the war, I think, it was announced, as a policy of the Government that agricultural implements and parts thereof should be admitted free of duty. Item 409f concludes with the words "Parts of all the foregoing". This amendment, which was brought about by reason of a decision of the Tariff Board, makes it perfectly clear that parts of agricultural equipment as well as agricultural implements are entitled to free entry.

Item 409t gives double assurance with respect to certain classes of articles. That item provides for free entry of:

> Axles, belts and belting, bolts, chains, nuts, pulleys, washers; all the foregoing when for use with the goods entitled to entry under tariff items . . .

Then follows the list of tariff items which relate to agricultural implements or equipment. As I have said, this is for the purpose of giving greater clarity to the matter and putting beyond doubt the policy of the Government that agricultural implements in the broadest sense must be given free entry.

The next item to which I should perhaps direct attention very briefly is 425b. It deals with power mowers. Unfortunately, the wording in the budget resolutions was too narrow, in that when it spoke about power lawn mowers it did not cover articles that formerly were free, such as tractor-drawn lawn mowers. This item gives a broader description of lawn mowers, and applies whether the motive power is built into the machine or attached to it.

I would refer next to item 446k, which relates to tools. This item was rewritten because of a decision of the Tariff Board in April of this year, that tools made to fit specific machines or which are specific attachments, will no longer be classified under the item covering tools, but instead will be classified as parts of such machines. This of course would have the effect of reducing the duty very considerably, to the prejudice of the domestic manufacturer. For that reason, we have a new definition in item 446k.

I should like to refer next to item 618b, which deals with tires. This also occurs by reason of a decision of the Tariff Board. As honourable senators know, there are large sized, off-the-highway tires, used on excavating machines and equipment of that kind. It is intended that tires shall be considered as tires in all circumstances, and will bear the particular rate of duty prescribed. But by reason of the decision of the Tariff Board that off-the-highway tires should be classified as parts, they carried a lower rate of duty. This was undesirable in the circumstances, because tire manufacturers in Canada maintain their molds for these tires just as for all other kinds of tires, and the companies were being exposed to a kind of competition to which it was never intended as a matter of policy that they should be exposed. So, we have Item 618b written in the form in which we now see it. It will now be clear that only one item in the tariff applies to tires, and the duty is constant no matter what kind of tire is involved.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: May I ask if this particular item has been inserted to facilitate undertakings by foreign companies who are working on the seaway and other national projects? I believe the question arose when contractors attempted to bring in machinery being used in the prosecution of work for the Government. I now ask if that item was introduced into the tariff to meet that situation.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I cannot answer my friend's question, but I can tell him that the published purpose of what is contained in paragraph (2) of 618b is to meet a decision of the Tariff Board brought down early this year, in which it was held that tires on tractors, excavators and such off-the-highway equipment were parts and attracted a rate of duty of 7½ per cent, as against the most-favoured-nation rate of 22½ per cent under the tariff as it stood at that time. In order to make it absolutely sure that every kind of tire is covered I would draw attention to the opening words of paragraph (1), namely, "tires and tubes, wholly or in part of rubber . . ." without exception of any kind. Previously the item read "n.o.p." which means "not otherwise provided". So, where there is no exception, one looks nowhere else in the tariff for tires except at this one item, and it bears the rate of duty provided.

I should perhaps also refer to item 700, which is a rewording of the existing item and permits free entry for a limited period of time of displays where manufacturers or associations are holding conventions or meetings, and equipment is brought in for the benefit of those attending such gatherings. For a limited period of time the displays may be brought in free of duty; but the display material cannot be imported under this section by a commercial organization. It is allowed in in accordance with the limiting language of the item, namely:

> . . . for the purpose of display at a convention or a public exhibition, held by an association not engaged in business of a private or commercial character, at which the goods of various manufacturers or producers are displayed.

Under that limitation such goods may be brought in free of duty.

Honourable senators, there are many other items in the schedule which I could explain, but I think I have covered as many as I should. Perhaps I should have mentioned that some items have enjoyed—and in some cases for a number of years—a certain rate of duty under an order in council, which is a temporary provision. Five or six of these items are now being made statutory and are no longer dependent on the exercise of ministerial discretion by way of order in council for a limited period of time. You will observe that in one or two instances the time is extended on a temporary basis for a period of one year. Other than that, the items to which I have drawn particular attention are those which have some substance.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

TELEGRAPHS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, if I may now have permission to revert to reports of committees I would like to submit the report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on Bill 212.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

> The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to whom was referred the Bill (212) intituled: "An Act to amend the Telegraphs Act", have in obedience to the order of reference of August 7, 1956, examined the said bill, and now report the same without any amendment.
>
> The committee further report that the Deputy Minister of Transport, Mr. J. R. Baldwin, on the authority of the Minister of Transport, the Honourable George Marler, read the following statement to the committee:
> "After Bill 212 had been considered in the Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, it was found not to be practicable to exempt from the licensing requirement services and facilities for the transmission of communications that begin and end outside of Canada because, in a general way, substantially the same facilities are used for the transmission of communications that begin or end in Canada. In cases where the latter type of service may be licensed this common use of facilities is essential to efficient operation and will in the future apply to an even greater extent because of the tendency of cable companies to provide greater and more varied communication capacity in fewer cables.
> The proposed regulations have as their purpose the effective regulation and control of external submarine cables for the transmission of communications that begin or end in Canada, and subject always to this overriding purpose recognition will be given in the drafting of the regulations to the principle that the terms and conditions of licenses will not restrict or interfere with the transmission of communications that begin and end outside of Canada."

The report was adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I move the third reading now.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, first of all I want to congratulate the Chairman of the Committee on Transport and Communications (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) on his handling of the committee this morning.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I was very well pleased. I also liked the way in which the leader of the house (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) freely called witnesses before the committee, so that we had a full and frank discussion of the whole matter.

However, these things do not persuade me that the bill should be passed. I say quite candidly and honestly that I do not think this bill should be passed in its present form. That was my opinion when the bill was voted on in committee, and I voted against it. True, it was a minority vote. But I wanted to register my view that the licence should not be granted by the Governor in Council at all. I think the rules and regulations by which a licence should be granted should be set out by statute in cases of this kind.

Secondly, I submit that an appeal from a refusal to grant a licence should be to a commission. It was suggested that this should be the Board of Transport Commissioners, but any other equally impartial board would be satisfactory. It is true that these boards are appointed by and are responsible to the Government, and that the Government can remove them if it wishes to, under certain conditions. But there is a difference between a board granting a licence and the Government itself granting a licence, and I must say that I feel—although I may be wrong—that there was some desire that the minister himself should have the doing of it. He said he did not think the responsibility was sufficient to necessitate a reference to the whole cabinet. That is a wrong attitude. It is quite plain from representations we received that there are companies operating in the cable business which are afraid of this legislation; they think it is an attempt to exercise control beyond the provisions of the act under which they were incorporated some years ago.

For these reasons I object to the bill. I do not like to see legislation like this going through. I believe in free enterprise, and I believe that the ordinary individual who starts a company should have the right to conduct his own business and not be controlled by the Government. If the Government wants to go into the business let it go in on a basis of equality and have no favouritism. There is no use denying the effect of Government influence here. Some day a different Government may be in power but regardless of who is in power, we should not have to depend on the individuals comprising the Government.

I oppose this bill quite openly. I am not angry at the Government for the way it has handled things. I have made that quite clear. It is quite an open case. I have no objection to the way the bill has been handled in this house, which is very satisfactory to me, but I am not convinced of the fairness of the legislation and therefore I am opposed to it.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Honourable senators, I will not attempt to repeat what I have already said. I am opposed to the legislation, not because it has not been discussed, not because we are bound by majority rule—there is no question about that—but because there is an underlying philosophy which makes it clear that good government separates the legislative function from the administrative function. When a creature of the Government finds itself in a rivalry with private enterprise, and makes the rules and then determines how they shall be applied, I submit that there is a breach of the elementary philosophy of good government.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I would remind the house that if the honourable senator speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Perhaps I should say a word, in view of what has been said by the two honourable senators who have preceded me.

First, I want to thank the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) for his kind remarks about my conduct of the proceedings of the committee, as chairman. This morning and early this afternoon we had a full, free and frank discussion during a period of nearly four hours; and during the latter part of our meeting the Minister of Transport made a very clear statement with respect to this bill.

This is one of the cases which are bound to arise, and which occur quite frequently under our present system, wherein the Government is itself engaged in a class of business through one of its creatures—in this case the Canadian Overseas Telegraph Company—in competition with private corporations. This bill has to do with the regulation of overseas telegraphs; and in addition to the Canadian Overseas Telegraph Corporation, which is a Government creation under the control of the Minister of Transport, there are two private companies involved in the business. One is the Western Union Company, the other the Commercial Union Cable Company. Both of these corporations made representations to the committee. The Western Union Company feared that the purpose of the bill was to interfere with the business which it primarily carries on, namely, the transmission of messages from one point outside Canada to another point outside Canada, but touching Canada on the way. The minister authorized the deputy minister to make a statement to the committee—which he did, and which was read by the Clerk a few minutes ago—to the effect that it was not intended by the regulations to be set out under this bill to interfere with messages of that kind. That was the reason for the rather unusual procedure which was followed in the report—a procedure for which I do not remember any precedent during my years in the Senate—that is, the inclusion in the report of a statement made on the authority of the minister as to the manner in which he would interpret the legislation if it is passed. But the Western Union representatives wanted some record of the statement for which they had asked, and which the minister had made, as to the way in which the regulations were to be administered. The minister agreed to have this statement appear on the record, although, of course, the question is not one relating to the law, but a matter of good faith.

The other company, the Commercial Union Cable Company, which has a long history of ownership and operation of a cable between Canada and Great Britain, extending back, I believe, to the year 1886—

Hon. Mr. Hawkins: 1884.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: —was, I think, basically apprehensive that the power of regulation which the minister seeks under this bill —a power to regulate these companies after they have started their operations, and during the course of their operations—was intended as a means of favouring the Government company at the expense of the private companies. I suppose a suspicion of that kind is bound to occur in cases such as I have described, where the Government, as a regulatory body, is in the dual position of a judge and of one of the parties regulated. The minister explained to us that in his view the modern development of telegraphic communication is such that he feels he should have some measure of control over the current day-to-day operations of the telegraph companies. The only control he has under the act as it stands is that, when the cable is initiated, his approval of the construction and laying of the cable must be obtained: at that time he can make such conditions as he sees fit: After the cable has been laid pursuant to his authority, he has no further control. He felt that for general reasons he should have some measure of official control over the operations of the cable companies, but he assured the committee that there is no intention to prejudice the operations of the private companies in the interests of the C.O.T.C., that there is no desire on the part of the Government to create a cable monopoly, and indeed he pointed out that had the purpose been to make a monopoly the Government would not have proceeded through legislation of this kind, but through a direct act of Parliament to expropriate the private companies.

That was the general purport of the proceedings of the committee. I must say that there is something to be said on both sides. I admit I felt that there was some point to the suggestion that, rather than have these regulations made by the Governor in Council, they should be promulgated by an independent body such as the Board of Transport Commissioners. The minister explained, however, that these regulations, dealing with overseas cables and so on, relate to international matters with which the Board of Transport Commissioners is not competent to deal. But he did hold out hope that on some occasion in the future an independent body may be set up which will have charge of the making and enforcing of regulations over the whole field of communications. Well we had to be satisfied with that and, generally speaking, I thought the minister made out a reasonably good case for the bill. I certainly felt, after hearing his explanations, that the fears of the private companies were, to say the least, exaggerated.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, the question is on the third reading of Bill 212, an Act to amend the Telegraphs Act. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Haig: On division.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed, on division.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

NOTICE OF MEETING

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment of the house may I point out that although many of us have been in session almost continuously since 10.30 this morning, a meeting of the Banking and Commerce Committe is scheduled for 8 o'clock this evening. Our time may be almost fully occupied until then, for another meeting is to be held at 6 o'clock. However, in spite of all our engagements the chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee (Hon. Mr. Hayden) would like to proceed with his meeting at 8 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, we all want to get through our business as soon as possible and we have worked pretty hard today. Could we not agree to dispose of one bill in the Banking and Commerce Committee tonight and deal with the other one tomorrow morning at 10.30?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That would be a matter for the committee to decide.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The committee would want direction from the honourable gentleman and from this house.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It would be difficult for me to be at the meeting when it commences its sitting at 8 o'clock, but I shall speak to the chairman of the committee about it.

Hon. Mr. Haig: We shall be there at 8 o'clock.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, August 9, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., Hon. Thomas Vien, P.C., Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

SMALL LOANS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the report of the committee on Bill 51.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom was referred the Bill (51) intituled "An Act to amend the Small Loans Act", have in obedience to the order of reference of August 8, 1956, examined the said bill, and now report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hawkins: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, the bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE ACTING SPEAKER

TRIBUTES TO HON. THOMAS VIEN, P.C.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, my information is that His Honour the Speaker will return to the chamber tomorrow and preside over our sittings to the end of this session. At this time I should like to express to the honourable senator from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Vien) our appreciation of the very gracious and capable manner in which he has presided over our proceedings during the Speaker's absence. We are fortunate to have a man of his capacity and experience in our midst. I am sure I speak on behalf of all members when I say that we very much appreciate his service to us during the last few days.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John. T. Haig: Honourable senators, I wish to join the Leader of the Government in expressing to the Acting Speaker our appreciation of the way in which he has presided over the deliberations of this house during the last few days. It is very gratifying to know that there is someone among our members who understands the rules of procedure so well does the honourable senator from De Lorimier.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I am extremely grateful to the honourable Leader of the Government and the honourable Leader of the Opposition for their very generous expression of appreciation of my humble effort, and to you all for your very gracious applause and for the honour that you conferred upon me in calling upon me to discharge the functions of this very high office. I wish to extend my sincere thanks to all honourable senators.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

RESOLUTION OF APPROVAL

Hon. James A. MacKinnon moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of Parliament do approve the International Wheat Agreement opened for signature at Washington on May 14, 1956, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Honourable senators, when the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) asked me to speak to this resolution, I thought he did so because he knew that for eight or nine years, as Minister of Trade and Commerce, I had to do with this problem, among others. I had wished to take this opportunity to refer briefly, first, to the production of wheat, which comes under the authority of the Department of Agriculture, and then to the work of the various committees in the Department of Trade and Commerce which have to do with the wheat problem. I accepted it as a compliment and a privilege to be called upon by the honourable leader to speak on this subject. I have always appreciated my official duties in this connection. During my term of office I used to fear question time in the House of Commons, because invariably there was a barrage of questions from the Opposition groups relative to difficulties connected with the handling of wheat, and I had supposed that when I left the other place to come to join this venerable and august body my days of worrying over the wheat question were pretty well over.

Let me first explain how the Department of Trade and Commerce comes into the wheat question. The department has, of course, no direct responsibility in connection with the production of grain; that pertains to the Department of Agriculture. The Department of Trade and Commerce comes into the picture when the wheat raised in the grain producing areas of Canada is delivered to country elevators. The Board of Grain Commissioners takes charge of the wheat to start with, and then the Canadian Wheat Board takes over. When I was looking after this problem, as Minister of Trade and Commerce, we had a committee of the cabinet consisting of myself as chairman, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Finance and others. Among this group were the Honourable Mr. Dunning, the Right Honourable Mr. Gardiner, the Right Honourable Mr. Ilsley and the Honourable Senator Crerar. There was also an advisory committee consisting of the heads of the various western farm organizations and representatives of various aspects of the wheat trade, including producers, shippers, millers and so on. I believe the personnel of this committee, if it is still functioning, is composed of actual producers and heads of western farm organizations.

Many people look upon Canada as being the greatest wheat producing country in the world. Perhaps this is because we hear so much in Canada about the wheat problem generally. It was of interest to me to learn authoritatively that China is actually the leading wheat producing country, followed in order by Russia and the United States. If my information is correct I understand that until recently both France and Canada produced approximately the same amount of wheat, some 400 million bushels a year. Latterly, however, Canada's production of 500 million and more has exceeded that of France.

Canada is an exporting country. We have to export our surplus wheat, whereas many of the countries I have mentioned consume their own wheat supplies. I was going to refer to these matters in more detail, because I thought they might be of interest to honourable members, but the time is late in the session and I am not going to go further into it now. However, I would like to refer to the good work done by the Department of Trade and Commerce officials—by the deputy minister, the assistant deputy minister and the Civil Service officials generally. Incidentally, I have never met nor heard of any better Civil Service than we have in Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: And I never had any happier years in my political life in Ottawa or Edmonton than those I spent as Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Honourable senators, in supporting this resolution may I give a brief explanation of its purpose and benefits to Canada. The text of this agreement was tabled in the Senate on June 26 of this year. This is the third such agreement, the original having been in operation for four years from 1949, and the second renegotiated in 1953 for a three-year period.

In order for this agreement to enter into effect it was necessary that, of the countries convened in conference, exporting countries making up more than two-thirds of the guaranteed quantity and importing countries in like proportion had signed between May 14 and May 18, and by July 16 had deposited, an instrument of acceptance or notice of intention to do so by, at the latest, December 1, 1956. The following countries undertook these provisions, and thereby the agreement became effective August 1, 1956, for a three-year duration: Argentina, Australia, Canada, France, Sweden, United States, Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Germany, Greece, Guatemala, India, Israel, Italy, Japan, Korea, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, the Netherlands, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Peru, the Philippines, Portugal, Switzerland, Union of South Africa, Vatican City and Yugoslavia.

I wish to give a short review of the various International Wheat Agreements. As honourable senators are aware, exporting countries are obliged to make available their guaranteed quantities only at the maximum of the price range established, and importing countries are committed to accepting their quota only if prices are at the minimum of the range. Under the 1949 agreement, the established range of prices was a maximum of $1.80 per bushel, and a minimum which began at $1.50 in the first year and declined to $1.20 in the fourth year. The annual amount guaranteed to Canada was 203 million bushels. For the entire duration prices remained at or near the maximum, the result being that Canada supplied virtually the entire quantity stipulated. For the three years of the agreement, commencing in 1953, the price range was higher, namely, a minimum of $1.55 and a maximum of $2.05 per bushel, with Canada's share reduced to 150 million bushels annually. The reduction in quantity was largely the result of the withdrawal of the United Kingdom. Prices fluctuated within the range, so that neither were exporters obliged to make available guaranteed quantities nor importers to accept. In fact, the volume of business conducted under the terms was only slightly in excess of half of the committed amounts for the three-year period which ended on July 31 this year. In the present agreement prices have been nominally reduced to a range of $1.50 to $2.00 per bushel and, while still subject to minor change, the amount available to Canada is in the neighbourhood of 100 million bushels.

I definitely do not wish to over-estimate the benefits to Canada of the agreement now in force. The quantity is too low to offer an effective market outlet for normal levels of Canadian wheat exports. Nevertheless, I believe that the majority of Canadian producers favour continued participation. Certainly the principal farm organizations of the Prairie provinces, the presidents of which acted as advisers to the conference, gave their support to the terms of the renewal. There is no doubt that the best possible deal was made. One of the major benefits derived is the stability which this agreement helps to achieve in establishing world wheat prices. It also offers a valuable forum for a continuing examination of the wheat trade picture by participating countries.

It is gratifying that a major exporter, the Argentine, has for the first time undertaken to participate. This will allow the closer liaison which I am sure is welcomed by exporting and importing countries alike and is a change of significance from the previous emphasis by the Argentine on bilateral trading agreements.

The decision of the United Kingdom again to stay outside of the wheat agreement seems regrettable. Its importance as the major wheat importer could have given the element of stability and guidance to the operation of the agreement which, it appears, the importing countries as well as exporters would have found mutually advantageous. However, despite the position taken, there is confidence that Canada will continue to be a major supplier to the United Kingdom.

It is extremely interesting to observe that most importing countries see merit in a continuation of an international wheat agreement. This strongly suggests that the majority of countries, whether importers or exporters, desire a measure of stability in the wheat trade of the world. The price range of $1.50 to $2.00 per bushel for the length of the agreement is to Canada the more tangible benefit than the possible level of sales under the agreement. For this reason, together with the many indirect advantages, I commend the agreement to the house for its approval.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask my honourable friend a question or two? What is the total number of bushels involved in the agreement?

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: As far as Canada is concerned, 100 million bushels.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I was wondering what proportion of the total Canada has.

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: The guaranteed sales for the exporting countries are as follows, in round figures: the Argentine 14 million, Australia 30 million, Canada 102 million, France 16 million, Sweden 6 million and the United States 132 million.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I merely wanted to know what was Canada's position in relation to the large exporting countries like Australia, the Argentine and the United States.

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: We are second.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Will the honourable gentleman permit a question by a mere neophyte? Why has Britain not signed the wheat agreement? Is it because the price is considered too high?

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: I would have liked very much to have an opportunity to discuss this particular point with the advisers, but I can go back to my own experience in the department and say that when we were negotiating sales of wheat to Great Britain there was naturally constant effort by the purchasers to keep the price low, and Great Britain thought that the price would eventually go lower. I think it is a fair statement to make that that thought is back of the hesitation on Great Britain's part to enter into this agreement.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Was the failure of Great Britain to enter into the agreement due to a dispute over the difference between $2 and $2.05 a bushel?

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: No, I think not. I have no doubt, as I said, that Great Britain will be purchasing large quantities of wheat from Canada. As a matter of fact, she has assured us she will be doing that, and at the world price.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I am speaking of the agreement. I understood the honourable gentleman to say that Great Britain is not joining in the wheat agreement for the second time.

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: That is correct.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Was her failure to become a party to the agreement due to a matter of price?

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: I do not think so. I think Great Britain prefers to wait and see what the future will bring.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Are we able to say that as much wheat was sold to Britain when she was without the agreement as would have been sold had she been in it?

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: Well, it is difficult to make a definite answer to that question. But, I think there is a certain amount of truth in the suggestion made by the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett).

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, on the occasion of the negotiations which took place in New York with respect to the former wheat agreement, Great Britain for the first time refrained from entering into the agreement. She held out for a maximum price of $2 a bushel. Everyone believed at that time that she would have signed the agreement if her proposal of $2 a bushel had been accepted. I recall having met in the hotel the head of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool on his return from New York, where he had been sitting in on the negotiations, and I said to him, "You are going to have to accept the $2 in order to bring Britain in". He replied, "Oh, no, we will get our $2.05". I expressed the view that he would not get it, and I begged him to accept the lower price. At about that time I rose in this chamber and said that I hoped Canada would not let 5 cents a bushel stand in the way of concluding an agreement with Great Britain. As we all know now, it was decided to hold out for $2.05, and Britain did not sign. I have always been told, and I believe it is the fact, that had we met Britain's price she would have signed the former agreement, and would have no doubt joined in this one too.

The honourable senator who moved this resolution (Hon. Mr. MacKinnon) is quite right when he says that an agreement of this kind between the exporting countries is all to the good. We in western Canada feel that it has a stabilizing effect on our economy.

The honourable senator also said, and I think it has been reiterated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that we are selling wheat right along to Great Britain for just as good a price as if she were under contract.

I think it should be said that western Canada produces the best quality wheat in the world, and many of the other countries must have a certain amount of our good wheat to mix with their product. For that reason we are fortunate, when we escape damage to our crop, in producing the best wheat in the world.

Dealing with the general wheat question, I have read some statements about the distribution of box cars which alarmed me considerably. We are told through the press that the number of box cars available limits the shipment of wheat through Churchill to 17 million bushels. That statement was to some extent endorsed by the minister himself. Now, honourable senators, that is an entirely improper supposition. I have never felt that Churchill was being used to the extent it might be used. But, as I have said before in this chamber, there is a great variation from season to season. Every farmer knows that you cannot set any limit to the length of a season. For instance, spring may be early or it may be late. So with the fall. There is the same uncertainty as to the length of the annual period of operation of the port of Churchill, and it is on forecasts of the navigation season that insurance rates are based. Insurance is really the main factor that makes it possible to ship wheat through Churchill at certain times; no wheat can be shipped through that port unless the insurance rates are reasonable.

This year the end of the navigation season has been extended five days. There are some seasons when shipping can be carried on with perfect safety well past the normal time of closing the port for the winter. Ice conditions are a criterion in opening and closing the port. But now we have ships equipped with modern radar devices, and planes and helicopters can be used in the charting of navigation conditions. So I believe that, with the help of an efficient ice-breaker, the port of Churchill could and kept open for five months of the year and possibly even for the entire year. I understand that the number of icebergs floating around in the strait is declining year by year, but in any event the strait can be navigated even when ice floes are there.

It is interesting to know that a group of British millers who travelled across Canada a year ago said they preferred wheat which came to them through the port of Churchill to any other wheat. They said it was better wheat and cost them much less.

I may have mentioned this before, but it will bear repeating. The man in charge of the elevators and machinery at the port told me they were equipped to handle 10 million bushels in their storage elevators. They have machinery to unload four cars of grain at once, and the loading facilities, the harbour, and the sheds are among the finest in the world. The first elevator that was built had a capacity of only 2½ million bushels, but during the past year a new elevator of the same capacity was added. The machinery and plant there are capable of handling another 5 million bushels. I personally think that 50 million or 100 million bushels could easily be shipped through the port of Churchill in any one year. I was talking to the captain of a ship which arrived in Churchill and was loading 400,000 bushels. He said that the shipping firm for which he worked had 17 ships and would be willing to send them in there for wheat, but he asked where the wheat to load them could be obtained. He said there are plenty of ships available and the shipping firms and the captains like the route. As a matter of fact, for 300 years old wooden sailing ships went in and out of there without any difficulty whatever.

One of my objects in rising today was to disabuse anybody's mind of the idea that the capacity of that port is limited to anything like 10 million bushels a year. I repeat my belief that 100 million bushels could be shipped out, because the navigation season could very well be extended. Advance information as to weather conditions could be relayed to the insurance agents, so that they would be able to vary their rates according to the weather conditions, ice conditions and so forth. It was not long ago when late in the season there was no more sign of snow and ice at Churchill, or in Hudson Bay than there was in the Ottawa River. The port was open until December and shipping could have been carried on until that time.

In closing, let me say again that the western farmers are disappointed that Britain was not included in the International Wheat Agreement. But they are in favour of the idea of stabilization, and, as the honourable senator who introduced the resolution said, because of the agreement they have a better chance of securing information on conditions throughout the wheat growing countries of the world.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Will the honourable senator from Edmonton (Hon. Mr. MacKinnon) permit me one more question? If Britain had signed the agreement would she have been precluded from purchasing wheat at less than $1.50 per bushel?

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: If Great Britain had signed the agreement she would have been protected by the ceiling price and the grain growers would have been protected by the floor price. Great Britain would not have had to buy more than the amount committed for; but as she is now buying, and a change might occur in the market, it is quite possible that she might be paying in excess of the ceiling price here, because we sell to the British miller and the British miller buys our high grade Canadian wheat to mix with inferior wheat for bread-making purposes, and there is a continuing market for Canadian wheat there.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: But if I understand the honourable senator correctly she could not buy wheat for less than $1.50 per bushel?

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: That is right. But a great deal depends on conditions. It is just possible that some serious situation might arise that would affect the price of wheat, but that is not expected, and there is nothing on the horizon whereby this agreement would be affected as regards the floor price and the ceiling price.

The motion for approval of the resolution was agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. David A. Croll moved the second reading of Bill 449, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill amends the present act in two respects, both of which are rather important. Honourable senators will be glad to know that it received unanimous support in the House of Commons. It was praised in all quarters, and for a very good reason: it makes a significant and important change and is a long forward step to something which I think all of us wish will come about in due course. It brings under the act all people engaged in fishing: fishermen on both coasts, and those engaged in commercial fishing in fresh waters.

I think it is appropriate that I should give the house a few facts by way of background. A year ago the Unemployment Insurance Act was thoroughly looked into in the House of Commons. I have before me a report which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of June 1, 1955, which reads as follows:

> The Government held out hope last night that some of Canada's 66,000 fishermen may be provided coverage under the Unemployment Insurance Act.
> Labour Minister Gregg told the Commons Industrial Relations Committee that he and his officials will try to find out how many fishermen might be brought under the act and that this number would be provided coverage as soon as possible.
> He said he wants to look at the matter further before making any recommendation to the cabinet.
>
> Mr. Gregg's remarks followed a motion by Dave Croll (L—Toronto-Spadina) that the Unemployment Insurance Act now being studied by the committee, be amended to provide insurance coverage for the some 6,000 fishermen who are paid a regular wage.
>
> The motion was not put to the committee and the matter was left for further study.
> STRONGLY PROTEST EXCLUSIONS
> At the afternoon sitting, the committee was almost unanimous in protesting exclusion of fishermen from coverage under the act.

That explains my association with the fishermen. I assure honourable senators that in so far as I have been able to find out there are no fishermen in Toronto-Spadina, although one of my honourable colleagues points out that we used to fish for votes there very successfully.

This insurance is a matter of welfare and a matter of right. At the time the subject was under discussion in the other place the minister gave an undertaking that he would look into it, and it is gratifying to know that he was as good as his word. He studied the subject, as did the Unemployment Insurance Commission, and the Government was willing and anxious that the recommended changes be made. In consequence this bill is before us.

I do not deny that there are in this field great administrative problems. It is intended that contributions under the act as amended shall commence about the first of April 1957, the beginning of the next fiscal year, and that the benefits provided for will be available about the first of January 1958.

As I have intimated, the bill is a progressive measure, a step towards universality in unemployment insurance. The act as amended will cover more than 50,000 fishermen. There still remain, however, about a million workers, including those employed on farms, hunters, trappers, teachers, government employees, those working in public hospitals, and some domestics, who are not covered; so there is a considerable way to go yet. Though a plan is here formulated, it will take time to work out a detailed practical method of giving limited coverage to persons whose main occupation is fishing, including the self-employed, those who work on a share basis, and those employed by others.

As the act stands, for those engaged in fishing seasonal benefits only could be made available. This legislation will provide for collection of contributions from and on behalf of fishermen who are not employed for wages. So I am able to state emphatically that this will become the first instance in which self-employed groups are covered by insurance. It is anticipated—though at the moment I cannot speak on this point with too much authority—that the purchaser of the catch will be assumed to be the employer, and in the case of those who work on a shore basis the owner of the boat will be regarded as the employer. I would not try to teach a grandmother to suck eggs, and, looking about me in this chamber, I shall not do too much talking—for obvious reasons—about the fishing industry. It is carried on in a variety of ways in different parts of Canada. Thus, to meet all conditions, a very detailed and carefully drawn plan is required; but as I have said, it is expected that one will be worked out in time to permit contributions from fishermen to commence at the beginning of the next fiscal year. That will qualify them for benefits by January 1, 1958. That is all there is to the first amendment, except that the job of setting up a detailed plan will get under way. I am sure I share the views of this house that the Unemployment Insurance Commission will be able to work out a suitable plan. It has solved more difficult problems in the past and I am sure it will be able to deal with this one.

The second amendment arises in a curious way. Last year the act was completely overhauled and extensively revised. It was not then realized that it would impose stringent restrictions on the unemployed. That, of course, was not the intention. Everyone, including the officials of the department, was surprised by the practical results and there was considerable suffering, due to disqualification under the new act. It has been suggested that almost 90,000 claimants were disqualified, although about 90 per cent of them were able to draw seasonal benefits. The Government was quick to recognize the hardship that was caused and so this bill is being presented. I have used a considerable number of words, but what I am trying to say to this house is that we on the committee that dealt with the Unemployment Insurance Act last year pulled a boner, and it was a little too late to correct it. When we put the act into effect we found it did not do just what we thought it would do. The mistake is now being corrected.

The act that was passed last year brought on hardship, for it provided in effect that persons who become unemployed and claim benefits every year have to acquire 30 weekly contributions every year in order to qualify. Now, the amendment before the house will permit these people to requalify if they make 24 or more contributions during the preceding year. The amendment will permit a large number of those who were unable to qualify last fall to be brought within the act, and it is anticipated that almost 90 per cent of them will be brought within the act. Because of the limitations that our climate imposes on certain industries, many persons must of necessity confine their work to industries which are unable to provide as many as 30 weeks of insurable employment in any year. In 1955, when the act went into effect, 45 per cent of the people failed to qualify in October, November, December and January; whereas in the same period in the previous year only 29 per cent failed to qualify. It can therefore be seen that a considerable number of people were inadvertently disqualified. That was a result of the amendment.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: In what industries were the workers affected?

Hon. Mr. Croll: In all industries across the board. Everyone was affected as a result of the amendment.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Civil servants too?

Hon. Mr. Croll: They do not come under the Unemployment Insurance Act. I should point out that by lowering the qualifying period to 24 weeks the benefit period will be shortened from 15 weeks to 12 weeks.

Honourable senators, that is all that is contained in the bill, except for a few minor amendments which are necessary in order to bring the act into harmony. The Unemployment Insurance Fund is as solid as a rock. I commend this bill to honourable senators as good, progressive legislation which is worthy of their support.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Do I understand that under one of these amendments a fisherman will have to work for 24 weeks in order to qualify?

Hon. Mr. Croll: No. Fishermen are not at this moment covered. They will not be covered until the bill becomes law.

Hon. Mr. Horner: It would be difficult to bring the fishermen of western Canada into such an act. We have some lakes out there that are fished on a quota basis. The fishermen are allowed to catch only so many pounds of fish, and when the season closes many of the lakes are completely closed to fishing. I know that in one lake the quota was 250,000 pounds, and before the officials were able to get around and weigh the fish, the fishermen had already caught their quota. In many of the lakes the fishing season does not last sufficiently long to permit the fishermen to qualify under any form of unemployment insurance.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): I didn't know they had that many fish in western Canada.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Oh, yes, but there is a quota restriction. Restrictions are imposed to protect game fish at summer resorts, and so on. If fishing was permitted to continue beyond certain seasons, it might result in wiping out such fish as the jack, pickerel and whitefish. Incidentally, for the most part whitefish are caught with nets. It is only in rare instances they will go after a fly, but they are a fine fish and are shipped in large quantities to New York and other centres.

To amend the act is all very well. The unemployment insurance plan is being abused, and no doubt with the extension that is being suggested in this bill it will be further abused. Pretty soon farmers will want to come under the act. They find it difficult to get help because of unemployment insurance regulations. Many people would rather get work where they can collect unemployment insurance stamps, which will enable them to draw unemployment insurance benefits in the winter months. A farmer may say: "I am kind of foolish. Look at that fellow. He just works during the summer and he takes it easy all winter, but I have to work the year round, taking care of the livestock and everything else on the farm. I am going to get a job where I can draw unemployment insurance benefits."

So unemployment insurance is not working out as gloriously in our national interests as we might be led to believe. I certainly have my doubts that it is wise to extend the benefits to fishermen, for they are men who otherwise would find other employment in their off-season. Nowadays when the fishing season is over they are willing to take other employment, but if they come under the act and the fishing season lasts long enough for them to accumulate unemployment insurance stamps, they will say, "We will take it easy in the winter and draw unemployment insurance benefits". Possibly that is not good for the men who try it, and certainly it is not good for the economy of the country.

Hon. John J. Kinley: Honourable senators, I do not want to let the occasion pass without saying a word on this bill, for I regard it as a step forward in the fishing industry.

Some hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: It was refreshing to hear the honourable member from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) speak in the interests of the fisheries. My honourable friend said he had fished for votes, and in congratulating him I want to say that he always came in with a full fare.

The senator to my right (Hon. Mr. Horner) said he doubted if the fisheries should come under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Well, years ago I was interested in compensation for fishermen, and I met with a great deal of opposition from those who said that fishermen work on shares and not for wages and therefore are not employees. Then I was told that there would be difficulty with regard to adjusting the details of administration. I said I thought we could overcome that difficulty, and got it arranged that a contract could be made on the shore which would be maintained at sea, and then the fishermen came under the Workmens' Compensation Act. Since that time, of course, social legislation has made great progress.

I always felt it was unfortunate that our fishermen could not share with the rest of the working population of Canada the benefits of unemployment insurance. We at least got to the point where the merchant marine could derive benefits from it. When I tried to bring the matter forward I was told that it was difficult to arrange the details of administration. However, I contended then as I do now that the man who works at sea should be entitled to the same provisions as the man who works on shore. The fisherman is not a partner, but he is a sharer in the sense that he shares in the work of the fishing industry, though he does not share the losses and is subject to discipline. He is, rather, a piece worker. It is beneficial that he be a sharesman, because you cannot obtain good fishing results with hired men; there must be an incentive and a willingness to work without regard to hours, and men must extend themselves to the point where they will make a success by a combination of the efforts of the owners and the fisherman.

For many years the fishing industry was a co-operative system whereby the fishermen shared according to the success of the occupation, and that brought Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, to the very forefront of the fishing industry in Canada. I think anyone who goes to Lunenburg will say that it is a splendid town; no one is rich, but there is no poverty, and we have an economy which we think does us credit. We think this has been brought about by the working together of all our people for a purpose expressly applicable to the Maritime provinces. Our people live by the sea, and our success depends upon the sea. Progress demands that conditions be as in other industries; that is, a sub-grade industry must be made into a successful industry. Before Confederation, men who came from Newfoundland discovered that our deep sea fishing fleet was eminently suited for employment. The fishermen would come in the summer and fish in our vessels, and return to Newfoundland in the fall. Later, Newfoundland became a Canadian province, and these fishermen found they could work wherever they wished in Canada. During the summer they work on the Great Lakes with the merchant marine, return home in the winter, and draw unemployment insurance benefits, and so do better than they would in the fishing industry.

We believe the fishing industry should be preserved. In order to keep good men in an industry you must make the industry worth while; you must provide good conditions for the men—labour must feel that it is not engaged in a sub-grade industry, that it is treated on terms of equality with the rest of the people in Canada. For that reason we have striven to have fishermen brought under the Unemployment Insurance Act, not for the benefit of fishermen exclusively but for the benefit of the whole industry. It must not be forgotten that without good men to manage the industry, and without experienced crews, the fishing industry would fail. Today our fishing vessels are equipped with the finest type of machinery and refrigeration, and good transportation carries fish to distant markets so that it arrives at its destination fresh. This means that the fishing industry is active the whole year around, and there is no question of the deep sea fisherman staying ashore during the winter in order to draw unemployment insurance benefits. However, the fisherman still works as a sharesman. It is not very difficult to find out what he earns. A railroad man who runs so many miles, and works overtime, finds no difficulty in computing his earnings, and a fisherman is in a similar position. We felt it would be a simple matter to find out what a fisherman earned, that is, anyone engaged in deep sea fishing, and that applies to a large part of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

Then there is what is called the shore fisherman, and the man who works individually. His position has not been so good, and his earnings have generally been small. However, his position is improving, for he is able to obtain government loans and buy bigger boats. Three or four of these men will go on a boat and they will share, but one of them is the master. If they call the boat a vehicle for unemployment insurance purposes, that will be all right. On the coast of Nova Scotia there is also the little fisherman, who fishes at the time of year when the lobster season is open, or when herring and mackerel are running, and then he turns to the ground fish.

Hon. Mr. Horner: May I ask the honourable member a question?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Horner: If these people are able to fish all the year around they would not need unemployment insurance, would they?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Well, the purpose of unemployment insurance is to give stability to the home life of a man and his family.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If a man takes out fire insurance he does not expect to have a fire.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: We need this unemployment insurance in Nova Scotia. For many years I went up and down the coast of that province, visiting the homes of fishermen, and I would see old men who had spent years in the fisheries and had become dependent on the young people. Old age pensions gave relief to the old. Then we got compensation for the fishermen. That was a salutary measure. In one season we lost 80 men at sea from my county, and compensation was paid to their widows and families. But when I brought the question of compensation for fishermen before the Legislature in Nova Scotia I was ahead of the time. The fishermen were not convinced of its merits, and the owners were against it. After a storm on Sable Island I ran in an election, and in a large fishing district my support was almost unanimous.

Obviously, fishermen appreciate assistance by way of social measures; it is a redistribution of the wealth of the country, so to speak. We are thinking and doing things now for the stabilization of conditions in the country which we never thought of in earlier years. We believe that the old people, as they go down the hill of life, should be looked after, and so we have provided old age assistance for them. We believe the young people growing up should be made strong citizens, and for their benefit, we have a system of family allowances.

Honourable senators, if you were to travel through the fishing districts in Nova Scotia today and compare them with other days, you would be surprised at the important progress that has been made in schools, housing and general accommodation. The fisherman, with a family of perhaps seven or eight children, appreciates an opportunity to share through these means in the abundance of this vast land; and we as representatives from the province of Nova Scotia feel that we should support this sharing, because it is good for the country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I have always realized that there might be some difficulty in devising a scheme for the payment of unemployment insurance to fishermen, but I have never thought it was anything to worry about. I have been too long in politics not to know that when there is reason for delay the Government moves slowly, and when it wants to do something it usually finds a way of doing it. The Government feels that this is the time to take the step we are now taking. We from Nova Scotia feel that the fishermen of our province should get this kind of assistance, so that they will not return home in the winter season, or during lay-offs or refits, to unemployment. Of course the deep sea fisherman is kept busy all year, but the shore fisherman has a lay-off period between seasons. The passage of this bill will mean that fishermen will share in some of the benefits available to men on the payrolls of other industries.

Not long ago a fellow came to me and asked for a job. I said: "You are a fisherman. Why don't you go fishing?" He told me in some detail how he had fished for twenty years, but that fishermen got no fringe benefits, no holidays with pay and no unemployment insurance, and that the men who worked in town got better pay. I pointed out to him that our industry depended on the fishing industry, that if there were no fishermen going to sea there would be no need for vessels or equipment. Well, he seemed to think that I was trying to persuade him to go and work where other people did not choose to go.

In days gone by when two fishermen had to face the open sea in a small dorry, it was then a most hazardous occupation. But with the use of machinery much of the hazard has gone. We do not lose many men in the fishing industry today. True, they work hard and they must maintain their place in the fleet. We want them to have a stable future, with the right to share in unemployment insurance benefits along with other workers in Canada.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I was a member of this Senate when the first unemployment insurance bill was introduced, I think in the year 1940. I took a keen interest in the measure when it came to us, and I have followed closely the various amending bills that have been submitted to us from time to time. In fact, I think I had the privilege of explaining one or two of them to the Senate in earlier years.

I must say that, speaking by and large, I think this has been one of the most useful and progressive pieces of legislation in our time. I have been delighted, as the years have gone on, to find that it has been possible to include among those eligible for the benefits of unemployment insurance larger and larger segments of the working population of our country. And I am indeed glad to see by this bill that it has now been found possible to provide for at least certain segments of the fishing industry.

This question has been considered, I know, for some years, and on several occasions we were told that the difficulties of introducing unemployment insurance in the fishing industry were so great that it was impossible to devise any scheme of more or less general application. I am glad to know that the difficulties appear now to have been overcome.

There was one point about which I wanted to ask my honourable friend, and perhaps he would touch on it when he closes the debate. He mentioned the unemployment insurance fund and said that it was in very good shape. I have no doubt about that, but I wondered as a matter of information whether he has the figures on the total assets of the fund for the last two or three years, and if when he replies he could give us those figures.

Hon. John T. Hackett: Honourable senators, I might speak for the farmers, but I shall not. We have seasonal occupations throughout this country: there were the icemen who had a seasonal and paying occupation until natural ice was supplanted by the scientific production of cooling devices; there were the longshoremen, who laboured when ships were laden and unladen; there were the ships' carpenters, who came from all over Quebec, and hordes of other skilled men who worked four or five months of the year on the ships that came to our port, and then returned home when the ships ceased to ply.

I shall not go further. But I say to the honourable gentleman from Queens-Lunenburg, (Hon. Mr. Kinley) that he should have reminded his friends who sought employment with him that they must consider that the day would come, and was not far off, when they would be called upon to make contributions to the unemployment insurance fund, and that that would mean more taxes, and that taxes always go through a process of reduction when they are garnered and paid up; and that all this would mean a growing class of tax gatherers, distributors and middle men who have to be paid out of taxes which weigh upon the taxpayers who inevitably contribute to this type of beneficence. There is something to be said for it; but is much to be said against it.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, if the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I want to thank honourable senators for their observations and the manner in which they welcomed the bill. There are really no questions to answer, and there is nothing further that I can contribute except to supply the information about the fund requested by the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett). I have here a statement of receipts and expenditures from July 1, 1941 to May 31, 1956. It is an interesting table, and I would ask permission of the house to put it on our record. For your information, I would say that in 1950 the total of the fund stood at $582,646,972.52 and at present it stands at $854,198,518.59.

With the permission of this house may I place this on the record?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

EXCISE TAX BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill 450, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is an amending bill which comes before us each year incorporating changes in rates and other items. I propose dealing first with the various tariff items which are affected, and then with the item that creates Part II of the Excise Tax Act and which has come to be known as the magazine tax.

If you look at section 1 of the bill you will see that we have had and will have until this bill becomes law a premium tax of 2 per cent under the Excise Tax Act, which goes to the federal treasury. That is a tax on the premium income received by all fire, life and casualty companies other than marine. This amendment proposes the repeal of that provision. I should state, although it does not appear in this bill but appeared in an earlier bill dealing with federal-provincial tax relations, that this item of premium tax is being left available for the provinces to use, if they so wish, and under the so-called tax agreements the premium tax, if utilized by the province, is defined in such a way as not to be a corporation tax for purposes of that agreement. I understand only one province in Canada, namely Quebec, imposes a premium tax at present.

Section 2 retains the premium tax of 10 per cent. It is a tax that is payable by an insurer on the amount of the premium that he pays for insurance which he places with a company not licensed to do business in Canada. Now, that is an existing provision in our law and it has been there for years. Section 2 makes it clear that the repeal of the 2 per cent premium tax does not affect this 10 per cent tax. Then there are incidental amendments for the purposes of clarity in the application of the 10 per cent tax. As to just how valuable or effective some of the efforts contemplated in this section will be in enabling the Government to collect the 10 per cent, I do not think it is necessary for me to express any opinion at this time.

If we pass on to the top of page 4 of the bill, we see that section 4 provides for an amendment to one of the sections in the present Excise Tax Act. It is a section which describes how to arrive at the basis of value of an article for purposes of calculating sales tax, and it also provides for the insertion of a third item. The other two items now in the act are by way of additions to the price. This third item is by way of a reduction in the price, in that to arrive at the value you are entitled to exclude certain fees paid by the manufacturer to the Government for inspection, marketing, stamping or certification thereof in respect to capacity, accuracy, standard or safety, if such fees are shown as separate items on the manufacturer's sales invoices.

Section 5 of the bill simply adds several more items to a list of articles that are made specifically exempt from sales tax. The new section 32 (3) provides for the exemption of articles which are of the character of casual donations. For example, some person from outside Canada may send to a person, or may order to be delivered to some person in Canada something by way of a present, and if the value does not exceed $10 the goods are exempt from sales tax.

The other tariff item deals with articles for exhibit in public museums, libraries and schools, and violins manufactured over one hundred years ago. I am sure that is an item which will be very often used!

Hon. Mr. Hackett: In the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Also antiquities produced prior to 1847. Tariff item 705 covers settlers' effects. These are items that are added to section 32 of the Excise Tax Act as a further list of exemptions from sales tax.

Section 6 deals with schedule I. It provides a long list of items which are made subject to special rates of excise tax. Section 12 of schedule I is repealed and re-enacted, although the only change is that which is underlined towards the bottom of the page. Under Schedule I as it now stands, in section 12, subparagraph (c)(iii), articles of china, porcelain, earthenware, etc., are subject to a 10 per cent excise tax except where they are sold or imported for use exclusively in the manufacture of electric lamps or where they are for use in the preparation or serving of food or drink. In subparagraph (c)(ii), immediately preceding, articles of cut glassware, crystal glassware, cut or not, etched glassware, or metal-decorated glassware, were dealt with, and there was no exception; that is, the 10 per cent excise applied in all cases.

By this amendment it is intended to exempt such articles from the 10 per cent excise tax when they are used in the preparation or serving of food or drink.

By section 7, schedule III of the act is repealed, and a new schedule is substituted. Schedule 3 of the act is a great and happy hunting ground for our people, because it is a schedule of exemptions. By reference to the underlined items it will be found that many articles are added to the list of exemptions, because under the scheme of the act the sales tax is imposed on all goods which are produced, manufactured or imported, and then the exemptions are set forth in the schedules and in particular sections of the act. Some of these items are specifically dealt with, and appear to be additions and amendments to the schedule, whereas actually they have become necessary because of Tariff Board decisions of a restrictive character. For example, under the heading of "farm and forest" one sees "boxes for farm wagons". For years these boxes were regarded as coming under the general exemption of agricultural materials, but recently the Tariff Board made a ruling that certain boxes are not part of a farm wagon and therefore become subject to sales tax. So, under the bill, boxes for farm wagons are specifically exempted in their own right, and no future question can arise as to their right to exemption. Another item I might cite is poisons for pest control purposes. Originally the exemption was of chemicals used in this way, but since poisons are quite commonly used now for pest control, "poisons for pest control purposes" are exempt. And so on through the list, which represents quite a number of additions to the schedule of exemptions. I do not propose to deal with them, because it is simply a matter of reading them to see what they are.

Section 8 provides for the date of coming into force of these various provisions; and it also deals with one item with respect to which some confusion was bound to occur, because, whereas cast iron soil pipe and cast iron fittings appeared heretofore in the schedule of exemptions, in the budget debate it was announced that this item was being amended to become more inclusive because substances other than cast iron are now used for soil pipe and fittings. But it was found on further consideration that to broaden the section in this manner caused too great administrative difficulties, because pipes other than cast iron for soil purposes have so many different applications.

It was then decided to revert to the original language, namely, "cast iron soil pipe and cast iron fittings therefor". The reason for dealing specifically with this item is that the provision was brought into force at the time the budget came down. So it has been necessary to correct the situation that may have resulted in the interval.

I have dealt generally with the amending provisions, but there is an addition, under section 3, Part II, entitled "Tax on special editions of non-Canadian periodicals". That has come to be known as "the magazine tax"; and so much has been written and talked about the question of whether we should or should not tax particular magazines that I would be piling up an unnecessarily large addition if I attempted to develop in any detail what this is. But I think I should state, very briefly, that by section 9 it is intended to impose a tax of 20 per cent of the value of the advertising material contained in a special edition of a non-Canadian periodical published in Canada.

First, I should state what is a special edition of a non-Canadian periodical. The definition appears at the top of page 3:

(b) "non-Canadian periodical" means a periodical published outside Canada by a person resident outside Canada.

That seems plain enough. Then:

(e) "special edition of a non-Canadian periodical" or "special edition"—

—those expressions are interchangeable—

—means a periodical printed in or outside Canada for publication in Canada

(i) containing editorial material at least twenty-five per cent of which is the same or substantially the same as editorial material contained in one or more copies of a particular non-Canadian periodical . . . and

(ii) containing any advertising material that is not contained in such non-Canadian periodical.

There is an exemption in the case of a periodical if the editorial material contained in it is devoted principally to religious or medical purposes.

Hon. Mr. Power: May I ask the honourable senator for a definition of "editorial material"?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It is defined in the bill as meaning "any printed material other than advertising".

Hon. Mr. Power: Does it include new material?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: "Any printed material other than advertising". You deduct from the periodical what might be described as advertising, and the rest is editorial material for the purposes of this section of the Excise Tax Act.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): Strictly speaking the word "editorial" is not all-embrasive. There is a distinction between editorial material and news material.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Not under this bill.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): But there is a distinction in the publishing business.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): I suppose the definition cures that.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The statute provides its own dictionary. To interpret the taxation section you have to give the words the meaning that are given in this section of the bill, not any outside meaning.

Hon. Mr. Power: Is "periodical" defined also?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes. The dictionary is complete. A periodical means "printed material, unbound or paper bound, printed and published at regular intervals not less frequently than four times a year and bearing dates of issue".

Hon. Mr. Euler: A page of jokes in Reader's Digest, for instance, would be regarded as editorial material?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, that would be editorial material.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: What is the purpose of the imposition of the tax? Is it to get revenue or to protect Canadian publications?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I do not propose to express any opinions in relation to this tax. All I propose to say is that the announced purpose was to protect what would be called Canadian national magazines. The theory underlying the decision to impose this tax proceeded along the following line.

At the end of the war these special editions as defined in the act accounted for about two-thirds of the magazines of general interest read in Canada. They now amount to 80 per cent, because the Canadian publications are down to 20 per cent. The Canadian counterparts would come under the heading of Canadian national magazines, publications of general interest reflecting Canadian thought, culture and, I suppose, news. In most cases these publications were having a difficult time to make any money, and it was felt that the special editions of non-Canadian periodicals were able to attract to themselves more advertising, both from outside and from within Canada, and were therefore enjoying an advantage over the Canadian publications. The theory was that they were paying less for their editorial material than were the Canadian publications. Frankly, I understand the meaning of this group of words, but I find it a little puzzling to believe that writers for American publications are not alert to the value which they may put on their articles; and if they are selling their articles to an American magazine which is a counterpart within the description of a special edition under the act, I cannot understand why they would not measure their selling price with an eye on the expanded circulation by reason of distribution in Canada as well as in the United States. However, that is just a passing remark of mine.

My main purpose is to inform honourable senators of the basis upon which it was decided to impose this tax. The Minister of Finance realized there might be many problems inherent in the imposition of this tax. I suppose one way of looking at a special edition would simply be that it is a branch office of an American company carrying on business in Canada. I am sure that if it were generally known that any principle was being established by the Government to enable Canadian companies in competition with branch offices of American companies operating in Canada to get relief by a special tax against the American branches operating in Canada, or in some other way, it might prove to be very embarrassing. But the minister faced that question, and in the course of a statement in the Commons he said:

> We have been considering this problem for some time, and we have decided that, in this field, very exceptional measures can be justified—measures that certainly could not be justified in connection with any ordinary line of business or commerce.

It was recognized that you were walking a pretty narrow line and that there was quite a risk of creating a precedent that would broaden the line, and so the Government, as a matter of policy, has taken this step as a calculated risk and hopes to be able to hold it to these particular magazines. Whether the tax is justified or not is no part of my exposition to the house. It is an announced policy of the Government as contained in the budget resolutions.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Would the honourable senator permit me to ask him a question at this point? With regard to this group of "non-Canadian" publications that are being taxed, I suppose that as far as any branch factory of American ownership is concerned—and there are many of them in this country—it would be correct to say that none of these branch factories in essence is Canadian. They are non-Canadian if you apply the standard that is being applied here to the branches of American publications that have established offices in Canada. In other words, an exception is being made of two or three publishing institutions which happen to be branches in Canada of American ownership. Am I correct in that assumption?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I think what the honourable senator has said is correct. One of the conditions required to satisfy the definition of a non-Canadian publication is that it must be published outside of Canada by a person resident outside of Canada. As to my honourable friend's parallel of a branch of an American company operating in Canada, certainly the carrying on of that business by an American company in Canada would be the carrying on of a business by a person resident outside of Canada. But that is a broader application of the principle than might be involved in this bill, if you were free to conclude that the imposition of the tax under this section is based on a principle. I think the minister in his language has been very careful to avoid, or to attempt to avoid, for his purposes, any tying of the imposition of the tax to any principle from which you might reach a set of facts such as the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) has just stated. The minister said: "Considering the problem, we have decided that in this field very exceptional measures can be justified". I must accept the minister's purpose. As a further aside, I might say that I have recently had it demonstrated to me—and I expect it has been demonstrated to other senators also—that when a rigid resolution is brought down and legislation implementing it is passed by the Commons we must conclude that it contains a pronouncement of Government policy to the extent that, while we may point out its difficulties, we are not expected to interfere lightly with it.

May I add further that if you were looking on the side of competition there was an added explanation given in the Commons. Apparently it was agreed by every person that if all that was happening was that the American editions of Time and Reader's Digest—these two periodicals being two of the special editions of the kind referred to—were being exported to Canada and distributed in Canada, Canadian magazines would be in a fair position to meet the competition and would not require any favours; but it was because of the fact that they were being published and distributed in Canada within the terms of this definition, gathering up advertising material that competitively was not available to Canadian magazines, and also taking away from Canadian magazines advertising material that was attractive to these other magazines because of their popularity.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: They have an unfair advantage, for they do not pay tax or contribute anything.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I am not attempting to argue this thing or to express an opinion one way or another, but I am interested when my friend says that they do not pay taxes. I take it that my friend means that the American companies distribute their wares in Canada. There must be something wrong if they do not, because an American doing business in Canada is subject to corporation tax in Canada on the volume of business he does here and the profit he makes, just as a Canadian is.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: But they are not doing business in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: This tax is imposed whether the publishing is done inside or outside of Canada, if it satisfies this definition, so I do not know how you can fail to do business here if you bring in your American material and plates, and then develop your additional plates for the Canadian advertising and produce a product which you distribute in Canada. Certainly that operation would be subject to tax.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: They do not all do that.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I am not saying they do, but in those cases at least I say they do.

Hon. Mr. Power: To qualify for this definition, must there be a certain proportion of editorial material that is of Canadian origin?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: There must be at least 25 per cent of editorial material of outside origin. In other words, they must lift out of their American publications at least 25 per cent of the editorial material that they put into the Canadian edition; and there must be adverising material in the Canadian edition that is not in the American as well; those two elements must be satisfied.

Another principle urged in support of this tax was the necessity to encourage Canadian magazines, and one cannot quarrel with the statement that we wish to encourage Canadian magazines of Canadian interest, reflecting Canadian thought and appeal. What would have to be weighed is whether that is enough to justify a tax of this kind. Fortunately, that decision has been made by the Government as a matter of policy, and it has decided that there are the various elements which justify the special and extreme measure which has been taken in this case. Those elements are the extent of the occupation of the Canadian field by the so-called special editions, their ability to gather in advertising material to the detriment of Canadian magazines which might be competitive in the field, and the assumption that the editorial material used in the special editions costs less to the publisher of the special edition than similar editorial material would cost to the Canadian magazine publisher in his preparation of it, the theory being that they make use of the counterpart of some or all of the material in the United States, and that therefore their costs for using that and incorporating it in the special edition are less. That may be true; I do not know.

Honourable senators, that is the basis for the tax. The application of it is very simple. It is 20 per cent of the value of the advertising material, and there are provisions for the minister making regulations so as to give him all the necessary information in returns, etc., so that the tax would be easy of imposition. I do not think it is for me to express an opinion one way or the other as to the advisability of dealing with the problem in this way, admitting that there is a problem, but the Government apparently pursued this matter for some time, and it is represented in the material that I have that a very thorough study was made. As a result, you have this method of solution, and here it is for us to decide whether or not we are going to approve it.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Can the honourable gentleman say whether any diplomatic representations have been made concerning this legislation?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That question would be more properly addressed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), because I am not in a position where I would learn of any diplomatic representations.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Then I will ask later.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to discuss what is called the magazine tax, but if anyone could justify such a tax it is the honourable member from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden). However, he has not attempted to justify it, and certainly I am not going to try to do so. I am more interested in the provision of Part 1 which has to do with the passing over of the taxing of insurance premiums from the federal Government to the provinces. Some honourable senators may recall that I discussed this tax on former occasions. The history of it is this: originally, the federal Government taxed insurance companies at 3 per cent on their premium income, but at that time there was no income tax on corporation profits. I expressed the view that a tax on premiums was an improper method of taxation. Of course, I agree that insurance companies should be taxed, as are other companies, on their profits. But an insurance company might have a very large premium income, as many of them have, and might at the same time lose money on its operations. I have in mind the case of an insurance company which paid a premium income tax of about $100,000, and lost $50,000 on its business operations.

It may be argued that premium tax is another form of sales tax. But it is not a sales tax as it is applied to commodities generally. When a manufacturer pays sales tax on an article, he passes that cost on to the customer, a wholesaler or retailer. The Government is unlikely to allow the tax to be added to the final price to a customer, although, I believe we had at one time what was known as a luxury tax on the final price, but the customer was able to see exactly what he was paying. The insurance company might be able to pass the tax on to its policyholders by adding the tax to the premium, but, politically speaking, I do not think any government would want a company to send to its policyholders notices of premiums due with an added item for premium tax. That would be politically unsafe.

About eight or ten years ago—I think the Right Honourable Mr. Ilsley was Minister of Finance at the time— it was decided to bring insurance companies under the corporation tax. That policy was, I thought, sound and proper. Previously the companies had paid only a premium tax of 3 per cent, with no corporation tax on profits. As I say, the Government decided to make the companies subject to tax on their corporation profits, which I felt was sound and fair, because I could see no reason why insurance companies should be treated differently from other corporations.

The insurance companies up to that time did not complain about having to pay a premium tax of 3 per cent. True, they did not like it, but it meant that they had escaped corporation tax, and the one pretty nearly equalled the other. Then the insurance companies became liable to pay corporation taxes, and the premium income tax was retained but was reduced to 2 per cent.

I contended then that it was quite unfair to apply the corporation tax and to retain even the reduced premium income tax as well. I opposed the proposal to the extent of moving before the Banking and Commerce Committee that the premium tax clause should be deleted from the bill, and we had a good debate on it in committee. There were at that meeting the Acting Minister of Finance, the Director of Income Tax and the Superintendent of Insurance, all of whom were against deleting that clause because it was in a Government bill. Notwithstanding their opposition, the motion to delete the clause carried in the committee.

That evening I spoke to some of my friends who had supported me in the committee, and I said "Watch out for what happens tomorrow morning, when the committee resumes". To put it in ordinary language, we beat them again. The bill was reported to the house with the amendment that the premium income tax clause be deleted. But, for reasons which I will leave to honourable senators, when the report came to the Senate it was defeated by about four votes. Some of my supporters were absent at the time.

I notice by the bill that the matter of premium income tax is now left, as my honourable friend has said, to the provinces if they wish to make use of it. I am a little afraid they will do so. I see little reason why there should be a tax on premium income. The only reason I can think of for its use—and it is not a very good one—is that it is one more way of getting revenue.

I can only hope that the insurance companies which are affected, and who now will have to deal with the provincial Governments, will find them a little more fair, a little more just and approachable, and that they may not choose to avail themselves of this source of income.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I should like to refer to Schedule III to the bill, which contains a list of foodstuffs exempted from sales tax. This raises a rather favourite subject with me. It may be recalled that two or three years ago I made a motion—and my friend from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) who has just spoken supported me—that margarine, being a food like butter and many other things named in this schedule, should be exempt from sales tax.

Well, margarine bears sales tax at the rate of 10 per cent. It is somewhat of an anomaly that it does not appear in this list. My feeling is that margarine is not in this list because up to a certain date it was not a commodity that could be legally sold in Canada. I believe that if it could have been legally sold in Canada 25 years ago, or when this list was compiled, it would have been included. However, the Government has refused to add it to the list for a reason which I think is known to almost everyone. How absurd the whole thing is! Looking at the list, one observes that, generally speaking, all foodstuffs are exempted from sales tax. I see in the list barley, bread, butter, eggs and so on; farther down the list some rather strange items appear. I would interject here that one of the objections made against margarine was that it was manufactured from imported vegetable oils.

Hon. Mr. Taylor: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I would point out to my friend from Norfolk that that list includes peanut butter. Who ever heard of peanuts being produced in Canada? It includes also such items as spaghetti, macaroni and vermicelli, foodstuffs that I do not think are produced in this country.

By the way, a few week ago while I was on a motor trip through the province of Quebec I stopped off at the very interesting city of Three Rivers. On the street one day I saw some goods displayed in a store window. I went in and, pointing to a commodity which was very attractively packaged, I said to the clerk, "Is that margarine?" She replied, "Oh, yes, that is margarine". I took a look at it and observed that it was coloured like butter, but the name on it was "Spread". I bought a package of the substance, and it looked and tasted like butter.

I suppose that product was made out of dairy products, but I do not know. I said to the clerk: "Do you not know you are breaking the law? You are not allowed to sell margarine in Quebec." She replied "Oh, we sell quite a lot of it." That product "Spread" does not appear in this list of exemptions from sales tax. I suggest to some of my friends from Quebec that they should bring pressure on behalf of the producers of this product to have it included in the list of exempted foodstuffs.

Here we have exempted a very long list: Alfalfa meal, beet pulp—if there is a more unattractive thing than beet pulp, I would like to know about it—

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: It is dried beet pulp.

Hon. Mr. Euler: That makes the difference, I suppose. The list includes boxes for farm wagons. I have no objection to that particularly.

Then we have sap spouts and sap buckets, and steel pens for farm animals—I did not know farm animals could write, that they require steel pens.

Then there is vermiculite—what in the world that is I do not know. I am just making these references to point out the absurdity of excluding margarine, which is used by almost a majority of the people of Canada, from the benefit of the exemption from sales tax enjoyed by so many other articles.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I want to speak on only one section, the section concerning the magazine tax. I wonder how many members of this house, say over the last five years, have read Time magazine. I often wonder how many members have consistently, every week, read Time magazine.

People who go over to the United States tell of the surprising ignorance of the people of the United States regarding Canada. Now, I do not know of any magazine—there may be one, but I do not know of it—of the character of Time magazine that goes from Canada to the United States. But I do know that Time magazine comes from the United States to Canada. I am one of those who have read it, I think, every week, for I would not like to say how long, but at least for five years or longer. I have learned from that magazine more about the politics of the United States than I know about the politics of Canada, and I think that everybody else who reads it can say the same. It is a very valuable asset to a man or woman in the public life of this country to know the political life of that great nation to the south of us.

Now, Americans do a great many things that we do not like in Canada. Just the other day the Secretary of War made some very sarcastic remarks about the Suez Canal situation—called it "a little row over there", or something like that. "A little row"! It may mean a world war before we are done with it. It is a very great problem, the problem of the East and the West in that particular part of the world. The oil rights are tremendous and any interruption to the flow of oil would affect the whole world. The Americans do not know our problem, they do not know the British problem, they do not know the French problem. Probably Mr. Dulles knows it, probably the President knows it, but the rank and file of the people in the United States do not know it. We do not know it ourselves.

We in Canada should read Time magazine. I am not saying it is a great magazine. I presume there are lots better. I think some of the newspapers from Boston are better, and the New York Times is one of the outstanding papers of the world. I presume there are great papers in Chicago and other places, but I do not know of them. From my reading I seem to have a personal knowledge of the President and the Vice-President of the United States, of the Democratic presidential candidate and the possible candidates for the office of Vice-President. I might even go so far as to say that I know those people nearly as well as I know our own people. And I get that knowledge through that magazine. Now, maybe it is not worth while to educate a man like me; maybe it is no use educating any member of the Senate or of the House of Commons, or of any Legislature in Canada, or the mayor of a city or any member of a city council. Maybe that is not required in Canada. Maybe we are supposed to have that knowledge without being educated to it, but I, unfortunately, am one of those who require that type of education. I have no doubt that many of the rest of you know all about these things, but I do not.

I have read that magazine very carefully for many years just to get acquainted with a good magazine that will give a reader the impressions of the American people and tell how they act. By putting a tax on that magazine and preventing it from coming into Canada—which this measure, after all, is intended to do—I think we are making a mistake. I think we are wrong. To lift this tax would not be catering to the United States. The Americans do not care if the magazine is prevented from coming into Canada, but we may care. Some people say that we are independent of them, but don't be too sure of that. We spent $24 million this year in building a new guided missile and eventually it turned out to be no good and we have now to adopt the type of weapon that the Americans are building.

In my opinion this tax is absolutely uncalled for. I do not think it will in any way help readers in Canada one iota; I do not think it will help any magazine in Canada to any appreciable extent at all. I would like to ask what other publication I could obtain that would give me the news of the political life of the United States.

Hon. Mr. Smith: Newsweek.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: The New York Times and the United States News and World Report.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But those are American magazines too.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, this tax will not keep out any magazine. This is a tax on the advertising content of a special Canadian issue of a magazine published outside Canada.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is the purpose of it, to keep magazines out.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, not at all. The purpose is to give Canadian magazines a chance to get the advertising that is at present going to publishers outside Canada. There is no attempt to keep American magazines out of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That may be true enough, but the only purpose of putting a tax on those magazines is to keep them from coming into this country.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Not at all, not at all.

Hon. Mr. Haig: It cannot be for any other purpose. Time is not an immoral magazine, it does not teach anything immoral, it does not oppose religion or imperil public order.

In fact, there is nothing at all objectionable to it. I know of no reason for trying to stop it except that the proprietors sell a magazine which Canadians who want to advertise think is as good as or better than any other medium, and they spend their money on it because they believe they will get their money's worth. The minute you restrict the magazine the money is diverted somewhere else and the paper is cut out. There is no use in saying that this is not the intention of the amendment; it is to stop the magazine coming into this country.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: You cannot stop it coming into this country.

Hon. Mr. Haig: It cannot be printed here.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Time or any other magazine can be sent into this country; but the publishers print a section in which they tell Canadians what they think of them, a section which Americans cannot read because it does not appear in the United States.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The only objection I have to Time magazine is its enthusiasm over the great things it thinks the Liberal party has done for Canada. I understand such language quite well. When I am in a mood very hostile to the Government I pass up that part of the magazine, but sometimes I read it to get an idea of what a fellow who does not know what is going on in Canada says about us. But it has something else which is what I want: it comes in a form which any man or woman can read, and from it one can obtain in a concise fashion news of political and public affairs in United States. That sort of information I can get from this magazine better than from any other. I have the Reader's Digest; and I used to take Newsweek, but I dropped it. While I am here in Ottawa, if Time does not come to me from Winnipeg I buy it at the news-stand, and when I go home the old issues are in a pile waiting for me.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask my honourable friend a question? He values Time. I, too, read it. But does he not think that it expresses opinions more than it gives facts?

Hon. Mr. Haig: It prints the opinions of the American publisher.

Hon. Mr. Euler: To that extent it is not a newspaper.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Quite so. The publisher is a prominent American; his wife is the United States Ambassador to Italy. I understand all that. I see a great many Americans reading it, and since these attacks began I made a practice of asking them what kind of a magazine it is. I never heard one person criticize it. I read what it has to say about the Republicans and about the Democrats; and if I were an American, to whichever party I belonged I would regard its descriptions as very fair: one can gather what the two parties stand for, what they are trying to do, what kind of men their leaders are. All these things are what I want to know. I want to know, too, the views of people in the southern and western states, the farmers, and those who reside in the eastern and manufacturing areas. I want to know the views of both sides on the Negro question. I may not get a right representation of the facts, but I believe I do, because it is confirmed by what I read elsewhere. For instance, I read also quite often the New York Times, and the Christian Science Monitor, which is published in Boston, is it not?

Hon. Mr. Euler: Yes. It is all right.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But I always come back to Time, for it gives me something I cannot get any place else.

I think a tax like this is one that we do not need to impose. I am a Canadian, I like the Canadian people, I think we have a great country and I am very proud of it; I stand for Canadian ways; but I feel that we Canadians have tremendous responsibilities, and that the greatest of them is to know the American people. When citizens of other countries meet us, either here or on our visits overseas, they are very keen to learn what the Canadian opinion of the American is. That is one of the things most frequently asked of us. The only time I was at the United Nations Assembly several people asked me for my opinion of the Americans. I say that as we have a responsibility we can never get away from, we should have information on which to base our opinions. So I regret exceedingly that our Government has seen fit to put a tax on this magazine which can, it seems to me, drive it out of this country.

Hon. Norman P. Lambert: Honourable senators, I am grateful to the sponsor of this bill for having made the remarks he did about Part II, relative to the subject which has just been referred to by my honourable friend the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig). I am rising now to express my opposition to that part of the bill, because I could not comfortably sit in my seat and give even tacit acquiescence to this bill with that part in it.

I am opposed to it because I think it is entirely unnecessary. I think it is a complete perversion of the traditional liberal principles which have characterized most of the legislation which I have been privileged to support in this house since I was made a senator. I do not intend to go into the subject at great length, although I could, if it were necessary to do so. It has been examined to a certain extent in the other place, but I submit very definitely that up to now there has been no evidence submitted in either house which shows that Canadian periodicals or magazines which Canadians want to read are in financial jeopardy today from any cause whatsoever.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Canada's national weekly periodicals and magazines have more than doubled in number in twenty years: they have greatly increased their circulation, and they have matured into real competitors with other magazines which are circulating in this country. Any perusal of the available figures showing the growth of publications in Canada, the circulation, and the amount of advertising that they enjoy, will prove quite conclusively what I am saying now. I consider that this provision in the Excise Tax Act is clearly a protectionist one because it shifts advertising revenue and, indirectly, circulation, to Canadian magazines which now will be able to enjoy the equivalent of special tariff protection against the competition of American publications. At the present time there is no protective tariff for Canadian publications against the competition of American publications that are coming into the Canadian market. That is why my honourable friend can buy the New York Times or any other Sunday papers, together with their magazine sections, at a price which takes into account only the cost of getting them here, but against which there is no tariff. But this provision in the Excise Tax Bill supplies the equivalent of tariff protection to a specialized group of publications in Canada which really do not need the protection. It is the invidiousness of this legislation that I am opposed to as much as anything else, for it is based upon the fallacy of trying to prevent the importation of ideas and of energy and of enterprise into Canada to help develop this country. It savours too much of the suggestion we have heard during this session, that we must avoid the importation of capital from the United States in order to develop our national wealth. This savours exactly of that note, and I think that it is wrongly based on the idea that advertising is the important thing in a publication instead of its reading matter. Publications enjoy big circulations because of the reading matter they contain, and not because of the advertising they carry; and publications enjoy advertising revenue because of the quality of the reading matter they contain.

My honourable friend referred to one publication that is affected by this tax. I am rather surprised he did not mention the other one, the Reader's Digest. This publication was founded by two young people who came out of Winnipeg, Lila Acheson and DeWitt Wallace. These two young people conceived the idea that the time was ripe for a publication of pocket size that could be carried about by the casual reader. They finally went to the United States, going to Minneapolis and then to Chicago. That was in the 1920's. By applying themselves to this idea they made a success. Their headquarters are now in New York City and for all I know they may be naturalized Americans. The circulation of the Reader's Digest is in the millions today. These two people, now Mr. and Mrs. DeWitt Wallace, sent back to Canada some evidence of the enterprise which made them successful in the United States, and they established a headquarters in Canada for the publication of their magazine here. This is the only magazine that is published in French and in English in this country. It employes 322 people and has a payroll of over $1,250,000 a year. The magazine is described in the Massey Report—which I am not given to quote on every occasion, but I take great pleasure in doing so now—as the only real national magazine that is published in Canada.

I object to this exclusive definition of "non-Canadian" in the bill because, as far as the Reader's Digest is concerned, I regard the founders and owners of that publication in the United States as still being good Canadians. They are certainly North Americans, for they were born in this country, and they deserve all the credit that can be given to them for what they have been able to do. Their magazine circulates here to the extent of 865,000 copies a month, including both French and English, and its advertisements represent only about 4 per cent of the advertising that goes to all the magazines and periodicals that are published in this country. So when you come to boil the whole thing down, the provision in Part 2 of the bill is distinctly a protectionist provision and represents a bit of special privilege legislation in its most concentrated form. From the point of view both of basic principles as well as of common sense and practical business, this provision is reactionary and anti-liberal. It is invidious and provocative of reprisals from a neighbouring people whom Canadians everywhere should be doing their very utmost to cultivate at this time. The bill will probably pass, but if it does it will certainly be passed on division.

Hon. John T. Hackett: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few comments on this bill, but before doing so I shall ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) a question I asked earlier of the honourable senator who presented the bill (Hon. Mr. Hayden). Was any diplomatic representation made to the Government concerning the bill or the questions that are raised by the imposition of a tax on certain American magazines?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have no knowledge of that.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I have admired the rather large category of adjectives that the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) has applied to this part of the bill. I do not know whether he admits to being a protectionist at all times; I admit that I am that, and possibly frequently. However, I do share his opinion in regard to what he considers to be a provocative element in the bill. Pages have been written on both sides of the international line and elsewhere on the 3,000 miles of unprotected boundary, the unseen line which divides us, and on the friendship existing between us and the American people. Why should we attempt or desire to deny ourselves access to the unfolding story, not only of this continent, but of the world at large, which is brought to us weekly in one of the publications that have been mentioned, and in several others that have not been mentioned? Our action may arouse ill feeling. I think most people wish to allay misunderstandings and disputes, and when we know of conditions in other lands, when we learn to appreciate motives that press them to take this and that action, it enables us to approach the great difficulties that beset the world with an element of understanding, and sometimes of good will, even when that attitude is not entirely acceptable to us. Therefore, I am reluctant to be party to any interference with the flow of information which comes to us through these magazines and tends to overcome the barriers of space and time, especially when it comes from sources that generally are reliable.

Like my leader (Hon. Mr. Haig), I may say that some of the assertions that are found occasionally in one of these magazines do not always tickle my political funny bone, but on the whole they open broad avenues of information that would otherwise be closed to us. I dislike the pettiness of the bill. I dislike the idea that we cannot listen to truth that we cannot listen to facts. If there is one great characteristic of our country I think it is that we have been able to live in harmony as a people, despite the fact that elements of our people cherish divergent views, different languages, different creeds. Through a dispensation of Providence we have been enabled to understand that the other man may have a point of view which explains, if it does not entirely justify, his attitude.

At this time so much depends on men of good will, people who can work together, that we should avoid all possibility of ill will. If there is one thing for which Canada is reputed throughout the world it is that her people have been able to settle difficulties without spilling blood. Here we may create bad blood. This bill embodies a topic that will find its way into the election campaign which is about to take place in the United States and may embitter friends. We are doing this over—I will not say over paltry dollars, for we have to have dollars to carry on our government, but there are kinds of dollars that come too dear. I submit that a part of the bill indicates a pettiness that is entirely unworthy of the Canadian people, and above all of the Canadian Parliament.

Honourable senators, I shall vote against this bill.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, our colleague, the senior senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) spoke with vigour and decision on this particular provision of the bill we have under consideration at the moment. Let me say at once that I wholly support the views he expressed. This so-called magazine tax on advertising is simply and clearly a device of protection; it is nothing else. I have never been very partial to devices of that kind in the past as affecting the Canadian economy; but this device is even worse than I have known, for it is a tax on the exchange of ideas—perhaps not directly, but indirectly, and if there is one thing historic that the Liberal party has stood for in the past it is full-scale opposition to anything of this kind. I regret this tax, I think it is a mistake, and not only a mistake but a blunder.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: No doubt it will pass, but that does not end it so far as public opinion is concerned.

I also wish to endorse what my colleague from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) said about the sales tax on margarine. How is it possible to find any equity or any justification for a tax on what today is a common food of a great number of the Canadian people? I know the purpose of it, but I think it is a wholly mistaken purpose. As a matter of fact, I know of certain instances of dairymen, in whose interest this sales tax on margarine is maintained, who are selling their cream for the best price they can get, and are using margarine as a substitute for butter. If they care to do that it is quite within their right to do so, but why should they have to be penalized by a sales tax on margarine? Things like this make it difficult for one to understand what principle—if any principle at all—is guiding our legislation in these matters. There was a time when our laws were based on some principle. But it does appear that that practice has largely gone out of the window, and we tend to judge the merits or demerits of legislation on the grounds of expediency. That is never a sound ground on which to form a judgment on matters of this kind. Sooner or later it is bound to react; even politically, it is an unsound step to take.

I agree also with my colleague from Waterloo about the tax on the premium income of insurance companies, and particularly life insurance companies. If there is any one thing that is characteristic of life insurance, it is that it is a sound method of encouraging savings among all classes of our population. We hear many lectures about the importance of saving; our bankers talk to us about it, our public men advocate it. If it is a desirable thing—and I think it is highly desirable that the people generally should save in every legitimate and possible way—why on earth should we penalize the life insurance companies by so taxing them? I cannot understand at all the principle that lies behind such a proposal.

Today governments at all levels, federal, provincial and municipal, are harried to death with the need of getting additional revenue, and they reach out and grasp for it in the manner in which they think they can get it most easily. There is one point on which I do not quite agree with my colleague from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) namely, the approval he appears to give to corporation taxes.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I said income tax.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Corporation income tax?

Hon. Mr. Euler: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: My own view is that corporation income tax is an unsound tax for the reason that one has only to examine the financial statements of corporations since the tax was imposed to see as clear as the sun at noon day, that this tax is passed on to the consumers in this country. So when we tax a corporation 50 per cent of its net profits, that policy may sound good out on the hustings; it may be the basis for an appeal to a prejudice. But, in effect, it is a tax on consumption in this country, because industries and corporations which conduct business serve the public, and the public in some respect or other are consumers of their products. So, in almost all cases the people pay the shot on corporation tax.

Corporation tax is unsound because it is a disguised tax. A fundamental principle of sound taxation is that the tax be clear and evident to everybody, and that it be certain. That is why personal income tax differs wholly from tax on corporations. For instance, as a member of this house I receive an indemnity, as do all other senators, of $10,000 a year. On that sum I have to pay a tax. I cannot pass that tax on to anyone else: I have to meet it myself. That is the peculiar characteristic of personal income tax. But when the Government taxes a corporation in which I may be a shareholder, that corporation simply finds the means if it can, and it usually can, to pass that tax on to the consumer in the price it charges for its product.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: It does just the opposite.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I say that I was not endorsing corporation tax as such. I was merely saying that an insurance company, as a corporation, is entitled to be placed on the same basis as other corporations. I was not arguing in favour of the tax otherwise at all.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Well, I must say that I am relieved to hear that. I was afraid that my friend from Waterloo, for whom I have a very high regard, and who on such matters as these is usually sound, had strayed a little from the path of virtue. In that I was clearly mistaken.

I do think these are considerations which should occupy our attention a little more than they do. Nothing is more important to a country than its taxation policy, because it truly reflects how the people govern themselves. To the people of a freedom-loving country which believes in democratic government, nothing is more important than the way in which they govern themselves. We have great parliamentary institutions, and part of their work is to find revenues to meet the needs of the country. As representatives of the people, I think it is a matter within our ambit to point out what appears to me to be certain defects in this measure. And so, I am grateful to the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) for speaking as vigorously as he did. The principle he enunciated must not be forgotten and should be kept before the eyes of the people of this country.

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, I had not intended speaking in this debate, but so much has been said about the measure before us that I feel I should attempt to express a practical view with respect to the proposed tax of 20 per cent on advertising material in American magazines published in Canada.

Speaking generally to the bill, I share the opinion expressed by the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler), that the 2 per cent tax on life insurance premiums is a tax on gross revenue, but not on net. That feature makes it an unjust tax. As my friend pointed out, many insurance companies may collect large premiums, but the net result of their operations may show a deficit. I see no reason whatever for imposing such a tax on insurance premiums.

As to whether insurance companies should be taxed on their net profits, as is every other corporation, I think they should be so taxed. A few minutes ago I was looking across at my two colleagues, as they faced each other, and they appeared to be wondering who was for and who was against corporation taxation. Now they both seem to be against it. I wish they had expressed that opinion some years ago when corporation tax was first instituted, because it might have meant fewer years during which the people would have had to carry the burden of that tax.

In the matter of the 20 per cent tax on advertising in American magazines published in Canada, I must admit that to me it is a surprising tax. I am bound to think that the Minister of Finance and his deputy looked thoroughly into this matter before they reached a decision to propose such a new tax. I must also admit that I have not had sufficient explanation of the reason behind this proposal to convince me that it is a good or a bad one. However, I propose to vote for the bill, notwithstanding the fact that the explanation falls far short of satisfying me of its merit. I fear that the tax will not have the effect of reducing the flow of American publications to Canada and thus benefiting Canadian publishers. If certain American publications or magazines have had a wide distribution in Canada it is because their material is good. Their material has been accepted by Canadians to the extent that their business has grown tremendously over the last 10, 15 or 20 years. That indicates that Canadians have greatly appreciated these magazines.

Also, I have been told—I do not know whether it is true or not—that in so far as the advertising in these magazines is concerned they have not enough space to take all that is offered to them from Canada. If that is so, and I have no reason to believe that it is not, those who advertise in these magazines pay a pretty high rate; I think they are among the wealthier advertisers in Canada. So, if the magazines have to meet a 20 per cent tax on advertising, who will eventually pay for it? Will the publications pay for it and thus reduce the amount of their income by 20 per cent? I do not believe so. I think one of two things will happen: either the magazines will charge 20 per cent more for their advertising, which means that the Canadian advertisers will pay more, or the publishers will say to the advertisers "Our rate for advertising space has not changed, but as there has been a tax imposed on us of 20 per cent we are asking you to pay it". I think the result of the tax will be an increase in the rate for Canadian advertising by 20 per cent. That will not prevent wealthy companies from advertising in those magazines.

This tax will not decrease by any means the Canadian business of these American magazines. The fact that Canadian advertisers will have to pay a 20 per cent tax on advertising in these large magazines will not cause them to switch to Canadian publications. Consequently, I do not think the tax will have the effect that the minister thinks it might have.

As I am not an expert in the taxing business, nor do I have the knowledge that the minister has—and I am sure he carefully studied the situation before recommending imposition of the tax—I am going to vote for the measure. But I emphasize the opinion that I have expressed—though I may be wrong—that the tax will not have the effect the Government thinks it will have.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Honourable senators, may I clear up what is perhaps a misapprehension in my mind, or else a misapprehension in the mind of my honourable friend?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: The misapprehension may be mine.

Hon. Mr. Euler: He made the statement that two of his colleagues were apparently against the corporation tax. If he included me in that he is quite wrong. If he will do me the honour of reading my speech in Hansard tomorrow he will find that I am distinctly in favour of taxing the profits of an insurance company, as of any other corporation, but that I am wholly opposed, as he is, to the tax on premium income.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I take the word of my colleague, and I apologize if I misunderstood what he said. I still think that if either of my two colleagues opposite had in the past expressed opposition to the corporation tax it might have benefited the whole community.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, the honourable member for Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) has had to leave, so may I on his behalf close the debate?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I would point out to honourable members that if the honourable leader speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I expected that the honourable senator from Toronto, who opened the debate, would close it. However, I have followed the discussion very closely and I have also read the report of the debate which took place in the House of Commons. Therefore I feel that I am sufficiently well informed to speak for my honourable friend at this time, although probably not as effectively or as eloquently as he himself would speak.

Now, the last thing I want to be is provocative in my remarks. I think we have had an excellent debate. Honourable senators have spoken with feeling and vigour, and that is all to the good. No one can complain today about not having heard the debates in this chamber, because the participants have all been enthusiastic.

I was rather surprised at the tone of some of the speeches at a time when we hear so much about a desire to help the Canadian people, particularly writers, and artists, to do something for the fine arts. There has been much agitation to have an arts council. Well, the Government has been trying over the years to help in many ways, and it hopes that this tax will produce satisfactory results.

The attention of the Government was brought to the fact that it was not advertising sufficiently in magazines and other publications. So there has been an extension of advertising by the Government in magazines, not for the purpose of helping the publisher or the printer, but in order that the magazines could keep going and that Canadian writers and artists might contribute to them.

Also we have established special postal rates to make it possible for these magazines to exist so that they might publish articles written by Canadians, not necessarily for Canadians only, but for consumption in foreign countries as well.

Now, despite what has been said here today, we are not endeavouring to keep any American magazine out of Canada. I think that was done at one time. The honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) may recall that in the thirties duty was imposed on magazines entering Canada. I am not sure, because I was not in the house at that time.

Hon. Mr. Golding: As I recollect, it was a tax on advertisements in magazines. My honourable friend was in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I know there was some such tax at the time. But my point is that this legislation is not in the form of a tax on magazines coming into Canada, and I do not think anybody can interpret it in that way.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: May I draw the attention of honourable senators to rule 13, which compels the Speaker to leave the Chair at six o'clock unless he has unanimous consent to suspend the rule.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I shall not be very long.

Hon. Senators: Go ahead.

The. Hon. the Acting Speaker: I take it that the honourable gentleman has the unanimous consent of the house to continue.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I agree with the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) in his high opinion of Time magazine, which he reads regularly, as I do. I also read that excellent magazine the Reader's Digest, of which the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) made mention, and Newsweek, to which I think the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) referred. All of them are splendid publications. This legislation will not prevent them from coming into Canada on the same basis as heretofore.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I interrupt my honourable friend? It is not a question of their coming into Canada; they are here and are being produced here now. Would my honourable friend care to venture an opinion as to whether the publishers of the Reader's Digest, whose payroll in Canada is over a million dollars a year, will think it is worth while to retain quarters here, or will they return to the United States and publish their Canadian edition from there, as is done by Life and other United States magazines? The owners of the Reader's Digest came to Canada in order to publish here, and they are to be penalized for doing so. I should not be at all surprised to see them move back.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not want to venture an opinion on that question. I was going to say, "Time alone will tell", but it might be supposed that I was referring to the magazine! I am sure that, notwithstanding this legislation, the Reader's Digest will have an excellent market in Canada, and it will retain at least one subscriber, in any event, in the person of myself.

The honourable senator from Ottawa said, I believe, that Canadian magazines are increasing their circulations.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: That is so.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have here a statement which was made by the minister the other day, as follows:

> Shortly after the war about one-third of the magazines of general interest read in Canada were Canadian. Four years ago the proportion was down to one-quarter. Last year it had fallen to one-fifth.

And he adds this comment:

> I wonder if there is any country in the world where only one-fifth of the magazines of general interest are of national origin, and four-fifths originate abroad.

That is the situation which exists in Canada today. It was because of that position, and to put our magazines on a more competitive basis—not to help the publisher or the printer, but rather to promote Canadian contributions to something which is essentially Canadian—that this bill has been presented. I am sure it will encourage our Canadian writers. We all want to encourage them. We want them to have fair competitive conditions. We feel that the competition at present is a little unfair. If our action should prove to be wrong, it can be changed. But it certainly seems unfair that magazines published and printed in the United States—and having all the editorial content prepared over there, whether it is printed there or not—benefiting by their own wide market, can come into Canada with all this prepared editorial matter and compete with our magazines.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: And be called Canadian.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: And, as my honourable friend says, be called Canadian magazines.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: May I ask my honourable friend a question?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, indeed.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I wish he could clarify in my mind how he comes to believe that to impose a tax of 20 per cent on advertising in American periodicals published here is going to assist Canadian magazines or Canadian writers. I cannot understand it, unless the result is to be that these magazines of American origin stop publication.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, the magazines will not stop publication. But the costs of producing an American magazine in Canada are much lower than the costs of producing a Canadian magazine.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I agree. But how will this legislation help Canadian magazines?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The Canadian magazine, with its high costs, cannot compete with the low-cost American magazine: the circulation is restricted, and there is a very limited field for Canadian writers. I cannot put the matter any clearer than that. We hope that this legislation will improve conditions and opportunities for Canadian writers, and it will be given a chance to prove its worth.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed, on division.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, might I suggest to the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) that when the Senate rises today it stand adjourned until tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock. The Banking and Commerce Committee is meeting tonight at 8 o'clock and it has only one bill to dispose of.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, among the legislation now before the house for consideration is Bill 439, an Act to amend the Indian Act. There is also a very important bill entitled an Act to Promote Equal Pay for Female Employees, which is to be explained by the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson). The honourable gentleman from Huron-Perth (Hon. Mr. Golding) is going to explain bill 440, an Act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act. Then there will be two bills presented to the house dealing with taxation arrangements with the Republic of Germany and the United States respectively, which the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) has kindly consented to explain.

If it is the wish of honourable members I would be pleased to move that when the Senate rises today it stand adjourned until tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, August 10, 1956

The Senate met at 11 a.m., Hon. Thomas Vien, P.C., Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

INCOME TAX BILL

COMMITTEE AMENDMENT

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, for Hon. Mr. Euler, Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the committee's report on Bill 418.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom was referred the Bill (418) intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act", have in obedience to the order of reference of August 8, 1956, examined the said bill, and now report the same with the following amendment:

Page 1, lines 6 and 7: strike out the words "of any kind whatsoever".

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Later this day.

FEMALE EMPLOYEES EQUAL PAY BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson moved the second reading of Bill 445, an Act to promote equal pay for female employees.

She said: Honourable senators, today, when I have the privilege of introducing and explaining this bill to promote equal pay for female employees, is a highlight in my life.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: The principle on which this bill is based is the recognition of the dignity and the worth of women's work. Through women's organizations with which I am associated I have worked for many years for this recognition on both a national and a provincial level.

Canada is a member of the United Nations Organization and, as such, she has subscribed to the belief that there should be equal opportunity for men and women. The United Nations has repeatedly emphasized the importance of equal pay as an international standard. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which was unanimously adopted by the United Nations General Assembly, stated that everyone without discrimination has the right to equal pay for equal work. This means that all Governments which are members of the United Nations have given at least lip service to the principle of equal pay.

The constitution of the International Labour Organization, as originally adopted in 1919, proclaimed "the special and urgent importance" of "the principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration for work of equal value". The principle was repeated in the amended I.L.O. Constitution in 1948.

In 1951 the International Labour Organization adopted a convention concerning equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. Since that time 14 countries have ratified the convention. When the convention was adopted, in 1951, the Canadian Government delegates favoured adoption of an instrument but took the position that a recommendation was preferable to a convention. According to the statement made by the spokesman for the Canadian Government, this was because of the difficulties which Canada as a federal state would encounter in seeking to ratify a convention on a subject for which jurisdiction is divided between Parliament and the provinces, and also because at that time there was a strong feeling in Canada that equal pay was a matter for collective bargaining rather than legislation.

Honourable senators will know, without my telling them, that many of the businesses and industries in which Canadian women are employed are under the jurisdiction of the provincial Governments, according to the British North America Act. However, since 1951 five of our provinces have passed equal pay legislation, and now we are considering a federal bill. Canada has therefore gone a long way toward carrying out the principles of the convention during the past five years.

In many other countries people have awakened to the injustice of paying women less than men for the same kind, quality and quantity of work. As I mentioned before, 14 countries, some highly industrialized, and some not, have ratified the Equal Pay Convention of the I.L.O., and in many countries which have not yet ratified it, women, often with the assistance and support of their men co-workers, are making considerable progress toward adopting the principle of equal pay for equal work.

Equal pay bills have been introduced into the United States Congress at every session since 1945, although it is true that they have not yet been passed by Congress; however, 16 states of the Union and the Territory of Alaska have adopted this legislation and passed bills to implement it.

Last year in the United Kingdom legislation was passed which provided that female government employees would receive increases on a graduated scale, so that by 1961 they would be receiving equal pay with their men co-workers. The principle of equal pay has long been adopted in Britain, but for economic reasons Britain has felt that it could not implement it in its civil service; however, it is doing so on a gradual scale, so that before long British women civil servants will receive equal pay with men.

In Canada, as I stated earlier, women's organizations have been working assiduously to have the provincial Governments and the federal Government pass legislation to put on the statute books laws to guarantee for women this basic right of human beings, whether they be male or female.

Since 1907 the National Council of Women has sponsored this principle and has continued to do so down to the present time. In case honourable senators may not be familiar with this council, may I explain that it is a group made up of and representing 21 national women's organizations, 6 provincial councils, and 49 local councils which embrace almost 1,700 local affiliated societies.

The Canadian Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs has as its special objective the improvement of the status of women, and since it was organized, in 1930, has interested itself in the implementation of equal pay legislation as a basic requirement for the improvement of the status of women. There are 139 business and professional women's clubs throughout Canada, from Victoria, British Columbia, to Saint John's, Newfoundland, with a membership of almost 7,000. Honourable senators may have seen a number of members of this group, when almost 1,000 members of the International Congress of Business and Professional Women's Clubs which met in Montreal came to Ottawa by special train and visited the Parliament buildings on July 10 of this year. The Canadian members of this group were addressed by His Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons in the Chamber of that house; and later, the Speaker very graciously entertained them in the Railway Committee room, where they had an opportunity to see the Prime Minister.

It is generally recognized, honourable senators, that the work done by these clubs has been responsible for the passage of equal pay legislation in Ontario and other provinces in Canada.

The Canadian Federation of University Women, with its 86 branches and a membership of about 8,000 in Canada, has for years supported this type of legislation. Another group which has been very vocal in support of the legislation through resolutions and in other ways is the National Federation of Liberal Women, which has more than 500 branches in Canada. I am sure there are many other women's groups who have supported it, but I am referring only to those about which I have personal knowledge, having taken part in their work. I understand that most of the women's organizations of the other political parties in Canada have also gone on record as supporting this legislation, but I am not in a position to say other than what I have heard in that respect.

Honourable senators will perhaps be interested to know that the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada enunciated, as the third point in its twelve-point platform which was adopted in 1882, equal pay for equal work for both sexes, and the Congress never deviated from the endorsement of this principle. The Canadian Congress of Labour has endorsed the principle of equal pay for equal work, and has gone on record as being in favour of this legislation. When these groups united, equal pay for equal work was one of the principles in the platform of the Canadian Labour Congress, adopted at their April, 1956, convention.

The Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, at its 1951 congress, passed a resolution requesting the Legislature of the province of Quebec to recognize the fact that male and female employees should receive equal pay for equal work as proposed by the International Labour Organization.

As honourable senators probably know, women in government in Canada have also supported this principle and have requested legislation to implement it. It was first voiced in the other place by Miss Agnes Macphail, the first woman member of the Canadian Parliament, when she represented Grey-Bruce. More recently, the member from Hamilton West, Mrs. Fairclough, introduced an equal pay for women bill on three different occasions. On two occasions the bill was debated in the House of Commons, and although it was defeated each time it was supported by all women members of the house, regardless of party affiliation, including, Mrs. Ann Shipley, the only Liberal woman member.

All these things have pointed to a trend in public opinion toward equal pay for women. When the very capable Director of the new Women's Bureau in the Department of Labour, Miss Marion Royce, was appointed in 1954, a survey of the need for this legislation, and if there was a need for it, of the form which such legislation should take, was begun. Honourable senators, the present bill is a great satisfaction to the women of Canada. It is also the first major accomplishment of the Director of the new Women's Bureau; it is an accomplishment of which she and her minister may well be proud.

To me it seems only simple justice that every human being, regardless of sex, should receive equal pay for equal work. But I know there is some opposition to this idea. With the permission of the house, I should like to take a few moments to make some comments on the reasons besides simple justice for support of the bill.

The two world wars were the great incentive that brought women into the labour force. Their help was greatly needed; indeed, it was actually essential, and they gave their help generously. It was thought at that time that the use of women in such a field was a matter of passing interest, and their presence would be only temporary. It is plain, however, that in our rapidly expanding economy there is still a place and a demand for women. Their record shows that women's work is not inferior to that of men. If it were, they would not be employed at all. You will be interested to know that the number of women in the labour force in Canada today is slightly more than one and a quarter million; the latest figure is I think 1,312,000. This represents a little more than 23 per cent of the entire labour force of Canada, which numbers about 5,664,000. The fact that women constitute such a large proportion of the labour force is certainly a reason why they have come to be recognized as a stable group within that force, and it increases the value placed on their work. This group has increased in number greatly since the turn of the century. An article in the Labour Gazette of April 1954 states that from 1901 to 1951 the number of women in the labour force increased about fivefold and the ratio of women in the labour force to the total population of women of working age has about doubled.

The number of women who will be affected by this legislation is a smaller number for it will affect only those who are employed in works, undertakings and businesses within the power of the federal Government to regulate. The total number of persons employed in these operations under federal jurisdiction is about 375,500, of whom about 72,000 are women. However, within this group there are a few women, members of unions, who are covered by collective agreements that provide for equal pay for equal work, and therefore they will not benefit from this legislation. and there are some, such as telephone operators and bank clerks, in occupations where few if any men are employed. The number of women whose wages and salaries will be under scrutiny according to the terms of this bill are not very great compared with the whole woman labour force in Canada. If the bill passes, however, the very fact that the federal Government has enacted equal pay legislation means that official national recognition has been given to the inherent worth of women's work and the basic principle of their equality with men.

It has been a long and slow process to establish equality between males and females in Canada. We may forget that in the early years of this century women in Canada were denied the right to vote. It was only in 1929, just 27 years ago, that following a reference to the Supreme Court and later to the Privy Council a judgment was given declaring that under the British North America Act women are persons and therefore entitled to be summoned to this chamber. The bill before us to promote equal pay for female employees is a logical further step in the direction of granting equal rights to women.

Much of the earlier opposition to equal pay for women vanished when it was realized that equal pay would add to the security of the male employee in that he would not need to fear that if business became bad his employer might replace him by a woman who could do the same work for less money. Wives who first regarded such legislation with fear, when they understood this implication welcomed it as providing security for their husbands. It has been realized also that it provides security for employers of men who do not have to fear that their prices may be undercut by competitors who employ women at rates less than the rate paid to men for the same work.

To support that I would like to quote a statement made by Mr. Kaiser, the United States Government delegate at the 33rd International Labour Organization Conference at Geneva, when he was sitting in the committee which was considering equal remuneration for men and women for work of equal value. Referring to equal pay, he said that United States experiences showed first that the principle can be successfully translated into a workable practice, acceptable alike to workers and employers; secondly,—and this supports the point that I was trying to make—that its application protects established wage rates against undercutting and improves employee morale and labour relations.

One argument that has been put forward against equal pay is that men require higher salaries because they have to support families. However, where this discrimination prevails the salaries are based on the sex of the individual and not on whether he is a married man with a family or is a bachelor.

It is well known that many of our working women are widows with children to support and educate, and unmarried women who support aged parents, for it is traditional in our country that the unmarried daughter assumes the support of needy parents. That happens many, many times. Now, the taxes paid by such women are certainly no lower because the taxpayers are women. Groceries, shelter and clothing, which they have to buy, cost them no less than the same things bought by men. The cost of educating children are not less for a mother than for a father. Why then should a woman who works for money to pay for these necessities get less for her work than a man does if she is doing the same work?

It has been said to me, even within the walls of this building, that if women and men are to receive equal pay it would work to the detriment of women, because under these circumstances an employer will always choose a man. Honourable senators, I do not believe this; and in any case women are quite willing to take that chance. I would point out that in the large number of countries where equal pay legislation has been put into effect no such result has accrued.

Five provinces of Canada have enacted equal pay legislation. Ontario took the lead in 1951, and was followed by Saskatchewan in 1953, British Columbia in 1954, and Manitoba and Nova Scotia in 1956. The Nova Scotia law will not come into force until January 1, 1957.

There have not been many prosecutions as yet under these acts, but there is considerable evidence of acceptance of the principle by employers. I would like to quote a statement of the Deputy Minister of Labour of Ontario, who, in referring to the Ontario act, said:

> The Legislature of Ontario, in passing this statute, has established a principle for industry to follow, and it is understood that because of the existence of this legislation adjustments will be made, particularly by some of the larger firms in the province, without recourse to complaints made under the act.

Honourable senators, at last I have come to the provisions of the bill itself. I would point out that it applies to all the "works, business and undertakings" which, under the provisions of the British North America Act, are within the jurisdiction of the federal Parliament to legislate upon, including crown companies. The employees affected include those employed in telegraphy, broadcasting, transport, Canadian National hotels, banks, telephone companies, federal crown companies such as Canadian Arsenals and Polymer, and by the railroads. It does not only apply to civil servants, because most of them are engaged through the Civil Service Commission, and it is established policy in the civil service to pay the same scale to both men and women according to their job classification.

Section 4 contains the basic provision of the bill. It provides that no employer shall employ a woman at a rate of pay less than he pays a man for identical or substantially identical work. It is the "job, duties or services the employees are called upon to perform" that must be considered to determine whether or not the work is identical, or substantially so. If there is a difference in the rates of pay of a man and woman for identical or substantially identical work, and the difference can be shown by the employer to be due to a general rule or personnel practice or any matter such as length of service or seniority which applies to all his employees, regardless of sex, such difference is not to be deemed to be failure to comply with the act. By section 5, an employee who makes a complaint is protected from discharge or from being the subject of any other discrimination.

In the remainder of the bill there is set out the enforcement procedure. It is provided that a woman who considers she has a grievance under the act may make a complaint in writing to the Minister of Labour. The complaint is to be referred to a fair wage officer, who is an official of the department, and who will try to help the parties to understand their positions under the act. The result may be a settlement, either through a wage adjustment or withdrawal of the complaint if it were not justified. This is a provision for voluntary settlement. If the fair wage officer is unable to arrange a voluntary settlement he is to make a report to the minister setting out the facts, with his recommendations. If there is merit in the complaint the minister will appoint a referee, who may or may not be a member of the department, who will make a full inquiry, hear both parties, and decide whether there has been a contravention of the act, and make whatever order is necessary. Such order may require an adjustment of pay for as far back as six months preceding the complaint. Failure to comply with the order is an offence under the act for which penalties are set out.

Although administrative procedure is provided for in the bill, a person who considers herself aggrieved is not precluded from starting court proceedings, if she prefers, but if she has made a complaint to the minister, and administrative proceedings have reached the stage where the case is before a referee, she cannot then institute a court action.

The purpose, of course, is merely to prevent concurrent judgments of a court and a referee.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Is there any appeal from the finding of the referee?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: There is no provision in the bill for an appeal. Of course, if the referee's finding is not complied with the complainant may take legal action, and perhaps the court's decision might be of some benefit in this respect.

If an employer is convicted by a court of failure to comply with the act, the judge may order the payment of the wages due the employee, as well as any other penalty.

In cases of collective agreements, where an employer is bound by a clause which contains an equal pay provision substantially the same as that contained in section 4, grievances must be dealt with by the machinery provided in the agreement, and not through the procedure set out in this bill.

This is a very simple and straightforward bill, and I am sure the contents are clear to all honourable senators. If there are any questions, I shall be glad to answer them if I am able.

In Canada we believe in equality of the sexes, and over the years we have passed legislation based on that belief. Honourable senators, I would like to say that when this bill passes—if you will permit me to do violence to an old and well-known adage—it will prove that in the employment field in Canada we recognize that a "miss" is as good as a "male".

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I recommend that you give favourable consideration to this bill.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: In connection with the application of this bill, is the honourable senator satisfied that the same principle of parity or equality exists within the ranks of the Civil Service itself?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: The only way in which I can answer that is to say I was a civil servant myself, that I held rather senior positions on different occasions and I always received the same pay as did men doing the same work. I know, too, that the people in the departments in which I worked were paid for the job they were doing, regardless of their sex. I firmly believe that is the established practice of the Civil Service.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask a further question? In view of the Government's interest in this measure, which of course would be reflected in contractual engagements of the Government in its various works, would the honourable senator say that a fair wage officer would logically be considered a member of the Department of Labour?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I have not given consideration to that. It is provided for in the act, and I did not see any reason to raise any objection to it. The work of the fair wage officer is really to interpret the act to the complainant and the employer so they will both understand their rights. It has happened under some of the provincial acts that people who have made complaints would not have done so had the act been properly explained to them. They realized they were not justified in making their complaint. The same is true with respect to the employer who sometimes has not known his rights or responsibilities under the act. I understand that the job of the fair wage officer is to interpret the act and to try to get the employer and employees to understand their rights and to agree to abide by them. He is not an arbitrator.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: In the case of a wage dispute he would be the arbitrator.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: No, the dispute would go to a referee. If a voluntary settlement could not be arranged, the matter would be referred to the minister, who would appoint a referee. He may appoint a member of his department or someone from outside.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: That would be the Minister of Labour?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Yes.

Honourable Mariana B. Jodoin: Honourable senators, I hardly need to add other comments to the excellent and persuasive speech which has just been made by my distinguished colleague, the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson), in connection with Bill 445, an Act to promote equal pay for female employees.

For several years this idea has been discussed in great detail. I am happy today to see it accepted, after several serious developments which make us appreciate it all the more.

This service and this legislation will mean, for a large proportion of the women of Canada, that material security which is so vitally important to female employees.

I will not go into any details of the bill. The honourable senator from Fredericton, who is thoroughly conversant with the question, has already done so and, moreover, I would not want to delay the passing of this legislation.

In the name of Canadian women and particularly of those of Quebec whom I represent, I congratulate the promoter of the bill, the Honourable Milton F. Gregg, Minister of Labour, and all those who have supported him in this act of justice toward the working women of our country.

You may rest assured that these women are working for no other reason than to make a living for themselves and their families.

I hope this example will be followed by the provincial Governments of Canada in relation to the female workers under their jurisdiction.

I am wholly in favour of this bill, which is a most interesting piece of federal legislation.

(Text):

I am sure that all honourable senators will vote for this bill, because there is no good reason for opposing it. A truly big man is never afraid of a woman who fights for her rights.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I would like to ask the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson) a question. I have never understood how it came about that employers would pay men more than they would pay women for doing the same job if the women could do the job just as well. Why has that been the universal practice? It is interesting to recall that when I first went to work in a law office most stenographers were women, although there were quite a number of men too. However, nowadays there are practically no male stenographers. There must be a reason for this. And what is the reason why employers will pay men more than women for doing the same job?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I do not know. I was prepared to answer questions on the bill, but I do not know that I can answer questions on how this practice has grown up. It is rather complicated. Probably the explanation is that men traditionally held the positions. When women took over jobs during the war they were considered as filling them on a temporary basis; they were regarded as replacements. There has always been a feeling, which is gradually being dissipated, that women's worth in their work is less than that of men. I do not believe that is true, but it is a belief that people have held. It was felt that women were replacing men on a temporary basis only, and although women have stayed in employment this idea has continued. That is about the only explanation I can suggest.

Hon. Norman P. Lambert: Honourable senators, I am not rising to express any opposition to this bill but I would like to emphasize one aspect of it which comes to mind when I recall some words that were expressed by a member of the other place, a fellow-member with the late Agnes Macphail, when that very charming likeness which the sculptor was able to produce of her was unveiled in the hall yonder. Angus MacInnis said, "I am pleased to be here to pay tribute to the memory of the late Agnes Macphail in spite of the fact that she was a woman, to emphasize the services that she, the first woman to become a member of the Canadian Parliament, was able to render as a woman of Parliament standing entirely on her own two feet".

It is interesting to recall that when Miss Macphail came to Parliament she considered the sessional indemnity received by members—all of whom except herself were men —to be too high, and she actually turned back into the treasury a portion of her sessional indemnity for a couple of years, until she realized the mistake she was making.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: I mention that simply as a preliminary to expressing the hope that this bill does not place too much emphasis upon the sexes in relation to economic activities and economic values. I think that the result of two wars probably did more than anything else to enhance the economic value of women in industry and elsewhere in Canada, and also revealed to everyone who has had anything to do with public affairs or private business that on the part of women of this generation at least who have taken their place in those fields there has been a degree of efficiency and conscientious devotion to the task at hand, which has had a salutary influence upon the economy of the whole country. I do not think there is any doubt about that; many examples could be cited in support of that statement.

I hope that this growing equality of the sexes in these fields will not resolve the women into a unionized body seeking through the Department of Labour and its machinery of arbitration to obtain privileges because of their sex. Frankly, I do not think it is necessary at any time for anyone who is advocating support of a bill like this to emphasize the idea of equality and rights of women as opposed to men. The old feminist movement of Mrs. Pankhurst is gone. The economic value and ability associated with the female sex have long since been recognized and established.

Honorable senators, I would like to say, in the words of Angus MacInnis, that I support this bill in spite of the fact that it is on behalf of women.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, my only purpose in rising is to compliment the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson) on the splendid manner in which she presented this bill. She made a forthright address, and it is most appropriate that she should do so, for over the years she has been an advocate of equal rights for women, and with equal rights comes equal pay. I suppose the book is now closed and that women will have equal pay and equal status with men in every respect. I congratulate the honourable senator on the interest she has taken on this subject over the years.

In the honourable senator's interesting address she gave us some history of the women's equal rights movement, and of its progress in Canada and other countries. She referred to the international conference which was held in Montreal a few weeks ago by the Business and Professional Women's Clubs. On that occasion more than 900 members of these clubs came to Ottawa, and their visit was arranged by the honourable senator from Fredericton.

(Translation):

Honourable senators, I also would like to congratulate the honourable senator from Sorel (Hon. Mrs. Jodoin) upon the excellent speech she gave us on a subject which means so much to her. I also am wholeheartedly in favour of this bill.

(Text):

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I would point out to the house that if the honourable senator from Fredericton speaks now she will close the debate.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Honourable senators, perhaps I should explain that when I gave a slight historical background of the women's equal rights movement I certainly did not do so as a feminist, because I do not consider that I really am one. I simply believe that women should have the same opportunities as men. Instead of laying stress on their sex and seeking special privileges on that account, the purpose of this bill is to give women equal rights with men which they do not have now, but certainly not to give them additional rights. What women are seeking is equality of rights, not special privileges, and I feel they are well justified in supporting this bill.

May I add this? I think that when Miss Macphail refused to take all of her sessional indemnity it was not because she thought a woman should receive less indemnity than a man; I believe she felt that the indemnity for all the members was too high.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. William H. Golding moved the second reading of Bill 440, an Act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is designed to extend the application of certain provisions of the act to certain persons or groups of persons who are not at present able to benefit from it. These extensions in turn call for certain consequential amendments, and in addition the bill deals with other amendments of an administrative nature.

These amendments have been proposed by the Government after the receipt of a strong recommendation from the National Joint Council of the Public Service of Canada to the Minister of Finance. The National Joint Council, composed of representatives from the official and staff sides of the public service, recommended the removal of certain restrictive features in the Public Service Superannuation Act affecting the augmentation of pensions of those persons who may be employed in the public service after the age of 65. In the normal case at present the annual amount of the annuity of a retired civil servant is 2 per cent of the contributor's average salary over that period of ten consecutive years in which his salary is highest, multiplied by his years of service up to a maximum of 35 years. Contributions are made until the civil servant has 35 years of pensionable service to his credit, but salary earned in subsequent years is counted if it will give a higher ten-year average. These provisions apply at present, no matter at what age retirement takes place.

Certain provisions which are due to come into force on August 1, 1957, would have the effect of stopping all increases in pension benefits and of stopping all contributions for current service as of that date for those employees who are then 65 years of age or older. For example, this would have the effect of cutting down the pension of a person who came into the service at age 32 and who retired at age 67. Instead of obtaining a pension based on a combination of 35 years of service and salary up to retirement, it would be based on 33 years of service and salary up to age 65. Similarly, the person who had given even longer service and had completed 35 years before retirement would not gain the benefit of any improvement in the average salary due to service after the age of 65. This provision was originally inserted in the earlier Civil Service Superannuation Act in 1947 so as to provide a ten-year warning for those who might be affected.

As this cut-off date has approached, the staff associations have become more and more concerned about the effect of this restrictive provision on the average salary and service credit used in the benefit calculations of those who will in future be retiring after the age of 65. The National Joint Council now feels that any person who is regarded as so essential as to be retained in the public service after age 65, and could thereby increase his ultimate pension, should be permitted to do so.

This recommendation has nothing to do with the normal age of retirement, which is governed by the regulations made under the act. These regulations provide for normal retirement at age 65, with extension beyond that age at the discretion of the minister of each department in the cases of those persons whose salaries are below $9,500, and with the concurrence of a special committee established by the Treasury Board in the case of those with higher salaries. After a civil servant reaches the age of 70 extension is possible only upon annual approval of the Treasury Board. The National Joint Council is not recommending the raising of the normal retirement age above 65.

Clauses 4, 5 and 6 of the bill deal with amendments of a relatively minor nature. Clause 4 is designed to take care of an omission in the legislation and its purpose is to deem as contributors under the Public Service Superannuation Act as well as under its predecessor, the Civil Service Superannuation Act, all former permanent employees of the Government of the province of Newfoundland who became employed by the Government of Canada pursuant to an offer of employment in accordance with the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada. This amendment will ensure that these employees may on retirement be eligible for the benefits available in respect of service which could be counted for pension purposes under the laws of Newfoundland and Canada before and after the date of union respectively.

Clause 5 deals with the time within which advantage may be taken of reciprocal transfer agreements entered into under section 28 of the act. The period of election to contribute for prior service in the ordinary way without penalty was extended for a further year by the amendments made to the act last session. This was necessary because of the inability of the Superannuation Branch and the departments to cope with the very large number of new contributors in the time available. However, the year in which to take advantage of a reciprocal transfer agreement between the Government and other agencies was not extended. It has turned out in a number of cases that the year in which employees have transferred to the public service and could take advantage of these reciprocal transfer agreements has proven to be insufficient. This amendment would give power to the Governor in Council to extend the period for another year in respect of these reciprocal agreements. Such a provision would also make it possible to make extensions in the future where that is necessary, without requiring a further amendment of the act.

Clause 6 would provide the Governor in Council with additional powers to make the regulations to deal with circumstances which cannot be adequately covered by the present regulation powers.

The principal amendment proposed in the bill concerns the time in which an election can be made to continue as a participant after retirement under Part II of the act, which provides for the supplementary death benefits. The amendments proposed in this connection appear in clause 7 of the bill, and they are required to deal with the difficulties which have occurred in applying the requirements of sections 40 and 41 of the present act.

Under these sections a retiring civil servant or member of the armed forces can elect to retain the protection given by the supplementary death benefit scheme by paying the appropriate premiums after retirement. These sections restrict valid elections to those made within 30 days after ceasing to be employed as a civil servant or a member of the armed forces, as the case may be. Despite the many occasions on which this provision has been publicized, a large number of persons have submitted an election form before retirement, and these elections are therefore invalid.

Some very unfortunate cases have resulted where the person affected was not subsequently informed in time to make another election within the required period. In order to give a reasonable time in which to make an election this amendment would provide that, for this purpose, a year be given in advance of as well as 30 days following retirement.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Is that retroactive?

Hon. Mr. Golding: Yes, I think it will be. This clause also provides that where a participant of the scheme purported to elect within a year prior to retiring then this should be regarded as an election and it would be possible by paying the necessary contributions for him to resume his status as a participant if he took action to do so within six months of the coming into force of this amendment. Where the death of any of these persons occurred prior to the end of this six-month period there would be provision for the payment of the death benefit less the contributions which would have been made up to the time of death. The same applies to elections made within 60 days following retirement.

Clause 8 of the bill also deals with the Supplementary Death Benefit Scheme, but this amendment concerns those who elected not to participate under the scheme at the time of its introduction in accordance with the provisions of section 52 of the act. This section provided that contributors under Part I of the act, which deals with pensions, were given the right to elect not to participate under Part II under which supplementary death benefits are made available. It also provides that this election is irrevocable even if the employee leaves the service and is subsequently re-employed. The same provision applies to members of the armed forces who are re-engaged or subsequently become civil servants.

This restriction has been most difficult to administer, particularly in the cases of married women who return to the service under different surnames and in a different locality or department and also where there are two or more persons of the same name. If no change were to be made it would be necessary to set up a large administrative staff to cope with this without any prospect of complete success, as there are 34,000 persons who made these elections out.

It is proposed that the irrevocable feature of these elections should not apply in the case of re-employment in the Public Service or re-engagement in the armed forces or of a person leaving the armed forces and becoming a contributor under the Public Service Superannuation Act after the amendment comes into force. The amendment accordingly provides that the irrevocable nature of the elections made under section 52 of the Public Service Superannuation Act apply only to persons who continue to be employed in the Public Service or as members of the regular forces substantially without interruption following the coming into force of the amending legislation.

In concluding this description of the provisions contained in the proposed amendments, I should like to mention that they have all been recommended to the minister by his Advisory Committee, which is made up of 12 persons representative of the official and staff sides of the Public Service who have been appointed by the Governor in Council on the minister's recommendation after consultation with the National Council of the Public Service of Canada.

I may say that I have read carefully the discussion which took place on this bill in the House of Commons. I find that 10 of the Opposition members spoke on the bill and everyone was pleased with the legislation as far as it went; but on the other hand they were all anxious to see these amendments go further. However, as I say, they were all satisfied with the bill as it is and the Government members who spoke on the bill were of the same opinion.

Now, honourable senators, as Canadians, and particularly as members of Parliament, we are proud of our Public Service.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Golding: It seems to me that we can show our appreciation of the Public Service, of its loyalty, efficiency and so on, by simply accepting this bill as it is and by passing it without going to committee at all. I would suggest that we do that.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask the honourable senator if he can supply any information regarding the number of civil servants in Newfoundland who will come under this legislation?

Hon. Mr. Golding: No, I have not got that information.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: A further question arises as a result of some discussion in the Standing Committee on Finance this session as to the status of the superannuation fund itself. Is the honourable senator in a position to say whether or not the amendment proposed by this bill would have the effect of weakening or strengthening the status of the superannuation fund, that is from the point of view of an actuarial estimate of its value?

Hon. Mr. Golding: I may say that this has been carefully considered by the Government and all those involved, and they were unanimous in passing this measure.

Hon. John T. Hackett: Honourable senators, I hope that the honourable senator who has sponsored the bill will not think me unkind if I advise him that, although I am a very new member of this chamber, I rather resent the allegation which is made here very frequently that a bill has been approved somewhere else. Of course it has; and the reason for our existence is not to be swayed by what has happened elsewhere, but to investigate proposed legislation, know what we are doing, and act on our own responsibility, not because somebody has thought well of it. One of the benefits of this form of government is to provide—using a phrase with which we are all acquainted—a "sober second afterthought".

As to the Civil Service: I do not know how many former civil servants are members of this chamber. I am one, and I look back with great interest on my experience. In that period I formed friendships which have persisted through a life that is long. Of the excellence of the Civil Service there is no doubt. What worries me is the never-ending increase of its numbers, and indications that one of its activities is to see that it increases and multiplies—not always in accordance with the biblical injunction.

I regret that more information in support of this bill is not available. I regret that we are asked to be satisfied because somebody else, or members in another house, have been pleased to approve of it. Continuance of these methods of appreciation and these standards of judgment gives a powerful argument to those who sometimes say, in their ignorance, that the Senate is not of much use, that it is a refuge for the weary. But as I have said, I hope that the honourable gentleman who has presented this bill will understand that my remarks are in no way personal to him.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

MOTION FOR THIRD READING—
DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Golding: I move the third reading now.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak on the merits of the bill; I want to raise a small objection, with which some honourable senators may not agree. It seems to me very unfair to the members of this chamber that practically no legislation comes here before the last two weeks of the session. True, we received somewhat earlier the pipe line bill and certain other bills, one of them with regard to wheat; but the great bulk of the legislation has been withheld over a long period, between January 10 and August 10, during which we would have had ample time to give very careful thought to any measures presented to us.

I am not going to object to passage of this bill. I have great confidence in the honourable gentleman who sponsored it. He is an old parliamentarian, and I am satisfied that he would never try to mislead this house or any other body. But I am concerned about the same thing which worries my honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett). I know that the bill has been accepted in another house, and that it had the support of members of all parties, but that fact does not relieve us of one iota of our responsibility. There is no use in sending it to committee. The number of honourable members now in attendance is small enough, and they will be fewer at the end of the week. If the bill went to committee, three or four days would be needed to give it adequate consideration. It deals with technical matters. We are quite capable of carrying on the necessary examination, but it would take time, and quite a long time.

My purpose in speaking now is to ask the honourable Leader of the Government in this house (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) to make request of the Prime Minister, on behalf of the Senate, that next session, instead of so much legislation being reserved until so late a date, the program be arranged to enable a number of bills to be sent to us earlier in the session. It may be necessary to spend a good deal of time on matters which demand prolonged consideration, but I think some of this legislation which is now before us could have been passed earlier. If the Government does not wish to adopt this course, legislation which can be initiated in this house without contravening the Constitution should be begun here, put through the necessary stages, and sent to the other house. I have not lost sight of the fact that excepted from such legislation are bills to effect an increase in or reduction of taxation. But I think it is unfair to the Senate to dump in our laps, in the last two weeks of the session, the great bulk of the legislation. I admit that the pipe line bill was of primary importance, but the bill now before the house is important too. The Government controls the introduction of legislation, and in fairness to the men and women who have been appointed to this chamber important measures should be sent to us earlier so that we might have adequate opportunity to examine them thoroughly. I am persuaded that no body of men and women in Canada can do a better job than honourable senators in examining legislation, for we represent every walk of life.

The Income Tax Bill is another piece of legislation that we should have had at least two months ago.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: There is no doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Because this legislation comes to us so late we are not able to give it the consideration it deserves, and as a result the taxpayer is not getting a fair return for the money he is paying us. This is not our fault, nor is it the fault of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). It may be, in fact, that he has kept us here when we have had too little to do. For instance, he kept us sitting steadily for three days a week when some days we sat for just an hour or so.

Honourable senators, I am willing that this bill be passed, for I feel the Government and the Civil Service need it. Like those who have spoken, I have great admiration for our Public Service. A civil service is the backbone of the administration of any country. It is the responsibility of the officials of the Civil Service to use their experience and wisdom in placing the legislation before Parliament, but it is our responsibility to decide what to do with it.

The manner in which we dealt with the Small Loans Bill was an illustration of the proper way to consider legislation in a thorough manner. Whether or not we agreed with the contents of the bill, we dug out all the facts and there was no choking off of our investigation. We knew what we were doing; but the same cannot be said about this bill. I am depending on the explanation of it given by the honourable senator from Huron-Perth (Hon. Mr. Golding), and I can find out about details from departmental experts.

I make no criticism of the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald).

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: He doesn't mind a little criticism.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, maybe he deserves a little. But I would offer some constructive criticism of the Government. It has to be reminded of the existence of the Senate, and whether it wants to reform this house and kick it around it will not get rid of it. Abolition of the Senate could only occur with our consent. But if we have to sit around doing nothing we may want to give that consent.

For all these reasons I would ask that next session the Government send legislation to us much earlier so that we will have a chance to consider it thoroughly with our full membership. I agree that this bill should be passed, but I do so with that reservation.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, may I say at the outset that I agree with the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) and the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) that it is regrettable all this legislation has come to this house within the last ten days. I am sure we would have preferred it to be otherwise. However, that does not prevent us from handling it in the manner in which it should be handled. We are the masters of our own procedure.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If we feel that a bill which has come to us has not received proper consideration here, why should we pass it? We do not have to adjourn this Senate on any particular day. We are not bound by what the Commons do. If we are not through with our business when they are through with theirs, we can stay here. I am prepared to stay. Is the Leader of the Opposition prepared to stay? Are other honourable senators prepared to stay? If honourable members do not feel that this bill has received proper consideration in this house, I say let us send it to a committee and consider it there. I invite them to do that.

Having made that comment, I would like to add that there is to be no choking off of debate in connection with any bill or motion so far as I am concerned. I do not particularly like the suggestion of the honourable gentleman that I propose to choke off my debate.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The words "choking off of our investigation" were used. I can assure him that as far as I am concerned there is no desire to choke off debate on or investigation of any bill.

The honourable leader opposite said that perhaps I kept the Senate here too long. Well, I sometimes felt that way myself, but I can say that my sympathy for other members went to such an extent that on one occasion when I thought the Senate would likely sit for one day only I went to the considerable trouble of sending a telegram to each and every senator living outside of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I suggested in the telegram that they might not come if they felt they did not want to. Of course, I could not tell them not to come. I know the Leader of the Opposition appreciated that, as did other senators.

We have taken it upon ourselves to repose in the Speaker of the Senate the responsibility of calling back the Senate during an adjournment if an emergency should arise prior to the date fixed for our reassembling. That has been done in certain instances, always after the Speaker has consulted with the Leader of the Government.

Honourable senators, it occurs to me that next session the motion might be widened so that His Honour the Speaker, after consultation with the Leader of the Government, could extend the date of adjournment.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Let us suppose that we adjourned for two weeks, and at the end of the two weeks there was no business, why could not the Speaker, after consultation, extend that date for another week? I make that suggestion for what it is worth, with a view to meeting the convenience of honourable senators, and so that I may not be accused of having them sit here longer than they actually should.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: May I say to the honourable gentleman that the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) was very definite in saying that he was not criticizing the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), and in saying so I think he spoke for everybody. The courtesy and kindness of the Leader of the Government is beyond criticism, and I am quite certain that the Leader of the Opposition made it clear that he was not criticizing him.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am sure of that. At any rate, when I made reference to the house sitting too long I intended it to be in a jocular tone. I hope the Leader of the Opposition did not take my remark too seriously, for it was far from my mind to make such a suggestion seriously.

However, I wish to make a comment on his statement that more legislation should be introduced by this house. I agree with him; but I feel that I should point out that under our Constitution money bills, as they are called, cannot be introduced in the Senate, as the Leader of the Opposition has said. Some day I think that might be changed; at least, that is a question which we might consider. If that were done more bills could be introduced here. However, I have made every effort to have bills introduced here which did not have a money question, and if the legislation of this session is reviewed I think it will be found that, probably with one exception, all bills which were not money bills have been introduced in this house.

Hon. Mr. Power: What about the bill to promote equal pay for female employees, and also the act to amend the Indian Act, which were debated here this morning?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Both those bills have a money content.

Hon. Mr. Power: Have they?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Oh, yes. The bill to promote equal pay for female employees certainly has a money content. That is true also of the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Indian Act.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The Small Loans Act could not have been introduced here.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald:. The Leader of the Opposition is right, I think, in saying that the Small Loans Bill could not have been introduced here. I do not think there was a money content in the Telegraphs Bill, which was introduced in the other house; but by and large there are few Government bills which have not quite a substantial money content.

Honourable senators, I will take the advice of the Leader of the Opposition and continue to have as many bills as possible introduced here.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: As early as possible.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, I shall introduce as many bills as possible here and as early as possible; but I doubt if in any session a larger proportion of the total number of bills can be introduced in the Senate than have been introduced here this session.

The Leader of the Opposition also rather blamed the Government for taking so long with its bills in the other house. I think if he will read the Commons Hansard he will find that it was the Opposition that took the time over there, if he will add up the columns of speeches made by Government members he will find them to be few compared with those filled by speeches made by the Opposition members. I do not accuse the Opposition of holding up bills, but if bills have been delayed I contend that the delay was not occasioned by the Government. I do not like to have either the other house or this house accused of holding up bills. Parliament is a place where there should be full discussion, and I think we should not look too critically at either house when considerable time is spent in dealing with legislation.

I trust that my remarks this morning were in no way uncomplimentary to the Leader of the Opposition. In fact, when I learned that he might not be present at many more sittings this session I decided that I would rise and thank him for the help he has given me.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In his relations with me the Leader of the Opposition has gone far beyond normal co-operation. He has never made demands, but from time to time he has made suggestions and they have always been helpful. I wish to assure him and the house that my task here this year has been made much easier and more pleasant than it otherwise would have been, because of the great assistance I have received from the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Norman P. Lambert: Honourable senators, I should like to have the privilege of returning to the discussion of the third reading of the bill which is before us, with special reference to section 4, the explanatory note on which reads:

> This provision is new. Its purpose is to deem as contributors under the public service superannuation Act as well as under the Civil Service Superannuation Act all former permanent employees (i.e., established civil servants) of the Government of the province of Newfoundland who became employed by the Government of Canada pursuant to an offer of employment made in accordance with the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada.

I assume from the remarks already made here that this bill is not likely to be referred to a committee for further examination. On that assumption I should like to request the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) to be good enough to present information bearing on clause 4 as to how many contributors and how much in contributions will be added to the superannuation fund as a result of this particular provision. At the same time, I think it would be useful to have some statement regarding the financial status of the fund itself.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I shall endeavour to get the information for the honourable senator before the house prorogues, if possible.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: May I ask the honourable leader whether the bill could not stand until the information is made available?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It could stand for third reading, and if I am able to get the information I shall be glad to supply it.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: The bill is now up for third reading.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If my honourable friend wishes to do so, he can adjourn the debate on the motion for third reading, and I shall endeavour to get the information he has requested.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hackett, the debate was adjourned.

CANADA-GERMANY INCOME TAX AGREEMENT BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 452, an act to implement an agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it may be possible to proceed with this order later this day, but if not it can be adjourned to a later date.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Second reading later this day.

CANADA-UNITED STATES OF AMERICA TAX CONVENTION BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 451, an act to amend The Canada-United States of America Tax Convention Act, 1943.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall the bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Later this day.

At one o'clock the Senate adjourned until 3 p.m.

At 3 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

INCOME TAX BILL

COMMITTEE AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendment made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce on Bill 418, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act.

Hon. C. G. Power: Honourable senators, I move concurrence in the report of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I would move that the amendment and the report of the committee be not concurred in, but that the house resolve itself into a committee of the whole to consider such amendment.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate went into committee on the bill.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Golding in the Chair.

Clause 1.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I have had an opportunity of examining the report of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce with reference to this Bill 418, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act. I observe that the committee has suggested an amendment to clause 1 of the bill which would strike out the words "of any kind whatsoever" from lines 6 and 7 on page 1. As I understand the position, doubts had arisen before the Income Tax Appeal Board as to the proper interpretation to be placed upon the expression "board, lodging and other benefits". In one view the words "other benefits" should be given a limited construction—ejusdem generis, it is called—so that the benefits referred to would have to be of the same general character as "board" and "lodging". In another view the words "other benefits" should be construed in their ordinary wide connotation and not be limited by the preceding words "board" and "lodging". The Government decided to remove the existing doubt by the insertion of the words "of any kind whatsoever" in the present bill. These additional words would have the effect of insuring that the words "other benefits" would be given the widest connotation. The effect of the amendment proposed by the Standing Committee—that is to say, the deletion of the words "of any kind whatsoever"—would leave the position as it now stands under the Income Tax Act and the existing doubt would remain unresolved, at any rate by the present legislation. If the amendment proposed by the Standing Committee were to have any effect at all it would be in the direction of reducing the tax.

Before expressing an opinion as to the desirability or otherwise of adopting the proposed amendment at this time, I would like to make it perfectly clear that in my view the Senate is empowered to amend Bill 418 in the manner suggested. As honourable senators know, a special committee was appointed by the Senate in 1918 to consider the rights of the Senate in matters of financial legislation. The report of that committee was presented to the Senate on May 15, 1918, and was at that time fully debated in this house. The report was unanimously adopted on May 22 of that year, as is shown by the Senate Journals, 1918, page 241. To my knowledge the Senate has at no time subsequent thereto expressed any view contrary to those adopted at that time, nor do I suggest that it should.

The relevant portion of the report, so far as the proposed amendment is concerned, is clause (1) thereof, which reads as follows:

> 1. That the Senate of Canada has and always had since it was created, the power to amend bills originating in the Commons appropriating any part of the revenue or imposing a tax by reducing the amounts therein, but has not the right to increase the same without the consent of the crown.

It is therefore, in my opinion, abundantly clear from the report that the Senate could, if it so desired, properly adopt the proposed amendment.

At the same time there remains an important question as to the extent to which, and the occasions on which, the Senate should exercise its powers with respect to financial legislation, especially measures designed to raise the necessary revenues. I believe that I could do no better than to quote the remarks made by the late Senator Dandurand with respect to the report which I have mentioned, during the debate in the Senate in March, 1922, at page 17 of the Senate Debates for that year:

> I desire to say that I will not recede from the position I then took. I may question the wisdom, but will never question the right, of this chamber to intervene in the discussion of the money bills that are presented to it. The situation is so grave that I am sure the Government and the people are entitled to the co-operation of all the members of the two branches of Parliament in the solution of our financial difficulties.

I must say that I question whether this is an occasion on which the Senate should assert its authority with respect to financial measures. The fact is that doubts had arisen with regard to the proper interpretation of paragraph (a) of section 5 of the Income Tax Act. After careful consideration and mature deliberation the Department of Finance, the Government and the House of Commons have alike concluded (a) that the doubts should be resolved, and (b) that they should be resolved in the manner indicated in the present bill. In my opinion it would be most unwise, although within its legal competence, for the Senate to substitute its judgment in this matter at this time. I believe that so far as possible "the balance of ways and means" should be preserved, and that the Senate should not lightly or without the most mature reflection upset the calculations of those charged with making those calculations and with the preparation and initiation of the measures designed to bring them into effect.

I do not believe that the clause concerned is of such a nature or order that the Senate should intervene at this time. For these reasons, I must oppose the amendment suggested by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. C. G. Power: Honourable senators, as the person who moved in the committee that the words "of any kind whatsoever" be struck from the bill, perhaps I should give some explanation of the reasons why I did so. By long conviction—a conviction perhaps now antiquated, perhaps romantic—I have always believed that it was the duty of the legislature to protect the subject as against the crown, the citizen against the state, and in matters of taxation to take a good look at the onerous burdens placed by the tax collector on the taxpayer. In this instance we find that the department—and I am not blaming them—in order to bring about what they think is a more efficient administration of the act, have decided to insert in it what I call an omnibus provision. The duty of administrators—there are those who call them bureaucrats—is to bring about the most efficient administration possible, but sometimes they forget that something else is involved besides running a country as if it were a machine: there is the human element, the element of the rights of the subject.

In this particular instance it appears that one member of the Income Tax Appeal Board expressed a certain view; another one, without giving a decision, took another view. It is my contention that the department should first have thoroughly exhausted all the legal points of view in this matter. They have not done so, but in order to insure themselves against any case wherein a doubt may arise they have endeavoured in this bill—before the case has been thoroughly discussed in the courts, before this matter of interpretation, which is all it is, has been fully considered by the courts—to take the attitude, "In any case, if our powers under the act are not sufficient, we are just going to throw the kitchen stove at them; we are going to make sure that we collect from all and sundry".

It is a long time since I went to law school; but I was taught there, and I believe it is a fundamental principle of law, that when taxation is imposed it should be specific and on specific things, otherwise there would be no reason in the world why the crown could not require us to tax, as they require revenue and at their discretion, in any place where money could be found. I have checked the whole sphere of that kind of language in legislation. It does not give the taxpayer a break; the cards are stacked and the dice loaded against him before he starts. At any rate he should have a reasonable right to defend himself. But no: in case that right may arise, in case it may be found that the interpretation given by one judge is the right one, the authorities come before Parliament and say, "In any event we are going to make the language of the act broad enough to cover everything". I concede that a case can be made on behalf of the tax collector. It may be there are people who evade this tax because the language is not broad enough. But I am reminded of the days when I paid a great deal of attention to soldiers' pensions. At that time someone was sure to come before the committee with a case which strongly appealed to its sympathies, and as a result amendments were passed by which hundreds of people who had no claim at all to pensions were brought under the scope of the Pension Act. In other words, hard cases made bad law. Here the reverse is the case. It may be that, in order to effect the aims of the department and its officers regarding some people who are abusing the law, we shall expose to their activities thousands of people in less favourable circumstances, having small incomes. and without the ability to protect themselves or to engage counsel to defend them. My contention is that, if the department and the Government wish to attack a particular class of persons who at the moment are evading the law, those classes should be specified in the bill, and the act should not be made so broad that it will impose hardship on thousands of people of small means throughout the country.

I am not going to discuss the examples which were given in committee to show that the amendment is aimed at people with Cadillacs, nor shall I compare owners of Cadillacs with persons who receive a turkey for Christmas. But between the Cadillac class and the turkey class are very large numbers of people who may or may not receive benefits, who perhaps are unaffected by the existing law, and who may be covered by the kind of language used in the bill.

I do not propose to refer to the constitutional aspect of the question which was raised by my honourable friend the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). I do not know why he brought it up. But if we were to concur in the hint he gave us, that we had no right to interfere with this—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Oh, no, I gave an opinion directly to the contrary.

Hon. Mr. Power: I know my honourable friend the leader quoted a contrary opinion, but he certainly gave the impression that there was some doubt whether we had the right to move this amendment.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Power: He said we had the right, and then he questioned it on other grounds.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The propriety of it.

Hon. Mr. Power: The propriety? Well, with respect to the propriety, my conscience is my own.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: And the advisability.

Hon. Mr. Power: I have been long enough in public affairs to know what is proper or not proper, and I am not going to take any lessons from the honourable leader.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not want to quarrel with my honourable friend. I did not intend, by the use of the word "propriety", to question whether it is a proper thing for him to do, but whether it is a proper type of amendment for us to accept. I know the honourable senator knows what is proper in every respect. I was not referring to him personally, and I do not think he should have interpreted my words in a personal sense.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I have listened to the two speeches on this matter which so far I have been privileged to hear, and as one of the members of the standing committee which had to consider this amendment to section 1 of the bill to amend the Income Tax Act, perhaps I may be allowed to express my own views. I am afraid that I disagree in some respects both with the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and with the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power). Dealing first with the amendment itself, my personal view is that it accomplishes precisely nothing, that whether we add these words "of any kind whatsoever" to section 1 of the bill or whether we leave them out makes no legal difference as to the tax which is to be imposed by this section.

Let me try to explain my position. This section deals with income tax imposed upon employees of corporations. The bill in its original form provided that the tax should be imposed upon such employees in respect of, and I quote:

> The value of board, lodging and other benefits. . .

Now, to an ordinary lawyer I think that means what it says—"board, lodging and other benefits"—and I understand that in practice the Income Tax Branch has in the past considered these words to include any kind of benefit which a company gives to its employees in addition to cash. Of course there are many kinds of those benefits. I hardly need to go into them for the sake of honourable senators. For example, a commercial company may grant to its employees the right to purchase its goods at a large discount from the price payable by the public. That is a benefit that is indirectly part of the salary of those employees. Another example on perhaps a slightly different scale, is that of a number of companies who pay the club fees of their executive officers. That is a benefit which those officers derive. It is part of their income, and I can see no reason why, when you are trying to estimate a man's income for the purpose of taxing him, any benefit of that kind which he receives as a result of his employment, even though it may not be in actual cash, should not be included in his taxable income. That is my understanding of the section as it stood before the proposed amendment, and that is the view which the Income Tax Branch has always taken.

The only reason why this amendment was suggested was that some doubt—I do not think it is much of a doubt, and it has not been crystallized into a judgment—had arisen as a result of two conflicting views which apparently developed in the Income Tax Appeal Board.

In one judgment of the board one of the members took the view which I have just expressed. He said that the value of the board, lodging and other benefits included every kind of benefit which an employee would receive from his employer. An opposite view was expressed in the form of what we lawyers call an obiter dictum, an opinion expressed by one of the members of the board and not forming part of the judgment. In this case the member took the view that the words "board, lodging and other benefits" should be restricted to other benefits of the same nature as board and lodging. It was in order to clear up any possible doubt that this restricted meaning was the correct interpretation of this section that it was proposed to amend the bill by adding the words "of any kind whatsoever" after the word "benefits".

In the view that I take of this matter it makes no difference whether those words are added or not. I listened to the discussion in committee last night and I voted against the amendment of my honourable friend from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power), for it seemed to me that the view which the Income Tax Branch has been taking in the past, and the view expressed by one of the board members to whom I referred a moment ago, has been that that is what the section means in any event, and that it might just as well be clarified. In my opinion it makes very little difference whether we accept the suggestion in this bill and add the words "of any kind whatsoever" to section 1, or whether we adopt the view of the honourable senator from Gulf and drop these words. My own preference would be to make it abundantly clear that any kind of benefit an employee gets from his employer should be considered as part of his income. I think that is the logical, correct and proper thing to do. If it should come to a vote I will certainly vote against the amendment of the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power).

Dealing with the remarks of my honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), I must say I was rather surprised and a little disquieted by the very high ground which he took in reference to the wisdom of this house or the right of this house—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Not the right.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: —the advisability of this house suggesting a very minor amendment of wording to an income tax act. I have been a member of the Senate for quite a number of years now, and in our consideration of income tax legislation as it has come before us year after year we have always felt in the Banking and Commerce Committee that we were at least free to make suggestions as to changes in wording and alterations of paragraphs, and so on, which did not vitally affect the tax structure proposed by the Government and approved by the House of Commons. For the life of me I cannot see why a minor amendment of this category, which merely relates to a question of words, should be visited by the thunder and lightning of my honourable friend the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You flatter me.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That is really all I had to say on these two points. First of all, I think that the amendment proposed is a wise one, and I shall vote against the dropping of those words as proposed by the honourable senator from Gulf. Secondly, I must take exception to the, as I think, rather too rigid view which the Leader of the Government expressed as to the wisdom of this Senate touching or attempting to deal in any way with the phraseology of a tax bill which comes before us.

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, I do not propose to deal with the constitutional point of view at all. I think that such a minor amendment as this does not justify a discussion of the constitutional right of the Senate to amend money bills. I have little doubt of the right of the Senate to amend the wording of an act, even if it has to do with taxation, and therefore I do not think the constitutional question of the legal right of the Senate to make the amendment need be considered. This amendment is only a matter of interpretation. It has been said by some senators in the course of the discussion, that the amendment in their opinion, does not mean anything. If that is so I do not think we are prohibited from striking it out of the bill.

I propose to say a few words about the amendment that was made yesterday in the Banking and Commerce Committee. One of the members who spoke a few moments ago said that he was satisfied with the wording of the bill before the amendment was made, and that the amendment did not change anything. But if the words that the bill inserts in the act do not mean anything, why put them in? On the other hand, if they do add something to the act they are worth discussing and examining. In my opinion, they do add something to the act. The Minister of Finance, during the course of the lengthy discussion that occurred in the other place, stated very definitely that he did not see how he could get money that he deems to be owing to the department without adding these words to the act. He may be right, and I am assuming that he is right. But if he wants to collect taxes that are rightfully owing, why does he not be more specific in the wording of the act? Why does he not enumerate the circumstances in which he thinks he should collect taxes, so that no one will be surprised? If he wants to include amounts spent in entertainment for high executives, or the payment of their club fees, why does he not say so? If he wants to tax the little presents that are given by companies or other employers to their employees at Christmas time, or on other occasions during the year, why does he not say so? The doubt that exists in the act even with the addition of the proposed words is not good for the general public of Canada. The Income Tax Act is already loose enough and difficult of interpretation; it is extremely difficult for the taxpayers not only to understand but to comply with the requirements unless they are enumerated in the act. I do not think a department has the right to tell employees who receive a turkey at Christmas that they will have to pay tax on its value. I hope they are not going to tell an employee who receives $25 at Christmas every year that he must pay tax on that little gift. I hope that the girl who is employed by a company and gets a wedding gift will not have to pay income tax on the value of the gift.

What I am afraid of is that the income tax authorities will not use discretion. It will not be an officer of the Income Tax Department who will indicate that such and such a thing ought to be taxed; it will be the small inspector who goes from house to house and from company to company who will include the item or items in the tax report of an employee. Then later on the employee will be told, "Well, it is too bad, but we cannot do anything—the law is there." That is what the officials have said up to the present time, and they have the right to say so—they have no discretion.

Honourable senators, if we retain this proposed amendment in the bill—and I am sure it will be retained—I think it will be regrettable, and a lot of people will be affected by it. I do not care at all if the desire is to tax a high executive on the club fees paid by his company, the entertainment allowances he receives, or the automobile that is put at his disposal. That is all right. But why does the act not specify these taxes?

I regret that the proposed addition is not clear enough and does not indicate the cases in which the department wants to levy taxation. I am afraid the general interpretation that will be given to the act will affect and embarrass many people through taxation of insignificant matters.

Hon. Mr. Howden: May I ask the honourable senator a question? If we have not enough knowledge now to correct the situation, where are we going to find it?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I cannot give an answer to that question. It is up to other people to do it.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, I do not pose as a tax expert. I think the question of whether or not we have the power to make an amendment of this kind is beyond dispute, and that the power of the Senate with regard to legislation is co-equal with that of the members in the House of Commons. We cannot amend legislation in any way that will mean an increased charge upon the revenues, neither can a private member of the House of Commons introduce legislation for that purpose. But apart from that limitation, the Senate has full power, in my judgment, to deal with an amendment of this kind.

Then comes the question of whether the amendment is advisable. If it is not advisable for this house to consider amendments of this kind, what on earth are we here for?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: As far as I am concerned, the motive or the purpose behind the proposed amendment to the act is rather obscure. I am inclined to agree with the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), that it does not seem to add clarity to the existing provision in the law. It appears to me to be one of those amendments where some tax gatherers—I was almost going to say bureaucrats, but I shall not use that term—have come to the conclusion: if we can't catch them one way, we will catch them another way.

That is not a sound basis for any form of taxation. If there is one fundamental right of the subject in matters of taxation, it is that the tax be clear and definite as far as it is possible to establish it. This amendment makes no contribution to the law in this way at all, as I understand it. Just what does it mean?

A few years ago I was living in an apartment block in the city of Winnipeg. We had there a very good caretaker, who no doubt received a salary from the owners of the building. As he was a very obliging man, when Christmas came around I bought a turkey, at a cost of perhaps $5 or $6, and presented it to him and his wife. Now, is there anyone who will argue that he should take the value of the turkey and add it to his income so that the National Revenue authorities can collect tax on it? Is that within the scope of reason at all? I cannot imagine that it is. Yet, I venture to say that under this amendment, in a court of law the taxation authorities could prosecute that caretaker because he did not include that benefit in his tax return. That is only one illustration of a great many that could be given.

If an executive has an efficient secretary, and on his or her birthday he wants to make a present of a box of chocolates worth $10—

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: A pretty good box.

Hon. Mr. Power: A pretty good secretary.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Is that a benefit under this section? I do not think there is any question that that interpretation would be put on it. Do we want to use this sort of thing to increase the revenues?

I agree with my colleague to my right (Hon. Mr. Power) that there is provision in the law for appeal. And when the taxing authorities brought it to a certain point, why did they not go on and endeavour to clarify the law They could have done so, but they realized this was a troublesome mattter and decided to try to cure it by an all-embracing amendment. For the life of me, I cannot understand why it should be done.

For those reasons, and not because I am in a militant mood, for I am not, I am going to support the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power).

Hon. Mr. John T. Hackett: Honourable senators, so that the honourable gentleman from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) may not feel too lonely in his excursion into the unknown, I shall be pleased to accompany him, if there is an opportunity to vote. But my reasons for supporting the committee amendment are not entirely his.

We find ourselves at a time in our national growth and life when taxation is necessary, and I think most of us appreciate the difficulty of administering that part of the Government business. I for one would like to leave a little discretion to the honesty, good heart good feeling and decency of the people who are entrusted with the administration; and I am reluctant to make taxation in itself so hateful that it becomes in effect like a law known as the Volstead Act, which was passed in a country not far from us. However, I must say that the decision in respect to it has enured to our benefit. It so incensed the people of that country, its persecutions and its prosecutions brought so much ill will, that in the fullness of time, and the fullness of the purse of that neighbouring country, it had to be written off.

We cannot afford to belittle our taxing acts by writing into them patricular incidents and opportunities like this.

Some years ago, just before the last war, I was in Austria. When something was said by one of my companions to some Austrian people about Hitler, the answer was that their worry was not Hitler so much as it was all the little Hitlers who made life unbearable.

We do not want to make our legislation, which is so essential, and on the whole so fair, difficult of administration because of something that denies the flow of the milk of human kindness.

I notice that some honourable gentlemen opposite feel that legislation must be very definite and that every detail must be nailed down. I do not share that view entirely. Those of us who are lawyers know that good judges administer the law wisely. As one honourable senator has said, if the law is not going to be made more specific by adding this paragraph, why add it? It certainly would make the law more objectionable to many people, and without purpose.

Hon. John J. Kinley: Honourable senators, I am a member of the committee which considered this bill, and I voted for the amendment in the committee. I think it passed by a vote of 12 to 5. That being so, and with a small attendance in the house this afternoon, it seems to me to be a bit extraordinary to try to upset the work of that commitee now.

I am in favour of the committee's amendment because I think the new words in the bill as presented to us are too inclusive. I regard that part of the bill as an invasion of the liberty of the subject and as something that would create ill will in this country.

I have never had any difficulty with income tax inspectors in my plant. For many years at Christmas time we gave our employees turkeys; and later we received a ruling from the inspector that we could give our employees a present of $25 without treating it as income received by them. From that I concluded that inspectors had some discretion. Now it appears that the discretion is to be removed, because under the amendment, "benefits of any kind whatsoever" would be taxable.

My honourable friend from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), whose opinions we all respect, said that the words are worth nothing. Well, if they are worth nothing they should not be there. But if they are important enough to cause a difference of opinion between two judges, we as laymen must make our decision accordingly. He referred to the practice of stores giving their employees a discount on goods that they buy there, and said that the value of such goods would have to be added to their taxable income. I would like to point out that the allowing of discounts to employees is an old established custom in every well managed store. The practice applies also to other lines of business. If you do something which stops that practice in Canada a lot of people will think that the laws of this country are too exacting and that the liberty of the subject is being invaded.

This morning I was talking to my wife over the telephone, and she told me that we had received an invitation to be present next week at the wedding of an employee in our plant. He is an important employee and we will naturally give him a wedding present. Now under this proposed amendment to the act I would have to add the value of that present to his income, for tax purposes. It seems to me an extraordinary thing to have to do.

I would like to point out another situation that will cause some ill feeling. On occasions our men go to Halifax to work. The scale of wages in the country is a little lower than in Halifax, and I have had complaints from the union that our men were working at a lower rate of pay than was being paid for similar work in that city. We notified the union that in addition to paying their wages we pay their board and lodging, and if the two items were added together the compensation would be higher than the pay in the city. However, the union did not want to accept that explanation. Again, when Friday night comes around our men generally want to go back to their homes, and as our trucks are returning in that direction we carry them back home without charge. If this amendment passes we will have to make a charge for giving them a lift home. It seems to me that that would certainly cause ill will.

The departmental inspectors are very intelligent men. They come to our plant and go over the books, and from what I can gather they are very careful in their work. One inspector from the Sales Tax Division came to our plant, looked over our books and said: "There is nothing I can find to report on. Surely I should be able to find something to justify my being here today". But he could find nothing, and he went away pleased.

The tax collector wants to put a blanket over everything: if you can get out from under, all right. That has been so all through the years, when I was a member of the Legislature of Nova Scotia, and also after I came here. Talk about "the liberty of the subject", when what a man is being asked to do is to prove himself innocent! There is now on the statute books legislation under which an inspector from the Fisheries Department can go in and make an arrest, and the obligation is on the man arrested to prove himself innocent in a case which is pretty much a matter of opinion. I have always thought that that kind of thing was bad law, and that it was something which should not be permitted, because we always assume that a man is innocent until he is proven guilty. However, in the enforcement of this law the officials seem to take the ground that efficiency is everything.

In discussing this procedure with a woman acquaintance who was a law clerk in the income tax branch of the Department of National Revenue I remarked that it was terrible. She said, "Without it we could not get convictions". My reply was that it seemed to me the department should take its chances without resort to provisions of that kind. But it does not do so, and now the law is so stringent that one's chances are doubtful even if one is innocent. It seems to me what is uppermost in the minds of the officials is the idea of making collections easily and without expense, and they have little regard for the liberty of the subject.. But such actions have wide significance; and I agree with the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power), who has been long in public life and has good political sense, that we would be well advised to leave the act unamended in this respect. I shall vote, as I did in the committee, for the honourable senator's motion.

Hon. Gray Turgeon: Since I intend to vote against the amendment of the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power) I want to say a word, not argumentatively but by way of explanation of the amendment proposed by the bill. I am taking the liberty of doing so in spite of the fact that I am not a lawyer, and have no connection with the administration of courts or the formulation of judgments under the existing legislation. The present wording in the act is "the value of board, lodging and other benefits (except the benefit he derives from his employer's contributions . . .)", and if I correctly understand the matter a question arose as to whether the word "and other benefits" meant benefits other than from board and lodging or included what is ordinarily meant and understood by those words.

Since this amendment has been put in the bill, it is clear that the existing legislation was designed and passed in the other house to include benefits outside of those comprised in the term "board and lodging", and the amendment in the bill for which we are asked to vote is for the purpose of clarifying the situation to make it plain that board and lodging are not included within the meaning of the three words "and other benefits". The words "of any kind whatsoever" are inserted by way of interpretation of the fact that "and other benefits" in the existing legislation are outside of the term "board and lodging", and the exception still remains, as stated: "except the benefit he derives from his employer's contributions to or under. . ." —in place of "an approved superannuation fund or plan"—"a registered pension fund or plan." That change might make more difference to the effect of the legislation than the words "of any kind whatsoever", concerning which we are to vote in a little while, because these four words relate only to the benefits under the term "board, lodging and other benefits". To repeat: the words "registered pension fund or plan" may make a bigger difference than the words "of any kind whatsoever". Therefore, as a parliamentarian, I intend so to vote for retention of the words "or any kind whatsoever" in the bill. Between now and the next session we can easily examine the whole situation, and if it is shown that the addition of these words will inflict an injustice upon taxpayers we can take such action at that time as we see fit. If, however, these words are deleted we shall throw back on the Tariff Board the same element of doubt which evidently exists, and which led the other house to pass this clarifying phrase.

As I have said, I therefore intend to vote against the proposal of the honourable senator from Gulf and in favour of the bill as it has come to us from the House of Commons. I hope that all honourable senators present and other parliamentarians will study the whole situation between now and the next session to ascertain whether any of the fears which have been expressed by some honourable senators prove to be well founded.

Hon. J. Adelard Godbout: Honourable senators, I do not suppose you expect a long speech from me on this matter. I am not on expert on taxation, and perhaps if I were to begin to review the subject in English I would have to switch at some time to French.

At the outset let me say that I shall vote against the proposed amendment of the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power). The purpose of this bill is to clarify the position as to taxable revenues from employees and from industries. There is no doubt in the mind of any honourable senator, that the house has the right to amend the bill. But after the explanation of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) I do not think there can be any reasonable doubt as to the advisability of approving the bill. Someone questioned whether the four words "of any kind whatsoever" would add anything to the force of the law, but on that point I am of the opinion of the honourable senator from Cariboo (Hon. Mr. Turgeon). It is felt by the departmental officials that the addition of these words would clarify the legislation, and of course we want our legislation to be as clear as possible. We have already been told that a member of the Income Tax Appeal Board expressed a doubt as to what the present law means. If there is a doubt in the mind of a member of such an important board, how could we not expect there to be a doubt in the minds of the taxpayers and tax collectors? That is why I am in favour of clarifying the situation.

As to going as far as the honourable senator from Gulf suggests and defining everything that should be taxable, I think the reverse would be much better. If we legislated that every gift should be taxable but felt that small gifts like chocolates, cigars and cigarettes should be excluded, we would then have to say so. This would result in enumerating thousands of articles in detail. Instead of clarifying the law that would be making it more cumbersome. So I am opposed to the amendment suggested by the honourable senator from Gulf. I am satisfied that we have the right to amend this bill, but at the same time I think we should accept the advice of the departmental officials. We are not familar with the difficulties they encounter in administering the income tax law, but I have every confidence in them, just as I have in our other civil servants, and if the department feels that the amendment contained in the bill is required I think we should accept it.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, as the one who explained this bill in the house on second reading, I should say something in connection with this proposed amendment. I rise to do so with great reluctance after hearing what men of so much more experience have already said about the amendment and about general position of the taxpayer under the law.

I must say that I was particularly impressed by the argument made by the honourable gentleman from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power), and if it were not for the fact that I have a different idea about the practical effects of this legislation I would certainly be on his side. In many respects his argument is a very good one, particularly what he says about the general circumstances of the small taxpayer and the protection we should give him in his dealings with the crown.

Having said this I think it might be appropriate to look again at the section of the act which is being amended. It is section 5, and it reads:

> Income for a taxation year from an office or employment is the salary, wages and other remuneration, including gratuities, received by the taxpayer in the year plus > (a) the value of board, lodging and other benefits—

And I will omit the part in brackets.

> —received or enjoyed by him in the year in respect of, in the course of or by virtue of the office or the employment . . .

Perhaps I might say just at the end of this paragraph that my honourable friend from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) can continue to give the janitor a turkey without worrying about the janitor having to declare its value in his income tax return, for I assume that my honourable colleague is not the employer of the janitor. The janitor would probably be working for the landlord. The act says "in the course of or by virtue of the office or the employment", and I do not think there would be any question as far as interpretation on that point is concerned. I believe that is so.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It may be argued that the janitor got the turkey by virtue of his employment, but it seems to me that an interpretation of that kind would be too severe.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: What if his employer gave him the turkey?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Well, as I said when I explained the bill on second reading, this is a basket item; and I think that turkey would go into the basket. I would like to deal with this point in more detail later on.

Hon. Mr. Power: It might be advisable for the employer to fire the janitor the night before giving him the turkey.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: And rehire him the next day.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes. Perhaps the employee should have the honourable gentleman from Gulf as his lawyer.

Paragraph (b) of section 5 of the act provides that:

> All amounts received by him in the year as an allowance for personal or living expenses or as an allowance for any other purpose except . . .

Then there are certain exceptions. I mention that because the honourable gentleman from Queens-Lunenburg (Hon. Mr. Kinley) referred to the fact that certain of his employees were paid expenses when they travelled outside their own municipality on company business. There is a section in the act to cover that situation, and this item here would not affect that position at all. There may be other specific examples which have been discussed here which perhaps I am overlooking, but I have mentioned these two to clarify just what the proposed amendment purports to do and not for the purpose of disagreeing with the honourable gentleman from Gulf.

I regret I must disagree with my honourable colleague from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), but lawyers are constantly disagreeing. If they didn't they probably would not be able to earn a living. However, I disagree with great deference, for I do value the opinions that he expresses, as I know all honourable senators do.

It seems to me that the legislation as it is now written is subject to this weakness, that a court might easily apply what is called the ejusdem generis rule. That simply means that the courts might very well interpret the language "board, lodging and other benefits" to mean "board, lodging and other benefits of the character of board and lodging". May I point out that it was not a court of law that had expressed an opinion on the interpretation of those words. It was the Income Tax Appeal Board which, strictly speaking, is not a court of law. May I point out that the ejusdem generis rule to which I referred is a rule well recognized in our courts. And I think that there is some reason to expect that if the rule is applied, benefits of a major character might very well be given tax free to employees. Such employees, if taxed, might go to the courts. The courts might well say that a benefit like a Cadillac is not of the class of "board and lodging" or a benefit of that character and so is not taxable. To use some of the examples given by the Minister of Finance in the other house, I could mention refrigerators and life insurance premiums on the lives of executives where the beneficiary is not the company but persons of the nomination of the executive on whose life the insurance is taken, and perhaps even club memberships, and items of that character.

Honourable senators, as to the argument made by the honourable gentleman from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power) in connection with a small benefit like a turkey, or the honourable gentleman from Lunenburg (Hon. Mr. Kinley) in connection with a $25 gift at Christmas, I think there is some cause for concern when we look at this amendment. But when we look at the larger possible benefits which might be given by employers to employees, examples of which I have given, and which the courts might hold to be exempt under the present law, I think none of us wants to be in the position where such large benefits should escape taxation. In my opinion, the clear meaning of section 5 is that we do not want that to happen.

Honourable senators, I now depart from a discussion of the legal principle, and enter a realm which I know the honourable gentleman from Gulf will castigate me for entering. On July 31 of this year, in the other place, the Minister of Finance discussed this matter. I realize that I am slightly out of order in referring specifically to a debate in the other place, but I think it is important and useful for us to consider what he said. The minister was considering the position of the small man and of the small gift under this legislation, and he said, as appears from the Commons Hansard at page 6763:

> . . . we do not intend to extend the present practice of assessing every kind of benefit . . . and . . . if at a later time it is brought to my attention that there has been an increase in the class of gifts or benefits provided for I will agree that that was not intended and we would then have an amendment to provide for it specifically.

By that language, as I understand it, he is giving an undertaking as minister—as representing the Executive of the day—that the administration of this section of the Income Tax Act is not going to change in so far as the present practice is concerned. May I say that so far as I know the present practice of trying to tax large benefits of the character I have described is a practice that is recognized under the law today. I think every honourable senator would want it to be recognized. The small benefit, however, is a benefit that in the administration is not considered to be a taxable benefit.

Let us remember, too, that section 112(3) reads as follows:

> Where the value of all gifts made by a donor to an individual in a taxation year does not exceed $1,000, those gifts are exempt from tax under this Part.

Now, an enactment with respect to the relationship between employer and employee is more specific than this general statement, but from this general provision some idea of the spirit of the act can be obtained. Taxpayers can make gifts of less than $1,000 to any individual without attracting a gift tax. The position under the act as exemplified in that section indicates that there is a recognition of the idea that relatively smaller gifts can be made.

Honourable senators, having said all this, I apologize for having taken so much time. I am sorry to be in the camp opposite my friend from Gulf. But it does seem to me that the kind of thing that he wants to get at is going to be looked after as the result of the undertaking of the minister, and that the kind of thing that he wants to tax is going to be clearly taxed. The fellow who gets a Cadillac, as my friend described it, or who has a big insurance premium paid for him, or who has his house furnished for him, is not going to be able to escape tax thereon as a result of the amendment that we have made.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: May I ask the honourable senator if the amendment, then, is really not in the nature of an experiment?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Well, I think almost every piece of tax legislation is in the nature of an experiment.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask the honourable senator if he is in favour of the amendment, or against it?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am against the amendment; I voted against it.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: That is, against the decision reached by the committee last night?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes; I voted against the decision of the committee in committee.

Hon. Mr. Power: Honourable senators, with respect to what my honourable friend from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) said, I am not going to castigate, I am going to weep for him. When a provision comes before any legislative chamber I do not attach any importance whatsoever to a statement made by a person, who, after all, is only temporarily in office—a minister of the crown—with respect to his future intentions. I have never been impressed at any time, no matter what Government was in office, with any statements as to its intentions with respect to legislation. The law is the law as written in the Statute Book, and this law must be followed by the civil servants who have to apply it, irrespective of the generous statement of the ministers of the crown who have introduced the legislation.

We are told that the proposed amendment introduced by the department was intended to clarify the legislation. Well, it seems to me extraordinary, if it was intended to clarify the legislation, that those honourable senators who are arguing in favour of it today cannot tell us what it means. To my mind the most logical speech made this afternoon was that by my friend the senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), who said it does not mean anything at all. Yet, he urged very strongly that it remain in the bill. Other senators, including my friend from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly), say it does mean something, that it is going to catch the man with the Cadillac.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): We hope.

Hon. Mr. Power: But if it catches more than the fellow with the Cadillac, next year the poor unfortunate small taxpayer will have paid his money, or been prosecuted by the courts and may have gone to jail. Out of the generosity of our hearts we have by another section of the act allowed people to make a gift of as much as $1,000 without tax. Therefore the lawmakers are generous, and we show it by the book.

It seems to me there has not been much clarification demonstrated on the part of the proponents of this amendment. So, why should it be inserted in the act? I can see no reason for making the provision so broad.

If I may make a suggestion for consideration in another year, it would be this: why would it not be possible to use the words "benefits of any kind over . . .", and then state a certain amount. If the department wants to get only the big amounts which have escaped taxation by indirect contribution to an employer or to an executive's salary, why cannot that be stated? It may not be necessary to say benefits by way of furnishing an insurance policy gratuitously, or by providing the use of an automobile, or paying club dues. But to make the provision as broad and general as is proposed here, that to me is objectionable. As I say, if it applied to benefits the value of which is so much, then I would not have much hesitation in accepting the views put forward by my honourable friends. But as the amendment is proposed, whatever its object may be, the authorities will catch the small man, and he is more susceptible to being caught and punished than is the executive who can afford high priced counsel and the best advice possible, and can bring his case before the highest authority.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is right.

Hon. Mr. Power: Let the department prosecute that type of man if they wish to, and get a judgment of the court.

What I object to generally, more than the proposal in this specific case, is the tendency on the part of the people who are charged with the administration of the affairs of this country to insert certain provisions in the law which tend to place the onus on an accused person to show that he is not guilty. I had the honour and privilege of administering a department of government for some years, and many times when my officers wished to introduce into the law a presumption of some kind—for instance, in such a statute as the Pure Food and Drug Act—I had to say to them that I could not possibly get such an amendment passed by a Liberal House of Commons. I emphasized the fact that you have to offer proof that a man is guilty of violating the law. My friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Hon. Mr. Kinley) has said that the reply by the officials often is "We can't convict them". I say: "That is too bad; you should go out and work a little harder and find out how you can convict them". I have told my officials in the department that I could not go to my colleagues in the cabinet or in the House of Commons and ask them to insert in statutes provisions which would make a man guilty without a full opportunity of having his case pleaded and putting the onus on us to decide whether prosecution was justified.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I do not wish to prolong this debate unduly. Apparently my opening remarks were misunderstood. I wish to impress the house with the fact that so far as I am concerned I feel that it is within the competence of the Senate to pass the amendment proposed by the committee. But I said in my opening remarks that I felt it would be inadvisable to pass the amendment; and after listening to the arguments put forth in support of it this afternoon, impressive and persuasive though they were, I am more convinced than ever that we should reject the amendment proposed in committee.

The honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) made a very outstanding speech in which he gave his interpretation of the act as it stands today and as it would be amended by this bill. His views were not followed entirely by the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly). However, they both feel that the amendment contained in the bill should remain. My friend from Cariboo (Hon. Mr. Turgeon) feels that the committee amendment should not pass, for another reason. My friend from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Godbout) feels that it should not pass, for still another reason. These are all convincing arguments, honourable senators, why the amendment proposed by the committee should be rejected.

The question has been raised as to whether the amendment contained in the bill clarifies the law. Whether it does or not, there are at the present time judges—I shall call them judges for this purpose—who have expressed opinions one way and another, making different interpretations of the law as it stands today. The cause for that difference of opinion will be removed when the amendment has passed. The law will at least be clarified to that extent. I feel convinced, therefore, that it would be wise on our part to approve of the amendment as contained in the bill.

The Chairman: The motion before the Chair, as I understand it, is for concurrence in the amendment moved in committee by Senator Power to clause 1 of this bill, to strike out the words "of any kind whatsoever". All in favour of the amendment will please say "Content".

Some Hon. Senators: Content.

The Chairman: Those opposed will please say "Non-content".

Some Hon. Senators: Non-content.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment defeated.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Let us have a standing vote.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Power was negatived on a standing vote: contents, 10; non-contents, 16.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Honourable senators, I was not in favour of the amendment and would have voted that way except that I was paired with the honourable senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard), who was in favour of the amendment to the bill.

The bill was reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed, on division.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION BILL

THIRD READING

The Senate resumed from this morning the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Golding for the third reading of Bill 440, an Act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) adjourned the debate in order that I might obtain certain information.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I have nothing more to say. My object was really to afford an opportunity for information to be obtained which had been asked for after the third reading had been moved.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: While this bill was under consideration the honourable the senior senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) spoke as follows:

I should like to request the Leader of the Government to be good enough to present information bearing on clause 4 as to how many contributors and how much in contributions will be added to to the superannuation fund as a result of this particular provision.

The answer to that is as follows: There are 19 cases which will derive immediate benefit from this amendment, and the number otherwise affected who will derive benefit in the future is expected to be small, probably not exceeding 30 altogether. Until either retirement or death takes place, the exact number will not be known. The remainder of the 1,188 persons who transferred in accordance with the pension provisions of the Terms of Union have been covered by the existing provisions of the statutes so that the additional liability to the Superannuation Account can be seen to be relatively small.

In the meantime, the contributions required of these persons will continue to be made so that honourable senators may rest assured that the normal payments will be made into the Superannuation Account.

The senior senator from Ottawa also said:

At the same time I think it would be useful to have some statement regarding the financial status of the fund itself.

I have that information. In fact I find that this information was given by the Honourable Mr. Harris, the Minister of Finance, to the Senate Standing Committee on Finance, and it appears in their record of May 10. It is as follows:

The total amount standing to the credit of the Superannuation Account on March 31, 1956, was $804·8 million. Of this amount, $615·8 million represents contributions made by employees and the Government (including interest at 4 per cent per annum). It includes, also, $175 million representing special contributions of the Government toward making up the accumulated deficiency in the fund. The remaining $189 million, which is shown on the Government balance sheet as a deferred charge, is the present unamortized deficiency.

The total of $804·8 million shown in the Superannuation Account constitutes the approximate actuarial liability of the Government with respect to future superannuation benefits for all public servants covered by the act. This account is not a cash fund but represents only the accounting record of the Government's liability with respect to the transactions or operations under the Superannuation Act, and is shown as a liability in the statement of the Government's assets and liabilities.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill 439, an Act to amend the Indian Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill makes amendments to various sections of the Indian Act. I think it would be preferable that I go through the bill clause by clause, not necessarily starting at the beginning.

One change in the act which, I think, will be of interest to most honourable senators is in the provisions regarding the use of alcoholic beverages by Indians. It will be found in clause 23, page 8. Prior to the Indian Act, 1951, it was illegal for Indians to have liquor either on or off a reserve, or for anyone to sell or give them liquor. By section 95 of the act provision was made whereby Indians could drink in public places off a reserve, provided a request is made by the Lieutenant Governor in Council of the province, followed by a proclamation bringing the section into force by the Governor in Council.

At the present time the provisions of that section are in effect in the Yukon, British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario and Nova Scotia. This bill contains no new principle in respect to the obtaining of liquor by Indians. It merely provides that the same principle shall have application in the case of purchases in a province of liquor to be taken off the premises and consumed elsewhere in accordance with the laws of the province. I think all honourable senators will agree that it would be a grave invasion of provincial rights for Parliament to attempt to legislate for Indians in this particular matter without regard for the provinces. Either the present prohibition must continue, or if there is to be a change it should, in my opinion, conform to provincial law.

Under the act as amended an Indian will be empowered to purchase alcoholic beverages in a place other than a beverage room and consume them in a place other than a beverage room. But this can be done only in accordance with the liquor laws of the various provinces. If a province wishes to give effect to this legislation, all that has to be done is to have a proclamation issued by the Governor General, at the request of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. No action can be taken without a proclamation by the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Proclamations in all the provinces?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: With the exception of two or three.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The law as it is allows Indians in certain provinces to consume intoxicants in public places. This amendment if adopted will permit Indians in any province to purchase liquor and consume it in other than beverage rooms, provided, as I have said, a request is made by the Lieutenant Governor of the province concerned for the necessary proclamation.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Can Indians take liquor back to the reserve?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, they cannot do so unless in the first place the proclamation has been issued and is in effect in the province. It is then necessary for an affirmative resolution to be passed by the council of the band. The resolution is forwarded to the federal Government, which in its turn must send a copy of it to the Attorney General of the province in which the reserve is located. If within 60 days objection is not made by the province, a referendum may be taken on the reserve.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Then in any province, without regard to what the Lieutenant Governor may do, each band can vote prohibition of liquor on its own reserve, can it?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: If the Attorney General gives no answer, can the band vote?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, if the Governor in Council has directed that the wishes of the band with respect thereto be ascertained by a referendum of the electors of the band.

Hon. Mr. Horner: And even after the vote, some Indian reserve may prohibit the use of liquor on its reserve?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is so. I do not think there is anything further I can explain in connection with this provision. As I say, there is no new principle. Rights are extended to Indians which they do not possess now, but they may be extended, as regards liquor, only with the approval of the province.

May I now turn to clause 18 of the bill, which provides for an increase in the amount of money which the Government can loan to Indians. It is desired to increase this fund to $1 million. Honourable senators will be interested to know that from 1938 to this year 611 loans were made to Indians in a total amount of $787,985, and of that amount only $5,452.76 has been written off. That speaks very highly for the thrift and industry of the Indian people.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: How much is outstanding?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have not the figures here, but I will try to obtain them for the honourable senator.

During the sixteen years the Indians have paid in interest $54,767. That is a very creditable showing indeed, and I doubt if any group of citizens in Canada has a finer record in that respect.

As I say, there are provisions in the bill affecting the administration of Indian affairs. For instance, subsection (1) of section 4 of the Indian Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

> A reference in this act to an Indian does not include any person of the race of aborigines commonly referred to as Eskimos.

The purpose of this amendment is to make it abundantly clear that this legislation refers to individual Indians and not to the Eskimos or any other race.

There are certain provisions under which an Indian may be excluded from an Indian band by the registrar, and clause 2 of the bill provides that if he is so excluded there can be only one reference to a judge from the registrar's decision, and the onus of proof is on the person making the protest.

Clause 3 of the bill provides that an illegitimate child of a female Indian may automatically be registered as an Indian, notwithstanding the fact that the father may not be an Indian. It is also provided that the band council has one year in which to protest the name of the child on the band list.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: It is the opposite if the father is an Indian.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I believe the illegitimate offspring of a male Indian automatically becomes of Indian status, provided that the mother is an Indian.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: If the mother is an Indian I believe the child is considered an Indian; but if the father is an Indian and the mother is a white woman, the child is considered white.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You may be right. I shall try to get some information on that point.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: It is my impression that the child takes the nationality of the mother.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That may be so. Indian bands sometimes become very large and they want to divide. It then becomes necessary to apportion the assets, and clause 7 of the bill authorizes the minister to make a division. Previously this was done by the Governor in Council, but it was felt that as this is an administrative matter, it would be more expeditious to have it done through the minister.

Clause 9 of the bill deals with the wording of the document under which an Indian holds his lands. In some places this is referred to as a certificate of possession, and in others as a certificate of occupation. The object of this clause is to extend the operation of the section to location tickets issued under previous legislation.

Clause 11 of the bill relates to the sale of assets belonging to Indians. Suppose, for instance, some Indians decide to sell a portion of their land so that it will be no longer part of the reserve. This sale or surrender will be considered void unless it is assented to by a majority of the electors of the band. Under the present act this voting must now take place at one centre. Under the proposed amendment the acceptance of a surrender may be assented to by referendum.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Probably that is to meet the requirements of the Caughnawaga Reserve.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: This legislation provides for a number of such polling places. The Six Nations Reserve near my home city of Brantford is a large one and contains about six or seven thousand Indians. It is not practicable for them to hold a vote at one centre, and the bill provides that a vote can be held at various centres.

There are provisions in the bill to assist in the administration of estates, especially where an intestacy is involved. There is also a provision whereby the department can take over and develop unoccupied lands.

Clause 15 provides that with the consent of the council of a band the minister may authorize the lending of money from the funds of the band to members for housing purposes.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Did the honourable Leader of the Government say that the moneys which may be loaned to Indians by the minister are moneys that come from the Indian band? Is the money loaned to the band or to individual Indians?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Under this section the money belongs to the band and is held by the Government for the band, and a loan may be made by the minister to an individual Indian for housing purposes, but only with the consent of the council of the band.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Does the council have to pass upon the individual loans?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, on each individual loan; so it is local self-government in that respect.

Honourable senators, I do not know if any further explanation is required. I would be glad to answer questions in connection with any particular clause of the bill. As I have said, most of the amendments deal with the administration of the affairs of the Indians, their funds, personal estates, and so on. I think it is progressive legislation and I have no hesitancy in recommending it to this house.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I have just a few comments to make about this bill. Allowing Indians access to liquor is more or less of an experiment. I doubt that it will be recommended in the province of Saskatchewan. If I remember correctly, it was shown before the joint committee of both houses which met two or three years before the amendment to the Indian Act was made, that the great majority of the Indians, particularly in Saskatchewan, were opposed to liquor, and opposed to having it taken to the reserve. I hope no tangle will develop as to whether Indians will be allowed to purchase liquor and allowed to take it on the reserve and drink it in their own homes. There have already been innumerable cases of prosecutions for offences as to where liquor was to be consumed, although purchased legally in a Government liquor store.

Great difficulties arise at times with regard to the Indians. Only a few years ago much resentment was caused because some action was taken to expel from the reserve people who, it was claimed, were not Indians and did not belong on the reserve—perhaps some grandfather or some mother claimed that such and such a person was not entitled to a share in living on the reserve, because he was not legally an Indian on the reserve. Finally the matter settled down, and I think some agreement was come to.

I would like to see the Government deal with the Indians in perhaps a more generous way and with greater foresight. I understand that although a huge part of the St. Lawrence Seaway channel has been dug through the Caughnawaga reserve at Montreal, yet to this day there has been no final settlement as to what eventually will be paid for the privilege of putting that canal through the reserve. The Government has known for some time that a settlement should have been completed before ever one shovelful of earth was dug on that reserve. I think there was great lack of foresight on the part of the Government. This matter will cause a great deal of friction, and possibly a much higher price will have to be paid before the channel is completed and the Indians are satisfied.

Honourable senators, I hesitate to return to the question of liquor. As I stated, the new provision in the bill is more or less of an experiment, but I cannot very well bring myself to support the idea, because there is plenty of evidence in many quarters, from reports of highway accidents, and so on, that the provision would not really add much to the welfare of the rest of Canada. I know it is argued that Indians secure liquor anyway, and in some cases illegally. That is something to be regretted, but it is not something that we are legislating about. I hesitate to be a party to legislating liquor for the Indians.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I move that when this house rises this day it stand adjourned until tomorrow at 11 o'clock in the forenoon, notwithstanding the rules of the house to the contrary.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

THE SENATE

Saturday, August 11, 1956

The Senate met at 11 a.m. the Speaker in the Chair.

Routine proceedings.

INDIAN BILL

LOANS

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, yesterday on the debate on the motion for second reading of the Indian Bill the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) asked me what is the amount outstanding in respect of Government loans to Indians under section 69 of the Indian Act. The information I have received is as follows: As of April 30, 1956, the principal owing on loans was $250,287.44.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Thank you.

CANADA-GERMANY INCOME TAX AGREEMENT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. A. K. Hugessen moved the second reading of Bill 452, an act to implement an agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

He said: Honourable senators, as its title implies, this is a bill to ratify an agreement entered into between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany on June 4 last to prevent the incidence of double income tax between the two countries. It takes very much the form of similar bills for the avoidance of double taxation between Canada and various countries which this house has had to consider over the past few years.

I should say, perhaps, that the bill which honourable members have before them is in the form in which it was introduced in the House of Commons yesterday. It was considered and adopted by that house without any change, so that what we have here is the bill which the Commons passed.

As is customary in bills of this kind, the bill itself is very short. It refers to the agreement, which is set out in the schedule printed on the second and following pages of the bill, and states that that agreement is approved and declared to have the force of law in Canada.

As I say, this bill follows along the lines of quite a number of similar bills which we have adopted in the past. The kind of taxes to which it refers will be found in article I of the schedule. In Canada they include income tax, including the surtax and the old age security tax; that is, of course, only federal tax. Naturally, an agreement between a foreign country and Canada can have no effect on provincial taxes. In the Federal Republic of Western Germany it includes several taxes, whose names are unfamiliar to me. One is called the Einkommensteuer, the second is called the Koerperschaftsteuer, and the third is called the Notopfer Berlin, and I am told that they correspond respectively to income tax, corporation tax, and Berlin emergency aid tax.

The territories to which this convention applies are Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany. But if honourable members will turn to article XXI of the agreement they will see that, unless the Federal Republic advises us to the contrary within three months after it comes into force, it will also apply to Land Berlin. This I presume means the section of the city of Berlin that is West Berlin, which is at present occupied by allied forces, or was until the other day, and is that part of Berlin now administered as a part of the Republic of West Berlin, although separated from it physically by an intervening section which is part of the Republic of East Berlin.

The terms of the agreement are very much the same as those of the other agreements to which I have referred. Perhaps it will make for convenience if I refer to them in this way. The most important part of the agreement deals with taxation upon companies doing business in both countries. I would like to take as an example a Canadian company which does business in both Canada and West Germany. The agreement provides that that Canadian company will not be subject to income tax in West Germany, provided it has no permanent establishment there. The term "permanent establishment" is defined very extensively and comprehensively in the agreement. Generally speaking, if a company simply carries on business from Canada by taking orders in Canada and shipping goods to Germany, it is not considered to be doing business in Germany; and if it simply has a storage warehouse in Germany for the convenience of its German customers it is not considered to be doing business in Germany. The same is true if it works in Germany through an independent agent or a subsidiary company. On the other hand, if it has anything like an establishment in Germany, an office of its own or employees of its own, then it is considered to be doing business in Germany and subject to income tax in that country on that part of its profits which may reasonably be considered as having been derived from German business. The same rule applies in a converse way to a German company doing business in Canada.

There is a special provision, as there has been in so many of these other agreements, for airplane and shipping companies. A Canadian airplane company which operates between Canada and Germany, or a Canadian shipping company plying between the two countries, is not subject to German income tax simply by reason of the fact that its ships or airplanes, as the case may be, land in Germany. The same is true in a converse way of German shipping companies and German airplane companies.

As respects individuals, the agreement deals with the sort of things that we would expect it to deal with in matters of this kind. It refers, for instance, to the limits upon the withholding tax or dividends paid by a company in one country to a resident of the other. As honourable senators are aware, if a Canadian company pays dividends to a resident of Germany, the withholding tax which Canada can exact from that dividend is limited to 15 per cent, and vice versa.

There are similar provisions for various other kinds of payments flowing between the two countries, of the nature of copyright and royalty payments, and so on.

Honourable senators may be interested to know that article IX provides exemption from tax on capital gains made by a resident of one country in respect of his property in the other country.

Article XII provides that a resident of one country who receives a pension or an annuity from a source in the other country shall not be subject to tax in that other country. In other words, a resident of Canada who receives an annuity or a pension from a source in Germany is not subject to tax on that annuity in Germany.

Then there are provisions, similar to those we have noted in the past in other agreements, for professors and teachers. A professor or teacher who comes from Germany to Canada for a period limited to not more than two years for the purpose of teaching in a Canadian university or school is not subject to tax in Canada on any income he receives from Germany during that time.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Why not?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I cannot answer my honourable friend's question except to say that that is a provision which has been contained in, I think, every one of the tax agreements between Canada and other countries. It is a sort of mutuality with respect to persons engaged in education. I see my honourable friend from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Wall) nods his head. I am sure he approves of that, being as prominent in the educational field as he is.

There is a similar provision in favour of students from one country who take their training in the other country. So long as they are training in a university or school in the other country they are not subject to tax in that country in respect of payments they receive from their own home country.

On past occasions we have had some discussions in this house with respect to the provisions in these agreements for the exchange of information between the Governments of the two countries concerned. In this agreement that provision is found in article XVII, and I think it is a fairly good article. It provides for the exchange of information between the Governments of the two countries for the prevention of fraud, but this is restricted to information which is available under the respective taxing laws of the contracting states. It requires that that information shall be secret, and it adds this provision in article XVII (2):

> In no case shall the provisions of this Article be construed so as to impose upon either of the contracting States the obligation to carry out administrative measures at variance with the regulations and practice of either contracting State or which would be contrary to its sovereignty, security or public policy or to supply particulars which are not procurable under its own legislation or that of the State making application.

The agreement provides that it shall come into force one month following its ratification—ratification is dependent, of course, upon its approval by this Parliament, on the one hand, and by the Parliament of the Republic of Germany, on the other—and that when it comes into force it shall have effect with respect to taxes of the nature which I have described as and from the 1st of January, 1954.

I think that is about as brief an explanation as honourable senators would wish me to give. I would simply conclude by saying that, as in all these cases, this is designed as relieving taxation, as a measure to prevent double taxation in the two countries; and I think it should be welcome to this house.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Will it affect in any way Canadian troops serving in Germany?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I do not think so. There is no mention made of troops.

Hon. Mr. Power: Will there be any special provision with respect to banks? The question of the honourable senator from Blaine Lake

(Hon. Mr. Horner) brings that point to my mind. One of the Canadian banks is established in the Canadian military camps in Germany. I suppose it is authorized to do business with the Canadian troops, and that it derives some revenue from them. Would it be required to pay taxes to the German Republic or to the Canadian Government? The bank has what might be termed under this convention a permanent establishment; it has an office in the area of the Canadian brigade and, I believe, with the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Undoubtedly, under the agreement, in the circumstances which my honourable friend has described, that Canadian bank would be liable to German income tax on its profits in Germany.

Hon. Mr. Power: Although it is probably not authorized to do business with German citizens? The business would be entirely confined to Canadian troops.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I was just about to add that, so far as this agreement is concerned, that bank would fall squarely within its provisions, but there may be some treaty provision of which I am not aware that may have special effect.

Hon. William M. Wall: Honourable senators, I notice there is a slight difference in wording between the agreement with Denmark, which was approved earlier this year, and the present agreement, in this respect. Article I of the agreement with Denmark states:

> The taxes which are subject to this agreement are:
> (a) In Canada:
> Income taxes, including surtaxes, which are imposed by the Government of Canada.

In the agreement before us the taxes subject to the convention are:

> (a) In Canada:
> Income taxes, including surtaxes and the old age security tax . . .

Is there any special significance in the change?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: The probable reason for that, I think, is that the agreement with Denmark was made before the old age security surtax was imposed; that is, the 2 per cent tax, with a limit of $60. I believe that was imposed two years ago.

Hon. Mr. Wall: The agreement with Denmark was adopted only on April 23 of this year.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: In any event, I do not think that circumstances would have any significant bearing, because, as my honourable friend knows, the old age security tax is a very minor one in comparison with the income tax and the surtaxes. I really do not know why it was omitted from the Danish treaty.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: I should like to raise a further question, which I think is not irrelevant to the subject-matter of the bill. On the assumption that the purpose of this convention is to facilitate trade between Canada and Germany, I have been wondering whether the sponsor has any information regarding the relative position of these two countries in relation to imports and exports. It is my impression that Canada is receiving from West Germany a larger volume of goods than she is exporting to that country. I may be wrong in that assumption, but I think it has an interesting bearing on the convention. I recall that when a convention of this kind was made with France, an honourable senator—I believe it was the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig)—urged in committee very strongly that it gave undue advantage to certain French interests resident in Canada by virtue of permitting them certain warehousing facilities and freedom from what was alleged to be double taxation, and that they were obtaining thereby some advantage in our domestic market over their Canadian competitors. Whether that aspect enters into this convenion or not I do not know, but it would be interesting to have the figures as to the volume of imports and exports between the two countries at the present time.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The honourable gentleman who explained this bill said he hoped he had done it in a concise way. I think all of us must agree, not only that he has been concise but, as is customary with him, extremely clear and comprehensive. I have a question to ask which does not arise specifically out of the bill but from the remarks made by the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert). Possibly I am unfair in asking it, because the sponsor of the bill cannot be expected to have this type of information available in advance. I wonder whether he knows the relative levels of personal and corporate income taxes in Germany as compared with the Canadian levels. In other words, are corporations in Germany taxed at 47 per cent when their profits are over $20,000, and at a lower rate if their profits are less; and how do levels of personal income tax in Germany compare with those in Canada? I think that, aside from the helpful provisions of this convention, considerations of that character may affect the decisions of Canadian companies which want to do business in Germany.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I must confess, honourable senators, that I have no satisfactory reply to give either to the honourable senior senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) or to the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) in reply to their questions. I do not know what is the relative position regarding imports and exports as between Canada and Germany, nor what are the relative levels of personal and corporation income taxes of the two countries. I am sorry that I cannot give that information. I do suggest to both honourable senators, however, that neither of those considerations is really of prime importance in considering a measure of this kind. What we are really trying to do, as I said before, is to relieve people who would otherwise be subject in certain circumstances to taxes in both countries from a part of that possible liability; and whether that relief works more to the benefit, say, of residents of West Germany than to residents of Canada, I cannot say. But in so far as and to the extent that it applies at all, it will relieve residents of Canada, and I think we should bear that in mind. Personally I do not care very much whether it relieves residents of Germany more than it does residents of Canada, so long as residents of Canada are, under the particular circumstances set out in this agreement, relieved from double taxation that they would otherwise have to pay.

Hon. Mr. Horner: It might have a far-reaching effect if, as the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) pointed out, a corporation having a business in both Canada and Germany found that the corporation tax was much lower in Germany. The company might do the greater part of its manufacturing of certain articles in Germany if the corporation tax were lower there. It might have that effect, might it not?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That is true. Under those circumstances it would be helpful to the Canadian manufacturer who did a considerable part of his business in Germany, if by establishing a branch in Germany he could subject his German business to lower corporation tax in Germany than if he simply carried it on from here. He would benefit thereby, and here again is an example of a possible benefit to a Canadian manufacturer.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: The honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) said he was not fully acquainted with the agreement that was entered into between Canada and Denmark for avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax. When that agreement was presented to this house it contained no reference to the double taxation which might flow from the imposition of income tax by a province. It was argued that Parliament could not deal with matters arising in a province. I submitted then, as I do now, that as the provinces are a part of Canada I think there should be a proviso in the agreement for negotiations between Germany and any province, should that necessity arise in the wisdom of the provincial Legislature.

Article XXI of the bill provides:

> This convention shall apply to Land Berlin provided that the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany has not delivered a contrary declaration to the Government of Canada within three months from the date of entry into force of the convention.

I think a reciprocal provision should be embodied in this agreement with regard to any province which might wish to benefit its residents who would otherwise pay double taxation.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The same situation might arise in Germany. I do not know what the constitution of that state is, but it is called a federal republic. It may not be a unitary state, so the same situation may apply there as applies in Canada. Separate states within the republic may levy personal and corporation income tax, just as provinces might do in Canada. You could easily get into a complicated treaty.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I think it rather unfortunate that Canada should enter into a negotiation of this kind while admitting the existence of taxation authority in the provinces. The bill does not contain a word, a mere caveat, if you will, warning the other high contracting party that there are elements within Canada that may wish to benefit within the limited period that has been stipulated in respect of Land Berlin, for instance.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the question is on the second reading of Bill 452, an Act to implement an agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: On division.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed, on division.

CANADA-UNITED STATES OF AMERICA TAX CONVENTION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. A. K. Hugessen moved the second reading of Bill 451, an Act to amend the Canada-United States of America Tax Convention Act, 1943.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill, as its name implies, has for its object the approval by Parliament of an agreement entered into between Canada and the United States of America. This agreement was entered into on the 8th of August last, amending in certain rather important respects the present tax convention agreement between the two countries. The first tax agreement between Canada and the United States was made in 1942, and was approved by Parliament under the Canada-United States of America Tax Convention Act of 1943. It was subsequently amended in certain respects by supplementary convention on June 12, 1950, which also received the approval of Parliament, and this is the second amending convention which is now submitted for our consideration.

The bill, as usual, is very short; it simply declares that the convention, which is a schedule to the bill, shall have the force of law in Canada and be deemed to include and form part of the original agreement as amended by the 1950 agreement. The convention is set out in the schedule and, as I say, it makes a number of fairly important changes in the original tax agreement. As honourable senators are aware, the object of the convention of 1942 was the same as that of all these other tax agreements, that is, to prevent double taxation in respect of the same kind of taxes in the two countries concerned.

I think perhaps I should go through these various provisions and indicate the changes to the house. As honourable senators will remember, under the original tax convention—as indeed I think under every one of the tax conventions between Canada and all other countries with which we have such agreements—a shipping company and an airplane company in one country which travels to the other country is only subject to tax in the country where it was incorporated; in other words, a United States shipping company or airplane company which lands in Canada or ships to Canada is not subject to Canadian income tax, and vice versa. Well, the first change which this convention makes is to add to those two classes of business the class of motor vehicles, common carriers, or contract carriers. In other words, if a Canadian trucking service operates from Canada to the United States, or an American trucking service operates from the United States to Canada, it will fall into the same category as the airplane company or the shipping company and will only be subject to income tax in the country of its organization and origin.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Does that apply if the company has an office here, even if it is not incorporated in Canada? Let me put it another way. Let us say an American trucking company incorporated in the United States is operating in Canada. If that company without incorporating here actually has an office here would it, in doing business through that office, be subject to Canadian income tax, and would the same situation apply in the same circumstances if there were a Canadian company with an office but no incorporation in the United States?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Well, frankly, I do not know. What the convention does say is that an enterprise operating as a common carrier or as a contract carrier shall be exempt from tax by the other contracting state in respect of income arising from the transportation of property for hire between points in one state and points in the other state. I should think that meant they would be exempt from income solely in respect of their revenues from the trucking operation between the two countries. If they opened an office here, and actually carried on business here, I should think that exemption would not apply.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Does that include passenger buses?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: No. This applies to a common carrier or a contract carrier transporting property for hire between the two countries.

Hon. Mr. Power: It is pretty clear, for it says, "... shall be exempt from tax by the other contracting state in respect of income ... arising from the transportation of property for hire between points in one state and points in the other state". I should not think it covered the operations of a trucking company between points within Canada.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps the question arising out of what the honourable gentleman from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power) put can be clarified within an example.

Supposing an American company that is going to run goods for hire across the border in its truck sets up an office in Canada without incorporating. It is not clear from the section whether that company would be taxable or not. I am inclined to agree with the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen).

Hon. Mr. Power: It may or may not have incorporated. An enterprise can be anything —a partnership, corporation, or business.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I am not too clear either. My mind goes back to the airplane companies, for instance. Quite a number of foreign airplane companies incorporated in the United States which have similar agreements with this country have some sort of an office here. If you go out to Dorval, for instance, at the Montreal airport, you will find that the French Line has a small office there, and the Dutch Line also has a small office there. I doubt if that in itself simply having an office for the reception of passengers to board airplanes, would be subject to taxation.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Or Eastern Air Lines, at Dorval; that is, an American company.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Yes. On the other hand, if they opened an office in the town and actively carried on business in Canada they might be subject to tax. Frankly, I do not know just how far the exemption extends. It is a pity that this is the tail-end of the session and we cannot refer this bill to committee and get an answer to an inquiry such as my honourable friend from Ottawa West asks.

Honourable senators, the second change is not very important; it is a change in article VII of the present convention. That has relation to compensation for personal services, and it provides in the case of a Canadian officer, for instance, of a Canadian company, that if he travels to the United States on business for his company and stays in the United States for not more than 183 days in the year and receives compensation of not more than $5,000 he shall be exempt from income tax in the United States. There is a corresponding reciprocal provision for an employee of an American company if he comes to Canada for less than 183 days in the year and receives less than $5,000 compensation for his services while here. The only change in that provision which this amendment makes is that it extends the exemption to an employee not only of a Canadian company who goes to the United States, but to an employee of a permanent establishment of an American company in Canada, and vice versa. That is not, I think, of very great importance, but I thought I should indicate it to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Power: May I ask a question there?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Yes, certainly.

Hon. Mr. Power: I have in mind employees of paper companies such as the International Paper Company, who are engaged in Canada but who cross the border into the state of Maine or the state of Vermont, as the case may be, and their wages or salaries are paid there. I am thinking of such people who have been engaged in Canada and work for a Canadian subsidiary of an American company. Would they be covered by a provision such as this?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Well, the fact that they were engaged in Canada would not be basically important. Of course, if they were engaged in Canada and went to the United States and performed the majority of their services in that country, then I would think they would be subject to the Canadian income tax. This provision relates to employees of Canadian companies who normally might be expected to do their work in Canada, but who go to the United States and perform services for their employer in that country for part of the year.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Special missions?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Power: It would not apply to the class of employee I refer to, such as bush workers, who are constantly crossing the border in certain sections of Quebec?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: No.

Hon. Mr. Power: I am informed—and perhaps this is a matter of state legislation—that very often income tax on these people is deducted at the source, and they are never able to recover it.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: If the work for which they are employed is to be performed in the state of Maine, for example, obviously they are subject to whatever tax might be applicable in that state, and not subject to Canadian income tax. Such individuals would not be affected by this section one way or the other.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask a further question along the line raised by the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power)? The exemption of $5,000 for taxation purposes applies to any person who is doing services for any Canadian company. He may be a lawyer or a scientific expert who goes to the United States to perform some service for the parent company, such as an industrial company which has established a subsidiary in Canada. I take it that to the extent of $5,000 his expenses are exempt from taxation?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: His salary.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: His salary of $5,000 for services performed while he is in the other country, provided they are performed within a period of 183 days, is exempt?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: That $5,000 would be exempt from taxation in what country?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Exempt from taxation in the United States.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: In other words, in the United States he would be exempt to the extent of $5,000?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Lambert:. One feature of this agreement which interests me is that the convention was negotiated between our Department of External Affairs and the Department of State in the United States. One naturally assumes that the approval of the Department of Finance in Canada, for example, would be given or implied, since this is a Government document.

I am not questioning that point, but it strikes me, by way of contrast with some of the provisions of the Income Tax Act which we have recently discussed here, as being a singular case of privilege.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): There is another point, honourable senators, that we could think about in this connection, and one which perhaps benefits Americans more than Canadians. It is the situation which can arise when an American industrial enterprise establishes an organization in Canada as a subsidiary and then sends its key personnel into Canada. They need not stay here for the whole year; perhaps even less than half a year would meet their requirements. Under the provisions of this section they can do that.

I am not raising the point to create a difficulty. However, I do know of a good many American parent organizations with Canadian subsidiaries which in the early stages of development send key personnel—persons who have the right to make policy decisions with reference to the operations of the company—to Canada for a period of time. In my own experience I have found that more and more of those companies are trying to get, and are now being quite successful in getting, young and experienced Canadians to take executive posts and conduct the affairs of the Canadian subsidiary. That is going on throughout Canada, but I refer particularly to some of the western provinces where it is happening in the petroleum and natural gas business. It happens also in the industrial sections farther east. I think this section would provide some help in situations of that kind, because these persons might be liable for income tax in both countries.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I appreciate the observations of the senior senator from Ottawa and the junior senator from Ottawa. They have both contributed to the discussion of this section.

I come now to the most important of the amendments.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt on a question of privilege? I am not the junior senator from Ottawa. Senator Bishop is the junior senator from Ottawa; and he is younger perhaps, but much senior to me. I am the senator from Ottawa West.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Perhaps I might refer to my honourable friend as the middle senator from Ottawa.

The most important of these amendments deals with a matter that was raised incidentally by the middle senator from Ottawa just a moment or two ago. It deals with the withholding tax on dividends. Honourable senators know the position at the present time. Let me take as an example a Canadian company having United States shareholders. Dividends paid by that Canadian company to its United States shareholders are subject to a withholding tax in Canada of 15 per cent, except in the case of a Canadian company which is a subsidiary of an American company. In that case the witholding tax which Canada levies drops from 15 per cent to 5 per cent. But as the convention stands now, in order to benefit from this parent-subsidiary company relationship the American company must own at least 95 per cent of the voting shares of the Canadian subsidiary.

Honourable senators will recall that during the past few months considerable discussion has arisen in the public press as to why American companies having important Canadian subsidiary companies do not invite Canadians to become shareholders of their Canadian subsidiaries.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: And directors.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Appointment of directors would follow incidentally. As the law and the convention stand at present, the matter is very simple. If the American company gets itself into the position where less than 95 per cent of the voting shares of its Canadian subsidiary are owned by it, then it immediately loses the benefit of the 5 per cent Canadian withholding tax, and the withholding tax jumps up to 15 per cent.

This amendment is designed to cure that situation. It reduces from 95 per cent to 51 per cent the percentage which the American parent company must own in the voting shares of a Canadian subsidiary in order to permit it to benefit from the 5 per cent Canadian tax deduction. And it goes even further than that: it provides that this Canadian subsidiary may be owned by not more than four parent companies in the United States, each of which, however, must own at least 10 per cent of the voting stock of the Canadian subsidiary.

Honourable senators will see how this amendment will affect the situation that I have described. In the future it will be possible for American companies having Canadian subsidiaries to offer Canadian investors shares of voting stock in those Canadian subsidiaries up to the extent of 49 per cent of the total of those shares without involving themselves in losing the difference between the 5 per cent Canadian withholding tax on the dividends which they receive from those shares and 15 per cent.

There is one further provision which may be of some importance. It is to be found on page 4 of the convention, article XIII D. The language of that provision is extremely involved, but I have tried to write out for my own benefit what it actually means in practice, and this is the result. It has to deal with charitable contributions made by residents of one country to charities in the other country. Let me take an example. As a resident of Canada, say that $1,000 of my income is derived from sources in the United States. At the present time I can make a charitable donation of $100—10 per cent of that $1,000—to a Canadian charity in respect of that income and can reduce my Canadian tax accordingly. Now under this proposed amendment I can make that charitable donation of $100 in respect of my $1,000 of United States income to a charitable organization in the United States and obtain the same reduction in my Canadian income tax, provided that the United States charitable organization to which I make the donation is one which, had it been a Canadian charitable organization, would have been recognized for the purpose under our tax law. The provision is reciprocal the other way in favour of a citizen of the United States who derives part of its income from Canada, and out of his Canadian income makes a contribution to a Canadian charity.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Does it have to be an international organization like the Red Cross, for instance?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: No; any organization which, had it been a Canadian charitable organization, would have been recognized as such by our income tax law.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Is there a further explanation to be given on this article?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I am afraid I cannot go any further.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I did not know whether there was another branch to it. There is a further question I would like to ask. In the amount of charitable donations they can make, Canadian corporations are restricted to 5 per cent of their taxable income. I think, but I am not sure, that the same restriction applies to American corporations for charitable purposes as well. Do I take it that, under this provision, if an American corporation is making a charitable gift to a recognized charitable organization in Canada, it still must stay within this 5 per cent limitation?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: And likewise, when a Canadian company makes a gift to an American charitable organization the ceiling of 5 per cent is not lifted?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: No, the ceiling is not lifted but the limitation under the ceiling within which charitable contributions can be made by that corporation is extended to the extent that the corporation has income in the other country. Let me try to give my honourable friend an example. Suppose an American corporation has, say, $2 million of income, $1 million of which it receives from sources in Canada. Its 5 per cent limit on its charitable donations as a whole remains, but in future it will be able to give half of its donations within that limit to Canadian charities instead of having to confine the donations, as at present, to United States charitable organizations.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I take it that an American corporation doing no business in Canada is not assisted by this provision in making a charitable donation in Canada. It must have Canadian income before it can take advantage of this provision?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: There is only one other provision of this amending convention which is of any importance, and it will be found in article XIII E at the foot of page 4. That deals with income from estates or trusts in one country received by a resident of another country, and perhaps I can best explain it in this way: Suppose I am a resident of the United States and entitled to income from a Canadian trust. That Canadian trust distributes to me income which it has derived from sources outside of Canada. Well, under this amendment I would be exempt from Canadian income tax on the income which I so receive from the Canadian trust.

That, I think, comprises all the really important sections of this supplementary convention.

Article II provides that the agreement shall be ratified and that instruments of ratification shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible; and that when ratified it shall become effective with respect to income for the taxable years commencing on and after the 1st of January of the calendar year in which occurs the exchange of the instruments of ratification.

That is about all the explanation I can give honourable senators. In my opinion this is quite an important convention, particularly from the point of view of our country, and a great deal more important than the agreement with Germany. I must apologize to honourable senators for having gone into the various details at some length; but I thought they would be interesting.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I should like to ask the honourable senator a further question on article XIII D; and I am thinking now of the needs of our universities. Can graduates of universities of our country who are now residents of the United States give moneys to their alma mater without being taxed?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: It would depend upon whether those graduates had incomes from Canadian sources. If they had, they could give charitable donations to Canadian institutions in the proportion which their Canadian income bears to their American income, up to the limit of 10 per cent permitted by the United States income tax law. In other words, suppose that one of these graduates had an income of $5,000 a year, of which $1,000 was received from Canada: under the United States law he could give a total in charitable donations of $500 in a year without subjecting himself to tax; he would then be able to donate $100 of that amount to Canadian charities, as representing the proportion which his $1,000 Canadian income had to his total income of $5,000.

Hon. Mr. Wall: Can the honourable senator tell me—I have not with me the protocol of 1942 or the supplementary convention of 1950—whether this addition to the convention or treaty also includes an article similar to the one in the treaty with Germany, respecting professors and teachers doing part-time work in one country?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Yes. That will be found in articles VIII A and IX of the present convention. Article IX deals with the limitations to students and apprentices, and apparently was a part of the original convention of 1942; and article VIII A, dealing with professors who come for a period of not more than two years to either country, was added by the supplementary convention of 1950.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Hon. The Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 3 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, we have completed all the items on our Order Paper and the only business that is likely to come before us during the remainder of the session is the usual Appropriation Bill providing for the payment of certain moneys approved by the Committee of Supply in the House of Commons. I have just returned from the Commons gallery, and it is my opinion that they will not finish their consideration of the estimates today. They may complete their work late Monday afternoon, so I would move that when this house rises today it stand adjourned until Monday, August 13, at 7.30 p.m.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, August 13, at 7.30 p.m.

THE SENATE

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a report of the Civil Service Commission recommending that certain new classes be established for the staff of the Restaurant of Parliament; that certain salary ranges be revised; and that the establishment for the Restaurant of Parliament be amended by deleting five unclassified positions and substituting therefore five classified positions.

The Clerk Assistant (reading):

To the Honourable the Members of both Houses of Parliament:

The Civil Service Commission, at the request of the House of Commons, and in accordance with the provisions of sections 9 and 62 of the Civil Service Act, submits the following for approval:

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Next sitting.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, when this house adjourned on Saturday it was expected that by the time we resumed this evening the House of Commons would have completed its work and that the supply bill would be before us for consideration. However, that house has not as yet passed the supply bill. It has considered the estimates of the various departments, but there are some departmental items remaining for consideration and these are now being dealt with.

The bell did not ring at 7.30 this evening, the appointed time for resuming, because I was then in touch with a number of members of the House of Commons, endeavouring to obtain some idea of when it might finish its work. I have come to the conclusion that it is quite likely to finish tomorrow morning. I move, therefore, that when the Senate rises this evening it stand adjourned until 1 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 1 p.m.

THE SENATE

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION CONSIDERED—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Civil Service Commission on the Restaurant of Parliament.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson moved that the report be adopted.

She said: Honourable senators, all the particulars regarding this report of the Civil Service Commission are set out in yesterday's Minutes of the Proceedings. The Civil Service Commission recommends that certain new classes be established for the staff of the Restaurant of Parliament, that certain salary ranges be revised, and that the establishment of the restaurant be amended by deleting five unclassified positions and substituting therefor five classified positions.

I do not have before me the particulars on which the recommendations are based, but perhaps the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has the information.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I was seeking that information from the honourable senator.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I am not in a position to give it. However, as the Civil Service Commission has no doubt gone very thoroughly into this question, I am sure we are completely justified in accepting its recommendations.

I should like to take this opportunity to express my appreciation of the excellent and efficient manner in which the staffs of the restaurant and the cafeteria have carried on their duties during the present session. If these recommendations are for their security and betterment as I gather they are, I am very glad to recommend adoption of the report.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Honourable senators, will the honourable leader say what would happen if we postponed action on the report until we obtained information upon which to express an opinion? I do not wish to suggest that the report be rejected, but I dislike very much having to pass upon something concerning which no one has any information.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Probably the sponsor of the report could have the information available for the house when we meet later this day.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I shall be very glad to do so.

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Fergusson, the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, we have no further business on our Order Paper. We continue to wait for the supply bill. I have recently been to the House of Commons and it is my impression that there is a good prospect that the bill will be passed there later this afternoon. Therefore I suggest that the Senate should now rise, to meet at 5.30 p.m.; but if the bill should reach the Clerk before that time we can be summoned to meet even earlier.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 6

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 453, an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1957.

The bill was read the first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I move the second reading now.

This is the sixth appropriation bill which has come to us this session. The first bill granted interim supply for the two-month period ending May 31, in the amount of $530,014,040.26. That included provision for payments covering the first two months of the current fiscal year, April and May.

Appropriation Bill No. 2 merely voted further supplementary estimates for the fiscal year 1955-56. The amount of those supplementary estimates is not included in the bill before us today.

Appropriation Bill No. 3, in the amount of $301,568,166.51, granted interim supply for the month of June.

Appropriation Bill No. 4, in the amount of $276,578,432.67, granted interim supply for the month of July.

Appropriation Bill No. 5, in the amount of $276,578,432.67, granted interim supply for the month of August.

Those amounts which I have mentioned, with the exception of the figure for further supplementary estimates for the fiscal year 1955-56, total $1,384,739,072.11. The present bill grants the balance of the main estimates of $3,172,915,679.00 for the present fiscal year, less deductions of $2 million in item No. 386 and of $50,000 in item No. 289 of the main estimates, leaving the net amount of $1,846,970,570.64 provided in section 2 of the bill now before us.

In addition there is the balance of the supplementary estimates, tabled on June 5, 1956, amounting to $85,181,549.25. The total expenditure authorized by this bill, covering the items which I have mentioned, is $1,932,152,119.89. The total of the main and supplementary estimates to date is $3,316,-891,192.

The bill is in substantially the same form as that of previous supply bills. Included is the usual power to borrow granted to the Governor in Council under the Financial Administration Act, in the amount of $1 billion. This is in addition to the borrowing power granted in Appropriation Bill No. 1. The details of the main estimates are set out in Schedule A to the bill. Schedule B to the bill contains the items based on supplementary estimates, in the amount of $85,181,549.25. It will be noticed from the schedule that there are three major items in the supplementaries. One is vote 605, in the amount of $12 million, being a grant toward the anticipated deficit arising in 1956-57 from the operation of the television service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Another item, vote 625, for $30 million, supplements other votes for the payment of salaries, wages, and other paylist charges—in other words, for the recently authorized salary increases for Government employees. And by vote 656 an item of $50,020,000 is allocated for reduction in the amount owing to the Old Age Security Fund, pursuant to Section 11 of the Old Age Security Act, representing the amount of temporary loans made by the Minister of Finance to the Fund during the fiscal year 1955-56.

I appreciate that honourable senators have not had sufficient time to study the details of this bill. However, we have had the estimates in our hands from the very early stages of this session, and we have had regular sittings of the Senate Standing Committee on Finance, under the able chairmanship of Senator Hawkins.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That committee considered certain departments and items in the estimates.

Honourable senators, in my opinion the bill is correct and is in its proper form. It is, indeed, for a large sum of money, and the amount that has to be voted seems to be growing annually. However, this is the trend in our expanding economy, which naturally expands in both revenues and expenditures. Our economy has never been so buoyant as it is at the present time. Indeed, the most recent publication by the Department of Finance indicates that for the first quarter of our current fiscal year budgetary revenues exceeded expenditures, resulting in a surplus of $220·4 million, compared with $69·5 million for the first quarter of the previous year. In my opinion, for what it is worth, our financial policies are in good hands and are on a sound economic basis.

Honourable senators, I have no hesitation in recommending this bill for the approval of this house.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Would the honourable gentleman say, with regard to his statement on the increase in receipts during the first three months of this year compared with the first three months of the previous year, to what extent inflation has taken place during the 12 months which separated the two periods?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I cannot say to what extent it has taken place. It is indeed true that there has been some increase in the cost of living, but it has not grown to alarming proportions. The policy of the Government will certainly be to discourage such a condition arising. I am satisfied that the people of Canada too will do all in their power to prevent inflation from getting out of hand.

Hon. John T. Hackett: Honourable senators, this is probably the last day of the longest session, with one exception, which Parliament has experienced since Confederation. I incline to the view that the amount to be levied by taxes this session, to provide for expenditures covered by the bill before us and the interim supply bills, is probably the largest amount that a government has found it necessary to impose at one time upon the Canadian people. The largest item is for defence.

When so much is expended on defence it is difficult to find the reason why one of the principal objects to be defended, the city of Montreal and its off-island suburbs, are without adequate protection. It is a mere incident, as far as my remarks of today are concerned, that I happen to represent that city in this house. My remarks, I hope, have for their basis the national interest. I submit that we are trifling with our defences.

Montreal is the greatest city in Canada; that is, it is the city with the largest population. It is the crossroads of all lines of transportation, be they by air, by water or by land. It is a seat of great deposits of goods, whether produced in remote parts of the country or fabricated in Montreal. It is a home of industry, of the arts and the skills, of schools and universities, and of all the great assets of the nation. They are all found on an island that is separated from the mainland to the south, to the north and to the west by bridges. There are no tunnels. As honourable senators know, tunnels are a normal and essential means of communication between an island and the mainland. All big centres of population located on flowing water are connected with other areas by tunnels. We know there are many important tunnels: for instance, those between New York and Jersey City and the Bronx; the one across the Mersey, at Liverpool; the Detroit-Windsor tunnel; and others which connect industrial locations, whether mines or other sources of production, the one with the other. Yet this matter of tunnels between Montreal and the mainland has not been discussed in Parliament, and a great city, an important source of our energy and strength, is left unprovided with an essential means of survival. In one place it was mentioned in a very cursory manner that the cost of a tunnel as compared with a bridge puts the former beyond consideration. But I contend that when Parliament is spending moneys as we have been called upon to spend them, for all manner of devices, such as television, experimentation on defence, and the rest, the very heart of our country should not be left unprotected by any other means than bridges—which are the most likely target for attack. This is in effect to deny a huge urban population the means of protection in time of danger, as well as other avenues of fluidity of movement, the opportunity of speedy transit from one place to another.

I repeat that this possible safeguard has not only been overlooked, it has not even been discussed, and that, in ignoring this situation while passing huge sums for other defence measures we are taking unnecessary and unwise risks. Of course there is little or nothing that can be done about it at the present time; but it is well that we of this chamber should realize that, in sanctioning vast expenditures in fulfilment of legislation before us which must be financed through national taxation, we are spending money on almost everything but on the very heart of Canada, the great, pulsating industrial city of Montreal.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I do not propose to detain the chamber for more than a few moments, but in view of what the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) has said, I do feel it is important to give a little thought to federal expenditures on defence, and what these expenditures mean and have meant in the past.

Some 40 per cent of the Government spending in this calendar year and perhaps for the past number of years has been allocated for defence purposes. Most of these commitments have arisen out of Canada's participation in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I am sure those who were privileged a few months ago to hear General Gruenther discuss the military side of NATO were deeply impressed with the importance of the picture he painted not only for countries close to the Iron Curtain but for countries like ours which, although not close geographically, are within close range of the missiles that could come from behind it. I think all of us realize that if it had not been for NATO after 1945 there might have been another war in Europe, perhaps even a world war. So it does seem to me that despite the heavy burden of taxation which Canadians must assume in order to make their contribution to NATO, that organization is necessary today in the interests of not only our national life but of the continued existence of the West.

I do hope the time will come when these huge expenditures of money can be devoted to more peaceful pursuits and to more constructive purposes; but until such a time arrives I do think national defence, to a larger degree than perhaps the honourable gentleman from Victoria has considered it, is going to be a most important consideration of the Canadian people. I did not rise for the purpose of disputing what the honourable gentleman said in connection with the defences of the great metropolitan city of Montreal, but I feel that Canada's first look at defence should be the one she gets as a member of NATO. I am sure everyone in this Parliament and in any of the free parliaments of the world would hesitate before taking any step which would weaken the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: May I remind the house that if the honourable senator speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I was very much interested in the remarks of the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett). I am pleased that he did not embark upon a criticism of too many of the items in the bill before us. No doubt he would disapprove of many of them, and I think it speaks very well for him that he did not do so, since for all practical purposes sufficient time is not at our disposal. The Senate Committee on Finance considers the estimates during the session. The committee is composed of a limited number of the members of this house, but that fact does not preclude other members from attending its meetings, and I believe many other members do attend.

An Hon. Senator: They do.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I regret that I have not found time to have the privilege of attending this committee's meetings, but I have attended meetings of other committees at which senators who are not members of the committees concerned took part in the detailed consideration of bills. I think we can best serve in connection with financial matters by attending meetings of the Finance Committee, where the estimates may be considered item by item, if the committee so desires. As honourable senators know, under our Constitution legislation which involves expenditure of money must first be introduced in the House of Commons. In my opinion we can perform a very important function by suggesting to that house how expenditures should be made, and we should not fail to criticize if we consider that any have been made unwisely.

I was interested in the remarks of the honourable senator from Ottawa-West (Hon. Mr. Connolly). I believe we all agree with what he said respecting NATO. No doubt he has noticed, as other honourable senators probably have, that there is no reduction in the expenditures in connection with NATO this year from those of other years. We have indeed spent a great deal of money in Canada over the years for our defence—prodigious sums, almost beyond human imagination. And what have we got for it? We have got in the past, what I hope we shall continue to have in the future—peace. No price is too high to pay for peace. Since the Second World War we have lived, generally speaking, in a peaceful world. True there was the Korean war, but although it was a very serious conflict it was localized, and we have not had a third world war. I think all Canadians will join in making whatever sacrifice, financial or otherwise, is necessary in order to maintain peace.

The honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) referred to the metropolis of Montreal. Far be it from me to set up one metropolis against another, but one other city, almost as large as, if not larger than Montreal, might not admit that Montreal is the home of the arts and the skills; I think the citizens of the Queen City of Toronto might not be entirely in accord with that statement.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I think I said that Montreal is a home of the arts and the skills.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: We will all agree that Montreal is a very important centre of the arts and the skills. Canada should do all in its power to prevent enemy damage to that city. The honourable senator from Victoria suggested that at least one tunnel should be built for the purpose, I presume, of assisting people to leave the city in safety in case of an attack upon it.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: And to come to the city to work.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I understood my friend's suggestion to be that the city required a tunnel to remove some or all of its population in case of an attack. If this were the purpose one should not lose sight of the fact that a well-placed bomb at either the mouth or the exit of the tunnel would put it out of operation. In other words, tunnels can be destroyed as well as bridges. The authorities responsible for the safety of Montreal will have to consider whether it would be advisable to expend a large amount of the country's money on the building of a tunnel to connect the city with the mainland, or on the building of more bridges. My friend from Victoria has at least put forward an idea which he claims has not received consideration by the Department of National Defence. I can assure him that I shall bring his remarks to the attention of that department.

Honourable senators, I have nothing further to add. I trust this bill will receive unanimous approval by the house.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Would the honourable gentleman permit me to say a further word? I was not referring to one tunnel, but rather to a number of tunnels.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from this morning the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon.

Mrs. Fergusson for adoption of the report of the Civil Service Commission on the Restaurant of Parliament.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I feel I should apologize for having been unable to answer the questions directed to me earlier today about this report. I am a member of the Joint Parliamentary Committee on the Restaurant, but the last meeting was held while the Senate was in recess and I did not know about it until I returned to Ottawa. I was sufficiently interested, however, to go to the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms and ask to see the minutes of that meeting, which I read and with which I was satisfied. The recommendation that was made by the committee, and has since been endorsed in part by the Civil Service Commission, was quite reasonable. However, when the honourable sentor questioned me today I was not sure that my recollection of the minutes was reliable enough to enable me to reply. Perhaps one reason why I did not prepare myself as thoroughtly as I should have done is that I noticed that when the report came before the other house and a motion was made for its adoption, it was accepted without question. The honourable senator's inquiry is an indication of the very great care which is taken by this house in all matters that come before it. It is an admirable practice, and I can assure honourable senators that it has taught me a lesson which I shall not disregard. If I should again sponsor a report I hope I shall be able to answer any question connected with it.

As honourable members know, there are two types of employees on the Parliamentary Restaurant staff—those who come under the classification of the Civil Service Commission and those who are paid at prevailing rates for similar employment in the Ottawa district. The question of rates of pay for employees in the Parliamentary Restaurant has been under consideration by the committee for some years and there was evidence that the rates paid were lower than those paid for similar work in other first-class restaurants in Ottawa. Accordingly the Department of Labour, at the request of the joint committee, conducted a survey and found that employees in the restaurant were paid at lower rates than the rates which prevail for similar work in Ottawa. The committee authorized increases in the salaries of the employees who do not come under the Civil Service Commission, so that their rates of compensation shall conform with the salaries shown in the Department of Labour survey as prevailing in Ottawa.

As regards employees who do come under the Civil Service Commission, the management recommended to the joint committee increases in their salaries, and the committee, at its meeting on July 27 last, approved the increases recommended, subject to the endorsement or recommendation of the Civil Service Commission. The recommendation of the Commission appears in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for yesterday. Although allowing for increases, it sets them at amounts less than those recommended by the committee. It also provides that the effective date shall be July 1, instead of April 1 as proposed by the committee.

The Civil Service Commission recommendation reclassifies the five positions of Manager, Parliamentary Cafeteria; Assistant Storekeeper, Joint Parliamentary Restaurant; Assistant Chef, Joint Parliamentary Restaurant; Clerk-typist, Joint Parliamentary Restaurant; and Hostess, Joint Parliamentary Restaurant. It further recommends that these five positions be made part of the establishment of the Joint Parliamentary Restaurant. This proposal, if adopted, will result in their being made permanent.

The recommendation also provides that the salary ranges of the chef of the Joint Parliamentary Restaurant and the maitre d'hotel be revised, and sets out the revised salaries.

I would like to bring to the attention of honourable members that this year the restaurant has in the Post Office Savings Bank, drawing interest at 2 per cent, an operating surplus of $55,000. Also it has $10,000 worth of stock on its shelves and $14,000 in current accounts. This is really unprecedented in the operation of the Parliamentary Restaurant. At the last meeting of the Joint Parliamentary Committee it was decided to pay the Receiver General of Canada $25,000 from the $55,000 in the savings account, which would be applied specifically to the salary votes in the estimates of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Honourable senators, there is no doubt that the restaurant has made a very excellent showing this year, and I trust this report, which recommends fairer salaries to some of the employees, will be adopted.

The motion for adoption of the report was agreed to.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received a communication from the Private Secretary to the Chief Justice of Canada acquainting him that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, would proceed to the Senate Chamber this day at 6.30 p.m. for the purpose of proroguing the Third Session of the Twenty-Second Parliament.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, as this is the last time I shall be sitting in this place during the present session I should like to take this opportunity of thanking you for your co-operation and help throughout the year. We have not been in accord with one another at all times but we have remained on excellent terms and continued to co-operate in keeping alive the spirit of service in the Senate. I feel the Senate is serving our country in a splendid manner and in accordance with our Constitution, the British North America Act. However, the act limits our activities. We are prepared to render more service if the opportunity should arise. We shall no doubt endeavour to seek that opportunity, and it may be possible to amend the Constitution at some time so that the work of Parliament can be more evenly distributed between the two houses. We have in this chamber men and women of wide experience and outstanding ability, some who have served as provincial premiers, others as federal or provincial cabinet ministers and others as members of provincial Legislatures; as well as men and women who have attained outstanding success in the business and educational fields.

I know that the desire to be of service will continue, and my chief reason for rising at this time is to thank all honourable senators for the co-operation and help they have given me throughout the session.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Honourable senators, my experience in the Senate has not been of very great length. I am pleased to state on behalf of the Opposition that the relations between the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) are excellent, and that the work here has been carried on amid the amenities of the best parliamentary practice. I have not been here long enough to become acquainted with all the opportunities that our form of government provides. I agree with the Leader of the Government that there is a wealth of talent in this house, but I am not certain that it is always either explored or exploited to the extent it might be for the benefit of the country at large. Possibly at another time I may be able to dwell at greater length upon this question. In the meantime I am very happy to join with the Leader of the Government in his felicitous remarks on the way in which difficult problems have been dealt with in this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

THE ROYAL ASSENT—SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

The Honourable Patrick Kerwin, the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to implement an Agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1957.

After which the Honourable the Deputy of the Governor General was pleased to close the Third Session of the Twenty-Second Parliament with the following speech:

Honourable members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

During the present session a conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers was held in London where, amongst other things, a most useful exchange of views on the international situation took place in that atmosphere of friendly co-operation which characterizes these meetings.

Since Parliament opened in January the relaxation of tension between the Soviet Union and the West has continued, though nothing has happened which gives us reason to believe that the fundamental policies of the Soviet Union have been changed.

There has, unfortunately, been a deterioration in the position in the Middle East where the action of the Government of Egypt in suddenly taking control of the Suez Canal has introduced a new element of discord and danger into that troubled part of the world.

My ministers remain firm in their desire to do everything possible through the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to strengthen the forces of peace and to participate fully in all efforts which are being made to solve the international problems which so unhappily divide the world.

This year is again one of continuing growth and development of the Canadian economy. Business conditions are good and employment is at a high level. Our international trade also is attaining record levels. The abnormal stocks of grain resulting from several bumper harvests have been reduced by heavy sales abroad. The confidence Canadians have in our economic strength is reflected in the high volume of capital expenditures for this year which show a substantial increase even over those of last year. Indeed, we are blessed with prosperous conditions in nearly all sectors of the national economy.

To alleviate financial difficulties some grain producers were experiencing because of a shortage of elevator storage space you authorized the Government to guarantee bank loans secured by farm-stored grain. You also authorized the treasury to bear the cost from August 1, 1955 of storage and interest charges on wheat held by the Canadian Wheat Board over and above the normal carry-over levels.

Legislation has been enacted which authorizes the Government to make tax equalization payments and provincial revenue stabilization payments to provincial Governments as well as tax rental payments to those provinces which may enter into agreements with the federal Government as an alternative to levying certain direct taxes on their own behalf. These measures were discussed at meetings between federal and provincial representatives this year and last and my ministers feel these new arrangements constitute a comprehensive and realistic improvement in the fiscal relations between the federal and provincial Governments.

The Government has also announced that, once a majority of the provincial Governments, representing a majority of the Canadian people, are ready to proceed, it would be prepared to recommend legislation to provide for the payment to the provinces concerned of a substantial share of the cost of a hospital care insurance program.

You have approved legislation authorizing the Government to enter into agreements with the provincial Governments for sharing the costs of assistance to unemployed persons in need who are not eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. Agreements have been signed with six provincial Governments.

As a result of legislation enacted at this session, construction has commenced on an all-Canadian natural gas pipe line to bring Alberta gas to eastern consuming markets.

You have passed a measure amending the Trans-Canada Highway Act to authorize increased federal participation in the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway, with a view to accelerating the completion of this important national link.

The National Housing Act has been amended to enable the Government more effectively to encourage and assist the redevelopment of older sections of our cities. This act has also been amended to increase further the amounts of loans available for home improvements.

A joint committee of both Houses made an extended investigation of the progress and programs of the Federal District Commission. The committee's study will be most useful in providing guidance for the future development of our national capital.

You have made it possible to enlarge the services available to our farming population through the Canadian Farm Loan Board, and the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

You have extended the scope of the Industrial Development Bank in order to promote still further the growth of smaller industries throughout the country.

You enacted a measure authorizing the Canadian National Railways to construct a branch line from Bartibog to Tomogonops River in the province of New Brunswick.

An act has been passed providing that women receive equal pay with men for equal work in industries which are under federal jurisdiction.

Amendments have been made to the Unemployment Insurance Act, among which is one that will permit the extension of that legislation to cover most of those engaged in the fishing industry.

Amendments have also been made to the Canada Shipping Act, the Navigable Waters Protection Act, the Indian Act, the Canadian Citizenship Act, the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, the Post Office Act, the Small Loans Act, the Telegraphs Act, the Judges Act, the Supreme Court Act and the Criminal Code, the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act, the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Act, the National Defence Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, the National Parks Act, the Veterans' Business and Professional Loans Act, the Canada Lands Surveys Act and the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act.

Members of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the supplies you have voted for the public service.

Honourable members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I pray that Divine Providence may continue to bless, protect and guide our nation.
