WELCOME TO NEW SENATORS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, may I, on behalf of the Senate of Canada, extend the most cordial welcome to those who have just taken their seats in this chamber? You will find here, honourable senators, a pleasant atmosphere far transcending any sharp differences of opinion that may from time to time arise in the consideration of legislation. You will at times be surprised at the expedition with which legislation is disposed of, until you appreciate the fact that the Senate embraces in its membership men and women of wide experience accustomed to assess quickly the import of what comes before them. There have always existed, and will exist in the future, ample opportunities for greater utilization of the undoubted talents and experience possessed by members of this house over and above that required by the consideration of what comes regularly before them. You, with the great prestige and experience hitherto gained in your respective spheres of endeavour, are in a position to add materially in this respect. We welcome you, and wish you well.

The Senate adjourned until 2.30 p.m.

The Senate met at 2.30 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

At three o'clock His Excellency the Governor General proceeded to the Senate chamber and took his seat upon the Throne. His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons, and, that House being come, with their Speaker, His Excellency was pleased to open the Third Session of the Twenty-Second Parliament of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

It is with pleasure that I greet you as you resume your parliamentary duties at the beginning of this new year.

Since you last met there have been significant international developments. Some of them have been welcome as releasing tensions in certain parts of the world while others unfortunately have had the contrary effect. My ministers remain convinced of the need to maintain the defences of the free nations as a deterrent to war. A strong North Atlantic Treaty Organization and adequate protection for this continent are in their view fundamental to the preservation of peace and the security of Canada.

Security, however, cannot rest on arms alone. The Government, therefore, is continuing its constant efforts, through diplomacy and negotiation and through the United Nations and other international agencies, to bring about better understanding between nations.

A meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers will be held in London in June to consider matters of mutual interest. My Prime Minister has accepted the invitation to attend.

Meanwhile my ministers are looking forward to the visit to Ottawa in February of the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom.

The annual meeting of the Consultative Committee of the Colombo Plan agreed that this constructive work should be continued for a further period and you will be asked to authorize Canada's continued participation in the Plan, as well as in the United Nations Technical Assistance Program.

A royal commission has been appointed to consider and report upon the development and financing of television and sound broadcasting in Canada.

The royal commission to examine and report upon our economic prospects is proceeding with its inquiry.

The year just ended has been the most productive in our nation's history. More men and women have been employed than ever before. Our harvests have been abundant. Our trade has exceeded all earlier levels. A record number of houses has been built.

Canada has enjoyed, on the whole, a high level of prosperity. Some sectors of the economy have not fully participated in this increased well-being. In particular, although sales of wheat in the past five years have been at record levels, an unprecedented series of bumper harvests has made necessary the storage of abnormal stocks of grain both in elevators and on farms. Lack of space in elevators has limited the ability of producers to deliver grain as early as usual in the marketing year. In order to provide an immediate source of funds where they may be needed, my ministers will ask you to authorize guarantees for bank loans to producers secured by their grain.

You will also be asked to authorize the Treasury to bear the cost from August 1, 1955 of storage and interest charges on wheat held by the Wheat Board over and above its normal carryover levels. As a consequence of this arrangement, returns to producers will not be depressed by carrying costs on abnormal carryover.

A higher level of employment this winter than last seems to be assured and the improvements you made to the Unemployment Insurance Act last year will provide a better coverage for those who are temporarily without work, particularly in the winter season. Various departments and agencies of government have sought to arrange their construction program to provide more employment during the winter season. It is gratifying to note that many other employers are endeavouring to follow the same policy.

In October my ministers held a conference in Ottawa with the premiers and other ministers of all the provinces to consider financial and other relations between the federal and provincial Governments. Following this useful discussion and some further correspondence, my ministers have placed before all provincial Governments a specific proposal for federal-provincial fiscal arrangements to commence next year.

The conference established a committee of ministers from all governments to consider health insurance programs and the work of this committee is now under way.

My ministers have also conferred with provincial ministers to consider and develop an arrangement for sharing the costs of assistance to unemployed persons not eligible for unemployment insurance benefits, and in need. Detailed agreements have been submitted to the provinces. You will be asked to approve the legislation necessary to implement this program.

You will be asked to provide for the construction, jointly with the Government of Ontario, of a gas pipe line across northern Ontario from the Manitoba boundary to Kapuskasing, to be leased to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, which is to build connecting lines in western and eastern Canada. My ministers consider this government participation is necessary to make this important national project possible at this time.

You will also have laid before you amendments to the Trans-Canada Highway Act to accelerate the completion of essential links in the Trans-Canada Highway and to continue, in co-operation with provincial Governments, the work of constructing that highway up to the agreed standards.

Amendments to the National Housing Act will be laid before you. The rapid growth of our centres of population has been a spectacular feature of our national development since the last war, and in that growth wide use has been made of the National Housing Act by our citizens, particularly in suburban areas. One amendment now to be proposed is designed to increase assistance to encourage redevelopment of older sections of our cities to their best use.

Early last year the home improvement section of the act was proclaimed. It has contributed greatly toward the betterment of many existing houses. An amendment will be laid before you to increase the amounts of loans available for this purpose.

A joint committee of both houses will be proposed to review the progress and program of the Federal District Commission in developing the national capital.

In the field of industrial development you will be asked to extend the scope of the Industrial Development Bank. You will also be asked to increase the size of loans which may be made by the Canadian Farm Loan Board and to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

My ministers also plan to introduce a bill to provide that women receive equal pay with men for equal work in industries which are under federal jurisdiction.

You will be asked to revise the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act and the Dominion Succession Duty Act. You will be requested to consider amendments to the Canadian Wheat Board Act, the Supreme Court Act, the Excise Act, the Canada Shipping Act, the Small Loans Act, the Navigable Waters Protection Act, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the Canadian Citizenship Act and the Indian Act.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to make provision for all essential services.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

May Divine Providence bless your deliberations.

The House of Commons withdrew.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

REPORT OF JOINT LIBRARIANS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the report of the Joint Librarians of Parliament.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

3rd Session, 22nd Parliament, 1956.

To the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate:

The Joint Librarians of Parliament have the honour to submit their report for the year 1955.

It will be four years next August since the destructive fire occurred in the Library of Parliament building. The reconstruction of the building was begun in the summer of 1953. On December 19 last the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons and the Joint Librarians made a tour of the library building and were very favourably impressed with the structural and decorative work that has been done there. However, the architects in charge of the reconstruction cannot as yet give us a definite date when their task will be completed; they hope that it will be some time in the early summer of this year.

The methods adopted in order to provide a satisfactory service to members of Parliament and officials while we are occupying several buildings in Ottawa have been described in previous reports. No important changes in these arrangements have been made since last session with the exception that we have recently acquired a light panel truck to facilitate the transfer of books and materials from one place to another.

The recataloguing of the collection according to modern methods is progressing satisfactorily, with the help of the six additional librarians engaged for that purpose. In the course of the year just ended 25,565 volumes were recatalogued and reclassified, which brings the total number so far processed to 48,120.

A number of donations were received during the year, among them an album of photographs recording the first century of "Earnscliffe", presented by Sir Archibald Nye, High Commissioner for the United Kingdom.

Respectfully submitted,

Felix Desrochers,
F. A. Hardy,
Joint Librarians.

Library of Parliament,
Ottawa, January 10, 1956.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Next sitting.

DIVORCE COMMITTEE

MEMBERSHIP INCREASED

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the house, before the report of the Committee of Selection is presented, may I refer to a matter directly connected with that committee? As honourable senators know, over the years the Senate Committee on Divorce has been hearing an ever-increasing number of divorce petitions. For ten years before I came to this house the committee was under the able chairmanship of the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). Since I have been here it has been under the equally able chairmanship of the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). The committee has a very arduous task to perform. Each petition for divorce, of course, receives very careful consideration; the evidence is heard and weighed just as it would be in a court of law, and from my experience in the courts of law I am satisfied that a petition for divorce presented to this house receives as careful and expeditious consideration as it would if heard in any court in Canada. As I have said, however, the committee has a very arduous task. The chairman has today tabled petitions from 257 applicants. He has so organized the committee, which hitherto has consisted of 20 members, that the evidence is heard by subcommittees and these report to the main committee. I am sure we all want to assist the chairman and his committee in their important work—work which under our Constitution it is necessary that Parliament should perform. It has been suggested that the committee's task would be somewhat lightened, though not greatly, if the membership were increased from twenty to twenty-five; so, with leave of the Senate, I will move:

That the rules of the Senate be amended by striking out paragraph 9 of Rule 78 and substituting therefor the following:

"9. The Committee on Divorce, composed of not less than nine senators and not more than twenty-five senators".

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, with the permission of the house, I would like to second the motion of the honourable leader of the Government.

Unlike him, I have had considerable experience on the Divorce Committee. For many years I was a member under the chairmanship of the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) and I am now a member ex officio—whatever that means—under the chairmanship of the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). Both these gentlemen are able lawyers and understand thoroughly the principles of law.

I should like at this time to offer some criticism, not of the Government or of the committee but of Maclean's magazine, which carried a vicious article, written by an Ottawa reporter, criticizing the conduct of the Senate in its handling of divorce last session. Our Divorce Committee recommended 407 petitions, of which the House of Commons passed 402, rejected two, talked out two and gave one the six-months hoist. Honourable senators, for many years I have been a member of the bar of my province and have earned my living by the practice of law. I do not claim to be the ablest lawyer in Canada, but perhaps I could be classed among the reasonably fair members of the profession. In all my experience I have not heard of a trial judge in my province or elsewhere who has had the good record of having his decisions reversed on appeal in only five cases out of 407. The courts of appeal frequently have their judgments reversed by the Supreme Court of Canada, and when our cases went to the Privy Council the decisions of the Supreme Court were sometimes reversed by that body. It seems to me, therefore that the committee having recommended 407 petitions, of which only five failed to pass the other house—only two were actually rejected—had a marvelous record last session. Indeed, I don't believe King Solomon in all his wisdom could have claimed a better record.

I am surprised that Maclean's would publish the criticism it did in view of the magnificent job done by the committee last year. A good many honourable senators feel that too much of the time of the Senate is taken up with questions of divorce and, of course, many senators are opposed to divorce ab initio. However, two Canadian provinces are without divorce courts, and the people of those provinces must come to Parliament to have their cases heard. Therefore, I do not believe that I, as a member of the Senate, can refuse to hear those cases. That principle applies especially to senators who come from provinces whose people have a right to have their cases heard by a provincial court.

In view of all the circumstances, I repeat, I am most surprised that a publication such as Maclean's magazine would challenge the Senate on the question of divorce. I think I could tell it a good many other matters about which there might be some criticism—for instance, I would like us to get through the session in five months instead of six, and perhaps we would if some honourable senators made shorter speeches. But, seriously, the question before us is whether the Divorce Committee did a good job in the consideration of the cases it recommended and that were sent to the House of Commons, and whether that house dealt with them properly.

One further point: When a bill for divorce goes from the Senate to the House of Commons, that house is, as it were, sitting as a court of appeal on the evidence. Members of this house who are lawyers know well that the courts of Canada, Great Britain, United States and many other countries in the world recognize the principle that the trial judge who sees the parties and who hears the witnesses first-hand is a better judge of the facts than anybody who reads the evidence later. For that reason, a court of appeal always hesitates to override the decision of a trial judge on a question of the truth or otherwise of the statements made by witnesses before him.

Now, honourable senators, in the handling of divorce petitions that come before Parliament we of the Senate Divorce Committee are the trial judges, we are the ones who see and hear the witnesses. May I be allowed to digress for a moment? Some years ago a very distinguished member of our house, who would be here today were he not ill, was associated with me on the committee, as was also a newly summoned senator. On one occasion we were hearing a contested case, and the question for us to decide was whether the wife-petitioner or the husband-respondent was lying. After we had heard all of the evidence I turned to the senator who had been with me for five or six years and I said, "John, how about it?" He replied, "The wife is telling the truth". I said, "I agree with you on that". Then I turned to the other senator, who was just as able and as conscientious as we were, and I asked him "What do you think?" His reply was: "Well, I don't know who was lying and who was telling the truth". I said to him, "That is one matter you have to decide for yourself on this committee, whether the petitioner or the respondent is telling the truth, and you have to base your judgment of the case on that". As I say, honourable senators, the trial judges —the committee members—are the ones who can make that decision better than anybody else.

I am glad to see that the time for receiving petitions has been extended. And in conclusion I want to congratulate Senator Roebuck upon his work as chairman of the committee. I have often congratulated Senator Aseltine. I had the honour to serve on the Divorce Committee under the chairmanship of the late Senator McMeans and the late Senator Robinson, when we used to have only fifty or sixty cases a year to deal with. When Senator Aseltine got to be chairman the number soon rose to about 300 a year, and I said to him, "You must be a lame duck; people apparently think they can get by you very easily". But now, with Senator Roebuck as chairman, the divorces we grant every year are in excess of 400.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: You always said I was too difficult.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes, but the public must have thought you were too easy.

I heard one case last session, acting as chairman, but only because Senator Roebuck sent for me and I could not refuse him. I tried to duck out of it, but I could not.

Honourable senators, we have this job to do, but if the House of Commons wants the job I will vote 100 per cent as far as I personally am concerned to let them hear these cases, to be the trial judges, and let us be the appeal judges and do the reviewing after they get through. That is what we are supposed to do in any event, and how they dumped this divorce business on to us I do not know. I suppose the reason was that in the early days it was not a very difficult task.

I am delighted to support the motion of my honourable friend, as I think it meets a real need.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I have the indulgence of the house for just a moment. To begin with I would like to thank the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) for the expressions of confidence which they have uttered with regard to the Divorce Committee. It is very encouraging indeed and reassuring to find the loyal support of our fellow members when we come back to the house after dealing with difficult questions and making difficult decisions. I also wish to thank very much the three new senators who have consented to join our committee. I hope they will find it not as arduous and not nearly so bad as it looks, because on the committee we have a certain camaraderie and a very pleasant association among ourselves. Difficult questions come before us and we do not always agree, but we settle them ourselves; the house never hears of them. I may give this information to my fellow members who are not of the committee, that every case that we tried last year we decided unanimously. Those in which we had differences of opinion we deferred sometimes for a short time until they could be discussed thoroughly, and in consequence we had no dissenting voice in any decision we made last year.

As Senator Haig has said, we handled a great many cases. He told us the number of cases that went to the Commons, but there were quite a number of cases that did not get to that house at all. We rejected more cases than the Commons did, by a good margin. The total number of cases that we handled numbered 473. Some we passed over as not being ready to proceed, some were rejected and a very considerable number were granted.

Now, honourable senators, I am pleased to be able to report that this year the number of petitions is down a little. At this time last year there were 326 cases filed and ready to proceed. This session so far there are 257, which represents a reduction of 69 cases at present, and I am rather under the impression that we are going to have a slightly reduced docket this year.

The Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has referred to the reorganization of the committee, to certain changes in its method of handling these cases since I became chairman. Instead of dividing the main committee into two halves, we appoint subcommittees to hear the evidence, and even when the chairman of the main committee is chairman of an evidence-hearing committee it is a subcommittee, and all subcommittees report back to the main committee. Last session we had four subcommittees for a considerable period and three for the remainder of the time, but I think three will probably do the work this year. I hope so. Last year we held a great many sittings. We sat as many as 52 times, not counting subcommittees as separate sittings—the main committee sat 52 times. That is a big docket, but there is a certain satisfaction in handling it, as this is our job. There is no sympathy due to us for doing our work, no sympathy at all.

I quite agree that much of the criticism directed against the Senate and against the divorce committee has been misinformed, some of it atrociously so, but I think we must make up our minds to accept criticism even when it is very unjust, and not to be too much concerned about it, particularly about newspaper criticism. Perhaps it is an indication that we are doing something when we are criticized for the doing of it. The worst thing that could possibly happen is that they should forget we exist.

At the end of last session I thanked the members of the committee, of which I have the honour to be chairman, for their loyal, careful and conscientious work. I thank them for accepting the task again this year, and I direct my thanks particularly to the three newcomers who have joined us in this work.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: What will be the quorum now?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There will be no change with respect to the quorum.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF SELECTION ADOPTED

Hon. A. L. Beaubien presented the report of the Committee of Selection.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Committee of Selection, appointed to nominate senators to serve on the several standing committees for the present session, have the honour to report herewith the following list of senators selected by them to serve on the Standing Committee on Divorce, namely:

The Honourable Senators Aseltine, Baird, Barbour, Burchill, Cameron, Croll, Euler, Farquhar, Farris, Fergusson, Gershaw, Golding, *Haig, Hawkins, Hodges, Horner, Howard, Howden, Kinley, *Macdonald, Roebuck, Ross, Smith and Stevenson (22).

Ex officio members.*

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: With leave, I move the report be adopted now.

The motion was agreed to, and the report was adopted.

APPOINTMENT

Hon. Mr. Beaubien, with leave of the Senate, moved:

That the senators mentioned in the report of the Committee of Selection as having been chosen to serve on the Standing Committee on Divorce during the present session, be and they are hereby appointed to form part of and constitute the said Committee to inquire into and report upon such matters as may be referred to them from time to time.

The motion was agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS, UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE AND PIPE LINES CONSTRUCTION

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I beg leave to table copies of two letters which were written by the Prime Minister to the various provincial Premiers with respect to federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, together with a draft agreement respecting unemployment assistance. Copies are being tabled in English and in French. I understand that the Prime Minister tabled copies of these documents in the House of Commons today.

I also beg leave to table a copy of an agreement between the Government of Canada and the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited respecting the construction of the Trans-Canada pipe line, as well as copies of correspondence on this subject-matter passing between the Right Honourable C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the Honourable Dana Porter, Treasurer of the Province of Ontario. I might say that the copies of the agreement and the correspondence are in English only, as they are with the Province of Ontario. Copies of this agreement and correspondence were tabled in the House of Commons today by Mr. Howe.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Could these documents and correspondence be published in our records?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, if the house agrees.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Then I move:

That (1) the two letters forwarded by the Prime Minister to all provincial Premiers with respect to federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, together with a draft agreement respecting unemployment assistance; and (2) the agreement between the Government of Canada and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited respecting the construction of the Trans-Canada pipe line, as well as correspondence on this subject-matter exchanged between the Right Honourable C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the Honourable Dana Porter, Treasurer of the Province of Ontario, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this date.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I second the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

See Appendix to today's Hansard, pp. 13-24.

CLERK OF THE SENATE AND FORMER CLERK

TRIBUTES TO JOHN F. MacNEILL, Q.C., AND L. CLARE MOYER, Q.C.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the house, I should like at this time to refer to the appointment and swearing in yesterday of the new Clerk of the Senate, John F. MacNeill, Q.C.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not think we should let this occasion go by unnoticed. We are all acquainted with Mr. MacNeill, who has been serving the Senate for a considerable time. We know of his ability and of his industry. He was educated at Acadia University, Wolfville, Nova Scotia, where he received his B.A. degree. Later he received the degree of LL.B. at Dalhousie University, Halifax, Nova Scotia, and subsequently he was called to the bar of the province of Nova Scotia. So he comes well prepared to carry on the very important functions of Clerk of the Senate

After serving at the bar for some time Mr. MacNeill was appointed a King's Counsel. He enlisted in World War I, and served overseas both in France and in Belgium for a considerable time. After completing his education, subsequently to his return from active service overseas, he was appointed secretary to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, who was chairman of the Statute Revision Commission from 1924 to 1927. That type of work also prepared him for the post he has now attained in the Senate. I am sure we all agree that his work as secretary of that commission was a splendid training for him. Upon the completion of his work with Sir Charles Fitzpatrick he joined the Department of Justice, where he remained from 1927 to 1942, and where his duties served as further preparation for those he is now required to fulfil. In 1942 he was appointed Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel of the Senate, and held that position up to the time of his present appointment. I do not need to amplify here the splendid manner in which he has carried out his duties and how helpful he has been to us all with our problems. I am sure I express the feelings of all present when I say that we are very, very happy indeed to have him as Clerk of this house.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: He replaces a man who was a very capable Clerk of the Senate, Mr. L. Clare Moyer, D.S.O., Q.C., B.A. Mr. Moyer retired from the position on account of illness, and I know we were all very sorry indeed when we learned that his health would not permit him to continue as Clerk. Mr. Moyer came to this house well prepared for the task which he was called upon to assume. He graduated from the University of Toronto with top honours in political science and worked on several newspapers, starting as a reporter. I think there is no better training for a man who has to deal with people, and who is going to serve in public life, than newspaper work; it gives him a great store of knowledge and information which is of great help later on. After serving in the newspaper field for some time, Mr. Moyer decided to practise law, and he was called to the bar of Ontario and the bar of Saskatchewan. He is one of the comparatively few people in Canada who are members of the bars of two provinces.

In World War I Mr. Moyer joined the forces, and served in France, Belgium and Germany. For his gallantry on the field he was twice mentioned in dispatches, and in 1918 was awarded the D.S.O. After demobilization, and having practised law for some time, he was appointed Law Officer for the Attorney General's Department of Saskatchewan, in which office he served from 1921 to 1922. He then came to Ottawa. He did such good work in acting as secretary to the Dominion-Provincial Conference of 1927 that at the completion of the conference the Prime Minister of the day, the Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King, appointed him as his secretary. Mr. Moyer acted as the Prime Minister's secretary for some considerable time. He was appointed as Clerk of the Senate in 1938. He has rendered splendid service indeed, and I think we would all be very happy to make him an honorary officer of this house. Such a step was taken in 1939 when Mr. Blount retired as Clerk of the Senate. On motion of the Honourable Senator Dandurand, seconded by the Right Honourable Senator Meighen, Mr. Blount was appointed an honorary officer of this house. I feel that we would all be very pleased to have that custom followed in the present instance, and with leave of the Senate I move, seconded by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig):

That in view of the long and faithful services of Mr. L. Clare Moyer, D.S.O., Q.C., B.A., the former Clerk of the Senate, he be continued an honorary officer of this house and allowed the entree of the Senate and a seat at the Table on occasions of ceremony.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, in joining the honourable Leader of the Government in felicitations on the appointment of Mr. MacNeill as Clerk of the Senate, the only regret I feel is in his loss as Law Clerk. I do not know how we shall be able to get a new Law Clerk with the ability, experience and finesse of Mr. MacNeill.

Hon. Mr. Euler: And the good looks!

Hon. Mr. Haig: The only redeeming feature for me lies in this fact: whenever I debated a bill and Mr. MacNeill's interpretation of the law respecting it was against me, I was licked, and I knew it.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Haig: In his new position, Mr. MacNeill brings with him the good will of the legal profession. No lawyer of my acquaintance in Canada—and I know a good many of them, through attending various bar associations meetings—is more highly esteemed than Mr. MacNeill. Any of my friends who have come from my part of the country to appear before a committee of the Senate, and who have become acquainted with the ability of Mr. MacNeill, have said to me, "Well, Haig, at least you have a good lawyer in the Senate, even if the senators don't amount to much." I hope Mr. MacNeill will be spared for many years to sit as Clerk at the Table, for I know that he will bring honour, not only to the Senate and its members but to the people of Canada, and will demonstrate what a Canadian can contribute to the public life of our country.

Now may I say, by way of reminiscing, and either for the benefit or discomfiture of our new members: you are sitting on the back benches at present, but some day you may wonder why you ever sat there, for it takes only about ten years to move up from there to the front benches. I was present when Senator Dandurand moved, and Senator Meighen seconded the motion, that Mr. Blount be continued an honorary officer of this house. They were able men and able speakers, and when they finished speaking there was nothing left for the rest of us to say—it was all said. I cannot do as well, and I will simply say this to the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald): In presenting this motion you have honoured one of our past officers. A gesture of that kind is encouraging to young men and women to join the public service of this country and serve its people. In such a way recognition is given where it is deserved. I am glad that the precedent with respect to Mr. Blount is being followed, and I have much pleasure in seconding this motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, notwithstanding the fact that everything that could be said in a general way has been said by the two leaders—as used to be the case in former times, according to the honourable Leader of the Opposition—I nevertheless feel impelled to make some specific reference to the appointment of the new Clerk of the Senate.

As a fellow solicitor and a member of the bar I have had an opportunity of observing Mr. MacNeill more closely than have those members of the Senate who are not lawyers. I have been intimately in touch with his work, particularly with respect to the Divorce Committee, where we are continually running into problems which require study and consideration. It has been our custom over the past two or three years to refer such questions to the Law Clerk, which of course is the most convenient and authoritative way of handling them, and I could show honourable senators a number of carefully prepared and sound opinions given to me by Mr. MacNeill for the guidance of the committee.

My mind goes back to another occasion when, over a period of some two or three years, a small subcommitee from this house assisted in the revision of the Criminal Code. As you well know, it was an exceedingly important and difficult task, and required a fundamental knowledge of the principles of law. The work involved a thorough study of many sections of the code, their history and the effect of their phraseology. Mr. MacNeill prepared for the subcommittee a lengthy and most useful memorandum, and I say most sincerely that his influence on the revision of the code was greater than that of any member or other official of either house.

Ever since I came to the Senate I have been most impressed with Mr. MacNeill's willingness and ability. While the new Law Clerk will not find it an easy task to fill the vacancy, I express every confidence in him: he too will learn, as everyone has to, the rudiments of his office, and in that task he will have the advice and guidance of our present Clerk of the Senate. I look forward to an equally competent Law Clerk in the successor to Mr. MacNeill.

I congratulate Mr. MacNeill on his elevation to his present post, which is a most honourable one, and I wish him every success.

The motion was agreed to.

LAW CLERK AND PARLIAMENTARY COUNSEL OF THE SENATE

APPOINTMENT OF EDWARD RUSSELL HOPKINS, LL.B.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, Mr. MacNeill having given up the position of Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel of the Senate, it becomes the duty of this house to appoint his successor, and under the rules the vacancy is to be filled by a resolution of the Senate.

No doubt many honourable senators are acquainted with Mr. Hopkins, and it is hardly necessary for me to say much about him. I should like to point out that he has had a distinguished academic career: he holds the degree of B.A. in political science from the University of Toronto, B.A. from Oxford and LL.B. from the University of Saskatchewan. He was a Rhodes scholar from 1932 to 1935, a lecturer in law at the University of Toronto in 1935, and from 1936 to 1940 Professor of Public Law at the University of Saskatchewan. Mr. Hopkins served for five years in the Royal Canadian Air Force, and was dis charged with the rank of wing commander. From 1946 to 1949 he was legal adviser to the Department of External Affairs. From 1949 to 1951 he was Clerk Assistant of the House of Commons, and then became secretary to the Board of Transport Commissioners, which position he has occupied until the present time.

I enjoyed a happy association with Mr. Hopkins during his term as Clerk Assistant of the other house, for I was then speaker of that house, and I know him to be a man of outstanding ability, with a great capacity for work, and a splendid gentleman. We are indeed fortunate in having the high offices of this house occupied by men of the type of those referred to here today.

With leave of the Senate I now move:

That Edward Russell Hopkins, B.A., LL.B., be appointed Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel of the Senate and that he be paid a salary of $11,000 per annum as of and from 10th January, 1956.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I take great pleasure in seconding the motion.

May I say briefly that Mr. Hopkins has only two drawbacks: First, he comes from Saskatchewan, and second, he was my legal adviser when I was a delegate to the United Nations General Assembly. However, I am sure that under the wise guidance and direction of our new Clerk Mr. Hopkins will be able to live down these two drawbacks.

At the United Nations meetings of which I spoke Mr. Hopkins was the leader of a group of three legal advisers. When a question would come up on which I wanted advice, I would ask him how I should vote, and then inquire whether the other two agreed with him. Well, he always advised me, and though I did not always take his advice I found him to be a very able gentleman.

May I say, honourable senators, when I meet a lawyer I either like him or I don't like him. I like Mr. Hopkins. I am sure that under the advice and guidance of Mr. MacNeill he will have great success in his new office.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I move that when the Senate adjourns today it stands adjourned until Tuesday, January 17, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The motion was agreed to.

THE LATE SENATOR DuTREMBLAY

TRIBUTES TO HIS MEMORY

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with I would like to refer to a subject which is not as pleasant as the subjects we have been discussing. Honourable senators will recall that during the recess one of our members was called to the Great Beyond. I refer to the late Senator P. R. DuTremblay who passed away in Montreal on Thursday, October 6, 1955, at the age of 76 years. He had been ill for the last few years and for that reason I was not as well acquainted with him as were most members of this house. I do know that he had a wide knowledge of business and of public affairs, and that during the time he was in this house he took a special interest in the affairs of the Standing Committee on Tourist Traffic.

The late Senator DuTremblay had a long and distinguished public career. He was a member of the House of Commons from 1917 until 1921. In 1924 he was appointed to the Quebec Legislative Council, and in 1942 he was summoned to the Senate. Senator DuTremblay was a remarkably gifted man. Probably I could best describe some of his interests by reading an extract from the Montreal Gazette of October 12. Referring to our late colleague the Gazette said:

During his career as a lawyer, member of Parliament, member of Quebec's Legislative Council and of the Canadian Upper House, Senator DuTremblay became president and general manager of La Presse, Quebec's largest daily newspaper.

He held this post at the time of his death and as well was president of La Patrie. He was also active in the management of CKAC, radio station operated by La Presse, and CHLP, La Patrie's radio outlet.

What strikes me most in connection with the late Senator DuTremblay was the fact that when a very young man he left the small St. Lawrence north shore village of Ste. Anne de la Perade and went to Montreal, where he was practically unknown, yet with a few friends and little financial means he worked his way from the bottom rung to the top of the ladder. I feel that his life should be an example to all young Canadians that opportunity awaits every one, no matter from what station in life he comes. His success is an outstanding example of the position which a young Canadian with industry, honesty and ability can attain.

The late Senator DuTremblay served his country well indeed. He was highly respected throughout Canada, especially in his native province. I am informed that thousands of people from all walks of life attended his funeral service or lined the route of the funeral procession.

May I read a short extract from La Presse of October 11, 1955, reporting the funeral:

(Translation):

The Church, universities, bench, bar, financial circles, the press, business and industrial concerns have all, through their many official representatives, paid a solemn and heartfelt tribute to the deceased, thus joining with the staff of the two newspapers and the two radio stations over which Senator DuTremblay presided for so many years, in this gesture of deepest sympathy.

(Text):

His Eminence Paul Emile Cardinal Léger was the celebrant of the requiem mass, assisted by other distinguished members of the clergy. The Government of Canada was represented by the Honourable Roch Pinard, Secretary of State; the Province of Quebec, by Lieutenant Governor Gaspard Fauteux; the Senate, by the Honourable Senators Adélard Godbout, Donat Raymond, Léon Mercier Gouin, Thomas Vien and Vincent Dupuis; the Government of the Province of Quebec, by the Honourable Paul Beaulieu, Minister of Commerce and Industry; and the City of Montreal, by the Chief Magistrate, Mayor Jean Drapeau. The honorary pall bearers were: The Honourable Roch Pinard, the Honourable Raoul Grothe, Senator the Honourable Mercier Gouin, the Honourable Paul Beaulieu, and Messrs. Oswald Mayrand and Eugene Lamarche. I mention this to emphasize the fact that all classes of society paid tribute to our late colleague at the last rites which were performed for him.

We owe a great debt of gratitude to Senator DuTremblay for the work which he has done both in and out of this house. May I repeat the sentiment which was expressed in an editorial in La Presse of October 11:

(Translation):

The memory of Senator DuTremblay will ever remain alive in our hearts. His demise is a great loss to us and one which we feel very keenly at this time when, in recalling his career, we become more conscious of our indebtedness to him.

(Text):

While the passing of the late senator is a loss to this house, to his loved ones it is a much, much greater loss. Probably I could close my remarks by referring to his loved ones in his native tongue.

(Translation):

Without doubt his loss will be felt even more by his loved ones. To Mrs. DuTremblay and to all the members of his family we offer once more our sincere and respectful sympathy.

(Text):

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I join with the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) in expressing my sincere regard for the late Senator DuTremblay. He entered this house some years ago; the occasion I remember very well. He did not play a very active part in the general work of the Senate but, as the leader said, took a special interest in the activities of the Standing Committee on Tourist Traffic. And I remember one debate in which he participated prominently, a debate in which the Constitution came under discussion; he was very keen on the constitutional aspects of that debate. He will be missed not only in Quebec, but in this chamber, where he upheld the traditions of that great province.

Hon. J. M. Dessureault: Honourable senators, I wish to associate myself with the very eloquent and well-deserved tributes which have been paid to the memory of our late colleague, the Honourable Senator Pamphile DuTremblay.

Originating from the same small town of Ste. Anne de la Perade, I knew him for over fifty years and always considered him as a personal friend of mine. I followed with great interest his brilliant and continually ascending career. From modest beginnings he attained great success and was tops in many spheres of activity. He was a most reputable lawyer, a clear-sighted businessman, a great politician and the president of Canada's two largest French newspapers, as well as of two radio stations.

Canada received both innumerable and invaluable contributions from Senator DuTremblay. His accomplishments during his distinguished career are far too numerous for me to relate but, to sum up, it can be truthfully said that he was a great Canadian and a true lover of his native province.

(Translation):

Honourable senators, as I said in my opening remarks in English, I have known senator DuTremblay since childhood, having been born at Ste. Anne de la Perade, as he was, and I have always considered him as a personal friend.

I remember him as a young lawyer and I followed his brilliant and extraordinary career closely as he became successively a newspaperman, a politician, a businessman, a financier and a building contractor. He excelled in all fields and finally became president of the two most important French-language newspapers in Canada.

Born at Ste. Anne de la Perade in 1879, he was called to the bar in 1901, sat in the House of Commons from 1917 to 1921, was appointed a member of the Legislative Council for the Sorel division in 1924 and appointed to the Senate in 1942 to represent the division of de Repentigny.

Humane and courteous, he was a true Christian, an ardent Catholic, who never deviated from the kindliness which was his main characteristic. In other words, he was a great Canadian, a perfect gentleman and our French-speaking fellow-citizens have lost in him a good friend and a devoted servant. His great activity, his persevering efforts and his steadfastness are an inspiration to our young people.

I would like to offer anew to Madame DuTremblay, to his family and to the executive and staff of La Presse and La Patrie, my deepest sympathy.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, January 17, at 8 p.m.

Letter forwarded by the Prime Minister to all provincial Premiers with respect to federal-provincial fiscal arrangements; letter and draft agreement respecting unemployment assistance; and agreement between the Government of Canada and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited respecting the construction of the Trans-Canada pipe line, as well as correspondence on this matter between the Right Honourable C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the Honourable Dana Porter, Treasurer of the Province of Ontario.

The letter to the Premier of Quebec was in the French language.

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER
CANADA

Ottawa, January 6, 1956.

My Dear Premier:

At the opening session of our October Conference, I put forward certain general ideas which the federal government believed would form a reasonable basis for a revised approach to the question of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. These ideas were further elaborated in our sessions in camera, with some statistical illustrations of how they might operate.

We discussed these suggestions at some length at the Conference and the general consensus seemed to be that they were worth careful study. We did not expect, nor did we ask the provincial governments to commit themselves on these principles at the Conference, but at the closing session, I invited them to send in further comments or observations after they had had time for further consideration.

Since the Conference I have received formal communications from four provincial governments and there have been informal exchanges of views with other provinces, both between Ministers and officials; all of these have been carefully considered.

The federal government is now prepared to make a definite proposal and to recommend to Parliament that appropriate legislation be passed along the following lines:

1. The federal government would make unconditional tax equalization payments to the provinces. In brief, these annual equalization payments would bring the combined per capita yield of certain standard taxes applied to the personal income tax field, the corporate tax field and the succession duty field up to the level of the average per capita yield of these taxes in the two provinces which have the highest per capita combined yields in these three fields. These equalization payments would be paid during each fiscal year commencing April 1, 1957, and would be calculated on the basis of the tax and population figures for the preceding taxation year.

2. During the currency of these arrangements, the federal government would also pay to each provincial government each year any amount required to bring the total yield of these standard taxes, plus the equalization payment, up to the highest of:

(a) the tax rental paid or available to the provincial government in respect of the year ending March 31, 1957, increased by an amount proportionate to any increase in population of the province, from June 1, 1956 to June 1 of the taxation year in respect of which the equalization payment is made; or (b) in the fiscal year 1958-59, 90 per cent of the standard tax yield plus equalization and stabilization payments, if any, in 1957-58, and in subsequent years, 90 per cent of the average standard tax yield plus equalization and stabilization payments, if any, in the two preceding years.

3. Where a provincial government undertakes not to impose or permit its municipalities to impose taxes in the personal income tax fields, or the corporation tax field or the succession duty field, the federal government would pay to such provincial government each year an amount equal to the yield of the standard tax in that field in that province.

4. Where a provincial government prefers to impose and collect its own taxes in any of these three fields at whatever rates it chooses, the federal government would abate the rate of federal tax in that field in that province by the standard rate.

5. Where a provincial government chooses to impose and collect corporation taxes, other than a general tax on profits, the federal government in determining the taxable income of a corporation would not allow as an expense provincial corporation taxes on that corporation up to 9 per cent of its taxable income or up to the general rate of corporate income tax levied by the provincial government, whichever is the greater. Where the total provincial corporation taxes paid by a corporation exceed such level, such excess would be allowed as an expense to the corporation. The cost to the federal treasury of allowing such excess as a corporate expense would be deducted from any payments due to the provincial government arising out of these proposals.

6. The standard rates proposed are:

(a) On personal incomes, 10 per cent of the federal tax under the Income Tax Act (i.e. excluding the Old Age Security Tax);

(b) On corporations, 9 per cent of the taxable income deemed to be earned in the province;

(c) On successions, 50 per cent of the federal duty. (In calculating equalization payments, it is proposed to average the yield of succession duties over a period of three years.)

7. In calculating equalization payments, stabilization payments or rental payments under numbered paragraphs 1, 2 and 3, the standard rates of personal income tax and succession duty would be adjusted upward or downward each year, if necessary, in order to offset any future changes in either the rates of tax or personal exemptions resulting from future amendments to the Income Tax Act or the Succession Duty Act.

We propose that these arrangements be for a period of five years commencing April 1, 1957.

These proposals provide revenues to the provinces somewhat greater than those available under the present tax-rental system; they provide for revenues increasing with the growth and expansion of our country; and they guarantee a measure of stability in this sector of provincial revenues more effectively than do the present arrangements.

They also make it possible for any provincial government so desiring to secure these revenues in these tax fields without the necessity of imposing and collecting its own taxes.

It would, I think, be useful to have our committee of officials meet as early in February as possible to clarify the technical details of these proposals.

I would be glad to hear from you in due course.

Yours sincerely,
(Sgd.) LOUIS S. ST-LAURENT

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER

OTTAWA, DECEMBER 5, 1955.

My dear Premier:

My colleagues and I have been considering changes in the draft unemployment assistance agreement proposed by a number of provinces in earlier correspondence and in discussions held with federal officials during the week of October 3rd. We have now approved a revised draft agreement, two copies of which I am enclosing with this letter.

In revising the draft agreement, we have sought to meet all the points raised by provincial representatives in so far as they would help to assure all provinces, with their wide variety of institutions and procedures for providing relief, an equal measure of federal participation.

In all cases where changes have been made it will be noted that the revised text offers somewhat more favourable terms to the provinces than was the case in the original draft of last August. No change is contemplated in the formula designed to meet the special situation in Nova Scotia as set forth in my letter to you of August 26th.

The attached agreement was drafted in such a manner that it may be given effect from July 1st, 1955, or whatever later date may be preferred by each provincial government. In the event your government decides to enter into an agreement on the basis of this revised draft, would you please arrange to have both the attached copies signed or initialled by your appropriate Minister and returned to the Minister of National Health and Welfare for completion on behalf of the federal government and one of the copies will then be returned to you for your records. Before sending the signed or initialled copies to Mr. Martin, paragraph 17 should, of course, be completed to indicate whether you wish the agreement to come into force on July 1st, 1955, or at some later date, and also whether the agreement with your province is to run for a term certain of five years or some lesser period.

Following completion of the agreement, the appropriate officers of the federal government will work out with the officials of whatever department you may designate the detailed administrative procedures for the submission of monthly reimbursement claims, beginning with the month in which the agreement takes effect. Federal authority to make the actual reimbursement payments will, of course, have to await the passage of legislation at the next session of Parliament beginning January 10th, 1956.

Yours sincerely,
LOUIS S. ST-LAURENT.

7. shall keep a record of the names and addresses of any persons and of the number of their dependents who have received assistance and the particulars of such assistance, which record shall be made available for examination on request by officials of Canada.

There shall be excluded from the reimbursement claim any person, together with any payment made to or on behalf of such person, who is

(a) an inmate in any institution maintained in whole or in part out of funds appropriated by

(i) the Parliament of Canada,

(ii) the Legislature of the province,

(iii) a municipality, or

(iv) a charity organization;

except that there may be included in the reimbursement claim payments made by the province or by a municipality for the upkeep of inmates in homes for special care and the number of persons in respect of whom such payments are made, provided that said inmates are unemployed and in need and the payments claimed do not exceed what an individual might reasonably be expected to pay for accommodation of a comparable kind and quality in the same locality and provided further that said inmates are not such as would normally be cared for in general, acute, chronic or convalescent hospitals, tuberculosis sanatoria, mental institutions, institutions for incurables, orphanages or child welfare institutions;

(b) a person in receipt of

(i) unemployment benefit under the Unemployment Insurance Act,

(ii) a pension under the Old Age Security Act,

(iii) assistance under the Old Age Assistance Act,

(v) an allowance under the Disabled Persons Act, or

(vi) a supplemental allowance or cost-of-living bonus provided under the law of the province to recipients of benefit under any of the aforementioned Acts; or

(c) a recipient of mother's allowance.

9. Notwithstanding subparagraph (b) of paragraph 8 there may be included in the reimbursement claim any additional relief payments made by the province or by a municipality to persons described in the said subparagraph and the number of persons to whom such payments are made if such persons are unemployed and in need.

10. There shall also be excluded from the reimbursement claim payments made in respect of

(a) medical, hospital, nursing, dental and optical care and drugs and dressings,

(b) funeral expenses,

(c) all travelling expenses except those, if Canada is not contributing thereto under some other arrangement, that are made for the purpose of

(i) returning a recipient of unemployment assistance and his dependents, if any, to his normal place of residence under an arrangement to which the municipality or the government of the province to which he is being returned has agreed in advance,

(ii) enabling a recipient of unemployment assistance or dependent member of his family to obtain assured employment as certified by the National Employment Service, or

(iii) enabling a recipient of unemployment assistance or a dependent member of his family to obtain needed medical, hospital or nursing home care which cannot be provided at his normal place of residence; and

(d) the cost of administration.

11. There shall be deducted from the reimbursement claim

(a) an amount calculated by multiplying the average per person monthly cost of assistance by

(i) ·30 per cent of the population during the first year of this agreement,

(ii) ·35 per cent of the population during the second year of this agreement,

(iii) ·40 per cent of the population during the third year of this agreement, and

(iv) ·45 per cent of the population during the fourth and subsequent years of this agreement,

(b) an amount calculated by multiplying the average per person monthly cost of assistance by the decrease in the number of recipients of mothers' allowances.

The average per person monthly cost of assistance shall be calculated by dividing the total of the payments made during the month, as set forth in the reimbursement claim, by the total number of persons, including dependents, who received assistance during the said month as set forth in the reimbursement claim.

13. For the purpose of subparagraph (b) of paragraph 11, the decrease in the number of recipients of mothers' allowances shall be calculated as follows:

(a) the average monthly percentage of the population of the province who were recipients of mothers' allowances during each twelve-month period from the first day of July 1945, to the thirtieth day of June prior to the month to which the reimbursement claim relates shall be determined, and in determining these percentages the latest estimate made by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and published by the Queen's Printer at Ottawa of the population of the province on the first day of June or nearest date thereto in each twelve-month period shall be used;

(b) the average monthly percentage determined for the twelve-month period ending the thirtieth day of June immediately preceding the month to which the reimbursement claim relates shall be subtracted from the highest percentage ascertained pursuant to subparagraph (a) of this paragraph in respect of any other twelve-month period;

(c) from the difference ascertained pursuant to subparagraph (b) of this paragraph there shall be subtracted ·10 per cent;

(d) the difference ascertained pursuant to subparagraph (c) of this paragraph shall be multiplied by the population; and

(e) in the event that the calculation in subparagraph (c) of this paragraph results in a negative quantity, subparagraph (b) of paragraph 11 shall have no application.

14. The reimbursement claim shall

(a) be submitted within six (6) months next following the last day of the month to which it relates, but no claim submitted by in respect of any month prior to the actual date on which this agreement is executed shall be disqualified solely on the ground that it was not submitted within the said six (6) months, and

THIS AGREEMENT made the 21st day of November 1955.

Between:

Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada, (hereinafter called the "Government of Canada"), represented by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, (hereinafter called "the Minister"),

Party of the First Part,

and

Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, a body corporate with head office in the City of Calgary Province of Alberta, duly incorporated by Act of Parliament, Chapter 92, Statutes of Canada 1951 (hereinafter called "Trans-Canada")

Party of the Second Part.

Whereas Trans-Canada has been authorized by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada to construct an all-Canadian natural gas pipe line, currently estimated to cost approximately $375 million, from a point on the Alberta-Saskatchewan border eastward through the Provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and to the City of Montreal in the Province of Quebec, with connections to serve cities and communities within economic reach of the said pipe line;

And whereas the Government of Canada favours the construction of the said pipe line in the national interest and to that end is prepared to recommend to Parliament that a Crown Corporation of the Government of Canada be established and financed to construct a section (hereinafter called "the Northern Ontario section") of the said all-Canadian pipe line commencing at the Ontario-Manitoba border and extending eastward through Northern Ontario to a point at or near the Town of Kapuskasing, Ontario and that the Northern Ontario section be leased to Trans-Canada for a period of 25 years and on the terms as hereinafter set forth;

And whereas Trans-Canada has carried on engineering studies, market surveys, contract negotiations, and has taken options to acquire right-of-way for the major portion of the Trans-Canada all-Canadian pipe line, and has constructed a 20-inch pipe line from the Niagara River to Sheridan in the vicinity of Toronto, Ontario;

And whereas Trans-Canada proposes to construct between October 1, 1955, and November 1, 1956 a 34-inch pipe line from a point on the Alberta-Saskatchewan border to the vicinity of Winnipeg, Manitoba, with a lateral line from the vicinity of Winnipeg to Emerson, Manitoba, and a 24-inch pipe line from Sheridan to Brooklin, Ontario, and a 20-inch line from Brooklin to Ste. Anne de Bellevue in the vicinity of Montreal, Quebec, with a lateral from Morrisburg to the vicinity of Ottawa, Ontario;

And whereas Trans-Canada proposes to construct between October 1, 1955 and November 1, 1957 a 30-inch pipe line from the vicinity of Winnipeg, Manitoba to the Manitoba-Ontario border, and from the vicinity of Kapuskasing, Ontario to Brooklin, Ontario;

And whereas Trans-Canada proposes to arrange for financing of all its costs and commitments in connection with the said program of construction prior to May 1, 1956;

Now Therefor This Agreement Witnesseth

1. Trans-Canada will diligently take steps to secure all necessary governmental permits, financing, materials and supplies for and, having obtained same, will carry out the aforesaid program of construction and particularly will cause to be constructed in conjunction with the construction of the said Northern Ontario section of the said all-Canadian pipe line the portions thereof from the vicinity of Winnipeg, Manitoba to the Manitoba-Ontario border, and from the vicinity of Kapuskasing, Ontario to Brooklin, Ontario, so that all portions of the said pipe line to be constructed by Trans-Canada will be ready for operation at the time of completion of the Northern Ontario section.

2. The Government of Canada will recommend to Parliament that a Crown Corporation of the Government of Canada be established and that funds be provided to such Crown Corporation to enable it in due course and in conjunction with the building of the said all-Canadian pipe line to acquire the necessary right-of-way and to construct thereon the Northern Ontario section of the said all-Canadian pipe line.

3. If evidence satisfactory to the Government of Canada is presented by Trans-Canada before May 1st, 1956 that it has arranged for financing of all the costs and commitments in connection with the said program of construction, the Government of Canada will cause the said Crown Corporation to acquire the said right-of-way and construct thereon a natural gas pipe line of the size and specifications laid down by order of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada under which Trans-Canada is authorized to construct the said all-Canadian pipe line. The said Northern Ontario section shall commence at the Ontario-Manitoba border west of Kenora, Ontario, thence to Port Arthur and Fort William, Ontario, thence to or in the vicinity of Nipigon, Ontario, thence to the vicinity of Geraldton, Hearst and Kapuskasing in the Province of Ontario, being a distance of approximately 675 miles and costing a currently estimated total of $117,633,000. The said pipe line shall consist of 30-inch diameter pipe of $\frac{3}{8}$-inch wall thickness and initially shall be equipped with pressure capacity capable of transmitting approximately 300 million cubic feet of gas per day and designed to have its capacity increased to 530 million cubic feet per day by installing additional compression facilities. The engineering and design of the facilities included in the said Northern Ontario section and the standards of construction and workmanship shall be in accordance with the design and construction standards specified by the engineering firm responsible to Trans-Canada for such matters for the whole all-Canadian pipe line.

4. In the carrying out of their respective undertakings hereunder, Trans-Canada and the said Crown Corporation shall co-operate in every respect to the end that (a) the said all-Canadian pipe line shall be completed as one integrated project on the most economical basis from the point of view both of costs of construction and operation, and (b) the construction of the Northern Ontario section and the installation of the facilities are properly carried out to meet the designs, plans and specifications thereof.

5. After completion of construction of the Northern Ontario section, the Crown Corporation will install and bear the cost of additional integral parts of the pipe line, including additional compression facilities, if required by increased gas demand east of the Manitoba-Ontario border, without, however, being required to build any additional pipe line or looping of the Northern Ontario section or sales laterals therefrom.

6. The Crown Corporation will retain title to the Northern Ontario section and will enter into a lease thereof to Trans-Canada substantially on the following terms:

(a) The lease shall be for a period of 25 years from the completion of construction;

(b) The lessee will, during the term of the lease

(i) at its own cost and expense operate and maintain the Northern Ontario section so as to make the maximum practical use thereof having regard to gas demand east of the Manitoba-Ontario border;

(ii) pay local and municipal taxes and assessments;

(iii) pay to the Crown Corporation a monthly rental equal to the number of Mcf. of natural gas actually transmitted by the Northern Ontario section in the preceding month multiplied by the transportation cost per Mcf. as hereinafter provided. The said transportation cost shall be that amount per Mcf. which, if the line were operated for one year at $\frac{2}{3}$ of initially designed capacity, would yield an amount in that year equal to $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the capital cost to the Crown Corporation of the Northern Ontario section as constructed at its initially designed capacity. In calculating the said capital cost, there shall be included, in addition to all costs of materials, supplies, right-of-way, installation of other costs incurred in the construction of the section, interest costs and all other expenses of the Crown Corporation during construction;

(iv) commencing in the fourth full calendar year of the term of the lease, and for each calendar year thereafter, pay to the Crown Corporation by way of additional rental the amount by which in such calendar year the revenues of Trans-Canada exceed its operation expenses, (including its cost of operating and maintaining the Northern Ontario section as required under the terms of this Agreement), interest on bonds, debentures and other outstanding debts and obligations, and depreciation at 3½ per cent of the cost of its depreciable assets, such additional rental not to exceed in any event 1 per cent of the said capital cost of the Northern Ontario section and to be payable only to the extent necessary to bring the accumulated total of rental payments under subparagraphs (iii) and (iv) hereof to an amount equal to 7 per cent per annum of the total capital cost from time to time of the Northern Ontario section together with interest accumulated at 3½ per cent per annum compounded annually on the net deficiencies below 7 per cent per annum of any preceding period;

(v) make such repairs and replacements as may be required to maintain the Northern Ontario section in proper operating condition;

(vi) be responsible for any loss of or damage to any part of the Northern Ontario section and will carry insurance in favour of the Crown Corporation and itself in respect of such parts thereof as would be covered by insurance if it were the owner of the Northern Ontario section in such amounts as may be agreed upon between the parties;

(vii) be responsible for any loss of or damage to property of others, injury to persons or infringements of any rights arising from or occasioned by the operation of the Northern Ontario section and will indemnify and save harmless the Crown Corporation from any and all such claims.

(c) Such other terms as may be mutually agreed upon for the carrying out of the intent and purpose of this Agreement.

7. It is understood and agreed by the parties hereto that Trans-Canada shall purchase the Northern Ontario section from the Crown Corporation as soon as it can arrange the necessary finances. Trans-Canada may elect to purchase the Northern Ontario section from the Crown Corporation at any time during the term of the lease by giving written notice to the Crown Corporation at least three months prior to the date when the sale is to be completed. The Crown Corporation will, following the receipt of such notice, sell to Trans-Canada all facilities and assets comprised in the Northern Ontario section of pipe lines as of such date at a price equal to the total capital cost of the Northern Ontario section as of the date of sale, minus all payments under subparagraphs (iii) and (iv) of paragraph (b) of section 6 hereof which are in excess of the amount necessary to give the Crown Corporation from the date of completion of construction an annual return of 3½ per cent on its invested capital and outstanding capital obligations, presuming that the Crown Corporation has applied semi-annually to retirement of its invested capital and outstanding capital obligations all funds received by it in excess of said return.

8. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 7, Trans-Canada shall not be entitled hereunder to elect to purchase nor shall the Crown Corporation be obligated hereunder at any time to sell the assets and facilities comprised in the Northern Ontario section;

(a) before the Crown Corporation has received, from the date of completion of construction, an annual return of 3½ per cent on its invested capital and outstanding capital obligations as hereinbefore set out; or

(b) at a price less than (1) the amortized capital cost of the Northern Ontario section which shall be determined by applying, from the date of completion of construction, to the total capital cost from time to time amortization at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum plus interest thereon compounded annually at 3½ per cent per annum, or (2) 70 per cent of the capital cost of the Northern Ontario section at its initially designed capacity as defined in subparagraph (iii) of paragraph (b) of section 6, whichever is the higher amount.

9. For the purposes of sections 6, 7 and 8,

(a) if the date as of which the sale is to be completed does not coincide with an anniversary of the date of completion of construction, interest as expressed in the form of annual return, amortization and interest thereon shall, for the purpose of making the calculations for the lease year then current, be deemed to accrue from day to day; and

(b) the total capital cost of the Northern Ontario section means

(i) the capital cost of the section as constructed at its initially designed capacity as defined in subparagraph (iii) of paragraph (b) of section 6, plus

(ii) the cost of additions thereto, such cost to include, in addition to all costs of materials, supplies, land, installation or other costs incurred in the construction of such additions, interest during construction at 3½ per cent per annum and all expenses of the Crown Corporation that are properly attributable to such construction.

10. This Agreement shall be binding upon and enure to the benefit of the successors and assigns of Trans-Canada, but no assignment of this Agreement or of any of the rights or obligations hereunder shall be made by Trans-Canada without first obtaining the written consent of the Minister, and in the event of any such consent being given, Trans-Canada shall not be relieved of any of its obligations hereunder; provided, however, that Trans-Canada, without such consent, shall have the right to mortgage, hypothecate, charge or pledge any or all of its rights hereunder to secure any indebtedness, and no such consent shall be required to permit any person holding such mortgage, hypothec, charge or pledge from enforcing such security under the terms of any trust deed or other instrument.

In witness whereof the Minister of Trade and Commerce has hereunto set his hand and the seal of the Department of Trade and Commerce on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited has caused its seal to be hereto affixed and this Agreement to be signed by its proper officers in that behalf.

MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

NOVEMBER 21, 1955.

The Honourable Dana Porter,
Treasurer of Ontario,
Toronto, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Porter:

As we have discussed on several occasions, the building by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited of a natural gas pipe line to follow an all-Canadian route from Alberta to the East has manifest advantages for the whole of Canada and will involve very serious financing problems due to the limited markets initially served and the difficulty of the terrain. These might result in the delay or indefinite postponement of this vitally important project.

I understand that conditioned upon the proposed line passing through Northern Ontario and thus making additional sources of fuel and power available to that area as well as to other parts of Eastern Canada, the Government of Ontario would consider limited participation with the Government of Canada in a plan which, it is hoped, will ensure the construction of the proposed all-Canadian line.

To accomplish this purpose, the Government of Canada proposes and intends to recommend to Parliament the formation of a Crown Corporation to build and own a 30-inch gas pipe line from the Manitoba-Ontario border to Kapuskasing, Ontario, to be known as "the Northern Ontario section", to be built in conjunction with the actual building of the adjoining sections and to be leased to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. Enclosed herewith is a copy of the agreement between the Government of Canada and Trans-Canada, dated November 21st, 1955 setting forth the terms of the proposed lease.

You have indicated, in response to our proposal, that the Government of Ontario would be willing, on satisfactory terms, to share, through the medium of such Crown Corporation, in the financing of the Northern Ontario section of the pipe line to the extent of one-third of its cost, your participation to be limited, however, in any event to a total of $35,000,000.

It has been estimated that the Northern Ontario section will cost about $117,000,000, on which basis Ontario's participation would be its maximum amount of $35,000,000. We therefore propose that the capital of the Crown Corporation should be called up on the conservative basis of an overall cost of $120,000,000; in other words, that $35/120$ of the funds required from time to time by the Crown Corporation for the purposes of the Northern Ontario section would be supplied by Ontario and the balance by the Government of Canada, adjustment being made in reasonable time before the completion of the section to ensure that Ontario subscribes its one-third share (not exceeding the total of $35,000,000) and the Government of Canada the entire balance of the cost of the project.

It is suggested, having regard to the extent of the respective investments of the two governments in the project, that the Government of Canada would be entitled to nominate one more director of the Crown Corporation than the Government of Ontario and also, from among these, to appoint the chairman.

It is proposed that the Crown Corporation should pay interest and repay capital investment to our respective governments in accordance with the following principles:

(1) Interest on the outstanding capital investment of each government shall be payable at rates (related to the respective rates of interest prevailing for outstanding obligations of Ontario and Canada) to be agreed upon prior to the commencement of construction of the Northern Ontario section;

(2) Earnings in excess of expenses and interest shall be applied to retirement of the outstanding capital investment of each government in proportion to original investment. In the event of sale of the assets of the Crown Corporation, the same principle of distribution shall apply.

I would like to make it clear that the Crown Corporation will not commence to build the Northern Ontario section and that the Government of Ontario will not be called upon to contribute any funds toward that project unless and until the Government of Canada has satisfied your government that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited is in a position to carry out its commitment to build and put into operation all the other parts of the natural gas pipe line as contemplated by the agreement with that company dated November 21st, 1955.

If these arangements are satisfactory to you, please let me know as soon as possible. This letter and your reply would then constitute an agreement binding upon both governments, subject to implementation by our respective parliaments, unless and until they are replaced by any other agreement between us.

Yours sincerely,
C. D. HOWE.

THE TREASURER OF ONTARIO

NOVEMBER 22nd, 1955.

Dear Mr. Howe:

I have your letter of November 21st, 1955 and the draft agreement between your government and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited which was enclosed with it.

It has long been an objective of the Government of Ontario to add to the fuel and power resources of this Province by bringing to the East, by means of an all-Canadian pipe line running through and serving Northern Ontario, natural gas from Western Canada.

We have given careful consideration to your letter and the agreement, and we are prepared to agree to your proposal and recommend its acceptance to the Legislature.

Accordingly, I wish to inform you that the Government of Ontario is prepared to recommend to the next session of the Legislature that appropriate legislation be passed to authorize our participation in the project to the extent and on the tems out-lined in your letter.

We have noted particularly that the proposed Crown Corporation will not commence to build the Northern Ontario Section of the line and that the Government of Ontario will not be called upon to contribute any funds toward that project unless and until the Government of Canada has satisfied the Government of Ontario that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited is in a position to carry out its commitment to build and put into operation all the other parts of the natural gas pipe line as contemplated by the agreement with that company referred to in your letter.

It is understood that your letter and this reply shall constitute an agreement, binding upon both governments, subject to implementation by our respective Parliaments, unless and until they are replaced by any other agreement between us.

Yours sincerely,
"DANA PORTER"

The Right Honourable C. D. Howe,
Minister of Trade and Commerce,
Ottawa, Ontario.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the Third Session of the Twenty-second Parliament.

Hon. Jean-Francois Pouliot moved:

That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Vincent Massey, Member of the Order of the Companions of Honnour, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada. May Please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of Parliament.

He said:

(Translation):

Honourable senators, it gives me pleasure to express myself in French in order to move the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. This is the first time that I have had that honour in Parliament.

The atmosphere here in the Senate is quite different from that which I have known in the House of Commons.

I wish to thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate for the honour he has bestowed upon me in asking me to propose the adoption of the Speech from the Throne.

The first time that I came to Ottawa, I was six years old. My father, who was then a member of Parliament, sent me up to the gallery. The only person, apart from my father, whom I recognized on the floor of the house, was none other than Sir Wilfrid Laurier. With the good nature for which he was well known, he came and shook hands with me.

I am happy to recognize in this chamber some old friends of mine for whom I have always had a very high regard.

Honourable senators, I would like to raise a point in which I am keenly interested. Why should we use the term "the other place", when speaking of either chamber of Parliament? The custom originated several centuries ago, when there was a marked difference between the poor classes and the rich ones, but we are now in the twentieth century. I hope I shall not be called to order by the Speaker of the Senate if I call the other chamber the House of Commons because it seems to me that, according to the British North America Act, the two chambers of Parliament should be given their true names.

I recognize Senator Power, who was dean of the House of Commons when I was its vice-dean, if I may be allowed to use the expression. We were then the two senior members of the House of Commons and today we are two junior members of the Senate, since we were the last to be sworn in. My greetings also to the Honourable Senator Croll, whose invaluable services at the time of the inquiry held in Windsor in 1930 regarding minimum salaries for men and women I have not forgotten.

(Text):

It is most difficult for me, but I intend to make, for the first time in my life, a non-political speech in Parliament.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: The only thing that I will quote as a matter of politics is the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons to the motion for the Address. Pardon me, I have the amendment in French:

(Translation):

We respectfully represent that Your Excellency's advisers, by reason of their indifference, inertia and lack of leadership in the face of serious national problems and their disregard of the rights of Parliament, are not entitled to the confidence of this house.

(Text):

I do not find that fair in its terms. That is all I have to say about politics, but I will mention some of the activities of the various departments of the Government of Canada.

(Translation):

Relations between the federal and provincial governments—The Speech from the Throne refers to the federal-provincial conference of last October and then adds that following "this useful discussion" the federal Government placed before all provincial governments "a specific proposal for federal-provincial fiscal arrangements to commence next year".

It is evident that "useful discussion" is a discussion which produces good results, but to obtain such results patience and a spirit of co-operation and good will are required.

As the Prime Minister of Canada so aptly said in the speech he made last Thursday on the address:

The past year was an active one in the development of our relations with the provincial governments. We had several major conferences with the leaders of the provincial governments, and have made considerable progress in developing new patterns of co-operation.

Last year four conferences were held between Ottawa and the provinces: a preliminary one in April; a special conference in June to help the unemployed; and in October, a full conference at which

(1) a committee of ministers was established "to consider in more detail the subject of health insurance";

(2) a continuing committee of federal and provincial officials was also established "to meet from time to time to exchange information and examine technical problems in the field of federal-provincial fiscal and economic relations";

(3) It was also agreed "that a meeting of the ministers concerned with highway matters would be held to consider the steps which should be taken to continue the work on the Trans-Canada highway. The Minister of Public Works, the Honourable Mr. Winters, convened this meeting in November, and the Government will be introducing legislation to accelerate the completion of essential links in this highway and to continue general work on it elsewhere up to the agreed standards".

A fifth conference will be held before the end of the month, under the chairmanship of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Honourable Paul Martin, to consider the question of health insurance.

"In addition to these conferences," said the Prime Minister, "we have had several discussions between individual federal and provincial ministers from time to time and between officials of our various governments. There has also been some correspondence on the matters which have been discussed at our meetings. These have all contributed to the working out of the matters that were of such concern to us all."

"I would like to indicate," the Prime Minister continued, "my colleagues' and my own appreciation of the friendly and co-operative spirit in which the provincial governments participated in all these discussions this year.

The settlement of these problems was a subject "of such concern" both to the federal and to the provincial governments; that is why the friendly and co-operative spirit shown by the latter was deeply appreciated by the whole population of Canada.

The Prime Minister and his colleagues "fully recognize the magnitude and the importance of the problems which the growth and development of this country have created for the provincial governments, and have borne this in mind in making their recommendations about their relations with those governments", following this useful discussion and these friendly meetings. The cordial atmosphere in which they took place caused such surprise to the leader of the Conservative opposition that he ignored federal-provincial relations in his criticism of the Speech from the Throne.

The Honourable Walter Harris, Minister of Finance, stated at a press conference that Ottawa's new proposal contained nothing which might lead the provinces to believe that their rights were being overridden. "I can see nothing" he said, "in our proposals which might give rise to the argument that we are interfering with the affairs of the provinces. If a province finds that our proposals do not provide it with sufficient revenues, it is free to levy its own taxes".

As a distinguished newspaperman, Mr. Lorenzo Paré, parliamentary correspondent of L'Action Catholique and former president of the Press Gallery, so aptly remarked:

> Ottawa is being very careful this time to respect the freedom of the provinces. There is no "take it or leave it" attitude. The various governments will continue to negotiate and a further inter-provincial conference may be held, if the premiers so desire.
> Whatever decisions are finally reached, it can safely be claimed that better plans for a settlement have now been laid than ever before, but the present stage is such a difficult one that the good will of all parties concerned will be required in order to avoid confusion in the public mind and to achieve a proper solution.

For eight months the Minister of Finance has devoted most of his time to the working out, with the co-operation of the officials of his department and of the representatives of the provincial governments, of a new and more acceptable formula with regard to the fiscal agreements between the federal and provincial governments. The Prime Minister believes that a fair apportionment of a sum of $500 million between the provinces will constitute a satisfactory arrangement for all provincial governments.

This is a praiseworthy effort by the Minister of Finance. Last November, addressing the Canadian Club in New York city, the Honourable Walter Harris reminded his audience that, in 1954, following eight years of budgetary surplus, a deficit of $150 million was recorded; that is 3½ per cent of the total expenditures. Nevertheless, he recommended, to the astonishment of many and to the satisfaction of all, that the scale of taxes be moderately cut down in order to balance the budget during a whole year of high level economic activity. He was compelled to prepare and present the budget at a time when the increase in business activity was not as yet apparent. His budget was adequate and reasonably optimistic. He forecast a deficit of about $160 million for the current year. The course of events has been even more satisfactory than Mr. Harris had hoped; that deficit is likely to be half the amount he had forecast.

In a speech delivered on January 12 at the annual meeting of the shareholders of the Royal Bank of Canada, Mr. James Muir, president and chairman of the board, asserted that this decision, this new trend towards deficit financing, unless it is reversed, is significant as it will no doubt determine the type of budgets that will prevail during the coming years.

Speaking to the Canadian Club in Toronto on January 9, the Honourable the Minister of Finance advised the Canadian people not to spend too much and urged them to be provident in order to divert inflation from our Canadian economy.

> In 1955, he said, Canada recorded a strong and continued increase in its economic activity, in practically all fields. Total production increased about 10 per cent over 1954, topping the high level reached in 1953 . . . All year-end forecasts have pointed out the possibilities of 1956. I am convinced that this year will bring great developments.

But we must keep in mind that the benefits of a buoyant economy involve greater responsibilities. When the economy nears the point where its present resources are fully used, the danger that it may be thrown out of balance becomes greater, unless the public practises timely moderation.

The Speech from the Throne mentions many new bills that the Government intends to present during the session in order to widen the field of action of the Industrial Development Bank, to increase the amount of loans authorized under the Canadian Farm Loan Act and the Farm Improvement Loans Act, and to amend the Small Loans Act.

Our trade has reached unprecedented levels.

National production last year was the highest in Canadian history. The number of workers, male and female, was greater than ever. Crops were bounteous.

On the 27th of December last the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce and of Defence Production, made a review of Canada's economic position in 1955; this review was published in every Canadian newspaper. May I quote the highlights of this masterpiece:

Ten per cent increase of the gross national product.

Decrease in unemployment.

Record production of passenger cars.

Steel production at the unprecedented figure of 4,400,000 tons.

Record exports as forecast.

Iron ore exports close to $100,000,000.

Substantial increase in our sales to the United Kingdom.

Increased exports to the United States.

Unprecedented investments of 6 billion dollars.

New housing units completed numbering 126,000.

Favourable year for the Canadian consumer.

Notable rise in the standard of living.

Increased farm production.

Nine per cent increase in personal income.

Upward trend of the main indexes of economic activity.

Continuing firm market.

Defence purchases at a constantly high level.

Increased activity in defence construction.

In co-operation with the Ontario Government, the Government will ask for funds to construct a natural gas pipe line through Northern Ontario, from the Manitoba border to Kapuskasing; the pipe line will be leased to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, which is to construct branch lines in western and easter Canada.

Those who wish to obtain information in regard to the financial situation of the country should read the Monetary Times magazine, "The Annual Commercial Review and Forecast" published by the Montreal Gazette, and the reports of annual meetings of the shareholders of chartered banks.

(Text):

The Forward Surge—For Canadians, 1955 was a year marked by renewed confidence and strengthened optimism. In reviewing events of the last 12 months at their annual meetings, the presidents of Canada's chartered banks have chronicled a story of resurgent vigour and determination leading to new records of achievement.

As H. L. Enman, President of the Bank of Nova Scotia, told shareholders, although an upturn in business had been expected "the surge forward which actually occurred was beyond the forecasts of the most sanguine."

Best Year Ever—With retail sales, industrial production, residential construction, foreign trade, employment and income all continuing to set new records since midyear, it is abundantly apparent that 1955 was the best year Canadian business ever enjoyed, Gordon R. Ball, President of the Bank of Montreal pointed out to his shareholders.

Canadians' Share in Canada—Individual Canadians may have a greater share in their country's development in the near future, James Stewart, President of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, told shareholders at the annual meeting.

"Never Had It So Good."—Repeating what he termed "an apt and picturesque description of the Canadian economy," A. C. Ashforth, President of The Toronto-Dominion Bank, told shareholders "Canadians never had it so good."

He pointed out that Canadians in 1955 produced more, imported, exported, earned, spent, consumed, borrowed, saved and invested more than in any previous year. They earmarked a gain in physical output and in the real standard of living of the Canadian people, he said.

Many economic and political problems remained to be solved, he admitted, but it is possible today to take a more optimistic outlook of the future than at any time in a quarter of a century.

"The Year Is Promising."—"The year just beginning is promising," said Mr. Charles St. Pierre, President of the Banque Canadienne Nationale. "However, could there be a more opportune time to counsel prudence than when it is liable to be disregarded?"

The role of governmental policy:

It seems clear enough that the policies of the governments had something to do with this new recovery in the economic activities, at a time when there was reason to fear a depression. The reductions of taxes, though small, have no doubt contributed to the ever growing consumer demand. They were all the more felt because the burden of taxes does unquestionably put a curb on expenses for consumer goods and on personal savings. But according to statistics, the most important step probably consisted in the great credit facilities available for housing, chartered banks having participated in the granting of mortgage loans. Advances made on this account during September exceeded 200 million dollars, an important figure in itself even if it does not represent a high proportion of bank loans.

That was an extract from a speech by Mr. J. Edouard Labelle, O.B.E., Q.C., President of the Provincial Bank of Canada, at the annual meeting of shareholders.

(Text):

Much in store for future—

"There is much in store for this young country and I cannot agree that Canadians are not very much awake and very much alive", said Mr. J. S. Proctor, Vice-President and General Manager, to the shareholders of the Imperial Bank of Canada. He also said: Canada's outstanding position, in every field of endeavor, industry, commerce, mining, agriculture, finance and atomic energy, etc., is due basically to the leadership of Canadians from every walk of life and to the Canadian working man.

If we all—particularly the younger generation—continue to tackle our problems realistically, work intelligently with vigor, enthusiasm and imagination, business will continue to grow and to prosper across our land and your bank will grow and prosper with it.

(Translation):

The Speech from the Throne exaggerates nothing when it states that, on the whole, Canada has enjoyed a high level of prosperity, but it notes that certain sectors of our economy "have not fully participated in this increased well-being". During the past five years "sales of wheat have been at record levels; on the other hand, an unprecedented series of bumper harvests has made necessary the storage of abnormal stocks of grain both in elevators and on farms."

In order to make cash readily available when needed, the Government will ask for authority to guarantee the loans granted by the banks to the producers under a mortgage on their grain and the payment of storage charges and interest, with respect to the wheat held by the Canadian Wheat Board over and above the normal carry-over.

From October, 1941 to December 31, 1955, $237 million was paid by the Government for shipping 37,672,000 tons of grain from the Prairie provinces to points in British Columbia, Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes.

It is clear that the Government does everything it possibly can to help the grain growers who are having a bad time on account of an unexpected surplus.

Floor prices for farm products—Where would the producers of butter, eggs and pork be, had floor prices not been set for their products? Only recently the Government also set a floor price for apples and potatoes. It might be said that such a policy works as much to the advantage of the consumers as to that of the producers, since it makes it possible for families with small revenues to keep on buying essential goods.

On January 6 last, Mr. H. H. Hannam, President of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, made a speech in Toronto, where he showed the need of a floor price for dairy products. The Catholic Farmers Union is of the same opinion.

The Right Honourable James G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture, proved once more that he is a real friend of the farming group.

"When construction is active, everything else is in good shape."

Mr. S. C. D. Chutter, General Manager of the Canadian Builders Association, stated that a record was established during 1955 in the field of construction and that it represented the tenth successive annual increase. He expects a higher figure for 1956.

The Public Works Department's estimates for this financial year has reached a record high of 173 million dollars. At the end of December, the department had 197 buildings under construction, which represents a substantial contribution to the Government campaign to give as much employment as possible during the winter months.

The Public Works estimates include many important projects, one of which is the spectacular undertaking to eliminate Ripple Rock, the great barrier to navigation in Seymour narrows on the Pacific coast. It is hoped that with the help of tunnels and a great amount of dynamite it will be possible to do away with this obstacle once and for all.

Among other projects also contemplated is that of changing the site of the city of Aklavik from its location in the delta of the Mackenzie river to another place where living conditions are better. The creation of the new site will necessitate the construction of a hospital, a school, churches, a rehabilitation center and a federal building.

We take pleasure in mentioning among the numerous public buildings a beautiful new one in Rivière du Loup, the metropolis of the Lower St. Lawrence region. This building is one of which Rivière du Loup is bound to be proud. Credit must be given to the Minister of Public Works for that construction.

Moreover, by the end of December, the Department of Public Works had paid $73 million, in round figures, an amount equivalent to half the cost of implementation of the Trans-Canada highway project, the other half being paid for by all the provinces, with the exception of Quebec. As a result of the agreement arrived at on the occasion of the conference held last November, the Minister of Public Works hopes to be in a position to grant even more help for the completion of this "main street of Canada."

Records indicate that in the field of housing an unprecedented number of housing units, 125,000, have been constructed in 1955; this bears witness to the success achieved through the amendments brought, the preceding year, to the National Housing Act.

Furthermore, the department has continued its traditional policy for the construction, repairing and maintenance of hundreds of marine buildings from coast to coast, many of which are located in the province of Quebec. No less than 371 major constructions undertaken by the department were under way in 1955, 190 of which have been completed. Moreover, the department undertook the construction of 1,200 smaller marine units during the same year. It is undeniable that the Honourable Robert H. Winters, that active and devoted Minister of Public Works, has given a strong impetus to building activities. He has led the way in this field.

Decrease of seasonal unemployment—The Honourable Milton F. Gregg, Minister of Labour, obtained the support of several other governments and of some private concerns in order to reduce seasonal unemployment during the winter. The action of his department in this connection deserves recognition.

On February 17, 1954, the National Employment Committee completed its report on the causes and effects of seasonal unemployment, prepared at the request of the National Manpower Council, and made several important recommendations toward stabilizing employment. The same day Major General George R. Pearkes, one of the most enlightened members of the Conservative opposition in the House of Commons, made a remarkable speech, in which he expressed the opinion that the unemployment which existed at that time was, to a very great extent, seasonal.

The Minister of Labour succeeded in co-ordinating the efforts of heads of industries, of employers and of public bodies, in order to remedy seasonal unemployment. The Government adopted the policy of letting building contracts in winter. It got the support of municipal authorities and chambers of commerce, as well as of the press and radio, to encourage individuals to have their properties repaired or done over during the period of lowest employment. Very interesting booklets were widely distributed by the Department of Labour, the National Research Council and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, which kept the public advised of the efforts of the federal, provincial and municipal authorities' efforts to fight seasonal unemployment. The co-operation of industry was essential and the Minister of Labour obtained it unreservedly.

Last night, at Winnipeg, the Honourable Milton F. Gregg had the satisfaction of being able to state, before the annual general meeting of the Canadian Builders Association, that the year 1955 had beaten all records in regards to commercial activities and employment in Canada. The value of our national production for 1955 will reach $26·4 billion, or an increase of 10 per cent over the previous year, which is a record increase for the post-war period.

Employment also reached a record high in 1955. It shot up to 5,641,000 in the month of August. Since then there has been some reduction in employment, but it is much lighter than for the two previous years. In mid-December, although there were 291,000 more non-agricultural workers than last year, unemployment insurance offices listed 75,000 fewer applicants. The improvement brought last year to the Unemployment Insurance Act will ensure greater protection to those who are temporarily out of work, especially during the winter season.

The National Employment Office renders the greatest services to the working class. This makes me particularly happy because the Honourable Norman Rogers, Minister of Labour in Mr. King's cabinet, stated on March 9, 1936, that the report which I had prepared on the classification of unemployed had served as the basis of his department's policy.

Mr. St. Laurent's government leaves no stone unturned when it comes to helping the working class. The following excerpt from the Speech from the Throne is ample proof thereof:

> My ministers have also conferred with provincial ministers to consider and develop an arrangement for sharing the costs of assistance to unemployed persons not eligible for unemployment insurance benefits, and in need. Detailed agreements have been submitted to the provinces. You will be asked to approve the legislation necessary to implement this program.

As regards equal pay for equal work in the case of women under federal jurisdiction, may I refer my honourable friends to the House of Commons Hansard for 1928, 1929 and 1930. They will see that the Liberal party's interest in and efforts on behalf of the working class is nothing new.

In the case of labour disputes, no one ever called in vain upon the good judgment, the tact and fair play of the Minister of Labour, the Honourable Mr. Gregg.

(Text):

Honourable ladies and gentlemen, I have a few notes in English to which I will refer.

Department of National Health and Welfare —Because of the initiative of Prime Minister St. Laurent and his predecessor, the late Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, Canadians now enjoy the benefits of such far-reaching programs as family allowances, old age security, allowances for the blind and the national health program.

During the past twelve months the most recent social measure introduced by the present Government—disability allowances—completed its first full year of operation. Through the co-operation of the federal and provincial governments, this program brings a welcome measure of relief to thousands of Canadians who are totally and permanently disabled. It covers a previously neglected area of social need and, together with other programs to which I have already referred, brings federal expenditures on health and welfare to more than $1 billion a year.

As the most recent forward step in the field of health, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Honourable Paul Martin, has this week called a national conference of outstanding specialists in the field of heart diseases for the purpose of considering further measures to combat heart ailments, which now account for more deaths each year than any other single cause. On past occasions the Minister of National Health and Welfare has taken important initiative in campaigns to conquer other diseases. As a result of his personal efforts, there were formed two national health organizations, the National Cancer Institute and the Canadian Arthritis and Rheumatism Society, which have done much useful work. The department has also administered programs in such fields as turberculosis, mental health and medical rehabilitation, and has directed a program of health grants to the provinces which has stimulated the construction of 800 new hospitals or hospital additions and the extension and improvement of existing health facilities and services.

The Department of National Health and Welfare made possible during the past year the immunization against polio with the Salk vaccine of nearly one million children. Canada's Salk vaccine program has won wide acclaim for the safe, effective and well-planned manner in which it was administered. This was only possible because careful preparations were made well in advance, so that as soon as it was announced that the vaccine was safe and effective Canada was in a position to proceed without delay on a large-scale program for the benefit of our children.

Expenditures on old age security reached a total of nearly $362 million as more than 760,000 persons 70 years of age and over benefited from the universal old age security pension. In the department's third area of responsibility, Civil Defence, continued progress was evident. During 1955 mass evacuation exercises were carried out during which advance centres for the treatment of disaster victims were established in various parts of the country. Now as a result of co-operation at the various levels of organization, more than 7,000 persons have received training in various aspects of Civil Defence. Across Canada, over 170,000 persons have accepted Civil Defence responsibilities on a full-time or voluntary basis.

Later this month the Minister of National Health and Welfare will be meeting with the provincial ministers of health to discuss the question of health insurance, as a result of the discussions that took place last October at the federal-provincial conference.

During the past 12 months there was continued expansion in existing social welfare measures. At the end of 1955 more than 5,300,000 children in nearly 2,250,000 families were benefiting under the family allowances program, with payments for the year in the neighbourhood of $378 million.

Says Liberals enriched women—This is a clipping from one of my favourite newspapers, the Halifax Chronicle-Herald, of January 15, 1936. It reads:

> The Liberal government during the last 10 years has entrusted more money to the women of Canada than any other government in history, Mrs. C. J. Embree of Halifax said Wednesday.
> President of the National Federation of Liberal Women of Canada, she told the Alberta branch that "the Liberal government in Ottawa has placed $3,060 million in the hands of Canadian mothers to be spent on the welfare of their children."

This is my only political quotation. It seems to be appreciated.

How much has been done for the veterans?

Treatment facilities—The Department of Veterans Affairs, since the days of World War II, has been working towards a Canada-wide chain of modern, fire-proof hospitals for the treatment of veterans. During the last two years a considerable amount of new accommodation has come into use, and work started on several other projects. The high-lights of this period include:

A complete renovation of Lancaster Hospital, near Saint John, N.B. New operating rooms, new laboratories and new kitchens were installed in this modernized 500-bed hospital. The remodelled hospital was opened in May, 1954.

A completely new hospital was built at Ste. Foy, Quebec, to replace the old hospital—a former school—in Quebec City. This 325-bed hospital was opened by the Prime Minister in May, 1954. I was there. It is the most modern hospital in Canada.

A new out-patient wing came into use at Queen Mary Veterans' Hospital, Montreal, in November, 1954.

A new floor, accommodating 35 beds, at the Medical Unit, Westminster Hospital, London, came into use in April, 1954.

At Deer Lodge Hospital, Winnipeg, construction was started in June, 1955, to replace 300 beds in frame buildings with the same number of beds in modern, fireproof wings.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs laid the cornerstone of a new wing for the Colonel Belcher Hospital, Calgary, in November, 1955. This 250-bed wing is expected to be opened before next winter and will replace the old convalescent hospital.

The department now owns and operates 11 active treatment hospitals, two convalescent centres and three veteran homes, with a total normal capacity of 9,435 beds. In addition, the department has 588 beds in pavilions owned by the department but operated by other hospitals.

War veterans' allowances—The War Veterans' Allowance Act was amended in March, 1955, increasing the rates and ceilings. Single recipients may now receive up to $60 monthly and those who are married up to $108 per month. The new ceilings are $840 for single veterans and $1,440 for married recipients.

Education Assistance Act (Children of War Dead)—This act came into force in July, 1953, and so far 671 have been assisted to continue their education. Of these, 110 have completed their courses and 464 are still continuing their studies. The remainder discontinued their training, for one reason or another.

The Honourable Hugues Lapointe has neglected nothing to reform the Department of Veterans Affairs and to help the war veterans and their families.

I wish to pay a tribute to the Minister of Justice and also to the honourable senators and the honourable members of the House of Commons who sat jointly on the Criminal Code committee, all of whom have done service to the country. The Code has been simplified and it is much better than it was. I am very pleased to convey to you the message of the Canadian Bar Association, to the effect that the revision of the Criminal Code reflects honour on the Minister of Justice and the members of the committee.

The honourable Leader of the Government in this chamber (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) is far from being a gentleman of leisure. Both as Leader of the Government in the Senate and as Solicitor General, he has a lot to do. I wanted to have some information about his work; and I am very much interested in him, because he has always been kind to me and because he was the greatest Speaker of the House of Commons that I have known. Besides that, he deserves credit for having made his rulings himself; he did not ask anybody to write them; and he was always right. That is something I cannot forget.

The Remission Service is a very important branch of the Government. It is a branch which, considering men and women from the human point of view, tries to improve their mentality and to make them better citizens. The Solicitor General deals with them with justice and also with kindness. The Remission Service is the branch of the Department of Justice which investigates each year between four and five thousand applications for the release on parole of inmates from penal institutions in Canada. It is the responsibility of the Solicitor General under our constitutional system to advise the Governor General as to which of these inmates should be released on parole; that is, on ticket of leave. The Solicitor General personally considers each case. In 1954, 916 inmates were released on ticket of leave. In 1955 more than thirteen hundred were so released. Of the persons released in 1954—this is quite interesting—only four per cent had up to November 1955 violated the conditions of their release and had to be returned to the institutions from which they had been released. It is noteworthy that during the past two years the remission service has worked out a system of supervision of persons released on ticket of leave. This is done through the service of social service agencies, such as the John Howard Society, the Société d'Orientation et de Réhabilitation Sociale, and provincial probation officers. In 1954 almost 75 per cent of persons released on ticket of leave received such supervision.

Prior to that time such trained supervision was rarely available in more than twenty per cent of the cases.

As you know, honourable senators, the Solicitor General is responsible for studying the case of every convicted murderer whose appeals have failed in the courts, for the purpose of discussing with his colleagues in the cabinet the question whether the sentence of death should be commuted to one of life imprisonment. There were fourteen such cases in 1954, and four of them resulted in commutation, while ten resulted in no interference by the cabinet. A number of the cases tried in that year are still before courts of appeal and there has been no action as yet to bring them before the cabinet. In 1955, seventeen persons were sentenced to death in Canada for murder. The cases of twelve of them are still before courts of appeal. The remaining five were considered by the cabinet, with the result that in two cases the persons concerned were executed, and in the remaining three the sentences of death were commuted to life imprisonment.

In addition, of course, it is the responsibility of the Solicitor General to advise the Governor General when and under what circumstances persons should be released from imprisonment who, having been previously sentenced to death for murder, have had their sentences commuted to imprisonment for life. Where it is possible to release such a person from confinement, as a general rule the release takes place not earlier than ten years nor later than twenty years from the commencement of the imprisonment. Of course there are some cases in which the release of such prisoners is impossible. The minister's duties in this respect are very difficult, but they are done conscientiously.

With regard to the Department of Fisheries: the minister, a young, active and courageous man, did what very few people from the west have done: he went to Russia to examine into the methods of the fishing industry in that country, and he returned with a great deal of information which will be very useful to the fishermen of Canada. I will not mention all the legislation that he has sponsored as Minister of Fisheries, but the Fishermen's Indemnity Plan was very helpful, especially when the fishing industry suffered great losses by reason of a hurricane. He has sponsored legislation for loans to fishermen, something that was sought by my former colleagues from the Maritime provinces for a very long time, and it is now coming into operation.

Let us look at the Department of Transport, which has a very able minister in the Honourable Mr. Marler, who had some training in the province of Quebec. No mention was made in the Speech from the Throne about developments under his department, but there has been the important undertaking of the deepening of the St. Lawrence Waterway, and the opening of the Canso Causeway, which has been a credit to the minister. There has also been the removal of railway crossings. I know from experience, and my colleagues must know too, that ten, twenty, thirty years ago a government would have referred to the opening of the Canso Causeway in the Speech from the Throne. I find this Government is very modest. It performs great accomplishments, yet it is left to the mover of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, in the Senate, to mention them.

Let us see what is taking place in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. In the last two and a half years the department has continued to play its important part in the lives of our oldest Canadians, the Indians, and our newest, the immigrants. The Indian population rose to 151,552 by the end of 1954 and an intensified effort was made to assist Indians in becoming happy, useful Canadians. Forty new Indian schools with a total of approximately 175 classrooms were opened between April 1, 1953, and March 30, 1955, and by the end of 1954, 32,525 Indians were attending educational institutions, most of them in the 574 schools operated by the department. Also during the period April 1, 1953, to March 30, 1955, 1,809 houses were built for Indians, and 4,367 houses repaired and renovated. The Indians have not been forgotten by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

During the years 1953-54-55 over 425,000 immigrants came to Canada and over 100,000 citizenship certificates were issued. In 1955 alone over 65,000 certificates were granted, an indication of the increased activity in this field. What has to be taken into consideration is the fact that it takes a few years before a certificate can be granted. An example of the work of the Citizenship Branch may be seen in the Handbook for Newcomers issued recently to assist immigrants in becoming familiar with Canadian ways. More than half a million of these booklets were printed in five languages.

The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the Honourable Jean Lesage, has said that there are two problems in his department, the human problem and the economic problem. Speaking to the Richelieu Club of Quebec early in January he said:

(Translation):

Among the main problems, one may mention the extremely high cost of education, the long distances, language difficulties, the nomadic habits of the population, its rapid increase, the different degree of civilization, the various creeds, etc.

(Text):

Let us look at the work of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, a department which has five main branches, namely: Mines Branch, Geological Survey, Surveys and Mapping Branch, Geographical Branch, and Dominion Observatories.

In this department, with its five main branches employed in widely differing fields, it is difficult to cite its most outstanding accomplishments.

Probably the most significant achievement of the Geological Survey Branch was the successful completion by using helicopters of the preliminary or reconnaissance mapping of 250,000 square miles of the Canadian north. This was done in three seasons, by accomplishing in each season what would have taken an old-style ground party 25 years to complete.

The production of maps has increased by 30 per cent in the last five years. The map in the Railway Committee room, produced by the department by hand methods, required the full-time efforts of skilled craftsmen for two years. Other noteworthy accomplishments are the use of "shoran" methods of surveying; and the use of echo-sounding devices in the hydrographic surveys which greatly speed up mapping of our coastlines. Canada, incidentally, has the third largest hydrographic fleet in the world, and a new survey vessel, the Baffin, will be launched this year for work in the far north.

The Mines Branch does all the metallurgical work for the atomic energy plant at Chalk River and does valuable research in extracting uranium from ores in various parts of Canada.

In summary, the department provides the maps and scientific knowledge used by those enterprisers who are most vitally concerned with developing the resources of this great country.

The Department of the Secretary of State —As honourable senators know, there are three divisions in this department, namely, the Companies Division, the Registration Division and a Special Division; and the department also includes the Custodian of Enemy Property, the Patent and Copyright Office, and the Trade Marks Division. The present Royal Commission on Patents, Copyrights, Trade Marks and Industrial Designs is under the chairmanship of the Right Honourable J. L. Ilsley, Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, formerly Minister of Finance and Minister of Justice. The important amendments of 1955 to the Election Act were sponsored by the Secretary of State. The Bureau for Translations is also under him. He sponsors the estimates of the Civil Service Commission, and I congratulate him upon the excellent appointment of Mr. S. G. Nelson as chairman.

Post Office Department—Honourable senators, one of the most reliable barometers of business conditions in the country is the continued increase in the use being made of our postal services. This physical increase has been apparent every year since the end of the war, and last year a similar increase was recorded to the extent of 6 per cent over the previous year. In other words, in that year postal business reached the highest point in the long history of the service.

The Department of National Defence reports that the strength of the regular force has increased by over 12,000 from March 31, 1953 to the end of 1955. The department is doing very well in defending our country. HMCS St. Laurent was commissioned in the autumn of 1955, and after inspection by naval experts from Canada and our allies this ship has been pronounced the most lethal anti-submarine ship of her type. The Department of National Defence has continually improved, and Canada has done a lot for mutual aid.

With regard to the royal commission concerning TV and radio, I had occasion to communicate with the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation about a program that was given over the air, and in which the Senate was ridiculed. I was not then sworn as a senator, but I wanted to give a defence of the Senate. The chairman was kind enough to send me a copy of the script, and I wrote to him. Would honourable senators permit me to read the letter I wrote to him, and also his reply? This is part of the letter I wrote to the chairman:

> I wonder if you have given your approval to the song in which it has been many times repeated that the Senate is no longer needed (pages 35, 36 and 37 of the script).
> CBC should be the last one to ridicule our Parliamentary institutions.
> Will you please tell me who is the script writer, where he was born, and how much he has been paid for writing that script?

I received this reply from Mr. Dunton:

> I believe a more careful reading of the rather crude English of the song you mention will show that in it there is not even in comedy any suggestion that the Senate is no longer needed. It is clear from the song and from other mentions in the script that the "House" to which the singer is referring is the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: The letter continues:

> And of course in the rough language similar to the negro original on which the song was based, the word "need" in no way refers to any lack of public need.
> I am not sure whether the writer, T. W. Tweed, was born in Scotland or Canada, but I know that he was brought up in this country and has been writing here for many years.

Well, I do not see how it is that anyone could make jokes like that about our parliamentary institutions.

An hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Of course, it is the right of people who enjoy liberty to make jokes, but I cannot conceive that an organization like the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should destroy one of the pillars of state in Canada, either the House of Commons or the Senate. It makes no sense. Besides there was a nearly blasphemous poem read over the French network. I complained about it, and they told me it was the language of the clochard, which in English means "bum." It may be all right to use language that such people are accustomed to, but not over the air by the CBC to a million people. I find that the CBC is exceedingly bold and that it has no sense of responsibility with regard to the public business, and that there are young men there who seem to believe in nothing and who should not be in a position to educate the Canadian people.

An hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I am not offended by what has been sung over the radio, but I am concerned about it, and they should be different from that. It is incredible, but as in so many other cases, they are always right, and always have an excuse to give—and nobody is wrong; those who are at the head of the business would consider it a humiliation to say that someone under them has not done the right thing. And we cannot say anything, but I hope that there will be a time when the Senate and the House of Commons will know how much it has paid for that fact, and as soon as it does know that we will have better results.

The Department of National Revenue—I have not forgotten the Minister of National Revenue, who is a very dear friend of mine. He is modest, and when I asked him to comment he said, "I have the responsibility to get the money to pay for all that." He succeeds pretty well, because all the accomplishments I have mentioned have been paid for mostly from moneys which came from the Department of National Revenue. The Canadian people have many returns from that department.

Before concluding I should like to say a word about the Department of External Affairs. The Speech from the Throne mentions the visit of the British Prime Minister with his Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, not with his Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations. Probably that is because of the influence of his Honour the Speaker in Great Britain. Our Prime Minister says that he will return that visit after the session, in June. With regard to trips taken by the Prime Minister, I must say what I have said many times before, that the trip he undertook two years ago around the world to visit the peoples of Europe, and of Australia and other countries, prevented a third world war. That is my deep conviction, and I am glad to repeat it now.

I have some notes about the accomplishments of the Department of External Affairs. The Honourable Minister, Mr. Pearson, reminds me of the aircraft carrier Magnificent—he travels all around the world and gives a good impression of Canada. During recent years Canada has assumed greater responsibilities in the international field, and although our population is small the influence of Canada among the nations is becoming greater and greater. When I was in the House of Commons I used to say that I could not conceive that Canada was a small nation. Then I was told that it had become a major nation. For me, Canada is the most beautiful, the greatest and the most important country in the world. The influence of Canada is felt everywhere.

At the last meeting of the United Nations it was due to the initiative of the Canadian delegates that new members were admitted. This remarkable achievement attests to the credit of the Honourable Paul Martin. I have before me some excerpts from the verbatim record of the United Nations General Assembly meeting, December 14, 1955. They are as follows:

> Sir Pierson Dixon (United Kingdom):
> This is an historic and a moving occasion at our Headquarters in this great metropolis of the United States . . .
> Let me pay tribute too to the work of the Canadian delegation under the indefatigable and far-sighted leadership of Mr. Paul Martin. Indeed, the Commonwealth as a whole, I think I may say without immodesty, has not failed in making its contribution to the breaking of the deadlock.
> Sir Leslie Munroe (New Zealand):
> I am honoured to follow my distinguished friend, Mr. Paul Martin, who may be justly described as the chief architect of this successful and historic event.
> Sir Percy Spender (Australia):
> We congratulate all those members who have been admitted tonight, and we should like to say a few words of congratulation to those whose efforts have brought this about. I especially single out, if I may say so, Mr. Paul Martin of the Canadian delegation who has laboured for many weeks now to bring about this result. We know what a deep debt of gratitude we owe to him for all that he has done.

Mr. Mates (Yugoslavia):

. . . Last, and above all, I wish to express the admiration of my delegation for the leadership that the Honourable Paul Martin has shown in striving toward universality and helping this Assembly to achieve today's result. He has displayed an unparalleled devotion to the United Nations and he has added honour to his great country, serving the best interests of the United Nations.

And there were others. The next day the Prime Minister of Canada said this:

The admission of 16 new members to the United Nations is a matter of profound gratification to Canada. I am sure it will be a source of pride to all Canadians that their delegation at New York, under the able leadership of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Paul Martin, has played so important a role in achieving this result . . .

All this has been said quite deservedly of Mr. Paul Martin. Canada, with the four big powers, is part of the subcommittee on disarmament. Canada continues to resist communism in Europe by supporting NATO, and by making contributions of men and war material on the European front.

I should also mention the Colombo Plan, and the St. Lawrence Seaway, which was decided upon after very delicate discussions with the Department of External Affairs.

Honourable senators, what I want to say at last is that I am happy to be a member of the Senate of Canada because I find so many of my friends here. I have already spoken of the Leader of the Government, the Honourable Senator Macdonald. The Deputy Leader, the Honourable Senator Godbout, was born in Témiscouata county and is well known in the province of Quebec. He is the first senator from Témiscouata county, and he may give me some very useful advice on agriculture. I see about me some other friends. There is the Honourable Senator Euler, to whom I wrote many times when he was Minister of National Revenue. And the Honourable Senator Crerar who, at my request, established a highway for vehicles on the Quebec bridge. It was a long time ago and he may not remember it, but what he did then was very helpful. So many senators have been kind to me that I cannot name them all. I might mention, though, a few who have passed on. In particular I would mention my late friend Sir Allen Aylesworth, Minister of Justice at the time when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was Prime Minister and there was a policy of light. I would also mention the late Senators Dandurand and Fafard. And, by the way, Senator Fafard and I were the two closest friends of the late Right Honourable Mr. Lapointe.

All that being said, honourable senators, I will conclude by saying this, using the words that the Right Honourable Mr. Howe used in Victoria when he spoke there not long ago:

As you know, I have had tremendous confidence in the future of Canada; and I have lived to see that confidence more than justified.

I will do my best to represent my new division of De la Durantaye in the Senate as faithfully as I represented the county of Témiscouata during my 31 years in the House of Commons.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Croll, the debate was adjourned.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

REPORT OF JOINT LIBRARIANS ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Joint Librarians of Parliament, which was presented on Wednesday, January 11.

Hon. Norman P. Lambert: Honourable senators, I think a word or two in explanation of this report might be advisable at this time.

In the first place, the report of the Joint Librarians is possibly the earliest report that is tabled every session. It is tabled by the Speaker of each house as one of the Joint Chairmen of the Joint Committee on the Library.

The information contained in this report has been submitted by the two joint librarians, and after the joint committee has been set up it may meet in the near future and consider anything that arises out of the report. Most of the items have already been considered by the committee during the past year.

Reference is made in the first paragraph to the fact that the date of completion of reconstruction of the library is indefinite. However, inquiry of the Department of Public Works since this report was published has elicited the definite information that it will be ready for occupancy by the end of May this year.

The report mentions the purchase of a light panel delivery truck which is used to facilitate the transfer of books and materials from one place to another in the rather difficult circumstances that the library has to operate under at the present time. Members will be interested to know that no additional civil servants have been hired to operate that truck. It is run by a present part-time employee of Parliament who receives $25 a month for doing that work.

The concluding reference is to recataloguing. This process has been going on for the past two or three years since the division was made between the present Library of Parliament and the new National Library which is still to be constructed. The report states that the number of books that have been reclassified and recatalogued has risen from 25,565 volumes a year ago to 48,120 at the present time. When the library is reopened in the reconstructed building its complement will be somewhere around 250,000 volumes, devoted entirely to parliamentary interests and information, as compared with the old stock of over half a million volumes. Most of the volumes not required have been moved to the basement of the Supreme Court building awaiting the construction of the National Library, which will take over these books, classify them and perhaps dispense with those which are of no value whatever.

With those words, honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

STANDING COMMITTEES

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF SELECTION

Hon. William H. Taylor, for Hon. Mr. Beaubien, presented the report of the Committee of Selection.

He said: Honourable senators, the names of the senators appointed to the several standing committees will be printed in the proceedings of this house tomorrow, and any senator on looking over the list who wishes to have a change or an addition made should, I suggest, get in touch with the Whips.

The Clerk Assistant, reading:

The Committee of Selection appointed to nominate senators to serve on the several standing committees for the present session, have the honour to report herewith the following list of senators selected by them to serve . . .

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

For text of report see appendix to today's Hansard, pp. 44-5.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Taylor: Next sitting.

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am pleased to second the motion to adopt the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I want first to thank my long-time friend, the mover of the address (Hon. Mr. Pouliot), for his generous references to me. He is a great Canadian who has impressed his personality upon the country. His speech was constructive as well as informative and contained a sample of his fluency and freshness of appeal. The Senate will undoubtedly be privileged to hear from him very often. I serve notice that he is a great deflator of political balloons, particularly if they contain hot air, and he is expert at pulling rugs from under political opponents. He is really at his best when he is interrupted, and then he is very quick at the thrust. The mover really needs a foil, and you can take my word for it that then he is superb.

Now, let me turn first to the broad picture. It is with some pride that I take the opportunity to say that we in Canada have been bountifully blessed with good harvests, for which we ought to be thankful. More people are employed than ever before in the history of our country; the number is now 5,588,000, which is 153,000 more than were employed last year. Unemployment is down; seasonal unemployment, which is a curse in this country, is also decreasing. Housing is at an all time high. The gross national product has increased by about 10 per cent, which is much greater than the increase in the United States. The normal increase is considered to be between 3 and 4 per cent.

Now, if conditions in the world do not change and there is no need for extraordinary expenditures—and I do not expect such—there will be a great temptation, an overwhelming temptation, to cut taxes. I take this very early opportunity to counsel the Government not to do it. I do not think there should be any reduction in taxation until health insurance in this country becomes a reality. In my opinion health insurance would be real tax relief, and where it is most needed, in the lower and middle income groups. If we were to reduce taxes now there is a strong possibility that some would have to be reimposed in order to meet the cost of health insurance, and that might well start the merry-go-round of controversy once again. I can pay no higher tribute to the Government than to say that the economy is unparalleled: today is glowing and tomorrow looks rosy.

I express my pleasure at the honour which has been conferred upon me which admits me to this house. It is a distinguished company which I join. I am particularly happy to come to it with a group of fellow appointees whose qualifications are such that I am sure you will welcome them to your labours and deliberations. As a newcomer to this house but as an old Ottawa hand I would offer them my personal congratulations and good wishes, and I hope that we find each other comfortable colleagues.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: With many members of this house I have had a long, pleasant and useful association. The house will forgive me if I reminisce about my early association with them. The honourable member from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) and I sat in the Ontario Government more than twenty years ago. We were members of the original Hepburn cabinet. Time and the democratic process have taken their toll, so he and I and the Honourable Harry Nixon, member for Brant in the provincial house, are the only ones remaining on the political scene. Whether that political scene is thereby better off or not is a matter I leave to the house.

When I came to the Senate I found some fifteen members with whom I sat in the House of Commons, with whom I have had a great friendship and understanding. With other senators I sat on joint committees, and others I met from time to time. There is yet another group of senators. These, I recall, were Liberal stalwarts when I was a young Liberal thirty years ago. In those days they were blazing the trails; today you find them in the front seats as elder statesmen. I know what a debt this country owes to their vision. As for the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), I sat under him when he was the First Commoner. We both have a great interest in that glorious part of Ontario called Western Ontario. I had hoped that the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power) would be present, for this happens to be his birthday and it would have given me an opportunity to say a few words about him. I am still going to say them, because I owe him a rather personal debt.

Some Hon. Senators: Here he comes now.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, I wish the honourable senator from Gulf many happy returns of the day.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: We save some money on him because he is not eligible for old age security. But what I wanted to say was just this, that for years, in my early days of politics, he was the great liberal Liberal, and I still think he is the best political strategist in Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: In my years in the House of Commons there were occasions when I needed advice and I turned to him time and time again for advice and guidance, and he always had time to give it to me. If one in politics has a father confessor, then he has been mine for a great number of years, and I am very grateful.

I have admired from the other side of the hall the cool sagacity of debates that have taken place in this house. I have also recognized the hard, painstaking and often tedious work which your committees have done and the kind of work that has been entrusted to them. My one criticism has nothing to do with the manner in which you have conducted, or in which you have performed: it is concerned only with the fact that more such duties have not been allotted to you. Capacities have far exceeded permitted performance; and I would like to believe that the utilization of the abilities to the fullest extent in the most diverse fields should be and will be an object of the administration.

The fact that I find myself in this forum, which is basically different from the one where I spent so many years, relieves me of the problems which confront the elected representatives of any political party, without stripping me of the convictions which I have held throughout my lifetime. To me, as to many—I should say the majority—of you, the Senate is no sanctuary, no escape from responsibility and service. I am here prepared to work and to learn. I shall continue to be a Liberal who believes that his party is more often right than wrong, but is none the worse off for being told when it is wrong. I shall continue to advance my beliefs and to hope that they will find favour and support from you, my colleagues. I hope, too, that they will be vital enough to penetrate across the hall to the House of Commons, and interesting enough to penetrate the cloud of silence with which the press shrouds the doings of the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: My generation has brought to the fore strong, healthy and responsible groups, who, as Canadians, have had an influence on affairs commercial, cultural, professional and political. They have contributed much to virtually every field of endeavour in this country, in peace, war, and twilight. They have had to save, and struggle and endure to achieve Canadian status. All this they have gladly done, and they have been repaid many-fold. Recognition, for which they all strive, has been achieved in part by appointments to this public non-elective body. It is proof positive that our democracy does work and that we are being welded into a great Canadian nation. We have been accepted unhyphenated into the larger community; and we are extremely happy as Canadians. There are others waiting for the recognition which, in due course, will come to them, but which will come very much more quickly if they throw themselves wholeheartedly into all projects of community and political life and give of themselves and their talents. My generation, and particularly those who, like myself, were not born in Canada, found that we could best give expression and make our greatest contribution through Liberalism. The Speech from the Throne indicates that there will be considerable legislation at this session. Some of it will be merely controversial; some of it will be political—I need not mention that that sometimes is controversial; all of it will be important. Some of the controversial legislation which lacks political overtones will entail considerable study. These matters could very well be turned over to the Senate now, and such legislation could originate in the Senate.

I can understand the Government not originating in the Senate any matter upon which it stands or falls, but anything short of that could much better be originated here. Already bills have been introduced here to amend the Citizenship Act and the Post Office Act, and the house leader indicated yesterday that we would have before us a bill to amend the Insurance Act. Even now such a controversial matter as divorce is originated in the Senate. They are very glad to let us have it. That practice can be followed, and such bills on the agenda as those to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, the Dominion Succession Duty Act, the Canada Shipping Act, and the Indian Act could be sent to the Senate for immediate attention, which they would receive. All this legislation could be sent to the Senate with profit. In so far as the Senate being able to handle it, I had occasion to look up the study that was made in 1918 by the late Senator W. B. Ross as to the rights of the Senate in matters of financial legislation. The bills to which I have made reference do not appropriate public revenue or impose any tax, and the passing of a bill which indirectly invites the expenditure of money is certainly not outside our scope. As I understand our scope, short of voting supply we are on the same footing as the members of the House of Commons.

I would like to refer at this point to a recent press report emanating from Calgary which disclosed that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had fired six mounties, each of whom had served more than three years on the force. Their crime—marrying without permission. I could hardly believe my eyes when I read the report; yet it is a true and shocking situation, and one that I raised a question about in the House of Commons some years ago. These mounties, who are heroes and examples to our children—and, as for me, to my grandchildren—appear to have been fired for doing what comes naturally.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Croll: The mountie who represents the typical Canadian, with the physique of an Appollo, a bloom in his cheek and a gleam in his eye, is forced, as a condition of employment, to remain celibate. Such thinking is antiquated and medieval, outmoded and outdated, and it is time the Government were told by the people that they have no right to exact from an employee a condition requiring him to live an unnatural life. My advice to the Government—I am not sure they will take it from me here as they used to in the other place—

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Croll: —is that the best way to deal with the situation is to pay decent salaries and make a fair and generous allowance for the movement of these men and their families, as is done for service personnel.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: By this time I have no doubt you have come to the conclusion, as I will now state, that I intend in this chamber to speak out with all the emphasis at my command on issues still to be resolved in the interest of the Canadian people. Though we have come a long way towards creating a nation in which the dictates of the common man are not overlooked, there are many things yet ahead of us. The Liberal philosophy which I understand best, and particularly that of a welfare state, is reflected in the legislation which has been enacted over the past several decades. We have taken great strides toward a more equitable distribution of the good things of life. We have provided out of our tax revenues substantial sums to aid the junior and senior citizens, the physically afflicted, and other worthy elements of our society. But the biggest step of all has not yet been taken, and that step is the bringing into being of a national health program. It is true there never can be an end to legislation enacted in its relation to the changing moods and needs of our people, but it is equally true that a national health program would complete a magnificent program of social security, planned and carried out by the Liberal party. Today Canada is racing ahead toward the fulfilment of its twentieth century destiny as a great and vital nation, rich in material and human resources. Surely in a land such as ours the lack of an adequate overall health insurance program to replace the patchwork of schemes now in effect can no longer be tolerated. We have backed and filled and stalled and looked the other way far too long. There is a desperate need, and we have the means with which to meet that need. Until such a program becomes an actuality, the great humanitarian story which has been unfolding in Canada over the past two decades is a story without an ending. We must write the final chapter now.

National health insurance is one of the unfinished tasks before us. We Liberals have been consistently criticized for including health insurance in successive party platforms but allegedly doing nothing about it. It is quite true that for many years it has been the policy and goal of the party, but it is untrue to say that it has been no more than idle words, for in recent years very definite and essential steps have been taken. We are surely in a position now to begin a health insurance plan with hospitalization. Adequate hospital accommodation exists—adequate in the sense of bed space, and in the sense of efficiency of service.

The government system of grants-in-aid has accomplished wonders in the construction and improvement of hospitals by government and private agencies. Much has been learned from the great expansion of private and semi-public hospitalization plans, such as the Blue Cross and that of the insurance companies. These have been closely and constantly examined by the Department of National Health and Welfare, and much has been learned that would otherwise have to be learned the hard way. The provincial ventures have been similarly valuable as guides. The Department of National Health and Welfare is thoroughly informed. We are surely now in a position to begin our national system; we have the accommodation, we have the knowledge, we have the money, and we have agreement, expressed and implied, of provinces containing more than half of the population of this country. The need is overwhelming, and the argument that we are waiting for a substantial majority of the Canadian people and the Canadian provinces just does not hold water. The provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Ontario contain more than one-half of the population of Canada. If that fact does not meet the formula, surely the Government can induce one or two of the Liberal provinces to come over to the side of the angels.

We can no longer penalize those whose thinking is more socially advanced nor can we afford to wait for the laggards We are now ready to pass legislation, and invite the participation of any province willing to accept the terms. Only in that way can we make effective the next logical step in the advancing program of social welfare. It cannot be denied that all necessary facilities are available to make a start with hospitalization. That can be the first instalment. We can do the rest in progressive stages. We will never have better facilities, and never be more able to afford and pay for it.

Honourable senators, time is running out on us. Let us just take a look around. British Columbia, Alberta, and Saskatchewan all have hospitalization schemes. Ontario will introduce one at this session. The first two provinces have Social Credit governments; Saskatchewan has a socialist government, and Ontario is Tory. I ask myself, and I ask this house and the country, where are the Liberal provinces? Can we afford to sit by and let the initiative be taken from us? I believe that any number of provincial schemes would be much less desirable than one guided and patterned by the federal Government. At this stage, to allow our promises to be fulfilled by others would be failure to keep faith with Liberal philosophy; it could be the greatest political mistake in our generation, and could very well result in having the tables turned on us. In the past our party has delivered what other political parties have promised, and the people have returned us to office time and time again. So, even at this late stage I make the appeal that the Government regain the initiative, as they did with the old age security enactment. In that case, honourable senators will remember, a joint parliamentary committee was established one session and it brought in a report that was adopted at that very session. I was a member of that committee. A similar joint parliamentary committee could be set up this session. I assure the Government that its minimum recommendation would be the commencement of a national health scheme with hospitalization. The Canadian people would thereby have the advantage of a scheme that would be more efficient, uniform, better directed and less of a hodge-podge than we have now. The present "bits and pieces" schemes will be as hard to unscramble as an omelet. Much time will have to be spent in undoing that which it should not have been necessary to do in the first place.

There is no profit in blaming others or looking for scapegoats. We have a precedent, which members of this house know was used on another occasion. It is now more than 25 years since we brought into being old age pensions. At that time, the scheme was offered to those provinces which wished to participate. Some accepted at once, others took a little longer; by the end of ten years all had joined the scheme. It may be argued that the old age pensions affect perhaps only a couple of hundred thousands at the most, whereas national health insurance affects the whole country. That is a good argument, and notice must be taken of it, but the way to meet that argument is to turn to a constitutional amendment. If any province refuses to agree to a constitutional amendment —and that is the prerogative of a province—then, of course, we could bring in national health insurance without a constitutional amendment by grants-in-aid. The scheme resulting from grants-in-aid will not be as uniform or as good, but anything is better than what we have at present.

Honourable senators, this is not a new subject with me. I have advocated health insurance for 25 years, which is all of my active political life. If I was a radical then, I am an advanced radical today. My views were moulded by the storms which raged around me in my youth. In those days insecurity was all about me. That same insecurity of crippling health costs still exists, and will continue to exist, until national health insurance is realized.

I had also planned to speak on crime, penal reform and probation, a subject in which I thought I should take more interest here than I took in the House of Commons. I intend to speak on housing and on foreign affairs, but I shall leave those subjects to another day. However, there is one matter which I must bring to the attention of the Senate at this time, for I have strong feelings on it.

It has always been my view, and this is the first opportunity I have had to say it, that the Senate can play a very much more important role than it does in the field of public inquiry. In this respect I have in mind one subject which in my opinion is long overdue and screaming for attention. If there is wisdom among us, and I believe there is, and if there is experience of many years, as I am sure there is, then these qualities should be put to use in the most beneficial manner. Frankly, the Senate of Canada faces the task of reviving public confidence in it. I know of no better way of accomplishing that end than by continuing to use our talent and experience in the undivided service of our people in the field of public inquiry.

At this session, as early as possible, the Senate in conjunction with the House of Commons should undertake an immediate study of Canada's No. 1 health problem, the most dreaded affliction of mankind, mental illness. This subject is, as I say, long overdue for study. It is a little understood problem, and for too long has been sloughed off and neglected. It is time we had a national survey to create an atmosphere of understanding.

When I speak of the mentally ill, most honourable senators know what I am talking about: I speak of the hidden people, victims of superstition, unnoticed and forgotten, in a forbidden world, and living in a world of their own. These mental patients occupy one-half of the hospital beds in Canada. The cost of their care has risen over the past fifteen consecutive years to a point where it is now in excess of $70 million annually, with no end in sight.

Mentally retarded children outnumber all those afflicted by polio, blindness and rheumatic fever. Mental disease touches one in every fifty families in Canada. It is time that we brought the subject out in the open and had a good look at it. Thus, we could sweep away the myths surrounding this disease and deal with reality. Here is an opportunity to strike an important blow for human progress. I suggest that we should enter into such a study in order to obtain a greater understanding of mental illness, its causes and how it can be prevented. Let us learn something of the custodial problems and help to break down the barrier between the community and mental hospitals. It is time we recognized that the mentally afflicted are human beings with talents which can be developed into useful and worthwhile activities.

We in our time have been helpless against many diseases, but by study, application and expenditure of money we have driven back such diseases as smallpox, scarlet fever, tuberculosis and pneumonia. A better example of our progress is our fight against polio. Ten years ago—five years and, yes, two years ago—there was faith in the ultimate defeat of polio but there was little to justify that faith. Today we are in sight of a remedy. We must not give up.

I urge this house to give careful consideration to the suggestion I have made. I for one, and I am sure honourable senators feel the same way, am not prepared to write off the 66,000 Canadians now in our mental hospitals and the 10,000 to 20,000 waiting for admission.

Honourable senators, I have stepped across the hall from one house to the other. There are different walls and new faces, but my perspective remains unchanged. I believe it is what men and women do with human and material resources that largely determines their future.

We have before us a bright and glorious future, if we are determined to make it so.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Haig, the debate was adjourned.

DIVORCE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of report No. 1 of the Standing Committee on Divorce, which was presented yesterday.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the committee, moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, by way of a brief explanation, may I say that the report recommends that the quorum of the Standing Committee on Divorce be reduced, that the committee be permitted to sit during adjournments of the Senate, and to appoint subcommittees. This is a routine report.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the reports Nos. 2 and 3 of the Standing Committee on Divorce.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck moved that the reports be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, each of these reports recommends, first, that application for leave to withdraw a petition for divorce be granted. We are always very ready to allow such petitions to be withdrawn. Secondly, there is a recommendation in each case, that we refund the parliamentary fees, other than $25 for printing and translation costs. That is the amount fixed for these costs now. It used to be for many years $10, but we felt that was not sufficient and last session we increased it to $25.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, January 19, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien, Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

PRIVATE BILL

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND IN CANADA—FIRST READING

Hon. A. K. Hugessen presented Bill D, an Act respecting The General Synod of the Church of England in Canada, The Missionary Society of the Church of England in Canada, The Woman's Auxiliary of the Church of England in Canada and the Church of England Consolidated Trust Fund.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be placed on the order paper for second reading?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Wednesday next.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 4 to 15, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I move that when this house adjourns today it stands adjourned until Tuesday, January 24, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The motion was agreed to.

LIGHTING OF SENATE CHAMBER

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I rise to complain about the lighting in this chamber. It is atrocious; it is insufficient for the reading of our reports; and the members of the press in the gallery complain to me that they have to look directly into the lights when watching a speaker on the floor. I would suggest that when the Standing Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is formed it take up this question at once to see if some solution cannot be found.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, seconded by Hon. Mr. Croll, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, there is method in my madness in wanting to speak today: I calculated that the senators from Montreal and vicinity and those from Toronto and vicinity would be away, and I would be able to address the thoughtful members of the chamber in peace and quiet.

Before I address words of welcome to the new senators I wish to take issue with one item mentioned by the mover of the Address (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) and to support a point made by the seconder (Hon. Mr. Croll).

The mover referred to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Now, honourable senators, I do not know how the CBC is regarded in the province of Quebec or Ontario, but I do know something as to how it is regarded in the western provinces: we would not do without the CBC under any conditions if we could help it. It is one medium that is of very great assistance and help to our country. We have no American stations just across the line that we can tune in on; we have to depend on Canadian stations and especially on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the news, particularly in the outlying parts of the province. We value that organization very much.

Now I come to the matter raised by the seconder. I agree with what he said in criticizing the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for dismissing six members of the force because they had married without permission. That is an outrage. It is no excuse to say that there is a regulation to the effect that a man has to be five years on the force before he can get married. Love does not wait on regulations of that kind. I would hate to think that in this civilized country young men who went to war and risked their lives to protect Canada—as my boy did—might be told when they came home that they could not get married until they were twenty-one or had five years' service in the bank or wherever they worked. We talk about giving young men of eighteen the right to vote; yet a mounted Policeman cannot get married until he has been five years in the service. The sooner this barbaric rule is done away with the better. In saying this, I am sure I speak for all our people, especially Christian men and women who want their children to marry young and form a partnership which will make for better homes and, in the case of our policemen, for even higher efficiency. I know, speaking for myself, that I am a better lawyer than I would have been but for the kind of woman I was lucky to secure as a wife.

Apart from the reference to the CBC, I unreservedly congratulate the new senators who respectively moved and seconded the address. They are experienced parliamentarians; and as they have probably had more experience in this line than most of us, it might be said that to compliment them is like carrying coals to Newcastle. However that may be, we are delighted to have had thirteen people added to our rostrum. In welcoming them I want to say a word or two, not to try to tell them how to act, not to try to tell them what to do, not to try to tell them how to think or vote, but to assure them that we shall make them part of ourselves; and it is up to them to take advantage of this situation, because they are wholeheartedly welcomed and will be as wholeheartedly received as though they had been here as long as the rest of us—and some of us have been here quite a while. When one has been a senator for a year or two, or at most four or five years, he tends to forget, or at any rate to overlook, that he was a Liberal or a Conservative; he puts the interests of Canada ahead of those of any party when it becomes necessary to decide an issue of real importance. I do not say this in a political sense, but from the point of view that when we as senators have to face an issue, the interests of the country are the criterion by which we shall be judged. For if those outside this house criticize us it will be because, in matters of crucial importance, we have allowed our former political allegiance to stand in the way of what they think we should have done for the benefit and the progress of Canada. The more we promote the true interests of Canada, the more thankful the people will be that there is a Senate in this country today.

In welcoming the new members, may I say how pleased I am that some of them are women. When I first came to this chamber there was but one woman member: later another was added, to our side of the house. For many years our membership included only these two ladies, both of them distinguished and able; and it is very gratifying that their numbers have been increased by the latest appointments. These new senators have already given fine service to the people, and I know I speak for all of you when I say that we are glad they are members of this house.

I want to discuss a number of the issues referred to in the Speech from the Throne, and particularly to deal with a subject which you may not have heard about before—the question of wheat—and the agricultural situation in Canada. First of all, however, I am going to say something about the question of trade, which is vital to the life of our people. Since the end of World War II we have had a seller's market and have been able to sell anything we produced. Some of the things we produce are raw materials, and by selling them we are using up natural resources which do not reproduce and thereby doing away with a great heritage. For instance, the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company Limited produces and exports copper, lead and zinc, and the present estimate is that in eleven years the mine's deposits will be used up and that particular mine will no longer be productive. Although other mines may be found, Canada may ultimately reach its limit of production of these ores, as the United States has in respect of iron ore. In 1913 I had occasion to take part in a curling bonspiel in the iron range country of Minnesota. At that time it seemed to me that the iron ore there could never be exhausted. It was being taken away as though it were gravel. I remember seeing a town which had been constructed on the top of iron ore deposits and so much ore had been taken from around the town that a bridge had to be built in order that people could travel in and out of the place. Later I found that the town had been abandoned and the ore under it was mined until finally none was left. I fear we are going to do the same thing in Canada. We will be able to sell our raw materials as long as there is a demand in the world for war supplies, as long as the United States and Russia spend billions on defence, and the United States gives other countries the money with which to buy the instruments of war. It just can't be stopped.

What about our products that we are able to reproduce year after year? I maintain that that side of our production is lacking very much, but before I get into that subject I want to say a word or two about finances. Yesterday the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) advocated that a national health program should be introduced because the Government is now collecting enough taxes to pay for it. But let me tell you of some of the ways in which our taxes are collected. I know something about the operations of the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company Limited, which has its main mine in Manitoba, so I will use it as an illustration. In the year 1922 I travelled with other members of the Manitoba Legislature up the Saskatchewan River to The Pas, and later we visited Flin Flon. Here we were shown certain ground formations which somebody said might some day be a mine. A man by the name of Whitney came up from New York and decided to purchase the site.

Well, when he got the first of the material out and sent it for test they could not refine it, could not separate the gold, silver, copper, lead and zinc from the dross, and there was no known formula for doing so. Then he came to Winnipeg and asked the Legislature, which was in session at the time, for an advance of a certain amount of money to find a way to make the refining perfect; but the Government said no, that was a matter for private enterprise. He then appealed to the members of the Legislature, and offered to each one who put in $1,500 a bond at 5 per cent and also 100 shares in the stock of the company. Of course, the shares were worth nothing so long as there was no formula for refining the material, so if they could not find a formula you would lose your money. At first only three or four fellows accepted the offer, but the rest of us canvassed until we got pretty nearly every member of the Legislature to put up $1,500 in return for a bond, plus 100 shares of stock as a bonus. About $1 million was spent on experimental work, and at last a formula was discovered; then the mine was started and $20 million was put into development. Last year the company made $9 million net.

Remember, honourable senators, the land was originally owned by the discoverer of the mine; he bought and paid for it; then Whitney bought and paid for it. The town of Flin Flon was built, and it taxed the mine to pay for police protection, schools, and all that sort of thing. The dominion Government put in nothing at all, and yet last year out of the earnings of $9 million it took $4½ million in taxes. Canada is the only country in the world which does that kind of thing. Great Britain does not do so. It is true that Britain taxes corporations, but if I owned 100 shares in a company in Britain I would be given credit on my income tax for the amount that the company paid in taxes in respect of my shares. This country does not allow such a credit, yet it took $4½ million in taxes from the mine, into which it never put a dollar. At the end of eleven years my money and that of the other investors will be gone, and the government will have received a huge sum in taxes. Is that fair taxation? I do not think so at all. I have no objection to personal income tax, on the basis of ability to pay; I know of no fairer system that could be devised. If I earn $25,000 a year and a young man sitting next to me earns only $5,000, certainly I should pay more income tax than he; but if my money is invested in an organization into which the Government never put a nickel, I do not think the Government has any right to take half the profit made on my money, and not give me credit for it when I am paying my own income tax.

A growing financial problem is facing our municipalities and school districts, both public and separate. I have heard from school districts in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Quebec, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and they all refer to the great difficulty of meeting the cost of education, on account of the increase in population, with the prevailing larger families, and the increased salaries of teachers. I am not kicking because the teachers in our cities start at a salary of $2,500 a year, running up to $6,000, but I remember when a school teacher got $40 a month. That is what I started at, and I was considered one of the "plutes" one of the aristocrats of the profession. People said, "He gets $40 a month." True, $40 then was as good as about $100 now, and maybe more.

While on the subject of education, I thank the Government, through the honourable leader of this house (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) for the contribution made every year to the universities of Canada; if it were not for that help a great many of our universities would have to close their doors. The contributions by the Government this year will amount to almost $8 million, an average of 50 cents per person from every Canadian. Only the other day Dr. Sidney Smith, President of the University of Toronto, said that unless something drastic is done within the next few years the case for education will be lost. Russia today is training more engineers than is the United States, and is advancing in the field of higher education. It is said that engineers are not required in our country, but how can that be so, with all these new war inventions? And we are not near the end of the story. Yet we in Canada are starving our educational institutions, and the dominion Government is to blame, because the municipalities have not been able to get the money they need. The Government made a deal with the provinces, but it was soon found that the provinces would use up the money. I do not think my own city of Winnipeg is or ever was extravagant, but when I left the board there in 1921 our expenditure on the educational system was, if I recall rightly, about $600,000 or $700,000 a year. The estimate for this year is $10 million. And that is not the end; new buildings are proposed, at a probable cost of $5 million or $6 million more. There is a similar situation in other parts of Canada. Also, various municipalities are in a plight because the government puts up fancy buildings and pays no taxes on them. My honourable friend will say, "Yes, it does, provided their assessed value is a certain proportion of the whole assessment in the municipality concerned". But that happens only in Ottawa and perhaps some of the larger cities. The Government should pay municipal taxes on the same basis as all other property owners do.

I turn now to the question of credit. Four days before Christmas I walked into one of the largest department stores in Canada; in fact, it was the leading department store. I wanted to buy a present for one of my daughters-in-law. I was looking for cups and saucers—not an extravagant present, because one uses cups and saucers every day. I told the girl behind the counter that I wanted a certain pattern. She wrapped up the goods up and said "That is $42.35, Mister" —she did not know my name. She then asked if I wanted credit or would pay cash, and added, "We will give you credit if you wish, as much as you want." Now, she did not know me at all. My children say that she looked at my hat, which was about two years old—and my overcoat was not too good either—and that the girl behind the counter probably said to herself, "That fellow needs some help; he can't afford to pay cash for that expensive stuff, he needs credit."

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No doubt she looked at your honest face.

Hon. Mr. Haig: No, she looked at my hat and said to herself, "That fellow needs credit."

Honourable senators, that sort of thing is going on all over Canada. In the city of Ottawa 9,000 liens were filed in 1955, as against 6,000 in 1954. In the same city 1,189 more chattel mortgages were filed last year than in the previous year. All this is because of credit buying. There are firms by the dozens in the city of Winnipeg who are cashing agreements on television sets, radios and many other appliances which have been bought on time. It is most ridiculous that anybody can buy these articles by paying $5 down and $2 a month. Such easy credit terms were for a time allowed in Britain, but there it was soon found necessary to curtail them, and today buyers must make a down payment of at least 30 per cent of the value of the article they buy. In a firm in Winnipeg four men and four women are kept busy looking after the credit buying of television sets alone. That situation is multiplied all across the country.

Today the banks have heavy deposits in savings accounts. If there is a banker in the house I would like him to tell me why that is so. The same is true of the trust companies. In conversation an officer of a trust company recently told me that their deposits over the past six months were higher than they had been for years. To me, the reason why a certain class of people are putting their money into savings is that they are afraid of the investment future.

Let me come now to the problem of finding markets for the products we annually produce in Canada. Take for instance wheat, cattle, hogs, potatoes, fruit, especially apples, and such items which we produce year after year: These commodities are now a glut on the world market, and wheat in particular cannot be sold. I know some honourable members of the house will remind me that we got big prices for wheat during and after the war. That is true, but we could have received much bigger prices had we had a free market. I have previously reminded this house that in the first four years of the British wheat agreement we lost $600 million. The United States is in somewhat the same position as we are: it wanted $2.25 a bushel for its wheat, but the world market would not pay it. Now it is selling the wheat for what it can get, and taking in return foreign exchange, or lending money to the purchaser to buy American products.

Canada faces a peculiar situation. Let me read to you some rather startling figures concerning Canadian agriculture. The approximate value the farmer received for his products over the past few years is as follows:

1952	1,000,000,000
1953	880,000,000
1954	375,000,000

Honourable senators, to me it is most startling that the returns for agricultural products have fallen off so much.

And now we can't sell our wheat. The honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) will of course tell me that wheat is being sold now. I would remind him that the elevators are full. The statement that there is space for 100 million bushels is, I think, in part accounted for by another reason than sales. Our wheat last year was largely graded as No. 5 and No. 6, which is feed grain, and that grain is in the elevators. Some of it was sold to Poland, but only on credit guaranteed by the Government. A little may have been sold elsewhere, but largely it is either in the elevators at the lakehead or on the prairies.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: You are speaking of 1954?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes, 1954. That grain cannot be sold for the making of bread, and should be taken out of the elevators now and sold to the feeders of Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime provinces. If enough buyers cannot be found in that area, it should be sold on the world market at whatever price it will bring, and let the Government take the loss on the rest. That is the situation, honourable senators, and I emphasize its seriousness as strongly as I can. The longer we hold that grain, the less space we will have in our elevators, and the more time will be spent moving it about to keep it from spoiling.

Let me give you the story of a big farmer in Saskatchewan, and I am sure these facts will be as startling to you as they were to me. This farmer has shipped his full quota of grain to the elevator, and he has on hand, in his granary or out in the field, the following substantial quantities:

From crop of	Bushels
1954	10,000

Although he is, as I have said, a large farmer, that gives us some indication of the problem facing the producers, especially in Saskatchewan. We in Manitoba are more inclined to carry on mixed farming, but even there the problem is serious.

Just the other day a farmer came to my office to see me about the interest on a small loan I had made to him. I asked him if he was able to pay it. He said: "Mr. Haig, I have 1,500 bushels of wheat in the granary, No. 2 Northern, one of the best grades, and the bank manager tells me I can borrow money at 5½ per cent to pay taxes or to buy gasoline, but that I cannot use it to pay interest on the mortgage. What are you going to do?" I said: "I am going to close you out; you will lose your farm, machinery and all." His reply was: "Mr. Haig, I know very well you can do that, but I don't believe you will." I assured him I would not, and in turn I gave him a cheque to pay his taxes and his gasoline. I pointed out to him that I already had some money tied up in his farm, and I might as well put some more in and let him pay the interest to me instead of to the bank.

Honourable senators, that situation is multiplied many times across the country. These are honest men and they want to pay for what they get. If I lost the right to sit in this chamber I could still go back to the practice of law, but the farmer I speak of can do nothing else but farm. The attitude I took towards his problem was that which would be taken by almost anyone in the province of Manitoba. You may say that 1,500 bushels of wheat is not very much, but at $1.20 a bushel it amounts of quite a bit of money for him.

In another case, a woman came to see me, a widow. She has 240 acres of land and she cannot sell her wheat at all. I think she sold three or four bushels but what she got from that was practically nothing. She owes $800 on machinery; she wants to buy a couple of more cows to add to the two or three she now has. After her husband died and left the farm to her, the taxes piled up, and the municipality foreclosed for non-payment of taxes and is going to convey the property to her for the amount of the taxes. I consider that is a fine gesture on the part of the municipality, but now she needs $3,000. I point out that there is no government agency or anybody else who will lend the woman that money. She has seven children, the eldest a boy of 17, the next one 14, and two or three under ten. What is that woman to do? Her grain is in the granary but what good is that to her? She said: "Mr. Haig, we cannot sell it. What should I do with it?" I told her, "You cannot sell it to me, I would not touch the stuff, it would have no value to me." Of course, if I were a farmer I could trade or barter with another.

Hon. Mr. Horner: The Wheat Board would not let anybody buy the wheat at all.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The point is that these farmers are law-abiding, hard-working people, who at first thought that the wheat pool idea would result in a bonanza for them, that they would be able to sell their grain to the world all the time. We tried to tell them differently, but they would not listen to us. We tried to tell them that the day might come when France would have 100 million bushels of wheat to sell, as it has this year; that Italy might have grain to sell; that Britain might some day have a much bigger wheat crop than ever before. And it is worth mentioning here that Sweden, which five years ago had never exported any grain, has 20 million bushels for sale now. Britain may not be subsidizing grain production, in one sense, but in reality it is doing so, because not being able to obtain dollars to buy our grain it pays its own people to produce. I believe that we in this country, even the Government itself, do not understand the problem that faces Britain.

I agree with the proposal of the CCF party that the Government should pay at least 75 per cent of the initial price of the grain to the farmer for the quantity in his granary or on his farm, so as to enable him to carry on. Now, honourable senators, that is not as dangerous as it sounds. No one can sell any grain in Manitoba without bringing in a government certificate showing how much grain he has. Of course, farmers might sell it among themselves, but then that would show up on the certificate. So there would be little possibility of a farmer defrauding anybody if the proposed advance of 75 per cent were made.

Another thing that should be done today is to take the damp grain of the 1954 crop and dispose of it to Ontario, Quebec, the Maritime provinces and British Columbia at the best price obtainable, for feed to cattle, hogs and poultry, in order to make use of it in this country. It is far better that farmers in those provinces should have it than it be left to rot on the prairies or sold to Poland or some other satellite of Russia for an amount that we may or may not be paid. I remember that when we were selling Canadian ships to China I objected strenuously in this house to that transaction. However, the ships were sold, and now we are paying for them and the Chinese have the boats. We certainly lost out on that deal. And here is the same thing again. This grain cannot be sold for milling purposes, so it should be sold for feed.

Just think, honourable senators, of going to the bank and borrowing money at 5½ per cent interest on the value of your own grain, so that you can spend that money to pay for what the grain itself should have paid for. You cannot sell the grain because of the government monopoly; it just cannot be got onto the market.

That, honourable senators, is the situation in a few words.

I say that that question and the question of the financial condition of municipalities and school districts of Canada are problems of paramount importance to the people of our country. Schools are needed not only in the rural districts, but perhaps even more urgently in the cities. We senators have to help to solve these problems. We have no political axe to grind; therefore it does not make any difference to us whether a Conservative, a Liberal, a CCF, a Social Credit or a what-have-you government is in power. We shall be senators as long as we live—which may be a short or long time—and therefore we personally do not have anything to fear from the standpoint of political consequences. All that we need to do is to bring forward what is best for Canada.

Honourable senators will pardon me if I make a personal reference here. I came to Winnipeg as a boy and went to school. I won't tell you how much money I had in my pocket, but it was not very much. Dad and mother were at home and I knew mother would scrape up the last bit of butter and sell it to get a 50-cent or 25-cent piece to send me occasionally until I got through university and became a lawyer. She treated my brothers and sisters similarly; all farmers do that kind of thing for their children. Honourable senators, I tell you that the farming community is the backbone of this country, and the minute we forget that fundamental fact we are lost. It is all right to work the mines at Flin Flon, to dig the iron ore mines in Quebec and Ontario, to work the nickel mines in Ontario, but the day will come, as it did in the United States, when our ore will run out, and then what will we have to sell?

The farmers must be enabled to make a living. They are entitled to their share of the prosperity of this country. I do not care whether you are a labourer or a capitalist, you are entitled to your share. But to my mind the farmer is No. 1, and if we do not consider him to be No. 1 the rest of us will be No. 6 before we are through.

I am glad to have been able to say these few words today; I hope I have said nothing to offend the feelings of any member, for I did not intend to do so, and I hope I have said something to repay the kindness that farmers have always shown to me. I have dealt with farmers all my life. My father was a homesteader and I was brought up on a homestead. I know the work from the ground up, and I know that the bulk of the money the homesteaders made went for goods manufactured in Ontario and Quebec. We made a living out of it, a plain honest well-cooked living, but the eastern manufacturers made a profit on our clothes, our boots, our vehicles, our binders and other implements, and our twine. All those necessities came from Ontario and Quebec. We in the west voted that the manufacturing industries should have protection year after year. Some of you should have been behind the scenes as I was. I recall hearing my dad and mother argue and argue about that problem, and my mother would always ask why we should pay so dearly for binders just in order that industries in the east might be protected and Americans prevented from selling their binders in this country. I used to listen to these arguments and wonder what they were all about.

Well, honourable senators, we stood it, we fought it through and we put Canadian industry on its feet. We made Canada a great industrial country. Now we say to industry, to the management and to the workers, you have to come to the assistance of the farmer and see that he gets a square deal for his produce. World markets have so changed that we cannot get into them at all now, and we may have to do as the United States did. Do you think the Americans are giving their wheat away because they like to do so? Our government criticized them, but what did it do about our butter? Did it give it away? It sounds as if it did. The Government paid 58 cents a pound for it and sold it at 37 cents a pound. That sounds to me like a give-away. I am not complaining; maybe it had to be done.

The problems of the farmer face this house and Parliament generally this year. They cannot be evaded; they will be with us again next year. There are those who place reliance on a crop failure as a corrective, but even a crop failure would not take care of our surplus, for under present conditions Canada cannot compete successfully in the world's markets. I hope every member—especially those who are former Government supporters and have more influence than I—will seriously consider and do what he can to bring home to the government the seriousness of the problem. It is an issue which must be met and solved.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, the debate was adjourned.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, January 19, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, seconded by Hon. Mr. Croll, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, my opening remarks will be words of congratulation to the mover (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) and to the seconder (Hon. Mr. Croll) of the address. This year we had the privilege of hearing two very experienced parliamentarians move and second this motion. The mover, Senator Pouliot, was first elected to the House of Commons in 1924, and he served continuously in that House until July last, when he was summoned to the Senate. That is an exceedingly long unbroken period of service as a member of Parliament. During that time he has interested himself not only in the affairs of his own province but in those matters which concern all the people of this dominion. He has become familiar with the workings of Parliament, both those which take place in the chamber itself, and such as occur in the background—so to speak, behind the scenes. He is well informed as to the work of the various government departments, and in his speech the other day he took occasion to put on the record, for all of us to read—and reread—a description of what these departments are doing. His speech is indeed a very valuable contribution to our debates.

The honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) is also an experienced parliamentarian. He has not been in Parliament quite so long as the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot), but previously he had been the mayor of one of our most industrialized cities—the city opposite Detroit, and the largest city in western Ontario—namely, Windsor. He served as mayor of that great municipality from 1930 to 1934, and in the latter year was first elected to the Ontario Legislature. On July 10 of that year he was sworn in as Minister of Public Welfare, Municipal Affairs and Labour, in which capacity he served for a number of years. It is interesting to note that the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) was a colleague of Senator Croll in the Ontario Government. Senator Croll left the Legislature at the outbreak of war to enlist in the army as a private soldier. He went overseas on active service, and was discharged in 1945 with the rank of colonel. He then successfully contested the federal riding of Spadina, which he represented in the House of Commons until his appointment to the Senate. During his years in that house he served on various committees, the last one being the very important Committee on Banking and Commerce.

As I have said, honourable senators, we have had the opportunity this session of hearing two very experienced parliamentarians. Their speeches were most interesting and enlightening, and will be well worth rereading from time to time.

May I also take this opportunity of extending a welcome to the honourable senators who were introduced into this house when Parliament reassembled this year. There are thirteen very distinguished new members. Amongst their number are the two whom I have already mentioned, and another veteran parliamentarian, a Privy Councillor, who held various portfolios in our Government. Two other new senators were at one time members of Parliament at Ottawa. And besides Senator Croll, two other newcomers held portfolios in provincial governments, one in New Brunswick and the other in Nova Scotia, the latter having served for some time as the distinguished premier of his province. Three or four of the new senators are well-known and distinguished members of the business world. Others have devoted most of their time and talents to the arts and sciences. Last but not least, our numbers have been increased by the addition of a member of the fair sex, who is not only a family woman but also a woman of wide business experience. I am sure honourable senators will agree with me that we are fortunate indeed in these members who have just come to our house, and we extend to them a very hearty welcome.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: New members may wonder why we do not initiate more legislation in the Senate, and why more bills are initiated in the House of Commons than in this house. May I point out that we are limited by the provisions of the British North America Act. In my opinion, money bills or taxation bills, cannot, according to our Constitution, be initiated in this house. Allow me to read section 53 of the British North America Act:

> Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

It will be seen, therefore, that great limitation is placed upon the work which can be initiated in this house. There has been a slight difference of opinion as to whether the words of section 53 should be read as clearly as I read them, but I have various authorities who agree with my opinion. The Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, a distinguished former member of this house, once wrote an article on the subject of the Canadian Senate, in which he stated:

> There is only one class of legislation which, in point of law, must be initiated in the Lower Chamber, and that is such as has to do with taxation of the people, or such as creates a charge on the Treasury. It is not certain, indeed, that the limitation in law is even as restricted as it has been thus expressed. However, whether it be so circumscribed or not, that Senate would be very ill advised which sought to encroach upon the territory which I have just defined. Far better that subjects which fall within the domain of taxation and charges upon the Treasury should have their initiation in the Commons, as is the case in England. Whether or not this is the law in Canada, it ought to be the practice in Canada.

I also have in my hand a book entitled The Senate of Canada, by Sir George Ross. As honourable senators know, the author was of a different political persuasion from the Right Honourable Mr. Meighen. I will read two quotations from this book. At page 45 the author, referring to a debate on the British North America Act, states:

> The Hon. George Brown, in the same debate, said:
> Our Lower Canada friends have agreed to give us representation by population in the Lower House on the condition that they shall have equality in the Upper House, and on no other condition could we have advanced a step, and for my part I am quite willing that they shall have it. In maintaining the existing sectional boundaries, and handing over the control of local matters to local bodies, we recognize to a certain extent diversity of interests, and it was quite natural that a protection for these interests by equality in the Upper House should be demanded by the less numerous provinces.

At page 44, Sir John A. Macdonald, speaking in the same debate, is reported as follows:

> In order to protect local interests and to prevent sectional jealousies, it was found requisite that the three great divisions into which British North America is separated should be represented in the Upper House on the principle of equality.

And later in the same debate:

> Accordingly, in the Upper House, the controlling and regulating,—

Please note these words.

> —but not initiating, branch, we have the sober second thought in legislation, which is provided in order that each of these great sections shall be represented equally by 24 members . . . To the Upper House is to be confided the protection of sectional interests, and therefore is it that the three great divisions are there equally represented for the purpose of defending such interests against the combinations of majorities in the Assembly.

The provisions of the British North America Act, backed up by such eminent statesmen as I have mentioned, I think make it quite clear that money bills and taxation measures should not be initiated in this house. There was a great fight for representation by population, in which the slogan was "No taxation without representation." The representation which was meant at that time, and which I think is still meant, is representation by elected persons. Questions having political implications, controversial questions, and those on which one section of the country takes a stand against another, all are matters which, in my humble opinion, should be introduced not in this house but in the other house.

Honourable senators, and especially the new appointees to this house, will think from what I have said that our work may be restricted. But, on the other hand, we have wide powers of inquiry, of which we have taken advantage, and from time to time we shall continue to do so. I am sure you will find the work in the committees most interesting. As you know, in the House of Commons bills, after having received second reading, are referred to the committee of the whole, where the minister concerned may have the deputy minister and his assistants sit in front of him on the floor of the house to advise him. The members of the house cannot question directly the representatives from the department, but must address their questions to the minister, and if he does not have the information he may then speak to his advisers and tell the house what he has learned.

Our practice—which I am sure you will feel is preferable—is to refer a bill, after second reading, to a committee of the house sitting outside the chamber, to which we can call representatives from the department concerned and we question them directly. I am sure you will find that a satisfactory way of getting the information you desire.

Honourable senators, I should like now to refer to a matter which was mentioned by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) and the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll), the dismissal of a number of men from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for failure to comply with regulations. Naturally, our sympathy goes out to young men who want to marry, and we would encourage them to marry. But, after all, when a young man joins a force such as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, after having been advised on at least three occasions before he joins that he may not marry in less than five years, we cannot criticize the force for penalizing him by dismissal for flagrantly breaking that regulation. One reason why he should remain single is that during the first four or five years of his service he may be moved from place to place.

Hon. Mr. Wood: He may be sent to the northland.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, he may be sent to the far north, the far east or the far west. He does not, as a rule, stay long in one location. I inquired of the department how often young members of the force were moved. The officials drew at random 20 service files, which revealed that within the first five years of service the men concerned were moved a total of 261 times, because of certain exigencies that the force had to meet.

Now, honourable senators, imagine what effect such frequent moves would have on the home life of a young member of the force. As you will observe, from those 20 files it would appear that a man is moved on an average of more than twice a year. He may go first to the far north, a location to which it is impossible to take his young bride. From there he may be transferred to another area entirely, and so he may move from place to place all across Canada. Would those conditions tend to bind together the family or be in the best interests of the household? Is it in the interests of the R.C.M.P. to allow such circumstances to arise? In my opinion they would neither be helpful to the young couple nor to the force.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask a question at this point? Is there not provision in the regulations that if permission of the head of the force is obtained the young man can marry in less than five years?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Under certain conditions. For instance, if a man who has served a few years is posted to a city and is prepared to stay there for several years, permission may be given him to marry. But, honourable senators, most of these young men in the R.C.M.P. do not like serving in cities; they did not join the force for that purpose. They like to get out in the wilds. Their greatest work is not, as some of us think, parading up and down in front of the Parliament buildings—necessary as that may be—and incidentally giving a very splendid impression to the thousands of people who come here.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask one question? What was the original regulation in that respect and when was it changed?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The regulations regarding marriage have always been in effect.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is not the point. At one time the length of service required before a member of the force was allowed to marry was twelve years, but that was cut down.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have some information on that point. At one time it was twelve years, as my honourable friend says. In 1951 it was modfied from seven years' service and 28 years of age to the present regulations.

Replying to the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler), I may say that again in 1953 a further easing of the regulations was introduced allowing members with three years' service to marry, provided they volunteered to serve in certain large centres in Canada where their duties would be of a permanent nature and the need for sudden transfers greatly lessened. In 1955 forty-nine members took advantage of that change.

Honourable senators, I need not labour the subject. I am sure that, on reconsideration, all honourable senators will agree with me that we should not try to influence the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to change regulations which have tended to make it one of the most respected forces in the entire world.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, since the opening of the session last year great changes have taken place on the international front. Frowns and cross looks and insulting words at diplomatic gatherings have given way to smiles and compliments and backslapping, but in spite of this the cold war continues, and we are still living in an age of very uneasy peace. But in my opinion the cold war instead of getting hotter, as it was at the beginning of last year, has if anything cooled off slightly and the prospects of permanent peace are in my humble opinion much greater than they were a year ago.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Nevertheless, in spite of these changed conditions on the international scene, we must guard against complacency. The reason why the prospects for peace are brighter than they were a year ago is that we have been able at least to maintain our strength and in many instances to increase our armed might. I predict that in the next decade in order to have peace we must continue to remain stronger than those who seek a different way of life than we are accustomed to or in which we believe. Should our armed might become weaker than that of the totalitarian countries we would no longer have peace: the cold war would immediately flame into a hot war, with devastating results to all concerned.

We must continue to maintain and develop our defence efforts. Our progress must keep pace with the techniques of modern warfare. We must not lose our place in the competition for supremacy and, to say the least, events are moving at a nightmarish pace. To relax, to rest on our oars, to be complacent, would spell disaster.

Now, you ask me, is this mad race in the construction of destructive armaments to go on for ever? I sincerely trust and believe that it will not go on for ever, but we must be in it as long as it is going on. In other words, we can only cease in our efforts when there is some sign of a general agreement on a reduction in armaments. At this moment representatives of the great nations are meeting together in committee to consider the matter of disarmament. That is a step in the right direction. It is one of the first steps in the direction of peace. It is a hopeful sign.

However, in the meantime our budget for military purposes cannot be cut. We must be prepared to continue to pay in heavy taxation if we are to have peace. But I am confident that every one of us is prepared to pay whatever the price may be and that none of us will complain about higher taxes if we have the assurance of real peace throughout the world.

Since the commencement of the last session of Parliament there has also been a change in the pace of industrial development in Canada. When we assembled here a year ago critics of the Government were never more eloquent than when predicting a depression. In fact, many of them were already declaring that we were in the midst of one. There was some unemployment, but my recollection is that critics of the Government sent out storm signals of hurricane proportions. The Government maintained that the condition was only temporary, and fortunately for all of us the Government was right. I do not want to burden you with a lot of figures, but I think it is especially noteworthy that the present employment picture in Canada has greatly improved over that of the last year. On December 10, 1955 there were 5,261,000 people working in Canada, an increase of 180,000, or more than 5 per cent, over the previous year.

What of wages and salaries? In October of last year the total wages, salaries and supplementary labour income received by Canadian workers reached an all-time record level of one billion one hundred and thirty-nine million dollars, an increase of 9 per cent over the figure for October of the previous year. The total labour income for the first ten months of 1955 reached ten billion, six hundred and three million dollars, which was an increase of 7 per cent over the same period of the previous year. The year 1955 was indeed a record-breaking year in employment and in wages.

On the trading scene, Canada's sales abroad during the first eleven months of 1955 reached $4 billion. That is, in eleven months we sold abroad $4 billion worth of goods, an increase of 12 per cent over the corresponding term in 1954. And if we consider world trading conditions, particularly competition in our traditional wheat markets, with giveaway programs on the one hand and new grain exporting countries such as Turkey and France on the other, I think you will agree with me that our export trade has been remarkable. These percentages are largely consonant with the increase in our national output, which in every line has been impressive; and I believe we can take great comfort in general economic conditions and in the prospect of a bright future. I think I can do no better at this point than to refer to the words of my colleague, the Right Honourable C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, whose magnificent record has been distinguished by excellent prophecies and justified optimism. In his recent year-end statement he said:

> The evidence at hand gives no indication of any general slackening and seems to point to the continuation for some time to come of all-out operations throughout at least a major portion of Canadian industry. Whether or not speculative excesses and other dislocating influences will enter the situation to cause an eventual reaction would seem to depend very largely on the future attitudes and decisions of individual consumers and businessmen. Nevertheless, in its progress to date, the current economic upswing seems solidly based.

For this reason I feel we can look forward with confidence to another record-breaking year in 1956.

My honourable friend the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) referred at some length to credit buying. He was very disturbed about it. While I also am somewhat disturbed, I have, as I am sure he has, great confidence in the Canadian people. He is inclined to think that the practice of excessive buying on credit has extended to all our fellow-citizens. My impression is otherwise; that is, that it affects only a limited class. Although there has been a great deal of credit buying, the volume has decreased in recent months. I would also point out that the majority of these credit purchases are in respect of automobiles. I do not know that one can find too much fault with that because an automobile is an expensive article; not many of us can afford to make a down-payment of the full price. So credit buying may very well be a good thing for the purchaser, as it undoubtedly is for the manufacturer, as well as for the Government, which derives good revenues from a fairly high tax on all automobile sales.

Although we may be concerned at the volume of credit buying in some directions, it should not be assumed that credit can be had as easily as some seem to suppose. The honourable Leader of the Opposition remarked that one could get credit with no deposit at all. The other day I put this notion to the test. Walking along the street, I saw a sign advertising certain household commodities as being available without a down-payment. So I went in the store, told the salesman what I wanted to buy, and inquired, "What about the deposit?" He said, "Well, how much can you pay down?" I replied, "I am not in a position to make any down-payment." He said, "Nothing down?" I remarked, "There is a sign in your window, 'No deposit' ". "That," replied the salesman, "is very limited. What have you got to turn in on a purchase?" I answered that I had nothing to turn in, that I had seen this piece of equipment and the "No deposit" sign, and that I had come in to inquire about it. He then asked, "Where do you work?" Though harbouring some doubt whether I worked at all, I did not admit it, but assured him that I had steady employment. "Well," he said, "can you give us an assignment of your pay?" I remarked that I did not think my employer would recognize such an assignment. He then said, "Well, we would have to inquire of your employer and be assured that you have steady employment." I told him I could not agree to anything like that, but I repeated: "I would like to buy this article. It just suits me. But I want to buy it without a deposit." "Well, sir," he said, "I am very sorry, but we could not let you have it without some down payment." I believe my experience accords with the custom in most stores which advertise goods for sale with "No deposit".

Hon. Mr. Haig: If my honourable friend wore a hat as old as mine, probably he would not have got even as far as he did.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I will trade hats with my honourable friend "sight unseen".

It is true that in Britain restrictions have been placed on credit buying. But Britain has been under severe inflationary pressures, and, moreover, as it has a unitary government, the constitutional problem is not a serious one. In Canada things are quite different. I am not so sure that the question of instalment buying is not one which affects property and civil rights. Although credit buying was restricted during the war, we were then working under emergency legislation. To put a similar enactment into effect in time of peace would not be easy, and in any event would not be palatable. I doubt very much whether any such legislation by the federal Government would not be challenged in the courts. However, the subject is an important one, and I can assure the house that the Government is fully conscious of the present situation.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Can the Government not control the banks, which are giving credit?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Well, the Government does not want to control the banks. We like to believe that we are operating under a free enterprise system. From what I have read, the Bank of Canada, without any inspiration from the Government, is conscious of the condition, and the increase of bank interest which it has imposed is, I am sure, designed to safeguard our economy from the danger of over-extended credit. On the other hand, as I have already said, the Government has confidence in the judgment of the Canadian people generally, and is convinced that their common sense will continue to direct them in the ways which are best for themselves.

May I now refer, honourable senators, to a commodity of which we have heard a great deal in recent months. I shall briefly discuss the matter of the surplus of wheat. It appears from some speeches we have heard outside this chamber that certain people are endeavouring to reap political advantage from this situation. It is very difficult for me to understand why anyone would try to gain political advantage from a condition which brings about plenty in our land, and I am glad that the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) did not take that attitude when he spoke in this house the other day. If my memory serves me correctly I think the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) told the house last year that the prospects for a bumper crop in the west were uncertain on account of the weather conditions at that time. Therefore, he will bear me out when I say that a slight change in the weather conditions in western Canada last year might have resulted in a crop failure. The Book of Genesis recalls to our minds the account of Joseph's interpretation of Pharaoh's dream which foretold 7 years of famine and 7 years of great plenty. Well, I hope that such a condition will never prevail in Canada, but I would remind Canadians that it can happen here, and, if it did happen, this great surplus of wheat which we now have would be a blessing in disguise.

Just what is the situation in Canada with respect to wheat? Many of you are familiar with this, but for some of us who come from the east it is very refreshing to note that the acreage in wheat has been reduced since 1940. At that time there were 27¾ million acres sown in wheat in Canada. Last year the acreage sown in wheat was 20 million, a reduction from 1940 of 7¾ million, or approximately 25 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Were there corresponding increases in oats, peas and other market garden vegetables? Was there an overall increase in agricultural production?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am not referring to overall agricultural production. I am referring only to the acreage that was sown in wheat in western Canada, and I was pointing out that there was a reduction of approximately 25 per cent in that acreage from 1940 to last year.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Was there a corresponding increase in other agricultural products?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I should think there would be an increase in the production of coarse grains. I notice the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) nodding his head in assent. But at the moment I am dealing with wheat, and I want to discuss its exportation. In eastern Canada we have been given to understand that our exports in wheat have not been up to standard recently. However, let me go back to the years when we felt we were doing an excellent business in wheat, years in which everyone was satisfied with our exports. I refer to the period from 1947 to 1951. I find that during those very good years we had an average exportation of 223 million bushels a year. Here are the figures:

	Bushels
1947 to 1948	195 million
1948 to 1949	232 "
1950 to 1951	241 "

Now let us look at the last four years, from 1951 to 1955. I find that our average exportation of wheat during that period amounted to 312 million bushels a year, which is exactly an average of 89 million bushels a year better than any previous four-year period in our history. So it can be seen we have been doing fairly well in exporting wheat during recent years. For the record, here are the figures:

	Bushels
1951 to 1952	355 million
1952 to 1953	385 "

What about the marketing of wheat? That is what we are most interested in, for when we market wheat we get money for it. Admittedly our marketing of wheat is not as bright as is that of other agricultural products, and unfortunately it is the farmers in the three Prairie provinces who are being affected. I am endeavouring to give the facts tonight, and I hope I am not being misleading. I do not say that the sales of wheat abroad are as good as we would like them to be; on the other hand, I feel they are much better than would appear from the impression which is being given throughout the country. Last year, although the sale of wheat was not as good as we would have liked, the farm income in the Prairie provinces was not down as low as we might have expected. I have the figures on this: the farm cash income was down less than 6 per cent in Manitoba, and less than 5 per cent in Saskatchewan and Alberta. The high rate of income has been maintained, nothwithstanding the increased international competition caused by the great production of wheat throughout the world.

There are many reasons why it is difficult to sell wheat. One reason, of course, is the wheat surplus, and there are many reasons why there is a surplus. One that seems to me to be interesting is this. At one time horses, cattle and oxen were used for doing certain work on the farms in France, and grain was produced to feed these animals. Nowadays mechanized equipment has taken the place of these animals in France, as in other countries, and instead of using the land to produce grain to feed the animals the farmers are putting the land into wheat.

There has been some criticism of the manner in which the selling of wheat has been dealt with in Canada, and suggestions have been offered by various people as to how the selling should be done. I wonder how many of those suggestions are valid. Today the sale of our wheat is in the hands of the five members of the Canadian Wheat Board; they are very able members, indeed, and very good salesmen.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am satisfied that we cannot have a better salesman at the top of that board than our own Right Honourable C. D. Howe.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Although prospects for the sale of wheat are not as bright as we might wish them to be, I am happy to say that things are beginning to look a little brighter in Canada for farmers generally. During the past few years the eastern farmer has seen difficult days, and it has not been easy for him to make a living. The improvement is welcomed, for I do not know how much longer the farmer could withstand very difficult times. I have before me a table entitled "Farm cash income: Receipts from Sale of farm products, 1926-1955." The figures are given in millions of dollars, and are listed by provinces. This table could be included as an appendix to Hansard, or shall I just refer to the last five years?

An Hon. Senator: Put it in Hansard.

See Appendix to today's Hansard, p. 61.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I would ask honourable senators to note the distinct change upward last year for each of the provinces, in so far as farm income is concerned, with the exception of the three Prairie provinces. It is, indeed, a very hopeful sign, and I trust that we are moving toward better days for the ordinary farmer who carries on mixed farming, for he has had a hard time; I am sure we shall all rejoice if better days are in store for him.

There is one further matter I should like to mention briefly. A number of years ago the dominion Government entered into tax-rental agreements with the provinces. Some provinces benefited greatly. Some provinces accepted because they could not get any better deal. One province did not accept the agreement at all. Although I do not think it can be said that the tax rental agreements were entirely satisfactory, yet they were much better than no agreements at all, and certainly the best that any government could conceive of at that time. Personally, I do not think any better proposals were put forward. From experience, however, it has been found that the agreements do not work too well, and therefore the Government has proposed equalization payments. The good things of this country are spread throughout the land, but the wealth seems to be concentrated in one or two provinces, with the result that other provinces do not get the benefit of the great wealth of this country which they should receive. The purpose of the tax-rental agreements was to endeavour to spread the wealth of the country more equally amongst the people of Canada, no matter where they are situated, no matter where they happen to have been born. That is also the purpose behind the proposal for equalization payments, and it is a very laudable effort. I tabled the letter of our Prime Minister to the premiers of the various provinces, setting forth the proposals of the Government. I know all members of this house hope that a satisfactory arrangement will be entered into. All good Canadians want the wealth of Canada to be divided as equally as possible throughout all parts of our country. In that way we can surely have a united Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, seconded by Hon. Mr. Croll, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. John A. McDonald: Honourable senators, may I first extend my apologies to the more senior members of this chamber for speaking so early in the debate; but I do so because I wish very much to return tomorrow to Nova Scotia. I would also like to explain now that, in what I shall have to say about the fruit industry, I hope it will be understood here and elsewhere that I speak not as one who knows it all, but as one who wishes to help. I certainly do not feel that I know it all. But during the later years when I was with the provincial Department of Agriculture at Halifax a set of circumstances and conditions arose in the fruit industry similar to those which are present today; and it occurred to me that it might be helpful if I reviewed some of these conditions and mentioned some of the remedies which were suggested at that time, and which, I believe, would if adopted bring about some improvement today.

May I sincerely compliment the mover (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Croll) of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne for their excellent performance. Their speeches showed careful preparation and were well delivered. We expected much from these two honourable gentlemen, who were leaders in the House of Commons, and we were not disappointed. After listening last night to the interesting and educative address of our Government Leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), and the fine tributes he paid to the mover and seconder, I would like to endorse what he said about them. I heard a critic of the Government speak in the other house recently and he said that the Government had lost its two only independents. Well, as all honourable senators are aware, the Senate is the house for independent thought and we welcome it here. I must say, however, experience shows that some of the independent thought has a leaning toward the Government side, and some has almost as pronounced a leaning in the opposite direction.

I would like to compliment His Honour the Speaker (Hon. Mr. Robertson) for all the time, energy and money that he has put into his efforts to emphasize the objectives and aims of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and especially for trying to have article II implemented, so as to improve economic conditions in the fifteen member nations. I believe if that were done it would help to arrest communism.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the address of the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig). I am sure we were all glad to see him in such good form, and I know that he spoke with the utmost sincerity and the greatest desire to aid the grain growers of western Canada. I wish him to know that anything I may say is not intended to detract from his remarks, and I know I could not do so anyway. As he spoke I could not help comparing the lot of the fruit growers of Nova Scotia with that of the grain growers in the western provinces. I speak more particularly of Nova Scotia because I know the conditions existing there, although I believe similar conditions prevail to some extent in both Quebec and Ontario.

Honourable senators, I join with the speakers who preceded me, in extending a most sincere welcome to the newly-appointed members, two of whom are from my province of Nova Scotia. Senator the Honourable Dr. Connolly, a friend of mine, and a former colleague in the provincial Government, was at the time of his appointment to the Senate the only member of that Government who had been a member of it in 1945, when I was summoned to the Senate. So that in a little over ten years, and without a change in government so far as party is concerned, there has been a complete change in personnel. When that great Nova Scotian and Canadian, Premier Angus L. Macdonald, passed on, the honourable senator succeeded him and held the office of Premier for some time. Senator the Honourable Dr. Smith was a very highly respected member of the House of Commons during the 21st Parliament. Unfortunately, Nova Scotia had not kept pace in population with the rest of Canada in the preceding ten years, and the newest constituency in the province, namely, Queens-Shelburne, which happened to be Dr. Smith's constituency, had to go. These two honourable gentlemen possess the fine qualities of heart and mind required for the rendering of outstanding public service here, and I am sure the other newly-appointed members also possess the same fine qualities or they would not have been asked to take their places in the Senate. We wish them all long years in which to serve the public as members of this chamber.

As a humble citizen, interested in the welfare of our people, I wish to commend every person engaged in the public service who in any way helped to make 1955 such an outstandingly prosperous year. I am sure that even members of the Opposition will not think I am presumptuous in saying that I feel we have a lot to thank our Government for, both collectively and individually. In another room of the Senate meetings are being held at the present time in the hope of formulating a public health policy. This is another demonstration of the Government's desire to help the people of our country.

Honourable senators, the year 1955 was a year of outstanding accomplishments in my province. Among those accomplishments was the completion of the Canso Causeway and the inauguration of ferry service between Yarmouth and Bar Harbour, Maine, by the S.S. Bluenose, both of which projects were joint federal-provincial undertakings. I recently heard criticism of the rates being charged by the Bluenose, but those rates, I understand, are under review, in the hope that they will be lowered.

Satisfactory progress has been made in the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway. Several fine public buildings were erected in Nova Scotia last year. Numerous wharves and breakwaters were built or repaired. We should not forget one further important transportation link, that of the construction, by the provincial and municipal governments, of the Angus L. Macdonald Bridge connecting Halifax and Dartmouth.

The outstanding efficiency of our civil servants in the departments of agriculture, fishing, lumbering and mining, is something which I think we take too much for granted. If these departments in other provinces can claim to have anything like the efficiency of our Nova Scotia departments, then Canada can truly be said to have an outstanding civil service.

May I call the attention of the appropriate ministers and officials to two or three other transportation matters which I think are important to western Nova Scotia? Many people are hopeful that the direct service between Yarmouth and Boston will continue, that the link between these two points will not be broken.

A good deal of interest is being taken in the proposed re-establishment of the Minas Basin ferry which for many years was operated by the Dominion Atlantic Railway Services. At that time the ferry could operate only when the tides served; it is now proposed to operate from and to points where there are deep water terminals. It would be of great advantage to those who are shipping produce north and west, and as well to travellers. If the Department of Public Works and the Department of Transport could, through their appropriate officials, give us an estimate of the cost of this service, it would be much appreciated.

I was pleased to hear the Premier of Nova Scotia speak of a causeway—or perhaps a dam with an aboiteau—at the mouth of the Annapolis River, which would remove the necessity of keeping up miles of dikes and add materially to the acreage of first-class soil for the growing of fodder for livestock. This would also serve as a bridge. The same advantages, as I have suggested for many years, would be given to other first-class soil if a dam with an aboiteau was constructed across the Cornwallis River at Port Williams; that too would save miles of dikes and form a proper bridge. The present bridge is too narrow to carry the increased traffic safely.

In times of prosperity there is a danger of over-extending credit. I was pleased to hear the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) say in his speech last evening that credit is being curtailed. Yet, I am fearful that in my province there is considerable buying on the part of people who are unable to make a sufficient down-payment on the purchases and may become discouraged before the balance is fully paid. I think it would be helpful if buyers were required to make a higher down-payment on the articles they purchase. Possibly too much buying on credit is one cause of trouble in the Canadian west. It may be that implement manufacturers have been overly anxious to sell their machines and have pressed new ones on farmers when they did not have sufficient capital or credit and should not have bought such expensive equipment. However, honourable senators, I am only suggesting this may be one cause of trouble. There is this to be said, though, that our people certainly have been using credit much beyond what they can afford.

There is another matter which I would like to mention, and that is the tremendous business being done by finance corporations in making loans to people at very high interest rates. It does not seem to me that it is at all fair to allow these firms to charge such high interest. If borrowers find it difficult to pay low interest rates, how can they manage to pay very high rates? In my opinion the interest rates these finance firms are allowed to charge should be lowered.

Although we rejoice that Canadians generally have had a record year in making progress, as is reported in the Speech from the Throne, some are not in as good economic condition as others. Should we not pay special attention to those industries which are lagging and so help to build an even greater nation?

While the majority of the people in Canada are having a very good time commercially, many of the farmers of our country are not doing so well because of the downward trend in the prices paid to them for their products, coupled with rising costs of production. I hope that the Gordon Commission on Canada's economic prospects is making a sufficiently exhaustive study of the problems concerning the several branches of our great agricultural industry, and that the commission will shortly be in a position to make helpful suggestions.

One of the hardest hit branches of the agricultural industry is that of fruit growing. If we were to compare the surplus of fruit with the surplus of grain, for instance, we would find that the conditions are not very much alike. For instance, apples are a very perishable product, and even with the best of storage facilities they cannot be kept more than a few months. Wheat, on the other hand, is almost indestructible. As a matter of fact, I have heard some honourable members say, and not very long ago, that they consider good quality wheat in storage about as good as cash in the bank.

Perhaps I should not refer to debates in another place, but I think something that happened yesterday is interesting. One honourable member, an independent, is reported to have said that he did not support the amendment to the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne because he thought the Government had done everything it could.

It seems to me that we ought to slow down on requests to the Government for subsidies.

Hon. Senators: Hear hear.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: If we do not, then the situation will get out of hand and will lead to only one end, increased taxation.

With the permission of honourable senators I will try to explain something of the present position of the fruit growers and suggest several things that should be done to place this important branch of our industry in a more healthy economic position, so that the growers will never have to be embarassed by asking for subsidies—unless, of course, we have another hurricane such as visited the fruit growing districts of Nova Scotia in the fall of 1954.

Fruit growing is an important industry in at least four provinces, namely, British Columbia, Quebec, Ontario and Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick is making a good start. It is an industry in which I have had some experience, as some of you know, in both production and marketing. The cause of the trouble this season was over-production for the limited markets we have left, and lack of proper marketing organization to take advantage of the limited markets for this perishable product. When our growers in Nova Scotia set out their orchards they had good reason to believe that the market in Britain would continue to be available to them. For many years they continued to market there, generally profitably, about 85 per cent of their crop, which was about 6 million bushels a year at the time the market was lost to them as a result of the war, and later, also as a result of the war, because there was not the currency available to buy our fruit. Our fruit growers were in difficulty at that time, and today their situation has not improved very much.

The British market used to accept cooking varieties of apples, which were retailed by the pound from barrel packages. At the present time they do not want the cooking varieties, because they are growing them themselves. Apple growers in Canada could not have prevented this industry from becoming a casualty. There is, however, one fault that we find with our growers, and that is that more of them did not make a change over to dessert varieties or to other branches of farming when they knew that the growers in Britain were setting out large acreages of fruit trees. Many did make the necessary changes and are either growing good dessert varieties or have changed their style of farming, or both. The Valley today is one of the heaviest producers in Canada of livestock and livestock products, but there are still about 2,000 orchard farmers in Nova Scotia, many doing a thorough job in producing as good dessert apples as can be found anywhere. Where can you find fruit of as good texture and flavour? This is a valuable industry, and I have confidence that the growers will in the near future take the necessary steps to strengthen the industry. At present they are not even organized to take full advantage of the Co-operative Marketing Act.

Our growers are very grateful to this Government for their assistance in endeavouring to save the industry, which is truly a war casualty. I left Nova Scotia to attend the opening of Parliament before I could learn the reaction of the growers to the offer of assistance which was made recently by the Government, but I do know that many will be grateful again, as it will help them pay for the costs of growing last year's crop, and also help some, at least, to finance the production of a quality crop in 1956. I wish everyone concerned would remember that it has been very distasteful for the growers and members of the so-called "Ottawa Committee" to come here for help.

There was an estimated 2-million-bushel surplus of apples produced in Nova Scotia last season. Some growers sold to the processors on the understanding that they would be paid the amount which the processors could afford. Others were promised 18 cents a bushel. I am now speaking of the growers who perhaps do not spend quite so much time and money on the growing of their crops as others do, and who, as soon as their apples were picked, not knowing what to do with them, took them to the processors who promised to pay what they could afford. Some other growers, when it came time to market top quality Gravensteins, sold them to the larger retail stores and received approximately $1 a bushel for them. Of course the best fruit is now selling for $2 and upwards. It is estimated that about a million bushels were left on the trees.

Under the present system of marketing apples in Nova Scotia, the United Fruit Companies handle about 60 per cent of the crop; the balance is sold to so-called dealers, or the growers try to do their own marketing. The result is that truckloads arrive in our markets with fruit for sale which the owners do not want to carry back home. If they cannot obtain the price they want, they take what they can get. Under these circumstances, as honourable senators well know, it is not long before prices fall below the cost of production.

I will give as good an idea as I can of what it costs to produce a box of apples. Although costs of production and marketing vary from farm to farm, according to an estimate made by the secretary of the United Fruit Companies which recently came to my notice, apples cost 75 cents a box to produce up to time of picking. This figure covers pruning, fertilizing, spraying and thinning, but not packing and handling. The secretary of the United Fruit Companies also gave minimum expenses of preparing a box of graded apples for market, as follows:

Picking labour	.10
Trucking to storage	.03
Grading and packing	.30
Packaging	.53
Trucking to Halifax	.12
	$1.08

Adding the 75 cents I have mentioned, the total cost amounted to $1.83. Top quality Gravensteins were then selling for $1.12 in Halifax. Deduct this amount from $1.83, and there is a loss of 71 cents. As I have already intimated, this figure does not represent the fruit situation today, because the best quality apples are bringing $2 up a box.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask what is the difference between a box and a bushel?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: The box of which I have been speaking really holds a bushel.

There is not time here to go into too much detail, but if I may have your forbearance I would like to mention briefly some things which I think should be done to place this industry in a stronger position. Honourable senators will notice that most of the suggestions I have to make require that the fruit growers shall help themselves. There is one proposal, however—that of encouraging apple growers across Canada to get rid of their old trees and trees of unprofitable varieties—wherein the federal and provincial governments can give assistance. That is the only suggestion I am making which would call for any public expenditure in order to set this industry on a firm footing, so that in future the growers will not need to come here for aid, unless, of course, another hurricane or something of that nature should occur.

I wish that the appropriate officials of the federal and provincial governments could get together and tell the growers of Nova Scotia, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia, "If you have old trees, that is trees over 40 years old, or varieties of apples which are not of the best, you will receive a grant of so much per tree to encourage you to get these trees out of the way." I am sure that by this means a great service would be rendered, for I am rather doubtful whether inferior trees will be got rid of unless some encouragement is given to the growers. It is my recommendation that at least another 300,000 trees should be removed from Nova Scotian orchards this coming spring, and the land cleared promptly and made available for growing fodder for livestock of the production of small fruits and vegetables. I say, 300,000 trees. There still remain in the Cornwallis-Annapolis Valley over 700,000 trees. Formerly there were about 2 million, but while I was with the department we got rid, without any financial assistance, of 300,000. Later, with the support of the federal Government, about another million were destroyed, but we still have too many old trees and unprofitable varieties, which it is necessary to remove. Think how helpful this would be, not only to reducing the chances of another surplus, but to eliminate the infected orchards. There are people who keep these trees around them, will not look after them, and allow them to become infested with all kinds of pests, which make them a menace to those who are trying to keep their orchards clean.

Hon. Mr. Horner: May I ask the honourable senator what would be planted on ground from which these trees had been removed? Would he suggest more apple trees, or some other crops?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: In most cases, I think, the land would be better utilized to produce fodder for livestock, or small fruits and vegetables. But a farmer who is a real orchardist, ready and able to look after his orchard, to plant young trees, nourish, cultivate and prune them properly for the next 8 years before they come into profitable bearing, might set out Gravensteins, McIntoshes, Rome Beauties, or some such varieties.

The second suggestion is most important; the change has to be made by the growers themselves, and it should take place during the next few months. Our producers realize this, because they have already appointed a strong committee to study marketing systems in other places. They have had experience in centralized marketing, and this experience should be a help in the avoidance of some of the possible pitfalls. They know now that as close to 100 per cent of the growers as possible must indicate by their votes that they desire to and will co-operate in the marketing of their fruit through one office. Our growers also know that if they decide on this way of marketing they will need the most honest, independent and progressive management that it is possible to secure. Having said this, perhaps I should add that although among their members there are many men from whom a manager could be selected, it would be better for all concerned if the manager were chosen from outside the territory altogether. Personally, I would go after the best businessman that I could secure. As I have said, he must be absolutely honest and independent, and he should be progressive.

The growers should co-operate with that management, and for that purpose should meet at regular intervals to review what has been done and make such changes as are found advisable. The most important questions should be decided by vote of all the growers concerned, for only in this way will everyone have the opportunity to express his views. From personal experience, and having given much thought to the matter, I feel very strongly that the present system of cut-throat competition in the marketing of such a perishable crop as apples should be succeeded by centralized marketing. Some will say and, perhaps some honourable senators will agree, that centralized marketing is not the most democratic system; that is true, but for such a perishable product it is the only sensible and reasonable method that I can think of.

My third suggestion is that increased emphasis should be placed on the work of the Canadian Horticultural Council, which is composed of leaders in production and marketing in the fruit and vegetable industry across Canada. The Canadian Horticultural Council is in a better position than anybody else to solve such common problems in the industry as transportation, the weeding out of poor varieties, and the developing of new later apples with good appearance, texture and flavour. The members of this council have done a good job, but I would like to see them work a little harder and longer in an attempt to come up with some of the answers to these common problems. Another problem concerns the packing of fruit. For instance, a large consignment of apples shipped to England this year was found to be improperly packed, and as a result an official had to go over there to try to settle the matter. It is bad enough that the shipper himself was put in a position where he can no longer sell his apples at their full value, but it has also meant the blacklisting of the district from which those apples came.

The fourth suggestion is that through advertising and demonstration the sales for Canadian apples could be greatly increased. I do not think the industry has gone far enough in trying to increase consumption of apples in this country. They should carry on an advertising campaign similar to the fine one maintained by the citrus growers. The British Columbia fruit growers have also carried on an effective advertising program; just the other day I saw one of their attractive advertisements in Maclean's Magazine. In this connection I would like to thank the Halifax Chronicle-Herald for the front page advertising which it published in an attempt to assist the Nova Scotia apple growers at a critical time last fall.

I trust that as honourable senators have an opportunity they will let our fruit growers across Canada know that they have our moral support.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, seconded by Hon. Mr. Croll, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, it had not been my intention to participate in this debate but rather to observe the time-honoured custom of my Scottish forebears that the younger members of the family should be seen and not heard. However, I feel that I would be remiss in my duty if I did not take the opportunity of emphasizing the urgent importance to Canada of the earliest possible implementation of some of the recommendations of the Massey Report with respect to the establishment of the Canada Council and a national program of scholarships or, at least, some steps in that direction.

Before doing so, however, I would like to express my appreciation to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister for the very great honour he did me in recommending me for appointment to the Senate. I was particularly pleased that at the time the thirteen appointments were made the Prime Minister said that the new senators were selected as Canadians rather than as members of political parties. That is an attitude which is in keeping with the high sense of public duty which we have come to look for from our Prime Minister and one which starts new senators out under the most favourable auspices.

At this time, too, I would like to express my very deep appreciation to the honourable members of this house for the very warm welcome and many courtesies they have extended. Their kindness has made the joining of the Senate a warm and pleasant experience. I want to say also that it is a great privilege to renew my association with three men with whom I had the privilege of being associated on the National Film Board some years ago. I refer to my good friend the honourable senator from Edmonton, Senator MacKinnon; to that genial, rugged and friendly individualist, the honourable senator from Churchill, Senator Crerar, and to our distinguished Clerk of the Senate, Mr. MacNeill.

If it is not presumptuous on the part of a neophyte in this House, may I add my compliments to those that have gone before to the mover of the Address, the seconder, and the speakers who preceded me. It is always interesting for a "new boy" to see how things are done; and I can assure you that I have sat back and listened with very great interest.

In the course of this introduction, too, I want to pay tribute to two members of the cabinet who, with their colleagues, are doing a distinguished job for Canada in the larger realm of international affairs. I refer particularly to the Honourable Mr. Pearson, who by his inimitable qualities of personality, mind and heart has gained for Canada and for Canadians the respect and admiration of the world. In the work of the United Nations and in the field of national health the member for Essex East, the Honourable Mr. Martin, has been doing an outstanding job and has been persevering in his attempts to bring in a progressive program of health and welfare in Canada. In the latter connection I would like to associate myself with the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) and say that I hope that a national program of health insurance can be brought in at the earliest opportunity. I do so, however, with this reservation, that the direct beneficiaries should be expected to make a direct contribution as well. In these days of tremendous and increasing costs for adequate medical and hospital care, it is becoming imperative that a comprehensive program of health insurance be added to those other milestones in the evolution of social progress —old age pensions, family allowances and unemployment insurance.

It is no accident that the Canadian people are getting distinguished service from most of their governmental departments. For the past 20 years the government service has been recruiting some of the ablest brains from the universities right across Canada; and it is because I want our Government, along with every agency of the community, to continue to get adequate numbers of the best brains available in our country that I am prompted to take part in this debate.

We are living in one of the most exciting and challenging periods of history, in a time of breath-taking and rapidly accelerating change—a rate of change which, I think, is likely to continue. New forms of energy, new forms of communication, the increasing application of automation to industry, and longer hours of leisure as a result of progressively shortening work-weeks—all these factors are contributing to a different form of society. I suspect that the society of 35 to 50 years hence will be as different from our present society as our age is from the horse-and-buggy days of 50 years ago. Added to this is the fact that today, as a result of the advance of medical science and better health programs, people are living 20 years longer than they did 40 years ago. In spite of this, we still go on retiring people at 55, 60 and 65 years, with no thought as to how this valuable pool of skills and experience can be continued in useful and productive enterprise. In this area alone lies one of the most important fields of social thinking, yet practically nothing is being done to train people who are the victims of a set of rules that are no longer valid.

All of the developments I have mentioned have one important characteristic in common: they depend for their success upon greatly increased numbers of highly trained and highly skilled people. The source of supply is, of course, our universities and technical schools, yet it is common knowledge today that all our institutions of higher learning are suffering from a serious condition of financial undernourishment and malnutrition.

Our universities, like other institutions of our national life, are caught up in the whirl of social and technological change; they are, in fact, the very mainspring of it. No longer is the university only a cloistered retreat for scholars and a custodian of the heritage of knowledge. It is, fortunately, still that—the one place where the classical tradition still survives. But the modern university has become the nation's first line of defence, and we neglect it at our peril.

We Canadians like to brag and point with pride to this land of ours as one of the greatest areas of opportunity on earth. So it is; but if we are to develop our country to its fullest potential in the years to come we must be prepared to greatly change our thinking with respect to the share of our resources which must be invested in the physical facilities, staff and students necessary to maintain and preserve an expanding economy and our way of life.

It is unfortunate that the world today is divided into areas of conflict. We find ourselves engaged in what has been called "The war for men's minds". I suspect, contrary to the thinking of some people, that the war for men's minds, like the war for men's souls, will be, as in the period of the Reformation, a long-drawn-out and costly conflict; and the greatest disservice that we can do our people is to underrate the strength and the appeal of those who believe in a philosophy and a way of life different from ours. A new dynamic is abroad today among the peoples of Asia, Africa and Russia; and to disregard it would be folly.

In the years since the Russian Revolution of 1917 there have been many public figures and publicists who industriously promoted the fable that Russian technology and Russian culture were inferior things which in no way could challenge the superiority of the west. But some people, who are among the best informed on the matter, say that the progress made by the Russians in the 38 years since the Revolution of 1917 is practically equivalent to that achieved in our own industrial revolution in the period between 1840 and 1940. Fortunately for us, there are authoritative sources in the western world whose realistic appraisal of the comparable numbers of scientists, artists and technicians training in Russia and in the west cannot be ignored.

No less an authority than Sir Winston Churchill has suggested that the tremendous strides Russia has made in technological training could be a threat to western superiority, if not survival. Recently Mr. Allen Dulles, of the United States Security Administration, has been quoted as saying that in the current year Russia will turn out 60,000 graduates in Applied Science as against 22,000 in the United States and 3,000 in Great Britain. I think he has perhaps underrated the figures for Britain. Sir John Cockroft, who played an eminent role in our own scientific development during the war, is authority for the statement that Russia is now leading the world in some fields which we in the western world thought were peculiarly our own. Dr. O. M. Solandt, retired chairman of our Defence Research Board, recently stated that Soviet output of technical manpower surpassed that of the United States and "may soon exceed that of the whole free world combined". Lewis L. Strauss, Chairman of the United States Atomic Energy Commission, says much the same thing. Dorothy Thompson, in a series of articles on Russian education, has stated that her outstanding impression of Russia was the emphasis on education, disciplined and thorough. Mr. I. Norman Smith of the Ottawa Journal, the Honourable James Sinclair, the Honourable Mr. Pearson and others have said the same thing and we are indebted to these men for letting this much light through our western curtain of complacency and indifference.

According to a recent publication the Soviet Union has over 800 institutions of higher learning, with an enrolment of 1,800,000 students. In addition to that, there are over 4,000 specialized secondary schools, with an enrolment of 1,500,000. In the light of this information, let us examine our position in Canada.

In a series of articles in the Montreal Star in November, 1955, extracts of which were reproduced in the excellent issue of the Newsletter of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce for December, two charts were reproduced showing the enrolment of undergraduate and postgraduate students in Canadian universities and colleges at the present time and projected to the year 1965.

The latest figures on university enrolments indicate that there are just under 70,000 taking undergraduate and postgraduate work in Canadian universities. This is slightly less than half of 1 per cent of the total population of 16 million. If we accept the figures of the Soviet Union as being 1,800,000 students in a total population of 200 million, we get a figure of ·9 per cent, or better than a ratio of two Russian students for our one.

All educators and all provincial and municipal governments are concerned by what is being called the "battle of the bulge" in education—the enormous increase in enrolments which is just beginning in our schools and will have a tremendous effect on our resources for higher education in the next 10 years. Again, the best projections available indicate that university enrolment in 1965 will be somewhere between 125,000 and 130,000 students, or practically double the enrolment today.

Speaking in Edmonton recently, Dr. R. E. Heartz, President of the Engineering Institute of Canada, made the statement that Canadian industry could have employed three engineering graduates for every one that graduated from our universities last spring. While the demand in all other fields may not be proportionately high, we know that there is an alarming shortage of teachers of the proper quality, and there is a shortage of doctors, dentists, nurses and people with training in economics and business management. Industries are coming to universities every day asking where they can get qualified personnel in the management field. In other words, the present university facilities in Canada are being used to capacity and are not turning out enough graduates to meet our present needs. If that is the case, how are we going to turn out double the number of graduates 10 years from now? The answer is obvious. We are going to have to greatly increase our expenditures for capital equipment and teaching staff and, if we are to do this we shall have to work out a new relationship between the federal Government, the Provinces and a new partner—Business—in order to provide the facilities which are a necessity to the efficient functioning of our economy and to national defence.

While I think the need for some form of federal aid for education is imperative and inescapable—and I am convinced that an acceptable formula for making that aid available can and must be found—there is another aspect of Canada's educational problem which is more important still, and that is the quality of education we are offering.

Canada is faced with three major problems in education today: one is finance, the second is recruitment of adequate numbers of the right quality, and the third is the quality of education we offer at all levels from the elementary school to the university.

Let me say at once—and as a result of 25 years' experience in university extension work in my own province, an experience which has brought me in intimate contact with the people in most communities of my own province and a good many outside—there is no dearth of potential leaders. In fact, it is one of the reassuring aspects of our democratic life that there are so many people who have the potential to go to the top in every line of endeavour; all they need is a little encouragement and cultivation. In the field of fine arts, which has been sadly neglected in this country, I have seen, on dozens of occasions, cases where a scholarship as small as $100 was the means of starting young Canadians on careers of distinction in music, painting and theatre. Most Canadians are gratified with the success of our own Stratford Festival, and deservedly so. Yet, in one year of that festival there were seven young Canadians in the cast—including Frances Hyland and Douglas Rain—who received their initial encouragement through a $100 scholarship to the Banff School of Fine Arts. It just took that much to get them started. In the field of business management training, business has come to the universities and more than one company president has told me in the last four or five years that the investment of $1,000 to $1,500 which his company put into sending a young executive to take a course in business administration has been repaid many times over in the first three years.

In the business world we measure returns on our investments in terms of percentage—3 per cent, 5 per cent, 10 per cent, sometimes 15 per cent or 20 per cent, or whatever the figure may be—but the money invested in developing the skills and talents of young Canadians gives returns in terms, not of a paltry 3 to 5 per cent, but of hundreds per cent. There is no investment that money can buy that will bring returns comparable to those from investment in the development of the skills and talents of young Canadians.

It was because we recognized the importance of scholarships that all Canadian educators welcomed the appointment in 1949 of the Royal Commission on National Development in the Arts, Letters and Sciences. We were gratified with the appointment of distinguished men and women to that commission and encouraged by the eminent feasibility and practicality of their recommendations. Here at last we thought is a program for a modest beginning in recognizing and cultivating those rich resources of talents and skills which for all too long have gone without recognition or adequate encouragement in our national life. Here was a charter which set in proper perspective the importance of those institutions which are vitally necessary to the development of a distinct Canadian culture. That report was made in 1951, and the Government acted with commendable speed in implementing the recommendations that immediate aid be given to our universities on a per capita-student basis. This has been of great help to Canadian universities. It was our hope that the second important phase, dealing with a national program of scholarships, would shortly follow. Four years have now gone by and the conditions which made the recommendations valid in 1951 are present in much more urgent form today. I would strongly urge the Government to take the necessary steps to implement these recommendations and go as far as they can at the earliest possible moment.

We are all familiar with the many reasons and factors which affect the timing of major innovations of the kind represented by the establishment of the Canada Council and a national program of scholarships. It is because I recognize this that I suggest to the honourable members of this house that we all have a responsibility as individual citizens, and as people exercising an influence in the communities in which we live, to make available the information we have on the importance of a national scholarship program to the general welfare of our country.

There may be good and sufficient reasons why the Canada Council and national program of scholarships cannot be instituted at this time. If that is the case, then I think every Canadian who occupies a position of leadership and responsibility in his community owes it to himself and those he represents to become fully informed on the issues at stake and the serious consequences which could accrue to this country if we do not provide trained leaders in the arts, the humanities and the sciences.

To show how serious the shortage of fully qualified people is at this time, may I quote the situation in my own province of Alberta? For the last 20 years it has been my privilege to sit as a member of the Senate of the University of Alberta. For the last three or four years particularly there has been increasing concern over the relatively small number of students who were completing their university matriculation examinations with grades sufficiently high to warrant their entry to the university. Two years ago the total number completing university entrance with 60 per cent or better was slightly less than 1,200 students—not enough to provide replacements for the professional personnel who were lost to the professions in that province by retirement, migration to some other province, or by death. In the current academic year, in a province with over one million population, the number who completed university entrance with 60 per cent or better was 1,426—again not nearly enough to meet the professional requirements of the province without imports, four years from now, even without any increase in population or industry. In addition, many of the students who are coming to the university have a minimum rather than an adequate grounding in mathematics and in languages. While I cannot speak with the same authority about the situation in other provinces, I have reason to believe the same tendency exists there as well, although I do not believe it is true to the same extent in Ontario.

Honourable senators, that this situation is part of a general condition on this continent is borne out by the comments of General Maxwell D. Taylor, Chief of Staff of the United States Army and former Superintendent of West Point, who said recently:

> Only 47 per cent of U.S. high schools now offer physics. Enrolment of students in such physics courses as there are declined from 22 per cent in 1895 to 5·5 per cent in 1948.
> Further proof of the squeezing out of old subjects for new is equally shocking. Now 46 per cent of the country's high schools offer no foreign languages; 24 per cent give no geometry; 23 per cent offer neither physics nor chemistry.

All this at a time when our industry and our defence depend on a thorough grounding in these subjects to an extent never necessary in previous history. While this is a United States' experience—and to my knowledge comparable figures are not available in Canada—I suspect on the basis of the knowledge we do have that we are not far ahead of our neighbours to the south.

If this assessment of the present state of higher education in relation to the needs of the times is even approximately accurate, it would suggest that some means should be taken soon not only to get more people into our universities and technical schools but to toughen up the standards of training for those who do get there. And our problem is: how do we do it? I would say by increasing the physical facilities for higher education by at least 50 per cent in the next ten years; by increasing the teaching and research staffs by at least an equal percentage; and, finally, by providing a nation-wide system of scholarships, bursaries and student loans—and I would suggest that more attention be paid to student loans on a revolving fund basis, because I know that many of the students can, in later years, make a contribution to repay the fund and help others who come after them.

Were it possible to set up the Canada Council in the near future it would be the logical instrument through which the scholarship program should be implemented. May I say here that when that council is set up I hope its membership will include a good proportion of men from the business world and the public service, as well as those from the arts, letters and sciences. The policies these men evolve and apply can have the most significant effect on the welfare, status and prosperity of the Canadian nation. In the meantime, until a council is set up and functioning, there is no reason why intermediate steps cannot be taken which will go part way in meeting the need. There are several precedents which the Government could follow, and there is much valuable experience which would be helpful. Since 1913 the federal Government has been making grants to the provinces to assist in agricultural instruction and technical education. In 1913 $10 million was made available for agricultural instruction; in 1919 $10 million was made available on a matching basis for technical education.

In 1937, under the Youth Training and Rehabilitation Program, further substantial sums were set aside, on a joint basis with the provinces. That was a very fine thing, as I know from personal experience, because in the five-year period from 1937 to 1942 it was my privilege to organize and administer 132 of those dominion-provincial schools in Alberta and to serve over 14,000 young Albertans in the rural areas. Coming at that time it had a most far-reaching and beneficial effect on the general morale and the practical knowledge of the country.

Probably one of the most generous and far-reaching programs of federal assistance that has ever been given in this country came under sections 8, 9 and 10 of the Veterans Rehabilitation Act of 1945—the program which was part of the Veterans' Charter, under which the veterans who served in the last war were able to go on to the universities. That was one of the finest pieces of legislation this country ever enacted. People who were not in day-to-day contact with the veterans who came to the universities under the veterans' program cannot have any idea what it meant to many young men and women who, but for that enlightened program, would have been denied university training and could not have fulfilled a life's ambition. Thanks to that program, thousands of them today are making a contribution to our national life far more important than they would otherwise have been able to do. Surely, with this example and this experience behind us we can find a formula that will enlist the support of all Canadians, no matter where they may live.

There is one other important source of scholarship assistance being provided by the federal Government, and that is the scholarship program through the National Research Council. According to the annual report for the year ending March 31 last, the amount allocated to scholarships was $642,000, a not inconsiderable sum. In addition to that a sum of $1,568,000 was made in aid of research. Again from personal experience I know that research grants such as this often serve the same useful purpose as grants for scholarships. Full credit must be given to the Government for what is being done, but the important point to remember is that what is being done, while valuable and good, is not enough to meet present day needs.

There are suggestions in some quarters that the federal Government should confine its activities in the scholarship field to the postgraduate level. This argument sounds fine, but it overlooks the very great value of scholarships at the undergraduate level as a means of recruiting and screening a much larger pool of postgraduate material. Such an argument also overlooks the fact that some of the most productive investments in scholarships in arts and letters may be made in areas of less formal training than that in a regular university program.

Earlier in this discussion I suggested that instead of looking to the Government entirely for support for a national scholarship program we ought to add a new partner—Business. Although I come from Alberta, where it has been alleged that we look for something for nothing, I have always believed that the beneficiary of any Government program should pay at least part of the direct cost of the aid he is getting. In this case there would be two direct beneficiaries of a national program of scholarships. One of the closest and most immediate beneficiaries, of course, would be the student himself, and the second would be the business community which gets the benefit of the scholar. As far as the student is concerned, I think he can and should pay part of his own costs. The amount could be anywhere from 10 per cent to 50 per cent or more, according to the student's ability to pay, but he should make some contribution. Furthermore, more use could be made of the principle of repayable loans and revolving funds.

In the case of business, many will argue, with justifiable validity, that business is paying for education now through taxes. However, I can say from personal experience in providing courses in Business Administration that one of the most hopeful signs I see on the horizon is a new and growing sense of parterership between business and education. Private business and co-operative enterprise are today spending large amounts of money on in-service training programs, leave of absence with pay, and outright scholarships. Business today is more interested in education than at any time in my experience. And that is one of the most hopeful signs on the horizon at present.

I make bold to suggest that if the machinery of the Canada Council was established it would not be long until contributions by industry, provincial and municipal governments, and individual contributions by charitable donations and bequests on death, would much more than match any contribution the federal Government made. As one who has had some experience in raising funds for both capital and scholarship purposes, I have confidence this can be done.

Having been interested in this subject, naturally I have been anxious to know what groups in Canada have given official expressions of support for the establishment of the Council and the scholarship program. These are the peoples and organizations that have gone on record in favour:

The Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire

The Canadian Congress of Labour

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture

The National Conference of Canadian Universities

The National Federation of Canadian University Students

The Canadian Association for Adult Education

The Co-operative Union of Canada

The Canadian Teachers' Federation

The Canadian Education Association

The Canadian Home and School Federation

The National Federation of Women's Institutes.

This is a formidable list representing many thousands of the most intelligent and best informed Canadian citizens and voters. With support of this kind in every province in the land, who are the organizations opposing the program, and why? I respectfully suggest that it is our job to find out.

In conclusion, I want to say that education is the responsibility of every member of the Canadian Parliament. It is the very foundation stone of our society. I also believe that our leaders have the wit and the skill to devise formulas which will overcome the handicaps of geography and protect the rights of minorities. My final words are those of the noted Chicago architect D. H. Burnham who, speaking of building of the cities of tomorrow, said these words, which I like very much:

> Make no small plans, they hold no magic to stir men's blood.

I suggest to you that the time has come for Canadians to be much bolder, imaginative and daring than we have been in the past. The opportunity is ours and the rewards will be great.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Gershaw, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

MERCANTILE TRUST COMPANY—MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. David A. Croll moved the second reading of Bill R, an Act to incorporate Mercantile Trust Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a bill to incorporate a trust company to carry on a normal trust business, as we understand it. The application is made by responsible and representative Canadians, who intend to open offices at first in Toronto, Edmonton and Vancouver, and later in some other major cities.

I am asking the house to endorse this bill in principle and send it to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, where it can receive detailed study.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Where will the head office of the company be located?

Hon. Mr. Croll: According to section 4 of the bill, the head office will be in Toronto.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Lambert (for Hon. Mr. Vien), the debate was adjourned until Wednesday, February 1.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce Nos. 44 to 56, which were presented yesterday.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Committee, moved that the reports be adopted.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, January 31, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, January 31, 1956

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Routine proceedings.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE—STATISTICS

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 72 to 93, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

He said: Honourable senators, at this time I wish to make a progress report of the divorce committee, in which I fancy the house will be interested. The figures to date are as follows:

Petitions filed	302
Petitions withdrawn		2
Petitions heard and recommended		113
Petitions pending a hearing		187
Totals	302	302

As to the petitions pending a hearing, 25 notices of intention to oppose have been filed by the respondents.

The time limited for filing petitions for the present session will expire on Monday, February 20.

The number of petitions heard and recommended from the beginning of the session to date, namely, 113, is probably a record of accomplishment in the early stages of a session. The hearings commenced in the very second week of the session, and since then committees have been sitting steadily; for instance, last week cases were heard every day, from Monday to Friday. This week cases will be heard on Tuesday and Friday only, because other committees of the Senate will be sitting.

I should point out that the fact that there are 25 notices of intention to oppose does not necessarily mean 25 contested cases, because experience has shown that some opposed cases will be withdrawn, or that some petitioners will fail to turn up, and that sort of thing. It does mean, however, that a number of contested cases will have to be heard, some of which may take a full day or more; probably a day per hearing is the average.

The Chief Clerk of Committees estimates that another 100 petitions will be filed. In that event, we shall have a further 287 petitions to be heard.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, January 26, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, seconded by Hon. Mr. Croll, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, may I first of all congratulate the mover (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Croll) of the Address. They are both outstanding Canadians and I am sure that in their new positions they will continue to contribute to Canada's welfare.

May I also in a very humble way extend my welcome to the new senators who have come to this chamber? A person need not be here very long before noticing that from time to time familiar faces are missing, and that new appointees appear to carry on the work of the Senate.

Now, I want to make brief reference to the fact that 1955 was the Golden Jubilee year of the province of Alberta.

Hon. Mr. Wood: And Saskatchewan, too.

Hon. Mr. Gershaw: It will long be remembered, because of the many gatherings, ceremonies and gala events which marked the occasion.

Honour scrolls were prepared for all the people who had lived in the province since 1905. Schools everywhere observed the historic occasion, and thousands of new Canadians joined in the gala events and, without a dissenting voice, expressed their loyalty to and love for our Queen and for the country of their adoption.

Just about 50 years ago a land of prairie, woodland, footlands and mountains was formed into the province of Alberta. Over those plains for countless ages nomadic bands of Indians had roamed. In 1874 police posts were established and a few settlers came in; and explorers, traders and Christian missionaries made their way from place to place in that great country as well as they could. There were numerous buffalo grazing on the plain. Buffalo existed in such great numbers that early observers there said they covered the ground in some directions for as far as the eye could see. Those buffalo disappeared and in their place came great herds of cattle. The cattle did well on the nutritious prairie grass, and the years before 1905 were the golden days of the ranching industry. They were the days of the open range and there was a great measure of prosperity. Later on, of course, after the settlers came in and roads and fences were built, that industry ceased to exist as it had existed in those earlier years.

Since 1905 there have been two wars and a great depression. Those wars caused more death and destruction, more suffering and sadness than any previous conflicts; and it seems to me that, lest the memory of those anxious days should grow dim, it is the duty of the people of this generation to teach the children something of the grimness and horrors and also something of the causes of war, so that another resort to arms will never occur, and war as an instrument of settling international disputes will be banished forever.

Since 1905 there was also a great depression. That was a period of strenuous times for the people of Alberta. Soil erosion, dust storms, drought and crop failures brought discouragement and despair to many people. In some places relief had to be given. Not a few areas of land were depopulated. Prices fell to extremely low levels, wheat was selling at 26 to 30 cents a bushel; beef cattle fetched 1¾ cents a pound, wool 4 cents a pound.

In the last fifty years great changes have come in the province of Alberta. The population, which in 1905 was 116,000, has grown to around a million. Industrial production, then in the neighbourhood of $5 million, has risen to between $600 million and $700 million, and agricultural production, always in the lead, has grown from $42 million to about $800 million or $900 million. A thousand barrels will hold an awful lot of oil; yet every day the wells of Alberta produce 412 thousand barrels of oil. In order to transport such tremendous quantities a new method has been adopted; an underground tunnel has been built all the way from Edmonton to Superior, on the Great Lakes. That pipe line contains enough steel to construct a thousand miles of main line railway, and the capacity of the pipes is about 64 million gallons. Oil which was poured into the pipes at Edmonton on October 4 reached Superior just two months later. That great asset has made an immense difference to the circumstances of our people in Alberta. In order to process the crude oil, great refineries have been built, and secondary industries have been established to provide manufactured plastics, sulphur, cellulose acetate, and building material. Enough refined gasoline and oil is being produced to supply all western requirements.

Thousands of people visit our province to see the beauties of the Canadian Rockies and our lakes and rivers. They come to Banff, Jasper and Waterton Park, and such colourful events as the Calgary Stampede and the Grey Cup football semi-final attract a great many people who, once they are there, are impressed by western hospitality.

Honourable senators, I wish to discuss just one other subject this evening. Research has had the richest results in the field of medical science, and has done more to control the ravages of diseases than any other activity. Scarlet fever, diptheria, typhoid and smallpox have almost been conquered, and pneumonia and even tuberculosis have lost their hold on and terror for the people of Canada. Great progress has been made in the treatment of mental diseases by the use of electric and insulin shocks, and even newer drugs are having a strong influence on the healing of diseased brain tissue.

However, while much has been done, much remains to be done. Rheumatism and arthritis still disable people. Cardiovascular diseases, cancer and accidents are still the captains of the men of death, and so research must be given a very prominent place if any national health scheme is to be successful. The following discoveries have been made through research: antitoxin, in the treatment of diphtheria; liver-extract, in the treatment of pernicious anaemia; insulin, in the treatment of diabetes; and penicillin and similar drugs, in the treatment of infections. The great advances that have been made in brain and heart surgery have been accomplished by diligent, prolonged and even discouraging and tedious efforts. Except for the last few years, ever since the days when the Books of the Bible were written there has been one disease which has been a terrible scourge to humans. That disease, it has been said, is handed down to the second and even the third generation. An attempt was made to find a serum to combat it, and after prolonged experimentation on 900 serums, No. 606 was the one which had a great deal to do with curing the disease. At the present time medical professors can hardly find a case to demonstrate to their classes. No one gets a fortune when such discoveries are made by laboratory workers. No one patents or copyrights the discoveries; they are given freely to everyone in the world. So we should pay tribute to the laboratory workers who step by step have accomplished so much. These words truly apply to them:

> Does a trail wind uphill all the way?
> Yes, to the very end;
> Does a day's work last the whole of a live-long day?
> From morning till night, my friend.

During the past week a federal-provincial conference on health was held in Ottawa. I think we may say that it was reasonably successful and will result in some measure of health insurance being devised to help meet hospital and diagnostic costs. But this does not go very far toward a full national health insurance scheme. It is true that hospitals are being used more now than formerly, but the average person who becomes ill calls in a doctor or goes to his office or to a clinic. The fact is that it is the cost of drugs and prolonged medical or surgical care that runs up the big bills, and naturally and rightly Canadians are trying to find some relief or escape from this expense.

A good deal has already been done about health insurance and three of our provinces provide a pretty full measure of hospital protection. Hospital insurance is compulsory in one province and costs about $15 per person or $30 per family. In another province there is an arrangement whereby every taxpayer can receive treatment in the public wards of hospitals for $1 a day, the balance of the cost being paid by the provincial and municipal governments. All over Canada workmen's compensation boards provide hospital accommodation and doctors' care. Special illnesses such as cancer, tuberculosis, poliomyelitis, mental disease and venereal disease are provided for by some degree of diagnostic treatment and, in some cases, by hospital treatment. In some western provinces people who are in receipt of old age security, or the blind pension or the mother's allowance receive hospital accommodation, and some of them have dental service and free drugs.

Over and above all this, at least 4 million Canadians are protected by private voluntary insurance organizations. I wish to discuss one in particular, for I feel that the use of these voluntary organizations can do much to bring about a satisfactory health service in this country. The Trans-Canada Medical Plans has collected premiums from some 2½ million Canadians, in return for which it provides medical services. It is a voluntary scheme throughout.

Honourable senators, I am not sure that the people of Canada are yet ready for any compulsory health insurance scheme. I want to quote what Dr. Wilder Penfield, of Montreal, said very recently:

> I hope that we in Canada never see socialization of medicine in this country like that in England.

I realize that others take the directly opposite view, but the opinion of a man of Dr. Penfield's standing is certainly worthy of some consideration and should not be hastily cast aside. I do know this, that when a person is sick, especially seriously ill, he or she wants and is entitled to the very best medical and surgical care which the age affords, wants to feel convinced that the best care is given. Under those circumstances, cost is really not the most important consideration.

Honourable senators, I am not sure that the people generally are ready yet for compulsory health insurance. I will tell you why. In Saskatchewan, in the southwest corner, quite a large block of municipalities were marked out, and within that area, called the Swift Current Health Unit, the people all had to take out insurance for medical care. It cost them about $15 per individual, and up to about $30 to $35 per family. In addition, there was an assessment of two mills on the assessed value of all their property, and there was also some assistance from the Government. That health unit has been in operation for eight or ten years; it is very well managed and has been a great blessing to many; but just recently it was proposed to set up two more health units in the same area. A vote was taken, and although the issues were explained to everybody the vote in one case was three to one against the setting up of a health unit; in another case the vote was six to one against. I take that to mean that in some places at least compulsory insurance is not too popular.

However, I realize that many people in Canada feel they should be protected against calamities, and I have noticed that the labour representatives are asking for medical care in their negotiations with companies I think that something should be done, step by step, to relieve people of ruinous charges. One body is particularly interested in health matters, namely, the Canadian Medical Association, which is made up of practically all the doctors in Canada. In 1943 the Association passed a resolution approving national health services; in 1947 it approved a plan of medical insurance; that is, it initiated and sponsored the Trans-Canada Medical Plans, and it hopes that gradually by means of these plans, every individual in Canada will be able to insure himself against the high cost of medical care. This scheme was to apply to all Canada, and it is operating now in every province; a person who has a policy in one province can get medical care in another; and the policy does not expire at 65 or 70 years of age, but the holder's card is good as long as he lives. It is a voluntary scheme in every way; it is prepaid insurance, because the premium is payable at the first of the year. It is a non-profit organization.

The object of the Trans-Canada Medical Plans is to provide insurance for all. Up to the present time mostly only groups have been able to obtain insurance; for instance, a number of people working in an industry or in a city hall or in a garage. Sometimes such a group consists of nine or more persons, and sometimes as few as three can be insured. Great progress has been made, for half a million people joined last year. In the Windsor metropolitan area it is estimated that 85 to 90 per cent of the people are insured under this plan. In that area there are a great many payrolls. However, the idea is that not only groups should be allowed to join, but also individuals, and it is expected that in Ontario, within a year's time, the Medical Plans will be able to insure individuals as well as groups.

In Alberta, about a year ago, the Government decided to encourage Medical Services Limited, as it is called there, to insure individuals. It went so far as to promise to pay about one-third of the premium up to $7, and then Medical Services would insure individuals as well as groups all through the province. Unfortunately, an election came on about that time, and the date of starting was postponed from the first of October until the first of January this year; then it was further postponed on account of the recent conference. It is expected, however, that the organization will be taking on individuals as well as groups before long.

The objects of this particular private organization sponsored by the Canadian Medical Association are: First, to make health protection available to everybody in Canada; secondly, to see that the doctor-patient relationship is not interfered with—a person who has a policy can choose any doctor he likes, and when he likes; thirdly, to retain the management in the hands of those who provide the service and those who receive the service—it is not strictly a doctors' organization; fourthly, to keep expenses down as low as possible—probably to $22 to $24 a year for individuals.

During the year 1954, $33 million was collected by the Trans-Canada Medical Plans, $28,750,000 was paid out in claims, some 4 per cent was set by as a reserve, and the cost of operating was about 8 per cent.

Just recently President Eisenhower expressed his support of private pre-payment medical plans as voluntary organizations. He felt they would protect a great many people against ruinously high charges. I simply wish to make clear what at least one private voluntary organization is doing and is prepared to do, because I believe that at present the national health scheme can best be advanced through private, voluntary organizations, for they have had experience and know how to adapt their system to the needs of the people of Canada. While we must see what the results of health insurance have been in other countries, yet we need a system that is particularly adapted to our own Canadian needs and ideas.

There are two parts to social welfare; one is social insurance, which I have mentioned; the other is social assistance. In encouraging private voluntary organizations, governments of necessity would have to pay the premium for unemployable persons and disabled persons, and perhaps some people of low incomes. The policies would need to be carefully examined and approved of by the governments. It would be a way of proceeding step by step, without any turning back; thus, an efficient service would be established which would endure and be a great blessing.

In the last analysis the aim and object of all legislation is to improve conditions in the homes of the people. In the gradual rounding out of our social welfare program, security against sickness and resultant ruinous bills would bring more contentment to the homes of the people than almost anything else we could provide; it would dispel that great fear of debt and uncertainty which is present in so many homes. In reaching towards this high and worthwhile ideal, I believe we should proceed step by step with proven and steady progress, which in the end would accomplish most. Like most things, we cannot expect to reach the ultimate goal all at once; it is rather a matter of trial and error. It is as Josiah Gilbert Holland said:

> Heaven is not reached at a single bound;
> But we build the ladder by which we rise
> From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies,
> And we mount to its summit round by round.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Horner, the debate was adjourned.

HEALTH INSURANCE

PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT IN COMMONS

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I rise to reply to the inquiry of the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) on Thursday last, when I was unavoidably absent from the chamber, with respect to a historic statement on health insurance made that day by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons. The honourable senator asked why a simultaneous statement was not made in this house. The answer is that the statement had not been received by me nor by the honourable Acting Leader (Hon. Mr. Godbout) at that time. As honourable senators know, one or other of the ministers makes a statement in the House of Commons almost every day, and it is not always possible to have a simultaneous statement made to the Senate on each occasion.

However, in view of the very interesting and informative address on health insurance delivered this evening by the honourable senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw), it occurred to me that perhaps the house would wish to have the Prime Minister's statement inserted as an appendix to today's Hansard. The statement would no doubt be helpful to honourable senators when they are required to consider this question in the future.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Could the honourable Leader read it to us?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I could read it, but it is quite lengthy.

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With leave, I move that the statement of the Prime Minister as to federal assistance in the matter of health insurance made in the House of Commons on January 26, 1956, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

The motion was agreed to.

See Appendix to today's Hansard, p. 84.

PRIVATE BILL

CHURCH OF ENGLAND IN CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. A. K. Hugessen moved the second reading of Bill D, an Act respecting The General Synod of the Church of England in Canada, The Missionary Society of the Church of England in Canada, The Woman's Auxiliary of The Church of England in Canada and the Church of England Consolidated Trust Fund.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill results from the action taken at the General Synod of the Church of England in Canada held in Edmonton early last fall at which the name of the church was changed from that of the Church of England in Canada to that of the Anglican Church of Canada. That change in itself does not require any parliamentary sanction, but there have been a number of measures passed by this Parliament at one time or another dealing with some of the bodies affiliated with the church, and the property of those bodies, in which the name of the church appears; and the only purpose of the present bill is to effect the corresponding change in the name of the church wherever it appears in any of these acts.

In a matter of this kind, which is of considerable importance to the two million Anglicans in Canada, I think the Senate will probably require to be satisfied on two points. The first is as to the authority under which the name of the church was changed; and the second, as to the reasons which led the General Synod to make a change in what I might say is an old and historic name.

First, as to the authority for the change. The Anglican Church in Canada is divided territorially into 28 dioceses, each headed by a bishop. The temporal affairs of each diocese are administered by the diocesan synod, which consists of the bishop, the clergy working in the diocese, and elected lay representatives from each parish. In most dioceses the diocesan synod meets once a year for a period of two or three days.

Matters affecting the whole church throughout Canada are in the hands of a body known as the General Synod of the Church of England in Canada. The General Synod, like the Parliament of Canada, consists of two houses. The Upper House, the House of Bishops, consists of the 28 diocesan bishops and of retired bishops; its present membership constitutes about 40 in all. The Lower House is constituted of delegates elected by the synod of each diocese in equal numbers of lay and clerical delegates; the number of delegates elected from each diocese depends upon the number of parishes in the diocese. For example, in the diocese of Montreal, we are entitled to elect eight clerical and eight lay delegates to the General Synod. The clerical delegates are voted for by the clergy and the lay delegates are voted for by the laity separately. The total number of elected delegates to the Lower House of the General Synod at the present time is 284.

The General Synod meets once in every three years for a period of about ten days. It does not meet always in the same place. It varies its sittings from city to city throughout Canada, and the nineteenth session of the General Synod met at Edmonton from August 30 to September 8 last year. Incidentally, that was the first occasion on which a meeting of the General Synod has been held west of Winnipeg.

I attended the General Synod as one of the elected lay delegates from the diocese of Montreal; and my honourable friend the senator from Northumberland - Miramichi (Hon. Mr. Burchill), sitting opposite me, also attended the General Synod as one of the elected lay delegates from the diocese of Fredericton. He and I had the experience there, rather unusual for both of us, of sitting and voting together as elected members of the Lower House.

One of the first questions which the General Synod considered was this question of the change of name to which I have referred, and a resolution was submitted in the following terms:

> The church hitherto known as the Church of England in Canada shall in future be styled the Anglican Church of Canada.

Now I should explain that in most matters the two houses, that is, the Upper House of Bishops and the Lower House of Delegates, sit together, as they did when they considered this resolution. However, they vote separately, and no resolution can be adopted unless it receives the affirmative vote of both houses.

After considerable discussion, the resolution which I have just read was carried in both houses by an overwhelming vote. In the Upper House, the House of Bishops, the vote was 23 to 4, and in the Lower House it was a vote of 174 to 40. So the Senate will realize that there was a very substantial majority in favour of the resolution in both houses of the General Synod, and that basically that resolution is my authority for introducing the present bill to the Senate at this time.

The Senate may be interested in the reasons for making this change in the name of our church. It goes without saying that that was not done without very considerable thought. I think it is fair to say that the principal reason was an historical one. It was felt that the old name no longer correctly describes our church as it exists today.

I think it is perfectly fair to say that the name, "The Church of England in Canada", was a perfectly proper and perfectly correct description of the church in the early days. Let me refer you to the conditions as they existed in colonial times.

All the clergy of the church were sent out to us from England. Financially, a very large degree of support both in the building of churches in this country and in the maintenance of the clergymen was obtained by contributions from the faithful in Great Britain. Our Episcopal Sees were established, and our bishops were appointed, by letters patent issued by the sovereign under the Great Seal. Let me take as an example the diocese of Montreal.

The diocese of Montreal was created by letters patent issued by Queen Victoria under the Privy Seal on the 18th of July 1851, and I have in my hand the text of these letters patent. By these letters patent Queen Victoria created the diocese of Montreal out of a part of the territory formerly comprised in the diocese of Quebec. The letters patent define the boundaries of the diocese; they appoint the Right Reverend Francis Fulford as the first bishop of the diocese; and they set out the powers and the duties of the bishop and of his successors in office. But the letters patent did more than that. As some honourable senators probably know, in England any town which becomes the seat of a bishop thereby becomes entitled to call itself a city, and that tradition was followed in these letters patent issued by Queen Victoria on the 18th of July 1851.

Honourable senators from the province of Quebec will, I think, be interested to learn that it was this document which created Montreal as a city. Let me read from the relevant section of the letters patent. I quote:

> And we do further by these our letters patent ordain and constitute the town of Montreal in the said diocese to be a bishop's see and the seat of the said bishop and do ordain that the said town of Montreal shall henceforth be a city.

Well now, under the conditions which I have described, I think all honourable senators will agree with me that it would be very proper to refer to our church as the Church of England in Canada. However, in point of fact, at the time of which I speak the mother church in England was not known as the Church of England. Its name in those days, and it is so described in the letters patent to which I have just referred, was "The United Church of England and Ireland", and it retained that name until the disestablishment of the church in Ireland by the British Parliament about the year 1870, during the first administration of Mr. Gladstone, after which it became known as the Church of England.

Now, since those days of which I have spoken, conditions have of course completely changed. Our clergy are not sent to us from England any longer; they are trained in our own theological colleges, established by our own people, in various cities throughout the country. Financially the church is completely independent and receives no funds from England. Our bishops are no longer nominated by the sovereign, they are elected by the diocese which they are to administer.

To be brief, honourable senators, the church has now become a Canadian church, it is completely autonomous and it has taken deep root in the soil of our country.

That I think was the principal reason which led the General Synod to change the name by that substantial majority. It goes without saying that in matters of faith and doctrine the church remains in full communion with the mother church in England. And we will always remember with great pride and gratitude the marvellous work which was done by the mother church in establishing our church in Canada, and the invaluable help which it gave in the early years.

A second reason was advanced to us for the change in name. It was put forward largely by members of the clergy and the laity in districts of Canada where there has been a fairly substantial immigration from northern Europe. These people, upon their arrival in Canada, often lose the church associations of their old country, and it might be expected that in their new home they would be attracted to the doctrines of the Church of England, which are not very far removed from those to which they were accustomed in the lands of their birth. But, we were told, it was almost impossible to get any of them to join the church so long as its name, "the Church of England in Canada", naturally led them to believe that it was confined and restricted to people of English birth. That is as it may be; but whatever the reasons were—and I have attempted to outline some of them—the General Synod, by the overwhelming majorities I have mentioned, did vote to change the name.

As I tried to explain, the only purpose of the bill now before you is, one might say, to tie up certain legislative loose ends resulting from this change of name. That being so, I venture with great respect, on behalf of the two million Anglicans in Canada, to submit this bill for the favourable consideration of the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, it is, perhaps, superfluous for me to add anything to what has been said, and so well said, by my honourable friend from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen). In fact, there is hardly anything which can be added. The honourable senator is exceptionally well qualified to tell us what we have heard from him this evening, because he occupies, among other positions, the honourable post of Chancellor of the Diocese of Montreal. Since, however, you have heard from a representative of that diocese, it might not be out of place if, coming as I do from another and smaller diocese, that of Fredericton, I added a word by way of endorsing everything he has said.

As he has pointed out, the recommendation which he has presented and discussed is not one which has been rashly adopted. It has been before the General Synod since the year 1911, when as I recall, it was brought forward mainly by western bishops, clergy and laity, who pressed the gathering for a change of name, and for the second reason which the senator gave, namely, the difficulty under which they laboured in the missionary field to convince new Canadians, principally from northern Europe, that they would not have to be Englishmen to belong to the Church of England. At that time it came as rather a shock to the rest of the church that there should be so much as a suggestion that this historic heritage of ours, this name of which we were still so proud, "The Church of England", should be changed, and the idea got little support. The matter came up again in 1915, when a committee was appointed to consider it; but in 1918 it was reported, after consultation with the various dioceses, that there was little support for this suggestion, and the committee was discharged. In 1921 the proposal again met with a poor reception. In 1931 an Anglican commission which had visited every diocese from the east to the west of Canada presented, as one of its recommendations, that the name of the church be changed to "The Anglican Church in Canada". That recommendation was voted down, and the subject was dropped until 1949. In that year, when the Synod met in Halifax, it was brought up once more, again by western representatives who, I remember, pressed very strongly for a change of attitude in this respect. A motion to adopt the name "The Anglican Church of Canada", though carried in the Lower House by a very substantial majority,—as I remember, 157 to about 60,—was defeated in the House of Bishops. In 1954 the Primate appointed a representative commission to study the whole matter, and it is their recommendation, brought before the Synod which was held in Edmonton in 1955, that the name be changed to "The Anglican Church of Canada", which is contained in the bill before us. As the honourable senator from Inkerman has told us, it was carried in both houses by a very substantial majority.

I hope this honourable house will approve of the measure, because I feel that it expresses the wishes of the majority, after long years of study, and that it is the best course of action at the present time.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hugessen, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

APPENDIX

HEALTH INSURANCE

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER IN HOUSE OF COMMONS ON JANUARY 26, 1956, AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, honourable members will recall that the federal-provincial conference in October established a committee of federal and provincial ministers of health and of finance to study health insurance questions. This committee has been meeting here this week in camera, in accordance with the expressed desire of the provincial representatives at the conference.

I made a public statement of the general policy of the Government on this subject at the opening of the conference in October. This has been furnished to all honourable members in the proceedings of the conference. The main point of that policy statement was that when a majority of the provincial governments, representing a majority of the people of Canada, are ready to put into effect programs to provide hospital care as a measure of health insurance under provincial jurisdiction and management, the federal Government would recommend to Parliament legislation to provide financial support and technical assistance to the provinces for such programs.

Constitutional responsibility in this field lies, of course, with the provincial governments, and we have no desire to interfere in their exercise of it, nor to urge any provincial government to take this major step in social policy before it feels prepared to meet the substantial administrative and financial problems which are involved. Provincial spokesmen have made quite clear, however, that they would expect Parliament to provide some share of the finances required by a grant in aid, as was done in the case of other major social security and health programs.

Public opinion appears to support the view that it would be proper for the federal Government to recommend such assistance. The Government has not felt it could recommend assistance for only a few provinces to undertake this great social innovation, but if a majority of provinces, such as I have mentioned, are ready to embark upon it, and wish assistance, we feel it would be justified.

The discussions with the provincial representatives have now reached a stage where it seems desirable that the federal Government should state the nature of the financial assistance it would ask Parliament to provide under the circumstances I have described. This is desirable in order that provincial governments can estimate the amounts they would have to finance in undertaking a program along these lines.

I think it is appropriate that I inform the house, in general terms, of the nature of the proposed basis of assistance at about the same time that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in an adjoining room, is informing the provincial representatives. He will be reporting in more detail upon these matters to the house at the first appropriate opportunity.

When a majority of the provinces, as I have mentioned, are ready to proceed we would recommend to Parliament that it enact legislation to provide a grant to each province operating a hospital care insurance program. The amount of the grant would be a fraction of carefully defined shareable operating costs of hospital care, being 25 per cent of the per capita shareable costs in that province, plus 25 per cent of the average per capita shareable costs in Canada as a whole, multiplied by the population covered by the provincial program. The programs in which we would share would provide standard ward care.

This formula will leave a substantial incentive for economy and efficiency with each provincial authority, together with a large measure of federal assistance and equity in its distribution. It will mean that on the whole the federal treasury would bear about one-half of the net shareable operating costs of such programs of hospital insurance.

We would not propose under this legislation to share the costs of care for mental illness and tuberculosis, which provincial governments have traditionally provided and for the improvement of which Parliament has already been providing grants under the national health grants program.

We are also prepared to include in our recommendation to Parliament the addition to this hospital program of laboratory, radiological and other diagnostic services for patients outside of hospitals as well as in them. Already a start has been made toward these services under the national health grants program, and those who have studied the subject consider the provision of these diagnostic services to be a desirable step to take either before or along with a program of insurance for hospital care.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a question in connection with the important announcement he has just made? If the agreement to which he has referred is reached at this conference or shortly thereafter, will the appropriate legislation be presented to Parliament at this session?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The question as to when legislation to implement the statement I have just made will be presented is something that will be considered in the light of circumstances as they develop further.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PROVINCIAL PREMIERS TABLED

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, on Wednesday, January 11, I tabled copies of two letters written by the Prime Minister to the various provincial Premiers with respect to federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. It was suggested that the documents should be printed as an appendix to our Hansard of that day, and pursuant to a motion that was done.

The Prime Minister has since received replies from a number of the Premiers to whom he wrote, and yesterday he tabled those letters in the House of Commons. I propose to table them in the Senate today, and if it is the wish of the house, I would move that they appear as an appendix to our Hansard and Minutes of today.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With leave, I move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig):

That the correspondence between the Prime Minister and certain provincial Premiers subsequent to the letter of the Prime Minister dated January 6, 1956, concerning federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this date.

The motion was agreed to.

See Appendix to today's Hansard, p. 96.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, seconded by Hon. Mr. Croll, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, it is hardly necessary, so far as the senators who have been here for a number of years are concerned, to make any explanation, but for the benefit of the new members of this house may I explain that this debate is an annual occurrence, and it is one of the occasions on which I feel particularly well suited to make the remarks I care to make. It is an occasion of this kind that a speaker can wander about a bit.

I would first of all like to congratulate the mover (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Croll) of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and I would also like to commend the other speakers we have heard since the opening of this debate.

I was particularly impressed by the speech made by the honourable senator from Banff (Hon. Mr. Cameron). The honourable senator is a university man and I must say that he gave us a very fine address. I would also like to congratulate the honourable senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw) upon his splendid address of last evening. I may say that an outstanding contribution by him to this annual debate is something that we have come to expect.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Horner: He made a very sound speech as he always does, and to my mind he was pretty nearly right—at least, as nearly right as a Liberal can get to things.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Horner: The province that I represent here is the greatest grain growing province in the Dominion of Canada. As a matter of fact, it grows more grain than all the rest of Canada. I may be pleading poverty for a number of the farmers of Saskatchewan, but the fact is that the farmers of that province pay more than half of the income tax paid to the Government by all the farmers of Canada.

Looking around the chamber, I would say that some men here were born on a farm, and perhaps that is about the only basis for any claim that they can put forward to any acquaintance with farming conditions. However, honourable senators, I was not only born on a farm, down in the province of Quebec, but I have continued in the farming industry, and my main interest has been grain growing, the handling and driving of horses and all that pertains to an agricultural pursuit.

As I said before, I doubt very much whether the Wheat Board has benefited by much of the publicity and the argument relating to the disposal of our surplus wheat. I recall that in the early days I had a good deal to do with shipping horses from east to west, and latterly from west to east. To deal profitably with a bunch of, say, 26 horses one had to be a pretty good salesman, and I discovered it was poor policy to have too many of them on view at one time, so I stowed away some of them in a convenient box stall, stable or pasture. It is a weary business for both buyer and seller to have a would-be purchaser make up his mind when there are too many animals to choose from. Remarks have been made, even by my leader (Hon. Mr. Haig), somewhat critical of the present marketing system. But, honourable senators, the farmers of the Prairie provinces still believe that their wheat should be sold through the Board, for the simple reason that, under the present system, they share alike in the proceeds. Under the former system, one man in selling his grain would hit the high point, while another, perhaps his neighbour, would hit a very low point, so that there would be a considerable difference between their returns. It is interesting to find that, even yet, some people in Canada have not recognized this situation. For example, in an article in the Montreal Gazette I note the following, under the heading: "Free market for wheat sole solution".

> Return to a completely free market, "where the law of supply and demand governs and competent grainmen will move crops into world markets", was recommended yesterday as the only possible solution to Canada's wheat problem.

With these statements I entirely disagree. They represent a stage which, I believe, we have passed—the unrestricted law of supply and demand. On almost every other commodity which the farmer must buy, whether it be the machinery he uses or the clothes he wears, the producer makes the mark-up, and that is the price he gets for the article he sells.

I do not think a return to a completely free grain market would work, and I am unalterably opposed to the suggestion put forward by the Government, particularly to the 5 per cent interest feature of it. Every businessman knows that this surplus wheat is a gilt-edged security, and a 3 per cent rate should be plenty. The farmers cannot sell their wheat other than through the Wheat Board—there is no other way for them to get rid of it—but it would be an inexpensive matter for the municipal secretary or some such official to inspect the grain in storage so that an advance loan could be made on it. It is true that a few fortunate farmers have acquired some money in past years, but I am simply amazed when I hear it stated that general sales are down something like only 1 per cent in Saskatchewan. Almost a year ago the merchants in the villages and towns throughout my part of the country started to operate on a strict cash basis, simply because they realized the farmers were already in debt. Many Saskatchewan farmers have grain, yet are unable to pay their taxes, grocery bills, and so on.

It is a rather sad commentary that in the Speech from the Throne we were asked to authorize the Treasury to bear the cost from August 1, 1955, of storage and interest charges on wheat held by the Wheat Board over and above its normal carryover levels. Surely we can devise some better method to take care of this situation. When Providence has been kind and favoured our farmers with good crops, and particularly when we have a central bank, we should not have to pay 5 per cent interest on these charges. I am not sure whether the regulations have been changed, but I know that at one time a farmer could not borrow if he had not paid his taxes.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Was that a bank regulation or a government regulation?

Hon. Mr. Horner: I am not certain, but that was the stumbling block at first. The farmer said, "I can't borrow anything because I haven't paid my taxes".

This is highly profitable business for the banks. It has meant good business for them whenever the farmers have met with a disastrous set-back.

I disagree with my leader (Hon. Mr. Haig) in this regard: It is amazing what one crop failure can do to eliminate a surplus. Today in Canada, with a population of some 15 million, it is quite a problem to grow the best wheat for consumption; and I have no doubt many wheat-growing countries face the same problem. Sometimes we are able to get a crop only by a very close margin, and sometimes it is a question of whether we will even get a crop at all. I think it was in 1916 that the west had a beautiful stand of grain, but the frost killed it. When wheat is in blossom one degree of frost means no wheat at all. The crop is also subject to drought and hailstorms. I think Canada should carry a surplus of 350 million bushels of grain at all times, and that we should make up our minds to that as necessary for the welfare of our people throughout the whole of Canada. I recommend that such a surplus should be stored on the farms.

A great deal has been said about the expense of storage, but plenty of money has been spent on national housing without complaint. We appreciate the fact that the Government has offered to pay storage charges on deliveries of wheat that have been made to the Wheat Board in excess of the average of 178 million bushels. A large sum of money will be required to pay for these charges. However, I should imagine the Government would receive the greater part back in income tax, in the same way that it gets back a portion in income tax from Government housing projects. I think the storage charges, in the light of present-day conditions, are altogether out of proportion to what they ought to be. I am of the opinion that about one-third the present costs of grain storage in the terminal elevators would defray the entire cost of the buildings over a twenty-year period. The storage charges are entirely too steep.

Times have changed since the days when I used to turn over the grain with a shovel or a pail. Now the farmer uses augers, by means of which the grain can be moved from trucks to the bins in the granaries, or from the bins to the trucks, and turned over, thus allowing air to pass through and keeping the grain in good condition. The farmer is now able to do that himself on his own farm. That is why I say the grain should be stored entirely on the farm until there is a market for it. At least the farmer would be able to own the building in which his grain is stored. Farmers pay for many of the elevators, anyway, and they never own them.

Hon. Mr. Wood: How much per month is charged for storage?

Hon. Mr. Haig: About one cent a month per bushel.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Whatever it is, I know it counts up very fast.

Honourable senators, I want to give you an instance to show what honest people we have in Saskatchewan. I once sold a section of land to a Dukhobor neighbour on the crop-payment basis. It was a very dry season, and times were not good. I thought the man was perfectly all right. Before every threshing time he would come over and tell me he was starting to thresh and ask me if I wanted to come and help. So I would say: "Now, look, John, I am not going near your place;

I have plenty of other things to do. I trust you, and I am not at all worried." Well, the year that the crash came on this open market scheme, wheat was $1.25 a bushel on the market, and the wheat pool was paying 75 cents a bushel as an initial payment. That was a long time ago.

Hon. Mr. Wood: In 1929.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Yes, in 1929 or before. Of course, I wanted my wheat to go to the wheat pool, and I expected my Dukhobor neighbour to sell his wheat for $1.25. Next summer—that was the year the pool found it had overpaid—wheat dropped so low that they had to come to our provincial Government and borrow several millions of dollars. However, that has all been repaid. I realized that I would be allowing my neighbour only some 75 cents, and I said, "John, I will have to make an adjustment with you, because possibly you sold your wheat last fall for $1.25." He replied, "Mr. Horner, don't say a word, but I held my wheat until the next year because I thought it would go up, but it dropped and I only got 65 cents." Now, honourable senators, instead of telling me that, my neighbour could have told me to allow him $1.25 a bushel. That particular year the International Harvester Company had collectors on the road. The farmers had all made up their minds in the fall that wheat would go up in price, and the company then decided to take their collectors off the road.

Honourable senators, Saskatchewan is still a great province; I think it is the greatest province in the dominion of Canada. The honourable senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw) told you about the celebrations in July to mark the fiftieth anniversary of Saskatchewan as a province. Blaine Lake, and every village and town, had its parade and celebration. Then in September that grand meeting was held in Regina, when Lieutenant Governor Patterson, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture, former Premiers, including the Honourable Mr. Dunning, and other former members of the Legislature met in the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Wood: Former and present.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Former and present, yes. Although all honourable senators were invited, I think I was the only one present on that occasion. For the benefit of anyone who has not visited Regina, and particularly the site of the Legislature, may I say that this was a day in September that I am sure one could find only in Saskatchewan—a perfect day that could not be equalled in Florida or any other place in the world.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Wascana Lake is artificial, but the grounds are spacious and even more beautiful than those surrounding the Parliament Buildings here. They were in perfect condition, and seats, tables and chairs were out on the front facing the lake. Everyone present was in splendid form, and all assembled in the evening at a banquet.

As an old-timer in the Senate, may I say a word of welcome to the new appointees? I am looking forward to hearing from them, especially the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power), who can give us the benefit of his lifetime of experience in Parliament. On the Jubilee occasion that I mentioned I had an opportunity to thank the Prime Minister in particular for the appointment of the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett), who now sits with the select few in the Opposition ranks.

When I heard the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) give a rank socialistic speech proposing nationalization of health services, with no suggestion of reduction in taxes, I thought for the moment I was back in the Saskatchewan Legislature.

The good senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw), who knows so well the history of medical men in western Canada, is perhaps too modest to mention their fine record in not pressing for prompt payment of fees. In my almost fifty years of living in the west I have not heard of a single instance of a doctor embarrassing a settler by trying to collect his bill, let alone by putting him off his farm. But I am a little doubtful that I could say the same for the members of the legal profession. If we are going so far as to nationalize the medical services, let us also nationalize legal services and set standard fees for everybody. Perhaps the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) might not approve of that suggestion.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: This may be your chance to sell me the idea.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Be that as it may, what concerns me is what is to become of the true wealth and value of our nation, namely, the homes of our people and the character of the members of our families. What effect will the continued trend of nationalization of services have on the character of our people? If we truly want to be engulfed in socialism, let us go all the way and appoint our dictator, because socialism has never succeeded and will never succeed without a dictator. Under a completely nationalized health program we could never hope to build enough hospitals to meet the needs of the people. Let me take a moment to give an illustration of what I have in mind.

Back in 1916, in the days when the huge steam-powered threshing machines used to travel through the western states as far south as Texas and into the Canadian west, much as the combines did when they first began to operate, I met a man who travelled as an expert mechanic to keep the machines in operation. Later that year I met him again, in the little French village of Debden, in Saskatchewan, at one of those small, well-run hotels where the food is grown locally, and is well prepared, and everybody sits around a well-lighted dining room. The settlement in its early days had gained its livelihood by shipping wild hay and poplar cordwood, but was then a beautiful farming community with some timber in the area. I approached this chap, who was an Englishman, and asked how he happened to have settled in that particular spot. He said to me his health had been so bad that he had planned to go into hospital, at a cost of some $500, when it was suggested to him that he might benefit by working in the woods for a while. He found this attractive place, and was cutting cordwood at a dollar a cord. Some days he would cut as much as two and a half cords, but he always paid his board and cleared a dollar a day. He also said to me: "I never felt better in my life; this is the finest treatment I could have taken."

Honourable senators, I venture to say that had that man gone into hospital and taken a lot of medicines he might have died.

Hon. Mr. Reid: You mean, if he had taken the doctor's advice.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Yes. I too have had some experiences in that line, but I will not bore you with them.

I find fault particularly with what I call this meagre Speech from the Throne, because it makes no mention of the important things that affect Canada today. For instance, it says nothing about our immigration policy. What is the Government going to do about it? What about the ever-growing city population? Some persons are even suggesting that in Ontario more people should leave the farms and move to the cities. To me that would be a sad state of affairs, because I think there is no place equal to the farm for raising a family.

As I walk up to the Parliament Buildings each day and see car after car, many with only the driver in them, and on cloudy days the air laden with carbon monoxide, I wonder what will happen to city dwellers as their numbers grow. I believe the problem will become so acute that we shall need to have fans placed on towers to clear the air in built-up areas.

With all due respect to what was said by the honourable senator from Banff (Hon. Mr. Cameron) about the prolongation of life, I believe that is mainly brought about by the reduction in infant mortality. Not a day passes but we hear of young men dying of heart disease. Somehow or other, I think we are not really gaining, and we should revise our figures to give a more accurate picture. I think that the longevity we hear so much about is greatly exaggerated. I know of a man in Saskatchewan who has never been inside a hospital, and although he has not had an easy life he passed his one hundredth birthday last November. But he is an exception—he doesn't ride around in an automobile every day. Honestly, I think the automobile is responsible for a lot of poor health. For instance, a garage nowadays must be part of the house, so that people get up from one soft seat, pass through a door and sit down in another soft seat. If men were to run around a race track more and do less riding in their cars, they probably would live longer.

I wish to take exception to the statement by the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) that members of my party are prophets of gloom. Honourable senators, I would hesitate to try to fill that role completely, but may I point out that the bankers are talking today as they talked in 1929, to the effect that everything is all right, everything is going to be fine. Now, though I hesitate to rock the boat when a storm is coming up, I believe I would be derelict in my duty if I did not call attention to the icebergs and the shoals ahead, and ask the Government: How can our economy maintain its present buoyancy and what is the position of our trade with other countries? Today our trade with the United States of America, our biggest export market, shows an adverse balance of some $750 million.

The honourable senator from Cariboo (Hon. Mr. Turgeon) not very long ago expressed a very fine idea, although I have heard nothing of it lately. He favoured the appointment of a committee of the Senate to inquire into the costs of production in Canada, with a view to lowering our costs in order that our goods might better compete in the export markets.

As I mentioned earlier, we are doing nothing about the important problem of immigration.

We have developed wonderful new medicines and inventions, among which is the H bomb and what-have-you. However, we have not found a satisfactory method of avoiding strikes, which are costly and injurious to good relations between labour and management. An example of this is the current General Motors strike, as a result of which labour has lost some 136 days, with no solution yet in sight. And I may say that a second strike on the railways seems to be threatening.

Surely we can devise some means of avoiding such losses in the productive capacity of our country. The labour unions have contributed some $12 million to $15 million to maintain their fellow-workers who are on strike. If we can settle questions of life and death in our courts we ought to be able to avoid strikes. I am not arguing whether labour is getting enough or too much, but what I do say is that the tying up of industry by strikes is as outmoded as the ox-cart. Yet everyone seems to be fearful of tackling this question. However, we must face it.

Suppose a railway strike were to occur. The province that I represent would be very seriously affected, for it has only one outlet to the sea, through Hudson Bay, which involves a long rail haul. We are entirely dependent on the railways. And I may say in passing that the freight rates have become almost prohibitive.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: May I ask the honourable senator a question, to keep the record straight? Am I right in assuming that you are linking together the question of whether there should or should not be strikes with the suggestion I made about the appointment of a Senate committee to inquire into the factors leading to increased cost of production?

Hon. Mr. Horner: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Well, I would like to say that there is no connection whatever between the two. I did propose that a committee be set up to study the factors tending to increase costs of production, which have caused the loss of export markets, but I had no thought whatever with respect to strikes.

I would like to ask the honourable gentleman another question: I note that a labour group—I think it was the United Steel Workers—suggested just a few days ago that there should be an inquiry by the Gordon Economic Commission into the increase in prices. Would you sooner have a Senate committee or the Gordon Commission do the investigating?

Hon. Mr. Horner: I am not concerned as to that.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Then you are not thinking of linking up the question of strikes with my suggestion?

Hon. Mr. Horner: Otherwise I could not see what would be the object of your suggestion, because strikes certainly add to the cost of producing our goods, and we are at a point where it will become more serious; for if our cost of production is still to go up, how are we going to sell our goods in competition with other countries in the world market?

I would like to refer honourable senators to an article in the Ottawa Journal reporting the warning given to the Gordon Economic Commission by no less a person than James S. Duncan. The heading reads:

MAY PRICE CANADA OUT OF MARKETS

He develops the very argument I am discussing, that we will arrive at that position because of our fewer hours of work and shorter work week. Yet we persist in imagining that we are going to continue to compete in world markets. It is of the utmost importance that Canada maintain a favourable balance of trade, and it is high time that an investigation was made of the cost factors—whether it be by the Gordon Commission or by a committee of the Senate or by the Government, I do not care, but we really should get down to serious business on this whole question or we certainly are going to strike the shoals. We cannot continue in this way.

Let us look at some figures that help to make up the gross national product, which is said to have been of the order of $26 billion in 1955. Now, when we are given employment figures of course they include those persons who are self-employed. I wonder if the gross national product of $26 billion includes all the time sales. I suppose they are included, even though 10 per cent is paid on this and 10 per cent on that, and the rest is paid at so much a month. I may say, honourable senators, that I myself was once in a fix, and, like the man in the parable of the unjust steward, I took my bill for a hundred and "sat down quickly and wrote fifty". I am sure that if certain adjustments—such as omitting to count the unpaid balance on time sales—were made to the gross national product of $26 billion, it might easily be reduced to about $15 billion.

A $15,000 house can be bought with a $500 down-payment. A person can even travel to the Old Country by plane if he will pay down 10 per cent of the fare and agree to pay the balance later. Now, I can understand that there is some security for the balance due when you buy a house, but when you take a trip and come back and disappear in the crowd, I wonder just where the security lies. These are conditions we face today. I could cite the case of Saskatoon. If there is not a great influx of people to this country, what is to become of all the houses which have been built? There are not enough people to occupy them—certainly not to pay for them —and it will be just too bad for some of the present occupants if their salaries should cease.

We in Saskatchewan are concerned about the St. Lawrence Seaway project. It may be that I speak only for myself, but I am doubtful whether the undertaking will be of any benefit to Saskatchewan. It grieves me that valuable land is being inundated and trees, which have taken a century or more to grow, are being torn up by the roots.

I think it is time the Government let us know what the tolls are to be. I wish I had the ease of expression of the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), whose "Toll-gate on the Rhine" was very much in point. But I want to emphasize that the scheme will not result in lowering Saskatchewan freight rates one iota, though possibly Manitoba may benefit. In our province our one reliance is on the use of the Hudson Bay railroad. I am grateful for what has been accomplished on this route, over which, in the past season, about 12 million bushels of grain—the highest amount on record—was shipped. But that is a small fraction of what could be carried on this line. I have said before, and I think the criticism is reasonable, that insurance rates are too rigid. Anyone familiar with western Canada knows that the opening of the spring season may vary as much as four weeks; one year it will be a month earlier than another; but the insurance rates are based on an arbitrary and lengthy period. Today, with airplanes flying all over the area, and all kinds of means available for getting correct information as to weather conditions, this system is entirely wrong. If insurance charges were varied according to climatic conditions, it should be possible to ship via Hudson Bay at least 100 million bushels a year. And should a great part of our total grain exports move in the not too distant future by the Hudson Bay or through Pacific ports, we shall benefit very little from the St. Lawrence route; yet its great power developments, though mainly benefiting Ontario and the eastern provinces, will be very largely paid for, it seems to me, by the grain growers of Saskatchewan. I repeat, it is time to let us know what the toll will be; but no, we are not informed.

The honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) as well as the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) held out no hope of a reduction of taxes. Yet lower taxation, I suggest, is one of Canada's greatest needs,—not in the interest of us old codgers, but for the sake of the younger generation. How is a young man without private means or assistance to raise enough money, on the present scale of taxation, to establish himself on a farm? I maintain that the rate of exemption for single men should be at least $2,000 and for married men $3,000. The ordinary responsible citizen wants to make a home. How is he to do it? With income tax at its present levels, he cannot secure credit. I remember when a man with a good reputation in western Canada could go to the owner of a farm worth $25,000 or $30,000 and arrange to start operations with a very small cash payment. He cannot do that today, for if he does get a crop his income tax is so heavy that he has little left to pay for his land. This is a burning question. If national health insurance is established, taxes will be even higher. So, I maintain, the first thing we need to make Canada prosperous and give our young men a chance is a lowering of taxes.

I admit the needs of defence, but I believe we could save money and have just as efficient an organization if there were not, as I believe there is, waste and extravagance. We hear much about this DEW Line between Labrador and Alaska; personally I doubt whether the country is getting value for the enormous sums of money which have been spent on it. I say, though perhaps with some hesitation, that the fate of the western peoples is being decided elsewhere, and much nearer the equator. May I mention here that I regretted very much to find that the Government, because of its dire need to boost export trade, is adopting the nefarious practices of Sir Basil Zaharoff during the First World War, in shipping arms to one nation and then approaching its opponent and saying, "Your enemy has bought so much; to counteract their purchases you had better buy more." This practice, which provides implements of war to some of the most troubled spots in the world today, is one which, I am sure, is regretted by the Canadian people.

With regard to the criticism of Royal Canadian Mounted Police officers for having dismissed some members of the force, I know nothing of the qualifications of the men concerned, nor of the circumstances of the case. Though I was not satisfied with the explanation of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), there is a regulation that a man must be five years on the force before he can get married "without permission". The provision with regard to permission is, I think, satisfactory, and I do not share the extreme concern which was expressed by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll). After all, a young man away from home, provided with a well-fitting uniform, may, perhaps, be said to need some protection.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Horner: However, the reason put forward by the Honourable Leader of the Government was that the police are subject to being moved about often, to anywhere in the country. That is not a problem today. For instance, missionaries and their wives move to the far north and raise their families with the help of modern conveniences and transportation.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: And move every six months?

Hon. Mr. Horner: That is not the answer. However, in moving about they gain experience that is valuable to them in the carrying out of their work. But there should be no argument as to costs, for the present Government seems delighted to spend money in some ways. The Department of National Defence has moved many Canadian soldiers and their families, some with as many as nine children, to Germany, and have built homes and schools for them there. The regulation forbidding members of the R.C.M.P. to marry until they have served five years is a disciplinary measure. However, a member who has not yet served five years can appeal to his superiors and, under certain circumstances, may be given special permission to marry. So I have no criticism of this regulation.

Honourable senators, I cannot understand why eastern farmers should pay as much as they do for feed grain. A Quebec farmer told me recently that he has to pay $3.50 a hundredweight for a certain grade of wheat, and he said that Ontario farmers pay as high as $58 a ton for screenings. That amazes me because we get very little for it in the west. They also pay about $55 a ton for oats, whereas they should be able to get it for about $2 a hundredweight. The other day my honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Haig) referred to damp wheat, but let me say that the low-grade wheat we had last year is as dry as shot. It could be sent down here and kept for years. It is not damp at all. As a matter of fact, it is just about the finest feed in the world. It is even wholesome for dairy cattle. During a drought in 1919 many farmers began to lose their stock and they started buying wheat straw for feed, paying as much as $20 a load for it. I figured it had little nutritional value, so as soon as the snow melted on the hills I took some pure wheat and spread it over the grassy parts of the ground. Well, we had about a hundred head of cattle and we never lost an animal. They just thrived on the pure wheat. I think a market could be developed in eastern Canada for a great deal of the low-grade wheat that is hindering the movement of higher grades.

Honourable senators, there are many other subjects I would like to deal with but I will leave them until another occasion. I thank you very much for your kind attention to my rambling remarks.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: I should like to ask the honourable senator a question. Did I understand him to say that it was impossible for a farmer to sell his grain anywhere but through the Wheat Board; that there is no other way that a farmer can dispose of it?

Hon. Mr. Horner: I do not know that I said that, for I know that you can sell it to feeders.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: Yes, that is true.

Hon. Mr. Horner: That also means there is not nearly as much wheat stored as is estimated.

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Jodoin, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

MERCANTILE TRUST COMPANY— SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, January 26, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Croll for the second reading of Bill R, an Act to incorporate Mercantile Trust Company.

Hon. Thomas Vien: Honourable senators, I have been requested to draw to your attention the fact that, by a statute of 1952-53 Parliament granted a charter to the Mercantile Bank of Canada, and that charter was repeated in the revision of the Bank Act (Elizabeth II, 1953-54, chapter 48). The bank itself has its head office at Montreal, and other offices at Toronto and Vancouver, and it expects to establish branches elsewhere in a relatively near future. It owns already two subsidiaries, one called Mercantile Estates; the other, Mercantile Estates of British Columbia. The creation of Mercantile Trust Company would certainly cause a lot of confusion. We all know the close relationship that exists between banks and trust companies. Trust companies now exercise many functions similar to those of the banks; they receive deposits, lend money, administer estates, et cetera. If we create a new trust company, it would seem desirable that it be under a different name than that of "Mercantile Trust Company".

The promoters of this company do not now carry on any business in Canada. Had they been established under that name for some time, they might have had a better claim to it. The promoters of the bill are a group of bankers, financiers, and other businessmen from England and elsewhere, planning to launch in Canada a new venture in the form of a trust company. I should think it would be very easy for them to find a name to which less objection could be raised. I shall not oppose the second reading of this bill, but I propose to stress again in committee the point I have just made. In the meantime I invite the promoters of this legislation to give serious consideration to adopting a more appropriate corporate name. If no change in the name is made in committee, then despite my having agreed to the second reading of the bill I shall not consider myself bound to vote for the third reading.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The name is not a principle of the bill, anyway.

Hon. Mr. Vien: No, not the name.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I am inclined to agree with the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Vien). Ever since I first came to this house it has always been regarded as important to see that names of companies do not conflict. It will be remembered that last year it was said that the name of the insurance company seeking incorporation under a certain bill conflicted with the name of another company which had been in existence for some thirty years. Quite properly, that company objected. I saw the strength of its objection, and in committee I moved that another name be substituted. Now, as to the bill before us, I am not opposed to the proposed name at all—I know nothing about it—but I think the proper principle is to be sure that a new name does not conflict with an existing name. I would be very much afraid that it might do that.

As many honourable senators know, confusion often arises because the Royal Bank of Canada controls the Montreal Trust Company and the Bank of Montreal controls the Royal Trust Company. Many a person has said to me, "I want to go to the trust company that is controlled by the Bank of Montreal", and I have replied, "Well, go to the Royal Trust Company". The usual response is: "That is the Royal Bank trust company, isn't it? But I want to go to the Bank of Montreal trust company". So I have to say, "Well, that is the Royal". Then I am asked, "Do you mean to say that the Bank of Montreal is interested in the Royal Trust Company?" And of course my reply is, "Yes, and the Royal Bank is interested in the Montreal Trust Company; that is my information". I have been hoping for years that the two banks would get together and apply to Parliament for a change in the names or their respective companies.

Honourable senators, I will not be bound by any vote taken by this house for the second reading of this bill. I approve of the second reading in so far as the powers of the company are concerned, for I presume they are the same powers as are given to any other trust company, and that the conditions are the same. I just want to mention that, as honourable senators will remember, I opposed the incorporation of the Mercantile Bank, but it has since established itself and opened branches in our largest cities. We should not now incorporate a new company with a similar name.

I think this bill should go to committee and be considered there very carefully. I strongly support the suggestion of the honourable senator from De Lorimier that in committee the sponsors of the bill should be asked to substitute another name so as to avoid conflict.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, I remember that during my first session in the Senate the question of second readings was discussed. I think the rule in the other house was that any objection to the principle of a bill must be taken right at the second reading stage. However, I am informed that in this chamber when a bill is referred to committee it does not follow that we have voted in favour of the principle of the bill. I should like that point cleared up, so that in future I for one may be guided as to whether or not I should raise questions on second reading.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I think perhaps I can clear up the matter raised by the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid). There is a difference between public bills and private bills. When a public bill comes up for second reading, if we vote in favour we are supposed to have approved the bill in principle. That is not the case with a private bill. Under our standing orders a private bill must always be referred to one of the standing committees of this house for examination, and all that we do on second reading is simply to send it on so that it may go through that additional stage, reserving to ourselves complete freedom to examine it in committee and, if necessary, to vote against it there.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Croll, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

COPIES OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE PRIME MINISTER AND CERTAIN PROVINCIAL PREMIERS SUBSEQUENT TO THE LETTER OF THE PRIME MINISTER DATED JANUARY 6, 1956, CONCERNING FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

THE PREMIER
Fredericton
The Government of the Province of New Brunswick

JANUARY, 27, 1956.

Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

My colleagues and I have given careful consideration to the proposals of your Government in respect to its fiscal arrangements with the provinces, as set forth in your letter to me of January 6th last.

It seems to us that these proposals differ from the older tax-rental formulas only in the method of calculating transfer payments. They go very little further in remedial action or in the development of broader principle. They may be somewhat more sensitive and volatile than the formulas based upon Gross National Product, but their ultimate impact upon Federal-Provincial fiscal relations in general must necessarily leave the same problems unsolved—the same inequities perpetuated.

The new federal proposals offer compensation for the lack of taxable capacity in only three tax fields. Other fields, which remain for provincial exploitation and which, in the case of New Brunswick, account for roughly two-thirds of current revenue, are precisely those which reflect and embody the results of unsatisfactory economic conditions over a long period.

Thus, the proposals of your Government make only a very limited attack upon the problem of how best to overcome the serious and, indeed, tragic inability of certain provinces to raise, in tax fields open to them, sufficient revenue to carry out their constitutional responsibilities and to provide a reasonable level of provincial services.

You will remember, Sir, that in my submission to the Conference in October, I stressed the auspicious circumstances which exist, in the Canadian economy, at the present time. It was the earnest contention of our Government in October that full advantage should be taken of what I termed "a magnificent opportunity to achieve long sought national objectives".

Acting on this conviction, our Government submitted a formula which was designed to provide supplementary national adjustment grants for provinces where per capita income fell far below the Canadian average.

In this connection, I wrote you on December 30th, 1955 as follows:

> We are still convinced that a formula similar to the present tax-rental agreement or one based on tax yields should be supplemented by a National Adjustment Grant to those provinces whose per capita personal income is well below the national average, and feel strongly that the suggestion made in our submission to the October meeting was sound and equitable. Our formula would not impose a serious burden on the Federal Treasury. For a comparatively modest outlay the Federal government would really be enabling the poorer provinces to meet their minimum essential responsibilities without imposing on their people an intolerable burden of taxation.

Your proposals of January 6th contain no recognition of the foregoing contentions and, therefore, the Government of New Brunswick must regard them as disappointing and falling far below the national objectives which should be sought and might well be achieved under the present favourable conditions of Canadian development.

It is my opinion that this feeling is shared by all New Brunswick municipalities, who have to carry an ever increasing burden of taxation. Indeed, in our province, I am very much concerned lest municipal taxation may have reached the abnormal proportions, which you so properly view with alarm.

It has seemed to our Government in approaching the whole question of fiscal arrangements, that the language of the Rowell-Sirois Report admirably expressed the objectives with reference to their recommendation concerning adjustment grants. The quotation is taken from Chapter V, Book II, of that report and reads as follows:

> They (adjustment grants) are designed to make it possible for every province to provide for its people services of average Canadian standards and they will thus alleviate distress and shameful conditions which now weaken national unity and handicap many Canadians. They are the concrete expressions of the Commission's conception of a federal system which will both preserve a healthy local autonomy and build a stronger and more united nation.

I was much encouraged by your letter of January 14th, 1955, previous to the convening of the preliminary meeting, to learn that substantially the same goal remained the settled policy of the Government of Canada. Your letter included the following admirable declaration!

> The present government has no intention of abandoning the objective of the tax rental agreements which is to make it financially possible for all the provinces whatever their tax base to perform their constitutional functions themselves and to provide a reasonable Canadian level of provincial services without an abnormal burden of taxation.

We would respectfully submit that the result of the new proposal will be to increase the differences in economic and fiscal capacity among provinces. These differences actually constitute a grave problem in achieving national unity. A majority of provinces will receive slightly more in transfer payments—those which have neglected to impose adequate taxation and have inferior services as a result—those which enjoy rich and broad tax bases with derivative benefit to their services—those which are receiving almost more revenue than they know how to spend—those, like New Brunswick, which suffer from a relatively heavy burden of provincial taxation already and yet are unable to provide an adequate level of services—all will derive revenues from these three taxes and equalization payments on the same basis, (substantially equal amounts per capita), irrespective of their needs.

Our Government is now asked to accept a situation which does practically nothing to relieve the special disabilities under which we have laboured for so long. The formula which we presented to the Conference envisaged transfer payments to our treasury of some ten millions of dollars more than we were receiving annually under the 1952 tax agreements. This amount is based on a realistic appraisal of our minimum requirements, if we are to be able to carry out our constitutional responsibilities. The proposal of your Government will increase payments to New Brunswick by about one million dollars annually, ten percent of our indicated requirements.

This small percentage of the $10,000,000 special adjustment grant envisaged by our formula will not enable us to provide the health and social needs, the educational facilities and services, the public works, the material benefits and cultural advantages—all of which are the birthright of an industrious and enlightened people.

The situation is further complicated for New Brunswick by the fact that we have had to undertake an extensive program of hydroelectric development in order to meet the requirements of an expanding economy. The new mineral resources which have been discovered present opportunities which, wisely and vigorously exploited, could transform our economy, our provincial standard of living and our whole way of life. As you know, officials of your Government have expressed approval of the action taken by New Brunswick in proceeding with the construction of a large hydroelectric plant at Beechwood on the St. John River. In addition the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission must undertake very substantial expenditures on thermal generating plants, transmission lines, storages, and other capital expenditures.

Consideration of New Brunswick's position at the present time will reveal very special circumstances—some of them historic in their implications—others novel and demanding almost immediate solution. We believe that no other province outside the Martimes can be held to be so drastically affected by the results of your Government's decisions during the next few months. The things which need to be done cannot be carried out with our own unaided resources. Yet if they are not done, opportunities for which generations of our people have patiently waited will be lost forever.

To us, Sir, your letter has come as the disappointing culmination of a now long series of meetings and submissions of various kinds, rising eventually to the level of a Federal-Provincial Conference. During this process, the almost tragic suspense of our present provincial situation has been exhaustively explained and documented. Yet, we must infer from your proposals that no consideration is being given to our special needs and responsibilities at this time in our history.

As your letter induces careful thought upon the broadest aspects of Federal-Provincial relations, my colleagues and I once more request that consideration be given to the special awards which were made as a result of the Duncan and White Commissions in 1927 and 1935 respectively. One of the basic reasons for the adjustments made by these bodies was the recognition that the Maritime provinces had never received—nor had any prospect of receiving—any accessions to their areas at Confederation. No other provinces were partners in federal union under similar conditions—hence, special awards of compensation were provided under the Royal Commissions referred to. In the language of the White Commission report, page 17:

> We feel we can only deal with the claim as to public lands added to other provinces in enlargement of their original boundaries in a broad general way giving it equitable consideration as a factor of importance to be taken into account in reaching conclusions on the whole question of a just revision of subsidies as between the Maritime Provinces and the Dominion.

As stated at the Conference in October, it is our contention that the Duncan and White awards demand revision in the light of changes in the value of money and in the Canadian economy, and in recognition of our interest in the fabulous wealth which has been discovered in the Northlands. These now form a part of various provinces but were originally a portion of, or were acquired by, the Canada of Confederation into which New Brunswick came as a partner in 1867.

In view of all the foregoing facts and with the seriousness of our New Brunswick situation very much in mind, we respectfully request that the Dominion-Provincial Conference be reconvened in order that we may again present our case for special consideration.

Yours sincerely,

HUGH JOHN FLEMMING.

Quebec, January 26, 1956.

The Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent,
P.C., Q.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. St. Laurent:

I have noted this afternoon the contents of your letter of January 20 in reply to mine of the 18th of the same month.

Accordingly, Mr. Georges Shink, Q.C., our Comptroller of Provincial Revenue, has been informed of the change in the date of the meeting in question.

Yours sincerely,

M. L. DUPLESSIS.

Dear Mr. Duplessis:

I wish to thank you for your letter of January 18th which I received this morning. I am informing the Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr. Taylor, that a representative of the Province of Quebec will attend the meeting of the committee of officials.

I understand that those concerned were informed yesterday that the meeting will take place February 2nd rather than February 6th.

Yours sincerely,

The Rt. Hon. Louis S. St-Laurent,
P.C., Q.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. St. Laurent:

Your letter of January 6th was delivered to my office on the 9th of the same month. The considerable increase in work resulting from the Session of Parliament at Quebec and an absence of a few days have prevented me from answering before today.

You state in your letter: "It would, I think, be useful to have our committee of officials meet as early in February as possible to clarify the technical details of these proposals."

I gather that this meeting will be held in Ottawa on February 6th next, and the representative of the Province of Quebec will be pleased to attend. It seems to me very definitely that it is absolutely necessary for us to know details of the proposals which are to be clarified and defined in order to thoroughly appreciate these proposals.

May I assure you, Mr. Prime Minister, that it is our earnest desire to co-operate amicably with the federal authorities towards the settlement of federal-provincial fiscal relations within the framework of the full respect of the rights and privileges of the federal and provincial governments.

Yours sincerely,

M. L. DUPLESSIS.

My dear Premier:

While we did have an opportunity to discuss in my office last week your letter of January 12, which dealt with the subject of fiscal relations, nevertheless, I am confident that you would wish to have a formal acknowledgment of your communication for your records.

Mr. Harris, of course, is considering the matters raised in your letter and, as you suggested, some of the subjects will be discussed by the officials of our two governments.

I should like to express once more my pleasure at having had the opportunity of a personal meeting with you.

PROVINCE OF NOVA SCOTIA
The Premier

Halifax JANUARY 12th, 1956.

My dear Prime Minister:

I and my colleagues have considered the proposal of the Federal Government with respect to Federal-Provincial fiscal arrangements as set out in your letter of January 6th, and I should like to state briefly a few observations relating to:

(a) the objectives to be attained by such arrangements;
(b) the extent to which the tax rental agreements attained these objectives; and
(c) the extent to which the present Federal proposal may be expected to attain these objectives.

Perhaps it would not be unfair to say that the stated objectives of the Federal Government, relative to Federal-Provincial fiscal arrangements, are:

(a) to establish a more equitable system of taxation throughout Canada by reducing duplication of direct taxation and of machinery for the collection of direct taxes;
(b) to give a greater measure of stability to the revenues of the provinces in order to enable them more adequately to carry out their responsibilities;
(c) to enable Canada, with the co-operation of provincial governments, to carry out fiscal and other national policies intended to maintain high levels of employment and production, and
(d) to make it financially possible for all provinces, whatever their tax base, to perform their constitutional functions themselves and to provide a reasonable Canadian level of provincial services without an abnormal burden of taxation.

I can certainly agree, without reservation, with these statements of the objectives of the Federal Government. For this reason, therefore, I suggest that we must examine any fiscal arrangements which relate to provincial revenues with a view to ascertaining the degree to which such arrangements will attain these stated objectives, and particularly those contained in clauses (b) and (d) above.

As I stated on October 3rd of last year, the tax rental agreements, partially achieved the objectives of the Federal Government, but failed to fully achieve the objectives because of the fact that some provinces were and are able to raise from within their provinces revenues greatly in excess of the amount which can be raised in some of the less favoured provinces. I do not wish to repeat my argument, so I shall simply state that in my view a lasting solution to the problems of the provinces of Canada will only be found in an arrangement which will approach, in greater measure than at present, the provision of more equal per capita revenues from all sources, thus enabling a given province to discharge its constitutional responsibilities and furnish to its people what has been called a Canadian level of essential Government services.

The present proposal in essence does not approach this objective any more nearly than do the existing tax rental agreements. Indeed, one might observe that it differs from the tax rental agreements only in that:

(a) it substitutes the per capita yield in the two highest provinces from three fields of taxation for the gross national product; and
(b) it provides for an "equalization payment" to each province which falls below the average, whether or not that province chooses to vacate the three tax fields.

In principle it gives no greater recognition to the fiscal needs of the provinces than did the tax rental agreements. I wish to impress upon you that the Federal proposal compensates for lack of tax potential in only three fields of taxation and leaves the less favoured provinces (as do the tax rental agreements) with a per capita rate from local sources of taxation far below the national average. Unless some greater recognition is given to the inability of some provinces to raise something approaching the national average per capita yield from sources other than the three broad fields, the avowed Federal objective of making it financially possible for all the provinces, whatever their tax base, to perform their constitutional function themselves and to provide a reasonable Canadian level of provincial services will not be attained.

In my opinion, it may even be that the Federal proposal will not result in a more equitable system of taxation throughout Canada, and it may not even reduce duplication of direct taxation or the machinery for the collection of direct taxes to as great an extent as do the present tax rental agreements. Duplication of direct taxation will be completely eliminated only if all the provinces undertake to vacate all three tax fields. It could very well be that one province would wish to retain personal income tax, another corporation tax, another succession duties and another all three fields. In those provinces which retain one or more of the tax fields, there may well be a variety of rates either above or below the rates which the Federal Government will allow as a deduction from the Federal tax.

If, therefore, your letter of January 6th finally sets forth the position of the Federal Government with respect to Federal-Provincial arrangements relating to these three tax fields, it would be my hope that in some other way consideration might still be given to the position of this and some other provinces, as urged by myself and several other provincial Premiers during the October meeting.

I am somewhat disappointed that no way was found to give a guarantee of the continuation of Federal-Provincial fiscal arrangements beyond a five-year period for, whether the arrangements finally adopted are ideally suited to a given province or not, it is still important that the Government of any province can rely on the continuation of an existing arrangement for a period greater than five years, at least insofar as minimum benefits are concerned. I do note, however, that the numbered paragraph 2 of your proposal provides for a minimum payment during the continuance of the arrangement. Insofar as it is possible for me to judge summarily, this would seem to be an improvement over the provisions in the existing agreements for guaranteed minimum payments.

There are a number of minor points relating to these arrangements which will require clarification and further discussion, and officials of the Government of Nova Scotia will be ready to go to Ottawa as early in February as your officials may wish in order to consider these details. Perhaps even before that time, however, it would be helpful to have some clarification of the significance of the numbered paragraph 5 in your letter. I confess I am unable to determine the intentions of the Federal authorities from a reading of this paragraph.

Further to all the foregoing, I find that I shall be in Ottawa on Thursday and Friday, January 19th and 20th, and if convenient to you I would appreciate very much the opportunity of calling on you during that time. Some time on Friday the 20th would be most convenient with my other commitments, but I shall take the liberty of contacting your office when I arrive in Ottawa and will be glad to accommodate my schedule to your convenience if it is possible for you to see me.

Yours sincerely,

HENRY D. HICKS.

Dear Mr. St. Laurent:

I wish to thank you for your letter of January 6, 1956, outlining the proposal of the Government of Canada for a Federal-Provincial fiscal arrangement for the five years from April 1, 1957 to March 31, 1962.

Please be assured that this proposal will be given our most careful consideration, and I shall be in communication with you later.

Concerning the proposed meeting of the Committee of Technical Officers to clarify details, I feel confident that the early part of February will be satisfactory.

Sincerely yours,

Ottawa, January 18, 1956

The Honourable T. C. Douglas,
Premier of Saskatchewan,
Regina, Sask.

My dear Premier,

I wish to acknowledge your letter of January 11th, 1956, regarding federal-provincial fiscal arrangements.

I have carefully noted your comments on the proposal put forward by the Federal government and I will discuss them with my colleagues at the first opportunity. It seems to me too early at this stage to decide whether or not it would be desirable and useful to reconvene the Federal-Provincial Conference. Our next step should be for our Committee of officials to meet in the near future and I have noted with satisfaction that you agree with this suggestion. Mr. K. W. Taylor has already communicated with your representative on the Committee to fix a date for that meeting.

Yours sincerely,
L. S. ST. LAURENT.

PREMIER'S OFFICE

REGINA, January 11th, 1956.

The Rt. Hon. L. S. St. Laurent, Q.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Prime Minister:

Further to my letter of January 9th, my colleagues and I have had an opportunity to examine the proposal regarding Federal-Provincial fiscal arrangements contained in your letter of January 6th.

While there are technical questions which may require clarifications before we can measure their full implication, it seems to us that the proposal contained in your letter is similar in almost every respect to that which you placed before the Federal-Provincial conference on October 3rd. You will recall that your Government emphasized that it was advancing a new approach to Dominion-Provincial fiscal arrangements, and that the terms and statistical data provided at the Conference were to be regarded merely as illustrative of this new approach. It was indicated that the final arrangements would be worked out in consultation with the provinces, and to that end you invited the provincial Premiers to express their views both as to the principles and the terms which you had outlined. Your letter of January 6th indicates that your Government is now advancing a concrete plan, from which it is apparent that the representations put forward by the various provinces at the Conference and in subsequent correspondence have been rejected.

I would like to draw your attention to two points in particular to which a number of provinces have made reference. First, the standard rates put forward at the Conference for illustrative purposes would not result in the urgently needed improvement of the financial position of the provinces. The offer of an additional one-half percentage point of taxable corporation income represents no perceptible step toward this necessary objective. This is particularly so in view of the fact that no fiscal need grants are to be made available. Second the illustrative rates did not place sufficient emphasis on the imputed yields from personal income taxes relative to those from corporation income taxes, and it was very strongly urged that steps should be taken to correct this situation. Instead, your Government has increased the emphasis on taxes from corporation profits.

I feel that the objection which I voiced against your illustrative proposals applies also to your present proposal, namely the weakening of the Federal Government's control over fiscal policy by providing incentives for certain provinces to remain aloof from the tax rental agreements. I find that the same guaranteed minimum is available to all provinces whether or not they enter into a tax rental agreement. Also I find that insufficient weight is being given to the principle of fiscal need which we have always considered basic to any tax rental agreement designed to give equal treatment and opportunity to all Canadians.

The Saskatchewan Government believes that the effects of this proposal are so far reaching that the Federal-Provincial Conference should be reconvened to discuss this important matter. Most of the provincial legislatures will in all probability have completed their sessions by the first week in April. I would therefore like to urge that you give consideration to the advisability of reconvening the Conference some time during the month of April. It would, of course, be useful if our technical officials could meet prior to such a conference but I am doubtful of the value of a meeting held early in February since it is unlikely that the Federal budget will have been brought down by that date.

You will appreciate the fact that your 1956 budget could have an effect upon the tax structure which might seriously alter any computations which have been made regarding the tax potential on which the tax rental agreements would be based.

I would like to suggest that the Premiers of the various provinces be approached to see if they are desirous of having the Federal-Provincial Conference reconvened in April. Insofar as the Saskatchewan Government is concerned, we would welcome such a meeting especially if it could be preceded by a meeting of our officials in order to discuss any points in your proposal which might require clarification.

Yours sincerely,

T. C. DOUGLAS.

WHEAT

INTERIM PAYMENT BY WHEAT BOARD

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, today in the House of Commons the Right Honourable the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a statement with respect to an interim payment on certain grades of wheat delivered in the crop year 1954-55. As this is a subject in which all honourable senators are interested, and some particularly so, I thought the house might like me to make a similar statement at this time.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: This is the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

The Canadian Wheat Board has recommended and the Government today decided to authorize the Board to make an interim payment in varying amounts on the higher grades of wheat delivered during the crop year 1954-55. The cheques will be mailed to producers as soon as they can be calculated and issued, probably about February 15.

The interim payment will be 10 cents per bushel on One, Two, Three and Four Northern and Number Four Special, including toughs and damps of those grades; 5 cents per bushel on Garnets; 25 cents per bushel on No. 1 to 4 Durums; 10 cents per bushel on lower grades of Durum; 10 cents per bushel on Soft White Springs; and 5 cents per bushel on certain minor grades. A full schedule of the payments will be issued by the Wheat Board in the customary way.

The total amount to be distributed to producers in this interim payment will be $22,300,000.

Returns from the sale of feeding grades of wheat do not justify an interim payment on No. 5, 6 and Feed Wheat. The minister believes, however, that it will be possible to make a final payment on these grades when the pool is closed.

A final payment on the 1954-55 wheat pool account must await approval of the legislation—which is at present before the House of Commons and will come to this house in due course—with respect to the assumption of carrying charges on excessive Wheat Board stocks as well as reduction in the size of this account to a level which would enable the balance to be transferred to the 1955-56 account.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I move that when the house adjourns today it stand adjourned until Monday, February 6, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, seconded by Hon. Mr. Croll, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Mariana B. Jodoin: Honourable senators, I will speak in my native tongue; but I trust that all my colleagues—English-speaking as well as French-speaking—will share my hopes for the improvement of the working-woman's standard of living.

(Translation):

I would like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the honourable senators from De la Durantaye and Toronto-Spadina, who gave us a most interesting review of the present government's achievements and of the legislation announced in the speech from the throne, which it intends to have passed during this session.

One of the measures which attracted my particular attention—no doubt because, being a woman, I am keenly interested in social security in Canada—has to do with the well-being of women and their homes.

Statistics show that during 1955, 125,000 housing units were built under the National Housing Act. The fact that these new houses were built is proof that our government is rendering tremendous services to the Canadian people. However, I would like to draw the authorities' attention to the lot of a certain class of people who cannot own their own homes. I mean female civil servants, widows or single women who, for reasons which are no concern of ours or through lack of sufficient income, are unable even with the help of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to build themselves a home of their own, where they may live in peace, without fear of being evicted by the landlord for reasons which they are not even allowed to discuss. At the present time there are from 13,000 to 14,000 women working for the Canadian government in Ottawa. I would like our leaders to consider the possibility of allowing these civil servants to make a home for themselves. Is it not quite legitimate for every adult to look forward to the day when he may have his own home.

Hundreds of women living in rooms are in constant fear of having their rent increased or of having to vacate. Honourable senators, they should be helped to find a home where they could rest in peace and security after their day's work.

"Much happiness can be found in a few square feet" says an author. And he adds:

> The home should represent the fulfilment of a dream which each one of us, sometimes unconsciously, harbours in his mind, until conditions permit that dream to come true.

With leave, honourable senators, I would like to suggest to the Minister of Public Works some way of solving this problem, which I have discussed with a great many people who are interested in social security. It seems to me that the problem could be settled in the following manner.

1. It should be possible to build suitable 2- to 4-room housing units (co-operative style) for women civil servants who are single or who live alone; such housing units should be located, if possible, near the government buildings where they work.

2. The Government would provide the following technical assistance:

(a) Plans drawn up by any architect it chose;

(b) The necessary loans from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation;

(c) Construction of the building by government experts;

(d) Management of such buildings, including heating and general maintenance.

3. Such housing units would be sold to women civil servants who, in return, would agree, as owners of the apartments, to pay water tax and cost of electricity.

4. The units would be purchased by means of a down payment followed by monthly instalments until the sale price is fully paid up. The buyer of such a housing unit would become its owner for life and would be responsible for its upkeep and, moreover, could sell it if need be.

That is the plan which I would submit to the Government, the details of which, naturally, would have to be drawn up by experts: they should include such features as built-in furniture, common laundry facilities with automatic washing machines, etc. Roughly, it would be a co-operative organization, somewhat similar to the Laurentian Terrace on Sussex Street, Ottawa. But in this case, the occupant of the apartment could eventually become its owner. After consulting several women civil servants, I am convinced that such a scheme would be enthusiastically received.

It might be claimed that the Government would thereby compete with building contractors. But is not the Government this country's largest employer? Why should it not help its employees as does industry? I am quite sure that under such conditions these women, free from worries in regard to housing, would render better service. The project is necessary because rents are prohibitive throughout Canada.

The Government is anxious to improve public health and hygiene by clearing slums, which are a source of trouble. Why not replace them with housing units acceptable to civil servants?

It is the duty of any Government to see to the welfare of its employees and their families—and a happy home helps to increase efficiency. All the provinces could co-operate in such a project, but as Ottawa is the headquarters of the civil service, the federal Government could quite properly take the lead here in Ottawa.

If this suggestion were implemented, the housing units should be built near the most important government buildings, such as those of the Bureau of Statistics, the National Research Council, the Printing Bureau, the embassies, etc. What a comfort for these employees if they did not have to go to work miles away from home.

Would not such a plan also help to solve the traffic problem?

The Honourable Paul Martin, Minister of National Health and Welfare, once said:

> Co-operation is much more than a means of doing business. It is a way of life which takes into account the welfare of the individual and the welfare of the community.

It was Pope Pius XII who wrote:

> Housing is one of the vital needs of man; therefore, every human being has the right to own a home.

In 1954, Dr. Frank A. Calderone, attached to the World Health Organization, one of the United Nations' specialized agencies, invited several governments to recognize that the moral health of their employees is just as important as their physical well-being.

It would therefore seem, honourable senators, that in providing the comfort of a peaceful home to those who all day long spend their physical energy on a difficult task, we are helping to protect the whole nation's welfare. By so doing, the federal Government would be taking a concrete step towards solving the housing problem and in a much more effective way than would be open to any private enterprise.

Honourable senators, I trust the plan I have submitted to help women civil servants will meet with your approval.

(Text):

In conclusion, honourable senators, I wish to thank you most sincerely for your kind attention to my remarks.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Joseph A. Bradette: Honourable members of the Senate,—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Bradette: First of all, I feel that congratulations are due to the honourable senator from Sorel (Hon. Mrs. Jodoin) for the ideas she has propounded. I think her fine speech certainly deserves consideration by both houses of Parliament.

I shall say a few words in French following these preliminary remarks in English, as did my good friend the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot), with whom I had the honour to sit in the House of Commons for 26 consecutive years. I was not surprised when in his speech he made reference to his request for a highway for vehicles on the Quebec bridge from the honourable member from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar), who at the time was a minister of the Government. From my own experience every request the honourable senator has ever made to a minister has always been so logical and persistent that it has been granted. As we all know, during several years he pressed for a better railway station for Riviere du Loup, and he got it, even though a Conservative Government was in office.

Some hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

(Translation):

Hon. Mr. Bradette: I would like to congratclate my honourable friend, the senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot), upon the well-deserved honour conferred upon him when he was called to the Upper House. I would also like to say how much I appreciated the excellent speech he made in moving the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

I also wish to offer my sincerest congratulations to my other new colleagues in this house. I am sure that the able service they will render Canada will bring universal recognition and appreciation.

(Text):

I wish to offer my congratulations also to the honourable senator who seconded the motion for the Address, (Hon. Mr. Croll), whom I have had the honour to know for many years. We who live in Northern Ontario have followed him in his accomplishments very closely, first when he became Mayor of the city of Windsor, later when he went into provincial politics and held a responsible post in the Hepburn cabinet, and more recently when he served in the federal field. As a member of the House of Commons he did a great deal of committee work and made some very enlightening speeches. We all realized that we had in him a very able parliamentarian. At times some of my colleagues would say to me, "Dave Croll is almost a radical." My reply always was, "Dave Croll is a true Canadian and a man of vision; he is a Liberal—with a capital L." The senator is a great humanitarian, and is very familiar with labour problems. In his lifetime he has accomplished much for labour both in the province of Ontario and elsewhere. He has been a bona fide missionary in that great cause, and even if his views conflicted with those of some other persons, for the most part his efforts produced good results and his ideas prevailed.

I should also like to say a few words about the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power), with whom I had the honour to be a deskmate in the other house. We all know and appreciate the great work he did as Minister of Defence for Air during the recent war. He was an inspiration to the Canadian people and its allied nations. The demands of his post were heavy, and although he seemed to work day and night the members of the House of Commons had access to him at all reasonable times. The honourable senator could have remained longer in the cabinet, but he chose to be true to his own ideals. When he resigned his cabinet post I am sure the vacuum which his leaving created was felt by the Opposition members as well as the Government. And when he was summoned to the Senate everyone realized that the Commons had lost a man of great talent, energy and sincerity. I would add one further observation: the senator from Gulf is a great orator and debater; he was one of the few members of the House of Commons who could hold his own against the late Viscount Bennett when he was Prime Minister.

I take this opportunity to congratulate the Government upon the fine choices it made for the new appointees to the Senate. I can assure you that the selection of senators, like the election of members to the other house, is not a mere matter of chance or accident: in every case persons who receive these honours are eminently qualified to discharge the responsibilities placed upon them.

One frequently reads in the press that members of the Senate do not properly represent various segments of public opinion. This is not true. For instance, the farmers are well represented here: As proof, one had only to listen to the able speech made by the senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner), in which he dealt with the problems of the farmer in a masterly way and as one who is intimately associated with those problems. For myself, I learned more about the wheat question from his speech than I have gathered from reading the newspapers over the past six weeks. The professions are ably represented in this house, as are the newspapers, finance and industry. In a word, this body is composed of people from all walks of life, and the accusation by the press that all segments of society are not represented is, I repeat, not true. I am sure anyone who takes time to study the background of honourable senators will concur heartily in what I have said. May I make a personal reference? After having been a member of the House of Commons for 26 years I was appointed to the Senate, and one day in the Post Office in my home town of Cochrane I heard two men who had opposed me in my elections talking about my appointment. One of them said, "Do you realize that Old Joe has been appointed to the Senate? I don't know how that happened". Let me state here that, although I am getting along in years, had I felt I was unable to fulfil the obligations that my appointment carried, I never would have accepted it. I believe that is the attitude taken by all members of the Senate.

I listened with great interest and pleasure to the speech of the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) in this debate. He has a regal presence, and it has long been my view that what he has to say is worthy of close attention. He carries his years lightly and is fulfilling in a most capable way an important post in the political life of Canada. The public must of necessity be made aware of the excellent job being done by members of the Senate, and in particular by the Leader of the Opposition.

My remarks on the Speech from the Throne will be short. I would not dare to enter into a discussion about the wheat question; I leave that to the members from the west, because for an easterner it is a dangerous subject to embark on. I have some few comments to make about inflation. In this connection I should like to compliment the Government for what it has done over the past eighteen months in an attempt to curtail spending and halt inflation. I know that pensioners and other people with fixed incomes fully realize that the Canadian dollar today does not have the value it had in 1939. It is shocking to read, for instance, that in the United States some $24 billion worth of cars have been bought on credit, and that instalment buying involves a total of almost $84 billion. The dangerous effect of such credit buying on inflation is readily apparent to all.

I well recall that in my early days in the House of Commons I was seated next to Mr. Parent, then the member for Gatineau. One day he said to me "Joe, I could sign a cheque to you today for $2 million, and it would be honoured by the bank." I replied "Are you satisfied?" He said "No, I want to get $4 million." Eighteen months later, during the depression, he was wiped out through dealings on the stock exchange. The possibility of inflation leading to a depression is one of the things that it is the duty of the Government to warn against and if possible to prevent. In fact, the United States Government has foreseen the danger. No doubt everyone of us was astonished at the effect that the news of Mr. Eisenhower's recent illness had on the economic situation as reflected by stock prices in the United States—a loss of over $24 billion in the value of securities listed on various stock exchanges. That just goes to show how sensitive the economic situation is. Incidentally, no one can make me believe that anyone can become wealthy or independent solely by speculation—it has never been done, it is not being done and it will not be done tomorrow.

The subject that I want to deal with at length this afternoon is one that has been of great importance in Canada and the United States ever since the first European came to the shores of this country. The subject is immigration. I want to speak about it in an objective and constructive way, for to my mind the subject is so important that politics should never be allowed to enter into it, and if during the course of my talk today I do make some political references they will not be made for purposes of criticism.

My section of the country, northern Ontario, is part of what is known as central Canada. We do not belong to the east nor to the west. Geographically speaking, we are in central Canada, and in our outlook on questions we always take a national viewpoint. We know the mayors of Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver, on the one hand; and those of Montreal, Ottawa, Moncton, Halifax and Saint John on the other; and we receive newspapers from those cities. So, you can readily see that we try to develop a broad view of problems affecting any of these centres. For instance, when we hear of Maritime rights we listen to what anybody has to say on that subject, and we listen not only seriously but sympathetically. We want to know what the thoughts and aspirations of the people in that part of the country are; and we support them in their grievances. And when we hear about the problems of the western provinces our reaction is similar.

We belong to a section of the country that in the years 1921 to 1931 had a greater agricultural development than any other section of Canada, and we have had thrust upon us various schemes of immigration, colonization and settlement. We belong to the northern Ontario clay belt which is very closely connected to the western provinces, although ours is a timbered country. It also is a section rich in potentialities, in all kinds of resources. When my father and our family moved there, in 1908, there were only a few fur traders' posts in that whole area, and very few places where the Indians would call, mainly on the Abitibi and the Lowbush Rivers. That part of northern Ontario lying between Fort William and North Bay contains three-quarters of a million people and the population is still growing. Sometimes newspaper articles dealing with the proposed pipe line across northern Ontario to Kapuskasing say it is to be built by the Government across this section because that is barren land. That statement is wrong.

There are great potentialities in that part of the country. I predict, however, that the population per square mile will never be a dense one. In that section of the country during the last forty years, besides the opening of the silver camp at Cobalt, which the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) knows so well, we have had the opening of the Porcupine gold district, the Kirkland Lake gold district and the Sudbury nickel and copper section and many other sections containing silver and copper.

We have also immense forest reserves in that section, but I must say again, as I said the first time I spoke in this august assembly, that our resources are not unlimited. They are limited even in northern Ontario, as they are in many parts of Canada where we have been very prodigal and very wasteful of them. And surely the time has come, and must be with us now, when we should husband our natural resources, whether they be of the forest, or mineral, or water powers, or any other kind of resources.

Since I have been in public life I have visited every section of our country—for many years as a fur-trader in the James Bay and Hudson Bay sections—and I know something about our large areas that extend up to the Arctic seas. I do not need to say that Canada is among the largest countries in the world. It comprises nearly 4 million square miles, and with a population of about 16 million that means a density of almost 4.5 people per square mile.

The argument has often been made that we should bring in immigrants to fill up our open spaces. But in dealing with most of the so-called open spaces we must be realists. We have nothing to lose by being so. There will always remain vast open spaces; one-third—yes, even two-thirds—of them will always remain that way.

I would like to see some of the proponents of schemes to colonize these open spaces try to live there for a year on their own, try to make a living there. They would soon find out that it is impossible to do so. Honourable senators, we must be realists in this, as far as immigration is concerned; and there is no really good reason for ignoring the facts. If we could slide this country of ours 1,500 miles to the south the situation would be entirely different. Not being able to do that, of course, we must accept matters as they are.

Canada has a healthy but a cold climate. That is a feature which amazes all Europeans who come to this country without having been previously informed of conditions here. But most newcomers soon grow to like the weather. In my opinion we should capitalize on our good climate; we should make people aware that it is just as healthy here in winter as in other sections of the world. I know of people who spend some time in Florida or California during the winter months and who, when they come back to Canada, have to be very careful not to contract pneumonia and colds, on account of the change in weather.

However, honourable senators, we must be realistic and frank to admit that a cold country is never densely populated. No doubt some who are listening to me have visited the Scandinavian countries, such as Norway and Sweden, which, although prosperous, have not a dense population. I say that if prospective immigrants are fully informed about our climate before they come here they will accept it. Our climate appeals to the strong and the young.

No doubt we all are aware of what is called the Precambrian shield on which my section of northern Ontario is superimposed. Well, honourable senators, there is in that vast mass of rock a treasure that any country in the world would like to have. However, to wrest that treasure from the earth a challenge must be met. I think it is a challenge for the provincial government to meet, not alone but in co-operation with the federal Government, by giving opportunities to prospectors, promoters and others willing to make sacrifices to open up the north. Jacques Cartier, one of the first men who saw this section of Canada, which comprises over 2 million square miles, reported to the King of France, "There is not a cartload of earth in the whole of it." Most of it is barren land—one cannot get away from that fact—but a provident Nature has liberally supplied the area with great bodies of ore, not only gold and silver, but lead, iron and other metals. So, although the population will never be dense, when this section is adequately developed the population immediately to the south, including Toronto, Montreal and other industrial centres, will immediately benefit.

Canada is an immense country, larger in area than the United States. I personally believe that, when our land is fully developed —not tomorrow, not in 10 or even 50 years, but eventually—it will support a population of 100 to 150 million.

All honourable senators have heard about the iron ores of Ungava. What a challenge was there to Canadian enterprise. I personally know Mr. Jules Timmins. He is a nephew of Mr. Noah Timmins. He and other men who accumulated money were ready to risk it on what was then a gamble; and what obstacles they had to surmount! Mr. Timmins told me that at one time it seemed impossible, because of muskeg and lowland, to bring the steel to that great body of ore. It needed all the ingenuity of engineers and others versed in the problems involved to build a railway right up to the Ungava field, which is now being operated.

At the present time there are new and promising developments in Newfoundland and the Maritimes. We are all very glad to learn of the discovery of important bodies of ore, whose exploitation will help those fine provinces to retain more of their population. Similar progress is being made elsewhere. We read of new discoveries in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, and of the great development at Kitimat, in British Columbia, which was a great challenge not only to financiers but to the inventive faculties of the human mind. It required their close co-operation to make a success of the venture. We also learned with great satisfaction that important interests in the British Isles were ready and willing to spend between 50 and 75 million dollars in preparing a magnificent site near Vancouver for future industries in British Columbia. The courageous acceptance of these challenges is bound to benefit not only those who provide the money, but the country from which they happen to come, and most certainly our own.

I am in favour of immigration, but within proper limits, because if unrestricted it can result in much hardship and suffering. I have seen this happen, for instance, when people from the British Isles were sent for colonization purposes, in the dead of winter, to the clay belt of northern Ontario. All of them were fine, rugged people. I recall in particular the case of one family. The husband was a fine type of man. The wife looked like a queen; she came from a well-to-do English family, and she brought along her jewellery and other valuables. This couple were located in a settlement 12 miles east of Cochrane, in the month of February, when the land was under several feet of snow, and for some weeks the temperature fell as low as 35 degrees below zero. They tried to make a living, but it was impossible; the handicaps were too heavy. Had they been told beforehand of the situation they would never have gone there, and certainly they should never have been allowed to go there in the winter months. Eventually, however, they moved to Cochrane, where they invested in a hotel. They are now making a good income and their children live in Ottawa and are doing well.

I mention these matters because I want to impress on the officials of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration that intending immigrants should be fully informed about the situation in the areas to which they propose to move, before they leave their own country, and be properly prepared to meet it —if necessary, with the help of the federal and provincial governments. After the last war the Government of Ontario decided to bring to that province a large number of people from the British Isles. The idea was a good one, but the federal Government was not ready to participate. The provincial authorities chartered some private planes with a view of transporting to Ontario, I believe, between 25,000 and 50,000 people. But there was no proper or adequate housing accommodation for those who arrived; and, though at the time no serious depression existed, some of the newcomers were unable to find employment. It is impossible to deal with these matters without full knowledge and adequate preparation, because we are dealing with human beings, and though they are willing to play the game, they must be given a fair chance to play it, and not be subjected to deceptions.

The problem of Canada's population is usually discussed in terms of anywhere from 20 million to 60 million people. It is all right to talk in that way, and discussions about immigration are desirable. My own view is that the country could easily absorb under normal circumstances between 150,000 and 200,000 immigrants per year; but such a policy must be carried out in ways which are fair to our own people and to those whom we invite to come here. In this relation I will quote the figures of births in Canada—excluding the Yukon and Northwest Territories—and for the past three years:

1953	416,825

It may be assumed that in the next three years the birth rate in Canada will reach between 500,000 and 600,000 annually.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Has the honourable senator the death rate figures?

Hon. Mr. Bradette: No, I have not. But it will be readily seen that we can maintain an influx of between 150,000 and 200,000 immigrants to sustain and enlarge the economy of this country, without creating any commotion or causing hardship to anybody. Our record as regards immigration has not been a bad one. The Liberal party, during its terms of office prior to 1939, carried on a policy under which a substantial number of immigrants were admitted every year. From January 1, 1946 to September 30, 1955, 1,198,980 people came into this country. I repeat that this is not a bad record. There are those who advise us to take note of Australia, which, with a smaller population than ours, is attracting more people from abroad than we are. But it must not be forgotten that at present the problem of properly integrating one million newcomers among 9 million Australians is producing, I will not say troubles, but problems which have to be faced.

Around 40 years ago the basis of Canadian immigration was the settlement of the prairies or employment on the farms. That field is now pretty fully occupied, and, in any event, it is my experience that the average immigrant, even though admitted on an undertaking to remain at least a year or two on the land, and although he has signed on the dotted line, will not stay there more than two or three months if he can help it. It may be said that there is a crisis in Canadian agriculture at the present time. One has only to read such pronouncements as that of Dr. R. Campbell, which appeared in a Canadian Press dispatch of January 7:

> Prof. Dr. R. Campbell, head of the Ontario Agricultural College's economics department, said in a lecture to marketing and co-operating students that low-income farmers should be encouraged to take jobs in cities.

I am not questioning the professor's sincerity, but I do not agree with him. If the groups he has in mind were to leave the rural districts and go to the industrial areas of Ontario, such a crisis would result that even that rich province would not be able to deal with it alone.

The families of the original settlers in northern Ontario still have holdings there but the young people went to work in the newsprint mills and the mines. We endeavoured to bring some Dutch people to farm in our part of the country but we could keep only a few of them. Many of them moved to the Toronto area, where they became successful in agriculture and business. Actually we are faced with the same situation that confronted us some 30 years ago in the matter of immigration.

A short time ago, Ontario's fine Premier, Mr. Frost, appeared before the Gordon Commission and predicted that within 20 years Ontario would have a population of some 8 million. But he warned that in order to provide adequate services for the increased population Ontario would have to call on the federal Government for assistance. Some people seem to think that if Canada's population were suddenly increased to, say, 20 million, all our problems would be over with, that we would have very little income tax to pay, that our railway problem would disappear, and so on. Well, it just doesn't work that way, because increased population brings its own problems which must be met, and they are getting more and more complicated all the time.

An alarming aspect of our immigration problem is the steady flow of our citizens, both old and new, to the United States. Living as we do in close proximity to that great country, we can understand its magnetic attraction for many of our people. I could not get statistics on the number of people who have left Canada to take up residence in the United States during the past ten years, but on the basis of available figures we do know that between 1921 and 1931 there came to be known what was called the "missing million" in our population. In other words, by 1931 there should have been a million more people in Canada. Our population, having regard to births, deaths, and immigrants, should have been over 11,234,392, but actually it was only 10,376,786. Taking into account those who had returned to Canada from the United States, something like a million people had simply vanished. They had somehow been drawn away, and this siphoning off of our people apparently continues without abatement. This is certainly true in regard to our university graduates of Ontario and Quebec—indeed, of all Canada, I believe.

It is a known fact that Canada has never kept more than a fair proportion of the immigrants coming to it. Between 1911 and 1921 the number of immigrants to Canada totalled 1,780,000, while the net increase in new Canadians born outside of Canada during the same period, as shown in the census of 1921, amounted to 368,000. In other words, in that ten-year period we lost nearly 1,300,000 immigrants, people who originally had decided to come to Canada but who either died or failed to remain here. My own deduction is that the great bulk of them must have gone to the United States, and that a few, very few, returned to the lands of their origin.

Accurate statistics are not available concerning emigration from Canada, because none of the government departments keep a record of this information. I think the Bureau of Statistics should devise a means of determining the number of Canadians who emigrate to other countries, particularly to the United States, and the number who return to Canada. These are statistics our people should have.

According to Le Nouvelliste of Three Rivers, Quebec, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, in a recent publication, has thrown some light on this subject, reporting that one person out of two who enters this country leaves it. I take it that such a reputable insurance company would not publish this information if it were not correct.

Between the end of World War II and December 31, 1953, some 980,868 immigrants entered Canada. Le Nouvelliste deduces from these figures that approximately 490,000 left the country, of whom 420,000 emigrated to the United States and some 70,000 went back overseas. I think it should be possible to keep annual statistics concerning Canadian emigration; they would let us know where we stand. It is impossible for any Government to prevent people from going to warmer climates or, as sometimes happens, to more comfortable living conditions and better positions. The attractions are there and the fact cannot be denied. They may appeal to the children of honourable senators just as to any other Canadians, despite the fact that we know there are great opportunities for everyone in our own country.

I want to say a word at this time about giving assistance to people who would like to immigrate to Canada. I am totally in favour of it. There are many potential immigrants in Europe who would become good Canadian citizens and an asset to our country, but they have no means whatever of getting here. It is a marvellous thing that our Government is to assist them in this respect, and it will not cost the Treasury very much.

There has been some criticism of the Government's policy on immigration because during the last few years we have not had as many immigrants as some people wanted. But there are many factors to be taken into consideration. Shortly after the war Sir Winston Churchill, in a speech broadcast over the NBC network, urged the people of England to remain in Great Britain. He said that all their energy would be required to repair the devastation caused there by the war. In some sections of Europe there have been misgivings about Canada's economic condition. This sort of thing, of course, is not favourable to immigration, because certain elements have made political capital out of Canada's so-called regression—a brief period of seasonal unemployment last year. Do honourable senators realize that Great Britain herself has conducted an energetic immigration program during the last four or five years? As a matter of fact, the increased population through immigration in London alone threatened to create a delicate situation. Everyone knows how tolerant the British people are—I doubt whether any people are more tolerant—but they quickly realized that the situation developing in London and other parts of the country could become more serious. However, Britain is thriving today and her international trade is expanding from month to month. The same is true of France. During the last 24 years, with the exception of the war period, France has brought in an average of 65,000 immigrants annually to work on farms and in industry. Therefore it is difficult for Canada to get immigrants from that country. Even Germany is enjoying an industrial boom, and her products are finding their way on the world markets.

We get some very fine people from Holland, too, but she also has a limited population, and only a few arrive here from year to year. In Italy the situation is entirely different. I think the principle of charity—I should say understanding—should be exercised toward that country, because it is greatly overpopulated. It is true that Italians prefer to go farther south—say to Brazil, Argentina, or any of the other South American Republics; however, many came to Canada years ago to work on construction and on the railways, and they did very well and became good citizens. Last year I visited the city of Guelph, Ontario, and saw a fine settlement of Italian immigrants working there, doing wonderful work. They were good citizens, and prosperous.

With regard to Greece, I believe that when in January 1954 the Intergovernmental Committee of European Migration asked for 3,000 applicants to go to different parts of Central America some 50,000 to 60,000 applications were received. Those emigrants were very good people.

Very few people have come from Spain to Canada in the past, so I cannot say much about Spanish immigrants.

The Scandinavian countries are not densely populated, and are very prosperous. However, we have some of their people in Canada, and it is a very good thing for us; but they will never come here in great numbers.

People from over-populated countries who have come to Canada to seek opportunity have responded very well indeed. Several schemes for receiving further immigrants have been put forward, all of which are sincere and have the welfare of Canada at heart. Some years ago Sir Henry Thornton urged that people from other countries should be allowed to come to Canada at the rate of so many a year for a number of years; he believed that such a plan would bring additional revenue to the country. He contended that if freight rates were increased 5 per cent annually for a number of years it would create a revenue of $20 million a year. Fortunately, that scheme was not acceptable.

Honourable senators, it is easier to theorize on the question of immigration than it is to apply some workable policies.

On several occasions I had the pleasure of meeting Brigadier General M. L. Hornby, who in 1933 and 1934 came forward with a plan for British community settlements. He approached the Governments of Ontario, the Prairie provinces and British Columbia—I do not believe he went to Quebec on the subject. He was serious and sincere in purpose. The last time I saw him he expressed disappointment, and said, "I believe if my scheme had been put into practice 20 years ago it would have worked, but today even the agricultural west cannot begin to implement my immigration programs."

General A. D. McRae—who later became a senator—also put forward a plan, in 1928, when he was organizer of the Conservative party. I mention his association with the Conservative party, because although he was not a member of the same political party as I was, I always considered it a great honour to enjoy his personal friendship. His plan was a good one. On March 9, 1928, General McRae made a great speech in the House of Commons in which he proposed the expenditure of $300 million for the purpose of increasing immigration. He proposed to take 50 million acres of Government-owned lands in the west—scrub land—and clear 80 acres on every quarter-section at an estimated cost of $12.50 an acre. On these lands he was going to put 300,000 settlers—one to each quarter-section. The Government was to build a house, a stable and outbuildings at a cost of $500 each. This grandiose scheme was actually discussed seriously in the house by members of the Conservative party, and on May 22, 1929, General McRae repeated and emphasized his views. He then said:

> Last year, in response to the Minister's request, I made bold to submit to this house a definite colonization program, but owing to an accident, I was unable to appear before the select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

This plan apparently did not meet with the approval of the Government, but General McRae went on to say that he still adhered to his original proposal and believed it would be a good idea for the country; in fact, he was strongly of the opinion that it would be absurd to deny broad and general plans to increase settlement. Continuing his speech, he said:

> I presume the hon. member agrees that we must increase our population. My idea of the only place it can be increased is on the land.

And later on:

> I proposed last year that the Government issue land bonds against their expenditure on such a development. I gave as the maximum required $300,000,000 for a ten-year program, as an average of $30,000,000 per year.

Dr. Manion was another emphatic advocate of immigration in this popular debate. In the House of Commons Hansard for May 28, 1929, at page 2892, he is quoted as saying:

> I do not see how you can possibly handle immigration without an adequate organization, and certainly I cannot endorse any such idea as that this magnificent country should put up its shutters and close its doors completely, taking the stand: "We have great resources; let us hang on to them and keep other people out." Surely we have a more encouraging conception of Canada's future greatness. I personally do not understand the attitude taken by the hon. member for Battle River and by the minister himself.

Finally, we have Mr. R. B. Bennett's own very definite attitude, as given in the House of Commons Hansard for June 7, 1928, at page 3923:

> And I want to place myself upon record that it is a fallacy to believe that the bringing of more people into Canada means the cheapening of labour and the lowering of the high standard of living of those who are here. History teaches us that if you get people settled in a country you are making work. Every time you bring a new productive person into the country, whether he be productive by his hands or his brains, if you are unifying your efforts, you are already opening up new avenues of work. That has been the history of other countries, and I am sure it will be the history of this country.

Honourable senators, I have quoted that passage to show what history can do. Now, in the Bennett administration there was a very good friend of mine. the Honourable Wesley Gordon, the member for Timiskaming South, then Minister of Immigration and Colonization and Mines. Mr. Gordon knew northern Ontario and understood the problems of immigration and agricultural development. In the year 1935 I had a number of questions placed on the Order Paper to be answered, among which was this one:

What was the total number of immigrants that came into Canada from every country of the world during the year 1934?

The answer, given by the Honourable Mr. Gordon, was: 12,476. Mr. Gordon said he was satisfied with that figure at the time and he felt it would be advisable to leave all immigration in abeyance until the depression was over. I think this showed that in all such matters he was a wise man.

We had some immigration plans in northern Ontario. After World War I a fine section of the clay belt close to the present Kapuskasing Experimental Farm was picked out and we brought some 200 ex-soldiers and their families from Great Britain and Ontario—fine men and women, all of them—and gave them some money and a home reasonably close to a post office and communication facilities. But after two or three years these people became discouraged, and some chose to return to England, others settled elsewhere in Canada, and a few remained.

I ask your indulgence, honourable senators, to deal briefly with problems affecting some of the provinces. Newfoundland, for instance, despite its somewhat sparse population, is making economic progress, but it has little need for immigration. The same is true of the Maritime provinces. Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, where the people are familiar with their own needs and are making great progress. The last two mentioned provinces have had some very good mineral discoveries.

As to my native province, Quebec, it has been said that its people are against immigration. Of Quebec as a whole that is not true. With respect to immigrants the people of French descent desire only a reasonable opportunity to maintain their position in the light of their own stated rights. They have always affirmed and maintained that under the juridical system there is nowhere—in the federal domain, at least—a French minority as such. We French Canadians constitute a minority only in the statistical sense of the word. I speak from my heart when I say that the French-speaking Canadians are equal partners with their English-speaking compatriots in our confederation. We have no quarrel whatever with our English-speaking compatriots who tend to assure in this country an English and Protestant predominance, but they should not overlook the fact that any official government policy to establish such a condition would naturally be to the detriment of French Canadians and strongly resented by them.

But one thing is certain: the solution of our demographic problems must be our primary concern. We must work on the same footing and with the same cohesion as those of another school of thought. But to be effective and constructive in our activities, we must rid ourselves of certain traditional prejudices against immigration which are apparent in some parts of Quebec.

At the end of last September, during la Semaine Sociale—a week devoted to discussion of social problems—at Mont Laurier, Quebec, His Eminence Cardinal Léger, of Montreal, delivered an allocution entitled "Let us not make immigration responsible for our faults". In a masterly way he analyzed and treated the immigration question in its different national aspects, emphasizing some of our obligations from not only the human but the moral point of view. He appealed to the people to receive displaced persons kindly, not to allow them to feel that they were foreigners or strangers in this country, and to recognize the great accomplishments of some of the immigrants to our shores.

May I say a word about labour's attitude toward immigration? While it is true that labour does not wish to permit a repetition of any of the errors of the past, or to allow industry to create a reserve of employable immigrant labour to be used at its wish, labour is, generally speaking, in favour of immigration into Canada provided the newcomers can find fruitful occupations.

It was said by Sir Wilfrid Laurier that the twentieth century would belong to Canada. Now, some people take that to mean that Canada must reach a population of 50 million or perhaps 100 million rapidly. Our population is not great and it never will be as great as that of the United States or India, for example, but one has only to travel outside the country to realize the respect in which the Canadian people are held. The world knows that throughout two great wars Canada served the cause of freedom, democracy and Christianity without hope of or desire for any territorial aggrandizement. In that respect Canada stands practically alone, and her high ideals and unselfishness are widely recognized. Many of our members have attended meetings of the United Nations and have seen there the respect in which Canada is held.

Neither Great Britain nor France has ever been a heavily populated country, but each has had a great influence on the democratic world of today. And Greece, a very small country, still ranks high in our study of the classics and history. We must realize that we are already in the century which Sir Wilfrid Laurier predicted would be Canada's century, and undoubtedly our population will increase and our position in world affairs will be maintained. At the same time, there is nothing to be gained by stuffing our country with immigrants against the will of our native-born population, or without proper preparations to receive them. While we realize the necessity for a government-controlled immigration policy, we must see to it that our new citizens measure up to the character and qualifications we require. It is our duty and prerogative to make a proper selection, and no one can criticize us for doing so. The Department of Immigration has at times been criticized for the method by which it screens European immigrants coming to Canada. My chief concern in that respect is to see that not one Communist is allowed to enter Canada.

I recently read an article in that fine newspaper, the Ottawa Journal, which seldom goes off on a wrong tangent. In it reference was made to a young policeman in the city of Toronto who had been shot by a recent immigrant to Canada and, I believe, had lost an eye. Now, while it is true that we have an obligation to newcomers, they too must face up to the obligations our country imposes on them. This incident illustrates the need for adequate screening, because we have no law requiring that an immigrant be deported to his native country after a criminal act such as that to which I refer. But if there are many abuses on that score, we may have to pass such a law.

In conclusion, may I refer to the good quality of immigrants who have come to Canada from the British Isles but who were not told what they would have to face? I remember well meeting them in the pulpwood camps, where they were trying to make a living by cutting wood at $2.50 a cord. These rosy-cheeked, healthy people had never ground an axe or filed a saw in their lives, and the best they could do at first was cut perhaps one to three cords per week, but with a little instruction and help they were quickly able to cut as much as two and a half cords a day. Of course, such people should be told, not that Canada is an earthly paradise, but that it is a land in which there are some hardships to be borne, and also great opportunities for success. I well recall that during the first World War a cousin of mine married a very fine English girl, from a lovely home, and brought her to the Cochrane district to start a new life. He had told her that he owned a big farm, 160 acres of land, but he failed to tell her that it was in the bush and had only a log cabin on it. She had to be made of good stuff to stand up to the troubles she faced on a bush farm, out of touch with society, but she made a success of her life and that of her family. However, I emphasize that we have no right to bring people here under false pretences.

I will close by quoting remarks made by His Eminence Paul Emile Cardinal Léger at Mont Laurier last September on the occasion to which I have already referred, Quebec's Semaine Sociale, in which I believe he crystallized the idea and the attitude of the province of Quebec, yes, of the whole of Canada, with regard to the question of immigration. His words were:

> The fear which immigrants inspire in us could be the symptoms of an inferiority complex or the signs of a lack of Christianity and humanity. An anaemic organism cannot perform the vital act of assimilation. It throws back in its original state the matter which it had absorbed. If our country is to remain united and our church prominent, every one of us, in these days, must show a strong capacity of assimilation. The peaceful victory of a nation whose very elements must melt into the union which will respect freedom and the human person will be secured only if charity prevails.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 2, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, seconded by Hon. Mr. Croll, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. William M. Wall: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Wall: It is a privilege and a distinctive honour to have been appointed to this honourable and historic legislative body. This high privilege and honour I acknowledge quite candidly. It is a source of great pride for me to be a colleague of distinguished Canadians, from whom I know I shall learn a great deal about problems of common Canadian concern. I share with you the feeling of responsibility which I feel to be inherent in an appointment to this office of high public trust. The meaning of this responsibility, and the scope of the burdens involved, are becoming clearer as I orient myself to the legislative work of this chamber.

A deep feeling of gratitude prompts me to express my very sincere appreciation to the honourable senators of this house for their very warm welcome, for their encouragement, and for the many thoughtful courtesies which they have extended to me and to all the new senators, both individually and collectively. My sincere thanks to the Honourable the Speaker (Hon. Mr. Robertson) and to the Honourable the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), whose advice and guidance have been most valuable. I must pay tribute, too, to the courtesy and friendly co-operation of the members of the Senate staff. Within the brief period of four weeks I have been given a feeling of security; and this sense of belongingness, so quickly realized, is truly a minor miracle in the gentle art of friendly human relationships.

Honourable senators, I feel privileged to be able to express my appreciation to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister for recommending that I be appointed to the Senate of Canada. I must admit that my appointment holds for me significant and special values because I have had it at the hands of this distinguished and respected democratic leader, whose high qualities of statesmanship have contributed so much to the evolutionary development of Canada's auspicious destiny.

I hope that the mover (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Croll) of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne will be kind enough to accept my compliments and my thanks. It was a heartening and also a chastening experience to listen for the first time to experienced parliamentarians discussing Canadian problems of such importance to our citizenry. I have listened with interest and with profit to the speakers who have followed, and I have been encouraged by the sincerity of their opinions and by their preoccupation with problems of common concern.

I trust it might be thought appropriate that on this first occasion on which I address honourable senators I should pay a tribute to my distinguished predecessor, the late Senator John Caswell Davis, whom it was my privilege to know, though, unfortunately, not intimately. His extensive activities in the political and business life of Manitoba did not prevent him from rendering invaluable services to the educational, religious and cultural life of this nation. His deep spiritual nature and the abiding strength of his Christian convictions, from which flowed his great love of his fellow-man, endeared him to all who knew him. The honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) expressed the thoughts of many when he said:

> He passed through life enjoying and holding the esteem of all those with whom he came in active contact.

Public mention has been made of the fact that I happen to be the first Ukrainian Canadian to have been appointed to the Senate. Honourable senators will understand and will respect my feelings and my motives when I say that all Ukrainian Canadians were honoured by this governmental recognition which they regard as a tribute to their contributions to Canadian nationhood.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Wall: Honourable senators, you may have noticed that during the past two or three weeks the Ukrainian Canadians have been commemorating the 38th anniversary of Ukraine's declaration of national independence and the 37th anniversary of Ukraine's political unification. I am certain that honourable senators understand the motives which prompt these anniversary celebrations and the purposes expressed by the participant speakers. Quite simply, the Ukrainian Canadian expresses his well-founded belief that the Ukrainian people in their homelands are determined to become nationally independent in a truly democratic and Christian state. He expresses the conviction that this dynamic and freedom-loving people cannot remain forever a sacrificial victim on the altar of abstract or purely academic interpretations of liberty, justice and self-determination. He expresses his belief that the Ukrainians in their homelands continue to long for the practical realization of those human rights which totalitarian spokesmen profess to believe in and profess to implement.

However, and this I must emphasize, the overshadowing and pervading theme at these gatherings is a rededication to the highest ideals of Canadian citizenship in the defence and strengthening of the democratic institutions of this country, so that Canada may remain a bastion of liberty and social justice. As a participant at some of these celebrations, I felt that I should explain to the honourable members of this house the essential nobility of these expressed aspirations and the high ideals of citizenship which purpose the organized activities of the overwhelming majority of our Ukrainian Canadian citizens.

In this context of democratic citizenship, honourable senators, I am prompted to stress the importance to Canadian unity of what has been termed the evolving philosophy of cultural pluralism. We believe, ever more strongly, in the possibility of unity within the framework of the existing diversity of ethno-religious groups. We have been witnesses of and participants in the democratic processes which have resulted in the successful integration of peoples through a policy of wise tolerance and accommodation to existing differences. We have learned that groups of people cannot be successfully integrated without the concurrent satisfaction of basic human needs. Among these we must give priority to mutual respect based on tolerance and security which comes from recognition and a feeling of belonging.

In historical perspective, we can honestly admit that some errors were made by both the majority and the minority groups as they strove to achieve mutually-satisfactory interrelationships, economicaly, politically, culturally, and socially. We have learned much from our experimentation in assimilation and isolationism. Happily, we have arrived at a workable and positive philosophy which has been termed integration through accommodation. Accommodation has been aptly defined as that process through which men and groups seek such forms of interaction which will not tend to obliterate sensible identification, while promoting the mutual diffusion and eventual cross-fertilization of heterogeneous cultures.

Accommodation presupposes tolerance, respect for and indeed a neighbourly cherishing of the distinctive linguistic, religious and cultural heritages of the various elements that make up our Canadian population. It rejects as negative such things as separatism, fanaticism, or any form of false romanticism which may wish to perpetuate former prejudices, old biases, and bigotry. It is axiomatic that freedom to conserve what is treasured and valuable in ethnic group cultures must be complementary to the evolution of the national culture of the Canadian people. This means that cultural differentiation, valuable in itself, must be counterbalanced by and must be subservient to our adherence and our loyalty to common ideals and ends. All Canadians must labour toward a common base of social custom and democratic loyalties essential to the maintenance of our political and national integrity. The ethnic group to which I have the honour to belong shares with other Canadians this awareness of its obligations and its privileges as it works in loyal partnership with other Canadians to promote national unity within our cultural and religious diversity.

(Translation):

And now, I should like at this point to pay my respects to the senators who represent that honourable race whose pioneers discovered, settled and developed this country, so richly endowed by Divine Providence. They have always been a creative and stabilizing influence in our national life because they have excelled in their practised devotion to the noblest spiritual values in their family and public life. I am not attempting to be rhetorical when I quote this tribute:

> Here is a people that have been able to stand up before men because they have known how to kneel before God.

Their united perseverance in their struggle for religious, political and educational rights brought to us in Canada the evolutionary development of a philosophy of bi-culturalism, which in turn, has been expanded to the concept of democratic pluralism—this happy realization of Canadian unity within ethno-religious diversity.

(Text):

Before I speak briefly about the participation of the Canadian delegation at the Tenth Assembly of the United Nations, I should like to pay a humble but sincere tribute to the Honourable Lester B. Pearson for his excellent statements on Canada's foreign policy. His policy statement to the House of Commons on January 31 is marked by a realistic appraisal of the potential dangers facing the Canadian people and the onerous problems involved in our continued contributions to the cause of liberty and world peace. His words of hopeful wisdom and his challenging appeal for strength, steadiness, and unity will be understood and appreciated by all thoughtful Canadians.

Honourable senators, with your permission, I should like to share with you some of the impressions I carried away with me as a result of my experiences with the Canadian delegation to the Tenth Assembly of the United Nations. These impressions may well be neophytic and sequentially ill-defined, but they will be sincere.

First of all, I should like to point out that there was an older and much more experienced senator on the Canadian delegation, whose contributions, especially on the Fourth or Trusteeship Committee, were outstandingly meritorious. I am, of course, referring to the honourable senator from Cariboo (Hon. Mr. Turgeon), to whose friendship and guidance I should like to pay a tribute at this juncture.

In all sincerity and honesty, I should like to express to the leader of the Canadian delegation, the Honourable Paul Martin, my admiration for his forceful yet ever kindly leadership, for his assiduous and conscientious application to his arduous duties, and for his tireless preoccupation with a bewildering array of problems which had to be understood, assessed, and acted upon in harmony with formulated and agreed-upon Canadian policies. Although I know I should speak only for myself, I believe that I am speaking for each and every member of the delegation when I say that his efforts were appreciated and honoured by all.

Delegates, parliamentary observers, advisers and staff, all co-operated willingly and diligently. It was a good Canadian team, and its members attempted to safeguard and to strengthen the position of respect, good will and influence which Canadian delegations and missions do have at the United Nations. Canada's general position in the international field is characterized by a sympathetic understanding of the issues that are involved, a realistic though conciliatory attitude in attempting to resolve differences of opinion, and a devotedness to the purposes and aims of the United Nations Charter. Never was I more proud to be a Canadian than when, at the United Nations, I saw Canada's representatives play a leading role in initiating the solution of such problems as the setting up of an international agency for the development of atomic energy for peaceful uses; the setting up of an international committee of experts to study the genetic and other effects of atomic radiation; and the inclusion within the United Nations family of what we originally hoped would be 18 new member states.

Secure in my conviction that Canadians have always shown themselves willing to look facts in the face—and, once having looked at these facts, have been courageous in accepting their implications, without excessive optimism or discouragement—I said this to a very fine audience of university graduates several months ago:

> To buy peace, to raise economic standards, to feed the hungry, to improve human health, to protect and resettle the homeless . . . we, the 60 member nations, have, in an international way and through the instrumentality of United Nations organizations, spent approximately $2 billion during the past decade and since the inception of the United Nations. To me, personally, this is not a very high price to pay for what we have collectively tried to do . . . and I am proud, indeed, that Canada's financial contributions to the United Nations programs have been willingly and generously given.

Admittedly, progress at the United Nations assemblies is slow. After all, the United Nations is a federation, an association of free sovereign states, each quite naturally concerned with its own aspirations and expectations. Multilateral, international action requires the consent and the active, purposeful co-operation of the now 76 national governments; and problems and issues must be settled through a slow reconciliation and harmonizing of multitudinous shades of opinions and expectations.

Yet I must admit that I returned to Canada with my mind seized in the vice-like grip of this conviction, namely, that in spite of problems, despite many frustrations, the United Nations continues to afford the best, indeed the only, existing near-universal forum for multilateral discussion and negotiation. The absence of any other practical alternative is admirably summarized by the Honourable Lester B. Pearson, in his introductory statement to the booklet Canada and the United Nations—1954:

> The fact remains, and should be restated at this time, when some international issues for special reasons have had to be faced outside the formal framework of the organization, that the United Nations remains our blueprint for building the mansion of peace, and our best hope for realizing the purposes and principles of its Charter.

If honourable senators will bear with me, I should like to deal with one more problem of major concern to all of us. On January 26, the honourable senator from Banff (Hon. Mr. Cameron) delivered a thoughtful and well-documented plea for the establishment of the Canada Council and for federal aid to education, especially in the field of national scholarships at both the graduate and undergraduate levels. We were all impressed by the sincerity of his purpose and by the challenge of his considered statements.

Whereas the honourable senator from Banff discussed the need for federal financial participation at the higher levels of learning, I should like to point out a concurrent need, which some claim to be more pressing, namely, the tremendous financial problems involved in providing adequately for elementary and secondary education.

As I do this, I am mindful of some of the discussions on this topic in this honourable house. I am mindful, too, of the arguments pro and con which have been advanced by the members of the House of Commons as they have wrestled with this question, which seems to be one of those unfinished national problem areas which will continue to challenge our wisdom and good will in the years that lie ahead. I am aware of the constitutional problems which are involved, although the force of some of the arguments advanced would appear to be tempered somewhat by the many existing precedents of federal participation in the financing of education.

It may be well to remember at this point that the important question of health insurance is also a matter which under our constitution falls squarely within provincial jurisdiction, which fact did not prevent the federal Government from expressing its willingness and determination to become a partner in a national plan for health insurance, in which the overall resources of our nation are to be harnessed, to provide technical support and financial assistance. I for one hope that the proposed federal legislation will be enacted and that subsequent mutually satisfactory arrangements can be made with interested provinces so that this important piece of social legislation will prove to be yet another milestone in the evolutionary development of our democratic social order.

I cannot shake off my belief that the considerations which prompted the federal Government to assist provincial governments in implementing health insurance plans designed, controlled, and administered by the provinces, could apply with equal justification to education, which is also a general service aimed at increasing the capital assets of the Canadian people. This is surely an area where joint efforts are required so that the national interest may be well served.

As I explain the problem as I see it, I hope that I shall not be accused of demonstrating a kind of microcosmic viewpoint because of a proprietary or vested interest in education, for I have spent more than a quarter of a century in the teaching field, whose internal problems I have studied and experienced at first hand. I must emphasize that my remarks are motivated by a genuine concern which is shared by those who have given careful study to what has been termed a growing crisis in education.

The problem, in its stark simplicity, is that many Canadian school systems—primarily at the local or municipal, but also at the provincial levels—see no present prospect of meeting reasonably and adequately the probable educational demands of the next decade, even if we maintain a relative status quo in education and make no provisions for the necessary improvements in our physical plants, equipment and supplies, overcrowded classrooms, educational services, and the scarcity of well-qualified teachers. Carefully calculated forecasts of school enrolments indicate that from an overall 1954 enrolment of 2,781,492 pupils in grades 1 to 12, we shall have in 1965 over 4,000,000 pupils in these same grades. Roughly, this means an additional 38,000 classrooms, 38,000 more teachers, capital outlays of some $1 billion, and an increase in operating costs of approximately $235 million. The problem of educational costs will also be conditioned by any improvements we may wish to make, and what interpretation society will be willing to place on the term "qualified teacher". Canadian parents and ratepayers will have to decide whether they wish to continue to have many of their children educated by high school graduates with inadequate periods of professional training; or whether teaching, properly defined and evaluated, might not demand academic and professional training equal to that prescribed for engineers, accountants, and scientifically-trained farmers.

Traditionally, the financial burden for education was placed mainly on the local unit, and at this level the tax on real property is the only practicable one that can be applied and collected locally. It is estimated that approximately two-thirds of all Canadian school revenue comes from real property taxes, with the percentage in urban centers rising much higher. The continuance of real property taxes as our main source of school revenue can be justified only if ownership of such property is a valid measure of the ability to pay for education, which assumption is no longer true today when wealth exists in new forms and personal property is largely invisible and untappable by local tax authorities. Neither is the local property tax regarded as a valid instrument for adequately distributing the cost of educating our children. These considerations, together with the fact that real property taxes are narrow and inelastic to burdensome new demands, have forced local educational authorities to ask provincial governments to assume a larger share of educational costs.

The problem of increasing provincial grants to education could be regarded as an internal, autonomous, provincial problem if we could be certain that each and every province does have the available financial resources to meet these requests now and in the foreseeable future. But some provinces state, quite bluntly but sincerely, that this is not the case —that they do not have the available financial resources to carry out their constitutional responsibilities and to provide a reasonable level of provincial services, even though the proposed tax-rental payments to these provinces have been adjusted and revised upwards.

Hence the increasing insistence on the federal Government's responsibility to participate in the equalization of educational opportunities across the country, perhaps on a shared-cost or joint-financing basis—and after mutual agreement. At the Dominion-Provincial Conference held in October, the Premier of Manitoba stated the considered position of my province in these words:

> On the subject of education, it is our conviction that equal opportunities should be available to all Canadian children, regardless of the economic circumstances of individual provinces. Attainment of this objective is almost impossible without some form of federal assistance. We believe that such assistance can be given without encroachment on provincial constitutional rights. General grants could be made without restricting the manner in which the grant was to be applied by the province other than to stipulate that it must be used for educational purposes.

We understand that our taxation structures and their attendant revenue-apportioning schemes are the realistic expression of many legal, social, and historical forces, resolved at this moment in a particular financial program which is characterized by a variety of compromises. Admittedly these compromises must be made when we collect, apportion, or expend our revenue resources. However, all these compromises must be complementary to and overshadowed by an overall national purposing, leading to concerted action on a Canadian-wide basis in areas of common concern. Surely, one of these areas of common concern is our national interest in the adequate development of one of the most important national resources we have—the human resources potential of our Canadian children. The Rowell-Sirois Commission Report stressed that the quality of education, public health and welfare services was no longer a matter of purely provincial and local municipal concern. In other words, education was recognized to be a national, general, social service on a par with public health and welfare services. Education should, therefore, be looked at in the context of overall national purposing, and I submit that it is from this point of view that we must continue to examine carefully the need for some form of federal aid to education, which need is truly becoming "more imperative and more inescapable".

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, the debate was adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1956.
2.30 P.M.

Sir Anthony Eden was welcomed by the Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Wishart McL. Robertson, Speaker of the Senate, and the Honourable L. René Beaudoin, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister of Canada): Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, fellow members of Parliament, it is my agreeable duty and privilege to welcome to the Canadian Parliament the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. This I do with warm personal pleasure, and I know that all members share that pleasure and wish me to express on their behalf, as well as on my own, our most cordial greetings to our distinguished guest.

We were all delighted, sir, when we learned that it would be possible for you to spend a few days in our capital following your important discussions in Washington, and that you had graciously accepted to speak to us here this afternoon.

I should like also to say how happy we are that the foreign secretary, the Right Honourable Selwyn Lloyd, was able to accompany you on this visit. To him as well we extend a sincere and hearty welcome.

We recall, Mr. Prime Minister, that you previously addressed this Parliament some 13 years ago, when we were emerging from the darkest and most dangerous days of the war. The might of the enemy forces was still great, but the dawn of ultimate victory was beginning to appear.

Those of us who were here have vivid recollections of the inspiring message of courage and confidence you brought us from the battle-scarred but indomitable British nation.

You were then the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in a wartime government headed by one of the great Englishmen of historical fame, that towering figure, Sir Winston Churchill, to whom the whole free world will remain for ever indebted.

Today we welcome you as the worthy successor in office of that great man, and we do so on the morrow of your visit to Washington, where you have been strengthening Anglo-American co-operation and friendship, the essential foundation for the structure of peace which we are all striving to build.

May we be permitted to congratulate you on the success of that mission? Of course, I do not need to tell you that whenever London and Washington and Paris seek to deepen their friendly understanding, there is a feeling of very special satisfaction in Ottawa. That visit to Washington was only another instance of the energetic, skilful and constructive part which you have played in international affairs during these troubled and trying years.

Your visit to us emphasizes the close association we enjoy with the United Kingdom and the other members of our commonwealth of nations. That association, based on the freedom of its members, spans the oceans and the continents; it is playing a worthy part in the search for peace, security and constructive progress.

We are also proud of our association with the United Kingdom as allies in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and as fellow members of the United Nations. In these organizations, too, we appreciate the opportunities of working with you for the strengthening of the free world and the maintenance of peace.

(Translation):

Mr. Prime Minister, you know that there are in Canada, and in this Parliament, two official languages. And so I wish to tell you, on behalf of Canadians of French descent like myself, how happy they are also to greet you here and to extend to you a most hearty welcome.

I am conscious of accurately expressing the feelings of my fellow Canadians from the Atlantic to the Pacific when I say that they have the very highest regard for you.

I now invite the Right Honourable Sir Anthony Eden, Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, to address us.

Right Hon. Sir Anthony Eden (Prime Minister of the United Kingdom): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, members of the Senate and of the House of Commons, Mr. Prime Minister, I am indeed grateful to you, sir, for your generous words, and to the Canadian Parliament for this invitation. I am deeply moved by the compliment which you have paid to me for the second time in my life. That must be a rare event. I believe that it is in fact unique in history. On neither occasion, Mr. Speaker, have I been able to catch your eye. I do trust the backbench members will not in consequence be so much aggrieved that they will move the closure on me. I was a little reassured to learn, sir, that this is an unusual custom for your Parliament.

You know that I speak sincerely when I say I am happy to be amongst you again. It is now 30 years since I first came to Canada and travelled across your country. On many occasions since then I have had opportunities to visit your vast and hospitable land. I am proud to think that I have more friends here than in any country outside my own.

(Translation):

French-speaking Canadians, I thank you cordially for your welcome. I do wish to say how much I admire and respect that culture and those traditions you so proudly preserve. You know that I am genuinely glad to be amongst you again. Thirty years have elapsed since my first visit to Canada. I have returned several times to your vast and hospitable land and, on each occasion, I have found many old friends and have made new ones.

I am deeply grateful for the high honour you have paid me in inviting me, for the second time in my life, to address the Canadian Parliament.

(Text):

Inevitably, my mind goes back this afternoon to that earlier occasion, to which you, Mr. Prime Minister, have referred, when I spoke to you during the war. Then, though the tide had turned, victory had yet to be won and the future beyond it lay all uncertain. He would be a rash man or an ill-informed man who would attempt a confident prophecy for mankind today.

Yet there is a certain balance sheet of good and evil which we can draw up, and I propose to do so, and to begin with the good, because it is more comforting that way. There is next the unshakable strength of the Anglo-American alliance in which we all join. Third, the growing unity of western Europe within the framework of NATO. Fourth, and grimmer, but still real, the deterrent power of the new weapons, including the hydrogen bomb, which restrain where they cannot reform. Fifth, the growing understanding by the west of the threat of communist penetration which it has to meet and of the new methods which we will have to employ.

And now on the debit side I would cite, first, the increasing hazards which some are prepared to take. Second, the dangers of aggression by countries which believe they can ignore the deterrent. Third, the continued existence of local disputes, whose consequences could engulf the world. Fourth, the daily communist call to abhor the west sounds sharply. In contrast, the steady effort of the west to raise the standard of life for all free people must take time. It is easier to spread hatred than to make two blades of grass grow where one grew before.

Mr. Speakers, it is with this balance of good and evil in mind that we have to prepare ourselves. Economic weapons may take the place of military ones. But always our purpose must be the same: to maintain the right that men's minds may be free and the care that their bellies be filled. Well now, to achieve this, free nations like ourselves, like free men, must draw and hold together, and it is in the spirit of those reflections that I would like to make some comments on the recent conversations which I have held in Washington with President Eisenhower.

I can best sum up my impressions of those talks by saying that there has never been so full a measure of agreement between our governments. In the whole field of European diplomacy, which a year or two back was troublesome enough, there was no difference between us. You may have noticed the attempts of the Kremlin to obscure the issues and confuse our councils. In fact, they only provided most obligingly an opportunity to underline the unity between the United States and ourselves.

Now, Mr. Speaker, much of our meeting was devoted to the difficult and critical problems of the Middle East. Here too we were in agreement that the first danger was the continuing Arab-Israel dispute. We were also in agreement as to what we should do to try to resolve it. We decided that the necessary treatment should be of three kinds. We should continue to work without publicity—I really think diplomacy is more effective without publicity—and by every means to bring about a settlement in that area. This can only be realized if both sides are prepared to reconcile the positions they have taken up to now. That means a compromise. Some people tell me compromise is a horrible English habit; however some might learn from it to their own advantage in the world. But we can both help, and are ready to do so, for example by financial aid to help settle the tragic refugee problem and by a guarantee of the frontiers once agreed.

Meanwhile, as you know, Mr. Speaker, we, the United States and France have our responsibilities under the tripartite declaration of 1950. We arranged for discussions on the action to be taken to meet an emergency should it arise. The French Government has agreed to join us in this. Personally I am convinced that to make ready in this way is to reduce the risk of conflict. It may also be, Mr. Speaker, that a strengthening of the United Nations truce supervisory organization would assist to prevent incidents. Both the United Kingdom and the United States Governments are very ready to agree to this. But of course we should wish to be guided by General Burns, a brave Canadian soldier who is resolutely carrying out this thankless task.

As regards the dispute which we have with Saudi Arabia our position is this: we are not prepared to return to arbitration. There can be no question of that in view of our recent experiences with their bribery and corruption. On the other hand, as we made clear in Washington, we are ready to enter into direct discussions.

The United States Government has declared its solid support for the Baghdad Pact, to which we belong. This again we welcome and here again our views are alike. The pact has economic purposes and aims which fully match its military provisions and importance. We have considered the kind of help which each member country needs and we are determined to make a success of the pact.

All this does not exclude some help to other countries in that area. An example is Jordan, to whom we shall continue to make substantial payments under our treaty.

So much then for what is perhaps the most critical region at the present time. Of course, we talked of many other problems, in many parts of the world, just as I had the privilege to do with the Prime Minister and your cabinet this morning. We discussed the declaration of Washington which the President and I issued together. In this we set forth the true principles which guide the free world. Some say that these have been stated before. Maybe, but it does no harm to state them again in a manner which makes it clear that we are aware of the modern communist challenge. The declaration of Washington is, in fact, a charter to which the whole of the free world can subscribe. I am sure that here in Canada you will agree with its purpose. It is in the tradition of the work you have done so well to unite the countries on either side of the Atlantic in defence of the free world.

Mr. Speakers, I now come back to our own friendship and the work of our two peoples together. Many speakers and writers have tried to define the commonwealth. None has really succeeded, for the reason no doubt that the spirit which gives it life is indefinable.

In a few months' time I look forward to welcoming the Prime Ministers of the commonwealth to our London meeting. Foremost amongst them is your own Prime Minister, wisest of counsellors and most loyal of friends. May I here suggest that though we enjoy being the hosts to all these meetings of Prime Ministers, it would be good if from time to time the meeting place were to revolve.

Mr. Speakers, I am here this afternoon surrounded by the familiar setting of our own House of Commons. This morning, Mr. Prime Minister, you were good enough to invite me and my colleague the foreign secretary to attend the Canadian cabinet. Our systems, our modes of thought, our traditions and our ways of life are all so much alike that perhaps we ought not to take too much credit to ourselves, but Anglo-Canadian relations are a model to the world.

But there is more to it than all this. The pervading influence which the commonwealth carries into the four corners of the earth is one of understanding among friends, of tolerance and of peace.

In all this work Canada now plays a leading part. It is impossible to travel, as I had to do as Foreign Secretary until a year ago, into so many lands without constantly hearing warm praise of the judgment and kindly help you have so often extended to "less happier lands". The service that you are rendering in Indo-China is but one example of the world's debt to you. By this action alone you made possible an armistice which may yet become a peace.

Mr. Speakers, if I may conclude on a slightly more familiar note: I have from my childhood, like many of you, seen this great nation grow up into a position where its authority is among the foremost in the world. I have no doubt of what the future holds.

You will be called upon to carry ever more burdensome responsibilities, but they go with authority. That is inescapable. Yet ever so at home and over the world at large there is great comfort in that thought, for I have no doubt that the guidance and wisdom of Canada will always be thrown in the scales on the side of toleration and peace.

It is not given to many of us to look far into the future, but of this no one who observes your country from outside can doubt, a future, an almost unimaginably great future, is in your hands. I have no doubt that you will fashion it in a manner worthy of a great people.

And so, Mr. Speakers, I salute this Canada which commands the future as probably no other land in the world today. I salute you also as the standard bearer of loyalty and a herald of good will. And I wish you well.

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson (Speaker of the Senate): On behalf of the Senate of Canada may I say to you, Mr. Prime Minister, how greatly we appreciate your visit to Canada and your courtesy in meeting with us; and, on its behalf, may I thank you for the address you have just delivered.

We will never forget the gigantic effort and sacrifice that the people of the United Kingdom made in the cause of freedom, their contribution in the rebuilding of a war-torn world and their efforts in building a better future.

The attendant circumstances of your visit, Mr. Prime Minister, are evidence of the leadership you are continuing to show in this respect. I need hardly say that in the peculiar position Canada occupies in relation in particular to the United Kingdom and the United States and, in general, to the other countries that are signatories to the North Atlantic Treaty, we welcome every effort that is made toward greater understanding and the achieving of a common viewpoint. Your very presence here and in Washington is evidence that you are keenly alive to the inestimable value of personal contacts in helping to attain these ends.

We would particularly ask you, Mr. Prime Minister, to convey our greetings to the members of the United Kingdom Parliament. We hold them in the greatest respect, but we see far too little of each other. If it were possible to develop something more of the personal relationship and understanding between the members of our respective legislatures that already exist and are being constantly developed between the executive and administrative branches of government, not only would the attendant benefit be inestimable but it is quite possible that the difficulties of those whose responsibility it is to initiate policies might be lessened accordingly.

We wish you well in your undertakings. May Divine Providence bless your endeavours.

Hon. L. René Beaudoin (Speaker of the House of Commons): Honoured guests, Mr. Prime Minister, honourable members of the Senate, honourable members of the House of Commons, ladies and gentlemen:

(Translation):

Once a well-known American writer, Nicholas Murray Butler, pointing out the multitudinous problems peculiar to the twentieth century, stressed the high ability required of the men called upon to solve those problems. Then again, another distinguished American author, Whittier, said: "Each crisis brings its words and deeds".

These words naturally come to mind at this time when it is my very great privilege to thank you, Mr. Prime Minister, for your interesting speech and your kindly presence among us. May I be allowed to add that the success of your career arouses in us the deepest admiration.

I should fear to lapse into the commonplace in repeating that Sir Anthony Eden, "the specialist in foreign affairs, the virtuoso of diplomacy", to use the words of his biographer, Campbell-Johnson, is a statesman of the highest intellectual standing who has always shown supreme ability and understanding in tackling the most difficult international problems.

At the general elections, in 1950, he summed up his political creed by referring to the theory of the three unities; first, the unity that should exist within the commonwealth; second, the unity of western Europe; and third, the unity which, across the Atlantic, binds England to the United States. Today, he has restated his political faith in those three unities and has added two others which are most important and inseparable from the first three.

We believe, as he does, in maintaining a friendly solidarity between the countries which make up the commonwealth.

For us, who are French-speaking and whose mother country was France, we cannot forget, sir, that you have always been a friend of that great nation, that you have, on many occasions, revived the principles that made a success of the Entente Cordiale. You have always believed that the solidarity of Anglo-French relations, nay of western European relations, was the very basis of relations between all western European countries, not only for the present but also for the future.

There are, of course, "other places under the sun" and, as a North American people, we rejoice at your relations with the United States. On the occasion of your visit to America in 1943, President Roosevelt was able to say that you both seemed to agree on approximately ninety-five per cent of the problems, which is a remarkable proportion. And the last few days, you and the present President of the United States have just agreed one hundred per cent on the definition of the philosophy behind our way of life, as you personally chose to call it, a definition which was incorporated in this henceforth memorable document, the Declaration of Washington.

This is consistent with the objective which is yours today and which you set yourself a long time ago when you said in the House of Commons:

I am convinced that a closer understanding between our nation and the United States constitutes the most important objective that the government of that country could propose to us.

In addition you have accomplished a tour de force, as it were, in bringing about an effective rapprochement with new Germany.

As I said just now, each crisis brings its words and deeds, and brings forth the indispensable men whose courage and logic carry ideals into the realm of reality.

(Text):

Each crisis brings its words and deeds; it brings also to the fore the men to utter those words and to do those deeds, and men with sufficient courage and consistency to translate their ideals into realities. Of such a breed is our honoured guest today.

So, in the name of the House of Commons and of the Canadian people, may I say to you, sir: Thank you and good luck!

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 7, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

STATISTICS

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented a number of petitions for divorce.

He said: Honourable senators, in presenting these petitions for divorce may I recall that last session the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. John J. Connolly) passed the Divorce Committee a very pleasant compliment because of the fact that every now and again we report the progress we have been making. This encourages me to do so more frequently than otherwise I might have done. Perhaps honourable senators will be interested in knowing that there are now filed with the committee 327 applications, and that to date we have passed and sent down to the other place 133 cases.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Roebuck presented the committee's reports Nos. 117 to 128 dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

BILLS—THIRD READINGS

Hon. Mr. Roebuck moved the third reading of the following bills:

Bill K-2, an Act for the relief of Audrey Hilda Voysey Beaudoin.

Bill L-2, an Act for the relief of Frederick Howard Blaikie.

Bill M-2, an Act for the relief of Muriel Tetreau St. George.

Bill N-2, an Act for the relief of Patricia Colleen Hewitt Nelson.

Bill O-2, an Act for the relief of Ruth Mildred Thompson McBain.

Bill P-2, an Act for the relief of Joseph Theophile Lambert.

Bill Q-2, an Act for the relief of Lillian Baron Goodman.

Bill R-2, an Act for the relief of Madeleine Erna McArthur Blais.

Bill S-2, an Act for the relief of Queenie Molly Wolfson Phillips.

Bill T-2, an Act for the relief of Annie May Elizabeth Godson Brooks.

Bill U2, an Act for the relief of Ada June Mannard Wilmoth.

Bill V-2, an Act for the relief of Rose Florczyk Greenwood.

Bill W-2, an Act for the relief of Beryl Grace Leaper Shufelt.

Bill X-2, an Act for the relief of Ralph Patrick Dowling.

Bill Y-2, an Act for the relief of Alice Guernon Peladeau.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the third time, and passed, on division.

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, seconded by Hon. Mr. Croll, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. C. G. Power: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Power: For some time past I have been endeavouring—purely, I assure you, for my own enlightenment and guidance—to draw a line of distinction between the functions, duties and responsibilities of members of this honourable chamber and of those of the house from whence I have recently been translated.

With respect to the House of Commons, I think it is only fair to say that the doctrine laid down by Edmund Burke in his address to the electors of Bristol in 1774 still receives the approbation of those who believe in the orthodox tradition. But Burke's doctrine has not always been taken to be that which should obtain in some democratic countries. Burke, as is well known, laid down the law—an almost immutable law—that the first consideration of the representative of a constituency need not always be the particular interests of that constituency, but should be the paramount welfare of the country as a whole.

Burke put it in these words:

> He is not a member of Bristol, he is a member of Parliament.

And he adds:

> Your representative owes you not his industry alone, but his judgment, and he betrays instead of serving if he sacrifices it to your opinion.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Can the honourable senator tell us what happened to Burke at the next election?

Hon. Mr. Power: I do not quite remember, but I am under the impression that Mr. Burke withdrew from his position as representative of Bristol.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Power: I was about to come to that.

Notwithstanding this axiom of Mr. Burke, even the most conscientious member of Parliament has at all times found that he must give some attention to, and at times be swayed and influenced by, the sentiments and even the prejudices of his constituents. This is all the more striking in a country such as Canada, with its wide spaces and diverging interests, where a member who does not incline to the wishes of his constituency may find that his expectancy of life as a member of Parliament is all too short and perhaps inglorious.

Another limitation to the free exercise of his judgment arises from the fact that in more recent days, with the advent of more closely knit political organization within the political parties, with all the means of publicity, propaganda and finance at their disposal, the candidate for office who attaches himself to one party or another assumes at least an implied obligation to give to that party during the period whilst he is in Parliament his full and whole-hearted support. The evidence of no less a personage than the Right Honourable Hugh Gaitskell, Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in the Parliament of the United Kingdom, in an address delivered in London on December 2, 1954, makes clear at least the views of what might be called the leading democratic party in present-day politics. He said:

> When it comes to voting in Parliament, however, the limits to the freedom of the individual party member to please himself are and must be more tightly drawn.

He continues:

> Continuing membership of a party in Parliament does call quite frequently for the subordination of one's own personal viewpoint.

And further:

> Moreover, while we all admire a man who follows the dictates of his conscience, I cannot myself agree that the man who puts his own views first and the loyalty to the group second is necessarily right, or better than the man who sacrifices his own point of view for the sake of the group.

Still speaking of the man who leaves his party, he said:

> He was also wrong in failing to understand that voting at the call of the party was an essential feature of our Parliamentary democracy.

I think it should be said here in extenuation, if that should be required, that with respect to legislative assemblies where labour party representatives are numerous, broad outlines of party policy are usually determined by party conferences outside of Parliament. This custom, though probably not entirely in accordance with traditional notions of parliamentary government, has been justified and perhaps rightly so, as a democratic check and restraint on the unlimited authority of the parliamentary executive.

There is one more and perhaps greater overriding consideration, and this seems to have developed to a higher degree on this North American continent than in any other part of the world. It lies in the prestige and popularity of the leaders of the parties. If one stopped to analyse it, one would perhaps find that it lies also in the North American habit of creating heroes at all times and in all circumstances. We have heroes for baseball games and football matches, heroes in every great calamity and catastrophe, and heroes of the screen and of the stage.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What about heroines?

Hon. Mr. Power: Perhaps the most striking instance of hero-worship developed by extreme propaganda is to be found in the Grey Cup final game between eastern and western Canada, an event which brings millions of people, their eyes and ears glued to television and radio, to a state of frenzy as they watch with palpitating interest the cavorting of their gridiron heroes, most of them homebrews from Alabama, Tennessee, Georgia and Texas.

In his book Parliament and Democracy, Gilbert Campion, now Lord Campion, for many years Clerk of the United Kingdom House of Commons says this, speaking of the member of Parliament.

> His own merits matter little compared with his label. On the other hand the position of the party leaders and particularly of the Premier is enhanced. The bulk of the electors in a large modern constituency may know little of the personality of the candidates; but they do know by reputation the rival Prime Ministers and a few of the other leaders on both sides. A general election is staged for their benefit as a sporting struggle between two rival teams for the prize of office; and the party managers and party press find it pays best to concentrate the spotlight on one or two "national figures".

Now, it is true that there is a disposition among our people to applaud certain gestures of independence, but there is a great disinclination to allow these gestures to be carried to what might be their legitimate conclusion; in other words, gentle criticism will be tolerated and even acclaimed, but persistent opposition will be severely condemned. There is little room on our Canadian political stage for the outright and consistent independent, and this is true of all political parties. It is within our recollection that within the past three or four years there arose considerable controversy and discussion in the press of the day because a number of members of the Opposition had not followed their leader on some motion which he made in the House of Commons. We also know that there have been recantations and even excommunications in the ranks of the splinter parties. Perhaps the most striking example of the strength to which party organization can attain is to be found in my own province of Quebec. There, some 20-odd years ago, a group of men belonging to the two major political parties came together and formed themselves into what they called a "movement" to do away for ever with parties and politics in government. Now, 20 years afterwards, that group has become a party—the most ironclad, regimented and disciplined that has ever been seen in Canada. It governs with an iron hand—not, as the saying goes, "without fear or favour", but through fear and by favour.

But it is not only in political life that this tendency to centralization occurs. I doubt whether in labour unions or in large corporations the individual worker or shareholder has a great deal to say in the decisions eventually arrived at by the executive. The final result is normally that authority becomes concentrated in a few hands, and the regimented members of the organization, be they shareholders, workers, farmers, business firms or politicians, find that they have abandoned to a large extent their own independence and placed control of their actions in the hands of a select few. In politics the end result has been a vast increase in the power, prestige and authority of the executive.

It is quite possible that, as at certain times in the long history of the development of British constitutional practice, the power of the Crown has grown to a point where it became a danger to the liberties of the people, and so there are those amongst us who now feel that the power of the executive, in making decisions affecting the whole of the country, may, if it continues to increase, be detrimental to the body politic.

On the other hand, there are those of us who believe in the political party system of constitutional development and who fully recognize that there must be some limitation to freedom of expression and action on the part of individuals if the greatest good of the greatest number is to be attained. The dilemma facing people who believe in these things was well understood by the late Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King. In an address to the Twentieth Century Liberal Association of Canada, on March 19, 1930, speaking on "Citizenship and Politics", he said:

> A political party is not an end in itself. It is a means, and a very necessary means to an end. It is the means by which men and women who feel and think alike on the great principles which should govern in the administration of a country's affairs, are able to make their views prevail in a practical way. Members of a government merely as such can achieve little in the realm of politics. In matters of government, more than anywhere else, co-operation among those who feel and think alike is essential.

At the meeting which he then addressed the following formula was approved:

> A Liberal is, first of all, loyal to his principles; secondly, he is loyal to his policy, and, lastly, he is loyal to his party, but only as a means to carry out his policy and amplify and enlarge his principles.

Many writers on constitutional matters who have given consideration to this trend toward overwhelming power of the executive have come to the conclusion that perhaps a second chamber, properly and resolutely functioning, may become a restraining influence.

I am too fresh from the chamber which I have long considered to be the fountainhead of democracy to suggest that it is the duty of this honourable body to obstruct or defeat the expressed will of the representatives of the people. But a cursory study of some of the functions admittedly within the authority of the Senate leads to the belief that perhaps this assembly may exercise a salutary and effective restraint on an otherwise omnipotent ministry.

I am indebted to the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) for information contained in a reprint of an address he made in 1954. Dealing with reports on and studies of the functions of second chambers, and in particular with the Bryce Report of 1918, he shows that the main functions of a second chamber are:

1. The revision of bills passed by the Commons;
2. The initiation and examination of non-contentious legislation;
3. The interposition of such delay as may be needed to secure an adequate expression of popular opinion on contentious bills;
4. Full and free discussion at any time on matters of public policy.

Taking the first of the functions herein enumerated, namely, that of revising legislation emanating from another chamber, it so happens that the majority of the members of this house as it is at present constituted are persons who have been, and largely are, supporters of the Government which initiates all major legislation. If they perform their duty conscientiously, revising and taking a "second look" at such legislation, they may find themselves in the position of opposing that which has been strenuously supported by the executive and passed in the House of Commons by a majority of their political associates. The dilemma which faces these senators is this one: either they must look closely for defects, injustices and inconsistencies in the legislation which has been placed before them for revision, or they run the risk of being held to be obvious, well-paid sinecurists. On the other hand, by acting as militant and active critics, they will be in the uncomfortable position of meeting with the reproaches of former comrades and associates, and much will be said openly or surreptitiously of ingratitude and of biting the hand which feeds them.

All of us at one time or another have been witnesses of these circumstances; and I should like to deal quite frankly and from the standpoint of political realities, not theory, with this matter of ingratitude.

If I may be excused a personal reference, I make no secret of the notorious fact that I am a politician, and that my appointment is a political appointment. For nearly half a century I have been associated with one political party. I have taken an active part in its activities and in its organization. I am no stranger to the controversies of the hustings or even to the manipulations of smoke-filled committee rooms. The leader of my party considered that these activities should be compensated by a seat in the Senate, and I accepted. But other appointments were not so obviously political. Whatever may have been the practice in the past, the considerations which weighed with the Leader of the Government (Rt. Hon. Mr. St. Laurent) in making some recent appointments were announced as being, and in many cases were, other than those which could be attributed to a desire for the advancement of a political party.

I should perhaps say here that notwithstanding rumours and allegations which have been freely circulated over the past many years, it has never been to my knowledge that any member of this honourable body was asked for or gave any guarantee or pledge of support on his appointment.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Power: To return to recent days, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister is quoted by the press of July 29, 1955, as having said that the new appointees to this honourable house were selected, not as Liberals, but as Canadians. They had been told that they would be under no political obligation, but would be expected to take an objective view of affairs.

A number of appointments were made of men who had no particular political affiliations, and some had strong ties with a party opposing that of the present administration. Indeed, with only one instance in mind, that of my very old friend and college-mate, John Hackett, it would be inconceivable to any who know him that there would be anything even approaching the suspicion of a bargain or arrangement or even a hope of obtaining his support in return for his appointment, and I am advised that the same thing is true for a number of other honourable senators. Since such is the case, this brings me to the point: is there any argument, moral or conventional, arising out of friendship or association, which would restrain a member who has been a supporter of the Liberal party all his lifetime from having the same liberty of action, the same duty to criticize and to amend and to modify legislation, as that which is fully and freely granted to my honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett), who has consistently and conscientiously been an opponent of the present regime?

I have laboured this argument to some extent because a long and intimate knowledge of the reactions of certain types of behaviour on the partisan mind have made me familiar with the consequences of deviation from the accepted and authoritative party line.

It was pointed out by the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly), in the address to which I have referred, that there may be, through the instrumentality of this chamber, a means to bring about greater expression of individual liberty and greater freedom from the exigencies of party discipline.

The Bryce Report, already mentioned, dealing with the functions of a second chamber, says:

> The second chamber should aim at ascertaining the mind and views of the nation as a whole, and should recognize its full responsibility to the people, not setting itself to oppose the people's will, but only to comprehend and give effect to that will when adequately expressed.

This recommendation, if effectively put into practice by an assembly of persons uninhibited by fear of party recrimination and unrestrained by the possibility of a reversal of the ministry, might, at the same time, supply a necessary check on the executive and serve to keep the balance between hasty, ill-considered action and the calm sober thought of the nation.

I would remind honourable members that it was the Barons and not the Commons who forced a reluctant king to sign the Magna Carta at Runnymede.

It is far from my intention as a newcomer to this house to lay down a line of conduct or even to suggest that my colleagues should do anything other than that which they have been doing. I am no crusading reformer. My words today are addressed not so much to persons in this house as to those with whom I camped, fought and bivouacked ever since I entered politics, now nearly 50 years ago.

In the earlier days, perhaps the principles underlying the great words "Liberty" and "Freedom" were better understood than they are today. We found our heroes amongst those who struggled for liberty of the people against the encroachments of the Crown. It had not been many generations since men had struggled to destroy for ever the doctrine of the Divine Right of Kings. Cherishing these traditions and honouring those proponents of a free Parliament, I cannot bring myself to believe in or to support a tenet which practice and usage may elevate into a doctrine—that of the infallibility of the cabinet. And as a continuing liberal I propose to govern my conduct in this house accordingly.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, in rising to take part in this debate I wish in my first words to pay tribute to our gracious sovereign. I offer our Queen and her husband my best wishes on their present tour of Nigeria, and I pray that God may protect them on their journey.

To the Governor General, who, with such remarkable dignity and prestige, represents the authority of the crown in our country, I express my warmest greetings.

To His Honour the Speaker I extend my sincerest wishes, and I compliment him highly upon the work he did last July at the meetings of NATO parliamentarians in Paris. He was chosen to preside over those meetings, and he had the honour to be elected chairman of the continuing committee that was established.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, honour was bestowed upon you because you brought honour to us.

(Text):

To the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), I want to say that I hope he will long continue to direct our deliberations in this chamber. I hope, too, that the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) will continue for many years to offer constructive criticism in his spirited way.

I present my compliments to the mover (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) and seconder (Hon. Mr. Croll) of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and I want to say how pleased I am by the spirit the new members have brought into this chamber. I hope they will realize that the Senate is not a place in which to dream, but one in which to work and strive for the prosperity of our country.

(Translation):

I envy the long experience of the honourable senator who spoke before me and who, with his usual good nature, told us a few home truths which we can see for ourselves. The opportunity was given to us once again to enjoy his friendliness and the brilliant qualities which he has shown through his thirty odd years of service to his country. We highly appreciate his appointment to this chamber.

There were two points which I wished to discuss briefly in the course of my remarks, but the bill tabled in the House of Commons yesterday makes it unnecessary for me to labour the matter at any length.

I will say a word on inflation caused by excessive credit facilities. The legislation tabled yesterday should bring some relief to this situation.

Everybody fears inflation but, unfortunately, no one dares to prevent it. Similar crises have been happening all over the world for a long time, especially in France from 1706 to 1712, and have brought with them catastrophic consequenes. Then, notwithstanding Law's experience, the same mistake was made in the issue of assignates, with still more disastrous results. Inevitably, a crisis followed, which caused the French Revolution and upset the whole world and which, even to our day unfortunately, continues to disrupt it.

The constitution places the control of credit in the hands of the provincial rather than of the federal government. Ottawa would not dare to interefere with the autonomy of the provinces, not even with that of the province of Quebec. Even so, co-operation between the federal and the provincial governments can do no harm and it might be well to discuss this question when the financial problems of the nation are under consideration during a federal-provincial conference. It is a case of protecting the whole country against inflation caused by excessive credit facilities.

Unfortunately, it is the little people who pay the heaviest penalty, the very ones who cannot afford it. When I see finance corporations lending at the rate of 2 per cent per month to the people in the low income bracket, who find it hard to make both ends meet, I am truly horrified and I do congratulate the government for having proposed this bill. I would like to give an example of the dire consequences of our easy credit system.

(Text):

Many people think that the practice of saving means avarice, whereas the fact is that, besides all its other advantages, it is wise provision for the future. Saving also promotes economic expansion. Here is proof: Buying on the instalment plan is done at a very high rate of interest, and people who use such a plan are not generally in a position to pay the high rate. Suppose a man needs $500 for the purchase of goods. If money is loaned to him at interest of 2 per cent a month, or 24 per cent per annum, he must repay $26.46 each month, and after 24 months will have repaid $635.04; that is $500 in principal and $135.04 in interest. But if the same man proceeded by way of saving to lay aside $5 each week at the Caisse Populaire Desjardins, for instance, he would, after 24 months, adding interest of 2½ per cent half-yearly capitalized, have an amount of $532. Suppose he then wished to purchase the same goods at the same price of $500, with ready money he could profit by a 10 per cent discount, that is $50; and this amount added to the extra $32 of savings plus interest, making a total of $82, would enable him to buy something else, which he could not do by borrowing $500. So the practice of saving has the result of increasing buying power. In other words, as I have stated, it promotes economic expansion.

But we still hear it said that saving restricts economic activity. On the contrary, saving increases economic activity, while too easy credit misused causes inflation and prevents economic stability. By borrowing $500 at the rate of 2 per cent monthy, a man reduces his buying power, but in saving money before he makes purchases he increases his buying power.

There is another advantage of saving to be considered: the man who purchases with money he has laid aside will buy useful things, not extravagant or harmful articles. Saving, then, has a beneficial effect on increasing production.

The credit situation is much the same in all parts of the world. The Government of Great Britain especially is endeavouring to reduce rates of interest. Allow me to read the following extract from Le Messager, a magazine which I received from Switzerland recently:

(Translation):

Purchases on the instalment plan appeal to the individual, in playing up to his almost childish unconcern. He is easily caught in the fatal web. He was aware of that fact, the wise father who claimed that if he could teach his son not to go into debt, but to save and purchase later, he would have ensured his future happiness.

And this is what is said in closing:

It would not be impossible to find in our own country someone like the lady from the United States, the land of the dollar, where instalment plan purchases are most popular, who, when she paid the last instalment on a baby carriage was asked by the cashier of the store how the baby was and who replied: "Very well indeed. "The dear boy is getting married next month!"

(Text):

Mrs. Johnson apparently required 20 years to pay off the loan!

Honourable senators, may I be allowed to mention briefly another very important problem, namely, agriculture in general in the eastern provinces? Our colleagues from the western part of the country often talk about the wheat question. Perhaps the problem of butter could be discussed more often to advantage; but in stabilizing the price of butter, and like commodities, the interest of the producer as well as that of the consumer should be taken into consideration. Butter production in summertime exceeds by 40 per cent the quantity required on the market for consumption. In wintertime it is the contrary—the consumers' market requires 40 per cent more butter than can be produced. In the past, before the Government fixed any maximum or minimum price for butter, grocers and wholesalers used to buy at rather low prices when production was at the top; then they stored the butter in a warehouse, and during the winter made profits ranging from 15 to 30 cents a pound. And who benefited? A few men benefited, while the consumers paid too high a price for their butter and the producers received too little for it. The stabilization of the butter market by the fixing of a minimum price works to the advantage of both the producer and the consumer.

Let us not forget that the dairy industry in the Maritime provinces, Ontario and Quebec is the main branch of agriculture. In those provinces active production lasts only six months out of the year, but the dairy industry stabilizes the agricultural economy of the whole nation.

In the east, the farmers whose main business is the dairy industry use the by-products of butter making, and even milk itself, for the raising of cattle, hogs, hens and so forth. This livestock consumes grains purchased from the farmers of the western provinces. Should the price of butter fall to an unprofitable level the farmers of the east would have to give up not only the dairy industry but also the raising of cattle, and the consequential consumption of grains would be reduced to a point where western farmers would be heard to complain a bit more.

By this good and right policy of economic stabilization through the fixing of a minimum price for butter, the Canadian Government has showed itself to be prudent, and has proved that it considers first the welfare and prosperity of the whole nation. When farmers cannot get enough income from their farms, they will leave them; and if the time comes when there are no farmers left and people have to live on synthetic products, it will be interesting to see what kind of people chemical foods will produce.

I congratulate the Government on its laws to stabilize the prices of the principal products of the farmer, namely, butter, hogs, poultry and so on. This policy means prosperity and stability for producers and consumers.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Pratt, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE CANADIAN STANDARD INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. G. Peter Campbell moved the second reading of Bill J-2, an Act to incorporate The Canadian Standard Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, very little explanation is necessary in connection with this bill. Its enactment would incorporate the Canadian Standard Insurance Company, an ordinary fire insurance company whose incorporation is proposed under the provisions of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

The bill provides for a capitalization of $1 million, divided into 10,000 shares worth $100 each. Before the company is authorized to commence business it must, under the provisions of the bill, have a subscribed capital of at least $500,000. The promoters of the bill propose to subscribe for this capital stock, and in addition to pay a premium of $500,000, which would be sufficient to enable the company, under the provisions of the general act, to engage in all forms of insurance business as provided for in the bill. It is proposed that the head office of the company be located in Toronto.

I may say, honourable senators, that if the bill receives second reading, I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. I should, however, draw attention to the fact that in my opinion the proposed name of the company conflicts in some ways with the names of existing companies. There is a company doing business in the United States known as The Standard Insurance Company of New York, and another known as The Standard Insurance Company Ltd. I understand that both these companies have been consulted and are willing to consent to the use of this name, The Canadian Standard Insurance Company by the proposed Canadian company. There is, however, a rather old Canadian life insurance company operating in Canada under the name of The Standard Life Assurance Company.

The Department of Insurance has taken some objection to the name of the proposed company, and the promoters of the bill have submitted alternate names. I understand the department will approve a change of name to The Canadian Equity Insurance Company.

This is a matter which I think should be considered and dealt with in committee, but I felt it should be brought to the attention of honourable senators at this time.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Campbell, the bill was referred to the Standing Committe on Banking and Commerce.

QUEBEC NORTH SHORE AND LABRADOR RAILWAY COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. C. G. Power moved the second reading of Bill Z-2, an Act respecting Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is is in effect a request to Parliament by the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company for an extension of the time in which to complete work that is already far advanced.

In 1947 a bill passed this house and Parliament authorizing this company to:

> . . . construct and operate a railway starting at a point on the St. Lawrence River, somewhere between the Rivière Marguerite and Rivière Moisie, in the Province of Quebec; thence in a northerly direction following the valley of the Rivière Moisie or the valleys of the Rivière Moisie and Wacouno River to the southern boundary of Labrador; thence in a northerly direction to a point on the northern boundary of Labrador in the vicinity of Ruth Lake, provided that authority be obtained from Newfoundland for the construction and operation of this section of the railway; thence north-westerly to a suitable port on Ungava Bay.

The company has completed construction of a line, from Seven Islands on the St. Lawrence River in the province of Quebec to the southern boundary of Labrador, through Labrador to the town of Knob Lake or Schefferville in the province of Quebec, a distance of 355 miles, at a cost to the company of $123,353,000, and is now operating this line.

There still remains to be built a length of railway from the town of Schefferville to a point on Ungava Bay, a distance of some 300 miles.

The line of railway already built was completed without subsidies or financial assistance from any government.

During the past eight years the company has fully completed the first portion of its undertaking and now asks, in the bill before us, to be granted a ten-year extension of its time limit in which to build the line from Schefferville to Ungava Bay.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Is the railway laid entirely in Labrador?

Hon. Mr. Power: Oh, no. Most of it is in the province of Quebec and some of it is in the province of Newfoundland. At the time the original bill was passed Newfoundland had not entered Confederation, and one of the provisions of the bill was that permission had to be obtained from Newfoundland. This has been obtained. I would say that approximately 40 to 50 miles of the line already built—I am speaking subject to correction—are located in the province of Newfoundland. The portion which remains to be built will lie partly in Newfoundland and partly in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Davies: May I ask the honourable senator what the specific reason is for such a long extension, ten years?

Hon. Mr. Power: The reason is largely that at the present time the territory situated between the present end of steel and a site to be chosen on Ungava Bay is not settled and is being prospected for minerals. Great hopes are held that very extensive mineral deposits will be found there. Perhaps a line there would not be a very remunerative proposition at the present time, but things are moving so rapidly in that section of Canada that there is no reason why construction should not proceed rapidly. Yet, it may be that financing will be required. After all, $123 million is a large amount to have expended, and I presume that an equal if not greater amount will be required for the 300 miles still to be built.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask if the railway that is now built is not carrying iron ore from the Ungava deposits?

Hon. Mr. Power: That was the purpose for which the line was built.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: But is the railway not carrying out the iron ore now?

Hon. Mr. Power: Yes, the railway is actually in operation.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Power, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, seconded by Hon. Mr. Croll, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Calvert C. Pratt: Honourable senators, in taking this opportunity of speaking in the debate on the Speech from the Throne, I would like to convey my sincere congratulations to our new colleagues who have spoken and who have made such excellent contributions to the proceedings in this chamber. I also want to extend a word of welcome and friendly greeting to all our new members. They bring in here a wide variety of interests and experience which I am sure will be of great value to the Parliament of Canada.

These are days of royal commissions. It is all to the good to have independent appraisals of public matters. The gathering up of views from all parts of the land can be of great value; of greater value is the sifting out of those views and embodying them in definite recommendations; but the practical and lasting value is in the shaping of public policy by reason of focusing attention of Government and the general public on the issues arising out of those inquiries.

The Speech from the Throne draws attention to two royal commissions of inquiry which can be of great value, but another commission is functioning of which no mention is made. However, I feel that does not indicate any lesser interest in it. I refer to the Royal Commission on Coasting Trade of Canada, which was appointed some months ago. In bringing the subject of coastal shipping before you for a few minutes, I do so because it is of particular interest to Newfoundland and because, as in so many issues of public concern, my province has conditions very dissimilar from those in other parts of Canada.

The general and overall application of Canadian shipping laws to Newfoundland immediately after union, I can say quite frankly—and I think I speak for Newfoundlanders generally when I say this—was regarded as just an abomination and a cause of needless dissension. It was one of those numerous matters that should have been ironed out in the revision of the unnegotiated terms handed to Newfoundland by the Government of Canada, on the basis of which the people of Newfoundland voted by 52 per cent to accept the principle of union.

Some of the shipping laws, and in particular those relating to inspection, masters' qualifying tickets and so forth, which were brought into effect in Canada to meet entirely different conditions of seafaring life and trading from those we have in Newfoundland, were found to be very frustrating to Newfoundland seamen. I must say, however,—and I give due credit for the consideration by department heads and others —that after prolonged negotiations there was a better realization of our local needs in this respect and a reasonable measure of adaptation of the rules and regulations was arrived at.

The general position of shipping in Newfoundland, however, is serious, and I would like to bring some of the facts to the attention of this house. There is right now a dangerous situation which touches the very core of the livelihood of our people. The population of Newfoundland, which exceeds 400,000, is spread along 6,000 miles of coastline, and the people live in 1,300 towns and settlements. Distribution of population over such an area makes a problem which is unique in Canada. Only in the last 20 or 25 years were roads regarded as essential, because the vast majority of people earned their livelihood directly from the sea and moved around by boats. The absence of a network of roads is in marked contrast to the situation in the other provinces. On a population basis the mileage of roads in Newfoundland is only about one-half of what it is in the three Maritime provinces, and finished roads of a modern standard are comparatively almost non-existent.

These facts make the present shortage of freighting schooners most alarming. Twenty years ago there were more than 1,000 vessels of a size for freighting and offshore fishing. Today there are less than 200 in that class; in fact, we have only a quarter of that number of freighting size and most of them are running up to the maximum age limit. The cause of this is largely twofold. First, the Newfoundland fishing fleet on the Grand Banks, that is of the type which could be both fishing vessels and freighters, has largely disappeared. Second, the cost of building is out of relation to the earnings. Newfoundland's wooden shipbuilding enterprise, which was almost in the nature of homecraft work, and most excellent work at that, is practically non-existent.

I could mention a third reason also, namely, the imposition of import duties and restrictions on the purchase abroad of foreign-built ships. The logical place to look for boats is where conditions of fishing and freighting are similar to ours. When Newfoundland managed its own affairs it met this need in two ways: by providing adequate bounty for locally-built ships, and allowing duty-free importation from anywhere of suitable boats. Newfoundland's condition will be desperate if it is not more fully recognized up here that her main problems are distinct and apart from those of the other provinces of Canada. I can give scores of instances where Canadian authorities—yes, and in some cases, Canadian business people—acted as if political union had just taken the Island of Newfoundland out of the Atlantic Ocean and planted it somewhere in the middle of Canada,—of course, I don't know just where. With the gradual disappearance of Newfoundland's local freighting fleet—vessels that can freight both loose and packaged fish from one point to another in Newfoundland, and can carry coal, flour and other essential products from the mainland ports to the scattered places in the province—with that disapearance goes the fishing industry, and particularly the salt fish branch of it. If that disappearance is allowed to continue, it will result in privation which will undoubtedly depopulate a great many, perhaps hundreds, of places, on the island.

While on the subject of shipping, I think I should refer to some of the general aspects of Canadian coastal shipping as applicable to Newfoundland, seeing that a possible revision of the Canada Shipping Act is now the subject of study by a royal commission. I sincerely hope that the commission and the Government will have due regard for the particular needs of Newfoundland; if not, there will be a first-class battle for existence needlessly brought on in the province. It is natural, I suppose, when business interests present briefs on such occasions that they do so only from their own point of view. From a Newfoundlander's viewpoint some of the published accounts of the representations are absolutely breathtaking. One recommendation was that all vessels added to or replaced in Canada's coastal fleet would be built in Canadian shipyards. There is involved in this the question of the means of livelihood of a whole population—or a large section of it—as compared with the protection of a specific industry of relatively minor importance in the whole scheme of things.

Strong representations were reported as being made for a national policy whereby all goods carried by water or land and water between two Canadian ports would be carried in vessels built in Canada or on the Canadian registry. Personally, I cannot see the advisability of such a policy with regard to Canadian trade generally, because of the great dependence of Canadian economic life on export trade. The barring of ships of other countries—yes, and customer countries, at that—from the use of our Canadian ports does not make sense to me. It appears about as foolish as a shopkeeper putting up a sign saying that no customer will be allowed to bring his car within, say, 100 yards of the shop. If, however, that should be considered an advisable policy for Canada generally, I am sure it would be absolutely ruinous to Newfoundland. Everything that enters and leaves the province has to move by sea. Our pulp and paper go over the world, but we cannot load railway cars there and deliver to our customers from the same cars, as can the mills on the mainland. For economic reasons ships must be able to move freight both in and out of Newfoundland as well as between ports. The same applies to our mineral and fish products. Such a policy would certainly be a crippling blow to our fishing industry, both to the salt fish trade over half the world and our fresh and frozen fish trade to American ports. It would deny the right to land the product at points in Canada while en route to American ports on the Great Lakes. We have also the importation of fishery salt from Europe and the West Indies which must be discharged at several ports.

One could go on indefinitely giving instances of distinct loss from such a policy. We have had for generations English lines operating between England, Newfoundland and other Canadian ports and on to the United States. One is operating constantly now, giving service under considerable difficulty, and it would be bad for our province if that were jeopardized by some of the demands that have been made.

In some instances the operating cost of Canadian vessels is reputed to be 50 per cent higher than that of British boats. Why should that be added to the cost of living of a people who must bring in practically all their needs by water and send out also over the sea the products of their labour, which has to provide the means to pay for those importations? This is hard to understand. The average cost of the necessities of life in Newfoundland, by reason of transportation, is already around 10 per cent higher than at the mainland points of Canada. Are we going to add substantially to that cost just to provide some labour in shipyards and on board vessels? That does not make sense to us in Newfoundland at all.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Can the honourable senator tell us what the present tariff on shipping is?

Hon. Mr. Pratt: The tariff varies as it applies to ships other than those of British build and British registry. It is a very complicated matter. It takes the replacement value and depreciates it so much per year to arrive at a value for customs duty. The duty is charged either on replacement value less depreciation or on the purchase value, whichever is higher. The rate of duty, I believe, is 25 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Bradley: It is 25 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is it higher than it was when Newfoundland was not part of Canada?

Hon. Mr. Pratt: Yes. At that time we allowed ships in duty free.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Would the honourable senator permit me to ask a question? Could he give us the difference between the cost of living in Newfoundland and on the mainland of Canada at the present time and just before the union?

Hon. Mr. Pratt: I might say that one of the big issues in Newfoundland before union was the cost of living in Newfoundland as compared with that in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Has the cost of living in Newfoundland not always been at least 5 per cent higher than on the mainland?

Hon. Mr. Pratt: After union the general public in Newfoundland came to realize that there was not nearly as much difference between the cost of living on the island and that on the mainland as had been represented in the heat of arguments. While I cannot say just what the difference on a percentage basis is now as compared with what it was then, I would say that a great many of the essentials of life which before union came into Newfoundland duty free, come in now under a Canadian tariff. For instance, before union we could bring in canned meat from the Argentine duty free at a much lower price than it could be supplied to us then by either Canadian or American factories. Some other goods of American origin, such as certain fruits and fruit juices, which came into Newfoundland duty free, are now dutiable. On the other hand, the duty on a wide range of goods was quite high, but I can assure the honourable senator there is a general feeling throughout Newfoundland that the lowering of the cost of living since the union has not been up to what was generally expected.

Returning to the matter of local shipping difficulties of Newfoundland, one is often asked about the transportation provided by the Canadian National Railways and whether it is taking up the slack brought on by the depletion of the motor vessel freighting fleet. The railway facilities, I might say, are altogether inadequate for our needs. It is only natural that such facilities have to be augmented by shipping generally. One of our difficulties is that the narrow-gauge railroad in Newfoundland prevents carloads being brought in to their ultimate destination. Cars have to be discharged at North Sydney, Nova Scotia, and the goods freighted across and loaded on smaller cars. This with the freight rates on a mileage basis—the Newfoundland railway alone is about 600 miles—runs up the cost terribly.

The terms of union made no provision for progressive advancement in transportation. The only obligation in stated terms was that the Canadian National Railways would take over the railway and the coastal steamers from the Newfoundland Government. It is true that there was an obligation to put a new ferry boat on the Cabot Strait. Perhaps at this time it is hardly worth while my discussing that much publicized ferry boat the William Carson. May I say, however, that Newfoundlanders have no desire whatever to be regarded as collectors of white elephants.

The great flow of one-way traffic which has resulted from union, that is, goods purchased from the other provinces and brought into Newfoundland, was never planned for and never has been adequately provided for by the Canadian National Railways. The heads of that organization anticipated at the first a demand from Newfoundlanders for what they might need, and their early announcements were largely to the effect of what the province was not to get. A nation-wide announcement, not by Government authorities but by railway heads, was made right after union came into force, to the effect that we were not to have a standard-gauge railway. That then was settled and out of the way. The numerous diesel engines and other rolling stock additions have cost a lot of money but they have solved nothing. We are located out there in costly isolation from the other provinces; we pay for transportation on the mileage basis, and the possibilities of restriction of competition in freight and passenger carriage just make one shudder.

Adequate ocean shipping facilities to service the trade in and out of the province are of relatively greater importance to Newfoundland than to any other part of Canada. I would appeal to the authorities to give this Newfoundland problem more considerate treatment than it has been given in the past. Owing to inadequate facilities for rail shipments to St. John's, the Canadian National Railways constantly have to engage other steamers to take excess cargo from Halifax and North Sydney. On the other hand, we have seen Canadian National steamers come into St. John's to discharge motorcars, for instance, and go off to the West Indies without even inquiring if freight were available to take out.

A matter of great importance to the fish trade would be direct steamship connection through the Canadian National Railways to the West Indies. Newfoundland fish has to be shipped to Halifax for transhipment at a cost of about 75 cents per 100 pounds more than Nova Scotia shippers have to pay. As the West Indies are now the principal markets for Newfoundland salt fish, that extra cost has to come off the basic price to the fishermen. The Canadian National steamships operate as a public service, and there is no doubt that they should make St. John's a port of call, at least on their outward voyage. Recently an occasional call has been made and some fish taken, but what the trade needs is a regular service which could be depended upon so that volume by that line could be built up, as it undoubtedly would be. The importance of this can be brought out by the fact that there are now over half a million cases of fish going from Newfoundland to the Caribbean area at regular intervals throughout the year.

Hon. Mr. Howden: By water?

Hon. Mr. Pratt: Yes. And it is just absurd that practically all of that has to go by indirect routes, while a Canadian public service operates steamers directly to the West Indies and follows a route not far off the route from Newfoundland.

I cannot prolong this talk by dwelling at length on many of our needs as a province, but I hope for opportunities—as I am sure my colleagues do also—of bringing before you more information which will be helpful in providing a setting for a policy which will enable Newfoundland to fit more equitably into the Canadian system.

I shall now mention briefly another specific matter of great economic importance to Newfoundland. The Speech from the Throne refers to compensation for seasonal unemployment, but not particularly in connection with the fisheries. Now, I know that the practical application of this, in the unemployment insurance structure, bristles with difficulties, but an approach by way of insurance and fishery assistance measures combined should lead to a reasonable solution. Situated as we are in one of the best fishing areas of the world, our fishermen nevertheless are leaving the industry until their numbers are only a fraction of what they were in previous years. We have lost out a great deal by exchange difficulties in our foreign trade, which were much better met by ourselves in conjunction with the British Government in pre-Confederation days. No other emphasis needs to be placed on the fundamental difficulties of our situation than the fact that the Portuguese, Spanish and French fishing boats are now coming across the ocean —they always had done so in some measure, but not to the present extent—and are taking almost as much fish from the waters just off our coast as all the Newfoundland fishermen are catching for salting. Time is of such importance to us in meeting our present difficulties that future planning, no matter how logical and good in itself, will be useless if action in the present is deferred. Ocean fishing is different from almost anything else, because when fishermen leave the industry their skills go with them and are not replaceable. Farmers can make woodsmen, woodsmen can make miners, and so on, but only men who are bred to the sea can be fishermen. We have had very interesting and valuable information in connection with the fisheries gathered up by commissions whose business has been to plan for the future, but I am sure we can appreciate that with all thought on the future and none on the present, which sometimes is the outcome of the deliberations of commissions, our only hope then can be in the resurrection—I mean, of course, of the industry—a prospect not entirely reassuring.

One of the expectations of Newfoundland people following the consummation of union was the establishment of a national harbour in Newfoundland under the administration of the National Harbours Board. It is difficult to see why such a necessary public service as this has been so long deferred. It is true that there are varied opinions with regard to the location, but I would like to express my belief that in the present stage of development the only logical site for it would be at St. John's. In deciding on a place in which to establish a national harbour, there are three features which all fair-minded people must accept as essential to such a project: first, service to a large population; second, an ice-free harbour throughout the year; and, third, established industry. All three requirements would seem to be met at St. John's. There has been a good deal of talk of establishing a national harbour at places where industrial development is thought to be in prospect but is not yet even planned for. For the sum of money that such an undertaking would require, surely more than mere prospects of economic use are required.

I do hope that this undertaking will not be much longer delayed. It should help to increase the industrial life of St. John's and the Avalon Peninsula, which has the only large concentration of population in the province. St. John's is, and will be for all the foreseeable future, the chief landing port for importation of goods for the east coast of Newfoundland, and it will always be, as far as one can see, the chief exporting point for fishery products. Also, it services to a considerable degree the export of paper during the winter months. In addition to that it is the principal port of entry for the requirements of the United States North-East Air Command, which is of very great importance to the economy of the province. The conversion of St. John's into a national harbour should not only increase the traffic through that port but substantially reduce the handling costs of goods, and this would be reflected in lower consumer prices.

Now, honourable senators, in closing this talk on Newfoundland and a few of its problems, I would point out that our province needs, and I hope will have in the near future, a greater understanding by Canadians generally of the implications of the new partnership. Our problems in Newfoundland naturally arise from numerous circumstances which differ, as I have stated, from those prevailing in other parts of Canada. In many ways Newfoundland has a very valuable security from the wider relationship established by union; while at the same time the other provinces have a distinct and positive value from the contribution by Newfoundland. I will mention now just one point in this connection. Our people have to buy outside the province most of the goods by which they live. Before union the importations from Canada amounted to something like $50 million, mostly of food products. The bulk of the manufactured goods came in from the United States and Europe. Today the importations from the other provinces run from three to four times that amount, and if our province still ranked as an export market of Canada we would be the third largest export customer of the dominion. The earnings of the people of Newfoundland which go to pay for these purchases come chiefly from revenue derived from our exports over the world of the products of the sea, the forest and mines, and very substantially from United States bases in the province. The trade outward is to almost everywhere except the other provinces of Canada, and the trade inward is now mostly from those provinces.

All these and countless other considerations create an urgency for more knowledge throughout the dominion of the facts of this mutual relationship. I realize it is up to Newfoundlanders to take a greater lead themselves in spreading information around about our province. While mentioning this, I would like to refer to the very excellent contribution in this respect made in recent times by the Mayor of St. John's, Mr. H. G. R. Mews, who has been travelling from coast to coast lecturing to Canadian Clubs and other organizations about our province. No one is held in greater respect in Newfoundland than he and no one is better qualified to speak on behalf of our people, and I am sure what he has done and is still doing is very valuable.

As I have been saying, I hope and expect that as time goes on we shall be better known and that many misconceptions will be cleared up. One is constantly impressed with the lack of knowledge of our province as reflected in press writings and magazine articles, and indeed in private conversation. I suppose that lack is only natural, as we have been Canadians for just seven years. One frequently hears throughout Canada expressions of impatience at the lack of knowledge of this country by the citizens of the United States. Canadian people generally seem to be impatient about that, and perhaps there is a reason. All I need say in that regard is that if the old adage, "Patience is a virtue", is true, then the people of Newfoundland should be an example of virtue for the whole of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: I would like to ask the honourable senator a question. He stated that foreign fishermen catch about as many fish in the waters around Newfoundland as local fishermen do. Why is that? Is it because the foreign fishermen use better equipment?

Hon. Mr. Pratt: I am glad to answer that question as well as I can. The foreign fishermen generally use much larger boats, which are more fully equipped than ours, at least than those that are used in the competing salt fish trade. I would mention in particular Portuguese fishermen, who, with national assistance, have made fishing on the Grand Banks an outstanding industry. As I expect my honourable friend knows, the Portuguese have gone to the extent of providing a mother ship which acts as a hospital ship, and has in fact rendered service to our Canadian ships. The whole Portuguese organization points to a program of fisheries advancement which I think is a good object lesson to all of us in the fishing areas.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Would my honourable friend give me the source of his information as to the extent of imports by Newfoundland from the rest of Canada? I understood him to quote some figures as to that trade before and after Newfoundland entered into Confederation, and I am curious to know where he got his figures. I may say that we in New Brunswick have been trying to get such statistics for 75 years and have been unable to get them.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: Honourable senator, I will take on that one too. You will notice that I quoted only one figure, that of about $50 million, as the value of importations from Canada in immediate pre-confederation days, and I said that at the present time it was three or four times that amount. As my honourable friend says, there are no official figures of imports by Newfoundland from the rest of Canada: no information in this connection is available from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics or the Department of Trade and Commerce. But as one who has had experience in business and who has practical knowledge of the volume and range of goods that come into Newfoundland and their source, I am very sure that the increase I have suggested is not out of line.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, as so many of those who spoke before me in this debate have done, I would like to congratulate the mover (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Croll) of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Having followed their speeches in the other house, we expected that their first speeches in this house would be outstanding, and we certainly were not disappointed.

I would like to congratulate all the speakers who have preceded me in this debate, and particularly the other new members, whose first speeches have greatly enriched the records of the Senate. To the new members who have not spoken as yet I would like to repeat the personal welcome that I have already given them, and particularly to my deskmate, the honourable senator from Charlottetown (Hon. Mrs. Inman), who I am sure is going to be a highly valued addition to the women members of this house.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Honourable senators, last summer it was my very great privilege to be numbered among the Canadian members of Parliament who attended the meetings in Paris of parliamentarians from 15 NATO countries. After the meetings the Minister of National Defence arranged for the Canadian delegates to visit our army and air force installations in Germany and France. What we saw there as well as at the Palais de Chaillot, which is the headquarters of NATO, was a revelation. As the Speech from the Throne refers to the importance of NATO I would like to make a few remarks about our experiences while we were in Europe.

The Speaker of this honourable house (Hon. Mr. Robertson), as the President of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association, was the leader of our group, and he was elected Chairman of the Paris meetings. He handled the meetings with great skill and tact, and he made us feel very proud that we were part of the delegation of which he was the leader.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: That his ability was recognized not only by Canadians but by the whole group was shown when he was elected chairman of the continuing organization that has grown out of these Paris meetings; and we know that in that position he will continue to bring honour to Canada as he did last summer.

At about the time we left Canada, honourable senators, some criticism of our proposed visit appeared in the press, and it seems to me that it was completely unwarranted. More than 40 cents of each dollar paid in taxes by Canadians goes into defence. Canada's first line of defence is the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and since the inception of that organization Canada has contributed to it over one billion one hundred million dollars. In view of Canada's contribution in money, arms and men to NATO, it seems only reasonable that the members of Parliament who are responsible for making provision for these contributions should learn as much as possible about how NATO operates.

About 200 parliamentarians from the fifteen NATO countries were present in Paris and we got to know many of them very well. It is important, and I think of great value, that Canadian parliamentarians should have an opportunity to know and to talk to members of Parliament from other NATO countries, so that we and they can learn to understand and appreciate one another's points of view on NATO problems. It seems to me important, too, that members of our Parliament should have a chance to see for themselves the conditions under which our service men and women and their families are living and how they are carrying on operations at Canadian NATO installations abroad.

Honourable senators, it would seem to me not an interference, but a duty—and I must tell you it was a very pleasant duty—for Canadian parliamentarians to learn at first hand about these things. At no time did the members of the group consider that they were concerned with policy making. No attempt was made or considered for the setting up of an executive body to make decisions, or the establishment of a secretariat for administrative purposes. The group had no desire and no intention to replace the functions of governments; their intention was only to complement the work of government.

The meeting of parliamentarians was held at NATO headquarters in the Palais de Chaillot, in the very shadow of the Eiffel Tower, which is so well known to anyone who has visited Paris. Lord Ismay, Secretary-General of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, welcomed us to headquarters and impressed us by his obvious belief in the vital importance of NATO if peace is to be maintained in the world. After listening to him we understood why he feels that if an organization such as NATO had existed in the 1930's we would have been spared the horrors of the Second World War.

We received briefings from a number of chairmen of committees of the North Atlantic Council, through which we learned much of how the planning is done for the tremendous organization that NATO has grown to be. Perhaps to the Canadian group one of the most interesting briefings was a talk by Canada's permanent representative to NATO, Dana Wilgress, who is a very distinguished and very highly regarded diplomat, of whom we were very proud. Mr. Wilgress is also Chairman of the Committee on Information and Cultural Relations of the North Atlantic Treaty Council, and he talked to us on that subject. That committee no doubt is responsible for the NATO fellowships and scholarships which were established by the North Atlantic Council and announced last October by our Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Wilgress and his charming wife did everything possible to add to the comfort and pleasure of our delegation during our visit to Paris. On one occasion they opened their delightful home, which is about 18 miles outside of the city, to all the delegates at the conference.

Of course the highlight of the briefings was the one we received during the three hours we spent at SHAPE, the Supreme Headquarters of the Allied Powers in Europe. This is located on the outskirts of Paris in the Versailles area. There General Gruenther, the Supreme Commander, and a number of his top ranking officials, including General Montgomery, told us of the great work that is being done. He told us also of the need of increased support for NATO, and he spoke of the lack of knowledge about NATO amongst the very people who depend on it and on the NATO forces for their protection.

In a report that Lord Ismay made he stated that 80 per cent of the people of the United States, the United Kingdom and France had no idea what the letters NATO stand for. I think that applies, though perhaps to a lesser degree, to Canada. Both Lord Ismay and General Gruenther urged that we parliamentarians do all in our power to stimulate public interest in NATO, and bring to the people of our countries knowledge and understanding about this organization. They urged us to point out that it is entirely a defensive alliance, and that without it many of the member countries would not be able to maintain their freedom if pressure were put upon them; also that, if it is to continue, it must receive the support and approval, not only of the parliamentarians of the member countries but of the people who elect them.

Since I returned from Europe I have spoken on this subject at many meetings in New Brunswick groups and Nova Scotia groups, to several meetings of Maritime groups, and to one national group which was meeting in my home city. I have had many more requests for talks on this subject, and I intend to give as many as time will allow. Perhaps I have been able to make these addresses a little more interesting by the display of a large number of slides from views which I took on my trip, but which, of course, I cannot exhibit here.

At SHAPE, 800 professional military men from the 15 NATO countries work together in a very friendly atmosphere. We learned not only that it is possible for our countries to unite in the military field, but that such co-operation is an accomplished fact.

The great interest of the Canadian delegation and of many others was the extension of co-operation among the NATO countries into social, economic and cultural fields. When we saw that joint efforts were operating so successfully in the military sphere, we were the more confident that the larger objective is within our reach. Article II of the North Atlantic Treaty pledges the member countries to such action. If we do not build up a free exchange with other NATO countries, it may well be that the Soviets, adopting their familiar tactics of "divide and conquer", will drop the military approach and try for success by entering into economic co-operation with some of our allies.

There was much discussion between parliamentarians at the conference as to the best ways of bringing about concerted action on levels other than military; but most of the formal sessions were taken up with organization of the group, to ensure that meetings of NATO parliamentarians will continue to take place.

The concern of the conference with Article II of the Treaty was, again, on an exploratory basis only, with no idea of dictating policy, but for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the NATO Council and our respective countries that parliamentarians regard as vital the implementation of this article of the Treaty.

The final communiqué of the December meeting of the North Atlantic Council contained a statement that the council recognizes the necessity of closer co-operation between the members as envisaged by article II of the Treaty, and has decided to instruct the permanent council to examine and implement all measures conducive to that end. It is quite possible, honourable senators, that the discussions at the conference last summer influenced the NATO Council to make this reference.

The hospitality extended by the French Republic to the delegates through receptions in its beautiful and historic palaces is something we shall always remember.

Following the conference the Canadian delegates flew to Soest, Germany, the site of the Canadian Army Installations. Here, Brigadier W. A. B. Anderson, the Officer Commanding, devoted himself to guiding us during our whole stay. He proved to be a superlatively good guide, giving us detailed information about the operations of the army installations, and concerning the section of Westphalia in which our forces are situated, and whose history he had obviously studied thoroughly. Demonstrations were given of assault-boat landing, bomb laying, the building of Bailey bridges and other activities. We were pleased to meet many local personages and gratified to experience the friendliness of the Mayor of Soest and other officials. Their attitude, we realized, must be the outcome of the excellent relations which have been established with these people by our own army.

After leaving Soest we visited the R.C.A.F. NATO Headquarters at Metz, where we were greeted and briefed by Air Vice-Marshal Hugh Campbell, Air Officer Commanding R.C.A.F. No. 1 Air Division. He, his Chief of Staff, Air Commodore William Clements and the Commanding Officers of the four fighter wings in France and Germany briefed us thoroughly on the work and responsibilities of the Air Wings.

Besides visiting Air Force Headquarters at Metz, we visited Grostenquin and Marville, in France; Zweibrucken and Baden-Soellingen, in Germany. The physical set-up and the activities carried on at these Air Wings made us realize that a great deal has been done in a short time. We were told that the Royal Canadian Air Force has received Europe's aerial post of honour, and that this assignment is a tribute to the high morale and efficiency of our pilots and the very modern equipment which has been supplied by the Canadian Government. We were also informed that our Canadian-made Orenda engines are better than anything that our allies have. We learned a great deal about the speed, efficiency and performances of the Mark V Sabre jets, which we were told were soon to be replaced with the even more efficient Mark VI Sabre jets. The air force gave us a number of demonstrations, including a fly-past and an exhibition by the Air Division Sky Lancers, which, according to European opinion, is one of the finest aerobatic teams in existence. We saw what they call rapid turn-arounds, when planes came in, were refuelled, rearmed, checked over and given new pilots and were off again in six minutes or less; demonstrations of the operation of ejection seats in jet planes, and many other air force activities too numerous to mention, but which we found extremely interesting and informative.

Here we also visited the famed Maginot Line and a number of places of local interest concerning which the commanding officer and his men were well informed. We found the air force was also on excellent terms with the people of the country, who obviously had the highest regard for Canadians.

We were happy to see the friendly relationship existing between our troops and local citizens. It is true we sometimes read that our forces abroad get into difficulties, but we were assured by very many people, including many of the local citizens themselves, that these are only minor instances distorted out of all proportion by the press in the interests of sensationalism and seldom if ever appear in the local papers. The proof of this, and the greatest tribute to our forces on the continent, is the excellent way in which Canadians generally are received throughout Europe.

At each of the army and air force bases we were shown the chapels, hospitals and recreation buildings as well as the permanent married quarters—always referred to as the P.M.Q.'s—the trailer camps and the local villages where many of the families of officers and men had been living prior to the completion of the married quarters, and where some continue to live.

We were assured that the presence of the families of the officers and men was the largest factor in contributing to the harmony which prevailed at the bases. We were also told that the wives, many of whom for some time after their arrival had found it necessary to live on the economy of the country, had made friends with the local storekeepers and others with whom they had to deal; had quickly learned the language and had, through their friendliness and tact, contributed greatly to the warm friendly feeling and obvious admiration with which the local people regarded the Canadians. Living in trailer camps and villages with no modern conveniences was a great change for many of these young wives, but they had adapted themselves with great good humour. Before schools were built they had worked together to carry on informal classes so that their children would not get behind in their school work. We felt proud to learn of the part our women were playing, not only the wives but also our service women. The commanding officers spoke of the service women in terms of highest praise, and one at least told me he only wished he had many more of them.

We viewed the recently completed schools, which are of a very high order, as they should be, for the children of our service men.

Since we returned to Canada, the First Canadian Infantry Brigade has been returned and replaced by the Second Infantry Brigade, which I am sure will also act so as to enhance Canada's reputation and encourage the warm feeling of friendship toward us that had been fostered by the First Infantry Brigade.

Our service men and their families and our service women who are posted to these Canadian NATO installations in Europe will not only make Canada better known and better understood, but they themselves will learn much about other countries as travel is encouraged and they see and get to know the peoples of our allies.

Honourable senators, again I would remind you that NATO is Canada's first line of defence. It will be remembered that it was our Prime Minister who, in 1947, when he was Secretary of State for External Affairs, brought before the United Nations the idea of an alliance for defence within the framework of that body. This is the idea which has now developed into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and he is sometimes referred to as the father of NATO.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: The great success of NATO leads us to think that "He builded better than he knew". In order that that success may continue to grow we must keep up and increase our interest and contributions, which really are an investment in peace.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Reid, the debate was adjourned.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 8, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, seconded by Hon. Mr. Croll, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, having come down here somewhat late after the opening of the session, it was not my intention to take part in the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. But a few days ago the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), remarked to me that, coming from a wheat province, he knew all about wheat, and he said: "Some of us, including myself, would like to know the story of the fight that is going on in British Columbia in connection with power dams and salmon. I believe you should tell us about it. It is something in which not only I, but others, are interested." Let me say to him and the others that I greatly appreciate the interest shown and that, without unduly prolonging the debate, I shall endeavour before I resume my seat to present the facts as clearly as I can.

One or two other matters which were mentioned in the Speech from the Throne have been alluded to by honourable senators during this debate. With these I intend to deal very briefly.

The honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) and others who live in the great wheat-growing provinces are well informed on all matters relating to wheat, and will not expect that those of us who live far away from the prairies can discuss it with a different background. But as a buyer of wheat, I want to suggest to the Government and to the Wheat Board that they took a rather backward step when they inserted in the regulations a clause which prohibits a poultry raiser or turkey raiser in British Columbia from obtaining grain from his own farm outside the province. This restriction goes too far in curtailing the liberty of the subject. It precludes the owner of a wheat farm on the prairies from utilizing his own wheat to feed his chickens or turkeys elsewhere. There is a great market in British Columbia for wheat. Incidentally, as a buyer of wheat, may I say that I never could and I cannot yet understand why I and others in the same position are called upon to pay such high prices for grades 6, 7, 8 and 9. I have procured wheat for my own poultry which at times is hardly fit to be thrown to them, and when one is called upon to pay anywhere from $3 to $3.25 for 100 pounds of it, one just wonders why.

I want to deal first of all with health insurance, a subject we have been hearing a great deal about these days. Nearly everyone seems to be jumping on the band wagon of health insurance, and a few weeks ago a federal-provincial conference on the subject was held in Ottawa. But I wonder if those who talk so much about health insurance have really tried to map out an effective program of some kind to indicate what they mean. British Columbia has a hospital scheme to which the public contributes by way of a sales tax, the rate of which was originally 2 per cent but is now 5 per cent. Last year the provincial Government collected $60 million and expects to collect some $66 million this year. I have been told on good authority that the federal Government may grant the British Columbia Government $17½ million. Well, let me tell you that this amount will be just gravy to the Social Credit Government out there, and I am willing to bet anyone in this chamber that they will not reduce their present 5 per cent sales tax. I would suggest to the federal Government, through this honourable body, that this $17½ million should be used to help people pay costs of surgical operations and lengthy illnesses, for I have found in my travels that these costs are the ones which cause the most concern. And aside from these things, I am frank to say that I can find no great burning desire on the part of the Canadian people generally to go much further in the matter of a national health scheme.

I hasten to say, of course, that the CCF party in the other place and throughout the country, as well as trade unions, are talking glibly about national health insurance, and are continually needling the dominion Government about it; and of course the Government listening to the voice of the people, and, thinking expenditures on health insurance may help to keep it in office, is ready to hand out further moneys. But who can say what we are aiming at or who will lay down a program of national health insurance?

I endorse the speech made by the honourable senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw) in which he advised the federal Government to go slow in this matter. Since the last war many Canadians—and a number of the provincial governments—have been only too willing and anxious for the federal Government to come to their help with respect to almost every kind of service. In fact, it is my own opinion that some provinces would be willing to relinquish certain of their rights under the British North America Act, provided the federal Government took over the financial responsibilities and paid the shot. Trade unions, together with municipal and provincial governments, are making demands on the federal Government for a national health insurance plan, but they are not saying just what they mean or want.

Do they want to go as far as Great Britain has gone? I happened to pay a visit there last year and I was really not too surprised to learn that they are beginning to restrict their national health insurance scheme. The United Kingdom Government has been providing false teeth, ear trumpets and eye glasses. One doctor said he never knew there were so many people with poor eyesight and poor hearing in Great Britain. Many of them were not content with one pair of glasses, but wanted two or more pairs, each with differently coloured frames. Some people were known to have three sets of false teeth, three pairs of glasses and I don't know how many ear trumpets. The Government realized that if this thing went on, human nature being what it is, it would ruin the country. So the regulations have been changed, and now people who need false teeth or glasses or hearing aids must pay a good proportion of their cost.

I join with the honourable senator from Medicine Hat in warning our Government to be careful in this matter. I trust that the Government of British Columbia, when it is handed this sum of $17½ million, will remember the suggestion I have made about contributing toward the costs of operations and doctors' bills.

Incidentally, I am surprised that the federal Government has never taken exception to the size of the hospital in Vancouver, the costliest in the province. I have said that many times before, and I would like to enlarge on that point at some other time.

I come now to the subject of education. I listened with a great deal of interest to the two honourable senators who spoke on education earlier in this debate, and I compliment them very highly on their speeches. I think the newcomers to this chamber so far have brought a very wholesome uplift to our debates here.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Sometimes I think that those of us who have been here as members of Parliament for many years may be a little too close to the picture to get a clear view of what should be done. Some of the newly appointed members, many of whom have not formerly been in public life, are bringing a wholesome breath to the discussions in the Senate. I commend them, and trust they will keep it up. Of course, that does not mean to say that I agree with all they said in their speeches.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Not by any means. I realize that both honourable senators to whom I have alluded have had a great deal of experience in the field of education. I speak as a layman, but as one who has had a lot of practical experience with human beings. I was raised with the principle of the three R's, so to speak, and seem to get along very well, but in this grand new age perhaps that is now considered old-fashioned and insufficient. However, I am wondering if the assistance that the two honourable senators are asking for from the federal Government would help to solve the problem at all. They have joined the band wagon in the cry for more money from the federal Government—but what for? For universities. Well, it cannot be said that British Columbia is poor and cannot afford a better educational system. If one can believe the published figures, British Columbia is also in the rich class, as it has reduced its debt by $65 million, and expects to reduce it further this year by $26 million. And I am especially surprised that the honourable senator from Banff (Hon. Mr. Cameron) should ask for help from the federal Government for universities, as Alberta is one of our richest provinces—indeed, the only province able to clear off its debt. That is a beautiful picture of progress if it is honestly correct. Therefore, I would say there is no great reason for asking the federal Government to assist the universities in those two provinces, at least.

In order to develop my thought a little more fully, I want to say that when I speak of British Columbia, I think the people of that province are looking at the picture wrongly; they seem to think they have to build marvellous schools, complete with showers, and every other modern convenience. All these things go under the heading of "education", and so the cost of schools is going higher and higher. I know of one school in which a classroom for children of the entering age cost $50,000, and the walls of that room were embellished with mosaic pictures of Little Bo Peep. Oh, I was called old-fashioned because I criticized that. But that is the trend today. School buildings must have gymnasiums and shower baths, rooms for all the teachers, and so on. These things make costs go up continually, and there is a cry for help to the federal Government to maintain this kind of thing.

However, honourable senators, that is not the real problem of education. I have here a newspaper article on McGill University, and as I am heartily in accord with what the writer says I would like to read some extracts:

> Dr. James said that a careful study of the records indicated that "rather less than a half of those who enter (the faculty of arts and science) as freshmen ever complete the requirements for a degree."
> "Some losses and failures are inevitable," he said, "but there can be no doubt that first year failures (and the admission of students to McGill who do not deserve to be admitted) are primarily responsible for the fact that in engineering only 46 per cent of the entering class graduated in the normal period of study and another 11 per cent after further study and supplemental examinations."

And a little farther on:

> Discussing the vast increase in applications that the universities can expect within the next 10 years when the universities begin to feel the impact of the higher birth rate of the war years, Dr. James pointed out that if McGill were to maintain its percentage of the total Canadian university enrolment, it would have to expect an enrolment of more than 13,000 students in 1965.

The article goes on to say:

> Dr. James said that an expansion to 9,500 instead of to 13,000 would be "great enough to meet the needs of all those applicants whose ability and character are demonstrable."

In other words, Dr. James is saying that many students who are going to university should not be going.

I will quote from Newsweek an article under the caption "College for all?":

> Whenever two or three college presidents are gathered together, the conversation, or, if there is an audience, the speeches, are almost certain to deal with what has become the standard cliche of the time, the rising tide, sometimes for variety's sake, termed the oncoming tide, or the tidal wave.
> Just how to cope with this "rising tide", says President Benjamin F. Wright of Smith College, should be cause for serious thought. But he is certain of one thing: "To talk of a liberal college education for all, or for half, of those from 17 to 22 is sentimental and dangerous nonsense. To advocate an education for all in accordance with their capacities and the country's needs is sober sense."

A little farther down the writer continues:

> Thomas Jefferson was one of the foremost advocates in modern history of free public education, from elementary schools through state universities . . . Jefferson repeatedly expressed his belief in the inequality of intellectual capacities and attainments. All persons should be given—or exposed to—an elementary education, what in today's jargon might be called a basic education. Not all should go on to the higher studies. Both the amount and the kind of education should depend upon capacity and purpose. And therein lies the relevance of his philosophy for the problems of the years ahead.

Honourable senators, I endorse those views. I could quote at greater length as to what is happening in the field of education. It is well known that the universities are crowded, because every father and mother wants their children to go to college, whether they are mentally qualified or not.

I do not know if one should quote from Old Country sources, because conditions there are vastly different from those in Canada; however, I made some inquiries regarding the educational system in Britain, and I was told that at the age of 12 the boys and girls are tested, and those who pass certain examinations go on to university, while the remaining group go on to higher grades of public school. I do not think anyone could say that people coming from Britain are uneducated or unable to meet the educational standards of this country. I am simply saying that that is the information I received when I was over there last year.

One of the things I wish to draw to the attention of honourable senators is this. It is difficult for me to understand why anyone would throw at us stories about Russia and what is being done in that country today regarding education, with the implication that the United States and Canada should go along the same line. I am thinking particularly of the large groups of young men and women in Russia who are being trained as engineers and scientists. Persons in this country who paint a rosy picture of the great and efficient educational system of Russia should be challenged and asked whether they are prepared to sacrifice and to live the kind of lives the Russian people live.

Certain facts must be borne in mind: the Russians are not eating as much today as they ate in 1928; women workers constitute some 45 per cent of the employed persons in factories, institutions and on farms; there is no absenteeism; there is no coffee break. And may I pause to say that the coffee break is the finest scheme ever invented to help pass the work time; indeed, I wonder how some of us have lived to this good day without that device. Of course, I know our friend the senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) does not agree with what I am saying; but maybe I shall have an opportunity at another time to take him up on some such questions as these.

Further, the Russian system allows no strikes, no slow-downs, no late arrivals—and for anyone who does not conform, the penalty is prison or a slave labour camp. That is the compulsion or penalty that is mainly keeping the Russian youth on their toes and working so hard. But still Russia is unable to adequately feed her people.

Perhaps I should mention at this juncture some of the latest figures I have gathered regarding Russia's geography and population. In area it embraces some 12 million square miles, of which only one-sixth is suitable for agriculture; in other words, Russia must maintain her 215 million people on 2 million square miles. Compare that with Canada, with its area of 1,792,000 square miles of usable or agricultural land and a population of only 16 million.

What will be the final result in Russia, with the younger people being taken from the farm and put into industry? One can scarcely pick up an American magazine or newspaper without reading glowing accounts of Russia's industrial progress, but hardly a word does one read about the fact that the people are eating less than the people of this country. Are those who advocate that we follow the trend of Russian progress prepared to give up their five-day week, their absenteeism, their holidays, their cars and all their other luxuries? In my quiet moments I sometimes wonder whether the great luxuries enjoyed by the people on the North American continent, compared with the hardships of such countries as Russia—which is intent on conquering the world—may not very largely some day be our undoing. I hope and pray that they will not be our downfall. But the fact is that the people of this continent are taking all they can get and asking for more. I notice that today the United States is using 50 per cent of her output to buy cars, television sets and bobby pins for her people.

I am sorry, honourable senators, but because of my limited time tonight I am unable to develop fully the subject of education; perhaps there will be an opportunity in a later debate to say something more about it. I believe that our educational system needs more than just monetary help for the expansion of universities and the erection of school buildings. To my way of thinking, the whole educational system from the lower school up, needs to be revised. I think it was the President of the University of British Columbia who said that many of the young people who come from high schools to that institution have to be taught English all over again. Perhaps the three R's were not all they were supposed to be when I was young, but today when I go into a store and buy a couple of items I am always annoyed to see that the young clerk has to take a pencil and paper to add two small figures. Perhaps these things may not be fundamental to education, but I think we should take a good look at our system and decide whether it ought not to be revised before we rush into the building of marble schools and lavish universities for our children, and at the same time listen to the cries of some rich provinces for federal aid.

I should like now to turn to a subject with which I am more familiar—fisheries.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: First, may I interrupt the honourable senator to ask a question?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I wonder if the honourable senator knows that Canadian universities have a minimum entrance requirement of 60 to 65 per cent before students are allowed into engineering, medicine or related faculties?

Hon. Mr. Reid: I did not know that. But if my friend will allow me the liberty of a suggestion, I would say that he should send that information to the head of McGill University, the source of some material I quoted a few moments ago. I think if you look generally at the other universities you will find the figures are somewhat similar; and the reason so many of the students fail is that they are not prepared to do the necessary hard work required of them.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Most university people would agree with you . . .

The Hon. the Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I should like again to thank the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) for the opportunity of placing before honourable senators what we in fisheries believe to be a great menace in the province of British Columbia. Perhaps I can start off in no better way for laying the ground work for my remarks than by saying that the Fraser River is the greatest salmon stream in the known world. It has a length of close to one thousand miles and drains approximately 90,000 square miles of land. I think it was in 1853 that a sailing ship came from Great Britain, around the Cape of Good Hope, and up into the Fraser River. The captain wrote back to the ship's owners saying that the vessel, in trying to make progress up the Fraser River, was impeded by the great hordes of salmon. Indeed, it has been said of those days that one could walk across the river on the backs of the salmon, as they came there by the teeming millions.

Then in 1913, when the Canadian Northern Railway was being built from the Prairies into British Columbia, it passed through an area known as Hell's Gate Canyon, where the Fraser River forces its way through a narrow gorge in the Rocky Mountains. The contractors building the railway looked at the mountain and at the river some 100 to 150 feet deep, with the water rushing through at some 120 miles per hour, and decided that the canyon was a good place to dump the rock from the construction operation, so they dynamited thousands and thousands of tons of rock down into the canyon. Nobody paid much attention to what the contractors were doing, but that year, as the salmon were headed up the Fraser to return to the spawning beds up river from Hell's Gate, millions of them died before they reached the spawning beds.

Now, honourable senators, the sockeye salmon is different from all other fish. It has a characteristic all its own: it will not lay its eggs anywhere but in the place where it came from or was born. So these salmon in their millions that year found their way up the Fraser, but only as far as Hell's Gate. I am not exaggerating when I say that there were at least 10 million to 12 million sockeye salmon trying to fight their way through the canyon headed for the spawning beds above Hell's Gate. In that year 2·5 million cases of sockeye salmon were canned, which is equal to a catch of about 30 million fish. Added to the 9 million to 12 million going up to spawn, it made that year a total of about 40 to 45 million salmon.

As I say, honourable senators, the sockeye salmon run in 1913 found its way up the Fraser blocked. The loss was not properly assessed nor was it actually discovered until about four years later, in 1917, which was the cycle year. The sockeye is a four-year fish. Some varieties, like the Pink, are a two-year fish. That is, from the time they are born until the time they come back to spawn, two years elapse. But in the case of the sockeye salmon, from the time they come out of gravel until they come back from the sea, four years elapse, although in some cases five years have been known to elapse.

There are six varieties of salmon, namely, Sockeye, Pink, Cohoe, Chum, Spring and Steelhead—the last named and Spring being very game fish and sought by anglers.

By the year 1917, the fourth year from 1913, instead of 2·5 million cases being canned, the quantity dropped to just under 450,000 cases, and following 1917 the number of cases canned went down and down. Now, the question will be asked: why did the Canadian Government not endeavour to correct matters after the impact of the damage was discovered in 1917? True, some attempt was made by the Government. The reason why it did not do more is this: The fish are born in British Columbia waters and head out to sea 18 months or so after they are born, but on their return they come through United States waters and the Americans, generally speaking, have the first crack at them. From 1917 right up until 1930 steps were taken by the Canadian Government to come to an agreement with the United States Government. It was felt, and I think honourable senators will realize the wisdom of it, that British Columbia or Canada should not go ahead and remedy the situation and then see the Americans get the greater number of salmon on their way back to the spawning beds. I may point out that in those days the Americans were getting, without any expense to themselves, 65 to 75 per cent of all the salmon heading back to Canadian waters.

Negotiations continued and eventually a treaty was passed by the Parliament of Canada in 1930, but it was not ratified by the United States until 1937. It is true that the treaty passed the American Congress earlier, but it was not approved by the President until 1937. In that year the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission was set up. Three Americans and three Canadians were appointed to the Commission, of which I was one, and I have, shall I say, the honour of being its vice-Chairman and the sole remaining original member. We were given the task under the treaty to rehabilitate and bring back once again the great runs of sockeye salmon to the Fraser River.

It was stipulated that during the first eight years of the life of the treaty we could not regulate, but had to carry out research. After that period had elapsed, starting in 1946 we commenced to regulate and have been regulating ever since. Two duties devolve upon us: we set the dates for the opening and closing of the season for both United States and Canadian fishermen; and we have to see to it that the catch is divided as equally as possible between the two countries. May I tell you it has been quite a headache for our biological staff to divide the yearly catch equally between the two countries, because a guess has to be made as to the size of the catch, and as the Americans fish first it could very easily be that they would get the greater portion. However, the fact is—and it may seem astounding—that the catch has been divided so nearly equally between the two countries that the inequality up to 1955 amounts to only about one-half of one per cent and slightly in Canada's favour. I think it is most remarkable that of the millions of sockeye salmon that find their way back to their spawning beds we are able to make this almost equal division.

As a matter of fact, honourable senators, our Commission as such is the envy of many other commissions. Let me give you a brief idea as to why we have attained such wonderful results. There are two reasons: first of all, we have had ample funds with which to engage highly skilled biologists and engineers, which other fishery groups have not had. Our allotment from the Canadian Government is now running around $153,000, and we get the same amount from the United States Government, so we have adequate funds to go into every aspect of research in regard to the sockeye salmon of the Fraser, and that has helped greatly. The second reason—and in saying this I am giving credit to all the commissioners—is that we were given the authority to tell the director of the biologists what we wanted, and to keep them to the task before us. So there has been a wonderful success, and today our Commission is the envy of most fishery research boards.

Now, what are the results? The problem of Hell's Gate has been solved. We have carried out extensive tagging experiments on the salmon at Hell's Gate and right out on the fishing grounds. We tagged 55,000 fish at Hell's Gate alone, and had a crew of men who were able to find why these fish were blocked, why they could not get through. We discovered that if the height of the water in the canyon was 120 feet, no fishway was necessary—the salmon went through on their own; but if the water rose from 120 to 145 feet, the result was as though a gate had been dropped in the water; no fish could get through. However when, as occasionally happened, the water passed the 145-foot mark, the salmon worked their way through without great difficulty. So, after a great deal of experimentation, we built right in the rock of the canyon walls fishways which did not and do not interfere with the flow of water, but which enable salmon, at water levels of between 120 and 145 feet, to pass through without being blocked. In this way the entire system is being restored. For us, 1954 was a big year: it witnessed the greatest run of salmon into the interior that has been seen by most people. In 1913, as I have said, 30 million salmon were packed, though 10 million were lost at Hell's Gate. During the four years 1950-54, the commercial catch on both sides amounted to 18 million. On the basis of the figure of 18 million fish, compared with 1909-1913 the catch for 1950-1954 represents about 56 per cent.

There is still quite a lot to be done. We believe that within a foreseeable time, at the rate we are progressing, we shall restore the runs to equal the 1913 figure, provided, of course, that no obstacles such as dams are built in the river. Time is limited, and I do not want to delay honourable senators too long, so I am avoiding detail and merely covering the salient points of the story.

Coming to the matter of the dams, the reason we are able to speak so authoritatively and so positively is that in the 16 or 17 years of our operations we have found the answers to most of our problems. This, I repeat, is due to the fact that we have had ample funds with which to carry on investigations and to employ for this purpose very competent men. One of them, Milo Bell, is in the highest class of fisheries engineers on the North American continent; another official with a continental reputation is Lloyd Royal, our Director, the man in charge of our investigations. With the aid of biologists and a scientific staff we have found answers to many problems. But it is still very difficult to get the public outside—even so-called fishery engineers, as well as the heads of the British Columbia Electric—to understand the facts we are trying to tell them. They have the idea that salmon are salmon. To them, water is just water, though to a fish it is not. In this connection let me mention one experiment which is going on now, and which some honourable senators, even from Ontario, may not have heard about. There are very few fish in Hudson Bay. Officials of the federal Department of Fisheries in the province of Ontario asked last fall if we would hatch one million eggs of a variety of salmon called the pink salmon, as they wanted to put them in Hudson Bay. As some of you know, in the fish-hatching process the eye is the first thing that comes out on the egg. This is called the eyed-egg stage. Some 900 thousand eyed-eggs were taken up to Hudson Bay; about 4 feet of ice, I understand, was cut through, and the eggs were embedded in the gravel of the bay, in the hope that enough of them would survive to create a pink salmon fishery in Hudson Bay. Our biologists are not very hopeful of the success of this project, not because they are opposed to it—it is none of our business—but because, they believe, there is little or no fish food in the bay. Fish food is known as plankton; it is invisible, but that does not mean that biologists and other scientists, using very fine nets, cannot take it out from the water. Unless a body of water contains sufficient plankton you cannot maintain a decent fishery, and the reason there may be no fishery in Hudson Bay is, as I have said, that little or no plankton is to be found there. Temperature, too, plays its part in this matter. Fish are very susceptible to differences of temperature. If the water is too cold they may perish; if it exceeds 65 degrees they cannot survive for spawning. So it will be readily understood why those of us who are interested in this matter are alarmed at the talk which is going on about diverting the waters from the Columbia River into the Fraser. The waters of the Columbia are glacial waters and contain, so our biologists tell us, little or no plankton. So if a volume of 10 million acre-feet is tunnelled from Mica Dam, the spot where it is proposed to build a dam and carry Columbia waters into the Fraser, nobody can tell what will happen.

I am not going to dwell on the details of one battle I have been fighting out west with the "powers that be" of the British Columbia Electric Company and the University of British Columbia. I understand these people are quite annoyed because I said that B.C. Electric handed $50,000 to the University to try to find an answer to this water problem. I am not implying that the men to whom the University has entrusted this research are ignorant; I should rather say that they are inexperienced; and honestly I do not know where they can get experience as to sockeye salmon other than at the Fraser River. That is the seat of the problem as regards the sockeye salmon. I have suggested that a solution might have been found more readily had these people come to officials of the federal department as well as to our Commission, with the funds, and asked to have competent men engaged in a co-operative effort to find an answer to the problem of the proposed dam.

I am not going to enter into an argument about the wisdom or unwisdom of what has been done. But I will state, as a result of my reading and information concerning Bill No. 3 which passed through Parliament last year, that it is perhaps a good thing that General McNaughton took the stand he did against United States interests and the Social Credit group in Victoria, because had their scheme been put into effect it might well have ruined for all time full development of the Columbia River. Had the federal Government not stepped in that scheme might have materialized and, as I say, ruined for all time our great heritage on the Columbia.

The federal Government is at present spending a considerable amount of money to discover dam sites on the Fraser to find out the full effect of diverting the water from the Columbia River to the Fraser River, and it has been proposed that ten dams be built on the Fraser. We have pointed out that this scheme cannot be carried out if the fisheries are to survive. I realize that it depends on where you live in British Columbia as to what viewpoint you have on this subject. Those in the interior who visualize the development of industry and the growth of towns are willing to see the fish industry wiped out. They say "What does it amount to anyway?" Well, it is now worth $25 million annually, and we expect it to be worth $50 million before very long. In the face of critical world food shortages are we going to sit idly by and allow this fishing industry, which has been steadily developed down through the years, to be wiped out in the interests of hydro-electric power?

We have been trying by every possible means to discover how the fish can be saved, but there is apparently no way the small fingerlings can be saved on their journey to the sea. The sockeye salmon usually lay their eggs in gravel beds and banks of rivers that flow into lakes, and when the eggs are hatched the fingerlings migrate to the lakes, where they live from 12 to 18 months. Then they head for the sea.

We realized we had to have scientific proof that dams were killing the fish so we set to work with three of our scientists to determine the mortality rate. We had the splendid co-operation of the federal Department of Fisheries in this work, as well as that of the State of Washington Fisheries, and it took us three years to complete it. Research work done at a 280 foot-high dam in the United States disclosed that there was a loss of 56 per cent in the sockeye fingerlings going over the dam—they are about 4 inches long when 16 to 18 months old—and a loss of 34 per cent going through the turbines. These figures are accurate and could be proven in any court of law. So we say to those who are going to build new dams: "What are you going to do about the fingerlings? And just how are you going to get the sockeye salmon past the dams?" Many people believe that the mortality of the fish depends on the height of the dam, but so far as the sockeye salmon in the Fraser River are concerned it is not the height of the dam but the obstruction of the dam itself that causes the damage. Every time they come to an obstruction they mill around for two or three days before attempting to surmount the obstruction. We have found through scientific research that a delay in their journey of from 10 to 12 days is fatal. It must be borne in mind that when the sockeye salmon leave the salt water for the spawning grounds they do not eat. They have only so much time to live, and some have to travel as far as 600 miles from the mouth of the river to the interior, living on their fat and sometimes even on their scales. They have a rendezvous with death, because after laying their eggs they die within two or three days, their life cycle being then completed. We have the most modern fishways available at Hell's Gate yet in 1954 the fish, because of their great numbers, were delayed getting through the fishways. Some 750,000 spawning sockeye salmon went through the fishways in one day alone. I might say that one of these fishways is 45 feet in height, 200 feet long and 20 feet wide. The one on the other bank is 460 feet long.

The people wanting to build power dams have sent engineers to fish dams on the Columbia River in the United States. By the way, at this point I might say I once put up a fight in the United States about those dams on the Columbia River, and had we been as alert and as attentive then to British Columbia as we are now we might have had more to say about the dams built in that country. In the year 1845 a treaty was signed between Great Britain and the United States which preserved the Columbia River for Canadians, as British subjects.

One of the big dams on the Columbia River is over 300 feet high, and no fish pass over it, but those who advocate the building of power dams refer to the Bonneville Dam to try to prove that the salmon fishing industry will not be destroyed on the Fraser River. I checked the figures just before coming to the Senate chamber tonight, and I read that this dam is unable to take more than 100,000 fish per day. Incidentally, the salmon do not usually move at night: they move in daylight, which is not over 14 hours, and rest at night. Bonneville Dam is 70 feet in height, and it is not sockeye salmon that go up over the fishway, but Chinook salmon, as they are known in the United States, or Spring salmon, as we call them. The highest number that can go through that fishway is 100,000 per day. From the Fraser River, at the present time, not less than 750,000 per day would have to go through the fishway. So these men who travel across the border to pick up information as to what is happening at Bonneville Dam, and say that the same thing applies to the Fraser, are quite wrong, because there is no comparison. Not only are the Chinook salmon not sockeye salmon, but in any event only a fraction are going up over that fishway as compared with what are going up over Hell's Gate. It can be well understood that if ten dams were built it would mean the wiping out of sockeye salmon. Fish have to reach their spawning grounds by a certain time, and if they are delayed they will die.

Schemes are put forward which I do not think the Government should consider at all. It has been suggested that a dam be built on the Fraser River at a place called Moran. The proposed dam would be 730 feet high, the highest and largest in the world. If the provincial Government ever gave permission for that dam to be built no salmon or fish of any kind would be left in the Fraser River. The Premier of British Columbia has said that until it can be proved that no harm would be done to the fish he will not grant a permit. I become a little alarmed when I read of statements made to the Premier like the following:

> Promoters of the project believe they have found a way of overcoming the problem presented in blocking of passage of upbound spawning salmon and sea-bound fingerlings by the huge dam.

Well, I realize the promoters have a job to do, and are receiving high salaries for doing it. I also realize that the American interests who would like to build this 730-foot dam are paying them for a favourable answer to the problem, but they are giving an answer to the Government of British Columbia which, I claim, is entirely false and misleading.

The International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission, of which I am Vice-Chairman, challenges anyone, scientists and others, to bring forward a scheme to solve the problem of bringing fingerlings safely over the dam. We have spent $25,000 a year for the past five years in an endeavour, by means of electrical rods in the water, to find a way to divert or guide these young fingerlings away from the dam and down a canal. It has been tried without success. We have investigated every known source, and have been in contact with every fishery board we know of, in various countries, and asked them for whatever knowledge or information they might have, but no solution has been found yet and it may never be found. Some proposed dams are only 35 feet high, while others are 50 and 100 feet high. However, it is not the height of the dam, but the fact that a series of blocks is put in the river, which will ruin the fish, for they cannot stand all these blocks. When Hell's Gate was blocked the sockeye salmon were nearly wiped out. We believe that if the dams are proceeded with the same thing will happen to the Fraser River Salmon fishery; and an industry now worth $25 million and which may some day be worth $50 million, will be ruined. This would mean disaster to the source of one of our finest foods at a time when the population of the world is increasing rapidly, as is the demand for food. We should not lightly throw away our heritage of the sockeye salmon.

I am very glad that the Minister of Fisheries has said that so far as he is concerned no permit will be given, but I am just a little fearful that the Fisheries Act does not contain all the power it should have to prevent it. And it should be remembered that while the dominion Government has the say with regard to an international river like the Columbia—where controversy has taken place between the United States Government, the provincial Government of British Columbia and the federal Government—the provincial Government could, if it saw fit, grant a licence to build dams on the Fraser River, which is under its control.

With regard to power development, we want to co-operate, but we say to the power interests: "Go to the Columbia River. You can develop there for Canada two and a half million horsepower; develop that, and give us a breathing spell for 40 or 50 years, and by that time maybe we will have the solution for bringing the sockeye salmon up and taking the fingerlings down; but do not divert the water from the Columbia into the Fraser, and do not build dams in the Fraser until you have explored the full extent of the Columbia River and examined the problem in the light of the salmon industry of the Fraser".

Honourable senators, I appreciate the kind attention you have given me. I trust I have not spoken too long: I felt I should try to give you a complete picture.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. McIntyre, the debate was adjourned.

ANTARCTIC SURVEY

On the notice of inquiry by Hon. Mr. Reid:

1. Is the Canadian ship Theron, at present operating in the Antarctic in preparation of the International Scientific Survey of that continent, beginning early in 1957, operating officially under, or on behalf of, the Canadian Government; and

2. Has any official recognition been given by the Government to Canada's participating with the other nations in the forthcoming scientific survey of the Antarctic?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, this inquiry has been on the order paper for several weeks. I would not like the house to suppose that I had forgotten all about it. The difficulty is that it is necessary to obtain information from several departments. I myself made inquiry today as to when the information is likely to come along, and I hope to have it within the next few days.

THE ESTIMATES

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be authorized to examine the expenditures proposed by the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957, in advance of the bills based on the said estimates reaching the Senate; that the said committee be empowered to send for records of revenues from taxation collected by the federal, provincial and municipal governments in Canada and the incidence of this taxation in its effect upon different income groups, and records of expenditures by such governments, showing sources of income and expenditures of same under appropriate headings, together with estimates of gross national production, net national income and movement of the cost-of-living index, and their relation to such total expenditures, for the year 1939 and for the latest year for which the information is available and such other matters as may be pertinent to the examination of the estimates, and to report upon the same.

That the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a motion to authorize the Committee on Finance to consider and examine the expenditures proposed by the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957, in advance of the bills based on the said estimates reaching the Senate. A motion similar to this was passed last year; and honourable senators will recall that the Finance Committee did consider the estimates in accordance with the provisions of that motion. I am informed that prior to 1950 the estimates were not considered by a Senate committee before the bills based on them were presented to this house, but in the session of that year the estimates were referred to various standing committees. However, there was not sufficient accommodation to enable all the committees to meet as often as desired. Also, as a number of senators were members of several of the committees it became impossible for some committees to obtain a quorum while others were sitting, and generally that procedure was not found to be satisfactory. In 1951 the estimates were referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, and this procedure was again followed in 1952 and in 1955.

It will be recalled that in those years the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) served as chairman of the Finance Committee, and we have not forgotten the splendid service which he rendered to the Senate and to the country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I know the house regrets that the honourable senator does not feel he should continue the onerous task of chairman, and on behalf of all honourable members I wish to extend our appreciation to him for the fine services he has rendered in that capacity.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: At the same time we are very fortunate in that the honourable senator from Milford-Hants (Hon. Mr. Hawkins) has agreed to take the chairmanship of this committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable senator, who is a man of wide business experience, has been a member of the committee for several years and has taken a very active part in its work. I am sure he will render to the Senate and to Canada the same fine type of service as was given by his predecessor.

Hon. Charles G. Hawkins: Honourable senators, in assuming the chairmanship of the Standing Committee on Finance, I am not unmindful of the high standard established by my predecessor, the honourable member from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar). His singular achievement as head of the committee constitutes but one more milestone in the long and distinguished service which he has rendered to Canada. It is very comforting to me, as I know it is to all members of this house, that we shall continue to have the benefit of his wise counsel and excellent judgment in our future endeavours.

All members of the committee will have received a copy of the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957, containing expenditures for the coming year, together with a summary of standard objects of expenditures and special categories, as well as explanatory notes governing these expenditures.

Very shortly I plan to call the committee together, as these expenditures are very important to all members of this house, as well as to every citizen of Canada. I ask each member of the committee to give careful scrutiny to the matters I have mentioned.

I feel that this committee is especially well equipped to render valuable service to the Canadian people. I respectfully solicit the wholehearted co-operation of every member, for the report will reflect the combined effort of each individual comprising the group. I am looking forward with a great deal of interest to the task before us.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, I would be ungrateful if I did not acknowledge the kind remarks of the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), and also those of the honourable senator from Milford-Hants (Hon. Mr. Hawkins), who is now Chairman of the Finance Committee; they have been generous in their references to any part I have played as chairman in the past.

It may be of interest to the house if I give my reasons for not continuing as chairman of the committee this year. The reasons are twofold. One, personal: I have some other plans in contemplation which, if they mature, would somewhat handicap me if I had the responsibility of the chairmanship. The second reason is much more compelling, so far as I am concerned. I hold pretty strongly to the view that the chairmanships of our committees should not be fixed permanently and indefinitely upon any one individual. Perhaps I am alone in holding that view. It can indeed be said to be the practice at Washington for chairmanships of committees to be of a permanent nature, for the appointments go by seniority. As everyone knows, and as Washington itself realizes, I am sure, there have been some strange results from that rule. I think that chairmanships of committees in the Senate should rotate. I am not conceited enough to think that I am the only individual in the Senate who can successfully be Chairman of the Finance Committee; in fact, I am sure there are several honourable members who could perform the duty perhaps even more worthily than I have done in the past. That view which I hold may not find much acceptance in certain quarters, but, believing it as I do, I felt I should vacate the office and give someone else a chance to preside over the work of the committee. I am sure that our colleague the senator from Milford-Hants (Hon. Mr. Hawkins) will give his very best effort to the committee, and I shall be glad to assist in any way I can as Chairman emeritus.

If I may be permitted to say a few words more: there are several things which I think this committee could undertake. The resolution which we shall presently adopt is similar to if not the same as resolutions on which the committee has acted in the past. That is all to the good. I am a great believer in the principle that in a democratic society we must give the facts to the people. After all, it is the people who in the end must judge; and if they are to judge intelligently, they must have the knowledge on which to pass judgment.

The work of the committees of this house, admirable as it has been, could be extended. For instance, may I suggest that I should like to see an inquiry by one of our committees into the sale of government annuities through the Department of Labour. I hold the view very strongly, and I have said this before, that the need for the dealing by the government in annuities has long since past. The practice was originally introduced by Sir William Mulock when he was Postmaster General, as a means of enabling people to make provision for their old age. It was entirely worthwhile at that time because there was no other opportunity to buy annuities. But today annuities can be bought from practically every life insurance company in Canada, and their sale can be much more effectively managed by such companies than by a government department.

But that is not the only reason why I object. My main reason is that I think every annuity sold today will at some time result in a demand being made on the treasury to keep the fund solvent from which to pay the annuitant his claim at maturity. With all the expenditures that we have to face, there is no need today to continue this one; the need can be met outside government altogether.

I have just one parting word: the longer I live and the more I observe the practices of parliaments and governments, not only here but elsewhere, the more I am convinced that the less interference there is by government in matters of this kind the better it is for the people as a whole.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The motion was agreed to.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, seconded by Hon. Mr. Croll, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. James P. McIntyre: Honourable senators, I wish to join with those who have paid well deserved tributes to the mover (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) and seconder (Hon. Mr. Croll) of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Both honourable gentlemen made a great impression on this assembly. I have had the privilege of listening to addresses on similar occasions for upwards of 35 years, and may I say that none have been on a higher plane than those delivered by our two honourable colleagues. They did honour not only to themselves but to the provinces and constituencies which they represent.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McIntyre: I wish to congratulate the new members who have taken their seats in this chamber. Their selection brings to this house a wide variety of experience. They represent many different occupations: among them are lawyers, a former provincial premier, representatives of industry, former members of the House of Commons, a former cabinet minister, a director of an educational institution, and a Commander of the Order of the British Empire, who received his decoration at the hands of the late King George VI. There are amongst them some Conservatives, some Liberals and a few Independents. They represent a combination of experience that would be hard to duplicate.

My remarks today, honourable senators, will be chiefly about the Senate, because of the criticism of it by certain newspapers and some members of the House of Commons. To answer those criticisms requires some research into history to find out why the Senate was created, what are its functions and what it stands for.

Parliament, which includes the Senate, is an ancient institution, which at times I fear people take too much for granted. They forget the upheavals and the trials which went into making it what it is, and what it means to the preservation of liberty and the orderly conduct of public affairs. When a thing comes to be taken too much for granted, it stagnates; and so there must at all times be intelligent public interest to maintain its vitality.

So it is in matters of government. Since free men usually differ in their views, where there is intelligent interest there also will be found constructive criticism and suggestion. No scheme of government in existence today has endured so long as the British parliamentary system which, with a few modifications suited to our need, is the one under which we operate in Canada.

First, however, let me say a word about the Parliament of Canada and the place in our system of government which is occupied by the Senate. We follow the pattern of the British government structure. There, Parliament consists of the Queen, the Lords and the Commons. Here it is the Queen, the Senate and the Commons. As we all know, members of the House of Commons, sometimes called the Lower House, are elected, while the Senate consists of men and women appointed by the Crown.

The House of Commons is constituted on the principle of representation according to population, and so it is that out of today's membership of 265 in that chamber, about one-half come from the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

The Senate is constituted on the principle of representation according to territorial divisions. For this purpose, at the time of Confederation, Canada was regarded as consisting of three separate areas: Upper Canada (Ontario), Lower Canada (Quebec) and the Maritime provinces. British Columbia and the other western provinces subsequently were constituted a fourth territorial division and given equal representation with the other three. Accordingly, our Senate now consists of 102 members, with 24 being nominated from and representing, respectively, the western provinces, Ontario, Quebec, and the Maritimes, and six from Newfoundland.

If time permitted it might be useful to make some detailed review of the historical background and the reasons for the differences in the constitution of our two Houses of Parliament, and the reason why the House of Commons, on the one hand, is elective, and the Senate, on the other hand, is nominative. I will be content with one or two brief observations regarding the reasons which prompted the Fathers of Confederation to lay out the pattern of our national Parliament as they did. I think that I can best do this by stating two simple propositions and then making a few comments on each.

The first is that if there had not been provision for a Senate, or Upper House, as it sometimes is called, there would have been no Confederation and no Dominion of Canada as we know it today. The importance attached to the constitution of the Senate by the Fathers of Confederation can be gathered from the fact that practically the whole of six days out of a total of 14 spent by them in discussing the details of the Confederation pact were devoted to this branch of our Parliament. A perusal of the Confederation Debates of 1865 makes it clear that the Maritime provinces and Quebec declined to enter the scheme of union unless there was a Senate. They anticipated the situation which, in fact, obtains today, where only two of the regions of Canada, on the basis of population, could control the deliberations of the House of Commons. As was said at the time by Sir John A. Macdonald:

> . . . In order to protect local interests and prevent sectional jealousies it was found requisite that the three great divisions into which British North America is separated should be represented in the Upper House on the principle of equality.

The provinces, and especially those which I have mentioned, in joining a union in which they were to surrender a large measure of their independence wanted to be sure that a parliamentary majority, supported in some sections of Canada but perhaps not in others, could not legislate against their interests, local or racial, without the balance-wheel of a second chamber: a sort of court of review in which the respective territorial regions of the country were to be equally represented and which would be less dependent on the passing fancies of the electors than the House of Commons. Thus, in the same speech to which I have already referred, Sir John A. Macdonald refers to the Senate as "the sober second thought in legislation". There is an important piece of evidence that the sentiment as expressed by Quebec and the Maritimes then has not changed since 1867. As recently as 1927 a Dominion-Provincial conference was asked to consider the subject of abolition or reform of the Senate. The provinces were unanimously opposed to abolition and there was no suggestion for reform of sufficient merit to warrant a conclusion of the assembly, and it was so expressed by the Prime Minister last year.

I have said that without provision for a Senate there could have been no Confederation. The second proposition which I would now state is that, without a Senate, even now, it is doubtful if Confederation could long endure.

While my first submission is easily established from the records of the past, my second may not be so obvious. It rests on the conviction that the need to safeguard the minority and sectional rights and interests of Canada is as great today as ever it was. In recent years we have seen new parties spring up, often on a local or provincial basis. Today there is one party which dominates in Alberta and enjoys little support anywhere else with the exception of British Columbia. There is another that is now powerful in Saskatchewan, with limited support elsewhere. There are at least three parties in Quebec contending for support which have no backing in the other provinces. The possibility of a House of Commons dominated by a party or combination of parties composed of members from only two of the four great regions of Canada cannot be dismissed. Absence of the guarantee of "sober thought" for legislaton by a body conscious of the interests of all parts of the country would give rise to anxiety and, possibly, in time, would result in a demand for separation. Even stipulated, in these days when legislation so often touches the personal rights and interests of the people, the demands we hear put forward on sectional grounds from time to time would assume more weight and might constitute a much greater menace were there not the Upper House.

With this brief and wholly inadequate explanation of the reasons for the creation of the Senate, and some of those bearing upon the need for its continuance as an integral part of our parliamentary system, perhaps I might pass to some observation as to how the Senate does its work.

Today you will find amongst its membership many men with long experience in Parliament and a good number who have served in federal and provincial cabinets. Others have been leaders in various fields in private life —labour, farming, business and various professions, including the army. I can assert with confidence that today's Senate membership constitutes a very real representation of the various occupational, racial and economic characteristics of the Canadian people. Occasionally one hears the Senate referred to as an assemblage of "old fogies" or "worn-out politicians". Let me state that such a conception of the membership of the Upper House could not be further from the truth. The first impression I received on entering the Senate was of the high standard of experience and business and political intelligence of the men with whom I found myself associated. Of course, there are some senators who are in the evening of life; but, speaking as I am to an assembly of people born mostly in the twentieth century, I think you will agree with me that without the wisdom which comes of long years of experience, leadership in Canadian government might be expected to follow a rather uncertain and perilous course. In times of stress and national emergency, I would take, any day, the legislative sagacity of the wrinkled and white-thatched brow in preference to the inexperienced and sometimes reckless self-assurance of youth. Certainly, let us have more younger men in the government, but let us also retain the tempering influence of the older statesmen.

Notwithstanding that the Senate has vested in it co-extensive authority with the House of Commons regarding the initiation of legislation—excepting any bill resulting in a tax—most acts of parliament start in the Lower House and get second treatment in the Senate. In the later stages the Senate puts in a great deal of intensive work, both in full session and in committees, considering and revising a rush of legislation from the Lower House. Unhappily, the public is not really alive to the very considerable volume of work which is done by the Senate. Unlike in the House of Commons, very few bills are considered in committee of the whole house, but are referred to one or other of the special standing committees for consideration; and changes are made. Some of these changes have been important; others less so; but it is clear, even from recent experience, that there is need in our parliamentary system for a body of review. How many Canadians are aware of the fact that the Senate in the past has effected numerous and substantial savings to the taxpayer of this country by rejecting legislation which originated in the Lower House? In this connection, not long ago I found an interesting statement made by the late Senator Charles Murphy in the course of debate, referring to the work of the Senate. It was not by any means an exhaustive review of the record of the Senate, but, by mention of only some ten bills which had been rejected or amended by the Senate—bills having to do with the appropriation of moneys for public works, the construction of railways and similar undertakings—he was able to show that the taxpayers of Canada had been saved in excess of one hundred million dollars.

I might also refer to the Naval Bill of 1912, when Mr. Monk resigned from the cabinet of Sir Robert Borden and, addressing the Prime Minister, said:

> I regret that I cannot concur in the decision arrived at by the cabinet yesterday to place on behalf of Canada an emergency contribution of $35,000,000 at the disposal of the British Government for naval purposes, with the consent of Parliament but without giving the Canadian people an opportunity of expressing their approval of this important step through a plebiscite.

Mr. Monk was succeeded as Minister of Public Works by the Honourable Robert Rogers. The bill was debated in the House of Commons for a very long time, and finally passed, but in this chamber it was defeated by a vote of 51 to 27. Had it passed it might have become an annual charge over a number of years. The action of the Senate at that time saved the taxpayers not only $35 million, but probably hundreds of millions of dollars. The Senate in reviewing and revising federal legislation at its source is protecting the rights and liberties of our people, and its function in this respect can be regarded as of equal importance with the function of administering the criminal and civil laws of the land.

Now, even apart from the fact that bills usually go to the Commons first and often move slowly to the Senate, it is to be expected that the Upper House will not spend as much time in session as will the House of Commons. In this connection it is important to remember that there are only 102 senators, at the most, and there are 265 members of the House of Commons. Naturally, 265 persons are bound to do a whole lot more talking than 102. The members of the Commons, moreover, represent the people directly and are charged by their constituents with the special responsibility of airing their complaints and suggestions. Long silence on the part of a member of the House of Commons, or refusal to champion a cause close to the hearts of his electors, may be fatal to his future aspirations. As an indication of what I have in mind in this respect, let me refer to the debate on the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne, and the debate on the budget, which are two major discussions taking place in the normal session. At these times members may discuss almost any subject under the sun. In the Commons these debates often take many weeks. In the Senate they ordinarily occupy only a few days. As I have said, speeches in the Commons to a large extent—and very properly so—are made for the purpose of expressing what members conceive to be the views and wishes of the particular constituencies which have sent them to Ottawa.

I have purposely mentioned these debating practices in the House of Commons, not because I am not in agreement with them—on the contrary, I believe them to be essential to our democratic system—but chiefly because the Senate occasionally is criticized on the ground that it does not sit as many days nor do as much speech-making as the other house. Such criticism, like a good deal based on other grounds, ignores the Senate's real function, which is essentially different from that of the House of Commons. As was once said by a former leading member of our Chamber, "the Senate should be a workshop and not a theatre".

In referring rather summarily to some of the charges levelled at the Senate, I have no desire to dismiss the question of reform. For instance, I have heard suggestions that the Senate should be elective, or that appointments to this chamber should be made on the recommendation of provincial governments or provincial legislatures. With regard to the suggestion for the election of senators, I might point out in passing that this proposal was very carefully considered by the Fathers of Confederation, who rejected the idea after having some considerable experience with an elective second chamber in the old province of Upper Canada. Whatever may be one's individual views regarding proposals for reform, constructive suggestions are both practical and legitimate subjects for discussion in a democracy which wishes to keep its institutions alive and in tune with the times.

There is no true democracy, however, in the talk of a politician who undertakes to abolish the Senate if, on achieving power in the Commons, he finds the Upper House will not do his bidding. To abolish the Senate would be to make a fundamental change in the political structure of the federated provinces of this dominion. We have only to recall the demands of the Confederation conference for the institution of the Senate, and of the Dominion-Provincial Conference in 1927 for its continuance, to realize that its abolition would remove the safeguard which it was intended to provide. Politicians who glibly talk of abolishing or changing the Senate in some arbitrary or summary fashion are proposing a course of action which would destroy one of the main pillars of our federal state. Irresponsible declarations of the kind I have just mentioned spring from an attitude of distrust of the Senate entertained by some people who have what might be called advanced or radical views. This distrust has its root in the belief that, in a given set of circumstances, the Senate might stand as a last bulwark and instrument of the vested interests; that it might attempt to stifle reforms demanded by a majority of the people. My submission is that those who would like to see the Senate act in that fashion are doomed to disappointment. Genuine reformers who carry the considered support of a majority of the people have nothing to fear from the Senate.

It is certainly possible for a bill to pass the House of Commons and be rejected by the Senate. Therefore, it is possible for a radical party, after winning an election, to propose a measure which might meet defeat in the Senate. It is well that this is so, because elections usually are not won on single issues; and if a certain party won an election it would not necessarily follow, for instance, that the people would want to nationalize all financial institutions.

Earlier I used the words "second thought". That was not to say that the Senate is merely a place where legislators give things a second thought; but rather, on important issues, it is to say that the Senate is a means of giving the people a chance to think twice. The Senate would be entirely justified in rejecting a government bill of major importance involving a vital government policy if, in its views, the bill was unsound or unjustly affected the rights of individuals or groups of individuals. The Government could then, and undoubtedly would, at the first opportunity, hold an election in which that particular bill would be the issue. If it were returned to office on that issue and should re-enact the bill, the Senate, while still legally entitled to reject it again, would, in point of fact—at least, in my opinion—have no choice but to pass it. Unsound and dangerous political doctrines must be fought by argument among the people. They cannot be checked in the Upper House. The Senate may give the people a chance to think twice but it cannot be expected to do more.

I have been a member of the Senate for thirteen years, and during that time I have had an opportunity to appraise the great service which this branch of Parliament renders in the legislative processes of government.

Governments are composed of ministers who, generally speaking, are not themselves experts but have the time and ability to direct intelligently the employment of experts. Ministers are responsible to Parliament which, in turn, is composed of persons who are not experts. Parliament is the link between the people and the Government, and this applies especially to the House of Commons, which frequently has neither the time nor the opportunity to dig into the work of experts and pass intelligent judgment upon it.

Committee investigations at one time provided the House of Commons with an opportunity to examine into matters of administration. Under present-day conditions members cannot conduct enough individual committee hearings to cover all the subjects. If a flagrant abuse comes to the notice of Parliament it is investigated, but I suggest that public confidence could be enhanced by some parliamentary device which would provide a continuous scrutiny of the activities of the administrative side of government and furnish a forum for discussion where public views and criticism might be heard.

The investigations of which I have been speaking are more or less special and occasional. However, I suggest that there are other fields for investigation in which committees of the Senate might be found very useful.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Inman, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

HYDROCARBONS PIPELINE LIMITED— SECOND READING

Hon. T. A. Crerar moved the second reading of Bill Q, an Act to incorporate Hydrocarbons Pipeline Limited.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill to incorporate Hydrocarbons Pipeline Limited follows the customary bills that have been introduced and passed from time to time in this house having to do with the transport of oil or gas by pipe line. The incorporators are residents of the city of Winnipeg, and the powers sought are the ordinary powers. The head office will be in Calgary, and when the bill is passed the company will come under the provisions of the general Pipe Lines Act in every particular; so that in all these respects the bill follows the same pattern as that of similar bills which we have frequently dealt with in the past.

It may be useful if I were to explain to the house what is proposed to be carried on after this legislation comes into effect. It will be noticed that the bill is entitled, "An Act to incorporate Hydrocarbons Pipeline Limited." I am told—and I profess great ignorance on the matter—that hydrocarbons are substances extracted by chemical processes from oil and certain types of natural gas. In the early days before chemistry had made the advances of recent years in dealing with oil and natural gas, these extra substances were separated and used up by a process called flaring, or setting fire to the gas and letting it burn out. Perhaps some honourable members of this house who are able to look back over a considerable period of years will recall when oil was first discovered in the Turner River Valley. I visited that place on one or two occasions, and here and there, where they were pumping oil, gas was coming out and was carried off and set on fire; and it flared day and night, week after week, and month after month.

As I stated a moment ago, the advances in chemistry have resulted in the knowledge of how to extract these substances for useful purposes. Two of the main hydrocarbons proposed to be dealt with by this company, when it gets fully into operation, are substances called propane and butane. I am informed that propane and butane are found not only in oil when it is taken out of the ground, but in much of the natural gas that also flows out of the ground. These substances, propane and butane, are transported to cities, or elsewhere, to heat homes, provide lighting and fuel for cooking, and so on. Until I learnt otherwise today, I was under the impression that propane was a gas at all times. Actually, it is a liquid which turns to a gaseous state when the pressure on it is reduced to a certain point and when it is exposed to the air. Propane is not only useful for domestic purposes, but is also used largely in some industries for certain types of furnaces which are required to produce certain effects. It can be bottled in containers in its liquid form, and the containers can be transported to, say, a farm, a country club, or any place where it is needed. When it is set up in a farm home, for instance, propane rapidly becomes a gas which can be utilized at the turn of a tap.

The purpose of incorporating Hydrocarbons Pipeline Limited is to enable the company to transport by pipe line from Alberta to the city of Winnipeg, or across the Prairies, these two forms of hydrocarbons, namely, propane and butane, and mainly at the beginning, I should think, propane. Butane can be utilized for certain chemical industries where they exist.

The bill also gives power to the company to carry a pipe line to Fort William, although I understand that is not contemplated at the moment by the incorporators. The present plan is to carry the line to Winnipeg and service the areas along the way, and when that is completed and propane has been chemically separated from the oil and gas it will be available for light and fuel.

Another use to which propane or butane can be put, for instance, is in providing fuel for dining cars on railway trains. No doubt honourable members are familiar with the type of container seen in the kitchen of a dining car to which the range is connected. By means of turning a tap the liquid fuel becomes gas and serves the cooking requirements.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Once the liquid has become a gas, can the gas be converted to a liquid again?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Yes, it can, under pressure. Again, my knowledge in these matters is very limited. If I may illustrate, the atmosphere or air we breathe is a gas, and under sufficient pressure it can be turned into a liquid. The same principle applies to all gases which come out of the ground. Propane and butane are unique because they can be used for the purposes I have stated.

Briefly, the incorporated company seeks to extract and purchase propane and butane in their liquid forms, transport them by pipe line, put them into containers, and then by the natural process they can be converted to gas in the manner I have described.

Honourable senators, I fear my explanation has not been very full. At any rate, I propose to move that the bill be sent to a committee, where experts and informed persons could give additional information. The promoters of the company also would be present, to give explanations and answer questions.

Perhaps I should add that it is expected that the pipe line from Alberta to Winnipeg will cost in the neighbourhood of $30 million. It is proposed to build a pipe line from six to eight inches in diameter, which would be sufficient to bring these substances through to the points where they would be used.

Hon. Mr. Farris: May I ask my honourable friend a question? Would it not be more practicable to bring these substances, propane and butane, through the ordinary gas pipe lines?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: No, I believe not. Again, I may demonstrate my ignorance in attempting to answer my honourable friend; but as I understand it, the processes for the separation of these substances are best carried on at the point where the oils or gases come out of the ground. At any rate, I have no doubt that the persons who I expect will be present to explain the bill when it goes to committee will be able to fully satisfy my honourable friend from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris), who has shown a laudable curiosity in this matter.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, seconded by Hon. Mr. Croll, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: Honourable senators, it is an honour for a new member to be given the privilege of speaking in this debate. I wish to thank most sincerely the Prime Minister for recommending that I be summoned to the Senate of Canada. It is an honour indeed to be the sixth woman to sit here, and, I would like to think that my appointment is further recognition of the part that women play in Canada today.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Inman: I wish, also, to thank honourable senators for the very warm welcome accorded me when I came to join them in this chamber. I can assure them that I deeply appreciate the kind and gracious way in which I was received as a newcomer among them. I especially thank my deskmate, the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson), for her kind reference to me in her speech in this house last week.

I am deeply conscious of the responsibility that goes with this high office and will at all times endeavour to discharge my duties faithfully and justly.

I have listened with the greatest interest to the able speeches of the mover (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) and seconder (Hon. Mr. Croll) of the Address. I proposed to take advantage of the broad latitude afforded honourable members in consideration of the Address; and, mindful of one of the chief purposes of this honourable house, which is the protection of minority and provincial rights, I would like to bring to your attention some of the problems confronting my native province.

Since Prince Edward Island is the smallest, but none the less a very important province of Canada,—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Inman: —it might be well to take a brief look at its history and geography before going on to some of the problems which face it as a small and rather isolated part of the Maritimes.

The first "Islanders" were Micmacs whose skins were red like the soil of their native land. In 1534 Jacques Cartier landed on this island and raised the standard of the King of France. Then came the French people, who worked, toiled, cleared the land, built homes and lived a more or less happy existence until 1745, when the British came and occupied the island. The French regained control three years later and maintained their position until, by the Treaty of Paris, the island became a British possession. Its name was changed to Prince Edward Island in 1798, in honour of the Duke of Kent, afterwards the father of Queen Victoria. The "Island"—and there is a precedent for saying "the Island": the Indians called it "Minegoo", meaning "the island" when they spoke of it as home—is approximately 135 miles long and from 2½ to 50 miles in width. There is a point in the town of Summerside where one can stand and look out on the Gulf of St. Lawrence on the one side and Northumberland Strait on the other.

Prince Edward Island's economic stability lies in the soil and in the sea surrounding it. Harvest from land and sea is the goose that lays the golden egg in this small province. Of its 2,184 square miles, about 85 per cent is under cultivation. We have no mineral resources—nothing is mined deeper than the depth of the seed.

In the romantic history of Canada this little island of ours played a major part. The historic Confederation Chamber in Charlottetown, where Confederation was born, is preserved today as it was then. We are proud that Canada was born in our Confederation Chamber. I may add that it was christened one year later in Quebec City. It was in this historic chamber that Sir John A. Macdonald, when he signed the visitor's book, put after his name the famous words "cabinet maker". It was here, too, that "building better than they knew", the Fathers of Confederation drafted the plans of nationhood of the Canada which is our pride and hope today.

The people of this island, numbering between 90,000 and 100,000, are famous for their self-reliance, a characteristic of people living close to the soil, and a dauntless courage developed through experience in facing the hazards and hardships of the sea. Prince Edward Island's roots are old and strong, brought over the seas from the soils of France and Great Britain. The people of our parent stocks were rugged pioneers who carved for themselves a way of life in a new country. In doing this they learned the lessons of tolerance, co-operation and mutual aid.

National unity, as exemplified by the peaceful and happy relationship between the two great races of Canada, has been illustrated in Prince Edward Island for the past 150 years. It is now one happy people. There is no such thing as a French Islander, Scotch, English or Irish Islander—we are all just "Islanders", taking a deep pride in the fact that some of the finest pages of Canadian history were contributed by this "Gem of the Gulf".

Honourable senators, we have been hearing a great deal lately about western wheat, but seldom has there been a word about potatoes, especially Prince Edward Island potatoes—and I want to say they are the finest potatoes in the world.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Inman: Whether this is due to the soil, method of cultivation, type of weather, or a combination of all three, I am not prepared to say. If bread is the staff of life, then the potato is the root of sustenance. Both are staple articles of diet in Canada; and, in the provinces of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, the potato is vital to their economy. It is said that when a nation takes to a cup of coffee, a slice of toast and a cigarette for breakfast, it is surely imperilled, but when you get back to bread and potatoes you have to work. You can't eat that and sit all day anchored to a chair.

Any discussion on potatoes must inevitably lead to the consideration of the unfair tariff regulations existing at the present time between Canada and the United States. I am speaking on this question particularly because shortly before I came here I attended a meeting of the Potato Marketing Board and heard it discussed. That made me more interested in the subject than I otherwise might have been, as I am not a farmer. To be specific, Canada permits the United States to ship potatoes into Canada without any duty whatsoever, except for a short period of six weeks from June 15 to July 31, when a duty of 37½ cents per 100 pounds is imposed.

On the other hand, potatoes shipped from Canada to the United States must pay a duty of 75 cents per 100 pounds, with two exceptions: a quota of 2,500,000 bushels of seed potatoes may be shipped at a duty of 37½ cents per 100 pounds; and a quota of one million bushels of table potatoes is permitted entry at the same rate of duty. There is a provision that should the estimate of the potato crop in the United States, made by the United States Department of Agriculture on September 1, fall below 350 million bushels, the quota on table stock would be increased by a quantity equal to the amount of the shortage.

When these tariff arrangements were negotiated, back in 1938, they were of substantial benefit to the potato producers of Canada and, more particularly, the potato producers of Prince Edward Island. It is worthy of note that my province produces more than half the seed shipped to the United States. Recently, however, these tariff arrangements, instead of working to the advantage of Canadian producers, have worked to their disadvantage, with the result that during the last two years the United States shipped more potatoes to Canada than Canada shipped to the United States. To appreciate this situation it is fundamental to remember that the state of Maine, with an annual production of 60 million bushels, produces about as many potatoes as the whole of Canada. The growers in Maine are much closer to the great table stock potato markets of Montreal and Toronto than are the Island producers; Maine producers consequently can place quantities of potatoes in Montreal and Toronto for much less than can the producers in Prince Edward Island.

In recent years a great change has taken place in production methods. These changes have resulted in a large increase per acre for American growers. The result is that today the American growers can produce potatoes just about as cheaply as they can be produced in the Maritime provinces.

A few years ago Maritime shippers could ship potatoes to American markets by water. Recently, however, with the development of truck transportation it has become profitable for farmers in the New York area to go into the production of potatoes in a big way. Fruit trucks going south for loads of fruit are anxious to get a paying load and thus are willing to truck potatoes from the New York area at low rates.

The result of these changes has been that advantages at one time enjoyed by Maritime growers have almost disappeared and today Maritime growers are facing a serious situation, which will continue to be serious, unless this disparity in tariff regulations is changed. I was much pleased therefore to learn that last week-end a meeting was held in Ottawa to review the findings of the Tariff Board on potatoes. It is to be hoped that from these deliberations changes in the regulations will result so that Canadian growers can compete on an equal basis with growers in the United States.

I do not want to be accused of advocating protection policies; all I want is reciprocal arrangements so that Canadian farmers can meet competition from the United States on an equal basis.

The fishing industry is another source of revenue and livelihood for our people, and I wish to commend the federal Department of Fisheries for its efforts in making fish a more popular food with Canadians. Important to this industry is the program of research carried on by the Department of Fisheries in methods of processing, preservation and transportation of fish so that all parts of Canada, the United States, and even countries overseas, may obtain fish as appetizing and palatable as it is when taken from the water.

The work of the fish hatcheries in Prince Edward Island in restocking lakes and streams with game fish is a great help in promoting the tourist industry, for trout fishing in Prince Edward Island is a real drawing card for tourists to make repeat visits to our province.

The biological station at Bideford for research on oysters is doing excellent work in connection with the cultivation of oyster beds. As all honourable senators know, Malpeque oysters are recognized as the best to be obtained anywhere; and this branch of our fishing industry is highly important. Lobster fishing is seasonal in our province and is considered to be the most valuable branch of the fisheries. I am going to read to honourable senators a little item that I came across and found rather interesting:

> An Atlantic fisheries research official has drawn attention to the possibility that lobster shells could be the basis of a million dollar textile industry in the Maritime provinces. A substance called "chitin" can be extracted from the shells to manufacture a rayon-like material with water repellant attributes. Probably few people have ever imagined that in throwing away lobster shells into the garbage pail they were throwing away money.

So at some time in the future we may be sitting here clothed in material made of lobster shells.

The fish processing plants established at Souris, the central storage and freezing plant at Charlottetown and the bait holding unit at Tignish are of tremendous value and a great convenience to fishermen and fish dealers.

As I mentioned before, the federal Department of Fisheries is doing much to improve the quality of fish reaching the consumer by educating fishermen and retailers to get the fish to market in good condition. In the hotel business, with which I have been directly associated, we see the value of this policy of education among the fish industry and hope it will continue to be carried on. Almost any city or town in Canada today can have good fish in its markets.

The department, conscious of the final decision made respecting fish consumption, has even gone directly to Canadian housewives. As an example: the recipe books to give housewives tested methods of cooking fish so as to get the most value from this food, and also the demonstrations by trained dietitians from this department, have greatly assisted in the consumption and preparation of the different varieties of fish.

The Fisheries Department has a policy whereby it assists in the construction of long liners or draggers by granting, through a provincial loan board, or other agency, a subsidy of $165 per gross ton on (a) vessels owned by one or more persons and measuring more than 45 feet and less than 60 feet in length, or (b) vessels owned by four or more persons and measuring not less than 60 feet and not more than 70 feet in length. Under this scheme, I believe, thirteen draggers were subsidized in Prince Edward Island last year. Undoubtedly this financial aid enables the small fisherman to pursue his occupation with greater efficiency and economy.

I would like to advocate improvement in the present facilities for travel between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. We need another boat between Borden and Tormentine and two larger boats between Wood Islands and Caribou to take care of the travel and movement of freight between Prince Edward Island and the other two provinces. The wheels of progress keep turning and we must be prepared to meet the demands.

In the marshlands rehabilitation scheme Prince Edward Island was not forgotten or left out. It was remembered with $87.50, in comparison with Nova Scotia's $624,000 and New Brunswick's $477,290. Honourable senators, I will admit we have not the vast expanse of marshes that our sister provinces have, but we do have considerable acreage that might well be reclaimed and brought into cultivation. A policy such as this, if pursued, would certainly provide work for many of our people and lessen the condition of unemployment at certain periods of the year.

The tourist industry of our province has become one of its chief resources and ranks as a major industry and a leading source of income. Indeed, the development and promotion of tourism during the past few years has been such that eventually our Government may deem it advisable to establish a regular government department for its administration, as have the other provinces; for it is an industry which benefits not only hotels, tourist homes, motels and other accommodation, but it benefits the farmer, the fisherman, the merchant and others. It is the concern of all our people, and everything possible should be done to encourage visitors to come to our shores.

Honourable senators, if you will permit a personal reference: I had occasion to attend a showing of pictures in Washington about a year and a half ago where scenes from the various provinces of Canada were shown. I was greatly disappointed in the pictures of Prince Edward Island. Certainly they did not do justice to our province, and I would suggest that the National Film Board try to procure pictures more representative of this little beauty spot.

We have much to offer the tourist in the way of scenery, excellent beaches, splendid fishing and points of historical interest. And it is felt that the National Park, which is at present within the confines of Queens county, should be extended both east and west to embrace parts of Kings and Prince counties. This would allow tourists a greater variation of landscape and activity within an area which is kept in a park-like condition by the federal Government. In this way, perhaps, trout streams could be developed which would be available for visitors, and small harbours dredged where boats could be hired for deep-sea fishing. This could be accomplished with some kind of assistance by the department concerned.

The Trans-Canada Highway is one of the largest engineering enterprises ever undertaken in our province. When finished it will be the motorist's dream come true, and of immeasurable value to our tourist industry.

Now for a word about education. Honourable senators, education in this day and age is a vital necessity. It is a hard road and demands real effort. More young people must be trained in the fields of medicine, engineering, dentistry, teaching and other professions so that Canada's resources can have well trained personnel and adequate service. Only about 4 per cent of all those starting Grade 1 ever go on to higher education in universities, principally for financial reasons. Many of our young people have the ability and desire to take university training, but for the lack of money are unable to do so. The present high cost of education is felt more particularly in those areas where students must go afiield to acquire the benefit of university or even collegiate training. Often it is impossible for them or their parents to raise the necessary money required to meet the cost of living and studying in cities.

It will be a splendid move on the part of the federal Government if it can make available more scholarships to the deserving youth of Canada who have the ambition and are qualified to proceed with higher education. It is to these young citizens that we must pin our faith and hope for Canada—this great nation which is our heritage, and which will be theirs in the years ahead. For this we stand challenged by the future.

Now, honourable senators, I am going to speak to you as a woman, and as a mother who has brought up a family and is interested in the welfare and happiness of the people of Canada. When women enter the field of politics they do so because they believe they can be of help to others and can contribute something of value to the welfare of their country. Health, welfare and education are the great loves of women because they so closely affect their homes and families; and so we keep on asking for, demanding, more financial aid from our governments for these purposes.

The history of the health and welfare program as inaugurated by the present Minister of Health and Welfare is a powerful story, the humanitarian effects of which are now sufficiently known to reveal the true purpose, scope and achievements of the measures enacted by the Liberal Government over the past few years to bring comfort and help when and where needed. Measures to improve and extend facilities to relieve human suffering because of disease and ill health; measures to provide for widows and orphans; measures to provide for dependent old age; and measures to guard against the attack of disease and give men, women and children the advantages of modern health services have been incorporated into our laws. Family allowances provide for a better standard of living and education for many children who otherwise would be undernourished and almost illiterate.

Good health and family welfare is the fundamental right of every citizen, a right that every government should guard. Over 72 years ago Disraeli said:

> The health of the people is really the foundation upon which all of their happiness and all their powers as a state depend. This is why I consider the first duty of statesmen is the care of public health.

It takes time and money to establish and strengthen health programs, but a country's prosperity and happiness is surely and inevitably dependent on the health of its people.

Honourable senators, I think I should commend the Government for its housing policy. If it were not for this policy many young couples would have to pay exorbitant rates of interest to loan companies. This would discourage them from ever owning their own homes. One of the greatest assets a country can have is a population of whom a large number own their own homes. The greatest bulwark against communism is a married couple with children and a home of their own. The present policy is good, but I think it could be improved. Some young couples are finding it difficult to raise the money for the down payment. I urge the Government, therefore, to give earnest consideration to reducing the amount of the down payment and thus encourage more and more young couples to acquire their own homes.

On account of its limited size, our province could not possibly keep all of its people at home; there would not be room. It has been said that Prince Edward Island populated the New England states. And it is true that there is scarcely a country in the world where one could not find a man or woman whose ancestry did not begin in Prince Edward Island. "The Island" is a small province, an old province—and, I might add, a unique province—but its people are imbued with the spirit of youth and vigour. It has been said, and truly, that the greatest export of this small province of Canada is brains, for it has contributed to Canada many outstanding men and women—more than would be expected on the basis of its population. I ask that "the Island" be treated kindly by the larger and more industrialized members of this great family which is Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hackett, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

WESTERN GOSPEL MISSION— SECOND READING

Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien moved the second reading of Bill F-5, an Act to incorporate The Western Gospel Mission.

He said: Honourable senators, this short bill is in conformity with measures of a similar kind which have passed this house from time to time. I intend to give only a very brief explanation, and if the bill gets second reading I shall move that it be referred to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills for further consideration.

The head office of the Western Gospel Mission will be at Steinbach, one of the most prosperous towns in Manitoba. In general, the object of the corporation is:

> To promote, maintain, superintend and carry on in accordance with the faith, doctrines, constitution, acts and rulings of the corporation any or all of the work of that body.

If this bill is approved, the corporation will maintain churches and missions, and erect, maintain and conduct therein churches, seminaries, schools, colleges, hospitals, dispensaries, orphanages and homes for aged people. It will promote the erection and purchase of houses of worship and parsonages, and administer its property, business and other temporal affairs. It will hold and dispose of property and carry on the regular functions of an incorporated body. It will also establish, support and maintain a publishing house for the purpose of printing and disseminating Gospel literature for the support of its doctrines and faith.

The people who are to be its directors, and who are known to me, are outstanding citizens, especially prominent in connection with this organization; and I am sure that if this measure is passed it will help to further the work of those who are connected with it, and benefit the people who support this faith.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I would not have it thought for one moment that I oppose the passing of this bill or that I have anything against the society that my honourable friend wishes to be incorporated. At the same time, however, I would like to make an observation in perhaps the form of a question with regard to what we are actually being asked to incorporate.

Section 4 of the bill provides:

> The objects of the corporation shall be,
> (a) to promote, maintain, superintend and carry on in accordance with the faith, doctrines, constitution, acts and rulings of the corporation any or all of the work of that body.

The section goes on to provide that the objects of the corporation shall be "to advance and increase the diffusion of the faith of the corporation in all lawful ways; and to establish, support and maintain a publishing house for the purpose of printing and disseminating Gospel literature for the support of the doctrines and faith of the corporation;" but it does not say what these doctrines are or what the faith may be. I presume it may be taken for granted that the faith is a good one and that the objects are proper, but certainly the bill does not say so.

Section 5(g) of the bill provides:

> The corporation may from time to time make by-laws, not contrary to law, for defining and applying the principles, doctrine and religious standards of the corporation.

Apparently we are to incorporate a corporation to advance principles and faiths, and so on, that are later to be defined by the officers of that corporation. We assume, of course, that all these things are regular and right, and I have no doubt that they are, having in mind the honourable senator who is sponsoring the bill. Is it not a fact, however, that he is asking us to incorporate a corporation for the purpose of carrying on a faith we know not what, or for purposes that are not defined but are only assumed to be religious in character? If my reading of the bill is such as I have interpreted it, I think perhaps the honourable gentleman should give us a little better idea of what we are being asked to incorporate.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: I might say to my honourable friend that in my fifteen or sixteen years' experience in this house, whenever a bill of this nature has been introduced I have never once heard its sponsor give a confession of faith, and I do not think that such a thing should be included in one of these bills. My honourable friend himself has no doubt introduced similar bills, but I never heard him inform the Senate what religious faith was involved in any instance. It is a religious organization that is asking to be incorporated by this bill, and it is merely seeking the powers we have given to other religious organizations all over Canada many times in years gone by.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I wonder if the honourable senator could tell us if this is a branch of the so-called Mennonite Church?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: It is really a branch of the Mennonites. The Mennonites are a religious sect, not a nationality.

Hon. Mr. Horner: But that is the name?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: The faith referred to in the bill is the Mennonite faith.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: We did not know that before.

Hon. John P. Howden: Honourable senators, I believe the Mennonites were Germans who migrated to southern Russia quite a few centuries back, and many of their descendants came to Canada about a hundred years ago. Deeply religious, they are well-behaved people who are intensely interested in agriculture. They have built splendid homes for themselves and are generally a credit to Canada. They are certainly well deserving of having this bill adopted by Parliament.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, technically speaking the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) was correct. The sponsor of this bill should have stated its principles and informed the house just what was to be incorporated. He has now done this, of course.

I am well acquainted with the Mennonite people of Manitoba and I know that their church is very strong in the district in which they live. I think the honourable senator from St. Boniface (Hon. Mr. Howden) will find that the Mennonites came to Manitoba in about 1870, at which time they were given special rights under our immigration laws. They have never once abused those rights. They are fine people, honest, upright and a real credit to our province. I am sure all honourable members from Manitoba agree that the Mennonites are among our finest citizens. Since the last war they have done a tremendous job in helping to support needy people throughout the world, sending food and other vital supplies abroad through CARE and other such agencies.

I am strongly in favour of this bill, but I would suggest that it be referred to committee, where the question raised by the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity can be cleared up. I am sure he will be satisfied that the bill is fully worthy of our approval.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, unlike my friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) I would not have objected to this bill in any sense, even without the explanation subsequently given by the sponsor. But once it was disclosed that the people seeking incorporation are Mennonites I was impelled to speak out in favour of the bill.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Perhaps no member in this chamber knows more about the Mennonites and has more to thank them for than I. The ancestors of the Mennonites who live in the county of Waterloo, from which I come, lived for hundreds of years in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania. Many of these people eventually emigrated to Canada and settled in the district which I had the honour to represent in the other house for some years. They are efficient farmers, and are successful in business and industry. I can sum up my appraisal of them by saying that they are as fine a group of citizens as could be found anywhere. It is all to the good that they wish to form themselves into this religious organization. One of their outstanding characteristics is their love of peace and absolute opposition to war. If anyone thought that counted against them, he would, I suppose, have to oppose the bill. For my part—and I said this once in the House of Commons many years ago—if all the people of the world had the same faith and the same peace-loving disposition as the Mennonites of Canada, there would not be any wars.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Stanley S. McKeen: Honourable senators, in British Columbia the Mennonites are settled in the Fraser Valley and are about 3,000 in number. I agree with the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) that the Mennonites are a peace-loving people. There are no better citizens in Canada. They are good farmers, honest and industrious, and cause no trouble; they are a credit to the province of British Columbia.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Speaker: May I remind the honourable senator that if he speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: On second thought, I will merely answer my honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) in these words: these people are Christian, and I think that statement means a great deal.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is not in the bill.

Honourable senators, I must congratulate myself on starting a lively debate. When one makes a technical objection to a bill it is sometimes wrongly assumed that he is opposed to the bill itself. I reassert that a bill which gives practically no information is open to objection. I appreciate the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), and I take it that if the bill goes to committee he, at least, will move that it be amended so as to satisfy the requirement I expressed, namely, that some indication will be given of the kind of people who comprise the Western Gospel Mission, and the nature of their faith—or Christianity, if one wants to adopt the words of my friend the sponsor (Hon. Mr. Beaubien). We do not want to feel that we are incorporating a group of people without knowing something about them.

I am in favour, therefore, of sending this bill to committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND IN CANADA—COMMITTEE AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendment made by the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills to Bill D, an Act respecting The General Synod of the Church of England in Canada, The Missionary Society of the Church of England in Canada. The Woman's Auxiliary of the Church of England in Canada and the Church of England Consolidated Trust Fund.

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard, Chairman of the Committee, moved that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendment was concurred in.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: With leave, I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 21, at 8 p.m.

CANADIAN NATO PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Thomas Reid inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of February 15:

1. Has the Government given any official recognition to the Parliamentary NATO Organization comprising senators and members of the House of Commons?
2. What assistance, if any, was granted members of the association to attend the meeting in Paris last year?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry is as follows:

1. The Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association was formed by members of both Houses of Parliament representing various political parties. The attitude of the Government was indicated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on May 25, 1955 when, in speaking to the Standing Committee on External Affairs of the House of Commons of the proposed meeting in Paris of Members of Parliament from NATO countries, he said:

> This has been a spontaneous initiative on the part of parliamentarians and is not in that sense association with governments. So far as this Government is concerned—and I think this applies to the other governments—it is something that is to be welcomed because the more that members of Parliament can see and hear about NATO and what it stands for and what it is doing, the better it is I think for all concerned.

2. An aircraft of the R.C.A.F. was provided for the group of members of both Houses of Parliament and of various political parties who attended the meeting of members of Parliament of NATO countries from July 18 to 22, 1955, and then visited units of the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force in France and Germany from July 24 to 31, 1955. The only other assistance provided was local transportation by car for the members of the group between their hotels and NATO headquarters in Paris.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 16, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, seconded by Hon. Mr. Croll, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. John T. Hackett: Honourable senators, I have not been very long in this house. I feel something like the lad who, despite his twenty years and his six-feet-odd, had not much learning. When asked how he was getting on, he admitted he had not made much progress in reading, writing, or arithmetic, but that he was "getting the hang of the schoolhouse." During the short time I have been here I have endeavoured to adapt myself to an atmosphere which differs from some of the places and assemblies at which I have, with others, from time to time foregathered. I have been here long enough, however, to learn much of this assembly's appreciation and practice of courtesy, and also something of its appreciation of brevity in debate. I shall endeavour to practise the first with consistency; and as to the second I shall rely upon you, honourable senators, to restrain me if I should trespass beyond the confines that are accepted as rules in this assembly. Is it not rather strange that in the other house there are rules to restrain members from talking at undue length? This house has no such rules, yet nobody here seems to trespass upon what would be the rules elsewhere.

Honourable senators, when the Fathers of Confederation wrote the Constitution they said that senators representing Quebec should be appointed from certain areas in that province which were known as electoral divisions, under a statute which is now more than 100 years old. The electoral division of Victoria is allotted for appointment to a certain senator, and the last preceding incumbent of the seat was that most able and affable man, the late Senator William J. Hushion. Senator Hushion was a quiet, efficient man. He served in the Municipal Council of Montreal, in the Legislature of Quebec, in the House of Commons—and I see about me a number of his friends, former members of that house—and he was a respected member of the Senate, where for many years he rendered useful service. I feel that if the late Senator Hushion were here tonight he would have a word to say about Montreal, and probably I could not do better than follow his imaginary example, especially as I find in the Speech from the Throne something which seems to render it appropriate, if not necessary, that a word be said about Montreal. In the Speech from the Throne His Excellency said:

> My ministers remain convinced of the need to maintain the defences of the free nations as a deterrent to war. A strong North Atlantic Treaty Organization and adequate protection for this continent are in their view fundamental to the preservation of peace and the security of Canada.

Universal war in these days entails universal defence: both military defence and civil defence. Because I am entirely unqualified to speak about our military defences, I shall say only a word about them. I believe they are closely integrated with the military defences of our near neighbour the United States of America; and I believe that in a joint operation there has been built across the northern sector of this continent a great series of alarm systems. There is the DEW system, the Pine Tree system and the Mid-Canada system, and there are the lines which connect these trans-continental alarm systems at each end, so that the approach of any enemy will be heralded immediately to our fighting men.

Fighting men fight preferably on the territory of the enemy; they fight also to protect the homes, the factories, the agencies which produce the armaments necessary to war. All these alarm systems have been built to protect—I was going to say, Montreal, and I will take Montreal as an example, if I may, because it is a densely populated area comprising one-tenth of the population of Canada.

Let us take a brief look at Montreal. It is an island 29 miles long and 9 miles wide at its greatest breadth, with a dense population. There we find great centres of transmission, of communication. There we find vast depositories of goods, of food, huge grain elevators, oil refineries—in brief, great deposits of everything that is necessary to the life, the activity and above all the defence of a people. And more than that, there we find the skills and the crafts. Without attempting to brag, I might add that there we find also the nerve, the sinew, the imagination, the power, and a large element of the courage of a people.

This heart centre of an important part of our nation is on an island, almost isolated from the rest of Canada. There come great ships from overseas. There the railways meet. There communications by air and by wire meet. There the great hydro-electric power generated in the hills beyond, on the majestic St. Lawrence and in the northlands, is centred. There are the factories. There we find that which enables the nation to express its power. And yet it all depends—all this life, all this energy, all this vitality—on a number of bridges which connect the island with the mainland to the south and to the north. It is my submission that when we are discussing the necessity, the wisdom, of maintaining our defences we should do something more than build bridges—we should construct tunnels under the St. Lawrence, not merely for the purpose of aiding congested traffic, of facilitating the travel of those who hurry away en masse for the week-end and who come home in belated droves, but that there may be an artery of communication between this heart and the members beyond. And I am not thinking exclusively of the city or the surrounding territory; I am thinking, in a way, of the source of power and strength that is in the city and that would defend in no small measure this great continent. I submit that for the purpose of defending Canada, and our ally the United States, there should be tunnels under the river. Montreal might be a target; its bridges certainly would be targets. We know what the air forces did to bridges all across Europe and the countries beyond in the last war: they blew them up. If tunnels are not built under the St. Lawrence at appropriate places and before the waterway is constructed, they will certainly have to be built at a later date and at much greater cost. This is a national endeavour; it is national defence; it has been nationally neglected. And while I do not pretend to possess any engineering skill, it seems to me apparent to all who stop and think that these additional protective and defence devices are essential to defence and should be one of the first items on the program of a wise government.

I wish to refer to another matter before I sit down. The other day, when the honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power), an intimate friend of more than 50 years, addressed the house, he suggested that he was a politician and that he had been raised to this honourable chamber because of his services to the Liberal party. None better than I appreciates the nature and effectiveness of those services, but I do say that there are many in this house and beyond it who could find, in the character of the services he has rendered to this country, many better if not more cogent reasons for his elevation to the Senate. I cannot claim that my appointment to this body was due entirely to my association with the party that is now in power. My association with politics was generally at the other end, and discomfiture was served to me frequently and effectively by the honourable senator from Gulf and other gentlemen, many of whom I see opposite. It is just possible that one of the circumstances which brought me to my position here,—which I appreciate highly, and my promotion to which so deeply astonished me—is that our form of government rests on party. I think it must be said that the party system is vital to representative government, and that the system works best when there are two parties—not too many—so that, when a government of one political persuasion comes into office to manage the affairs of the country, there is another group—not quite so well paid, but paid—to annoy, criticize and hold up to obloquy those who hold the reins of office. This is an entirely British device, and it works. It has never ceased to work except where there has ceased to be that kind of criticism and scrutiny which is incidental to the system.

The party which is now in power in this country—due to incidents which I shall not discuss tonight, but which I may deal with on another occasion—appoints senators. It has not had occasion to choose many who are not of one party, with the result that the Opposition—the "loyal Opposition", to use an accepted term—in this Upper House has dwindled somewhat. I do not say it is well that this is so, but it is natural. That reflection, however, opens up another chapter, which I may have an opportunity to discuss at another time. The fact is that the Opposition in this house is not numerous. But when, the other day, new senators to the number of 12 plus 1 were appointed, at least the Opposition gained one recruit. How long he will survive, only the future can tell. It may be that the diminishing size of the Opposition is one reason why I am here. Although there have always been in this chamber brave and dauntless souls who have spoken their minds when their words may not have been palatable to the party in power, of recent years the Opposition has not been as numerous as it should be in a well-balanced deliberative assembly. There are probably a good many ladies and gentlemen sitting about and with me who would concede the truth of this, provided of course that the Opposition did not become too numerous.

There is another possibility connected with my appointment which I have had to consider, and, as the honourable senator from Gulf did the other day, I ask your pardon for making a personal reference. It is conceivable that I had a friend somewhere. There is a man, prominent in government circles, with whom I have been on intimate terms since boyhood and early manhood. I have not always had the grace to share his political views nor his poltical enthusiasms, but through all the years—sixty-odd—we have remained friends. It is not often that the sweet rose of sentiment buds and blooms in the weedy patch of politics. I am not certain that it did here, but I have a suspicion, and I am confiding it to you. If I find myself in this seat tonight I doubt it is because there were not others who would have been willing to serve.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: If I find myself here I think it is because of that friendship which has remained green throughout the years. We had much in common. As I look back on the days and the nights that we spent together and think of the things we talked about, of the hopes and expectations of youth, and all that wonderland that opens before him who has not yet encountered all the trials and tribulations of life—as I look back on those enchanting days and care-free evenings I can say to my friend:

> We spent them not in toys, in lusts, or wine;
> But search of deep Philosophy,
> Wit, Eloquence, and Poetry,
> Arts which I lov'd, for they, my Friend, were Thine.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Savoie, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN STANDARD INSURANCE COMPANY—COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to Bill J-2, an Act to incorporate The Canadian Standard Insurance Company.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Committee, moved that the amendments be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendments were concurred in.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave, I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

MERCANTILE TRUST COMPANY—COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to Bill R, an Act to incorporate Mercantile Trust Company.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Committee, moved that the amendments be concurred in.

He said: Honourable senators, I would like to give a brief explanation of the committee's amendment requiring that at least $1 million of capital stock must be subscribed and paid up before the company can carry on business as a trust company. The committee felt that this amendment should not be regarded as a precedent in respect of future bills seeking incorporation of trust companies.

The circumstances in this case were a little different from the ordinary. The general act governing trust companies, the Trust Companies Act, has a provision requiring a minimum paid-up capital of $100,000. The Superintendent of Insurance told the committee that in his opinion this provision was out-moded but that there was no way of getting at it in the general act at the present time. He said he had discussed with those applying for incorporation the question of the amount of capital required, and also the difficulties a trust company faces when commencing to do business, and he reported they had indicated awareness of these difficulties and had themselves proposed to pay in capital of $1 million. Having regard to the views of the Superintendent of Insurance and of the persons applying for incorporation, and appreciating all the circumstances of the case and without establishing a precedent to govern future applications, we amended the bill by adding the requirement that the company shall not commence to do business as a trust company until at least $1 million of its capital stock has been bona fide subscribed and at least that amount has been paid thereon.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The Superintendent of Insurance went further and suggested that the minimum paid-up capital in any case should be $500,000.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendments were concurred in.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave, I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

PERSONAL FINANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. Charles B. Howard moved the second reading of Bill G-5, an Act respecting Personal Finance Company of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to change the name of Personal Finance Company of Canada to that of Beneficial Finance Co. of Canada, and to increase the capital stock of the company from $1 million to $10 million. If the bill is given second reading I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Howard, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

SIGNATURE LOAN COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Charles B. Howard moved the second reading of Bill H-5, an Act to incorporate Signature Loan Company.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to incorporate a new company, to be known as Signature Loan Company. Its parent is an American company, one of the strong companies in the New England states. The new company proposes to do business in the small loans field in Canada. Its capital stock is to be $500,000, divided into shares of $100 each, and the company asks for the right to increase its capital, as necessity demands, to a maximum of $1 million, divided into shares of $100 each. Of course, the bill is subject to all the provisions of the statutes regarding small loans companies' operations. If it receives second reading, I will move that it be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask where the company is to be located?

Hon. Mr. Howard: Its head office will be in Ottawa.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Howard, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

THE ESTIMATES

AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Charles G. Hawkins, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, presented the second report of the committee.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

> The Standing Committee on Finance beg leave to make their second report, as follows:
> In connection with the order of reference of February 15, 1956, directing the committee to examine the expenditures proposed by the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957, the committee recommend that they be authorized to print 800 copies in English and 200 copies in French of their day to day proceedings, and that Rule 100 be suspended in relation to the said printing.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hawkins: With leave of the Senate, I move that the report be adopted now.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, my impression as a member of the Senate is that the Senate does not get enough credit for the excellent work that is performed in this chamber. For a long time I have been interested in the—

The Hon. the Speaker: If the honourable senator will permit, I will put the question first.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Yes, sir.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Hawkins, seconded by the Honourable Senator Isnor, with leave of the Senate, that the second report of the Standing Committee on Finance be now concurred in. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have just a few words to say about the importance of the committee. In the first place, I wish to congratulate the honourable senator from Milford-Hants (Hon. Mr. Hawkins) upon accepting the chairmanship of the committee, succeeding the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar), who took a special interest in the committee's work. What is rather embarrassing is that there are the public accounts for last year and the estimates for the coming year, and in the meantime there is a gap for which it takes some time to get information. In 1918 the Senate appointed a special committee to determine the rights of the Senate in matters of financial legislation. The Honourable W. B. Ross, K.C., Chairman of the committee, asked for the opinions of two eminent members of the legal fraternity, Mr. Eugène Lafleur, K.C., and Mr. Aimé Geoffrion, K.C. of Montreal. They said the only material derogation to the general rule that the Senate is on exactly the same footing as the House of Commons as respects all legislation is contained in section 53 of the British North America Act, which provides that bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue or for imposing any tax or impost shall originate in the House of Commons. Then they added these words:

> The denial of the right to originate money bills does not involve the denial of the right to amend them. Nothing therefore in the text of the British North America Act takes away the latter right from the Senate.

The Minister of Finance is in a very difficult position, owing to the fact that he now is responsible for the payment of all expenditures by all departments. At first there was in each department an accountant who was responsible for the expenditures of that department, and payments were made under the authority of the minister concerned. At the present time payments are made for all departments by the Department of Finance itself.

A committee similar to the Committee on Finance in the Canadian Senate is the British Committee on National Economy. At Westminster when it was suggested that an accounting officer should be a treasury official, the suggestion was turned down for several reasons, as set out in an interim report on the position of accounting officers:

> In the first place, it offends against the cardinal principle of ministerial responsibility. A minister could not be properly responsible to Parliament for the conduct of his department if a large part of the responsibility falls actually on the servant of another department to whom he is unable to give orders.
> In the second place, the tendency to evade financial control alluded to above should, in our view, become more marked if the officer to be evaded were an emissary of another department. At present the Financial Officer is the servant of the same minister as the administrative officers, and is entitled to the same access to official papers and confidential information as they are; these are advantages of great value in financial control which might be lost if he became an officer of the Treasury.
> Thirdly, the treasury officer could not work single-handed. He would require staff. This would presumably have to be Treasury staff, too. There would thus be an elaborate interviewing of the staff of two departments under one roof, under conditions which would almost inevitably give rise to friction and discontent.

Lastly, the report stated that the position obtaining in the British Ministry of Transport was not to be considered as a precedent.

Referring to the Audit Act of 1931, on May 16, 1932, I asked the then Minister of Finance, the Honourable Mr. Rhodes, the following questions and received these answers, as reported in the Commons Hansard for 1932 at page 3208:

Mr. Pouliot: I suppose the fact that all the accounting is centralized will facilitate answers to questions?

Mr. Rhodes: I think, on the whole, we have shown remarkable efficiency in answering questions and responding to returns this year.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, especially this year.

There are other questions and answers which I will not read.

And, on March 22, 1934, when that same Audit Act was discussed in the House of Commons, the late Mr. Mackenzie King said this:

But I do think it is most important that Parliament should retain the power, which it has had for fifty years, of exercising control over public expenditures in the manner in which it formerly did. I submit that at the time the bill was introduced the house was not given to understand that the new appointment of Comptroller provided by the act meant withdrawal from the Auditor General of this particular function, which is the most important of all he formerly had, and placing it in the hands of an officer of one of the departments of Government. Had the house so understood, I am sure there would have been strong opposition to such a proposal, and that the house would never have consented thereto. I am not sure that when the Government brought in the bill its members appreciated the fact that this would be the consequence.

If honourable senators will permit me I will read a letter which I received from a former Government accountant explaining the whole set-up. It is dated February 5, 1953, and reads as follows:

I saw in the Ottawa Citizen of today that you suggested that the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury should be abolished and the old system of Government accounting restored. I agree with you. Some time ago I wrote to a member of Parliament showing that the old accounting system was best. I worked for years in the Accounts Branch of the Finance Department under the old system. As you say, under the present accounting system responsibility is divided between the Finance Department and each government department. This makes for inefficiency, duplication of work and staff, and interference with the proper supervision of each department.

Under the old system of accounting, each department had its own accounting staff. Letters of credit were issued from the Finance Department to each government department. These had to be signed by an officer in the Finance Department and an officer in the audit department. There was an appropriation ledger kept showing the amounts voted by Parliament for each department. A letter of credit only covered a portion of the parliamentary vote. These letters of credit were sent to the bank and against them cheques could be issued. When a letter of credit was exhausted a fresh one had to be obtained. Under this system a tight rein was kept on the expenditures of each department, but under the new system letters of credit were abolished. Lists of cheques issued had to be sent to the Finance Department each month and cheques paid by the bank were sent there also. These were marked off on the lists and then lists of outstanding cheques had to be made out. After the accounts had been balanced the paid cheques were then sent to the audit department.

The old system was very good and thorough. But Premier Bennett found fault with it. When he wanted money for some purpose he found that the money had been used up. So the new system was devised to keep a better check on expenditures. At the end of the fiscal year, the departments used to exceed the parliamentary appropriations and they still do it in spite of the new system. Then money has to be voted in the new year to cover the deficiency in the appropriations.

Also it used to be that pay cheques for the permanent staff of each department were issued by the accounts branch of their own department, and then the pay lists from each department were sent to the Finance Department. Now I believe all these pay cheques are issued from the Comptroller of the Treasury's office, which does seem ridiculous.

All I am interested in is to see that a more efficient system of government account is instituted.

Good luck to you.

On July 3, 1935, over 20 years ago, the following appears in the Commons Hansard:

Mr. Mackenzie King: —the comptroller of the treasury took over certain of the functions which formerly belonged to the Auditor General.

Mr. Bennett: No, several of the departmental functions in connection with disbursements.

Mr. Mackenzie King: The expenditures in that one branch are getting to be very large.

Mr. Bennett: It has control over all the disbursements of the country.

I have in my hand a chart showing the officials in the numerous divisions under the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury. In due course I shall give notice of a request that another chart be prepared showing the names of those who are at present employed in these divisions, to illustrate just how much this branch of the Finance Department has grown.

On May 21, 1941, I asked Mr. King for a statement showing a complete list of all civil servants whose names and salaries did not appear in the report of the Auditor General for the year ending March 31, 1940. Mr. King replied:

I doubt if I could promise the list for this session but I hope that in some form the list will be available for next session.

In 1942 I again insisted on having this information to show the importance of parliamentary control over expenditure and I was very glad to have the support of the Ottawa Journal and the Vancouver Sun and other leading newspapers. The Senate is now doing this work, and doing it very well, thereby rendering a valuable service to the country.

Honourable senators, I have spoken today just to inform the readers of Hansard about the efficiency of the Senate. It seems that what is being done here is not publicized enough, and Canadians should know what work is being done by the Senate. I presume that the members of the committee who support the Government will give the Government the benefit of the doubt, and that the members of the committee who belong to the Opposition will give the Opposition the benefit of the doubt.

The motion was agreed to, and the report was adopted.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

LETTER FROM PRIME MINISTER TO PROVINCIAL PREMIERS TABLED

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, this afternoon in the House of Commons the Prime Minister tabled a copy in English and in French of a letter written by him to all provincial premiers on February 18, 1956, concerning federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. When other letters on this same subject were tabled in the Senate a short time ago, it was ordered that they be printed in our Hansard and Minutes. If it is the wish of the house, I would move that this letter appear as an appendix to our Hansard and Minutes of today.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With leave, I move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig):

That the letter, dated February 18, 1956, forwarded by the Prime Minister to all provincial Premiers, together with the memorandum from the Minister of Finance of Canada in the matter of certain questions raised by provincial governments relative to the federal fiscal proposals of January 6, 1956, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this date.

The motion was agreed to.

See appendix to today's Hansard, p. 186.

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY— DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, seconded by Hon. Mr. Croll, for an Address in reply thereto.

(Translation):

Hon. Calixte F. Savoie: Honourable senators, being an Acadian, that is a member of the oldest French group in America, I am bound to take advantage of my right to speak in my own language, the French language, a right which our great Lafontaine obtained from the Canadian Parliament more than a hundred years ago. I do so on principle and, especially, in remembrance of all the Acadians who, during two centuries, toiled and suffered for the preservation and survival of their ancestral language.

I would like, first, to express my deep appreciation to the Honourable the Speaker for the kindly welcome he extended to me as well as to the other new members of the Senate. I was particularly impressed by the brotherly atmosphere which permeates this chamber and makes us all feel at home.

I would like also to thank all the senators most cordially for their courtesy and their many kindnesses towards us. In my own case, never having taken what is called an active part in politics, it was with some misgivings and fear that I entered this chamber, deeply conscious as I was of the presence in our midst of able men, well versed in numerous questions of vital importance to the country. However, all my worries and fears quickly vanished before such friendliness and so many kindnesses.

On July 28, 1955, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister announced the appointment of thirteen new senators. It is generally recognized that in making these appointments Mr. St. Laurent took into consideration several factors which are vital to the unity of the Canadian nation, which is of a rather complicated nature. It was the statesman, rather than the political leader, who, in selecting men to fill some of the Senate vacancies, kept in mind the racial origin, the political opinions, the sex, the social group and the religious affiliations of the appointees. Some of them are politicians, which is quite understandable, but others never took any active part in politics. He was mindful, in particular, not to overlook minority groups and he appointed some senators to represent them in the Upper House of Canada. This is worthy of a great and true Canadian.

As a faithful spokesman for all Acadians, I would like to express their happiness and gratitude to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister who saw fit to recognize the great merits of Acadians in appointing one of them to the Senate on the occasion of the solemn festivities which marked the second centenary of the deportation of the Acadians. Such a gesture is significant and, to my mind, deserves special attention. The fact that he placed my people's merits above any political consideration is further proof of the greatness of Canada's leader who has so admirably served his country. The Acadians are most grateful to him.

It is not so much his having appointed an Acadian to the Senate that prompts me to speak in this way, for we were entitled to that. It is rather that he should have appointed a man free from any political ties. It was the Acadian people that the Prime Minister sought to honour and not my humble person. I am only the recipient of that honour, which I deeply appreciate and rightly so. If I was chosen among so many others who were just as deserving as I, if not more so, it may be because of my close association, for more than thirty years, with Acadian endeavours and more especially with the organization which has played a leading part in the restoration and re-establishment of Acadians and which has managed to rally under its banner nearly 80,000 of Acadia's children scattered to the four winds by the tragic events of 1755. I mean La Société mutuelle l'Assomption, the national and friendly society of Acadians of which I have the honour to be general president and general manager.

(Text):

Before the year 1885 the Acadians had no representative in the Senate. It was another great Canadian, Sir John A. Macdonald, who gave the Acadians their first senator in the person of the Honourable Pascal Poirier, who was then a Civil Service employee here in Ottawa. The Prime Minister at the time saw in him a man endowed with the qualities of a real leader, and he was right. A graduate of St. Joseph University, he was named to the Senate at the age of 33. He represented the Acadians in this house for nearly half a century—48 years to be exact—and he did it in a masterly way. He was designated the Senator from Acadie. All through his long and active career he championed the cause of the Acadians most capably and with devotion. He accomplished a lot for his people, to whom he was intimately attached. On this special occasion, which is one of the great moments of my life, in my own name and in the name of the other honourable Acadian senators here present, I wish to pay a very high tribute of respect and admiration to our great predecessor in this Senate whose memory I revere and who will be a source of inspiration for me during my years in the Senate.

It was in Acadia that the first colony was founded in North America. After crossing the ocean in the spring of 1604, Demonts and Champlain chose as a haven in which to pass the winter a small island in the St. Croix River, a few miles above St. Andrews-by-the-Sea in New Brunswick. "To this island which is now known on the maps as Doucett's Island, he gave the name of St. Croix. This island probably contains about ten acres of land. At one of its extremities, Demonts placed his cannons; at the other end, he built a little fort. Temporary buildings were erected, a watermill for grinding corn was started and plans were laid out for a garden in the following spring."

Hardly had they finished their preliminary work when winter came upon them with its severity and fury. To add to their misfortunes, a disease known as scurvy attacked them and claimed its victims. Out of 79 colonists, 35 died. When spring returned, Demonts removed his colony to Port Royal, about six miles from the present town of Annapolis. So Port Royal was founded, and that was in 1605.

The colony progressed and flourished for half a century. In 1654 it was captured by the English, but in 1670 Acadia was surrendered to France. It changed hands again 40 years later, in 1710, when it was taken by the English. It was finally ceded to the British by the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713. At this time, the population was made up chiefly of French Acadians and by 1749 they had increased to about 15,000.

Then during the wars that afterwards were waged between England and France came the sad event of 1755, the exile or expulsion of the Acadians from their homes and their land. All their lands, tenements, and cattle were forfeited to the Crown and they themselves were to be conveyed to other British colonies. About 8,000 were thus forcibly removed; the rest fled to the woods with their wives and families, where numbers perished by cold and hunger and others managed to escape to neighbouring French settlements.

The poet Longfellow has based his story of Evangeline upon the exile of the Acadians. I quote:

Where is the thatch-roofed village, the home of Acadian farmers,
Men whose lives glide on like rivers that water the woodlands,
Darkened by shadows of earth, but reflecting an image of heaven?
Waste are those pleasant farms and the farmers for ever departed!
Scattered like dust and leaves, when the mighty blasts of October,
Seize them, and whirl them aloft, and sprinkle them far o'er the ocean.
Nought but tradition remains of the beautiful village of Grand Pré.

Those are the fortunes of war or, perhaps better said, the misfortunes of wars. The exiled Acadians roamed from one end of the continent to the other. Some went as far as Louisiana, which was at that time a colony of France. Others, thrown on shores of the New England states, returned on foot through Massachusetts and Maine to the land of their birth. Others settled in Lower Canada, now the Province of Quebec. The bonds of family love were ruptured. That ethnical group was disrupted and scattered to the four winds of the earth. The Acadian people as such were doomed to destruction. But where there is life and faith, there is hope. Calmly, peacefully, patiently, heroically they accepted their fate; they waited—and waited. Let me quote Longfellow again:

And the soul of the maiden, between the stars and fire-flies,
Wandered alone and she cried, "O Gabriel! O my beloved!
Art thou so near unto me and yet I cannot behold thee?
Art thou so near unto me and yet thy voice does not reach me?
Ah! how often thy feet have trod this path to the prairie!
Ah! how often thine eyes have looked on the woodlands around me!
Ah! how often beneath this oak, returning from labor,
Thou hast lain down to rest, and to dream of me in thy slumbers!
When shall these eyes behold these arms be folded about thee?"
Loud and sudden and near the note of a whip-poorwill sounded
Like a flute in the woods; and anon, through the neighbouring thickets
Farther and farther away it floated and dropped into silence.
"Patience!" whispered the oaks from oracular caverns of darkness.
And, from the moonlit meadow, a sigh responded "Tomorrow".

My honourable friend from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt) at the closing of his excellent address said that his province, Newfoundland, could be an example to all the other provinces of Canada in the practice of the great virtue of patience. I am sure that my honourable friend will not take objection if I claim for the Acadian people the same honour, only to a higher degree. I shall add that if the patience of the people of Newfoundland is rewarded in the same measure as that of the Acadians, it is worth their while to be patient and to wait, because great is the reward.

Time does not permit me to go into details. Much could be said about the resurrection of the Acadian people, its rapid development during the last half century and the enviable place it now occupies in this great country of ours. The year 1955 marked the fiftieth anniversary of the entrance into Confederation of two great provinces, Saskatchewan and Alberta. The year 1955 also marked the 200th anniversary of the exile of the Acadians and the 350th anniversary of the founding of the first colony in America, Port Royal. The Acadians, through the National Assumption Society, in 1953 appointed a central committee in the Moncton area to organize the celebrations of 1955. For two years the committee with its numerous subcommittees worked feverishly and relentlessly to make of the festivities some really outstanding celebrations, and they really were outstanding.

The bicentenary year opened on August 15, 1954, and ended with the magnificent celebrations held at Moncton, Memramcook, Grand Pré and Port Royal. They were intended to be a major event in the life of the Acadian people, and they were. The year 1955 contained a remarkable chain of centennials, highlighting four great phases of Acadian history. Colorful events at those unique manifestations, impressive religious ceremonies, historical pageants, float parades, folklore festivals, concerts and plays and other events provided a full week of unparalleled enjoyment. The highest personalities of different countries were invited to attend our celebrations. There were, for instance, the Prime Minister of Canada, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the President of France, the President of the United States, the Apostolic Delegates, Cardinals, the governors of those states of the Union where Acadians are located, premiers of all the Canadian provinces and many other personalities. Many of those were present and others delegated representatives. Acadians from all over North America attended the celebrations.

For the first time in the 350 years of their history the Acadians were able to throw open the gates of their ancient homeland and say to all their friends and fellow citizens: "Come, be our guests in the land of our fathers and rejoice with us that all is well."

At the very beginning of our festivities a message was sent to Her Majesty the Queen praying her to accept the homage of her Acadian people, which they tendered in loyalty, and their affection, which they offered with great respect.

We came to that day with joy and pride and with serenity in our hearts. Our object was a very positive and most deserving one: a collective act of thanksgiving to Almighty God for having favoured the Acadians with his protection; our everlasting gratitude to the Queen of Heaven, our Patron Saint, for having guided and enlightened us; a proud tribute paid to the virtues of our ancestors which enabled them to conquer adversity and to remain steadfast in the midst of tribulations; a grateful remembrance of the heroic deeds of those who were the first to attempt to establish a permanent colony in Canada.

And the Acadians have emerged from that state of forgetfulness, weakness and indigence. They have courageously and unflinchingly, with toil and perseverance, established themselves firmly wherever they have elected to choose a permanent place of habitation. The Acadian people had been so shattered by the expulsion that only in the last half century have they been in a position to comprehend fully the possibility of their survival and to hope to become one day an adult people. But they have discovered their potentiality and the dimensions of their survivance and are determined to use it fully in the interest of our great Canadian nation.

At the time of the expulsion in 1755, the Acadian population numbered about 18,000. Last year, an Acadian population of one million and a quarter from Louisiana to the Gaspé peninsula, from eastern Canada and the New England states, proclaimed their survival by a gigantic Bicentenary celebration which ended so brilliantly at Port Royal on August 16 last. The Acadian population of the Maritime provinces is about 300,000, of which more than 200,000 are in the province of New Brunswick, or about 40 per cent of the total population of that province.

The rapid development of the Acadian people during the last 50 years is astounding, to say the least. Many factors have contributed largely to the impetus that set the machine in full motion. One of those factors, and perhaps the outstanding one, is La Société Mutuelle l'Assomption—The Mutual Assumption Society—of which, as I have said in my remarks in French, I am the President and General Manager. It is perhaps on account of my long connection with that society, and also because of the fact that I was the President of the Central Committee of the celebrations of 1955, that I was honoured with an appointment to this Upper House.

Since La Société Mutuelle l'Assomption has played such a vital part in the social, economic, national, educational and religious life of the Acadians during the last half century, it is proper that I should say a few words about it. In the last decade of the past century and the first decades of the present century, they emigrated by the thousands from all parts of the Maritime provinces to the New England states. These people, though scattered in the different manufacturing centres of Massachusetts, Maine, Connecticut, Rhode Island and New Hampshire, were united by bonds of faith, nationality and history. By virtue of the social instinct of man, which is at the base of all societies, they felt the need to meet and discuss matters of common interest to them and in particular to the group. The fraternal societies existing in the New England states did not exactly answer the needs and requirements of the Acadian immigrants. It was on September 3, 1903, that a group of Acadians met at Waltham, Massachusetts, to lay the foundation of an Acadian fraternal society, which they named La Société l'Assomption.

Now these men knew very little of the science of life insurance. The founders of the society, with their generous ideas for the future, their faith in the potentiality of brotherly love and co-operation, were looked upon as dreamers by many a wistful but sceptical compatriot. The thought that these men were laying the corner-stone of an institution destined to play a mighty economic as well as social role in the life of the Acadian people was indeed very remote from practical realistic minds. In fact, the founders themselves probably never envisioned such a future.

At that time the Acadians were still living in poverty and consequently did not have the means of providing advanced education for their children. The founders of the Assumption Society knew that and, fully conscious of the need of secondary education, conceived a wonderful idea by the creation of a fund called the Scholarship Fund for the education of the children of the members. To attain that aim, they added as a special loading to the net premium a per capita contribution of 10 cents per month for educational purposes; the scholarship fund was created.

The first 20 years or so of the existence of La Société l'Assomption is a story of hardships and occasional drawbacks, of hard work with discouragingly meagre results. In fact, 25 years ago, that is twenty-some years after its foundation, the society's assets amounted only to $400,000; its membership was less than 11,000, and the total insurance in force was about $4 million. Today, the society's assets exceed $13 million; the insurance in force has reached the high figure of $88 million, and its membership has hit the 77,000 mark. It has paid out benefits under various forms in an amount exceeding $7 million. The society has loaned to church organizations, school districts, educational institutions etc., over $25 million. But the outstanding feature that I want to specially emphasize is its scholarship fund. I have just said that a special loading of 10 cents per month was added to the net premium for educational purposes. Immediately after its foundation, the ten cent pieces started rolling in, slowly at first but with increasing velocity as years rolled on. During the 52 years of its existence over six million dimes rolled into that fund, which represents a sum exceeding $600,000. Over 800 boys and girls have received a college education through that fund. During the last school year, 185 boys and girls attended college on scholarships totalling over $45,000. All these wonderful achievements constitute a record for our Acadian Society that deserves to be extolled not only by the Acadian people but by all those who believe in those institutions that excel in humanitarian services.

Here in Canada is a land of many great opportunities where people of more than one tongue, more than one creed, more than one party, more than one aspiration, all together serve the nation, each according to his own beliefs. Canada is favoured with a dual culture that makes it a country different from many others, a country perhaps unique in its kind with great potentiality, a country that can achieve real greatness, provided each element serves the nation to the full measure of its talent. The Acadians, with their staunch religious convictions, their dual culture, their determination to live their high ideals and their true loyalty, are contributing their good share for the advancement and glory of Canada, land of liberty.

(Translation):

The 1955 Bicentenary festivities were no re-enactment of the terrible tragedy of 1755, but rather a celebration of the Acadian people's marvelous survival and growth. They commemorated a capital event in Acadian history, an event of such radical consequences that it not only dislocated the physical course of the Acadians' life, but also left, deep in the soul of each one of them, an imprint which several centuries have not erased.

At the end of the 19th century we were, in all fields, in a state of weakness bordering upon helplessness. We were losing ground everywhere. We had no bishops and very few priests. Two or three colleges had been founded, but they were far from progressive. Our schools were poor and operating under pitiful conditions. We had no voice either in finance, trade or in any of the material endeavours of human activity. Harried on all sides, we were in the position of a poor and unwanted neighbour.

But times have changed. In the last fifty years, we have covered an incredible distance. I have already given you statistics on Acadian population in the Maritimes as well as elsewhere. Today we have an Acadian episcopate comprising one archbishop at Moncton and three bishops in the dioceses of Bathurst and Edmundston, in New Brunswick, and of Yarmouth, in Nova Scotia. Some fifteen religious communities of both sexes are now at work in our schools, hospitals, charitable institutions and orphanages.

In the field of education, a tremendous task has been accomplished. First we have our higher educational institutions: St. Joseph University at Memramcook and the University of Moncton; Sacred Heart University, at Bathurst, St. Louis University, at Edmundston, Madawaska county, the University of St. Anne, at Pointe de l'Eglise, in Nova Scotia. At Moncton we have the marvelous Notre Dame College of Acadia, where 500 of our young girls can acquire a good education. I would also mention the Maillet Girls' College at St. Basile of Madawaska, and the Assumption College of Moncton, under the direction of the diocesan secular clergy. And the Fathers of the Holy Cross, the Eudists, the Salesians, as well as the Sisters of Notre Dame du Sacré-Coeur, the Filles de l'Assomption and the Filles de Jésus continue to spread among us the benefit of their teaching.

Local organizations play an important part in their respective areas: La Société Saint-Thomas d'Aquin, in Prince Edward Island, has already looked after the education of more than 200 young Acadian girls and boys, and la Société Saint-Pierre has done as much in Cape Breton. Our teachers' and parent-teachers' organizations are also actively contributing to the development of Acadian and French activities.

Acadians also have professionals to represent them in all spheres of activity. In the field of politics they have 16 members of parliament, two ministers, three senators, three judges in New Brunswick; two members of parliament, a senator and a judge in Nova Scotia; and one judge and two members of parliament in Prince Edward Island.

In 1956, Acadians also have their own newspapers: the Evangeline, our only daily, the Madawaska, which mainly serves the Madawaska area, the Petit Courrier of Baie St. Marie in Nova Scotia and the Fermier Acadien, which speaks for the Acadian farmers in the Maritime provinces. They also have several radio stations: CHNC of New Carlisle; CJEM of Edmundston and CBAF of Moncton, New Brunswick.

Economically speaking, although we have made great headway, we are still relatively weak. I mentioned the Société de l'Assomption with its assets of $13 million. Our credit unions are developing remarkably well and already have assets of the order of $6 million. Our co-operatives are very promising. All in all, our Acadian group is on its way to economic emancipation. That is what we were yesterday and what we have become today. As to what tomorrow or the next century have in store for us, judging by the accomplishments of the last hundred years, there is good reason to hope for the best. On the whole, as Mr. Robert Rumilly so aptly says in concluding his excellent History of the Acadians:

> An impartial judgment calls neither for complacency nor for systematic pessimism. But is an impartial judgment called for in this case? In the ordinary course of events, the Acadian people should have disappeared two hundred years ago. But its strength of character saved it and will continue to do so. Every page of the history of Acadians, the virtues generally ascribed to them, their self-established institutions and the steady pace of their progress in several fields all point to one conclusion: HOPE.

APPENDIX

(See p. 180)

Letter from the Prime Minister to all Provincial Premiers, with Memorandum from the Minister of Finance in the Matter of Certain Questions Raised by Provincial Governments Relative to the Federal Fiscal Proposals of January 6, 1956.

(Similar letters sent to the Premiers of all the Provinces. The letter to the Premier of Quebec was in the French language.)

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER
CANADA

OTTAWA, February 18, 1956.

The Honourable Leslie M. Frost,
Premier of Ontario,
Toronto, Ontario.

My dear Premier:

Since the Federal-Provincial Conference adjourned in October, the federal government has made the fiscal proposals outlined in my letters of January 6th and explained them in some detail early this month to provincial treasury officials. It has also made contingent commitments to recommend to Parliament financial participation on a large scale in provincially-administered hospital insurance plans. It has received written comments on the proposals from the Premiers of three provinces, which have been studied along with comments and questions received in conversation.

I am enclosing a memorandum from the Minister of Finance giving answers to a number of questions that have been raised by provincial representatives. Some of these answers involve some modest development in the details of the proposals advanced by the federal government in January. In particular the government has decided that it would be in accord with the spirit of the present arrangements and with the special nature of the federal tax on insurance premiums to treat provincial taxes on insurance premiums as not being special corporation taxes within the scope of paragraphs three and five of my letter of January. This will improve the arrangements from the point of view of all provinces.

In view of the suggestion that we should meet again in committee to discuss these fiscal arrangements, I feel it would not be fair to the provincial governments if I failed to indicate at this time that the federal government believes its own fiscal situation in the next few years would not justify adding any substantial further financial commitments beyond those already proposed.

In the replies I have received to my letters of January 6th, the Premiers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed regret that the federal government was not able to accept suggestions such as they made for a wider application of the fiscal need principle, and the Premier of Saskatchewan has also indicated that in his view fiscal need has not been given sufficient weight. My colleagues and I feel there is a very substantial recognition of fiscal need involved in the equalization payments we have proposed and also in the high level of returns in these tax fields which we are prepared to guarantee to provincial governments. These are, of course, in addition to the existing statutory subsidies which already make special provision for the fiscal need of the Atlantic provinces. We believe we should all have some experience in the practical operation of these proposals before going on to consider other concepts of fiscal need.

I note that only two of the Premiers have suggested a resumption of the Conference for the purpose of considering the fiscal proposals. Since our federal responsibilities and commitments are now so heavy that we would not be warranted in making any increases in the basic offer we made in January, it may be that the provincial governments generally would not feel there would be any advantage to be derived from another meeting to discuss fiscal relations.

If a further meeting in committee is generally desired, we would suggest it be held either on March 2nd or March 9th in order that final decisions can be reached before the Minister of Finance completes the preparation of his budget. If, on the other hand, most of the provincial governments see no substantial advantage in a general meeting, Mr. Harris and I would be happy to confer at any time between now and the early part of March with the Premier or Treasurer of any province wishing individual discussions of particular aspects of the proposals.

I should be grateful to have your views at your earliest convenience.

Yours sincerely,
L. S. St. Laurent.

Memorandum from the Minister of Finance of Canada in the matter of certain questions raised by provincial governments relative to the Federal fiscal proposals of January 6, 1956.

In the course of discussions on the fiscal arrangements between Canada and the provinces advanced by letter of the Prime Minister dated January 6, 1956, certain questions were asked and clarifications requested. The Federal Government's position relative to these matters is set out in this memorandum.

1. Royalties and the taxation of income from certain natural resource industries.

Under present fiscal arrangements, the provinces have not been restricted in the imposition of royalties on natural resources. No specific suggestions have been made for changes in the methods employed and none would seem warranted.

Present procedure gives the provinces a substantial concession in the taxation of the income from mining operations and the income from logging operations. It is proposed that this general position be maintained. The Federal Government would be willing to undertake, should any province wish, further studies in an endeavour to determine if better formulae for the allocation of profits between the primary and secondary phases of the industries can be devised.

The extension of this special treatment to the petroleum and natural gas industry is not warranted, in our opinion.

2. Tax on insurance premiums.

Under present arrangements, a full offset against the Federal tax is given in a non-renting province for the insurance premium tax charged by that province. In a renting province, the province has been paid for relinquishment of the corporation tax field and the insurance premium tax is included in that category.

In order to put all provinces on an equal basis in this field and at the same time provide to them a substantial additional source of revenue, the Federal Government is prepared to allow any province an offset for a tax on insurance premiums. Accordingly provincial taxes of this nature would not be considered corporation taxes for purposes of paragraphs 3 and 5 of the Prime Minister's letter of January 6.

3. Definition of Corporation tax.

The definition of corporation tax included in the present tax rental agreement would not seem to require any changes in substance. There are however two exceptions to it where provinces have requested some liberalization of the terms. These are in relation to the limits on licence fees now set at $250 per annum for each corporation, and the gross receipts or gross revenue tax on certain public utility companies now set at 4 per cent in the case of telephone companies and 3 per cent in the case of all others.

The Federal Government will be prepared to increase the allowable limit on licence fees to $400 from $250 as now authorized.

As to the rate of tax on gross receipts or gross revenue of certain public utility companies, we will be prepared to study this in an effort to determine if some increase in the present rates is justified.

4. Base year for purposes of equalization.

In the proposals the base year on which calculations are made for purposes of equalization is that taxation year preceding the fiscal year for which payments are to be made. The calculation of payments under the current rental agreements has always been on this principle. In view however of the desirability of placing these payments on as current a basis as possible, the Federal Government is prepared to calculate these equalization payments on the basis of the current taxation year as is provided for in calculation of proposed tax rental payments. This decision accepts the fact that all payments in a fiscal year will be on the basis of estimates and that some substantial if indeterminate financial cost to Canada is involved in this change.

5. Fire marshal tax.

The Federal Government is willing to consider a more flexible policy in this matter providing that the principle of the tax being used for costs of operation is maintained.

6. Tax on income of non-residents.

The Federal Government will regard tax revenue from income of non-residents of Canada as being subject to allocation under the proposals.

7. Withholding tax.

The Federal position is that taxes shared with the provinces should be confined to those of a nature normally employed by them. Withholding tax does not come in this category and therefore cannot be included for purposes of provincial sharing.

8. Sharing of income tax from companies whose main business is the generating or distributing of electrical energy, gas or steam to the public.

The Federal Government is prepared to continue these payments for the time being but will not incorporate the provision in any formal agreement entered into.

9. Deduction of certain corporation income tax revenue losses from the payment due a province.

The Federal Government will not require the inclusion of this provision in any future arrangements.

10. Collection agreements.

The Federal Government will undertake to enter into a suitable agreement to make its facilities available to any province for collection of provincial taxes on personal or corporation income providing that the terms of the provincial statutes do not differ from those of the Federal statute and that the rates imposed are at the standard rates of tax as contained in the proposals.

Any agreement would be on an agency fee basis subject to cancellation on adequate notice by either party.

11. Formula for allocation of corporate profits between provinces.

The current Federal procedures in this will be followed.

12. Special provision for raising revenue for a provincial health program.

The exceptions contained in the definitions of individual income tax in the present agreements will be carried forward into any new agreement.

13. Old age security tax.

The Federal Government's position is as stated in the Prime Minister's letter of January 6, 1956.

The Old Age Security Tax is not part of the Federal income tax structure proper, and will be excluded from calculations of the provincial share of tax fields and from abatement of federal tax.

14. Adjustment for changes in definition of income, etc.

Under the proposals it is provided that adjustments will be made for changes in rates and personal exemptions in personal income tax and succession duties. Miscellaneous changes in income definitions, allowances, etc., are most difficult to assess and it is therefore necessary that the adjustments be limited to those as originally set out in the proposals.

15. Tax Credits after expiry of agreement.

It is not considered necessary or desirable that the Federal Government should limit itself to any specific tax policy beyond the period of any agreement entered into. For the purposes of any province entering into a new tax rental agreement, Canada will be prepared to undertake that at the conclusion of the agreement a renting province will not be placed in a less favourable position than a non-renting province relative to Federal tax abatements or credits.

16. Termination.

It is proposed that the same conditions apply as under the present tax rental agreements.

Minister of Finance.

THE SENATE

Thursday, February 23, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

STATISTICS

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented a number of petitions for divorce.

He said: Honourable senators, the time for filing divorce petitions expired on Monday last, the 20th of February. It has been the practice of the committee to make reports of progress from time to time until all pending petitions are heard, or, if the time for filing has been extended, until that time has expired. However, I assure the house that there is very little likelihood of an extension of time this session, and therefore I should now like to place a few figures on Hansard.

The following table shows the work done by the committee last session and the progress to date this session:

Petitions presented		473
Petitions heard		414
1956
Petitions presented	435
Petitions withdrawn		3
Petitions heard and recommended		155
Petitions heard and rejected		2
Petitions heard and pending a decision of the committee		3
Petitions pending a hearing		272
Total		435

Honourable senators will observe that the committee this year is faced with about the some volume of work that it had last year. I may say by way of passing interest that some 60 new applications were received over the past week-end.

PRIVATE BILL

HYDROCARBONS PIPELINE LIMITED—
REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the report of the committee on Bill Q.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to whom was referred the Bill (Q) intituled: "An Act to incorporate Hydrocarbons Pipeline Limited", have in obedience to the order of reference of February 15, 1956, examined the said bill and now beg leave to report the same with the following amendment:

Page 2, lines 31 and 32: strike out the words "for the transmission of gaseous hydrocarbons".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Next sitting.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 138 to 141, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate I move that when the house rises today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENT OF ITALY

MR. GIOVANNI GRONCHI TO ADDRESS
MEMBERS OF BOTH HOUSES

Hon. W. Ross MacDonald: Honourable senators, I feel sure you have been pleased to learn that His Excellency Giovanni Gronchi has accepted an invitation extended by the Government to visit Canada during his North American tour. Mr. Gronchi will be arriving in Ottawa on Saturday, March 3, and will remain until Monday, March 5. Mr. Gronchi will be accompanied by his Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Gaetano Martino.

His Excellency the Govenor General has invited the President and Madame Gronchi, and the Minister of Foreign Affairs and Madame Martino to be his guests at Government House during their visit.

Honourable members will also be pleased to learn that Mr. Gronchi has consented to address both Houses of Parliament in the chamber of the House of Commons on Monday, March 5, at 2.30 p.m.

SALES TAX

INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). In view of a press report of a few days ago that the Minister of Agriculture stated that margarine is being sold in the province of Quebec, I should like to ask whether the Government is collecting sales tax on such sales.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I did not read the dispatch to which the honourable senator has referred. I will take note of his question, and try to obtain an answer as soon as possible.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot, seconded by Hon. Mr. Croll, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Gray Turgeon: Honourable senators, I intend first of all to give myself the pleasure, which I share with all others who have addressed this chamber on this subject, of paying a compliment to the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne, and at the same time—because the two matters are linked together—to express, as a somewhat senior member of this body, a welcome to those who have come into the Senate during the present session. I think we all agree that every one of these new senators has given a very good exhibition indeed both of knowledge and of quality.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: I intend to say a few words about the international situation, not only because it is developing into even greater importance than it was a short while ago, but because note of that particular fact was made in the speech from the Throne. It states:

> Since you last met there have been significant international developments. Some of them have been welcome as releasing tensions in certain parts of the world while others unfortunately have had the contrary effect. My ministers remain convinced of the need to maintain the defences of the free nations as a deterrent to war. A strong North Atlantic Treaty Organization and adequate protection for this continent are in their view fundamental to the preservation of peace and the security of Canada.
> Security, however, cannot rest on arms alone. The Government, therefore, is continuing its constant efforts, through diplomacy and negotiation and through the United Nations and other international agencies, to bring about better understanding between nations.

I am sure all honourable senators have read extracts from the various speeches made by high-ranking Russian officials to people in eastern Asian countries in recent months. I am thinking particularly of Premier Nikolai Bulganin, head of the Russian state, and Nikita Khrushchev, the Communist party secretary. I was going to refer to him as secretary of the Communist party in Russia, but apparently he is secretary of the Communist party throughout the world. I am not too critical of everything the secretary said during his recent tour, because some of it may prove helpful to the West in the long run, but I wish to comment on one statement he made in India:

> It irritates some people that most friendly relations develop now between us and the people of India, Burma and other countries. Not to mention our great friend and brother—the People's Republic of China—with whom we are now bound for ever by ties of the most solid and most cordial and unselfish fraternal friendship.
> Yes, some people dislike the fact that we are supporting the countries which have thrown off the colonial yoke and are now advancing each along its own road. We have always supported the striving of the peoples of these countries for their national liberation. And we are sincerely happy that they have not only achieved political freedom, but are also advancing along a new path, although it annoys some gentlemen in Britain, France and the United States.

I would point out that this speech was made in a country which is a member of the Commonwealth of Nations, and which recognizes Queen Elizabeth as head of the Commonwealth. Having his statement in mind, I shall read a list of the countries that are now members of the United Nations and which, when war broke out in 1939, were under the administration of other countries:

Country	Under administration of
Burma	United Kingdom
Iceland	Denmark
India	United Kingdom
Indonesia	Netherlands
Israel	United Kingdom
Lebanon	France
Pakistan	United Kingdom
Philippines	United States
Syria	France

Then there were four other countries which in 1939 were colonies and which became members of the United Nations during the last session of the General Assembly, having been included in the so-called "package deal" introduced by the acting head of the Canadian delegation, the Honourable Paul Martin, who took the place of the Honourable Mr. Pearson at the 1955 session. These are Ceylon which had been under the administration of the United Kingdom; Libya, under Italy; Cambodia, under France; and Laos, also under France. However, the colonial situation is extremely acute, and was a subject of serious discussion at the last session of the United Nations. I was the Canadian delegate attached to the trusteeship committee, which deals with all colonial affairs, and I can say that sometimes conditions were strained. I have placed upon the record the number of countries which formerly were colonies or dependent territories and are now members of the United Nations. Incidentally, as honourable senators know, Pakistan and Ceylon were part of India before they received liberation. I mention the achieving of the status of membership in the United Nations, so soon after being freed from colonialism, in order to have on the record some words about the fundamental strength of the peoples of these 13 countries.

Reference to that general situation naturally makes one think of expansionism. But before I speak on that subject, I am going to digress for a moment. I take great exception to a frequently-used expression, "the conflict between the East and the West." It is not a conflict between the East and the West, it is a conflict between a number of so-called western countries and the Soviet Union. It is true that the Soviet Union since the war has acquired control of certain other countries; but it is the Soviet Union that is waging the conflict. In the year 1948 I placed upon the record here a statement to the effect that the main cause of the quarrel between Stalin and Trotsky was that Trotsky wanted to communize Europe; but Stalin said: "No, we cannot communize Europe until we have first created a proper socialistic communistic foundation in Russia and until we have taken control of Asia and communized the Far East; and we cannot accomplish that until we have got control of China." And he went on to say, "In order to get control of China we must right away get control of Sinkiang, and also of Inner Mongolia, Outer Mongolia and Manchuria." Stalin immediately took steps to acquire, and succeeded in getting, a good deal of that territory. I am mentioning this to show that the dispute is not between East and West, because the Soviet Union is making the same effort today as it made in those earlier days of Stalin and Lenin to get complete control of Asia and the so-called Far East. It is up to us to see that it does not succeed, and I am certain that it can and will be stopped.

I return now to the point from which I digressed. Mention of colonies and colonialism naturally makes one think of expansionism. Hitler and the Czars of Russia were the strongest and most active expansionists that the world ever had; there is no question of that. One recalls that the term "spheres of influence" was used frequently in the days of the Czars and the days of Hitler. The USSR is carrying out a program of expansionism with the same zeal and a greater measure of success than czarist Russia ever did. One need only glance at a map of the world as it was at the beginning of World War II, and compare it with an up-to-date map, to see what has happened to various countries which formerly were independent. Many which lost their independence have become subjected, directly or indirectly, to the Soviet Union, while many other countries were gaining independence which they did not have before. That expansionism has been going on, and is going on now, in Europe, as well as in the Far East. With this in mind, the General Assembly of the United Nations, at its sixth session, passed a resolution saying that the General Assembly:

> Having considered the complaint submitted to it by the delegation of the Federal People's Republic of Yugoslavia concerning the activities of the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Governments of Bulgaria, Hungary, Romania and Albania, as well as the Governments of Czechoslovakia and Poland, against Yugoslavia,
> Viewing with serious concern the tension between Yugosalvia on the one side, and the other above-mentioned countries on the other side, . . .
> Recommends that the Governments concerned:
> (a) Conduct their relations and settle their disputes in accordance with the spirit of the United Nations Charter;
> (b) Conform in their diplomatic intercourse with the rules and practices which are customary in international relations;
> (c) Settle frontier disputes by means of mixed frontier commissions or other peaceful means of their choice.

That is dated December 14, 1951.

Now we come back to our Soviet friend, Mr. Khrushchev, who has made two general statements lately. One: that the world cannot resist communism; and, two, that the Soviet Union is going to see that communism is imposed upon the world at large. That is not a quotation word for word, but a general interpretation of his statement. I say that the Kremlin wants more than communism—although, God knows, that is enough—it wants absolute control.

The resolution passed by the General Assembly of the United Nations that I have just read was based upon a complaint of Yugoslavia against the Soviet Union. Yugoslavia is a communist country, and was communist when this complaint was made. I have before me a copy of a speech delivered in 1950 before the General Assembly by the chief delegate from Yugoslavia. I do not intend to read the entire text, but rather to call the attention of this honourable house to a few remarks of the speaker. First, he quoted a statement made by the USSR delegate as follows:

> As regards foreign relations, the Soviet Union has stood and stands for the strengthening of friendly relations and co-operation with all nations that pursue the same end.

The Yugoslavian delegate had this to say:

> However, the attitude of the Government of the Soviet Union with regard to Yugoslavia shows clearly that these words do not, for the time being, correspond to actual facts, that they are not, for the time being sincere and that they are, for the time being, nothing but—words. The Soviet Government, and the governments under its influence, are pursuing against the FPRY—

That is Yugoslavia—

—whose Government has always expressed its readiness to co-operate peacefully with all countries including the Soviet Union, an aggressive policy of which the whole world is cognizant and which nothing can conceal. This policy is at present developing in accordance with the words of the former Bulgarian foreign minister Poptomov who, in his capacity of official representative of the Bulgarian Government, wrote on January 8, 1950, in the newspaper Rabotnichesko Delo, that the struggle against Yugoslavia "must be stepped up and waged with ever-increasing energy".

Later he said this:

Yugoslav national minorities in Hungary, Rumania and Bulgaria are being displaced. Hatred among the Balkan peoples and war psychosis in the Balkans are being fomented and fanned. The economic blockade of Yugoslavia has been carried to such lengths that Rumania for instance has, in violation of all international obligations, severed all rail and postal traffic between Yugoslavia and Rumania.

And further:

When Mr. Vishinsky therefore demands that war-mongering propaganda be prohibited in all countries—a request with which we are in complete agreement—he ought, in the first place, achieve this in his own country.

And still further:

It is, however, evident that this policy towards Yugoslavia and its methods can in no way be considered in isolation from the general trend of the present day Soviet foreign policy.

There is no doubt that the aggressive anti-Yugoslav campaign is not an isolated phenomenon, but only a drafted manifestation of the general trend of this policy.

That was the statement of Yugoslavia with respect to the general attitude of Russia toward that country. Russia not only enforced the communist form of government on Yugoslavia, but made an absolute demand for dictatorial control and ownership.

I have before me a booklet issued by the Soviet Union entitled The Results of the Geneva Four-Power Conference. Its concluding chapter, under the heading, "Decision of the USSR Supreme Soviet on the Report of N. A. Bulganin", reads in part as follows:

The USSR Supreme Soviet notes that as a result of the fruitful activity of the Soviet Union and other peace-loving states there has been of late a certain lessening in the international tension that arose between the states after the second world war.

I call honourable senators' particular attention to the following portion of the quotation:

This lessening of tension was facilitated primarily by the end of the war in Korea and also by the end of the hostilities in Indo-China; by the conclusion of the Austrian State Treaty; by the normalization of relations between the USSR and Yugoslavia, which paved the way for the development of friendship and co-operation between the two countries.

Stopping there, may I ask honourable senators who is responsible for the tension, the lessening of which the Supreme Soviet says has taken place? I have just referred to the position of Yukoslavia; and it is of course unnecessary to make reference to the causes which resulted in the Korean War. While there may be some differences of opinion with respect to the position of Indo-China, we all know that Russia did little or nothing to lessen the tension there.

These observations, honourable senators, bring me to my concluding remarks.

There is no doubt that the world today faces a very difficult situation. Those of us who from time to time have attended international gatherings are well aware of the details of what is taking place on the international front. We know that in order to lessen world tension today one of the things we must do is to pay greater attention to Asia. I stated a few moments ago what Russia was doing in an effort to get control of Asia: possibly much the same as she has done with respect to Yugoslavia. What is our answer to the problem?

The world at large is afraid of war, and particularly of the use of modern weapons such as atomic and hydrogen bombs. But amongst those who greatly fear war are the people of Russia itself. I do not have to remind honourable senators of the terrible invasions that country has suffered over the past hundred years or more; the invasion by Hitler may have been the worst, but many earlier ones also caused great damage. I repeat: the people of Russia are afraid of war.

The constitution of the Soviet Union makes war-mongering a crime, and provides a severe penalty for it. But the government of Russia goes far towards establishing its own guilt as a war-monger when it creates in the minds of its people a fear that countries such as the United States, Great Britain and France are planning to go to war against them.

I would conclude my remarks with a statement about atomic bombs. We all know of President Eisenhower's suggestion that aerial photography be used as a means of learning what other countries are doing. This involved the photographing of his own country as well as that of the man to whom he was writing, Premier Bulganin. I feel that Canada and the other countries of the western world would readily agree to the President's suggestion, provided it was adopted by the communist countries. Mr. Bulganin's reply is contained in a letter he wrote to President Eisenhower on September 21, 1955. Since then the Soviet Union has changed its stand, but I think it could be brought back to the original suggestion. The letter, in part, reads:

> The system of control proposed by us, namely the creation of control posts in large ports, at railroad junctions, on automobile highways and at airfields, is designed to prevent dangerous concentration of troops and combat equipment on large scale and thereby remove the possibility of sudden attack by one country against another. Establishment of such posts would be an important step towards relaxation of international tension and the establishment of trust among states.

Now, honourable senators, that was meant to be accepted in connection and together with President Eisenhower's suggestion for aerial photographic surveys. I think that these suggestions could be accepted. There should be no objection at all to having included in any aerial survey the airfields controlled by the United States outside its own boundaries. That is to say, these outside airfields and posts would be included in the terms of any agreement for the aerial survey of the United States and of Russia.

Hon. Mr. Euler: What reply did President Eisenhower make to that suggestion?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: I think it was one of general acceptance in principle, without going into detail, and I also think that the Secretary of State has gone further in connection with the question of military posts held by the United States in other countries of the Atlantic Union—I mean NATO; I was thinking of my honourable friend when I said Atlantic Union.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: I think NATO could be brought into the general scheme as well as the United States proper and the Soviet Union proper.

Those who have been representing us at the deliberations of the United Nations have displayed great leadership; the Honourable Mr. Martin and the Honourable Mr. Pearson have done a marvellous work, and Canada is highly regarded all over the world. That has been true for several years, but is particularly true now. Other delegates too have done good work, and among them I have in mind Krishna Menon of India. He did not agree to everything that Canada suggested, but all in all he did good work. Within the last week newspaper dispatches from India have described what the communists are trying to do in that country to hamper the efforts of the Government to find a solution to the trouble caused by the creation of provinces, and so forth. Whether one agrees with the Government's action or not is immaterial—it is a purely domestic matter—but our communist friends are interfering and fomenting strikes in order to create absolute rebellion in that country.

Now, honourable senators, there is no question that the people of India, and I might say particularly Mr. Nehru and Mr. Krishna Menon are intensely afraid of atomic bombs—they do not want war of any kind—and I think we could induce them to make a statement similar to that in which they urged the cessation of nuclear tests. That cannot be brought about at the moment. First there must be control of some nature, and what I am suggesting is not that we renew an effort at the moment to bring about control but that we endeavour, through the heads of the Indian Government, if we can, to have the Soviet Union leaders and our leaders agree to get together for the purpose of studying a system of control that is possible and practicable; and if a system of control were agreed upon we could then take steps tending to bring about disarmament to a certain degree. To my mind it is utterly impossible to bring about the second thing first.

We talk about treaties: Hitler did not stop at invading Russia, though he had made an agreement with Stalin not to do so. Treaties are necessary, but they do not prevent action being taken in contradiction of their provisions.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I do not like to interrupt my friend, but may I ask him a question? He referred to a suggestion by President Eisenhower for aerial observations of different military posts in all countries. Am I right in that?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Well, it was really confined to the United States and Russia.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Then Premier Bulganin replied, making certain other suggestions, and I asked my friend what President Eisenhower's reply was to that communication. I think my friend said that the President agreed to it in general.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: He was friendly to it.

Hon. Mr. Euler: My impression has been that the United States was not favourable to those proposals. Am I right in that?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: I do not think you are right, but it could be that you are. My opinion is no. A couple of weeks ago Premier Bulganin wrote another letter which puts a different aspect on the whole proposal. I think they are getting away from the suggestion of President Eisenhower for aerial inspection.

There is a suggestion that I hope the leaders of India will make, as the Soviet Union would have to pay attention to what was said by India, and the world would feel India was sincere in making the suggestion. Let Russia realize how friendly we are—and by

"we" I mean Canada, Great Britain and all the countries of the Commonwealth—to India and how friendly the United States is to her also, in spite of what is sometimes declared from the Kremlin. Here is the suggestion that I hope India will make: Since India cannot bring about what she has already asked for, the immediate stopping of all construction and tests of atomic weapons, let her try to get a control system so she can make certain that atomic bombs will not be used.

Now, honourable senators, I want to say a word about provision (2) of the NATO agreement which, as we all know very well in this chamber, provides for economic understanding and relationships between all the member countries of NATO. I am sure that all those countries would like that provision to be applied to the world at large. I am in favour of increasing trade with the world at large, including, wherever possible—barring strategic elements—the U.S.S.R. I think our whole relationship with that country could be changed. The Russians have a right to their opinion so long as what they advocate is not meant to be imposed upon other countries, including satellite countries. The Russian people have the right to be socialists or communists—whatever the term is—just as we have the right to be what we are. I would like to see further consideration of the possibility of inaugurating general trade relations with the Soviet Republic, such as we now have with Japan, under which the provisions of the Atlantic Charter would be put into effect.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The motion was agreed to, and the Address was adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Ordered that the said Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this house as are members of the Honourable the Privy Council.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 142 to 162 dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

SALES TAX

ANSWER TO INQUIRY

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, on Thursday last the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) asked the following question:

In view of a press report of a few days ago that the Minister of Agriculture stated that margarine is being sold in the province of Quebec, I should like to ask whether the Government is collecting sales tax on such sales.

At that time I told the honourable senator that I would take notice of his question and obtain an answer as soon as possible. The house has not sat since Thursday, so I have brought an answer as soon as possible.

The answer is that margarine is not on the list of foods exempted from sales tax. Since the tax is paid by the manufacturer on his sales, details as to immediate or ultimate markets or destinations are not required and therefore no such records are available.

ANTARCTIC SURVEY

INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Mr. Reid inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of January 31:

1. Is the Canadian ship Theron, at present operating in the Antarctic in preparation of the International Scientific Survey of that continent, beginning early in 1957, operating officially under, or on behalf of, the Canadian Government; and

2. Has any official recognition been given by the Government to Canada's participating with the other nations in the forthcoming scientific survey of the Antarctic?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry is as follows:

1. So far as the Department of Transport is concerned, the Canadian registered ship Theron is not operating officially under, or on behalf of, the Canadian Government.

2. Canada is very much interested in scientific observations in the Antarctic and takes advantage of any opportunity of doing any work there. In 1954-55 the National Research Council, in co-operation with the United States, provided a scientist and supplied Canadian-developed equipment to make continuous observations on the intensity of cosmic rays on a cruise of a United States naval vessel to the Antarctic.

Scientific observations in the Antarctic are an integral part of the program for the International Geophysical Year in which Canada is fully participating, although for geographical reasons Canada's contribution will be mainly observations made in Canada with particular emphasis on the northern areas.

NEW BRUNSWICK POTATO MARKETING BOARD

On the notice of inquiry by Hon. Mr. Pirie:

1. Has the Audit and Investigation concerning the operations of the New Brunswick Potato Marketing Board, under agreement with Her Majesty The Queen, represented by the Minister of Agriculture, dated December 21, 1953, been completed?
2. If so, when may the tabling of the report be expected?

Hon. Mr. Pirie: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) if he can give any indication as to when I might expect an answer to my inquiry?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As I said with respect to the question asked by the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler), I shall try to get the information as soon as possible. I have already made inquiries and I hope to have an answer within the next few days, although I cannot guarantee it.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PROVINCIAL PREMIERS TABLED

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with I would inform the house that this afternoon the Prime Minister tabled in the House of Commons telegrams and letters received by him from all the provincial Premiers in reply to his letter dated February 18 concerning federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. Honourable senators will recall that I tabled a copy of that letter. I now table copies of the replies sent by the provincial Premiers, together with a telegram dated February 27 sent by the Prime Minister. If it is the wish of the house I would move that the telegrams and letters appear as an appendix to our Hansard and Minutes of today.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With leave, I move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig):

That copies of telegrams and letters received by the Prime Minister in reply to his letter of February 18, 1956, to all provincial Premiers relative to federal fiscal proposals and of a telegram, dated February 27, 1956, forwarded by the Prime Minister to all provincial Premiers, relating to resumption of the conference on fiscal arrangements and proposing the date, March 9, 1956, for such meeting, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this date.

Hon. Mr. Reid: How many replies have been received by the Prime Minister?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I believe replies have been received from the Premiers of all the provinces. In any event, I shall table copies of all the replies.

The motion was agreed to.

See appendix to today's Hansard, p. 206.

DIVORCE BILLS

THIRD READINGS

Hon. Mr. Roebuck moved the third reading of the following bills:

Bill J-5, an Act for the relief of Lillian Hannah Maxwell Gallant.

Bill K-5, an Act for the relief of Gordon MacKay Butler.

Bill L-5, an Act for the relief of Eleanor Jodelis Milius.

Bill M-5, an Act for the relief of Marie Madeleine Rachel Gregoire Shank.

Bill N-5, an Act for the relief of Shirley Mildred Glazerman Wolfe.

Bill O-5, an Act for the relief of Dorothy Jean Midkiff Desnoyers.

Bill P-5, an Act for the relief of Lorinc Orvos Nagy.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the third time, and passed, on division.

EXCHEQUER COURT (DIVORCE JURISDICTION) BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. W. M. Aseltine moved the second reading of Bill I-5, an Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act (Divorce Jurisdiction).

He said: Honourable senators, I thank you for the very kind reception you have given me, and I hope it will be reflected in the decision that is reached when this debate has been completed.

Hon. Mr. Farris: This is the second prize.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators are aware of the fact that this subject is not new to me. Before I ever came to Ottawa as a member of the Senate I practised law in the divorce courts of the province of Saskatchewan for some twenty years. The first morning I arrived here the late Senator Gerald White, who was then Government Whip in this chamber, met me in the hallway and said, "I want you to be a member of the Standing Committee on Divorce." I don't know whether I made a mistake or not, but I agreed to accept, and I have never been able to get off the committee since. I have, therefore, been a member of that committee for some twenty years. I was much interested in this question of divorce before I came to Ottawa, and I have been intensely interested in it since, particularly in parliamentary divorce.

I find that I made my first speech on the history of divorce in the session of 1936, and if honourable senators would like to read some good literature they might look up that speech, which is reported in the Senate Hansard for that year, beginning at page 265. Since then I have made a speech of one kind or another on divorce, mostly on parliamentary divorce, at virtually every session. I am not trying to qualify as an expert, but during the time I have been a member of the Committee on Divorce, and particularly during the ten years I was chairman of the committee, I have been instrumental in hearing and helping to decide several thousands of petitions. The work was so onerous at times that we were obliged to sit six days a week, from Monday to Saturday. The committee now divides itself into three or four subcommittees, and therefore the work is less onerous for individual members than at the time I was chairman. In those days, while my friends from Ontario and Quebec were spending their week-ends in Montreal and Toronto we were working very hard at disposing of numerous cases. I never objected; in fact, I rather enjoyed the work. However, I always felt that this was not a task that Parliament should be dealing with at all. It seemed to me that my time was being more or less wasted and that I could have applied myself better to more important national matters. I always believed, too, that that was the opinion of the people of Canada as a whole, that they did not think we should be spending our time on matrimonial squabbles between husband and wife, but would prefer to have us handling matters of more importance to the country at large.

Honourable senators, I want to make it clear that this is not intended to be a general debate on divorce. Bill I-5 deals with parliamentary divorce only; it does not propose to change the grounds for divorce, and it has nothing whatever to do with the question whether divorce should or should not be permitted. It is merely a proposal to change the present practice under which persons from two provinces of Canada have to come to Parliament to seek a divorce. The bill deals with nothing else, and I hope that honourable senators who participate in the debate on it will try to confine themselves to the issue.

This bill is couched in very simple language, but in my opinion it is a most important measure, in that its passage would do away with a procedure which has been followed for almost ninety years, that of petitioning Parliament for divorce. As I have previously stated, I have made many speeches on this topic, but within the twenty-odd years I have been in this house there has not been a serious debate on parliamentary divorce. The bill now before the house was very carefully prepared for me by our newly appointed Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel, Mr. Russell Hopkins. During his preparations of the bill—he actually prepared three bills before it appeared satisfactory—he read virtually everything that had been said on parliamentary divorce. We sometimes overlook the good work done by officials and clerks of our house. In this instance I wish specifically to pay tribute to Mr. Hopkins for his efforts in preparing this bill, and to say that I consider him a worthy successor to the position formerly held by our good friend Mr. John MacNeill.

Honourable senators, I may be prejudiced—I hope I am not—but I believe the work done by the Senate's Standing Committee on Divorce is equal to that done by any court in our land. While the committee is not a court as such, it functions as a court, abides by the laws of evidence and hands down its decisions in a judicial fashion. I wonder how many honourable senators take the trouble to visit the three or four rooms in the basement where the committee meets and watch it functioning from day to day. Those who do so—and I have seen a few take the trouble—find that about the only apparent difference between the committee's procedure and that of a court of law is that neither the Chairman of the committee nor any member wears a gown.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Or a wig.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: But the lawyers who appear before the committee are dressed in the same fashion as they would be if they were appearing in a court of law in any province.

The work of the Divorce Committee is in my opinion done in a very careful manner. Despite the criticism which from time to time emanates from the other place and from the press, I am still of the opinion that no court of competent jurisdiction does a better job or gives more careful consideration to every case coming before it. The point I am endeavouring to make is that although this committee is not a court, it functions as efficiently as any court in the land.

On one occasion during my term as Chairman of the Divorce Committee, several members visited the sittings of the Supreme Court of Ontario in Ottawa to observe how divorce cases were dealt with by that court. After listening to seven or eight cases these members reported back to me that they were not too much impressed with the way the cases were handled; indeed, they thought our committee was a little more strict in the evidence it required to prove each case.

In 1953 I had the privilege of spending two days in the law courts of London, England, and each day I visited different courts that were hearing divorce cases. In my opinion our committee is doing as thorough and efficient a job as any of those courts do. I noted that the average undefended divorce case before the English judge took about eight to ten minutes; but our committee seldom completes the hearing of such a case in less than fifteen to twenty-five minutes. I brought back with me a list of cases for a day in the English courts, amounting to some twenty-five or thirty cases; I should have liked to show it to honourable senators, but unfortunately I misplaced it. I was told that such a list was an ordinary day's work for a single judge.

May I emphasize that the bringing in of this bill is not an attempt on my part to get out of doing some work. During my term as Chairman of the committee I never complained, no matter how many cases we had to deal with. The purpose of the bill is not to reduce our work, but to remove from Parliament a work that we should not be doing here. It is work of a disagreeable nature, but that is not the main objection. I fail to see why some 25 senators should spend the greater part of their time dealing with matrimonial difficulties between husbands and wives, for in my opinion these senators could be more profitably employed in dealing with national problems. I will give you an example of the time-consuming nature of the Divorce Committee.

A week ago Friday the present Chairman, the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), said the committee had a lengthy case for that day and asked me if I would relieve him. As he had taken over the chairmanship of the committee on the understanding that I would help him out when he was in difficulties, I was quite willing to relieve him. I must say that he has been a very faithful chairman, and has rarely called on me. On this occasion we heard a lengthy case, involving some ten or twelve witnesses, and the sitting continued until 6.15 in the evening. I later learned that some new evidence has come to light, so we will be obliged to reconvene and call all these people back again and take perhaps another half day to finish the case.

I do not think honourable senators should be required to do work of that nature. I am willing to do my share if we are obliged to do it, but I hope the time is coming when Parliament will take adequate steps to transfer this work to some judicial body.

Honourable senators, I consider parliamentary divorce to be the most antiquated divorce system in the world. Is there any other country at present that grants divorces by act of Parliament? If there is, I do not know of it. We pride ourselves on being up-to-date, but in some matters such as this I think we are hopelessly behind the times.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: When the Fathers of Confederation were framing the British North America Act they discussed this matter of divorce quite fully, I am told, and came to the conclusion that the exclusive legislative authority in marriage and divorce should rest with the federal Parliament. Just why they reached that decision I do not know, but I am also informed that the reason for giving the Parliament of Canada this exclusive jurisdiction was so that each province would not have a different divorce law. In the United States each state has a different divorce law, and that is very confusing. To avoid that kind of thing in Canada the framers of the British North America Act gave exclusive jurisdiction to Parliament to make laws in divorce matters. Section 91 of that act provides:

> . . . it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next herein after enumerated; that is to say,—

Then follows a list of matters or heads, and head 26 reads:

> (26) Marriage and divorce.

Now, what has the Parliament of Canada done in the way of passing legislation under this power which was given to it by the British North America Act? I find that four statutes have been passed since Confederation, and I will give the substance of each of them.

The first one was the act of 1925. It was known as chapter 41 of the statutes of that year, and it was passed for a special reason. Up to that time the husband could obtain a divorce on the grounds of his wife's adultery, but the poor wife could not obtain a divorce on the grounds of her husband's adultery only: she had to prove either extreme cruelty such as would endanger her health or her life, or desertion for two years. The purpose of passing that act in 1925 was to place the wife on the same basis as the husband in so far as divorce is concerned.

The next statute, called the Divorce Act (Ontario), is chapter 14 of the Statutes of 1930. The purpose of that act was to give Ontario courts jurisdiction in divorce matters according to the law of England as it existed on the 15th day of July 1870. Now, the reason for that was that prior to 1930 all divorce cases from Ontario came to Parliament. That province had no divorce law and Parliament had to dispose of the petitions under the same system that we have for the two provinces which still have no courts of their own. It might be interesting for honourable senators to know that four bills similar to the bill of 1930 giving Ontario courts jurisdiction had been passed in the Senate before 1930, but for one reason or another none of them had ever been dealt with in the other place. I think the first such bill was passed here in 1920, and the other three were between that year and 1928 or 1929. By then the situation had become so serious that something had to be done, and when a bill was brought into the other house in 1930 there was a free vote on it, and it passed. Since that time the Senate has not had to bother with hearing divorce petitions from Ontario. And if this Bill I-5 becomes law, Parliament will not have to deal with divorce petitions from any province, except in some very exceptional cases.

The third act that was passed was the Divorce Jurisdiction Act. It also was passed in 1930, and is chapter 15 of the statutes of that year. The reason for passing that act was to take care of a case like this: say that a husband and wife lived in Saskatchewan and the husband deserted his wife and went to live elsewhere, perhaps in Ontario or the United States. If she wanted to obtain a divorce she had to sue him in the domicile where he lived. Well, the object of this act was to remedy that situation by enabling the wife to sue in the original domicile of the husband at the time he left her, provided she had been deserted by him for two years.

These were simple statutes, but very important.

The fourth was a statute called the British Columbia Divorce Appeals Act. It was found that the appeal provisions in British Columbia were not suitable and the Court of Appeal of that province was given jurisdiction to hear and determine appeals from any order, judgment or decree of a court of the province or a judge thereof having jurisdiction in divorce and matrimonial causes.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I do not like to interrupt but may I ask my friend a question? I think he stated that the reason why jurisdiction with regard to divorce was placed in the hands of the federal Parliament was that there should be a uniform divorce law all over Canada. It would be interesting to know, then, why it is that in Nova Scotia, and possibly in other provinces, the grounds for divorce are wider than in the rest of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I did not want to go into that. I know that there are three grounds for divorce in Nova Scotia, and the grounds in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick also are just a little different from those in other provinces. I could go into this in some detail, if desired. The differences could hardly be avoided, because under section 129 of the British North America Act the law as it stood was still the law in those provinces.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is how the law stood at Confederation.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: If it had been left to the provinces, not only would every province have had a different divorce law, but probably people in the two provinces which now have no divorce courts or divorce law of any kind would not have been able to get a divorce on any ground anywhere.

Eight of the ten provinces now have courts exercising jurisdiction in divorce. Nova Scotia has had this right since 1751; New Brunswick, since 1791; Prince Edward Island, since 1835; British Columbia, since 1858; Manitoba, since 1870; Saskatchewan and Alberta, since 1905, when they became provinces; Ontario since 1930. Quebec and Newfoundland have no divorce law, so that husbands or wives from those provinces who seek divorce are obliged to ask relief from Parliament by way of a private bill.

I have already given some reasons, honourable senators, why divorce should not be administered by Parliament; but there are others. The first I would mention is that the number of petitions has been increasing almost annually, until there are now between 400 and 500 every year. This situation is similar to that which had arisen when Ontario was given jurisdiction. I think the time is coming when Parliament will have to make some decision which will relieve it from dealing with between 400 and 500 cases every year.

Further, the procedure here is cumbersome and costly. To show how cumbersome it is, perhaps I may be allowed to outline briefly, for those who are not familiar with the matter, the procedure which must be taken in order to get a parliamentary divorce.

First, there is the petition. That petition must be served. Then the solicitor for the petitioner must hire or appoint an Ottawa agent who is also a solicitor. Next, notice of the petition or application has to be published in a French and an English newspaper and also in The Canada Gazette. It has come to our notice, in several cases wherein applications have been made for remission of fees, that the cost of advertising amounted to between $100 and $125. This is ridiculous. Also, when the case is ready for hearing, and before it is set down on the list for a fixed date, the petitioner must pay $210, the fee required in respect of a private bill. Counsel and all witnesses must come to Ottawa, and the case is heard here just as it would be in court, but by the chairman and the members of the standing committee. Having listened to the evidence, they decide whether it is strong enough to warrant the granting of a divorce.

Hon. Mr. Reid: How is the $210 arrived at?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is the fee demanded not merely for divorce bills, but for any private bill before it can be introduced.

If the committee decides to recommend that a divorce be granted, it makes a report. Attached to the report is a copy of all the evidence, the petition, the affidavits of service and all other relevant documents. These are brought in by the chairman, with the committee's report, which is usually adopted. It is then necessary to have a bill, known as a bill of divorce, drawn. That bill is read a first time, a second time and a third time. This having been done, everything —including the evidence, the report of the committee and the affidavits of service and other papers—is sent with the bill to the other house, where a similar procedure is followed; that is, the bill is read the first and second times, and referred to a committee, which reports in due course; it then comes back for third reading, after which all the papers are sent back to this house; and by and by the Governor General comes in, assents to the bill, and the parties are divorced.

That is a costly procedure.

Hon. Mr. Ross: And the evidence is printed.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The evidence has to be printed and translated. That is, the printing is in English and also in French; and copies of the evidence are sent to all members of both houses.

I said that the procedure was cumbersome, and I think I have proved it. I think I can also prove that it is costly. When I first came to Ottawa I checked into the outlay for an ordinary undefended parliamentary divorce, and found that it was about $550. At the present time an ordinary undefended divorce action entails an expenditure of something in the neighbourhood of a thousand dollars. I should, of course, advise my honourable friend from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) that frequently lawyers charge more than a thousand dollars. Contrast this with the average cost of a divorce action in, say, the province of Saskatchewan, where it very seldom exceeds $400. What I am getting at is this, that only wealthy people can obtain a divorce from Parliament; the poorer classes have practically no remedy. I believe that if this bill were adopted the cost of divorce to petitioners from Quebec and Newfoundland would be cut in half.

Another point I wish to make is that when the Fathers of Confederation conferred exclusive jurisdiction in respect to divorce on the Parliament of Canada they had no intention that Parliament should be turned into a divorce court. Of that I am quite satisfied.

Another argument in favour of the change I propose is that if this bill were passed there would be less publicity in divorce cases from Quebec and Newfoundland, because, for one thing, no advertising would be necessary. I assume that when other honourable senators join in the debate they will bring forward reasons which I have not mentioned.

Probably honourable senators do not remember that in July 1947, when the then Standing Committee on Divorce made its annual report, it presented the following resolution for the consideration of the Senate:

> In view of the fact that the number of applications for divorce has been increasing by leaps and bounds, this year reached an all-time high, and may continue to increase, your committee recommends that Parliament should immediately seek a solution of the problem of dealing with divorce in the province of Quebec by other than parliamentary action.

I believe I am the one responsible for that appearing in my report, but it was with the approval of the committee. Upon receipt of that report on July 9, 1947, the Senate passed the following resolution:

That the subject matter of the final report of the Standing Committee on Divorce be referred to the Parliamentary Counsel of the Senate for consideration and report immediately following the opening of the next session of Parliament.

The Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel for the Senate at that time was Mr. John F. MacNeill, our present Clerk. His report, dated December 9, 1947, appearing at page 419 of the Journals of the Senate, 1948, contained certain suggestions, and I wish to place four of them on record now. The first was as follows:

Various proposals have been made as to what court, if any, should be given jurisdiction to deal with divorce applications in the province of Quebec. The one which commends itself to some is that the Quebec Superior Court be given jurisdiction in divorce, thus treating Quebec in this regard the same as the other provinces and providing that the law to be administered be the same as that in force in Ontario. There are many reasons why, if Quebec is to have a divorce law at all, this court should be clothed with jurisdiction to administer it. It is the court which deals with other civil rights of persons domiciled in Quebec.

That, of course, would be the best solution of all. If that could be done it would take divorce out of Parliament entirely, just the same as was done in the case of Ontario.

The second suggestion was this:

It has been suggested that jurisdiction in divorce be conferred on the Exchequer Court of Canada and that the law of England as to the dissolution of marriage as of 1870 be made applicable to Quebec, thereby making the law relating to the dissolution of marriage in Quebec the same as that in force in Ontario.

The bill I am now presenting is different from that proposal in that it makes no reference to the law of England as it stood in 1870; and the bill provides that the Exchequer Court, normally a travelling tribunal authorized to hold sittings all over the country, be not given the right to hear divorce cases in the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland. All applications for divorce from those provinces would have to be heard by the Exchequer Court in Ottawa.

The third suggestion was a novel one:

A third suggestion is that the Exchequer Court of Canada be given jurisdiction throughout Canada, where either of the parties is domiciled in Canada, and that the Superior Court of each province be given jurisdiction within the province where either of the parties is domiciled in the province, but that an exception be made in the case of the Superior Court of Quebec. The effect of this proposal would be to give the Exchequer Court exclusive jurisdiction in divorce in the province of Quebec and concurrent jurisdiction with the provincial courts in the other provinces.

I presume Mr. MacNeill meant that all judges of Superior Courts in Canada, except those in the province of Quebec, would be considered judges of the Exchequer Court of Canada for the purpose of dealing with matters of divorce and would have jurisdiction to hear divorce cases in their own provinces. Divorce cases emanating from the two provinces which have no divorce laws would be heard at Ottawa.

The fourth suggestion was as follows:

Another proposal which has been urged by some writers is the establishment of a new divorce court for the dominion having exclusive jurisdiction in matters of marriage and divorce.

Honourable senator, I would point out that no action was taken on these proposals, but if any one of them was adopted it would, in my opinion, completely take care of the trouble that we are now in. It would do away with parliamentary divorce. However, I should also like to deal with certain other suggestions that have been made with regard to the handling of divorce applications from the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland. A few years ago the honourable senator from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Ross) made a suggestion that might appeal to some. It was to the effect that domicile be made dominion wide. At the present time domicile is more or less a provincial matter. In fact, in some provinces the applicant must start the action in the jurisdictional district or the county in which the husband has his domicile; otherwise the applicant is "out of court". If domicile for the purposes of divorce causes was made dominion wide, then any case from any province could be heard in any other province. That would mean that cases from the two provinces which have no divorce court could be heard, say, in Ontario, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island or any other province. I realize that this practice might place too big a burden on the provinces contiguous to Quebec and Newfoundland, but it is one of the suggestions that have been made and I think it is worthy of consideration.

Another suggestion for curing this evil, if it can be called that, is that the British North America Act be amended and divorce jurisdiction placed in the hands of the provinces. My honourable friend from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) has sent me a copy of Hansard of the other house of recent date, which contains a speech claiming that the only thing we need do to solve this whole problem is to amend the British North America Act and turn divorce over to the provinces. Well, of course that would not solve the problem in the two provinces not having divorce laws; they would still have no divorce court. So I think the idea of amending the British North America Act in that fashion is out of the question.

There are two other half-measures that I would like to refer to. Somebody told me that in August, 1946, I made a speech in the Senate dealing with a suggestion that had been made by the Minister of Justice at that time. I looked up what I said, and I quote from page 609 of the Debates of the Senate, 1946. I made the following remarks when I was giving the annual report on the work of the divorce committee for that year:

> A short time ago the Minister of Justice is reported to have suggested in another place a remedy which he thought might, if adopted, relieve Parliament from the drudgery of hearing the evidence in petitions for divorce coming from the province of Quebec. His suggestion, as I understand it, was that the husband or the wife desiring the divorce should first take action in the Superior Court of Quebec or a judicial separation, and if the court granted the separation on the ground of adultery, a certificate to that effect could be obtained; upon presentation of this certificate to parliament, along with the petition for divorce, the bill of divorce would go through as a matter of course. If this could be done it would certainly relieve Parliament and the Senate Divorce Committee of a great deal of unpleasant work.

When I first read of the minister's suggestion I thought it might at least be a partial solution of the problem. Then I sent to the province of Quebec for a copy of article 187 of the Civil Code of Lower Canada, which reads as follows:

> A husband may demand the separation on the ground of his wife's adultery.

I understand that article 187 is still in force in Quebec. In other words, if the husband got a certificate he could bring it to Parliament, and the Divorce Committee would put the bill through and the divorce would eventually be granted. It would still be a very cumbersome way of doing things. But I was startled when I read article 188—

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Article 188 has since been amended, and both parties are now on the same footing.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: My objection at the time was that they were not. I am glad to learn that article 188 has since been amended.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: The same rights are now given to both husband and wife.

Hon. Mr. Farris: What does article 188 say?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: At that time article 188 read as follows:

> A wife may demand the separation on the ground of her husband's adultery, if he keep his concubine in their common habitation.

However, the honourable senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) advises me that article 188 has since been amended.

There is still another objection. Even if a certificate were obtained, how could the Committee on Divorce find out if there were collusion, connivance, condonation, or anything else? As I have stated, the suggestion would provide only a partial solution. It is true that it would do away with the taking of evidence by the Divorce Committee, but the committee would be placed in the position of having to rubber stamp recommendations for bills of divorce on the strength of certificates from a Quebec court, without having read the evidence or heard witnesses; and bills would go to the House of Commons, where the same criticism of our procedure would be made as has been made for many years, before the bills were passed and sent back to the Senate for Royal Assent.

I have quoted the four methods suggested by the Law Clerk of the Senate and referred to other suggestions, including that of a former Minister of Justice. There is still another suggestion, for which I believe I myself am responsible, for I remember making a speech on the subject years ago when the number of divorce petitions started to go up and up. The suggestion was to the effect that some officer, perhaps a lawyer or a judge, be appointed by Parliament to try all these cases, that is, to hear the witnesses, take the evidence, and report back to the Divorce Committee; the committee would then act as a court of appeal, and if it decided that a divorce should be granted, it would bring in a bill, which would receive three readings here, and three readings in the House of Commons, and so on. By that means Parliament would be relieved of all the drudgery of taking the evidence. Although I believe I was responsible for that suggestion, I gave it up as being only a half-measure. It also had some of the objection to be found in the suggestion made by the Minister of Justice, and it was a somewhat similar solution to the problem.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: May I ask who the Minister of Justice was in 1946?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The Minister of Justice in 1946 was the present Prime Minister. The suggestion I offered might be feasible. I do not know whether an act could be passed to give someone the authority to hear the cases and take the evidence or not, but even if it could be done that way the committee would really be rubber-stamping the decision of someone else, without having heard the evidence and considering the case, and the House of Commons would be in the same position. I have come to the conclusion that the only solution—at any rate, the only one I can think of at present—is that proposed in Bill I-5. The bill would not create any new court. We already have a federal court called the Exchequer Court, which under section 18 of the Exchequer Court Act has wide powers in many federal matters. I will read subsection (1) of that section:

The Exchequer Court also has exclusive original jurisdiction to hear and determine the following matters:

Then there are set out (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), (h), (i) and (j). Bill I-5 would add a new paragraph (k), reading as follows:

Every application for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, from a person domiciled in any province of Canada not having courts possessing jurisdiction to grant such divorces, on the ground that the defendant has since the celebration of his or her marriage been guilty of adultery.

Now, Parliament would not be divesting itself of its jurisdiction; that could only be done by an amendment to the B.N.A. Act; but I believe that with respect to Quebec and Newfoundland there would be a result similar to that which followed the giving of divorce jurisdiction to Ontario courts in 1930, namely, that no divorce applications have come from that province since then. However, there might be an odd case that would have to be dealt with by Parliament. I recall a case not long ago when a woman, in New Brunswick I think, was deserted by her husband. He went to Nova Scotia and took a job there. His wife sued him in Nova Scotia for divorce, and the courts in Nova Scotia held that the husband was domiciled in New Brunswick, and therefore they dismissed the action. She then brought her action in the courts of New Brunswick, but there it was held she had no jurisdiction because her husband was domiciled in Nova Scotia. The case finally came before the Senate committee, and was dealt with on the ground that only Canadian domicile is necessary, in accordance with the divorce rules of the Senate. It may be necessary in the future for Parliament to hear cases similar to that one, but generally speaking I believe that passage of this measure would have the same results as those which followed the giving of divorce jurisdiction to the province of Ontario in 1930.

The bill before us would add subsections 4, 5 and 6 to section 18 of the Exchequer Court Act. Subsection 4 is necessary to give the wife the same right as the husband; in other words, if it were not there, it would be found that the act applied only to the provinces having divorce jurisdiction.

Subsection 5 is necessary for the purpose of giving a married woman the domicile of her husband in the case of desertion.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Would the honourable senator allow me a question? Subsection 4 uses language that is permissive rather than mandatory. For instance, it uses these words, "In an application for divorce . . . the court may give judgment . . ." But at the top of page 2 of the bill there is a proviso: "Provided always that the court shall not be bound to give judgment if it finds . . ." Does that not imply that the court would be bound to give judgment if certain prescribed conditions were not present?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Those are defences, and when such defences are raised it becomes a matter for the court to decide in its discretion whether the evidence warrants the granting of a divorce.

Hon. Mr. Vien: But does the honourable senator not think that the language to which I referred could be improved?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not pretend for a moment that the language is perfect. We worked on the bill for some three weeks and the result is the best we could do in that time.

Subsection 6 provides that divorce cases must be heard by the Exchequer Court in the city of Ottawa.

Section 4 of the bill would amend section 82 of the Exchequer Court Act, because the present appeal provisions contained in the act are not applicable to divorce matters.

It might be argued, honourable senators, that the Exchequer Court has not enough judges to handle the divorce work from the two provinces concerned. I am reminded of what I saw in England, where a judge was handling as many as 25 cases in a day, which evidently was the common practice there. Under the circumstances, I think if one Exchequer Court judge were assigned to divorce work he would have no difficulty handling as many cases as are now dealt with by Parliament.

I hope that a good number of senators will take part in this debate. As I said earlier, I cannot recall a full dress debate on parliamentary divorce having taken place in the Senate during my time here. I would also like to see a Gallup poll taken on this question. It seems to me that the Canadian people as a whole feel that the divorce matters which senators and members of Parliament are called upon to deal with from day to day and year to year should be removed entirely from Parliament.

I trust that when this matter comes to a vote, honourable senators will have a free vote and that we will all take a stand on the subject. I thank honourable senators for their courtesy in listening to this somewhat lengthy speech.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Hodges, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN COUNCIL OF CHURCHES—SECOND READING

Hon. Cairine R. Wilson moved the second reading of Bill Q-5, an Act to incorporate The Canadian Council of Churches.

She said: Honourable senators, the explanatory notes to the bill give the reasons for the move to incorporate The Canadian Council of Churches, but I might add a few historical references.

From the preamble to the bill it will be noted that the present unincorporated Council represents the larger denominations of the Protestant faith, as well as the National Council of the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association of Canada, and the Student Christian Movement. The Canadian Council of Churches was organized in 1944 and was the result of a flowing together of two movements, which had become increasingly important in the life and work of the churches of this country: first, the movement for inter-church co-operation within Canada; and, second, the Ecumenical Movement from abroad.

Co-operation among the churches in Canada has been growing over a period of many years; gradually, we have developed a series of co-operative organizations. In the Christian Social Council of Canada representatives of the social service boards of the churches have worked together for Christian social action. The Religious Education Council of Canada served in the same manner for undertakings in religious education. The Secretaries of Foreign Missions Boards had a conference which developed into the Canadian Overseas Missions Council. There have been other co-operative bodies which have promoted useful and fruitful projects in their several fields.

Each of the earlier co-operative organizations was departmental in its scope and somewhat remote from the churches represented; they were associations of church boards rather than of the churches themselves.

Many of those engaged in the various organizations came to feel that a Council of the Churches was needed to integrate the co-operative organizations and make available an inclusive agency for any co-operative enterprise which the churches might wish to undertake.

At the same time the impact of the Ecumenical Movement was beginning to be felt by the churches in Canada. The Utrecht conference, in 1938, devised the proposed constitution for the World Council of Churches. Prior to this conference a Committee of Selection had met to name the Canadian representatives, and this became later the Canadian Committee for the World Council of Churches.

A proposal was made in the United States to combine several inter-church bodies in a North American Council of Churches, but study of this plan led to the conclusion that it would be wiser to have a National Council in each country. A special committee was next called together, composed of representatives of the Canadian Committee for the World Council of Churches; the Christian Social Council of Canada, the Religious Education Council of Canada and the Conference of Mission Board Secretaries. This committee devised a constitution for a Canadian Council of Churches, submitted it to the parent body, and they in turn submitted it to their constituent Communions. The Canadian Council of Churches was thus formally organized in September, 1944. Since then the Canadian Council of Churches has held ten annual meetings. I was privileged to attend two, one in Ottawa and one in Toronto. In 1952 it was decided that in future the meetings would take place every second year instead of annually.

The members of the Canadian Council of Churches are today: The Anglican Church of Canada, The Baptist Federation of Canada, The Churches of Christ (Disciples), The Evangelical United Brethren Church, The Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of North and South America, The Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church of North America, The Presbyterian Church in Canada, The Reformed Episcopal Church, The Salvation Army, The Society of Friends and The United Church of Canada.

The National Council of Young Men's Christian Associations of Canada, The Young Women's Christian Association of Canada and The Student Christian Movement of Canada are affiliated members. The United Lutheran Church of America is in friendly association with the council and co-operates in the Department of Ecumenical Affairs.

The Canadian Council of Churches serves as a national council of Canada, and carries forward undertakings of the Canadian churches both in this country and in other parts of the world, but each Communion retains its separate identity and is practically autonomous. It is still a very youthful organization, but its prayer is that it may be used for the Christian good of Canada and as a more effective Christian witness throughout the world.

Through the World Council of Churches our Canadian Council of Churches has been active in caring for refugees and for churches destroyed through war, and in undertaking missionary operations. I can say that we feel the Canadian Council has a great future before it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The motion was agreed to.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Wilson, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

HYDROCARBONS PIPELINE LIMITED—
COMMITTEE AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendment made by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to Bill Q, an act to incorporate Hydrocarbons Pipeline Limited.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Committee, moved that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendment was concurred in.

MOTION FOR THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: With leave, I move the third reading now.

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor: Honourable senators, the amendment made to this bill was a slight one. On general principle I am against any bill receiving third reading the same day it is reported from committee with an amendment; however, being a member of the committee, I remember that the amendment was just a matter of striking out a few words.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I think I should apologize to the house for not mentioning that. The amendment made to this bill was a very trifling one, and I should have so advised the house before moving third reading. Perhaps I might suggest that third reading be taken tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I think amendments should be explained.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I fully agree with the honourable senator. On principle, he is quite right.

The Hon. the Speaker: Third reading next sitting.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce, Nos. 138 to 141, which were presented on February 23.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Committee, moved that the reports be adopted.

The motion was agreed to on division.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of February 18th. After the proposals therein contained have been studied by our officials I shall reply further.

The only comment I might make at the present time would relate to the last paragraph of page two of your letter wherein you suggested that only two premiers had requested a resumption of the conference. Perhaps I was not specific enough at our meeting in Ottawa, or did not state our views with sufficient formality, but I did intend to convey the impression at that time that Nova Scotia favored a resumption of the conference. However, in view of your recent letter, this is perhaps not so important as we shall again consider our position to see whether, in view of certain other paragraphs in this letter, we still think it would be worth while to reconvene the conference.

Yours very truly,

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of February 20th, 1956 on the proposed fiscal arrangements and the attached memorandum of answers of the Minister of Finance for Canada to the questions raised by the Provinces.

Certain features of the proposal referred to in your letter and in the memorandum of the Minister of Finance are improvements over the present fiscal arrangements, but it appears to us that the basic formula which uses the weighted average of the per capita tax yields of only Ontario and British Columbia—to all intents and purposes this means Ontario—does not recognize the heavy financial burdens that are imposed on this Province and its municipalities in servicing a rapidly growing population and industry which produce such a large proportion of the Federal Government's revenue. In view of the enormous obligations and commitments that we face, we feel strongly that a formula that provides a special payment to all the provinces except Ontario fails to meet the special needs of this Province. As a first step in this approach, we believe that the equalization payments should be calculated on the basis of the four provinces having the highest per capita tax yields.

We shall be glad to meet with you, your colleagues and representatives of the other provinces in a resumption of the Conference preferably on March 9th.

My dear Prime Minister:—

Thank you for your letter of February 18th and for the attached memorandum from the Minister of Finance.

I note you are desirous of ascertaining whether or not the provinces favour meeting again in committee to discuss the proposals which you advanced in your letter of January 6th. In spite of the fact that the Federal Government feels it would not be warranted in making any increases in its basic offer, the Government of Saskatchewan would favour a Federal-Provincial meeting for the reasons which I outlined in my letter of January 11th. We would be prepared to attend on either of the dates which you have suggested although March 9th would probably be preferable.

There are still a number of matters which were discussed at the Federal-Provincial Conference in October regarding which the Saskatchewan government feels there should be some further discussions. This is particularly true of resource development and also assistance to the municipalities by making operative the Municipalities Improvements Assistance Act. If the majority of the provinces indicate their desire for a meeting again in committee we shall be very happy to attend. If, however, there is no widespread request for such a meeting either Mr. Fines or I will be glad to avail ourselves of your kind invitation to discuss with you or Mr. Harris those aspects of the Federal Government's proposal about which we are particularly concerned.

Should it be decided to re-convene the committee we would appreciate hearing from you at the earliest possible date.

Yours sincerely,

My dear Prime Minister:

Your letter of February 2, 1956 and the memorandum from your Minister of Finance giving answers to a number of questions raised by Treasury officials are acknowledged.

If a further meeting in committee is found generally desirable, I shall be glad to attend it. If, however, no general meeting is to take place, then I must press for a conference between our respective governments, further to discuss the terms of the proposed agreement, insofar as they apply to a Province like British Columbia which is not dependent upon fiscal subsidies; is experiencing an unprecedented economic growth; and requires a greater allocation from the cultivation of income tax fields to keep pace with a development which, apart from its provincial worth, will yield vast returns to the Nation.

Your letter indicates that discussions with the individual provinces will be conducted by yourself and Mr. Harris on behalf of the Federal Government. Mr. Bonner, our Attorney General and I will represent British Columbia, and on the assumption that technical staff will be present, I propose taking with me Messrs. Fisher and Gunderson, and possibly Mr. Veitch.

Our current session of the Legislature will not terminate its labours until the second week in March. I would, therefore, urge that our meeting do not take place before March 9th, 1956.

The memorandum from Mr. Harris is being studied and comments thereon will be made either before or at the meeting suggested.

TRADE AGREEMENT WITH RUSSIA

STATEMENT IN COMMONS BY MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE—DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the house may I be permitted to make a statement at this time?

This afternoon in the House of Commons the Minister of Trade and Commerce tabled copy of a trade agreement concluded with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The minister also made a statement at that time. I have received a copy of his statement and if honourable senators so desire I could read it at this time.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The minister's statement is as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I am happy to announce the conclusion of a trade agreement with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The text of this agreement is being tabled for the information of honourable members. If the house agrees, I suggest that the text be printed as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings.

My colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs opened the way for this agreement during his visit to the U.S.S.R. last October. At that time it was agreed in exploratory talks that negotiations should take place in Ottawa. A delegation from the U.S.S.R. arrived here four weeks ago and the negotiations have been in progress since then.

The agreement which has been reached is set forth in five documents.

The first of these documents makes provision for the exchange of most-favoured-nation treatment along lines similar to existing agreements with various other countries. It includes other provisions having to do with the conduct of trade between the two countries. It recognizes that either Government may apply prohibitions or restrictions of any kind for the protection of its essential security interests. Our strategic export controls are therefore not affected. This agreement provides, in addition, on a reciprocal basis for the non-discriminatory treatment of merchant ships while in port. On the Canadian side, the effect of this latter provision is simply to confirm the treatment which in fact has been available all along to ships of U.S.S.R. registry.

This agreement is to continue in force for a period of three years; agreement of both countries is required for any extension. It was signed on February 29 by accredited representatives of both Governments and is now in force provisionally. By its terms, it is subject to ratification within 90 days from the date of signature and within this time opportunity will be provided for a debate in Parliament. A resolution of approval will be introduced for this purpose.

The second document is a letter from the Canadian Government reserving the right to establish values for ordinary and special import duty on any Russian product that might enter Canada in such increased quantities as to cause serious injury to domestic producers. In determining such values, the prices of similar goods imported into Canada from third countries are to be taken into account. This procedure is intended to deal with situations which might be created if Russian goods were to be sold in Canada at very low prices, even if they are not proven to be lower than their domestic values in the U.S.S.R.

The third document is a letter from the Government of the U.S.S.R., acknowledging the Canadian letter on customs valuation.

The fourth of the five documents forming the agreement is a letter by which the Government of the U.S.S.R. guarantees to purchase and take delivery from Canada, during the three years of the agreement, a total between 1,200,000 and 1,500,000 tons of wheat, in annual lots of between 400,000 and 500,000 tons. The exact amounts to be purchased in the second and third years, within these annual amounts, will be determined by the Government of the U.S.S.R., taking into account the volume of Soviet goods sold to Canada. The total over the three years, however, will amount to not less than 1,200,000 tons and the amount in any individual year to not less than 400,000 tons. The Russian purchases of wheat are to be made at the prices and on the terms at which the Canadian Wheat Board is making sales to its major customers at such times as the Soviet purchases take place.

The fifth document is a letter from the Canadian Government, acknowledging the letter from the Government of the U.S.S.R. on wheat.

Honourable senators, that completes the statement made in the House of Commons by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Is the U.S.S.R. buying the long ton or short ton?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: This document does not disclose whether it is the long ton or the short ton. That information will no doubt be available when the agreement is presented to this house for consideration. It will be recalled that in his statement the minister said that the agreement will be submitted to Parliament.

I therefore table the documents referred to in the statement which I have just read. The agreement is in English and in French, while the other documents are in English only. If it is the wish of the house I would move that these documents appear as an appendix to our Hansard and Minutes of today.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With leave, I move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig):

That the text of the statement made by the Right Honourable C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, in the House of Commons, on February 29, 1956, on the subject of the Trade Agreement entered into between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and copy of the said Trade Agreement, done at Ottawa on the 29th day of February, 1956, in duplicate, in the English and the Russian languages, both equally authentic, together with copies of an exchange of correspondence between the Honourable L. B. Pearson, Secretary of State for External Affairs, and Mr. S. A. Borisov, First Deputy Minister for Foreign Trade of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, be printed as an Appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this date.

The motion was agreed to.

See appendix to today's Hansard, p. 227.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 163 to 170, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck presented the following bills:

Bill R-5, an Act for the relief of Mona Margaret McCastlin Adams.

Bill S-5, an Act for the relief of Regis Edouard Gosselin.

Bill T-5, an Act for the relief of William Boychuck.

Bill U-5, an Act for the relief of Edna Betty Berendt Payment.

The bills were read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: With leave, next sitting.

EXCHEQUER COURT (DIVORCE JURISDICTION) BILL

CORRECTION OF STATEMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I wish to make a slight correction of a statement I made in this house last night. It will no doubt be remembered that the honourable senator from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Ross) pointed out that the evidence taken by our Divorce Committee is printed. I then stated hurriedly, and without thinking, that the evidence has to be printed and translated, that the printing is done in English and French, and that copies of the evidence are distributed to members of both houses. That is not correct. The evidence is not translated and is not printed in French, except upon special request.

PRIVATE BILL

HYDROCARBONS PIPELINE LIMITED—THIRD READING

Hon. T. A. Crerar moved the third reading of Bill Q, an Act to incorporate Hydrocarbons Pipeline Limited.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRAIRIE GRAIN PRODUCERS INTERIM FINANCING BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill 82, an Act to provide for short-term credit to grain producers in the Prairie provinces to meet temporary financial difficulties arising from inability to deliver all their grain.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to provide a partial guarantee of loans made by chartered banks to the producers against grain on farms, and to reinforce the security that would ordinarily be available under the Bank Act.

Honourable senators will recall that comparable legislation was introduced and passed in 1951, under the title of the Prairie Grain Producers' Interim Financing Act, 1951. The conditions which required the passage of that act differ from the circumstances which prompt the introduction of the present bill. In the fall of 1951 winter set in and the snow came early, making it impossible for the farmer to cut his grain, and much of his crop had to be left standing in the field. Loans were advanced to the farmer on the security of standing crops.

This year, as honourable senators know, conditions are quite different: there is a superabundant production of grain, and for the most part it has been harvested. Indeed, production this past year is much higher than it has ever been. I think it would be of interest to honourable senators if I gave production figures for the four years preceding 1951, the year in which similar legislation to this was passed by Parliament. They were as follows:

1947	320	million bushels
1948	356	" "
1949	341	" "
1950	427	" "
An average of	361	" "

With an average yield of 361 million bushels the farmers experienced no marketing problem. And had the average yield during the four crop years preceding 1955 been normal there would have been no marketing difficulties; but the crops in those years also were above average, and besides there was a very good crop in 1955. I will list the production figures for the four years preceding 1955:

1951	529	million bushels
1952	664	" "
1953	584	" "

The average over those four years was 515 million bushels, compared with the average of 361 million bushels for the previous four years. So this legislation is needed simply because of the tremendous crops which the wheat growers have been obtaining since 1951.

Now, some people may say, "Oh, no, that is not the reason; the reason is that there has been no sale". Well, I can assure honourable senators that that is not correct. There has been no failure on the part of the Wheat Board to sell grain. I have the figures of export sales from 1948 to 1955. I will quote these figures, dividing them into the two periods, 1947 to 1951, and 1951 onward.

Crop year
1947-48	195	million bushels
1948-49	232	" "
1949-50	225	" "
1950-51	241	" "

The average export sale of wheat during those four years was 223 million bushels. Now, let us see what the average was for the four following years:

Crop year
1951-52	355	million bushels
1952-53	385	" "
1953-54	255	" "
1954-55	252	" "

There was an average export of 312 million bushels a year during those four years as against an average of 223 million bushels in the previous four years. These figures show that the poorest year for exports in the last four years was better than the best year of the previous four years.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Has the honourable leader any figures to show what the financial returns were in those years?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, I have not any figures giving that information.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It would be interesting to have them.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable member is a much better arithmetician than I am. He would only have to obtain the price per bushel and multiply the figures I have given by that price.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask what the sale was from the 1st of August 1954 to the 31st of July 1955? My honourable friend gave the figure a minute ago.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: 252 million bushels. Although I cannot give the value in dollars and cents, I can say that there has been an all-time high both in production and exportation during the past four years.

May I also remind honourable senators that the 1952 crop of 664 million bushels was the greatest wheat crop in Canada's history, and the 1953 crop of 584 million bushels was the second greatest.

All wheat produced prior to the present crop year was delivered by the farmers to the elevators, with the exception of about 100 million bushels. In the five crop years prior to this year prairie farmers have marketed 2,076 million bushels of wheat plus 1,203 million bushels of other grains. This is another all-time high record. So in the last five years Canada has had three all-time records: one in the production of wheat, one in the farmers' marketing of wheat, and one in the export sales of wheat.

Prior to this year's crop there was space available in the elevators to receive the wheat, but this year at the opening of the crop year elevators were filled to capacity. That is why this legislation is necessary. Probably I should repeat that. Prior to this year's crop there was space available in the elevators to receive wheat, but this year, at the opening of the crop year, elevators were filled to capacity. Of course, farmers can only market their wheat as space becomes available, and it becomes available because of export or domestic sales. The condition which prevails at present makes it necessary to provide temporary financial assistance for some farmers. I would not want honourable senators to think we have not got markets. We have markets, and the sale of wheat at the present time is very good. The problem arises not because of lack of sales, but because of lack of transportation. At this season of the year it is difficult to transport wheat from the country elevators to the space at the lakehead, but as the weather improves it will be easier to make shipments. Railway cars were scarce earlier in the year. They still are not too plentiful, but they are becoming more readily available now than they were some time ago, and of course when navigation opens there will be plenty of space in the terminal elevators.

Proposals other than those set forth in the bill were made to assist the farmers. They were only proposals, but I will mention some of them. It was suggested that the Wheat Board should lend money direct. Well, in the first place this would put the board into the money lending business, and its constitution and by-laws are not such as would make that easily possible. The banks can now make loans and take security on farm-stored grain, under section 88 of the Bank Act. In 1951 they could not take advantage of this provision because, as honourable senators will recall, it was restricted to threshed grain and most of the wheat at that time had not been threshed. If the Wheat Board were to make these loans it could not do so pursuant to section 88. I need not enlarge upon this situation; it may be sufficient to point out that, by a special provision in the Bank Act, a bank can accept as security threshed grain located on farms.

Also, the Government felt that the Wheat Board should not be turned into a collecting agency. Obviously, if the board were to make loans and some borrowers were dilatory in making payments, it would be necessary for the board to try to collect. It has been represented that were the Wheat Board empowered to make loans it could afford to fix a lower interest rate. I do not think that would be possible. The board would have to borrow money from the banks. At the present time the rate charged for similar borrowings is 3 per cent; an additional 2 per cent would be absorbed in administration and collection charges, so that the rate would not be less than 5 per cent—the figure set in this bill.

I notice that the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) signifies disagreement with this statement, but I can merely repeat that the board would have to pay the banks 3 per cent for the money and that administration and collection costs would amount to another 2 per cent. As for using the proceeds of wheat sales to make loans, this would mean that certain producers would get money which belonged to other producers. I do not suppose that the farmers to whom this money belonged would stand for that sort of thing. Further, one must anticipate costs and some losses and by whom would these be borne?

I should like briefly to compare this bill with the act of 1951. Honourable senators will be interested to know that in that year, under the legislation then passed, the Government paid losses up to 25 per cent of the loans made by any one chartered bank. Under the present bill, and as a result of experience, the guarantee will be much smaller, because the security of threshed grain is better than that of standing grain. It was also felt that the Government need not guarantee so large a percentage of the loss to the banks. By the present bill, as against the 1951 guarantee of 25 per cent, the guarantee amounts to 15 per cent of the first $100,000 of loss by any one bank, and 10 per cent of anything over $100,000. The individual limit under the 1951 legislation was $1,000; by the present bill the amount is increased to $1,500. Under the 1951 law the interest rate was 5½ per cent,—which, I might mention, is the same rate as that in effect under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. The total amount made available for the purposes of the 1951 act was $20 million; under this bill it is to be $50 million. The security is somewhat different from that provided by the 1951 legislation. Then, the only security was the proceeds of all deliveries. Under this measure there is the security of section 88 of the Bank Act, plus the assignment by the borrower of one half the proceeds of future deliveries.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: May I inquire what loss, if any, was sustained under the 1951 legislation?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It was very small. At the moment I have not the exact figures.

Hon. Mr. Horner: So far, I think, the total loss is about $13,000.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I know that it is quite small. I can give the honourable member this information, that up to the end of December last year some 8,000 loans were made, totalling $6½ million.

There is not much more to be said. I think I have sufficiently explained the purpose of the bill, in the light of the present situation of the farmers. If the elevators remain congested at the opening of the next crop year the guarantee can be extended to loans made under the same conditions between October 1, 1956 and June 1, 1957. At the present time the wheat picture—if I may so call it—for Canada is very bright, and I am confident that it will not be long before all farmers have delivered a substantial portion of their last wheat crop.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable members, I am going to assume, perhaps wrongly, that honourable senators other than those from the three Prairie provinces may not be very familiar with the subject we are considering, though they may have a general knowledge of the situation.

The problem is a little more difficult than the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has suggested. If he lived, as I do at the centre of one of the wheat growing provinces, where we grow wheat and sell it, or try to sell it, or if, like the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) or the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner), he farmed in the province of Saskatchewan, he would be somewhat better informed of the difficulties which the farmers in the provinces of western Canada have to face in connection with wheat.

The problem, of course, is not peculiar to Canada. Conditions are very much worse in the United States; and before I finish my speech I shall tell you why, in my judgment, that is so.

Let me say, to begin with, that I have no intention of challenging the Wheat Board or criticizing what it is doing. A large majority of the farmers of western Canada are in favour of the wheat pool system of marketing wheat, and as long as they are in favour of it I feel it is my duty as a senator from Manitoba to support that policy. The issue here is simply this. The elevators are so filled with grain that in many parts of the three Prairie provinces it is impossible for more grain to be accepted by the elevators. That is the problem, for until the farmer delivers wheat to the elevator he cannot get any money for it. I think the present quota is four bushels to the acre.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Three bushels in some places.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Mostly one.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Let us say the quota is three bushels of wheat to the acre. For 200 acres that would be 600 bushels. The farmer would get paid for this at the rate of $1.40, or about $1.20 net, per bushel.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is for No. 1.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I am talking about No. 1 wheat. You can take any grade you wish. Let me give you an illustration of what has happened. A farmer from the Rosewood district of Manitoba went into a small bank and told the manager that he had delivered 300 bushels of wheat for which he had been paid at the rate of, I think, $1.15 or $1.10 per bushel. The proceeds came to about $330. The manager told him that under the regulations he could borrow from the bank the difference between that amount and $1,500, namely, $1,170, but that he could only use it to pay his taxes and oil bill. The farmer asked, "What about the mortgage I owe on the land?" The manager replied, "Oh, let it go." The farmer came to see me, because I acted for the mortgagee, and he said, "Senator Haig, I can't pay on the mortgage". I told him: "That is all right; we will simply take the land. It will take two months to get it, but at the end of that time my client will own the land." He complained because he could not borrow money to pay on his mortgage, and he said, "Senator Haig, there is no use in my borrowing from the bank at 5½ per cent interest to pay my taxes and oil bill when my grocery bill is left unpaid." Pointing out that he would have no money with which to buy anything for his family for the rest of the winter, he said, "I can't face that kind of music." That is the situation he was in, and that is the situation in which hundreds of our western farmers find themselves. It may be asked, "What do they do with their money?" The honourable Leader of the Government told us about the amount of grain farmers have sold. I admit that some have done all right. My honourable friend on my left (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) has 65,000 bushels out in his backyard right now.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: He is a lucky man.

Hon. Mr. Haig: He cannot get any of it into the elevators. There is simply no space for it. He has part of his crops for the years 1951, 1952, 1953, 1954 and 1955.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Are there many in the same position?

Hon. Mr. Haig: There are dozens with as much as from 600 to 10,000 bushels. It is just piled up unprotected on their land. The regulations provide that all grain must be sold to the Wheat Board, except that a producer can sell to somebody else in his own province. He cannot sell outside his own province.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: He can with a permit.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Only through the Canadian Wheat Board. It is said that the Wheat Board is not the Government. Well negotiations are now taking place in Geneva for a new International Wheat Agreement, and our delegation is comprised of representatives of the Canadian Government. The advisers are the heads of the wheat pools in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, but this does not mean they represent the wheat pools. They are chosen by the Government to advise its officials. The effect is that the Government itself is responsible for what the Wheat Board does, no matter how you look at it. In every election campaign since the Wheat Board came into existence these people have always taken credit for the big prices the western farmers have been able to get for wheat.

I just want to go back a little in history. After the First World War the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, then Prime Minister of Canada, set up a Wheat Board system.

Hon. Mr. Horner: It was during the war.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, toward the end of the war. At any rate, there were no compulsory features about it. A farmer did not have to sell to the Wheat Board if he did not want to do so. That system was very successful. Why? For the same reason that our Wheat Board was successful about the time of the last war. I have a report here from the United States. For the first four or five years after the Second World War they were very successful over there, paying $2.50 a bushel for wheat, when we sold to Great Britain for less than we should have. The members of this house were so convinced that the terms of the first British Wheat Agreement were unsatisfactory that they voted to pay $65 million to western farmers as a slight indication of the regret the rest of Canada felt about the deal the farmers got under that agreement. Then we entered into the International Wheat Agreement, and at the start we were able to sell our wheat, but as soon as production in the rest of the world caught up with demand, what happened? My honourable friend opposite (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) did not tell us how much wheat is stored in the various terminals in Canada. He could have done so, but he did not.

Hon. Mr. Wood: About 900 million bushels.

Hon. Mr. Haig: And that is unsold wheat. I think the Leader told us that one year our farmers sold as much as 252 million bushels. Well, even at that rate, it would take almost four years to get rid of that wheat alone, to say nothing of any new wheat.

In Manitoba we have been trying as hard as possible—and I presume similar efforts have been made in other provinces—to get the farmers to cut down their wheat acreage. The total acreage has been reduced to some extent, and I think this year there were 22 million acres in wheat.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Twenty million.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Three or four years ago there were 24 million.

Hon. Mr. Gershaw: Twenty-seven million, in some years.

Hon. Mr. Haig: In some years, but there were 24 million three years ago. Furthermore, with modern machinery a farmer is able to sow grain in the spring at exactly the right time. I recall that when I was a boy on the farm it took my father six weeks to get his grain sown in the spring. He used three horses on a drill, and he would plant and plant and plant. With modern machinery, the same amount of seeding can be done now in about a week. We used to take six weeks to summer-fallow with a sulky plow and three horses. Now it is done in two weeks. The same thing is true with respect to threshing. The threshing gangs, which moved all around the country, threshed at our place from the 1st of September right up until Christmas. Now this work is completed before the 1st of October. They just cut the grain in the field, thresh it and draw it to the elevator. Also nowadays thousands of farmers use chemical fertilizers. When I was a boy on the farm I never heard of chemical fertilizer, but plenty of it has been used since; tons and tons of it are produced by a manufacturing plant in British Columbia. The fertilizer enables the land to produce a considerably higher yield of wheat, but that only adds to the surplus, and the problem is how to dispose of the surplus. The United States is using the best brains in the country in an attempt to solve the problem. It has cut its wheat acreage from 81 million acres to 50 million acres, yet the yield is as high as before.

The people of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta say to the Government: "You have been dabbling in wheat for ten years. What is your solution? The only suggestion you make is that we pay the banks interest at 5½ per cent on our own money, our own assets. We own the wheat, you agreed to buy it, and now you cannot take it. We want the money, and the people of Canada should put up the money, not the other grain growers." That was the conclusion that all the Opposition parties in the House of Commons came to. Honourable senators, do you think for one moment that the honourable members of the Social Credit party, the CCF party and the Progressive-Conservative party from the three Prairie provinces would have voted as solidly as they did against the Government on this bill if it had not been as clear as daylight to them that the farmers were dissatisfied with the present policy of handling grain?

I must admit that I do not know what the solution is. My honourable friend the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) might say, "Well, Senator Haig, if you were sitting in my place and I in yours, what solution would you offer?" Frankly, I do not know, but I do know that a solution must be found. The United States Secretary of Agriculture, Ezra T. Benson, is working desperately to find a solution. We in Canada have got to tell our people that our grain can be sold in the markets of the world at the world price. We cannot put our hands to the throat of the Englishman, or the Frenchman, or the Italian, or of anybody else who buys grain, and say, "You have to pay us $2 a bushel." He simply won't do it. About a year ago I was riding home on the train to Winnipeg, and I got into conversation with a passenger, who, I discovered later, was in politics. He said to me, "Are you a politician?" I replied, "I don't accept that accusation—I am just an ordinary senator." He said "Well, you are not quite as bad as a politician." "No," I agreed, "not nearly as bad." Then he told me,

"I went to the secretary of the wheat pool in Saskatchewan, because farmers were complaining to me that they were not selling their grain, and therefore not getting any money, and the secretary said, 'We will make the Englishman pay the price for the wheat.' Now, I am an Englishman, and I have never known anybody who could make an Englishman do anything; he will pay his own price." Britain refused to participate in the International Wheat Agreement, although there was a difference of only 5 cents a bushel between the price she was willing to pay and the price insisted upon by the United States.

That is the sort of thing that is upsetting the equilibrium of the Canadian farmer. Our western farmers are not all goats; most of them are pretty level-headed fellows who have been through high school and who read and understand what is going on; they feel very uneasy about the situation of the farming community which grows grain and wants to sell it.

If it is thought for one moment that I am exaggerating and making out too desperate a case for the farmers, I would invite you to come to my office in Winnipeg and be present when some young farmer, most likely with his wife, comes in to make a payment on his mortgage. On such an occasion I greet them, tell them I am glad to see them, and say, "Did you get my notice about your payment?". Perhaps the man will say: "I owe $275 interest, and I am behind two years in my taxes. What are you going to do about it?" Usually it is the wife who speaks up and says something like this: "Mr. Haig, we can't pay you anything. Your client will have to wait, because my children come first. I am going to see that they get food and some warm clothing this winter. You can put us off the farm if you like, but I am going to protect my children". Well, of course I give in—I am licked completely. What is one to say in such a case? That is the sort of situation that is setting the Opposition in the other place on fire. It is not the speeches that bother them, it is that awful kind of experience. May I say that I am not worrying about the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), for I think he will get through, but I am worrying about the fellow who in the last three or four years has started to farm for himself—perhaps a young man who has been married only a few years, and started out by renting a farm and later commenced to buy one. It looked impossible to get started at first, and now he has run into this hopeless position. I could say more about the grain question, but when the honourable leader says the most that was ever sold in one year was 252 million bushels, how are we going to dispose of the surplus in storage?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No; the average export from 1951 to 1955 was 312 million bushels.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is what was sold?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Haig: All right, let us take that. It would take more than three years to sell it all.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not like to interrupt my friend, but the Montreal Gazette, which I happen to have in front of me, gives the amount of wheat on hand in Canada at present as 740 million bushels.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But that does not include all that is on individual farms. There is far more wheat in the country than is estimated. For instance, how can that newspaper estimate how much grain my friend from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) has on his farm? The reporter did not come around and ask him, and so he does not know that my friend has 65,000 bushels there.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Who told you that?

Hon. Mr. Haig: My friend asks who told me that. I know him very well, and I just happen to be aware of the quantity he has on his farm.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Perhaps the newspaper made an over-estimate.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The honourable member from Rosetown, if he estimates at all, may under-estimate. I am inclined to think he has 75,000 bushels on his farm. He has to keep the figure down, because he has to pay income tax when he sells it.

To put it briefly, I do not see how anybody can vote for legislation that in effect says to a farmer who can only sell grain under control, "In return for a loan at an interest rate of 5½ per cent you must give an undertaking to sell your wheat, even though the people who are supposed to buy it won't take it". The United States is not doing that. On the contrary, it is giving the farmers money. The United States is going to sell the grain if possible; otherwise it will give it away. How are we going to sell our grain in those circumstances?

We have to tell our people the facts. Those of you from Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia may say you won't feel the effects if the western farmers fail to get some help. Let me tell you, if they do not get help they will not be able to buy the products of the other provinces. Why did the Ford Motor Car Company decide to stop manufacturing cars for the next two weeks? The reason given was that the snow was too deep in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, but I say the real reason was that the farmers do not have money to buy cars. I am familiar with the situation in the west, and I know that in almost every community the farmers are a year, and in some cases two years, behind in their payments of interest. The cause of the present trouble is the improper handling of the 1954 crop. Let me remind the house that that year's grain was graded No. 5 and No. 6. It could never be used for milling purposes, because the poorest quality the mills will take is No. 3. Therefore, it was suitable only to be sold as feed. The Government should have taken note of the situation and sold as much of it as it could to Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes, and disposed of the rest of it to the world at large on as favourable terms as possible. Had that been done, there would have been room in our elevators for this year's crop.

The honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) chooses to accept the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is always optimistic about selling our surplus wheat.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: He is selling it now.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But he has to sell 350 million bushels a year for the next three years to catch up.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: He has done well in the past; I have every confidence in him.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But why did we get into such a jam, if he did so well?

Hon. Mr. Euler: Are we not in a jam because we have had such large crops?

Hon. Mr. Haig: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Euler: If we had had average crops we would not have had this tremendous carryover.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: And my friend would not be making his speech.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Would not the farmers be in a similar predicament if they had had poor crops?

Hon. Mr. Haig: There were good crops in the United States, Sweden, and France; and just two years ago Sweden came into the world wheat market for the first time.

Hon. Mr. Euler: But is not the source of the trouble an over-abundance of production?

Hon. Mr. Haig: No. The source of the trouble was the decision by European countries to subsidize the growing of wheat by their own farmers because the consumers in those countries could not afford to pay out the currency to purchase Canadian or American wheat. That is what has happened in such countries as Great Britain, Sweden, Holland, Belgium, France and Italy, and the reports put out by the United States indicate the extent to which these countries are subsidizing the growers.

We must meet that situation. What is the use of sitting as it were in our tents and shutting our eyes to the true picture? The Leader of the Government says he is confident that Mr. Howe will sell our wheat, but I say conditions have changed and under existing conditions he cannot sell it. The British people would have gladly joined in the wheat agreement if they thought they could benefit by it. But they chose not to join because they knew they could buy the stuff cheaper without an agreement. We must admit they are shrewd buyers.

Hon. Mr. Reid: What would be the result if we sold on a free market?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Under present conditions, I do not think it would mean much.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Would my friend dissolve the Wheat Board? Is that his answer?

Hon. Mr. Haig: I said at the outset that I was not raising any criticism of the Wheat Board; it is simply an agent of the Government, and people who know anything about it are well aware that it is the Government which makes the decisions on all the major issues that come before the board.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I would like to ask my honourable friend what the Government has done wrong in this respect.

Hon. Mr. Haig: It has not sold the wheat. I can remember that in the period 1930-35 my honourable friend and others like him went up and down this country complaining that R. B. Bennett had a pool and had held wheat until it went down to 50 cents a bushel. Now, not only can we not get 50 cents a bushel for it, but we cannot sell it at any price.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is true, because the surplus is increasing every year. My friend says the reason is the good crops; I say, we will always have good crops.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I am trying to get information rather than offering criticism. What could the Government have done in order to sell wheat?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, Great Britain told it what it could have done; that country would have come into the wheat agreement at a proper price. Further, the Government could have sold all the cheap grain to livestock producers in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime provinces, and disposed of the rest of it as best it could. We are told that the Government is selling grain to Poland on some such deal as 10 or 15 per cent cash and the balance on time, with our own Government's backing. We are offering somewhat the same deal to Czechoslovakia. But that is not good business—it is rotten business. I say the farmers of Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia and the Maritimes should have had an opportunity to buy the cheap grain, and thus leave the elevators free to take care of the current crop. But the Government did not choose to do that, and now it is stuck with the surplus.

Hon. Mr. Farris: But would the farmers have been satisfied if the Government had done as you suggest?

Hon. Mr. Haig: The Government was running the show, and if it had faced up to the true situation the farmers would have decided that they had to make the best deal possible and take the losses.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Are you in favour of continuing the Wheat Board as a marketing agency?

Hon. Mr. Haig: As I have said, the Wheat Board exists only as a Government agency. The question involved in any such organization is what policy the Government chooses to adopt. If the Government is going to take credit for what the board has done in the past, it must be prepared to suffer the losses facing it today, and it is going to have to take tremendous losses before the present surplus is disposed of.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: We have not taken any losses yet.

Hon. Mr. Haig: You have not taken the losses because you let the grain pile up when you could not sell it.

The Hon. Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: My friend did not listen very carefully to the figures I gave. Is the selling of 312 million bushels a year letting it pile up?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes, it is still piling up, because the country produced about 550 million bushels.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No.

Hon. Mr. Haig: In 1954 our production was only 282 million bushels, but in 1953 it was 584 million, and in 1952, 664 million.

Hon. Mr. Euler: It is an embarrassment of riches.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) has the floor, and he should not be interrupted except to be asked questions, with his consent.

Hon Mr. Euler: I am sorry.

Hon. Mr. Haig: My answer to the question of my friend from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) is that the Wheat Board is a crown corporation and the Government must take responsibility for what it does. I would point out that when the last wheat agreement was made in Washington Great Britain said if the price was $2 it would come in.

Hon. Mr. Horner: That was a ceiling of $2.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes, a maximum. The Government of Canada refused to meet that suggestion, and so Britain did not come in. Perhaps if a price of $2 had been offered Britain would still not have come in, but it was the duty of our Government to make the offer.

There is no question about the 1954 crop. Anybody who understands grain and is familiar with the problem of stock feeding in Canada knows that ultimately we are going to have to do the thing that I have suggested. It does not matter how we may dodge the issue by giving our wheat away to Poland and to Czechoslovakia.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: We have not given any away yet.

Hon. Mr. Haig: You have given credits to these nations and it is doubtful if the money will ever be paid.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: We will get the money.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I am not so sure about that. We were told we were going to be paid for those vessels sold to the Chinese some years ago. Well, the Chinese have the vessels but our Government is paying off the $50 million; as far as I know we never got any payment at all.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I may say that other members of the Conservative party can vote as they please on this bill, but I propose to vote against it because I think it only condones the way in which the grain problem has been handled by the Government. I say it is not fair to prohibit our farmers from selling their own grain wherever they wish, and to require them to sell their grain to the Government, when if things go wrong the farmer takes the loss but if things go right, the Government takes all the glory.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, it is almost certain to me that you would be somewhat disappointed if I did not have something to say on the question of wheat.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I have listened with much interest to the speech of the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) and it does seem to me that he was discussing the wrong question in his remarks. If he intended under this bill to launch a general criticism of the present method of marketing wheat I think he has chosen the wrong legislation, but under the right legislation I would agree very largely with what he said.

This bill, after all, is comparatively simple. It is worthwhile, however, to keep in mind that the Wheat Board is a crown company. It is one of the brood of 23 crown companies which we have in existence today. The Wheat Board, therefore, is an agent of the Crown, and it is so specifically stated in the Wheat Board Act.

Now, what measure of responsibility attaches to the Government to come to the rescue of the farmer who cannot sell his wheat may be somewhat difficult to say, but in response to a very general demand—I was almost going to say clamour—in response to a demand that was thought to be general, that is a better way to put it, last October the Government decided that it would initiate a form of cash advances to farmers whose grain was stored on their farms because, as the honourable Leader of the Opposition said, the elevators were filled with grain, the farmers could not market their wheat, and consequently they were deprived of the cash needed to pay their fuel bills and other accounts that come due in that season of the year. So this plan was inaugurated.

There was one point of criticism that might be made although I may say I do not particularly hold it against the Government, but I mention it because it does seem to me that from time to time we are lapsing into rather easy-going methods in allowing governments to do certain acts. The Government made this arrangement with the banks last October. Now, the arrangement the Government made with the banks cannot be carried through to the end without the approval of Parliament. In other words the arrangement is made first and Parliament is asked to approve later. In the circumstances the Government no doubt felt warranted in doing what it did. I merely mention it because this is an extraordinary and exceedingly objectionable principle on which to have Government business conducted.

When we come down to this bill, what does it do? All that it does is to ratify the agreement with the banks. And what was the agreement with the banks? It was to this effect, that a farmer who had grain stored on his farm could go to a bank, get an advance on that grain up to $1,500; then section 88 of the Bank Act was brought into play, and he gave security on the appropriate form to the bank for the advance that he received. If it turns out in the end that the banks incur some losses on these loans the Government, as the Leader of the house (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) said, will reimburse any particular bank up to the extent of 15 per cent on the first $100,000 of loss, and to the extent of 10 per cent on losses above that. There is a proviso for a maximum, which will never be reached, of the total advances that may be made.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question? Are you correct in that statement? Is the reimbursement not 15 per cent of any $100,000 lost?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: As I understand it, it is 15 per cent of the first $100,000 of loss that arises, and if the loss exceeds that it is 10 per cent. I think that is correct, without looking immediately at the legislation.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The loss by any one bank.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: By any one bank, yes; I stated that.

Now, that is all that this legislation does. There has been criticism, and very strong criticism, of this method of meeting the situation. There has been criticism outside of Parliament —I will not refer to what has happened in Parliament. There has been criticism of the fact that the Wheat Board is not making cash advances. Well, the Wheat Board is not equipped to make these advances. If the board made the advances it would have to employ the elevator agents of the various elevator companies, and the agents are not qualified to form a judgment as to whether any particular farmer is entitled to credit. The banks are the people who do this sort of business and as a matter of fact it would have proven impossible in operation if the Wheat Board had been charged with the responsibility of directly making advances to the farmers.

The next criticism is that these loans are not interest free. I cannot agree with that. What is free interest? Someone has suggested, and I recall seeing it somewhere, that the Bank of Canada might operate the printing presses and turn out a certain amount of money, and make it available to the Wheat Board so it could make interest free loans.

I do not think any person would consider that for a second as being desirable. The Wheat Board would have to get the money from somewhere. If the loans were interest-free to borrowers, the interest charges would have to be paid by the Government and, in turn, by the whole tax-paying population. Or if the Wheat Board deducted the interest from its total receipts, the farmer who did not get any loan would be paying part of the interest for the farmer who got a loan; and that, of course, would not be equitable.

Having all these factors in mind, I think that, assuming the need exists, the Government has hit upon and is applying the best method of making these advances. My belief is that when all this business is cleaned up the total amount of losses under this bill, or for that matter any other whereby the farmer is required to pay interest, will be astonishingly small. It is a mistaken idea that the farmers of western Canada are near bankruptcy. We have had some information about the wheat holdings of the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). He may be short of cash—though I have never discovered that he was—but his asset position is certainly good; and I think that this condition is pretty general among farmers. I should not say anything about Saskatchewan and Alberta, but I can speak with some knowledge of the situation in Manitoba. Under our municipal law, penalties on unpaid taxes begin to run at the 1st of October each year; therefore everyone desires to get his taxes paid before that date. If payment is made a few months earlier the taxpayer gets a slight discount; if payment is not made by October 1, a penalty of half of 1 per cent per month accrues. So the manner in which taxes are paid in the rural districts and small villages is a sort of measuring-rod for conditions in the country. On the 1st of October last year tax payments from the rural municipalities and villages of Manitoba were 10 per cent greater than at the corresponding period of the previous year. I gather from this situation that not very many Manitoba farmers will take advantage of the present legislation. It is true that in Manitoba, which is largely a mixed farming province, many producers supplement their grain cheques with receipts from cream and milk. The same can be said of important areas of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

So far as I am concerned, honourable senators, the conclusion of the matter is that this legislation is upon the soundest basis on which such advances could be made to meet the needs of those who are short of cash and have wheat to market. The protection is ample; and the lending will be done through bank managers, that is by people accustomed to making loans. They know the situation in their communities. When a farmer goes into a bank, the manager knows him. If he is a worthless, thriftless fellow whose word is no good, the bank manager will probably refuse him a loan. To approved borrowers the manager will say, "Yes, we will give you a loan, and here is a document to sign", a document which gives the bank protection under section 88 of the Bank Act. The whole margin of security is increased, and the chances of loss, with the criticisms which might follow, are pretty well eliminated.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question for my own information? I take it that the elevators are full. Who owns the wheat in the elevators?

Hon. Mr. Haig: The Government.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: The Wheat Board owns the wheat in the elevators.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Has it paid for it?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Oh, surely.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: The farmers are fully paid for their wheat in the elevators.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: No. I may say that in many cases the farmer has been paid only the initial payment for 2 bushels or 4 bushels or whatever his quota may be. That was the result of the congestion in both country and terminal elevators during the whole of last fall. In that respect the remarks of the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) are entirely correct and apropos.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I understand that the question of the honourable senator from Queens-Lunenburg (Hon. Mr. Kinley) was whether or not the farmer had been paid for the wheat he had delivered.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Of course he has.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Not altogether.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: All that he has delivered?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Suppose his quota is 3 bushels of wheat,—

Hon. Mr. Kinley: No, my question is, was he paid for all he has delivered. If the elevators in the west are full, and he has been paid for all the wheat he has delivered, he must have received a lot of money last year.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: You mean, over the years?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: But even on the 1954 crop the farmers have not been able to deliver all their grain. They were limited by a quota restriction.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The elevators were full in 1952, and they are still full.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Yes: That is why the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) has so much wheat on his farm which he cannot deliver.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: He grows too much!

Hon. Mr. Kinley: It would seem that the first thing to be done before the farmers grow any more grain is to see that they have sufficient storage.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: We will discuss that at some other time.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Honourable senators, may I move the adjournment of the debate?

Hon. Mr. Golding: Before the debate is adjourned I should like to ask one question, so as to get an idea of the total consumption of wheat. The honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has said that the average export sale for the four years he mentioned was 312 million bushels. What has been the home consumption in the same period of time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I would have to get those figures. I have not got them available here.

Hon. Mr. Horner: It is reckoned at 160 million bushels.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Horner, the debate was adjourned.

TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill 83, an Act respecting the payment of carrying costs of temporary wheat reserves owned by The Canadian Wheat Board.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a simple bill but a very important one. The purpose of this legislation is to enable the Government to pay the carrying charges on wheat stocks owned by the Wheat Board in excess of 178 million bushels as of August 1, 1955, and to continue that obligation until the Wheat Board's stocks drop below 178 million bushels at the end of any crop year. At that time the legislation will immediately lapse.

Payment of these charges will relieve the Wheat Board, and through the board the wheat producer, from the burden of storage and interest costs on the abnormally large crops which have accumulated in the hands of the board in recent years. These large crops, as has been said earlier today, are not attributable to increased acreage. They are due entirely to the very favourable weather which has prevailed throughout western Canada during the last few years, and for which we should thank Providence. In fact, the acreage last year in wheat was less than it was fifteen years ago. Figures were quoted earlier today to the effect that in 1940 there were 27¾ million acres under wheat. In 1955 there were approximately 20 million acres under wheat. So this is conclusive proof that the huge increase in production is not due to an increase in acreage, nor is it due in any way to subsidies of wheat in any form whatsoever. Wheat growers in Canada get paid the world market price less storage and other expenses of handling and of marketing. I hope we have all been convinced by argument in a previous debate today that the large accumulation of wheat on hand is not due to poor sales. I shall not repeat the figures given earlier, but if honourable senators will take the trouble to read them in Hansard they will be convinced that the large quantity of wheat which we have on hand today is not attributable to poor sales; on the contrary, we have had excellent sales.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Could the honourable Leader provide us with information, which I think is available, as to the total sales of wheat made from August 1, 1955, to date, a period of seven months?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am afraid I could not get that information. I understand it is the practice of the board not to provide it, as it would be divulging very valuable information to those carrying on business in wheat in other countries. I think it would be inadvisable to give that information to our competitors.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: As a matter of fact, the trade knows that information pretty well today. We certainly are hearing a good deal of talk about the enormous sales that have been made and it would be a matter of interest if we knew just how much they amounted to.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I understand the practice of the board is not to give out that information.

Hon. Mr. Haig: It was given in the other house.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Was it?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: No. It was said in the other house that they did not want to give it.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I think it was given in the other house.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I had not thought so. I shall make inquiries, and if I get the information I shall be glad to give it to honourable senators. Our elevators were filled to capacity last August 1st, the beginning of the current crop year. At that time the Canadian Wheat Board owned 395 million bushels of wheat. I agree with what was said by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) in the earlier debate today, that it is likely Canada will continue to have large stocks of wheat for years to come. However, I maintain that during the same time we shall continue to have very large sales. The impact of increasing carrying charges first affected the Wheat Board operations in the 1953-54 account. This pool was under administration from August 1, 1953, to April 29, 1955, at which time the old pool was closed out. The carrying charges for that period came to 15·67 cents per bushel on 398 million bushels of wheat delivered to the pool by producers. In 1952-53 the pool charges were 7·57 cents on 533 million bushels, and it is estimated that the carrying charges on the 1954-55 pool will amount to somewhere close to 20 cents a bushel.

Honourable senators, I have not got much more to say about this bill. It is designed to facilitate the orderly marketing of wheat and prevent the panic selling of wheat that took place in the 1930's. I would point out that the bill does not subsidize the western producer. It avoids the subsidizing of exports and is not a camouflaged form of give-away, nor is it a device to guarantee a minimum price considered higher than the present initial prices. These proposals were made to the Government and rejected by it.

Probably the basic cause of trouble in the world wheat markets today is the subsidizing which is done by many countries of wheat production and exports. I am sure we do not want to be included in the countries which are causing trouble in that respect.

In conclusion, I would say that through the provisions of this bill we are making an essential contribution to the stability of the wheat economy of the Prairie provinces and thereby we are making an indirect contribution to the stability of the whole Canadian economy.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I think the honourable Leader ought seriously to consider giving us information as to the grain sold from the 1st of August of this year until, say, the 1st of February or the 1st of March. I do not think he needs to be afraid of others knowing that information. In these days the world market is not so much controlled by operators; it is controlled by governments practically everywhere. It is pretty easy to get that information now.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: May I ask the honourable Leader if he suggests this plan is a cure-all for the wheat growers? He stated that over-production today is not caused by lack of sales and that we have a lot of wheat on hand. To my mind, the plan is a kind of annual subsidy on 178 million bushels of wheat, intended to further increase the sale of wheat.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The purpose is not to produce further sales of wheat. An unusual condition in Canada has been caused by an unusually large production of wheat, and there is a surplus in the markets of the world; just how long that will continue I do not know, but at the present time farmers have been required to store their wheat longer than usually. The purpose of this bill is to endeavour to give some stability to the wheat market—the wheat economy—and the Government feels that through such stability the economy of the wheat producers will benefit as well as the economy of Canada as a whole.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Would the honourable Leader give us the reason for the fixing of this exact figure of 178 million bushels, the excess over which will entail storage?

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is the normal carry-over.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The normal carryover is 178 million, and that is the basis on which the storage rate is fixed.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: For what year?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Over a period of years.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: The average over a period of years.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The average over a period of years is 178 million bushels.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Could the honourable Leader say for how many years this may continue, and what it may amount to eventually?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Well, when the carry-over becomes less than 178 million, this legislation automatically lapses.

Hon. Mr. Ross: Could the Minister give us a breakdown of the figure of 20 cents a bushel for storage? As I understand it, 15 cents is for storage itself, and then there are handling charges and interest. I would like to know how the 20 cents is made up.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have not that information here, but I shall be pleased to endeavour to get it.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, I had retained my seat in the expectation that the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) or his deskmate (Hon. Mr. Aseltine)—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I never look a gift horse in the mouth.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: —would have a contribution to make to the debate on this bill. This is a much more important measure than the one we were considering a short time ago.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I propose very briefly to give you my reasons for saying so. In the first place, it might be well if I attempted to give a brief explanation of how this question arose. The Wheat Board is an agent of the Crown; in other words, it is a crown corporation. The law under which the board operates is one of the most drastic on our statute books.

Hon. Mr. Reid: You can say that again.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I can illustrate that by saying that a farmer cannot market a bushel of wheat, oats or barley beyond the boundary of his province until he gets a permit from the Government authorities. As the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) stated in a previous debate, if a farmer in Saskatchewan has a chicken ranch in the Fraser Valley he cannot move wheat from his farm in Saskatchewan to the Fraser Valley to feed his chickens without a permit from the board to market the wheat; and then he has to deliver it to the Wheat Board and buy it back before it gets out to his farm near Vancouver.

Hon. Mr. Reid: And try and get it!

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Of course, there are heavy penalties for violations of this law. The Wheat Board is an agent of the Crown, and therefore the Crown has a responsibility. This bill proposes to pay $30 million odd in storage charges over the next year; and, as I see it, for one of two reasons: either the Wheat Board in its operations for the present crop year will be in deficit, or the Government out of the generosity of its heart is saying to the farmers of western Canada, "Well, we are going to give you a present of this amount—we are going to pay your storage for you."

Hon. Mr. Haig: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Another gift!

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That introduces a very interesting principle. If that principle is to be applied to grain, is it also going to be applied to other commodities, and if so, will other commodities be brought under the supervision of boards? For instance, the apple growers of Canada might want a board set up to market their apples; and the livestock producers might say, "Well, we are going to let the Government take control of the livestock markets, and if we feel we are not making ends meet or that the industry requires assistance, the Government will come in and support by subsidies." That is a bad principle, and I make no bones about saying so. I suspect that the Wheat Board is in deficit on its 1955-56 operations.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Have you any facts to substantiate that statement?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: The honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) shakes his head. Well, I will give him some information in a moment which may convince him that I have some warrant for what I have said.

We should understand clearly what is meant by the pool. The Wheat Board, having control of all the wheat, starts at the beginning of the crop year, which is August 1, and markets throughout the ensuing twelve months to July 31. Quite obviously, in recent years when August 1 came around the Wheat Board has had a large surplus carried over from the previous crop year; so, the practice has been to transfer the wheat from that pool year into the next pool year, after a certain lapse of time during which an effort is made to reduce the carryover by sales.

Last year on April 29 the surplus from the 1953-54 pool was transferred to the 1954-55 pool year, which begins, let me repeat, at August 1. The surplus transferred at April 29 was a little in excess of 164 million bushels, and of that some 7 million or 8 million bushels was other than milling grade.

The 1954-55 crop in western Canada was a peculiar crop, in that it suffered considerable damage, as my honourable friend from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) knows, from both rust and frost. As a result, substantially more than 100 million bushels of the crop of that year belonged to the feeding grades. The Wheat Board, in its initial payment for the 1954-55 crop, fixed No. 1 Northern at $1.40 per bushel at Fort William. Recently there was an addition of 10 cents a bushel to the three upper grades. So the farmer who delivered wheat in that pool year has received $1.50 for No. 1 Northern. But the Wheat Board made no interim payment on lower or feed grades. The reason, which I think is perfectly obvious, was the very large quantity of feed grain to be disposed of. Taking No. 5 wheat as an illustration, the spread between that and No. 1 Northern at $1.40 brought it down to $1.12. That was the price fixed by the Wheat Board as the initial payment on No. 5 wheat at the beginning of the crop year in 1954. The honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) mentioned that the storage accumulations had been of the order of 18 or 20 cents a bushel, and I think he had an estimate of 20 cents a bushel for the current year. Now, if you add 20 cents a bushel to $1.12, which is the cost of the wheat when it was marketed, you get a gross of $1.32.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I said it was estimated at 20 cents for the current year.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: You mean from August 1, 1955?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, that is the estimate. I have the figures for each year, if my honourable friend is interested.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: What are the figures for the other years?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The carrying charges for the 1952-53 pool were 7·57 cents, for the 1953-54 pool 15·67 cents, and for the 1954-55 pool they are estimated as high as 20 cents.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That is the year we are discussing.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That figure is necessarily an approximation.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: If that assumption is right, then the cost to the Wheat Board has been $1.32. Now, let us look at what the board has been selling wheat at. A glance at the newspapers for the past three months will indicate, I think, that No. 5 wheat has been selling at $1.21 to $1.25 per bushel at Fort William, and I think it is $1.25 today. That spread in price applies as well to other lower grades, and they are quite substantial in quantity. Therefore, I strongly suspect that the Wheat Board is in deficit on these lower grades.

It is quite true that the Wheat Board is a Government agency, and if it fails to make ends meet the obligation is on the Treasury to make good the deficiency. We have met deficits in the past with respect to the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian National Steamship Lines and other Government agencies. However, I submit that we should have more information than we have at present before we agree to meet this deficit, if deficit it is.

I asked the honourable Leader of the Government if he could give us information as to the total sales of wheat by the Wheat Board from August 1 to say yesterday, a period of seven months. He said, and I believe he is quite correct, that the board does not wish to divulge that information. Nevertheless, this house is being asked to vote the sum of $32 million to cover this period of operation.

A further question arises. The carryover of wheat is fixed at 178 million bushels, which is an arbitrary figure arrived at by taking the average over several years. It has been stated that that is an emergency reserve, and that as such the Government should pay storage on it. Where is the emergency?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The excess over normal.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Yes. Quite frankly, I do not like this bill, and I know I will be criticized in the Prairie country for what I have said. But where is this practice going to end? If wheat growers are entitled to compassionate pay or alternatively to have the deficit, if any, of the Wheat Board made up, then should not the same or similar treatment be available to everybody? In other words, on what principle are we operating in this connection? I fail to find a definite principle, and that is one of the criticisms I have to make of the legislation. May I say that we seem to be getting into easy methods of dealing with matters of this kind. I am just old-fashioned enough and perhaps I have lived too long—

Hon. Mr. Croll: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: —I am old-fashioned enough to believe that there are certain basic, fundamental principles which should apply to public policy, and if we violate those principles for the sake of expediency we shall run into trouble sooner or later.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: It is for that reason that I object to this bill. I have no doubt that it will be passed by the house, but I predict that it is a type of legislation that we may well have with us next year and maybe for years to come.

There is some optimistic talk about selling our surplus wheat, and I hope it is true. But the sale of wheat to Russia, which we had announced to us today, is not a very big item in the total volume we have for sale. I have been long enough associated with the grain business to suspect some of these matters. If we can believe some of the newspaper accounts, the crops in Europe have been destroyed by the recent bad weather; but I know from private inquiry of a reasonably reliable source that indications are that possibly only the south of France has suffered serious wheat crop damage. The view of the British is that the snow covering they have had is protecting their winter wheat and that no damage has been done to it. Italy's crop may be damaged, but it is too early to say. We hear stories about dust storms in the United States. Well, the private advices that I get, and I think my sources are reliable, are that in the southwest of the United States, which is a big crop-producing area, their winter crops are in pretty good condition. With the snow covering we have on the prairies we may run again into a bumper crop; and if we do, what is to be our policy in connection with it?

Before I sit down may I say one word about the American situation. The United States Government has followed, in my judgment, a very unsound policy. As a matter of fact both political parties today would like to get away from it but are afraid of antagonizing a large section of what they call the farm vote. Now, the principle they follow is a guarantee of parity, and parity is 90 per cent. They follow a curious formula which can be stated in a moment: They took the prices in the years from 1910 to 1914 and made an index of the cost of the things the farmer bought in that particular period. They made another index, taking the average of the prices the farmer received for his products over that period, and they applied that formula to the current years. They pay 90 per cent of parity; that is, the price the farmer receives now is supposed to be, in that index, 90 per cent of the price he pays on the index of prices for the things he buys. That, of course, has put the price of wheat away up, so farmers grow it. The Leader of the house (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) stated that we are producing more wheat off 20 million acres today than we did 15 years ago off 27 million acres, and he is right. Why? Better farm practice has improved the average yield, fertilizers have been improved and are being used, good land is being put into wheat and inferior land is being put into something else.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: And there have been succeeding years of good weather.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Yes, we have had succeeding years of good weather, although the 1954 crop was very badly damaged over more than half of the wheat producing area. These are all signs of improvement which we should welcome.

I will give it as my own opinion—and some may think it not worth very much—that surpluses of wheat are the logical result of prices at the levels they have been at since the end of the war, maintained there largely by the endeavour of the United States to carry on its parity program. For, notwithstanding that, the United States has piled up surpluses which the Commodity Credit Corporation has on hand today—of wheat mainly, and cotton, representing a total investment of $9 billion. The efforts of producers in that country to sell at these prices, plus similar efforts in Canada and elsewhere, can have only one effect—to stimulate production of wheat in every country of the world. The result is that a number of countries which otherwise would not be growing wheat are growing it. It becomes an economic question and in the end the age-old law of supply and demand is going to govern the final disposition of this matter.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Are storage charges the same on all grades of wheat?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask my friend a question? He disapproves of establishing the principle of paying this $32 million of storage charges, as proposed by this bill. Does he not think that principle was already established when we paid out $65 million a year or two ago?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I am sure that my honourable friend's memory is as good as I think it is, and he will recall that I voted against that measure at the time.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Will the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) say whether he approves of the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) that inferior grades of wheat should be dumped on the domestic market as feed? That seems to me to be a suggestion that might have merit. The idea, as I see it, is that the eastern farmers would get the feed grades at a fair price, and this would have the effect of relieving the situation in the storage elevators.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I do not know that I would approve of that. It would enable feeders in Quebec, Ontario and the Maritime provinces to get cheap feed, and the taxpayers at large would be helping to pay for it.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: The western farmer, though, would receive his price.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: We are helping to pay for it at the present time anyway.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: The price is fixed by the Wheat Board. Once the price is fixed at, say, $1.12 a bushel, as it was last August for No. 5 wheat, that price cannot be varied. If the board decided three months later to cut that price by 7 cents to $1.05, or by 12 cents to make it an even dollar, what would you have? You would have certain farmers who received $1.12 a bushel while others would get only $1, and with the Wheat Board right in the middle of the political stage you can easily imagine what that would create.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Would it not be much cheaper to dispose of the low grade wheat on the domestic market than to sacrifice the good grades to foreign markets, as is now being done?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I would not say the board is sacrificing it.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Well, the Leader of the Opposition says it is.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: As a matter of fact it is selling No. 5 grade at $1.25, the quoted price.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: Did I understand the honourable senator to say that a farmer could not sell a single bushel of wheat without a permit from the Wheat Board?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Outside of the farmer's own province.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the question is on the motion for the second reading of Bill 83, intituled an Act respecting the payment of carrying costs of temporary wheat reserves owned by The Canadian Wheat Board. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Reid: On division.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Six months from now.

Pearson, Secretary of State for External Affairs, and Mr. S. A. Borisov, First Deputy Minister for Foreign Trade of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

TRADE AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

The Government of Canada and the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

Desiring to develop trade relations between the two countries on the basis of equality and reciprocal advantages,

Have resolved to conclude an Agreement which will regulate the commercial relations between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics,

Have accordingly appointed their respective representatives for this purpose who have agreed as follows:

Article 1

Each Contracting Party shall accord to the other Contracting Party unconditional most-favoured-nation treatment in all matters with respect to customs duties and charges of any kind imposed on or in connection with importation or exportation and with respect to the method of levying such duties and charges, with respect to the rules and formalities connected with importation or exportation, and with respect to all internal taxes or internal charges of any kind, and with respect to all laws, regulations and requirements affecting internal sale, offering for sale, purchase, distribution or use of imported goods within the territory of such Contracting Party.

Accordingly, products of each Contracting Party imported into the territory of the other Contracting Party shall not be subject, in regard to the matters referred to in the first paragraph of this Article, to any duties, taxes or charges other or higher, or to any rules or formalities more burdensome, than those to which like products of any third country are or may hereafter be subject.

Similarly, products exported from the territory of a Contracting Party and consigned to the territory of the other Contracting Party shall not be subject, in regard to matters referred to in the first paragraph of this Article, to any duties, taxes or charges other or higher, or to any rules or formalities more burdensome, than those to which like products when consigned to the territory of any third country are or may hereafter be subject.

Any advantage, favour, privilege or immunity which has been or may hereafter be granted by either Contracting Party, in regard to the matters referred to in the first paragraph of this Article, to any product of any third country shall be accorded immediately and without compensation to like products originating in the territory of the other Contracting Party, and irrespective of the nationality of the carrier.

Each Contracting Party shall accord to the other Contracting Party most-favoured-nation treatment with respect to sales or purchases involving exports or imports.

Article 2

Each Contracting Party shall accord to the products of the other Contracting Party, which have been in transit through the territory of any third country receiving most-favoured-nation treatment from the importing country, treatment no less favourable than that which would have been accorded to such products had they been transported from their place of origin to their destination without going through the territory of such third country. Each Contracting Party shall, however, be free to maintain its requirements of direct consignment existing on the date of signature of the present Agreement in respect of any goods in regard to which such direct consignment has relation to that Contracting Party's prescribed method of valuation for duty purposes.

Article 3

No prohibitions or restrictions shall be applied by either Contracting Party on the importation or exportation of any product from or to the territory of the other Contracting Party which are not similarly applied to the importation or exportation of the like product from or to the territories of all third countries except for import or exchange restrictions applicable to all countries in like circumstances for the purpose of safeguarding the external financial position and balance of payments.

The provisions of the present Agreement shall not limit the right of either Contracting Party to apply prohibitions or restrictions of any kind directed to the protection of its essential security interests.

Article 4

The merchant vessels of each Contracting Party and the cargoes of such vessels shall upon arrival at and departure from the seaports of the other Contracting Party and during the time spent in such seaports enjoy the treatment accorded to the most-favoured-nation.

The provisions of this Article shall not apply to the performance of harbour services including pilotage and towing, nor to coastal shipping.

Article 5

Canadian citizens and other natural persons domiciled and carrying on business in Canada and juridical persons constituted in accordance with the laws in force in Canada shall, when engaged in business activity in the territory of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics personally or through their appointed representatives under conditions prescribed by the laws in force in the USSR, enjoy in respect of their persons and their property treatment according to law no less favourable than that accorded to the natural and juridical persons of any other state.

Soviet citizens and Soviet business organizations and other juridical persons constituted in accordance with the laws in force in the USSR shall, when engaged in business activity in the territory of Canada personally or through their appointed representatives under conditions prescribed by the laws in force in Canada, enjoy in respect of their persons and their property treatment according to law no less favourable than that accorded to the natural and juridical persons of any other state.

The natural and juridical persons specified in this Article shall enjoy access to the courts of the other Contracting Party on the same basis as natural and juridical persons of any other state.

Article 6

Canadian citizens and other natural persons domiciled and carrying on business in Canada and juridical persons constituted in accordance with the laws in force in Canada, on the one hand, and Soviet citizens and Soviet business organizations and other juridical persons constituted in accordance with the laws in force in the USSR, on the other hand, may agree that disputes arising out of commercial transactions shall be settled by arbitration.

Article 7

The provisions of the present Agreement relating to most-favoured-nation treatment shall not apply to exclusive advantages accorded by Canada to members of the British Commonwealth of Nations, including their dependent territories, and to the Republic of Ireland.

Article 8

The Government of each Contracting Party shall give sympathetic consideration to any representations which the Government of the other Contracting Party may make in respect of the implementation of the present Agreement.

Article 9

The present Agreement shall be ratified by both Contracting Parties and shall enter into force definitely on the date of the exchange of the instruments of ratification. The exchange of the instruments of ratification shall take place in Moscow within ninety days of the date of signature.

The present Agreement shall however enter into force provisionally on the date of its signature.

Sir,

On the occasion of signing the Trade Agreement between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, I have the honour to inform you that the Government of Canada reserves the right to fix under the Canadian Customs Act values of goods for ordinary and special duty in the following terms:

(a) If, as a result of the obligations incurred by Canada under the aforesaid Agreement, any product is being imported or is likely to be imported into Canada in such quantities and under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers of like or directly competitive products, the Government of Canada shall be free, in respect of such product and to the extent and for such time as may be necessary to prevent or remedy such injury, to fix values for ordinary and special duty purposes;

(b) In determining whether values should be established in respect of any product pursuant to paragraph (a) and in determining the level at which such values should be fixed, the Government of Canada will take into account the prices of like or directly competitive products, if any, being imported at that time from other countries, in order to maintain the most-favoured-nation treatment stipulated in Article 1 of the above mentioned Trade Agreement between Canada and the U.S.S.R.

(c) Before the Government of Canada takes action pursuant to paragraph (a) it will give notice in writing to the Government of the USSR as far in advance as may be practicable and will afford the latter an opportunity to consult with it in respect of the proposed action. In critical circumstances where delay would cause damage which it would be difficult to repair, action under paragraph (a) may be taken provisionally without prior consultation, on the condition that consultation shall take place immediately after taking such action.

Accept, Sir, the assurances of my highest consideration.

CANADIAN EMBASSY IN MOSCOW

INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Mr. Reid inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of February 21:

1. Are the Canadian Embassy representatives in Russia allowed in Moscow to send by mail literature and pamphlets dealing with the life and events of the Canadian people, to Russian Government representatives, and others, similar to the reading material and propaganda sent out from the Russian Embassy here in Ottawa to senators and members of the House of Commons?
2. If the answer is "yes" that Canadian Embassy representatives in Russia are allowed the same privileges as Russian representatives here in Ottawa, has the Canadian Government given any consideration to the distribution, and circulation, by them of Canadian literature, with the view of the people in Russia being made better acquainted with Canada and the life of the Canadian people generally?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry is as follows:

1. A small amount of material about Canada, in English, is now being sent to certain Soviet libraries and universities. The Canadian Embassy in Moscow would, however, have to obtain permission from the Soviet Government to send publications in the Russian language dealing with life and developments in Canada through the mail to Soviet officials or private citizens. Although permission might be given there would not necessarily be any guarantee that the Embassy would be able to distribute such material very widely.

2. The Canadian Government has, from time to time, given consideration to the distribution of Canadian information material in the Soviet Union. In view of the high cost of reproducing information material in the Russian language and the shortage of trained personnel for such work, the Government has been reluctant to undertake it so long as there is no guarantee that it will reach a wide audience in the Soviet Union.

3. Who were they? And when did they resign?

TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the third reading of Bill 83, an Act respecting the payment of carrying costs of temporary wheat reserves owned by The Canadian Wheat Board.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it has been moved by the Honourable Senator Macdonald and seconded by the Honourable Senator Fergusson that Bill 83, an Act respecting the payment of carrying costs of temporary wheat reserves owned by The Canadian Wheat Board, be now read a third time. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Haig: On division.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed, on division.

PRAIRIE GRAIN PRODUCERS INTERIM FINANCING BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald for the second reading of Bill 82, an Act to provide for short-term credit to grain producers in the Prairie provinces to meet temporary financial difficulties arising from inability to deliver all their grain.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators,—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Coming as I do from the great wheat producing province of Saskatchewan, perhaps the greatest wheat producing area in the world, and being a practical and practising farmer up to the present day, I feel it to be my duty to speak in this debate. Had the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) introduced the bill in this house and offered no observations on it, I think I would have refrained from commenting on it. But in view of the remarks made by him and some other honourable senators, I feel it my duty to attempt to put the record straight.

First, may I say that this bill would have more appropriately been called "An act for the profitable business of the banks in western Canada". Certainly, it is of no great benefit to the farming community of the west. As a matter of fact, I fail to see the urgency of the measure, for in the great areas that were on a one-bushel quota the amount that could be borrowed was reduced by the quantity of wheat sold. The Minister of Trade and Commerce announced that the average loan was only $800.

Under the circumstances I suggest that the average farmer would not consider going through the ritual of applying to a bank for financial benefits under this legislation unless a creditor, knowing there would be a guarantee of the loan by the Government, was pressing him to make such an application. But the average farmer has no need for such a loan at this time. Those who borrowed earlier under this arrangement have already repaid their loans because they were a first charge on their sale of wheat. In the northern part of my province the farmers are under the three-bushel quota. It would be impossible for any farmer under that quota to get a loan, and it is unlikely that he would have need of it.

I take exception to the statement made yesterday by the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) that bank managers, being accustomed to making loans, are the people best fitted to look after the loans to farmers under this measure. May I suggest to the house, and I am sure my honourable friend from Churchill will agree, that the men most wide awake to the farmers' needs are the elevator agents located throughout western Canada. They are men of exceptional ability. The large pool elevators in the three western provinces are in keen competition, so the line elevators have to secure the very best men they can as elevator agents.

Had this bill provided for loans on security in the form of bonds or other paper, I would have agreed that the banks were well qualified to handle them. Perhaps many honourable senators from eastern Canada are not fully aware of the wheat marketing procedure in the west. Each farmer secures a permit book with respect to his quota, in which several lines are provided for entries as to different kinds of grain, quotas, the quarter-section of land on which the grain is grown, what portion of it is seeded and what is summer-fallowed, and so on. When an elevator man is handling a farmer's grain he likes to keep the permit book right at his elevator. It acts as a drawing card to get the business of that farmer, because he cannot take his grain to another elevator without at least picking up his permit book. An elevator agent is one man who knows exactly the position of each farmer and what farmers can be depended upon. I say that if the money was advanced by the elevator companies the cost of administration and collection would be far below the rate of 2 per cent which the Government Leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) suggested would have to be charged if the loans were made by the Wheat Board. Elevator agents are hired by the year. Now, honourable senators, we have heard a lot about the elevators being filled with grain. That being the case, what do you think that the elevator men are doing? Don't you think they have plenty of time on their hands to do the little bit of bookkeeping necessary to keep track of any loans that might be made? Of course they could do this, and at practically no cost whatever. And since the Wheat Board is a Government body, for the life of me I cannot understand why any financing could not be done through the facilities of the central bank.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: May I ask the honourable senator a question? If his plan were followed and elevator agents made advances to the farmers, who would bear the losses which almost inevitably would accrue?

Hon. Mr. Horner: Well, who will bear the losses under the plan set up by this bill? I maintain that if these cash advances were to be left to the judgment of the elevator agents there would not be one solitary dollar of a loss.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Would the Wheat Board or the elevator companies bear whatever loss there was?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The Government.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: The Government would bear the loss.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Only a percentage of it. But, as I said before, I maintain there would not be any loss.

At one time in the early years I operated a farm at a distance down on the Arcola line, in a beautiful prairie section. A very progressive elevator agent there, who had some banking experience installed a large safe in the office of the elevator company and lent money from his own resources, charging a small rate of interest and he was quite successful in that little operation. He told me it was a secret—but he has passed on, so I can reveal it now—and he was using it as a means of making some extra money because his wages were small. He also supplemented his wages by running a grinding business, and let me tell you that in a short while he made $9,000. There was a regular bank located in the town and it had to close its doors because the elevator agent, who knew every farmer in the community, had picked up all the good risks.

Honourable senators, if this were a matter of lending money against bonds and securities, what the banks call liquid assets, it would be all right to leave it to the banks, but the security here is wheat in storage on the farms. Why, the banker does not know anything about it. Furthermore, many of the farmers who would need this money do not know the local banker at all; perhaps they never met him, never were inside the door of the bank, never made a deposit. As against that, right on the site you have the elevator agent who is thoroughly acquainted with all details of the situation. A farmer cannot deliver his wheat to anyone else than the elevator agent, and if the elevator agent is worth his salt he drives around the country, visits the farms and is perfectly familiar with the type of granary that every farmer's grain is stored in. Logically, he is the man to handle this business, and there is no need at all to bring in the banks. But this is profitable business for the banks, and it is handed to them, so I repeat that the bill would more properly be called "An Act for the profitable business of the banks in western Canada".

Let me say in passing, honourable senators, that some of the land in the northern part of the province was originally purchased for $1 an acre, but costs of municipal services, schools, buses and so on have caused taxes to increase so that now in many cases the yearly tax on an acre of land is $1.

Honourable senators will appreciate that, coming as I do from Saskatchewan, the last thing I want is anything which will make it more difficult for the Wheat Board to sell our wheat. For this reason, too, I do not think that too much should be said about our surpluses. In looking up reports of one or two speeches of mine in this chamber, I found some remarks which, I think, would bear repetition. I spoke of the years of drought when, because the grain was too short, instead of using combines we harvested largely with mowing machines, one man being on the mower and another man walking behind. A couple of mowers could be worn out in covering 300 acres, and the operator would come home at night looking as though he had been lying in a sand pile. In threshing this grain, the separator became blocked with sand, and the net result was no more than 3 bushels to the acre. Whatever may be said about the prosperity of the western farmer, let me assure honourable senators that it takes several good crops to compensate for the losses in these drought years, to pay taxes and interest and to meet other accumulated debts.

A great deal of land has been forced out of the production of any kind of grain. Because of the growth of Canada thistle and quack grass, and in spite of the use of weed spray, several townships in eastern Saskatchewan and southwest Manitoba have become unfit for the production of grain. It is estimated that to reclaim these districts from quack grass will cost between $100 and $150 an acre. New methods of treating quack grass are being tried out, but at best the land is out of production for three years.

Mention was made yesterday of the value of fertilizer, and wonders can be done with it on irrigated land, but the case is different in dry farming areas. I tried fertilizer, and I got more straw but less wheat. That has been the experience of not a few farmers. Some argue that the use of fertilizer brings the grain on quickly and helps to choke small weeds, but it also promotes the growth of straw, and more moisture is taken from the soil.

Reference has been made to grades and prices. Those who rely on the quotations at Fort William may think the farmers are getting quite a lot of money. But the Saskatchewan producer, because of additional freight costs, receives at least 10 cents less than his Manitoba neighbour. In fact, a Fort William price of $1.35 per bushel represents only about $1 in central and western Saskatchewan.

The honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) talked about the law of supply and demand. Well, consider the situation as regards flax. A year ago last summer only 12 million bushels of flax were harvested, and as flax is sold on the open market the law of supply and demand presumably should govern. But last year, with a production of 21 millions, the price fell as low as $2.60. Knowing that sales are made on the open market, where the law of supply and demand was assumed to be operating, producers expected to sell their product at around $3. There was a nice crop, but some sold for futures, and others gambled that the price would go lower. As a matter of fact, it fell to around $2.50. But yesterday the market quotation was $4.35. That kind of thing makes one less enthusiastic about this law of supply and demand. Barley, rye and oats are traded on the open market. I understand that the grain exchange people are making more money than they ever did, and the elevator companies are doing very well too. To my mind the storage charges are excessive. I understand that they are based on receipts over, at most, six months in the year; but the charges for current receipts would repay the whole cost of an elevator inside a short time, because in fact storage is being used over the full 12 months. These exactions amount to another indirect tax which the farmer must pay. No doubt the Government will draw quite a nice bit of money in income tax from the elevators and storage companies, but it is the farmer, who bears the burden of these deductions in the price he receives for his wheat, who indirectly pays that income tax.

For over 35 years I have advocated that farmers should build their own storage. I pointed out that otherwise they would have to pay for storage which they did not own. In this connection a personal experience may be mentioned. A house on a hill belonging to a farm which I had bought was vacant, and I noticed that the cement basement, whenever I visited it, was always quite dry. So I said to the boys, "Let us fill the basement with wheat", so we filled it to the roof with good wheat. This occurred in 1952, and last year, when we took it out, not a kernel was damaged. I believe that the right solution is to construct your storage on high dry ground. The walls need no support, and the place is exempt from mites and the heat which results from the sun striking one side of a granary. I suggest this as the answer to the problem of cheap and efficient storage; all one needs is a supply of cement, and a roof. Formerly, when shovels were necessary, it was difficult to remove the grain from basement storage, but with the augers now in use the grain can be handled cheaply and quickly.

We have heard a lot about wheat grading. In western Canada now No. 5 wheat makes fairly good flour, although it takes more of it to produce, say, 100 pounds of flour. I am not speaking, of course, about wheat that has been graded No. 5 due to frost damage. Our No. 4 is a fairly good milling wheat. I am certain that wheat which formerly was graded No. 1 is now being graded No. 2. Our farmers are not complaining about this, for they realize it gives the Wheat Board an advantage in selling their wheat abroad. Naturally wheat farmers are anxious that their wheat be accepted in their specified grades on foreign markets.

It is beyond my understanding why a greater effort was not made to have Great Britain come under the last International Wheat Agreement. The honourable senator from Gulf (Hon. Mr. Power) recently referred to the widespread habit of hero worship, but I want to say that seldom is this habit more abused than when a man becomes head of a farmers' co-operative or pool association. He holds that position pretty well for life, and if you dare offer a word of criticism you are accused of criticizing the pool, and so on. When negotiations were going on in New York for that International Wheat Agreement, Great Britain would not consent to a ceiling price of more than $2, while Canada and the United States held out for $2.05. During those negotiations I met the head of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, one of the largest pool organizations in existence, operating some 1,200 elevators and terminals. During a chat in the Chateau Laurier I asked him if he was going to accept a ceiling of $2 and he replied he would hold out for $2.05. I said: "You are not going to get it. Britain won't give in". I was afraid Britain would use the price as an excuse for not participating in the agreement, and I said it was important she did participate. I referred to those negotiations in a speech in the Senate on December 1, 1953, and I now quote my remarks at page 73 of Hansard for 1953-54:

> I asked the Government not to let the opportunity to include Britain pass, for we in western Canada—and I thought I was speaking for the majority of the western farmers—would like to see her brought in even at $2 a bushel. But, no; the Minister of Trade and Commerce announced in the other place that the wheat of the world was held in strong hands, and there would be no difficulty.

Well, there has been difficulty. I maintain that had Britain been included in that agreement we would be in a much better position today. Incidentally, just prior to the present Geneva negotiations the Minister of Trade and Commerce again made statements that I consider will not be helpful in finding a solution to our problem.

What about wheat sales? Our farmers are offering their wheat for sale. For instance, I have in my hand an advertisement from a small newspaper in Hanna, Alberta, offering No. 5 grade wheat for sale at 65 cents a bushel. A lot of people in eastern Canada would be glad to get this wheat as feed grain, but there is a problem involved in shipping it east. A large amount of it is being used as feed in the west right now, and I wouldn't be surprised if 100 million bushels were used up. I have heard farmers offering No. 1 and No. 2 for 80 cents a bushel. The feeders around Saskatoon—and I suppose the same is true in Calgary and Edmonton—are feeding large amounts of this wheat to their livestock. So our carryover is not too serious when you consider what we require for our own consumption as a nation of some 16 million people, what we use for livestock, and what demands other nations might make on our supply.

Honourable senators, I have taken up more time than I intended, but I felt it was necessary to make these remarks. I am most anxious to do what I can to help dispose of this surplus stock, which is still the finest of wheat. Thank you for your kind attention.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I should like to congratulate my honourable colleague from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) upon his very interesting and instructive speech. He is actually a farmer who lives on the land and does farm work himself, whereas I more or less belong to that class which might be called agriculturists. I believe I said once before in this chamber that a farmer is a man who makes his money on the farm and spends it in town, but that an agriculturist is a man who makes his money in town and spends it on the farm.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I do not rise particularly because I am interested in the growing of wheat but because of the fact that some reference to me was bandied about yesterday and I would not want anyone here or anywhere else to get the idea that I am more or less a wheat mining capitalist. It is true that I am interested in wheat, but that wheat has been grown on land in which I am interested. Other people are interested in that same wheat. But most of it is stored safely. On the land that I am interested in we may have 10,000 or 15,000 bushels out on the ground; a great deal of it was blown away by last winter's storms, but we hope to salvage most of it.

Another reason for my rising to speak today is this: I was appointed to the Senate in 1933 to represent the wheat farmers of the province of Saskatchewan, and I do not think a session has gone by since without my saying something about wheat. The other day I was talking, at the hotel where I stay when in Ottawa, to a man who was once a farmer in western Canada. I was startled when he told me that he did not know that the wheat pools of the Prairie provinces had nothing whatever to do with the Canadian Wheat Board. My associates and I explained to him that in about 1924 the farmers of the Prairie provinces banded together and formed wheat pools, and for a time the pools bought and sold grain in the markets of the world, but after getting into difficulties in about 1930 they gradually worked out of that kind of thing and at present are principally engaged in running country elevators and storing grain; they no longer buy any grain, except for the Wheat Board. The board, of course, has nothing whatever to do with the western wheat pools. No doubt the confusion arises owing to the fact that the board puts the wheat into what it calls a pool, and each farmer gets his share of the proceeds of the pool when the grain is finally disposed of, according to the number of bushels he has marketed. I make that explanation because of what the senator from Queens-Lunenburg (Hon. Mr. Kinley) said yesterday, for I was under the impression that perhaps he did not know that the Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta wheat pools had nothing whatever to do with the Canadian Wheat Board.

Honourable senators may not know that the district I represent in Saskatchewan is probably the greatest wheat growing district in Canada. The land around Rosetown is particularly adapted to the growing of wheat because the top soil is very deep; in some places the top soil is fifty feet deep. Surrounding that town there are a million acres of land under cultivation, and naturally we grow a lot of wheat. That is one of the places where congestion exists. It may be difficult for honourable senators to understand why a great many farmers in our area have still on hand wheat grown in 1952, 1953, 1954 and 1955.

Hon. Mr. Haig: You haven't any of that.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The reason for the quantity of wheat on hand is as follows. In 1951 the crop was snowed under. As has already been said, when that wheat was threshed in the spring it was in good condition; it was a big crop, practically all of it was sound, none of it was spoiled, and it all went into the elevator. The 1952 crop was the largest that Canada ever grew. When we came to market that crop we found that the elevators were already almost full and we could not get rid of very much more. Then a quota system was inaugurated by the Wheat Board and we were allowed first to deliver 5 bushels, then another bushel, until we reached a quota of 8 bushels per acre. However, in the case of a farmer having 320 acres of land, with 200 acres in wheat, which had yielded 30 bushels to the acre—which was not unusual in 1952; in fact, most of the land yielded 40 bushels to the acre—his quota would be about 2,400 bushels, and after he sold that quantity there were still 2,500 or 3,000 bushels left that he had to carry over.

Now, the 1953 crop was almost as large. The farmer followed the same procedure as in 1952; he got out his 8 bushel quota, but had 2,500 or 3,000 bushels left, which went into the granary, and he would have wheat left over from 1952 and 1953. In 1954 there was another 8 bushel quota. Not so much grain accumulated in that year, because in our area the crop suffered from rust and was not so good as in previous years. However, in 1955 there was a big crop, and although we had a 3 bushel quota in our area in some elevators, when I left there to come to Ottawa for this session the ordinary quota was 1 bushel or 2 bushels per acre—there was room in the elevators for that much and no more.

Honourable senators will realize, therefore, how it came about that we had wheat left over from each of those years. It has piled up to such an extent that in our area, at any rate, I would say two full crops have been left over and not marketed, and the elevators are full. That is the position the farmers find themselves in, and it is a very serious one.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Does that mean that the 1954 and 1955 crops are left over?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No; part of the 1952 crop, part of 1953, part of 1954, and nearly all of 1955. When you add them together they make up, I should think, about two full crops not marketed.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Does the wheat of the earlier years, 1951 and 1952, deteriorate while being held?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Wheat that has been properly kept in dry storage and turned over does not deteriorate. If grain has been stored in a place for over two or three years it is generally turned over yearly to let the air into it, and if that is done it will keep almost indefinitely. The only trouble we have is with grain that has been left outside all winter and is not marketed during the next summer; some of it becomes spoiled by rainfall, and that sort of thing.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Do I understand the honourable senator to say that the wheat which was left standing in 1951 throughout the winter did not deteriorate?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Oh, well, there was very little wheat left standing; it was all swathed with big swathers, and it was left lying on the ground with the heads up; then the snow came and covered it before the big combines could pick it up, with the result that the wheat lay under the snow all winter; but we had a most wonderful spring—the snow went away in a few days, the ground dried up, and the combines picked up the crop, and we lost only about one grade. However, when the spring came there was not much left of any grain that stood up uncut, because the winds had blown it away. Very little was lost of the 1951 crop, and for that reason very little loss was incurred from the loans which were made at that time.

Honourable senators, these remarks have been more or less introductory and I have made them so that many honourable members present might have a better idea of the situation with regard to wheat.

I remember the bill that was passed here in 1951, under the same title as that of the bill now before us. I made a speech on the Address that year and I advocated the passage of that type of legislation. When the Government introduced the measure I complimented it, and I was pleased to see it pass. But when I returned to Rosetown I learned that practically no farmers had taken advantage of its benefits, and the banks had made no loans. The reason was that the farmers did not like to borrow money on their grain that was under the snow; they were afraid they would not be able to pay it back. The merchants were prepared to carry the farmers over the winter months, and in the spring the crop was saved. Under those circumstances there were little or no losses on the loans made by the banks at that time.

May I say that I have not yet heard a satisfactory explanation in this house as to what the farmers in my part of the country have asked for. They are not asking that the Wheat Board borrow money and advance it to farmers interest free. As the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) asked yesterday, if that were done, where would it place the farmers who did not borrow or obtain advances? It must be remembered that in western Canada there are some 200,000 farmers, and I understand that only about 8,000 have borrowed under this arrangement. If the Wheat Board borrowed the money and paid interest on it, that expense would be shared by all farmers, whether they benefited or not, when the board distributed to the farmers the proceeds from the sale of grain.

My understanding of what the farmers of western Canada are asking is that the federal Government make an interest-free loan to the Wheat Board for distribution among the farmers who need it. In that way the farmer who did not or could not take advantage of a loan would not have to bear the cost of borrowing, because it would be borne by the Government.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Indirectly you would have to pay your share of the interest, whether you borrowed or not.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I would not mind doing that.

Hon. Mr. Euler: In effect, every taxpayer would pay a share of the cost.

Mr. Aseltine: I have some figures here to show the cost of giving effect to the suggestion by the farmers that the Government make an interest-free advance on a four-bushel quota. That, I may say, is half of what is expected will be delivered during the crop year.

Some 63 million acres would qualify, after taking out the acreage devoted to flax and Durum wheat.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Not 63 million acres.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There was a total of only 20 million acres.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: But this quota is on the whole farm.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, you are quite right.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Perhaps I should explain that a farmer with a 320 acre farm, on an eight-bushel quota would be allowed to market, say, 2,400 bushels. Now, 63 million acres at a four-bushel quota would mean 252 million bushels. About 100 million bushels have already been delivered, leaving 152 million, worth say $1 per bushel, on which the Government could advance money. The cost to the Government for $152 million at 3¼ per cent for a period of four months—that is the time within which the average loan is repaid— would amount to only $1,600,000, and that would not be much of a burden for the Government. Beyond that there would be only the administration and collection costs. Briefly, the Government would advance the money interest free to the Wheat Board and, as the honourable Leader of the Government has reminded us, the interest cost would be spread over all the Canadian people.

This measure was fully debated in the other house and I do not wish to discuss it at undue length. But may I just say that I am at a loss to know why the Government did not make some compromise in the arrangement it is offering to the farmers, perhaps by way of making the money available to the Wheat Board and letting the farmer borrow it at say 3¼ or 3½ per cent. In view of the amount of wheat on the farms, I cannot see how there could be any losses at all.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Would the honourable senator permit a question for clarification of his suggestion?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I understand that 8,000 loans have been made under this arrangement up to the present time.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Up to the end of December last.

Hon. Mr. Croll: There have been 4,000 more since then.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The latest figure I have is 8,000. Therefore, if each farmer gets $1,500 it would amount to a great deal more than the sum my honourable friend suggested.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: But a good many of those loans have already been paid back. For instance, in the case of a farmer on the three-bushel quota, the elevator man takes half the value of every delivery he makes and sends it to the bank. In that way a number of the loans would already have been taken care of. Indeed, I should think that in four months practically all of them would have been paid off. You see, as box cars become available the grain moves out, the Wheat Board raises the quotas at the different points across the country and the farmer is able to deliver more grain; hence, if the farmer has a loan at the bank under this system, half the return on the grain he delivers is sent to the bank and he receives the other half.

At any rate, this is a temporary measure, and it may relieve the situation with respect to the small farmer; but, as the honourable senator from Blaine Lake has said, it will not help the farmer who has a substantial acreage of wheat. What he could get by way of such a loan would not be enough to pay this taxes. The fact is that before I left Saskatchewan for Ottawa in January many farmers in my area had not been able to sell enough wheat to pay their taxes.

The question of what policy should be adopted is all important. The honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) said yesterday that he did not know how the whole problem could be solved. I would remind the house that in 1942 a system was adopted for curtailing acreage by means of a summer-fallow bonus, which seemed to take care of the problem at that time pretty well. At present most farmers summer-fallow one-third of their land and crop the remaining two-thirds. On much of my own land I summer-fallow half of it each year. I believe that if by some arrangement one-half of the farm land in the wheat producing provinces could be summer-fallowed every year it would cut down the production of wheat, and also of coarse grains, of which there is a surplus at present. Outside of advocating reduction of the acreage sown in wheat and in other grains in that manner, I have nothing further to suggest.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat. We easterners have sat here listening to this discussion, and I would like to know if in his opinion the wheat farmer of the west would not be better off if he marketed his grain as was done before the war, in the way that we poor agriculturists or farmers in the east have to market our products, in accordance with the old law of supply and demand.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It was not marketed in that way prior to the war. There was a wheat pool and the Wheat Board.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: But the Government was not in it.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes. The Wheat Board came into operation in 1935. It was a voluntary organization, in that you could sell either to the board or through the other avenues open at that time, and some people took advantage of both. I remember I sold some of my wheat one way and some the other way, and I do not know which way produced the most money. Is my honourable friend referring back beyond that?

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Well, I am not going to commit myself on that. I am a member of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and I would say that the majority of the farmers belong to it, and that 90 per cent of them are in favour of the Wheat Board, as I am.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I would ask the honourable senator from Northumberland-Miramichi (Hon. Mr. Burchill): Do you not have a Potato Board?

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Yes, we do, but we cannot get any Government assistance, I am sorry to say.

Hon. J. Wesley Stambaugh: Honourable senators, I live in a district that is considerably different from that of the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). Up in my part of the country, which includes practically all of northern Alberta and part of central Alberta, there are no large wheat farmers. We grow as much barley as wheat, and as much oats as wheat, and in a great many cases we grow more coarse grain than wheat. Therefore, we are not quite as much interested in the wheat surplus as some other people are; it does not disturb us as much as it does large farmers like the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine).

Furthermore, farmers having 25,000 or 30,000 bushels of grain, in my opinion, do not need much sympathy. The farmers that I know, farmers who put in a big acreage and have a large amount of wheat on their farms, have actually sold as much wheat in the last five years as they did in any other five years, or more, because they have had larger crops.

Now, it has already been mentioned that this quota is on the whole farm. It is on the cultivated acreage, and in that part of the country where these large farms are they average about one-half summer-fallow and the other half grain. Half is summer-fallowed each year. So if a farmer has 1,000 cultivated acres, 500 acres would be in summer-fallow and 500 acres in wheat, but his quota will be on 1,000 acres. Therefore, when a quota of 8 bushels is set he can actually sell 16 bushels for each acre he has in crop. It is a very good average. I do not think that farmers down in that part of the country who have had good crops over the past five years are entitled to much sympathy. Of course, seeing that I live in a district where we do not have such large farms I may be a bit prejudiced.

Honourable senators, one matter that disturbs me somewhat is the agitation for interest-free loans to farmers. Now, I do not believe that a farmer is entitled to an interest-free loan any more than any other person is. I am a farmer and have borrowed money all my life, but have never been able to borrow any interest-free money. Of course, again I may be prejudiced along that line because, as you all know, a few years ago a party came into power in Alberta that was going to give us interest-free loans and we got all worked up about it; and even yet a great many people are still looking for it—and probably will look a while longer. I cannot see any reason why a farmer should not pay interest on money he borrows.

Coming back to my own part of the country again; the average farmer in my district owns about half a section, some own a three-quarter section and some a quarter section, but I think the average is about a half section. As we grow oats and barley, we have sold the most of our crop in the past years. There have been times up in our district when we got a larger quota for oats; the Wheat Board was able to sell oats when it could not sell wheat.

Last year, in my town the quota for oats was thrown wide open, so any farmer could sell all the oats he had; and the quota for barley was open to a considerable extent. So in my town the average sale of grain, including wheat, oats and barley was 14 bushels to the acre, and nearly all the oats were sold.

Now, the average farmer in my district does not get into debt during the season for any more than $1,500, so this loan of $1,500 will pretty well tide him over.

There is also one thing, honourable senators, that has not been mentioned. Besides the quota, at the opening of the season every farmer is allowed 100 units. The discussion here has been in connection with the quota. Every farmer, whether he owns a quarter section or ten sections, gets 100 units, and with those 100 units he can sell 300 bushels of wheat, or 500 bushels of barley or 800 bushels of oats.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But he cannot sell them all.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: He cannot sell them all, but we can sell either one or he can combine them to make up the units. Then, when the quota is given to the farmer it is based on his entire acreage; that is, on the acreage he has under cultivation on his farm.

I think that for the average farmer, the farmer who lives on his land, who owns his own home and is raising a family, the loan is fairly adequate. A little more would not hurt, possibly, but I think most farmers are getting by reasonably well.

In addition, over and above the quota and the units, if a farmer feels that he has not got the proper kind of seed grain he is permitted to sell 400 additional bushels of wheat in order to buy seed grain. The seed grain may be bought at any place where it can be found, at the seed house or the elevator, or from his neighbours. That gives him a little leeway to obtain seed.

Some of our farmers have gone down into the Hanna district, of which the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) spoke, and bought some No. 5 wheat and used it for feed. I know of one farmer in my district who has over 1,000 head of cattle and who bought 5,000 bushels of this No. 5 wheat, paying 60 cents a bushel for it, although the honourable member from Blaine Lake referred to an advertisement offering it at 65 cents a bushel. Certainly No. 5 wheat is excellent feed if its low grade is due to drought rather than frost. Frosted wheat, whether graded 4, 5 or 6, is not as good as dried-out wheat. But in my district more wheat was graded 5 and 6 through frost than from drought.

It has been frequently said that the increased crops are due to the use of fertilizer and various kinds of machinery and new methods of working land. I agree that this is true to some extent, but at least 75 per cent of the increase is due to the weather. Like the honourable senator from Blaine Lake, I have had some experience with fertilizer; if the weather is dry, the weeds will get more benefit from the fertilizer than the crop will. Sometimes one loses money by applying advanced methods; but improved machinery has revolutionized farming and enabled us to raise grain cheaper than we could do by using horses and oxen.

Yesterday the question was asked, who owns the grain in the elevators? The answer, as I remember, was that the Wheat Board does. It is my opinion, and I got the information from the board, that grain in an elevator is owned by the company which owns the elevator, and does not pass to the ownership of the board until the board takes it over—which may be when it goes into the terminals or when it is loaded on the boat.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It is the same thing.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: The farmer can get his cash ticket, but the elevator company pays for the grain and owns it.

Hon. Mr. Howden: It is the Government that pays for it.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: Finally, yes, but it does not pay for it until it is taken over by the Wheat Board, and the Wheat Board takes it over on the grade fixed by the Government inspector.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Who advances the money in the meantime?

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: The elevator companies, using their own money, or borrowing from the banks.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The honourable senator means they fill the elevators full of wheat, borrow the money, and pay the farmers for that wheat?

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Then they do not receive any money from the Wheat Board?

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: Not until the board gets the wheat.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Until the Wheat Board gets the wheat?

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: I understand so.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Who pays interim storage on the wheat in the meantime?

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: All costs are borne by the elevators until the wheat is delivered to the board. In 1954 the cost of storage and interest was 14·8 cents a bushel.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Interest on the money advanced by the elevators?

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: They paid everything. I am not saying that the Wheat Board does not pay any interest; I say it does not pay anything until it takes possession of the grain; it is not the board's grain, and it is not responsible for grade and condition until the grain is delivered to it. The 14·8 cents pays for all those items.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I should like to draw the honourable senator's attention to some statements which were made yesterday. I quote from Hansard:

> Hon. Mr. Kinley: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question for my own information? I take it that the elevators are full. Who owns the wheat in the elevators?
> Hon. Mr. Haig: The Government.
> Hon. Mr. Crerar: The Wheat Board owns the wheat in the elevators.
> Hon. Mr. Kinley: Has it paid for it?
>
> Hon. Mr. Crerar: Oh, surely.
> Hon. Mr. Kinley: The farmers are fully paid for their wheat in the elevators.
> Hon. Mr. Crerar: No, I may say that in many cases the farmer has been paid only the initial payment for 2 bushels or 4 bushels or whatever his quota may be. That was the result of the congestion in both country and terminal elevators during the whole of last fall. In that respect the remarks of the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) are entirely correct and apropos.

So there are two authorities. What the honourable senator from Bruce (Hon. Mr. Stambaugh) says is different.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I take a moment to give the answer?

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Haig: On a question of privilege; I did not say what is attributed to me. When a man delivers grain to an elevator he gets an initial payment. From this are deducted the freight costs and clearing charges. When the grain is finally sold to somebody in Europe, or wherever it is, and the proceeds are received, the owner gets his proportion. But the Wheat Board pays interest and storage and insurance and every sort of related expense as soon as the grain enters the door of the elevator. The only question which then arises is the matter of grading, and the trouble in that connection is this: the grain merchant at the elevator grades the grain, let us say, No. 3, but when he ships it out it goes as No. 2, and he gets a profit. Although those concerned try as far as they can to hold to one grade, these discrepancies have always been a source of trouble in the elevator business.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. The honourable senator from Bruce (Hon. Mr. Stambaugh) has the floor.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: As I have already said, I would be glad to answer questions. I understood from grain men with whom I was talking not long ago that the elevator companies advance the money to the farmer until his grain is taken over by the Wheat Board, and that they do not get any refund until the board has taken delivery.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not see what all this has to do with the principle of the bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: Yesterday it was stated that storage charges may amount this year to as much as 20 cents, for the reason that some grain has been left over for years, and storage and interest charges have accumulated against it. These charges are paid to the elevators at a fixed rate per day for the number of days the grain is in their keeping.

I do not think there is anything I wish to add, although, as I have said, I shall be glad to answer any questions if I have not made myself clear.

Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to take part in the discussion of this measure, and I shall be brief.

May I remark in the first place that the wheat problem in Canada will always be a Saskatchewan problem, because the people of that province are more or less miners of wheat instead of farmers. Modern machinery makes it easy to work the land. The farmer takes a tractor and four or five plows, goes a mile in one direction and then a mile in another. It is the easiest thing now to produce and cultivate grain in the flat lands of Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We cannot grow peas in Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: I would suggest to my honourable friend from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) that instead of remaining as an agriculturist he should become a farmer. Then he would know what farming is.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: My father left Quebec in 1882 and bought the farm on which I now live. It is not very large, being comprised of only 500 acres. We diversify our farming, and in my district this year, according to the bank's figures, we sold $300,000 worth of field peas. Many of our farmers grow beets and are producing an average of 8 tons per acre. The beets have a high sugar content and should bring about $14.50 a ton this year. Our farmers also raise hogs and dairy cows and they always have a steer or two to sell. When I left home on January 7 I asked my banker how many applications he had received for loans under the measure we are now discussing, and he told me he did not have one application.

The Saskatchewan farmers are great for propaganda. Their advocacy of loans being made free of interest by the Wheat Board is nothing but straight propaganda, and a good deal of it boils down to political propaganda.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Oh, surely not.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Why should a farmer or anybody else be entitled to borrow money free of interest? Somebody has got to pay for it. The farmer of the type we have heard about this afternoon does not need a loan, especially one free of interest. He can go to the bank and borrow all the money he wants, because his granaries are full and his credit is good.

Coming back to delivery quotas: in our district we delivered a thousand bushels of oats at the opening of the crop year. Since that time we have had two 1-bushel quotas for the total acreage and we have delivered another thousand bushels of oats to the elevators because the Wheat Board said there was a large demand for that kind of grain.

Honourable senators, this is about all I have to say. I know the majority of western farmers want to retain the Wheat Board, but there would be no better way of destroying it than by putting it in the lending business, especially the business of lending money without interest.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Speaker: I would point out that if the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, when I entered the chamber this afternoon I intended to speak at some length in closing the debate, but the arguments that have been advanced against the bill have been so well answered that there remains little for me to say. I do want to let honourable senators know, however, that I cannot qualify as a farmer. I know certain lawyer-senators who often describe themselves as farmers. The honourable Leader Opposite (Hon. Mr. Haig) is a lawyer. I do not know whether he describes himself as a farmer.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I never have.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Probably he owns some wheat land.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I do not.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Then he and I are in the same position. But the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) is a lawyer, and he has the advantage over his Leader and myself in that he not only owns wheat land but he has quite a supply of good wheat on hand.

Although I am not a farmer I am not entirely ignorant of farming, for as a young man I worked on farms in Ontario and Alberta, both during the sowing and harvesting seasons. In addition, I sat for eighteen years in the House of Commons, and anyone who is there for that length of time should acquire a good knowledge of the exportation and marketing of wheat.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: So I do know something about this subject. I enjoyed the debate yesterday and today. It has been very enlightening. We realize more than ever that the great surplus of wheat is probably a blessing, even though it has presented a problem. However, I think this problem is being well handled by the Government, notwithstanding anything that has been said here during the last two days. Wheat is being sold in very large quantities, and I am satisfied that before long all the farmers of western Canada will have delivered a substantial quantity of their wheat to elevators and will have received their payment.

Yesterday some honourable senators asked certain questions, which I am now able to answer. The honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid), referring to the trade agreement with Russia, inquired whether the USSR is buying the long ton or the short ton. The answer is:

The unit here is a metric ton: 2,204 pounds. There are four quantities mentioned in the agreement, as follows:

1,200,000	tons	equals	44·1	million	bushels
1,500,000	"	"	55·1	"	"
400,000	"	"	14·7	"	"
500,000	"	"	18·4	"	"

During the debate on this bill the honourable senator from Huron-Perth (Hon. Mr. Golding) referred to my statement that the average export sale of wheat for four years was 312 million bushels and inquired what the home consumption has been in the same period of time.

The answer to that question is: Domestic consumption, which includes milling, flour, seeds, feed, reaches a pretty steady figure of about 150 million bushels per annum. There may be a slight tolerance either way, but this is a pretty constant figure.

Hon. Mr. Horner: May I ask a question in connection with the sale of wheat to Russia. Is that conditioned entirely on our purchase from Russia?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, it is not conditioned entirely on our purchase from Russia. If I remember the terms of the agreement correctly, Russia can review the situation from time to time; but, as I say, the sale of wheat is not conditioned entirely upon our purchase from Russia.

In the debate on the Temporary Wheat Reserves Bill the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) asked yesterday for information on the total sales of wheat from August 1, 1955 to date, a period of approximately seven months. A discussion also arose at that time as to whether or not that information had been disclosed in the other house. I have made inquiries on these matters, and the answer is as follows:

The sales position is not given out during the current crop years because it is desirable that our competitors should not know our sales position. The information was not given in the other house. The Right Honourable Mr. Howe has always been adamant on this point. Export figures are given freely because export figures always run several months behind sales.

Also in the debate on that bill the honourable senator from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Ross) asked this question:

Could the Minister give us a breakdown of the figure of 20 cents a bushel for storage? As I understand it, 15 cents is for storage itself, and then there are handling charges and interest. I would like to know how the 20 cents is made up.

The answer is as follows:

In the House of Commons the Minister of Trade and Commerce indicated that the carrying charges of the wheat in the 1954-55 pool would average about 20 cents per bushel. It is not possible as yet to be absolutely specific because the 1954-55 pool is still open and the final calculation will not be made until the pool is closed.

In section 2(b) of the bill it is to be noted that the carrying charge is defined as "the amount per bushel per day paid by the board for storage and interest to managers of country elevators in respect of wheat that has been purchased and received for the board". That rate negotiated between the board and the elevator companies was ·04057 cents per bushel per day, which included storage charges and interest. This works out to 14·8 cents per bushel per year.

The point of the honourable senator's question was why the per bushel charge in the pool will be about 20 cents. The answer is quite simple. It is that much of the wheat in the 1954-55 pool has been under administration considerably more than 12 months. I think the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) made that point this afternoon. The distinction between 14·8 cents and, say, 20 cents is, therefore, the difference between the mathematical calculation of what it costs to carry a bushel of wheat for a year as opposed to the actual cost received to carry wheat through the life of a pool.

May I add that the 14·8 cents or 15 cents per bushel and the consequent $32 million figure—that is the amount mentioned in the bill—is based on the ·0405 cents per bushel per day, which is not likely to vary. It is the interest charges on carrying it for more than one year, as the honourable senator from Blaine Lake said, which might cause it to run up to 20 cents.

Honourable senators, I think I have answered all the questions which were submitted to me, and I trust the bill will receive the unanimous approval of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: The question, honourable senators, is on the motion for the second reading of Bill 82, an Act to provide for short-term credit to grain producers in the Prairie provinces to meet temporary financial difficulties arising from inability to deliver all their grain. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Haig: On division.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With leave I move the third reading now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it has been moved, with leave of the Senate, that this bill be read the third time. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I want to deal with a point raised by my friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Hon. Mr. Kinley). I did not take any part in the discussion on the matter to which he referred.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I was only quoting from Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, there was a mistake. The point is this. The Wheat Board fixed an initial payment of $1.40 for No. 1 Northern, and $1.12 for No. 5. The farmer, therefore, receives either $1.40 or $1.12, according to grade, less freight, storage and carrying charges. The wheat goes into the elevators, comes under the control of the Wheat Board and is paid for by the Wheat Board. From then on it is delivered to the board. The board pays the elevator company the price of the wheat, that is, either $1.40 or $1.12, plus interest, insurance, carrying charges, etc. Now, grain produced in 1954 that was not sold by July 31, 1955—which my honourable friend from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) said was 164 million bushels—was transferred from the 1954 pool to the 1955 pool. Every time they clean up that pool—once or twice a year, if they have quite a profit—they finally distribute whatever they have, the proceeds of either $1.40 or $1.12 wheat, among the farmers in that pool.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I was just reading from Hansard. I don't dispute what you say.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, there must have been a misunderstanding.

Let me add this, that every time a distribution is made our newspapers announce exactly how many bushels are involved; they state how many bushels were sold from the previous year, at how much it was charged, and how much each person gets per bushel; they also show how much is left over. That is my answer to the question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Haig: On division.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed, on division.

PRESIDENT OF ITALY

ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF BOTH HOUSES

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, this afternoon members of this house attended at the chamber of the House of Commons, when we heard an address delivered by the President of Italy to members of both Houses of Parliament. I am sure honourable senators would like his address, and the other addresses which were delivered on this occasion, to appear in the Senate records. I have not yet received a copy of the President's address, it occurs to me that if it does not arrive in time for printing today it could appear in tomorrow's Hansard. With leave of honourable senators, I move as follows:

That the address of His Excellency Giovanni Gronchi, President of the Italian Republic, to members of both Houses of Parliament this day, and other addresses delivered on this occasion, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The motion was agreed to.

See Appendix to tomorrow's Hansard pp. 264-8.

PENAL REFORM

DISCUSSION

Hon David A. Croll arose in accordance with the following notice:

That he will call to the attention of the Senate the present position with respect to penal institutions in Canada and in particular will discuss the need for further reforms in the Canadian penal system.

He said: Honourable senators, I have high hopes that this motion will bring about an all-out debate which will give Canadians some idea of the problems involved in prison reform and increase public interest in prisoners. Furthermore, my hope is that our discussion will stimulate and create interest which will result in activating elected officials in responsible positions to take remedial steps. I intend to deal with the problem of reform in a general fashion and more particularly with probation and parole. Probation is a matter of giving a man another chance. It is a little more than that. It gives society a second chance to understand, prevent and correct. Parole, or what is more commonly called ticket of leave, is the release of a person after serving a portion of his sentence.

Some honourable senators have already indicated that they will participate in the debate: the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson), the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges), the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), and the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid). I think the honourable senator from Banff (Hon. Mr. Cameron) will also participate, and I hope that others will make their contributions.

Prison reform has been a neglected subject in this country. And there are good reasons for it, I suppose. Perhaps I should say, not that there are good reasons, but that there are reasons.

Prisoners have no alumni association, no boosters, no lobby groups and no fan clubs, and because they have not these things it devolves upon us particularly, as a real duty and a responsibility, to give consideration to such matters as I will raise here tonight. My purpose is not to blame the Government or to be unduly critical of it. I hope that as a result of what I have to say and as a result of the debate we shall take some lethargy out of Canadians.

Inmates of Canada's prisons, reformatories and penitentiaries, are in the main a huge floating population of forgotten men and women. They are people who, whatever their intrinsic worth, have been lifted out of our Canadian society and for the time being immobilized. They are very much like the mythical creatures that are supposed to inhabit the Caribbean seas—neither dead nor alive, but existing in a kind of half-life until the day of their liberation.

Now, I am not for a moment disputing the principle that wrongdoing must be punished. That canon is at least as old as the Book of Genesis. I am not, as I have said, disputing the principle of punishment, but what we must always concern ourselves with is the nature of the punishment and what is to happen to these people after their punishment is over.

These are considerations which no Canadian —be he legislator, teacher, clergyman, or private citizen—can afford to ignore. We must be for ever and ever reviewing and overhauling our penal system just as we do our educational system because, in its own way, the penal system also is important.

The past history of crime and punishment in this and other so-called civilized countries is so shocking that I think few people today could read it through without abhorrence. Most of that is gone now. Our criminal laws and their enforcement are infinitely more humanitarian than they ever were before. No one can deny that.

And yet, old habits of thought die hard. We have still not altogether rid ourselves of the old belief that a person who has committed a crime is an outcast or an outlaw, and that he has forfeited all his rights, particularly the right to be considered and treated as a human being. What has been called the Bastille complex has not died. The only remedy some people can conceive of for wrongdoing is punishment and more punishment. If a man offends against our laws, they say, then lock him up—put him away. But they often overlook the question of what we are going to do with him while he is locked up. They are suddenly vague when it comes to matters like prison therapy, rehabilitation, probation and the like.

To my mind, punishment without cure is worthless. It is one thing to take people out of society when they break the law. But it is equally our duty to put them back into society. We have got to do more than simply open the prison door and turn them loose.

One thing is very clear. We are not doing the job as it should be done, and as it is being done elsewhere. We may be punishing, but we are doing little to cure. The problem of penal reform is a vital problem, and a continuing one. Let no one think that the Archambault Report is a dead letter today or that all's well in the prison world.

I don't want to get bogged down in statistics, but here are a few which are so striking that I must take a moment to discuss them. For they give the lie completely to any complacency or feeling of satisfaction which may exist on the subject of prisons and prisoners. The comparison is between Canada and Great Britain—always a favourite and, I think, a fair basis of comparison.

In the penal field a comparison between the two countries is so astounding that the conscience of Canada should be shocked to the core.

Let me give you a brief idea of what I mean. In Great Britain in 1907 they sent 185,000 persons to jail. Forty-four years later, in 1951, the number of persons sentenced to jail had fallen to 30,000—a reduction of 85 per cent—in spite of the fact that the population of Britain had greatly increased over the same period.

That's one side of the coin. Now let's look at the other side.

In Ontario alone, in 1941, some 20,000 persons were sentenced to jail. In 1951, ten years later, the number had risen to 40,000, an increase of 100 per cent. In 1955 the number was 46,899.

Canada, with a population of 15 million, sent some 100,000 people to jail last year. Great Britain, with a population of 43 million, almost three times as large, sent 33,000 to jail last year, or one-third the number. I wish to emphasize this: Britain's population is three times ours, yet we send three times as many people to jail. Why, Ontario alone is sending more to jail than are England and Wales.

Is there anyone who is still not convinced that Canada's penal system is lacking something? Then let him turn to consider these figures. In Great Britain, 15 per cent of the prison population are repeaters. In Canada, 60 per cent are repeaters. Here are some Canadian statistics on recidivism:

Penitentiary Reports Recidivism		Per Cent	General Recidivism		Per Cent
1948	—	45·45
....	—	.....	1950	—	77·1
....	—	.....	1951	—	76·3
1952	—	40·20	1952	—	77·1
1953	—	40·45	1953	—	78·1
1954	—	38·08	1954	—	77·
1955	—	42·5	1955	—	77·6

These figures tell me—and I hope that they tell the same story to you—that we are still sending out into the world men filled with bitterness, resentment and hatred of society.

Honourable senators, I do not believe, nor does anyone pretend, that the people of Canada are more vicious, more depraved or more inclined to crime than the people of Great Britain. I would not make the invidious comparison that we are better, but surely to heaven we are not worse, and not that much worse. I cannot believe that there is so much difference between us. Yet what is the explanation? How can there be such an enormous difference between our two countries? Well, if we pursue our comparison a little farther, we begin to see daylight.

It is generally agreed that a sane program of probation is a vital part of any penal system. For experience has shown that the people whom you don't send to prison are more important than the people you do send to prison. Does anyone doubt this? Then let me tell you that 75 per cent of all first offenders placed on probation in Ontario never again get into trouble. That is the record. On the other hand, only 25 to 35 per cent of those who do time in Ontario reformatories, and 21 per cent of those in Canadian penitentiaries, stay out of trouble. The rest end up in the prisoners' dock again. In other words, probation is almost three times as successful in rehabilitating men as prison is. So I think even the most cautious of us might safely conclude that putting a man on probation is better penal therapy than putting a man in jail—three times better, in fact.

Yet in the whole of this great Dominion of Canada, where last year we sentenced 100,000 people to prison, we have exactly 101 probation officers. Speaking of probation officers—if a young Canadian wishes to become a penologist he must study in either the United States or Great Britain. No Canadian university teaches penology. It is about time that our universities took notice of this great need. I said that there were 101 probation officers. If we apply American or British standards we should have at least 700. And you haven't heard the worst yet. Five provinces have none at all.

Here is the latest box score I have been able to find on probation officers in Canada:

Ontario	85
British Columbia	12
Alberta	2
Newfoundland	1
Nova Scotia	1

The other provinces—they will remain nameless—have no probation officers at all.

Now I have demonstrated the value of probation by showing that it is three times more successful in rehabilitating wrongdoers than a term in prison. Need I also demonstrate that probation is cheaper? It is a lot cheaper.

Do you know the cost of keeping a man in prison in Canada? Well, it varies, but the average cost is a little in excess of $4 a day, or approximately $1,800 to $2,000 a year. That does not include the cost of looking after their families, which was $84,000 in Ontario last year. On the other hand, it costs less than one-tenth as much, or $100 a year, to keep a man on probation. So if one wants to look at the saving in money only, it is exactly 90 per cent. Can anyone put a value on the saving in human beings?

Well, now, since probation costs less than one-tenth the price of prison, and since probation is three times as successful in rehabilitating men as prison is, then one would expect to see a high level of probation under our penal system. If so, one would be sadly disappointed. The comparison with Britain in this context is even more striking than before. Here are the figures for 1952, showing the case for probation:

	England & Wales	Canada
Population	43,000,000	15,000,000
Convictions	688,650	1,215,376
Prison	32,000	90,000
Probation	40,000	3,000

Honourable senators, these are frightening figures. If they were brought up to date they would tell about the same story. In 1952 Great Britain put 32,000 persons in prison and allowed 40,000 offenders to go free on probation. Canada during the same year committed 90,000 persons to prison and placed exactly 3,000 on probation. In other words, we in Canada put 30 times as many people in prison as we placed on probation. Britain, on the other hand, actually placed more people on probation than she sent to prison. Is it any wonder that Britain's prison population has been steadily declining for almost 50 years since probation was first introduced, while Canada's prison population has been just steadily increasing?

I have dwelt on this question of probation, not because it is the only factor to be considered in penal reform but because it shows up our thinking on penology for what it is—at least 50 years out of date. By and large, we in Canada are still back in the days of the Victorian lock-up. Our biggest fear seems to be that we may be accused of "coddling and pampering prisoners"—surely one of the stupidest phrases that ever dogged the steps of penal reform! It was last used, I recall, at the time of the Kingston riots in 1954.

I am not saying that we have done nothing to improve our penal methods. Great improvements have come in since the famous Archambault Commission convicted our system of making prisoners into criminals instead of reforming them. But an enormous amount yet remains to be done. To judge from the record, we have only barely heard of the probation system. It is apparent that we have never heard of the open prison system. Yet neither of these is exactly a radical innovation. They have been tried and proven in Britain and elsewhere.

Our prison population continues to grow. Here are the figures:

1947	3,752
1948	3,851
1949	4,225
1950	4,720
1951	4,817
1952	4,686
1953	4,934
1954	5,120
1955	5,507

Is that increase due to our growing population, or to multiplicity of laws and the increasing ineffectiveness of their enforcement? If not to what is it due?

But honourable senators have not heard the whole story yet. The following table shows the number of young inmates, under 21, in penitentiaries:

1950	551
1951	520
1952	485
1953	564
1954	639
1955	694

Honourable senators, remember that these figures apply to inmates under 21 years of age. It is a matter of serious concern, because it is time it struck the conscience of the Canadian people. Here are youths of this tender age committed to federal penitentiaries, where it is inevitable that they will come into contact with hardened offenders. It must be a matter not only of concern, it must be a matter of great alarm. Something is seriously wrong somewhere. It is about time we started to examine our homes and our communities. On the face of it, there seems to be a lack of guidance and discipline in our homes. These youngsters are marked for life; many doors of opportunity are closed to them for ever and a day. There is a responsibility upon us to do something about these matters.

What I would indict more than our penal system is the thinking of the Canadian public on penology. Prisons are always at the bottom of the list when the tax dollar is divided. It is an axiom of history that a country gets the kind of institutions it deserves, and that applies to penal institutions as well as to any others. It seems plain that the people of Canada simply don't care, because if it were otherwise, this state of affairs would not be permitted to continue.

My own province of Ontario is quite secure in the belief that it is a peaceable, law-abiding province; and yet, if we compare our record of criminal convictions with that of Great Britain, we will certainly find no food for smugness. If you take a look at our famous Don jail in Toronto, you will see part of the reason why. They stack the prisoners up like cordwood. Most of our provincial jails are a disgrace to the nation. To enter them is punishment in itself.

I think the time has come for the people of this country to be shocked into an awareness of what is happening, because in very large measure they must share the responsibility for our failure to reduce the incidence of crime. For years—indeed for generations—the problems of penology have been buried behind the thick stone walls of our penitentiaries. It is more than time that we pulled them out into the sunlight and had a good look at them.

Today the emphasis in penology has completely shifted from repression to rehabilitation. Building more jails is not the solution to the problem of crime. The real answer lies in reforming convicted men and not in teaching them worse patterns of crime. The solution to the alarming increase in crime lies in many things: it starts in our homes, our churches and our communities. But from our point of view it is probation, parole, rehabilitation and after-care. Our criminal statistics prove beyond the shadow of a doubt that the lock-up and the strap will not work. The British example demonstrates just as conclusively that the Borstal system, the open prison and wide use of probation will work.

We need, first of all, a tremendous expansion of probation facilities. We need ten times as many probation officers, and we need them in every judicial division throughout the country. We need a Dominion Parole Board to deal with the whole complicated problem of the remission of prison sentences. We need to overhaul our constitutional responsibilities on prisons and reformatories. It is amazing how these constitutional problems evaporate when the dominion Government is prepared to pay a very considerable portion of the cost—as it should. The safety of society cannot be assured by putting all our trust in the maximum security of prisons.

Not so long ago, one practically needed a jail delivery to get a man out of prison. Today, the system, although somewhat improved, still needs a major overhaul. The following figures indicate some improvement in ticket of leave operations in the past four years:

Year	Released
1952	398
1953	410
1954	420
1955	515

But the surface has not yet been scratched. What has been done does not reach the root of the problem.

It is one thing to sentence a man to prison for breaking the law; it is another, and to date a very neglected thing, to consider and review from time to time the propriety and usefulness of a man's sentence. We need a better system of getting a man ready to return home after a prison sentence. We need to give more thought to reintegrating a man into the community from which he has been absent.

Parole has been in use since 1899. Our present parole system was legalized under the Ticket of Leave Act, 1927. During the 50-odd years of ticket of leave operations about 5 per cent of the persons released have relapsed into crime and been returned to prison. Parole has proved its worth from a humanitarian as well as an economic aspect. The total number of releases made on ticket of leave from the inception of the act, roughly 30 years ago, is about 40,000, which is nearly the same as the number on ticket of leave in Britain this year.

Our remission service consists of:

Parole Officers	Location
1	Vancouver
1	Montreal
8	Ottawa

The cardinal principle on which the service operates is no interference until the prisoner has served one-half his term, or two-thirds his term in the case of a crime of violence. We need a Dominion Parole Board or a Rehabilitation Board, composed of qualified men and women from outside government service who can add the citizens' viewpoint to that of the official view, which is the only one we have at the present time.

The present Solicitor General is considerate, co-operative and kindness itself, but he is tied by traditions and worn-out methods. We should have an automatic parole system so that a prisoner's case could be considered whether he applied for parole or not. Under the present system his case is not considered unless he or his friends apply and reapply to have it considered.

A genuine system of rehabilitation is society's best protection against the convicted offender; otherwise, we keep paying the piper.

I have some suggestions to make: First, I think, consideration should be given to instituting home leave, under which well-behaved prisoners would be granted leave at regular intervals, in the interest of marital relations, family life and discipline. Second, I think we should give consideration to instituting a system of rehabilitation leave, to be granted to deserving prisoners whose release is not too far in the future, and to be progressively increased as the time for release becomes imminent. The purpose of the leave would be to accustom the prisoner to normal home surroundings and to the community, and permit him to make necessary arrangements for earning a livelihood upon his final release.

Heretofore, a criminal has been a dead man as far as his worth to the country was concerned. The task ahead is to bring him back to life, to restore him to his full status in the community. The only alternative is to drive him deeper and still deeper into crime.

Honourable senators, the choice is ours to make. We can go on piling up the mistakes of the past and doubling our prison population every 10 years, as we have done in Ontario. We can go on spending nearly $2,000 a year per head to keep men in prison. If we were to tear down all of the jails and rebuild new ones it would not make much difference. It's the minds we need to change, and the choice is ours.

The difficulty is that back in our minds are catch phrases which we have learned in song and lore—such as, "Make the punishment fit the crime", when as a matter of fact in this day and age it is far more practical to "make the punishment fit the criminal". Prisoners are people not much different from you and me. No one is born a criminal. Some have just taken the wrong turn.

I think the time is overdue for a second volume of the Archambault Report. The first was a landmark in the penal history of our country. Crime and the incidence of crime is one of the most pressing problems on the horizon. We urgently need a Royal Commission on our penal system or, short of that, I think it would be an excellent thing for this Senate to undertake a thorough study of the penal system by a small committee who would devote themselves to that work. It might well take a year or more, but in the end they could face the Canadian public with a study that would give them an understanding of what is going on, so that they could take the proper remedial action.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Honourable senators, may I ask the honourable gentleman a question? Does he place the blame for the various conditions he has mentioned upon the laws of Canada or upon the practices of the various courts, from magistrates' courts up?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I have my views on that, but I would prefer to hear from some other honourable members before expressing them. May I say that there is enough blame for a little of it to be applied to a number of places, and there would still be some left over.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: I would like to ask the honourable senator if he has any figures on the number of prisoners in Great Britain placed on probation at the time they were sentenced, as well as the number that were committed to prison for a term and after a period liberated on probation.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I have not the figures with me at the moment, but I am sure that one of the honourable senators who follow me will look after that question.

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Fergusson, the debate was adjourned.

SIGNATURE LOAN COMPANY—COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to Bill H-5, an Act to incorporate Signature Loan Company.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the committee, moved that the amendments be concurred in.

He said: Honourable senators, perhaps I should explain that the one change the committee made in this bill was to alter the proposed name of the company from Signature Loan Company to Signature Loan and Finance Company. This is a company being organized for the purpose of making small loans and for some reason or other the almost invariable custom is that companies which make small loans are known as finance companies. On the other hand, the designation "loan company" is connected in the public mind very largely with organizations which lend and borrow money on mortgages. It was represented to us by the Superintendent of Insurance that it would make for clarity and avoidance of confusion if we changed the name of this company from Signature Loan Company, which was what the promoters proposed, to Signature Loan and Finance Company.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendments were concurred in.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Next sitting.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

EXCHEQUER COURT (DIVORCE JURISDICTION) BILL

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 28, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, seconded by Hon. Mrs. Hodges, for the second reading of Bill I-5, an Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Hon. Nancy Hodges: Honourable senators, in rising to second the motion for the second reading of Bill I-5, sponsored by the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), I wish to congratulate him on his excellent preparation and his lucid explanation, and also to echo his hope that we shall have an extended debate on this subject which will be so convincing that the majority of honourable senators will support the bill. The honourable senator from Rosetown explained the principles of the bill in such detail, and covered its ramifications, legal and otherwise, with such thoroughness that I have very little to add to his arguments, and shall, in consequence, be brief in my remarks.

I support the bill wholeheartedly because I think the time has come to focus attention again upon some of the anomalies—as they appear to a member of the Senate Divorce Committee—of the present method of handling divorces. As a member of that committee ever since my appointment to the Senate, in 1953, I have rarely missed a sitting, because while I dislike having to listen to the unsavoury serial of mismated matrimonial ventures, I feel that, having been appointed to the committee, it is my duty to accept the responsibilities which membership entails. But that does not make me appreciate the task any the more, or lessen the reluctance with which I listen to these sorry recitals of alleged marital infidelities.

Nor do I relish, honourable senators, the strictures which are often passed upon the Divorce Committee by critics who sit in their ivory towers and, without any personal knowledge of the proceedings or the "dramatis personae", castigate us for the way in which we function. Every now and again we hear echoes of an explosive criticism from the other place as to the validity of the decisions reached by the Senate Committee on Divorce; yet, when the bills, plus the evidence, are sent over there for consideration they are usually passed en masse without being read—except for an occasional "second look" if the bulkiness of the printed book of evidence suggests that the case is, shall I say, a little out of the ordinary.

To prove that point I quote from a news item which appeared in an Ottawa newspaper early last year respecting a debate on divorce in the Private Bills Committee of the House of Commons. I will not give any names, but one member is quoted as saying:

> Of 161 cases before us we see one and if we don't do some probing we are not fulfilling our duty.

Another member made the observation that it was:

> a public scandal the way Parliament rushed through divorce legislation.

Well, honourable senators, the press and the public read such pronouncements. Is it to be wondered at if they condemn, not only the Senate but the whole parliamentary institution for what is made to appear a flagrant laxity in handling divorce petitions that come to us from Quebec and Newfoundland? I maintain that this situation tends to bring our parliamentary processes into disrepute and to cast unwarranted reflections upon the integrity of the Senate and its Divorce Committee. As the honourable senator from Rosetown pointed out, the Divorce Committee gives far more time to the hearings of divorce petitions than any court of law does, and I suggest that some of the honourable senators and members of the other place who are not in accord with these views might find it very worth their time to sit in occasionally on the committee's hearings, and thus learn at first hand how it operates.

I mentioned the press, its castigations and its criticisms. I want to read part of an editorial which appeared in one of my home town newspapers, the Victoria Daily Colonist, in November 1954. As a matter of fact, it was complimenting the Senate on the admission of women as senators, and particularly of two women senators who are members of the Divorce Committee. Modesty forbids my reciting that part of it; I will just read this portion:

> . . . the system under which Parliament's upper house has to listen to all the sordid details of broken marriages in Quebec and Newfoundland is as wrong as wrong can be . . . Because these two provinces have no divorce courts and the marriage ties of their citizens can be severed only by act of Parliament, the Senate each year has to deal with hundreds of petitions for divorce, hear and examine all the evidence and pass upon a separate act of dissolution in each case—euphemistically entitled "an act for the relief of" the petitioner. Cynics may say that this gives the occupants of a moribund upper chamber something to do to earn their indemnities. Be that as it may, the loading of divorce petitions on to the Senate is an indignity to the senior legislative body of the nation and an imposition on the taxpayers of the eight provinces which maintain their own divorce courts.

That is all of this editorial that I am going to read, but I may say that it is representative of editorial opinion in a great many places in Canada.

The situation which I have just outlined for you is one of the reasons why I am supporting this bill, which seeks to take the whole machinery dealing with divorce petitions from Quebec and Newfoundland out of Parliament into the Exchequer Court at Ottawa. I want to reiterate, with all the force at my command, what the honourable senator from Rosetown has said, that this bill has nothing to do with the causes of divorce. It does not attempt in any way to broaden the basis on which divorces are granted, or to touch in any way that particular phase of the whole question.

Another reason why I am supporting Bill I-5 is that it offers a less expensive process for those who are seeking legal rescue from marriages which have already foundered on the rocks of imcompatibility.

May I digress for one moment to take issue with one comment made by the honourable senator from Rosetown? I think the fact that I criticize him in this one respect may make all the more valid my remarks in support of the bill. I quote from his speech as reported in Hansard, at page 200:

> I said that the procedure was cumbersome, and I think I have proved it. I think I can also prove that it is costly. When I first came to Ottawa I checked into the outlay for an ordinary undefended parliamentary divorce, and found that it was about $550. At the present time an ordinary undefended divorce action entails an expenditure of something in the neighbourhood of a thousand dollars . . . Contrast this with the average cost of a divorce action in, say, the province of Saskatchewan, where it very seldom exceeds $400.

What I am getting at is this,—

And this is what I want to emphasize, honourable senators.

. . . that only the wealthy people can obtain a divorce from Parliament; the poorer classes have practically no remedy. I believe that if this bill were adopted the cost of divorce to petitioners from Quebec and Newfoundland would be cut in half.

As any member of the Senate Divorce Committee knows, the majority of those plaintiffs who appear before us are anything but wealthy. They include seamstresses, working housekeepers, waitresses, labourers, clerks and others of similar vocations. That is why so many of them have to wait so long before taking steps to end their misfit marriages. The other day in the committee on which I served we had a poor woman, a seamstress, who waited twenty-odd years after her worthless husband left her for another woman, because she wanted to bring up her children to an age when they would not be hurt by such proceedings, and because it took her that long to save the necessary money.

Only this morning in the committee on which I was serving we had a woman petitioner who lives in Newfoundland. A charwoman who earns only $18 a week, she came all the way to Ottawa to have her divorce case heard because there is no opportunity for having it heard in her own province. Her husband deserted her in 1940, leaving her with one child to bring up. Paragraph 9 of her divorce petition reads as follows:

That any delay occasioned in bringing this petition for divorce was due solely to financial reasons and your petitioner's inability to defray the costs of said divorce proceedings since your petitioner has had to provide for the maintenance and education of her son.

Honourable senators, I think that will disprove what the honourable gentleman from Rosetown said with reference to the Senate divorce proceedings being only for the wealthy. They are not. The financial circumstances of many of the petitioners in the cases we hear are so far removed from wealth that the Senate committee frequently reduces the fees and, I understand, counsel in such cases are expected to reduce their fees commensurately.

However, I can agree with the honourable senator from Rosetown that divorce by way of the Senate is more costly than divorce by way of other divorce courts. As such it is discriminatory against a certain class of people. I think the honourable senator from Rosetown pointed out in his speech that the initial fee for a petitioner to the Senate is $210, except in those cases to which I have alluded. On top of that, counsel in the case can charge up to $1,500, and I hope my legal friends here will not be offended if I say I think counsel often charge what the traffic will bear. Then there is the cost of serving the petition, the bringing of witnesses—an especially heavy item for Newfoundland petitioners—and all the other steps which were fully explained by the sponsor of this bill.

On the other hand, in provinces which have divorce courts of their own a petitioner has comparatively easy access to the local court and thus is spared the heavy expense involved in bringing witnesses and carrying out such services as are contingent upon the processes under our present system in the Senate. In those provinces the petitioner is protected against the possibility of exorbitant fees being charged by lawyers, for any petitioner who feels that these charges are excessive can protest them to the taxing officer. That officer, in turn, if he feels that the charges in question are too high, can appeal to the judge and the judge will determine what they shall be. The Exchequer Court, which the bill proposes shall take over all divorce cases from Quebec and Newfoundland, works under the same rules of court as the divorce courts, and so can take care of such a situation.

Honourable senators, that is all I am going to say at this time on Bill I-5. I feel that the legal technicalities and other phases of this legislation will be dealt with by members who follow me. I have made the two points I wanted to make. I trust I have made some impression upon honourable senators who perhaps might not like to support the bill, and that they will feel it is their right, their privilege and their duty to support it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Farris, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

SIGNATURE LOAN COMPANY—THIRD READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden (for Hon. Mr. Howard) moved the third reading of Bill H-5, an Act to incorporate Signature Loan Company.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I had spoken to the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), who brought in this bill from the Banking and Commerce Committee, and he very kindly asked the house to hold the bill over until I had an opportunity to say a few words concerning it. This is a loan company bill, and those of us who saw the report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada for the year ended December 31, 1954, will no doubt have noted on page 6 the following words:

> In my report last year, I referred to the greatly increased interest being manifested in the small loans business in Canada by established lenders outside Canada, more particularly by those with head offices in the U.S.A. Several of these lenders entered the field during 1954 through provincially-incorporated subsidiary companies and the same trend has continued up to the date of this report (November 1, 1955).

In the New York Times issue of yesterday, March 5, the following report appeared under the heading "Brewing an Issue":

> A beer issue with an international flavour is coming to a head in Maryland.
>
> Six breweries in the state, reportedly after soft-sudsing a good many legislators, managed to push through a bill to bar a subsidiary of Canadian Breweries, Ltd., the Carling Brewing Company, from building a $12,000,000 brewery at Halethorpe.
> Canadian Embassy officials have lodged an informal protest over the bill, which could prove somewhat embarrassing during the coming talks between President Eisenhower and Canada's Prime Minister, Louis St. Laurent.
> Governor Theodore R. McKeldin, who made the Eisenhower nominating speech at the Republican convention in 1952, must decide whether to veto or sign the measure by April 6.

When the present bill was before the Banking and Commerce Committee I asked the Superintendent some questions, and as a result of his answers, and the answers to other questions, I felt this was an opportune time to make some observations, and more particularly with respect to a frame of mind in the state of Maryland.

Honourable senators, I realize that small loans companies fulfil a necessary role, although I am sure the members of this house will agree with me that the borrowers pay through the nose.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It is a lucrative business for the lenders. But it came as a distinct shock to me to learn that the field is controlled, dominated and owned, to the extent of 83 per cent of the existing business, by two foreign corporations. With the exception of a few qualifying shares there is no Canadian participation in the two large companies which control the 83 per cent of the loan business in Canada. It is a matter of record that these two large corporations had a profit last year of $4,800,000. It is very interesting to note that the secret of their success is advertising. In the year 1955 the corporations spent $1 million in advertising, mostly in newspapers, which turned out to be quite a drawing power for them.

I do not share the view that this sort of business can best be run by big corporations in monopolistic fashion. I am of the view that if we are going to have loaning companies, and they are a necessary evil, small lending institutions, preferably Canadian lending institutions, are best for all concerned. These foreign-owned lending corporations borrow our money, lend it to us and take the profits out of the country. They could at least have brought their own money with them. We in Canada welcome capital, and we are not concerned with the colour of the eyes or the tinge of the skin of the people who bring capital to this country, but if we are going to have heartless and soulless corporations I prefer them to be Canadian. We would prefer that the capital was invested in brick and mortar, but no matter how it is invested we want to participate, otherwise we feel uncomfortable. We reject the role of "hewers of wood and drawers of water". It is true that in this country we have created a climate that is conducive to investment capital, by our tax laws, freedom from government interference, and abundance of natural resources, but we also wish to profit in capital's happy hunting grounds. We want to be partners.

Our banks and financial institutions are held in high regard; there is trust and confidence and good will in them, which is shared by most Canadians. I think that the Canadian people had assumed that our financial institutions would not only do our banking and insurance, but would create other financial institutions to meet the needs of the times. So it is a surprise—it is more than that, it is a shock—to learn that they have not fully occupied the financial field and are only indirectly concerned with the small loans business. The banks and the insurance companies lend directly to the small loans companies, which in turn lend to the public. The Canadian Bank of Commerce, alone among Canadian banks, has for years attempted to fill the need in the small loans field. It may be that some other banks have recently gone into the business, but for a long time this bank was the only one that was seriously engaged in it. In the hearings before the Banking and Commerce Committee of the other house last year that bank was the only one which was participating.

In my opinion the financial institutions of this country owe an explanation to our people as to why this has happened. We well recall the opposition by the Canadian banks to the incorporation of the Mercantile Bank a few years ago. If I recall correctly—though I was not here at the time—they argued that there was no more room in the bed. The Government and Parliament seemed to feel differently, and a charter was granted.

In view of this situation with respect to the small loans field the time has come when we should ask ourselves: Where are the breed of men who built the finest banking system in the world? Where are the men who, with vigour, imagination and acumen, gave us so fine a banking system that it is the envy of the world? Have they become smug, secure and soft?

Canadians hold 75 per cent of all investments in this country, and the American people have $9 billion invested here. Canada needs additional foreign capital in order that she may develop, but only on condition that she is made a partner. About one-third of all investments in Canadian manufacturing is in companies controlled in the United States, and Canadian investors cannot invest in the Canadian subsidiaries. There is much concern in this country over the fact that we are being mortgaged to United States corporations which are beginning to control our economic future. I think the time has come to call a halt.

Once before in our life we fought off the invasion of capital, at that time from the United Kingdom. The present invasion is no more palatable. The virtual exclusion of Canadian participation in United States controlled operations in Canada is being resented. For the purpose of the record I wish to quote some views of other people. The first is that of Ralph Blackmore, Financial Editor of the Toronto Globe and Mail, who has been emphasizing to the Canadian public the problem that is bothering them, not of the large amount of United States capital flowing in here but of—and these are his words:

> . . . outside corporations operating subsidiaries in Canada without allowing Canadians to buy stock in the exclusively Canadian aspect of their operation.

Mr. Blackmore asks:

> Why large, non-Canadian corporations should operate in Canada, sell their products to Canadian consumers, enjoy the friendly-to-private enterprise climate of Canada, yet merely lump in their Canadian results with all the rest of their results and sell stock to the Canadian public only in the American firm.

Mr. Frank Kaplan of the Financial Post has this to say:

> Foreign companies with wholly owned Canadian subsidiaries would be well advised to consider paving the way for common stock participation by Canadians. Having Canadian shareholders would be an excellent answer to those critics of our system of free enterprise who say that foreign-owned business is milking Canada dry.

I have a quotation from Mr. Clarke, Vice-President of one of Canada's senior investment dealer firms, who pointed out recently in lectures in New York that of 4,253 firms which are branches or subsidiaries of foreign organizations operating in Canada, only 2 per cent have Canadians on their board of directors.

I quote further from Mr. Blackmore:

> . . . if outside corporations do business in any reasonable magnitude, they should permit Canadian participation in the Canadian end of the business. This is a mature economy, not a frontier. The era of Davey Crockett has also passed in Canada.

Dr. G. Edward Hall, President of the University of Western Ontario, speaking in Boston to the Boston conference on distribution, on October 17 last, said:

> One so-called Canadian company sold, in one year, more than $210 million worth of goods to the Canadian public. Over 99 per cent of the stock of that company is owned by the parent company in the United States. The profits from this fairly substantial operation are simply lumped in with the profits of the total sales of the parent company. And Canadians, in order to participate in this company, are forced to purchase stock of the parent company in which they may have no specific interest. Another large and respected subsidiary operating in Canada for many years and completely owned and controlled by the parent U.S. company does not even release Canadian sales figures.

Dr. Hall makes this further comment:

> Two-thirds of all motor vehicles sold to Canadians last year were produced by companies operating in Canada without Canadian stock. The profits, again, are lumped in with the profits of their giant U.S. parent companies. The dividends paid by the parent company do not reflect Canadian sales nor the position of that company in the Canadian economy.

I quote Dr. Hall still further:

> Canada produces 90 per cent of the world's supply of a certain mineral, yet where is the effective head office of that industry's largest company, whose mines are manned by Canadians, whose furnaces are operated by Canadians, and whose profits are made in Canada? Not in Canada, but in one of the cities of the United States. And the Canadian stockholders are paid, not in Canadian dollars, but in U.S. funds!

Honourable senators, I don't suggest control legislation against foreign companies operating in Canada. At the moment I am not sure that I have the answer, but it is time Canadians were aware of what is happening and, even more important, that foreign corporations are aware that we are aware and intend to do something about it all.

Economic colonization is the only term that fits this present foreign capital invasion. It has been a long fight to attain political emancipation, and it appears now that our great need is for economic and fiscal emancipation. The state of affairs which I have brought to the attention of the Senate—and I do not do it for the purpose of preventing the passage of this bill—should not be permitted. This is the chamber of second thought: I implore honourable senators to give this matter not only second thought, but kind thought.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, the remarks of the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) are timely, and I feel that he should be congratulated on making them. Of course a great deal of the condition that he described is probably in a large measure due to the attitude of the Canadian banks themselves. The honourable senator's remarks reminded me of an experience I had with the Canadian Bank of Commerce shortly after it entered the small loan field. I had endorsed a number of notes on which I had to pay up; the bank had not been successful in collecting those particular loans. It had been running advertisements in the newspapers in connection with the small loan plan, saying "All you have to do is to bring your neighbour in to endorse your note". Now, the head of the bank in that province told me that I should not have signed those notes. And having with me the newspaper containing the advertisement I confronted him with it and said, "Of course you are an institution and you have no neighbours, but I do have neighbours, and by this advertisement you have placed me in a difficult position."

However, I do believe that the banks are largely to blame for the lack of ability and training in the matter of making and collecting a loan. That is an important field. When I endorsed the notes that I spoke about a minute ago, I found that that meant something, but if the bank had made the efforts it should have made it might have collected the money direct from the borrowers. A discussion of this kind might point up the matter and make the banks more conscious of what they can do in this field.

I was one of the two senators who opposed the granting of a charter to the Mercantile Bank. I thought that we had a sufficient number of banks in Canada and I still think so. I further think that the banks should put themselves in a position to make these small loans, these 2-per-cent-a-month loans that we hear so much about. I see no reason at all why the banks could not go into this field in a larger way, and the present debate may encourage them to enter into that business. Of course, they might have to pay a little more attention to collection. I think it is a very good experience for a young man to do business with a bank. I remember my first loan, and the question that came up as to the renewal of the note. The manager wanted me to sign a note for three months and then renew it. I protested that I would not be able to pay it within three months because I would not be able to sell anything within that time, and therefore would not have any money to pay. After some argument I finally had it my way and the notes were made for a longer time. I eventually paid when I got the money to pay.

It seems strange to me, honourable senators, that the banks, whose very business it is to take in money on deposit and to lend it out, are not more inclined to make loans for periods of perhaps a year or longer.

I think it is a wholesome experience to go into a bank and talk with the manager, and I repeat that especially is it a good experience for a young man. And in my opinion that is where he should go if he wants to borrow money, instead of to—I do not like to use the term—loan sharks, who will make him pay 2 or 3 per cent a month and take a mortgage on his goods. A lot of people who borrow from the small loan companies should really be going to our banks, where they would receive good treatment and be charged only a fair rate of interest.

My chief purpose in speaking, honourable senators, was to congratulate the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina upon his remarks.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: If the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I would like to point out that the honourable senator did not speak on opening the debate, and as the motion is for third reading I do not think he is entitled to reply.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Is His Honour the Speaker prepared to make a decision on that?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: This is on third reading.

The Hon. the Speaker: I do not know what the difference is, in principle.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Let us have a ruling.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, as far as I am concerned, I would like to hear more often from the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden). However, he moved third reading and that, I think, precludes him from entering this debate, and when he does speak he closes it.

The Hon. the Speaker: That would be my impression.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: On second reading the mover has the right of reply, but on third reading there is no reply. Sometimes the mover of the third reading is allowed to speak later on, but he certainly does not close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Is he allowed to reply?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, he is not allowed to reply except with the unanimous consent of the house.

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable senator has not spoken. He has the right to speak.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, before this bill is disposed of I should like to make a few comments upon it, and to deal with one or two matters raised by our colleague from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll).

I take it from the discussion that the company which the bill would incorporate would be one of these companies organized to make what are known as small loans, with almost the sky as the limit as to the rates of interest they may charge.

I do think, and here I agree heartily with the senator from Toronto-Spadina, that it is desirable in the public interest now, if it has not been heretofore, that some thought and study should be given to greater control over the operation of these companies. I have listened almost every evening in the news broadcasts of one of the radio stations at Winnipeg to propaganda by one of these companies, and it is very skilful and clever propaganda. Now, the oddities of human nature are such that some individual desiring temporary financial assistance for one purpose or another, after listening to such propaganda or sales talk—perhaps that is a more dignified term to use—will go to a small loans company for the accommodation he desires, when he might be able to get it from a bank. He does so because, curiously, in his subconsciousness, like that of many Canadians who are unaccustomed to dealing with banks, there lurks some reluctance to go—even fear of going—to a bank. Of course, banking institutions have greatly changed their methods in the last 60 years. There was a feeling half a century or so ago that one should, so to speak, almost take off one's shoes before entering a bank manager's office; and although that state of mind has disappeared, the fact remains that many people still prefer to seek assistance from loan companies and, as the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina strikingly put it, they certainly "pay through the nose" for what they get.

Personally, I favour a further examination of this loan system, and the devising, if possible, of some controls which would protect those thoroughly good and honest people who seek recourse to the small loan companies, and in the end, of course, pay their charges, or those companies could not remain in existence and earn the profits they do. It is certainly a bit harsh on the individual who seeks, maybe, no more than a few hundred dollars to provide for some temporary need, that he must pay 14, 16, 18, even 20 per cent for the accommodation. In seeking to establish some further control in this matter, we are not doing anything new or strange. Over at least the past 75 years the history of this country abounds with illustrations of the power and will of Parliament to exercise control. As an example I might cite the railways. I can recall, even during my young years, when the railroads operated practically without control. As a result, unquestionably, abuses developed. There seems to be something inherent in monopoly, in an absolute control of commerce and even of government, which develops weaknesses and leads eventually to tyranny in one form or another. The same thing happened in connection with the banks. It was strikingly evident in connection with the grain trade, with whose activities I am more familiar. I can recall when the grain business was wholly unregulated, and fraud after fraud was perpetrated on innocent people.

To cope with these conditions, legislation was passed. The restrictions so provided have not interfered one iota with honest and legitimate conduct of the business, but they do prevent the practice of fraud and deceit on innocent people.

Where I differ from my honourable friend from Toronto-Spadina is in what seems to me his confusion of two dissimilar things. To deal with abuses in connection with loan companies is laudable and right. But to argue that we are in danger of United States economic domination because some company which does business in Canada has its head office in New York—I suppose my honourable friend had in mind the International Nickel Company—seems rather far-fetched. Of course American capital has come into Canada. It has come in large amounts and we have welcomed it. The question we have to ask is, has it been useful to us, or a detriment? Inevitably, I think, the answer must be that it has benefited us, nationally. We can take an illustration from the economic history of the United States itself. A century ago its domestic capital was entirely inadequate to provide for the vast expansion of that immense country; and it is a well-known fact that American railroads, business, banking, insurance companies and other enterprises were frequently controlled, not in the country itself, but in Great Britain and elsewhere in Europe. The passage of time, with the changes which necessarily accompany it, cured that condition; and I am confident that the course of Canadian development will be very much the same.

We must not forget that many important Canadian concerns are doing business in the United States. If a personal reference may be pardoned, I might mention that I am a director of an insurance company, a very large part of whose business is done south of the border. Moneys are loaned there, profits are earned there, but the head office is in Canada, and all the directors are Canadians.

There is no question that from time to time there crops up in this country a tendency to anti-American prejudice. In my judgment it is very foolish indeed, and I will tell you why. Canada, a country of almost 16 million people, is one of the world's richest storehouses of natural resources. It would be well if, by a more vigorous immigration policy, we could bring greater numbers of people to Canada. Certainly, the wealth is here and available for development. Alongside us for a distance of 3,000 miles is another people, a great people who speak the same language as most of us do and whose institutions basically are similar to our own. That country today has 166 million people; at the present rate of progress its population in 1975 will probably exceed 220 millions; and within the life of some of the younger senators here present its members will be increased to probably 250 millions. Are these facts not of some significance to the future of our country? If one thinks only of material considerations, can we fail to be struck with the tremendous potentialities of a market of that size? Honourable senators, there is no greater need than that the people of Canada and the people of the United States remain in the most friendly relationship possible. That is above all essential for Canadians.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Not only is it essential for matters of defence in the uncertain world in which we live, but it is particularly essential for the ordinary simple prosperity of Canadians in the future. As far as I am concerned I am unalterably against anything that would raise prejudices against our neighbour. Heaven knows there is enough evil prejudice in the world today. The American people, notwithstanding what some may consider their inconsistencies in international affairs, are a great people.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: They have a wonderful future, and my hope as a Canadian who is nearing the sunset period of life is that the fine relationships between these two countries will expand and develop. It is not that I ever want to see Canada absorbed by the United States. There was a danger of that at one time, but that danger, I think, has wholly passed. I do not believe the United States wants to absorb Canada. We can be very friendly nations, co-operating in a world that is full of strife and trouble, but we can never fully do that if we are going to indulge in pin pricks, in criticism of our neighbour and in expressing fears of economic domination by it. I think that is a very foolish course to follow.

Honourable senators, I apologize for having taken up your time. When I came into this chamber this afternoon I had not the remotest idea that I was going to address these remarks to you, but I feel very strongly about this matter.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with respect to the question which was raised a moment ago, a perusal of Rules 36 and 37 would seem to indicate that a senator who makes a substantive motion has the right to reply, and that in all cases, under Rule 37, the reply of the mover of the original question closes the debate. It is the duty of the Speaker to see that every senator wishing to speak has the opportunity to do so before the final reply.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not question the ruling of His Honour the Speaker, but I wish to point out that the motion for third reading is never considered a substantive motion.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The rule says "in all cases".

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: On substantive motions.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Oh, no.

The Hon. the Speaker: Rule 37 reads:

> In all cases, the reply of the mover of the original question closes the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If it is a substantive motion. May I respectfully submit that if there is not a substantive motion there is no right of reply.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Is it not a fact that the rules can be suspended by His Honour the Speaker with the unanimous approval of the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I think the ruling should be maintained. I am glad it has been made, for it confirms what was always my understanding.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Honourable senators, before third reading is given to this bill I should like to have it very clear in my mind whether the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) has any particular objection to the passing of this bill or whether he was just speaking generally against small loan companies. It seems to me that if any of us have any objection to the passing of this particular bill, the place to voice that objection would be in committee.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, I thought I made it fairly clear when I spoke that I did not intend to oppose this bill. I am sorry the honourable senator from Kingston did not hear me. When the honourable gentleman says that the place to oppose the bill is in committee, I think he knows full well that the information available in committee is sometimes not the fullest that can be obtained. The opportunities for discussion in committee, though not limited, are not as good as in this house. Here honourable senators may speak on the third reading of a bill and cover a subject in detail. At any rate, I always reserve the right, as I think all members do, to oppose a bill in the house whether or not I have previously voted for it in committee, for some new facts may come to my attention that will cause me to change my mind. I voted for this bill in committee, although I was one of the minority who voted for the name "Signature Finance Company". This afternoon I used the present bill as a vehicle to bring to the attention of the house the domination of our economic life by foreign capital without our participation. That was my point, and I leave it for the consideration of honourable senators.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, as I happen to have been Acting Chairman of the committee which considered this bill, I can perhaps enlighten the mind of the honourable gentleman from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies). The bill was passed unanimously by the committee with one amendment, which I explained a day or two ago, changing the name from that originally proposed—Signature Loan Company—to that of Signature Loan and Finance Company. This is quite a simple bill to incorporate a new small loans company subject to the provisions of the Small Loans Act. But the discussion which has taken place this afternoon and the questions which have been raised by the honourable senators who have spoken point to the keen interest that is taken in this house, and indeed throughout the country, on the subject of small loans companies.

If I recall rightly, the Speech from the Throne announced that government legislation would be introduced during the course of the present session to amend the Small Loans Act. When that legislation comes to us we shall have an opportunity—and indeed it will be our duty—to go thoroughly into the whole question of small loans and the place which small loans companies occupy in our financial system and in meeting financial needs of the people of Canada.

I must confess I have no special knowledge of this particular field, but I do think it is clear that only a year or two ago these small loans companies were providing certain people with a service that was necessary and which no other lending organizations provided. I refer to people who need modest loans to help them in unusual circumstances, probably of very great urgency. We were told this afternoon that the banks could fill that need. Well, maybe they can, but they did not make any attempt to do so until perhaps the last year or two, and there has been a very strong demand by people of modest means for small loans. Now, in the circumstances under which those loans are made—loans of $100, $200, and $400, secured upon furniture, assignments of wages, and so forth, where the payments are made monthly—I think it is quite easy to see that the cost of making such loans must be very considerable.

In 1939 Parliament passed the Small Loans Act, to regulate companies making small loans, and it set a limit of 2 per cent a month as the cost of such loans. Two per cent a month does sound like a very large interest rate, but the question was gone into to a considerable extent at that time, and I think it was felt that that maximum charge was justified because of the heavy cost of collecting these small loans. The new legislation which will come before us later in this session will open that whole question again.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: May I ask a question of the honourable senator, for information?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Am I not right in saying that the banks are not permitted to charge anything like 2 per cent a month? Are they not restricted as to the rate they charge?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Is that not the answer to the question?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Yes; and until a year or two ago the banks could not take the same kind of security as small loans companies could. The Bank Act was changed last year, and it was not until then that the banks could take the same kind of security which the small loans companies could.

I want to point out to the house that these small loans companies do fill a need. The alternative to the small loans companies is the little "hole and corner" individual who lends money without any control whatever, and at any rate he chooses. He is the man with whom I have no sympathy at all. I have not much sympathy with these small loans companies, but I do say that they are lending under the control of the Superintendent of Insurance, and at rates whose maximum is fixed by Parliament. These companies are ever so much better for the small fellow who wants a temporary loan than the private money lender around the corner who demands the highest interest rates he can get.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Did not Mr. MacGregor, the Superintendent of Insurance, say that some of the companies were charging 2¼ per cent per month, although you claim there is a regulation against that?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is in the unregulated field.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: The present Small Loan Act applies to $500 or less.

Hon. Mr. Horner: But what about amounts over $500?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I understand that one of the features of the new legislation which will come to us later is that the limit of $500 is likely to be increased. This is a vital matter for a great number of people in this country. Although it has been raised by a private bill, it is perhaps well for us in the Senate to take a preliminary look at the problem with which we shall be faced later on in the session.

With regard to the complaint of my honourable friend from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) about the source from which these small loans companies derive their funds, I I must say that I have not much sympathy with his point of view. It so happens that these small loans organizations were developed in the United States. I understand they are highly specialized organizations. What has happened is that the companies which do this kind of business in the United States have formed Canadian subsidiaries and, as my honourable friend said, there is very little Canadian interest by way of shareholding in the companies. To my mind that does not make much difference. I am much more interested in their being properly controlled than I am in the source of the capital. I do not really mind whether the money for small loans which is available for people in difficult circumstances in this country comes from Canada or from the United States. My honourable friend talked about heartless corporations. Well, I do not think it matters very much whether a heartless corporation derives its money from the United States or from Canada, provided it is doing a good service to the people of this country and is properly regulated by Parliament in those spheres of activity where regulation is necessary.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, there is one point I would like to make. The senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) has expressed a lack of sympathy with individual lenders—the small loans institutions that are not incorporated and perhaps do not come under the control of the act. I would like to say a word for some of them that I know. In the riding that I represented in the House of Commons for a considerable length of time, and also in the Ontario Legislature, there were small loans societies.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Mutual societies?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Well, I do not know if you would call them mutual. The officers consisted merely of a president and a secretary, who carried a little black book in his pocket. The type of lender I am speaking of raised money from a certain class and lent money to people who needed it, at very low rates of interest. What used to amaze me was the facility with which the lenders collected the money that had been loaned. The loans were made without security, merely upon the honour of the borrower, and it was simply amazing how much of it was repaid, how very few the losses were and of small amounts. The number of such societies in that district was remarkable. They operated with a lack of bookkeeping, lack of supervision, and lack of everything that most businesses seem to need, except the good will and honour which existed between borrower and lender. This impressed me deeply, and I have a great deal of sympathy for these people.

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, I have a few words to say, not against the bill, because as we say in French, C'est un mal nécessaire.

A few months ago I was visited in my office by the president of one of the biggest small loans companies who asked me if I thought it advisable for him to come to Ottawa to seek an amendment permitting an increase in the interest rate on small loans from 2 to 3 per cent per month. I replied: "Come if you wish, but twenty years ago I fought against an increase to 3 per cent. I hope the Government will see fit to reduce the rate from its present 2 per cent."

The basis on which these small loans organizations operate is to abuse the poor people. Do honourable senators know that 80 per cent of the people in the low-income group borrow from small loans companies because of not being able to pay cash for purchases, and that on borrowings of $500 or less they are obliged to pay 2 per cent per month? These unfortunate people may pay back as much as $200 or $300, and then find they can pay no more. The company then sends the account to a lawyer who adds one per cent for collection, plus $10 for writing a letter. In the end the poor borrower is paying more than 3 per cent for the money. Only yesterday I talked to a man in my own city of Levis, who was attempting to get some food, clothes and fuel. After investigating his case I visited his home, where I found that he is obliged to pay on instalment plans a total of some $160 per month. This man, who has a wife and three children, receives a total of $225 per month, and they cannot live on the remaining $65. It is a most unfortunate situation.

Yet every day and every night we hear on our radios and read in the newspapers advertisements which appeal to people to buy television sets, radios and this and that, with no money down, only $3 or $4 per week, plus 2 per cent interest. And, unfortunately, after that the borrowers may be faced with an additional one per cent for collection charges and a lawyer's bill of $10.

I am happy that the Government is proposing legislation to prevent the abuse of poor people in the small loans field. A bill scheduled for our attention later this session contains this proposal:

(2) The cost of a loan shall not exceed the aggregate of

(a) two per cent per month on any part of the unpaid principal balance not exceeding three hundred dollars,

(b) one per cent per month on any part of the unpaid principal balance exceeding three hundred dollars but not exceeding one thousands dollars, and

(c) one-half of one per cent per month on any remainder of the unpaid principal balance exceeding one thousand dollars.

(3) Where a loan of five hundred dollars or less is made for a period greater than fifteen months or where a loan exceeding five hundred dollars is made for a period greater than thirty months, the cost of the loan shall not exceed one per cent per month on the unpaid principal balance thereof.

Unfortunately, the poorer people cannot borrow from the banks because of not having the necessary collateral. But what do the small loans organizations take by way of security? They no longer take a lien on a television set or other appliance, but require a personal guarantee from the purchaser. This means that in the settlement of their account they can take his house and everything he has.

This is a bad situation, honourable senators, and I hope something can be done about it.

(Translation):

As we say, it is a necessary evil, but let us try to minimize it as much as possible.

(Text):

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the speech by the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) will conclude the debate.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I was not the sponsor of this bill and in the ordinary course, after moving third reading, I would have made no comment on it. But some things have been said, ranging from the remarks of my honourable friend the senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll), who used the bill as a hinge on which to swing his general condemnation of U.S. funds coming into Canada, to the condemnation expressed by my friend the senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) of the administration of small loans, and the suggestion that there should be greater control and regulation of the small loan companies.

May I state my position at the outset. I agree in part with what the honourable senator from Churchill has said; certainly, I agree entirely with what he said in relation to the need for and the value and virtue of attracting United States capital to Canada.

Let me deal first with the bill and the governing act, the Small Loans Act. That act was reviewed in, I think, 1938 or 1939, and if greater regulation, inspection and supervision were needed, and if lower rates were advisable, my friend from Churchill was then in a position to voice his opinions, and no doubt he would have been listened to.

But since 1938 small loans companies have been regulated under the Small Loans Act by the Superintendent of Insurance. Honourable senators know the present Superintendent of Insurance and knew his predecessors in office: they have exercised, I would say, a most wholesome restraint, and have investigated carefully the operations of small loans companies in Canada to see to it that they do not exceed the authority permitted under the statute. I repeat, if anything more was needed the senator from Churchill once had a great opportunity to express his views. He had a second chance when this present bill was given second reading here, and a third chance when the bill was in committee. And now on the motion for third reading we hear for the first time his opinion that there should be greater control. However, perhaps it is better to repent late than never. There will be still further opportunity to discuss this matter during the present session when the Small Loans Bill comes before us, as I expect it will, at which time my friend can gather together his ideas of what the bill should provide to assure greater regulation and inspection in the operations of small loan companies.

Having said that, the only other remark I wish to make in connection with the operation of small loans companies is that at present there is nothing to prevent banks from operating in that field. I presume they choose to lend to the loan companies instead of directly to the public, because they find it the more profitable way to carry on their banking business. But there is no embargo on banks or any individual which prevents them from going into the small loans business in Canada, provided they conform with the statutory requirements. That being so, why we should be critical because substantial interests from the United States come into Canada and occupy that field, is very difficult for me to understand. The field is open for all those who have the ability, the know-how, the courage and the financial resources to occupy it. Because some American companies operating in this field have the experience, saw the opportunity and have taken advantage of it, that should not be the ground for criticism and condemnation of the whole small loans business.

I hasten to add that in making these remarks I am not speaking on behalf or in support of any company engaged in the small loans business. What I am saying sounds like good common sense to me, and that is why I am saying it.

I come now to the larger question which prompted my speaking at this time. When my friend the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina indulged in his general condemnation of United States capital coming into Canada, it was a little more than I could stand. But the last straw was his quotation of financial writers who have been carrying on this campaign for some time and who drape themselves nobly in the Union Jack or the Canadian Ensign, or perhaps both, and from a lofty and patriotically inspired position condemn the invasion of American capital solely because Canadians cannot invest in the common stock of some subsidiaries of American companies operating in Canada. Now, is that such a terrible situation?

Do those writers realize that the American parent companies of the Canadian subsidiaries are public companies, and that there is no embargo against Canadian money being invested in a parent company? By such investment Canadians would take an interest in the larger operation and not just in one phase of it. But apparently there is something sacrosanct in being able to invest your money in the shares of a Canadian subsidiary. Well, the strange thing that strikes me is this, that when there is a problem in Canada that requires financing and a lot of financing, and it is a matter that involves some risk, where risk capital is required, we do not find so much clamour for Canadian participation, and the net result is that the underwriters in many of those cases take their issues or part of them to the American market, which is a larger market, where they can get this risk capital. There is no demand by these financial writers for opportunity to invest in something that has not turned out to be pretty good. They do not want any part of anything that has not been very successful. What they want on behalf of the Canadian people is the right to be able to buy some of the common shares of a very successful subsidiary operation of an American company in Canada.

Did my honourable friend ever stop to consider that the Canadian subsidiary of an American company hires Canadians, buys materials made in Canada, pays wages and salaries and thus provides very substantial purchasing power in Canada, pays Canadian taxes upon the income earned in Canada, pays sales taxes, municipal taxes, and contributes to welfare organizations of our country, just as Canadian enterprises do? The real crime, apparently, is that at the end, after the company pays out of its gross income all these expenses, which might represent anything up to 80 or 85 per cent of its earnings in Canada, there is a dividend, in which Canadians do not participate.

But even when the American investor takes out a dividend he pays a tax on it.

Honourable senators, I listened to a debate here recently on the subject of wheat. In this field it seems that the real problem arises from lack of exports, because, as some honourable members pointed out, a number of countries by various methods of subsidies and otherwise are making it difficult for us to move our wheat into their markets. Now, our economic life blood depends upon our being able to export a great portion of the products we produce in such abundance. However, the financial writers say, "But we must not permit the export of Canadian dividends to any American shareholder if the shareholder is a parent company". I presume it would be all right for an American individual to own shares in a Canadian company so long as he did not have 51 per cent of the shares and therefore control of the operation. I personally cannot draw that line of distinction or demarcation. We invite American capital into Canada. We make use of it. Our Canadian life insurance companies are operating in a substantial way in the United States and elsewhere in the world, and they bring home to Canada profits which swell their income. To the financial writers that is all right, because that is working in reverse. That attitude is a pharisaical attitude, in my book, and I think it is designed for the purpose of stirring up a narrow nationalistic spirit, possibly trying to re-enact the 1812 situation or some other such thing that is ancient history, past and gone for all time.

I have been reading the writings of these financial writers and I have been listening to this kind of economic nonsense. Canada has grown up and can protect herself in so far as investment of foreign capital is concerned; but we have not yet reached the position where we can afford to go our own way, where we can put an embargo on capital coming into Canada and say to prospective investors, "Unless you are prepared to operate 100 per cent in the manner in which we dictate we are not going to permit your money to come into Canada". If that had been the attitude of this country in the past Canada would not be in the proud position she is in today.

We have gathered valuable manufacturing know-how from American manufacturers with plants in Canada. We have gathered financial assistance from our neighbours to the south when we needed it. We are more and more attaining to a position in underwritings and financings where Canadians are carrying a larger share of those operations, but we are not at the stage where we can turn to our American friends and say: "Thank you for what you have done in the past. Now will you please get out of the country, for we do not need you any longer". Honourable senators, that would be a false and unrealistic viewpoint. I could not permit its being advocated in the Senate without at least raising my voice to indicate that there is not unanimity of opinion in support of it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

ADDRESS

of

HIS EXCELLENCY GIOVANNI GRONCHI

President of the Republic of Italy

to

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE GENERAL PUBLIC in the

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

on

MONDAY, MARCH 5, 1956

2.30 P.M.

His Excellency Giovanni Gronchi was introduced by the Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Wishart McL. Robertson, Speaker of the Senate, and the Honourable L. René Beaudoin, Speaker of the House of Commons.

(Translation):

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister of Canada): Mr. President, on behalf of the members of our Parliament and of the whole Canadian nation, I have the honour to welcome you most cordially in this house and to express to you personally and to the country which you represent our regards and our feelings of respectful and confident friendship.

We are glad to extend also our most cordial welcome to Mrs. Gronchi, whose presence adds to the charm of your visit. May this visit, short as it is, be as pleasant to you as useful to the good relations between our two countries.

(Text):

Mr. President, in welcoming you today to this chamber we wish to express our pleasure at this symbolic evidence of the renewal and of the strengthening of the bonds of friendship and of understanding between our two peoples which have grown steadily and surely over these last ten years.

In presenting you to this joint meeting of the members of the Canadian Parliament, I am introducing to my colleagues and friends a staunch Italian patriot and a European statesman who for close to fifty years has worked consistently and courageously for three great objectives—freedom, parliamentary democracy and a society based on Christian principles. As a very young man, when he took an important part in the activities of the new Christian Democratic movement, and in the first world war and afterwards, he served those objectives and his nation with outstanding devotion.

During the difficult years of the Second World War, President Gronchi, working with the resistance, became one of the leaders for the strengthening of freedom in Italy, and later, in company with the late Alcide de Gasperi, he served on the central committee of the national liberation front. No newcomer to parliamentary life, he was Minister for Industry, Commerce and Labour in post-war Italian Governments, and he was Speaker of the Chamber of Deputies for almost seven years before his election as President of the republic in April of last year.

(Translation):

In greeting Mr. Gronchi we pay tribute to the representative of a country from which has come to us so much of what makes up the richness of our western civilization. We greet also in his person an able and ardent defender of the unity of the western nations. We admire the part he has played in bringing about Italy's decision to participate in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the Western European Union.

We derive a great deal of satisfaction from our association with Italy in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and, within the last few weeks, in the United Nations, this vast organization which remains the basis of the hopes and peaceful aspirations of so many millions of men and women throughout the world.

We Canadians are convinced that the accession of Italy to the rank of member of the United Nations marks a step toward better understanding between nations, more encouraging prospects of a peaceful solution of differences and consequently toward a reduction of the hazards confronting the peoples of the earth.

It is, therefore, with great pleasure, Mr. President, that we welcome you on behalf of the Parliament of Canada and that we acknowledge on this occasion the return of your country to the place which is rightly hers in the councils of the nations.

(Text):

I now invite the President of the Republic of Italy to address us.

His Excellency Giovanni Gronchi (President of the Republic of Italy): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, members of the Senate and of the House of Commons, Mr. Prime Minister:

(Translation):

I must, first of all, thank you for your invitation, which, beyond the scope of mere formality, has brought me to this honoured parliamentary rostrum. I am particularly sensitive to this honour because, as many of you certainly know, I was for eight years Speaker of the Chamber of Deputies. I need not add that when I can speak directly to freely elected representatives of popular will, I find myself on familiar ground in spontaneous and common agreement on the method of approach to various problems; all the more so in your Parliament which, by tradition and habit, can really be said to be one of the most noble expressions and at the same time one of the strongest bulwarks of democratic freedom.

I also consider it a fortunate privilege for me to speak on this occasion as First Magistrate of my country: in this way, for the first time in history the voice of Italy, through this assembly, can make itself heard by the people of Canada. I would like to take advantage of this singular privilege to bring you a warm greeting from the Italian nation, whom I have the honour to represent in its national unity.

It is the greeting of a friendly and allied people for whom all physical distances that separate them from you seem to disappear in the atmosphere of common ideals and harmony of interests between our two countries.

These ideals and interests, which have their deep roots in the same heritage of civilization and tradition and democratic way of life, find their ultimate expression in the manifestations of present-day relations between Italy and Canada.

The most important of these manifestations is represented by a continuing solidarity of effort which the two countries carry on, ideologically and materially, within the framework of the Atlantic community.

This solidarity is perhaps the closest existing among members of the pact which unites so many countries of the west, from Europe to this continent, because the interpretation which Italy and Canada give to the general principles of NATO does not reduce its significance to a mere diplomatic instrument or to an exclusively military alliance, but extends it, in full agreement, to all other requirements suggested by the new course of international events.

Such an interpretation does not require statutory or other innovations, since already in the original context of the Treaty it was not by chance that article 2—which today is so often referred to—was inserted, largely through Canadian prompting, wherein it is said that:

> The parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

As a logical consequence the treaty between free peoples must be rendered always more capable of expressing not only the language of force, but also that of truth and of right. As your Secretary of State for External Affairs said, in a speech that should not be forgotten, a military alliance, by achieving balance of power, is not sufficient to establish permanent peace, but can only create the conditions under which this peace can be maintained and protected by an accepted equality of rights.

In fact, the solidarity between our two countries does not end in military and in material assistance: it is manifested and strengthened daily in numerous other fields such as politics, diplomacy, economy, cultural and social life. I would like to recall that in this city, in September of 1951, in one of the rooms of this very building, Italian and Canadian representatives found themselves in firm agreement on the desirability that relations between Atlantic Pact countries should depend not only on their alliance, but rather on their membership in a real community and that all member countries should be expected to give this reality the utmost consideration.

Since that time the Italian and Canadian Governments, striving side by side in a common endeavour, have been in the forefront in upholding this necessity. The traditional universalism of Italian history and thought, and the ideological and political forces which have created from two different peoples and two histories the powerful unity of your country, have found common expression and a happy communion.

It is our conviction that the era in which we live demands solidarity among peoples, because one nation cannot live and cannot develop independently of other nations or without continuous and reciprocal exchange in which each gives and receives according to its capacities and its needs. The evils from which our era suffers derive from the fact that not all men have completely understood the essence of this truth. Human solidarity, that has achieved such extraordinary progress in the field of individual society, has not succeeded as yet in achieving universal and international solidarity.

On their part the democratic countries of the west have long since recognized that the way of international solidarity is the only path to follow in order to safeguard liberty and, with liberty, the possibility of civil and social progress for all peoples. The Atlantic Treaty has, from this point of view, something that is unique: never before has such an imposing array of nations, so diversified in their resources yet so uniform in their ideals, merged their energies not to fight and win a war but to ensure the victory of peace over war.

And it is by virtue and in the implementation of this agreement that western democracies have now trodden paths which our fathers not too long ago would have considered hopeless illusions. But what has been done up to now is not sufficient. It is necessary that all nations—our own above all others—understand this reality: that with solidarity there can be universal progress and welfare—without it there can be nothing but the prospect of destruction and misery.

My country is firmly resolved to continue to give its utmost to the efforts being made toward the strengthening of solidarity between democratic countries. We are convinced that they constitute the best contribution which can be made in the present circumstances for the maintenance of peace in the world, and that they represent the indispensable premise toward the establishment of a greater feeling of trust among all people.

In this spirit we were gratified at the recent decision which solved the deadlock on the question of new admissions to the United Nations, and which has, among other things, corrected the absurd exclusion of Italy from an organization for which she had all the necessary moral, juridical and political qualifications. That these qualifications are well founded, no evidence could be more eloquent than the proof of democratic maturity furnished a few days ago—thanks to the patient and broadminded exertions of Italian trusteeship authorities—by Somali populations who, in conformity with the United Nations Charter, have been able to establish in free and orderly manner their first representative institutions to which the basic responsibilty of that country's future is now entrusted.

The Italian people, besides recognizing in the decision to admit new members to the UNO a valuable step forward on the road to greater international solidarity, find an open door through which their voice can be heard in an important forum, along with those of friendly and allied countries, to serve the interests of security, peace, international justice and progress, interests upon which the political action of my country and Government is founded.

In this regard I cannot forget how much this favourable development, to which we owe the removal of the unfair discrimination to which Italy was subjected, is also due to the consistent action of the Canadian Government, who took the initiative and to whom I wish to express our most heartfelt thanks.

In this brief visit I have been deeply, even physically, impressed by the extraordinary vitality and potential energy with which your country is endowed. Canada has rapidly succeeded, through her will and effort, in achieving an international position of preeminence and responsibility, especially in that great and prosperous community of nations of which she is an integral and essential part.

But what has impressed me most deeply and strengthened my trust in the possibility of an ever-growing co-operation between Canada and Italy is the further evidence I have gathered from contacts with responsible Canadians in regard to their accuracy of judgment, their foresight and their firm attitudes. Furthermore, I was not surprised to find such a keen interest in European affairs in a country whose history, position and characteristics make it the natural bridge between the old world and the new.

I have taken advantage of these contacts to illustrate to leading Canadians some aspects of the Italian situation, in the same spirit with which two old friends, meeting after a long absence, compare their ideas and inform each other of their problems. In particular, I have told them—and I wish to repeat it again here—that my country, after the extraordinary effort of reconstruction, is now engaged in a work of renewal and development without precedent in its recent history. To accomplish this work, which is being carried out in a regime of true liberty and democracy, Italians must be able to rely upon two indispensable conditions: maintenance of peace in the world and the solidarity of friendly and allied countries.

It is my opinion and also that of my Government that the new course of international events make it advisable that the next session of the Atlantic Council, already planned for May 4, should have the extent and implications of a conference where an objective and therefore realistic examination should be made of all those political, economic, social and psychological requirements to which I have already referred.

Another opinion of my Government and of myself is that unification of the western viewpoint is the indispensable premise for any action—in our opinion necessary—in order to confer upon joint policies a dynamic and flexible character to counteract the forces which have lately given proof of possessing such flexibility.

On the other hand, without a united directive, every bilateral contact of single western countries with the Soviet bloc would not be conducive to useful and above all conclusive results, and would risk repeating the unwise tactics of ancient history when Rome lost the Curiatii in the struggle against the opposing faction of the Horatii.

But it is evidently in the general interest of western solidarity that preventive consultations, which up to now have had an extraordinary character, should become the ordinary and permanent method of approaching problems of defence and peace. These problems are indivisible and it would be artificial and prejudicial not to recognize their interdependence and to believe that stable and conclusive solutions are possible for them without having been rationally co-ordinated. I have noted with pleasure that on this side of the Atlantic there is now general agreement on the need to associate all members of the Atlantic community in the responsibility of proposing and elaborating solutions for the major problems of our time, and in the effort to achieve in harmony the realization of such solutions.

I may, therefore, conclude without dangerous and undue optimism that at the end of this journey, after my visit to these two great countries of North America, I will be justified in bringing with me to Italy the reconfirmed and increased certitude that Italians are not alone in their efforts for a better future, for liberty and peace in the world and prosperity for our peoples.

(Text):

The kindness shown me during my stay here and the reception that you, honourable sirs, have extended to me today, enable me to bring back to the Italian people your message of friendship and encouragement.

(Translation):

I would like to consider as evidence of this friendship those Italians to whom you open your doors and who give to your cities and land their contribution of loyal and industrious activity.

May God guide and maintain our two peoples united on the road to progress and peace.

(Text):

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson (Speaker of the Senate): May I, Mr. President, thank you on behalf of the Senate of Canada for coming to speak to us, and for the inspiring address you have just delivered.

Not only have many of our most respected citizens or their forebears come from your beautiful land, but your country and ours have, through the North Atlantic Pact, solemnly bound themselves together for weal or woe. Your eloquent appeals here and elsewhere for the bringing of life into the spirit of article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty strike a responsive chord. Two years ago in Bonn, Germany, our Prime Minister, reflecting all shades of political thought in this happy land, made a similar appeal; his judgment and yours has been amply justified by the swift rush of current events. For the common good of free men everywhere, it is the earnest hope that your appeals will not fall on deaf ears.

May we ask you, Mr. President, on your return to convey our greetings to the members of the Italian parliament. Some of us had the very great pleasure last summer of meeting with representatives of your Parliament, who were inspired with your viewpoint. We hope for a renewal of the opportunity.

We wish you well in your undertakings. May Divine Providence bless your endeavours.

(Translation):

Hon. L. René Beaudoin (Speaker of the House of Commons): Mr. President, it is with the keenest pleasure that I welcome you to the Parliament of Canada and that I thank you, on behalf of the members of the House of Commons, for the magnificent speech you just made.

We have had in the past the great honour of receiving here in this house many remarkable statesmen coming from neighbouring and far-away countries, in particular from the commonwealth and the republic south of our border. We are happy and honoured to be able today to add your name to this memorable list of friends of our country.

Besides, we have known you well since long before your arrival in our midst. The hundred voices of renown had revealed to us the great political force you represent in your country.

Though born in Pontedera, near Pisa, it was possible to say of you "He is a Roman", that is to say, a man of thorough austerity, firmness, courage and patriotism.

Your beautiful country is assured of our friendship. Here in Canada part of the population is of Latin origin and therefore feels a strong attachment to Italy. Moreover, no one can forget the contribution made by your country along the centuries and again today to culture, that is to art, literature and music. Let us remember also, in this strenuous international situation which the nations of the world are facing today, that no law has endured so long as the Roman law nor exerted a more decisive influence on modern law.

(Translated from the Italian)*:

In conclusion, I wish to say how glad we have been to welcome the charming Mrs. Gronchi, as well as the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Gaetano Martino, and his wife. It is our hope that you have all enjoyed your stay in Canada, and we wish you a safe and happy return voyage.

EXCHEQUER COURT (DIVORCE JURISDICTION) BILL

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, seconded by the Hon. Mrs. Hodges, for the second reading of Bill I-5, an Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Hon. J. W. deB. Farris: Honourable senators, I have listened with interest and appreciation to the clear and forthright speeches of my honourable friend who introduced this bill and moved its second reading (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) and my distinguished colleague from British Columbia who seconded the motion (Hon. Mrs. Hodges). Although I intend to support the bill, I do not think I can advocate it with quite so much zest as those speakers have shown. As a matter of fact, for some time I was not sure what attitude I should take toward the measure, but upon reflection—and perhaps a reasoned conclusion is more to be depended upon than one which is jumped at—I feel that the house should support it. The logic of my reasons may be somewhat open to criticism. My hesitancy in the matter was prompted in the first place by the fear that support of the bill might be interpreted as a reflection on the way in which divorces have been handled in Parliament, and particularly in the Senate. I should be sorry if any word of mine lent support to the very unfair attacks which have been made in other places—note that I do not say merely "the other place"—as to the conducting of the inquiries in our Divorce Committee. At a recent meeting of the Canadian Bar Association, in Winnipeg, which was attended by my honourable friend from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) and myself, attacks of this kind were directed at Parliament, and at the Senate especially. At that time I took a strong stand in defence of our work. I said then, and I repeat, that the Divorce Committee of the Senate is the most efficient and best conducted divorce court in Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I do not make that statement idly. In over 50 years' practice of law I have had some experience of divorce proceedings in the courts; also on various occasions I have sat with my colleagues in the Divorce Committee, and I know something about the gentlemen who, as members of that committee, give of their time and energy to its work. The present Chairman is my honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), whom I have known for many years. I knew him when he was Attorney General of Ontario. We were associated in cases before the Privy Council. I knew him when he was a member of the House of Commons; for some years we have been fellow-members of the Senate; and I affirm that there is no judge in Canada more competent, more conscientious, more faithful and diligent in his work than is the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Farris: His predecessor in the office of chairman was the honourable senator who has introduced this bill (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). I do not think he was ever an attorney general—and that perhaps is to his advantage. In any event, he gave long, faithful and efficient service as chairman of this committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Not only is the committee served in the chairmanship by men of this calibre, but the chairman has as associates and co-advisers other senators—some of them members of the medical profession or other professions, and some, businessmen—all experienced persons who have a full sense of responsibility and perform their duties faithfully and with competence. This has given to the Chairman of the Senate Divorce Committee an advantage not enjoyed by judges in our courts.

There is another advantage to having divorce cases handled by Parliament. The evidence is taken down, transcribed and made available to every member of both houses. It is not necessary that members should read all the evidence, and of course they do not, but it is available to them. If there is a complaint in any one case from any of the parties involved, if there is any whisper that everything is not just as it should be, there are approximately 100 members in the Senate and 260 members in the House of Commons who can have in their hands a full transcript of the evidence in order to check up and determine what has to be done. Therefore I say that from the standpoint of ability, experience, diligence and records this court of divorce in Parliament is, in my judgment, superior to any other in Canada. For that reason I must emphasize that any support I may give to changing the present divorce jurisdiction with regard to Quebec and Newfoundland must not carry with it the slightest implication that the work is not being properly handled now.

I am conscious of the fact that some people perhaps look with envy on senators because we do not have to seek election every three, four or five years, and criticize us because they think we have not enough to do. They might feel they had further ground for criticism if we wanted to slough off—if I may use that expression—the work we now do on divorce. However, I do not think we need concern ourselves about this too much. The Senate has stood the test of jealous criticism ever since Confederation, and I predict it will stand that test long after we have passed and gone.

It might strike honourable senators that I have talked myself out of court, and they might with logic ask: "Well, if this is the best place in the country for dealing with divorces, and a few members of the Senate are willing to hear the evidence, what are you kicking about? Why do you want to change things?" That is one of the points I pondered over, but on the whole I think it is in the interest of Parliament and of the public that some change should be made in the procedure by which divorces are granted to people in Quebec and Newfoundland, the two provinces where there are at present no established divorce courts.

Honourable senators, I believe I am entitled to refer to comments made in another place in previous years. Complaints have been made in the House of Commons that its members are put in an embarrassing position by having to pass divorce bills more or less "sight unseen". I think such complaints arise from a misconception of how organized society and organized business are carried on. In all big business, and in all affairs of importance, there must be delegation of authority. Similarly, in dealing with divorces in Parliament there is necessarily a delegation of authority. It is delegated by arrangement that the evidence shall be inquired into before a committee of the Senate.

If members of the House of Commons find it necessary to accept and vote on the passing of divorce cases more or less "sight unseen", as they have termed it, that is no reflection on the present procedure, in my judgment, because that kind of thing is done in the Commons all the time. I would call attention of honourable members of that house to the mad scramble that goes on at the end of every session. When supply is being voted they will spend days talking about one, two, or three items. That is natural, because there may be something of political significance involved. Then they will vote millions and tens of millions of dollars, almost at the turn of a hand. They do not worry about the delegation of authority, but accept something that has been prepared for them to vote on. I do not make my remarks as a criticism at this stage; I am merely pointing out that that procedure is necessary under all the circumstances.

Coming to the question of why there should be a change from the present system of handling divorce petitions from Quebec and Newfoundland, I submit that under the Constitution of Canada and in accord with long-established tradition in Great Britain, it was never intended that our Parliament in general, and the Senate in particular, should devote time and energy to divorce cases and investigate the conduct of wayward husbands and wives. In my submission this system leads to a waste of good material. Take, for instance, my honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). With his wide experience in public affairs, and his most intimate and careful scrutiny of the handling of affairs in the Senate, I do not think it is in the public interest that such a man should have to spend so much time and talent on divorce matters. I have seen him look extremely tired after a long session in the Divorce Committee. What I have said about my honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity applies equally to his associates on the committee, to his predecessor in the office of chairman, and to all other honourable senators who have engaged in the work of the divorce committee in the 20 years that I have been here. I say that is not only wrong as far as individuals are concerned, but in my judgment it is wrong in principle in a much wider way. We are not here to deal with individual disputes between husbands and wives; we are here as senators to perform broad and wide functions of national and international interest.

This divorce business has gradually grown up and caught us unawares. I understand, from talking to one of my colleagues, that when divorce cases were first heard by the Senate committee there was only an occasional petition from Quebec and other provinces. But as time went on and social conditions changed to what they are today, the number has increased to between 400 and 500 cases a year. And there will be a great many more as this country continues to grow. I therefore think it is time we asked ourselves one or two pertinent questions.

First: Should divorces be granted to applicants from the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland for adultery? There are honourable members here who believe that divorce should not be granted on any ground. To them I repeat what I said during last session's discussion on the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes bill: If that is the issue, then have the courage of your convictions and move a resolution or introduce a bill providing that no divorce shall be granted by Parliament on any grounds to applicants from the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland. What would happen to such a resolution or bill? It would be rejected by a large majority. The very fact that we are giving of our time in the conduct of divorce hearings demonstrates that in general Parliament and the people recognize there must be some outlet for people who seek divorce. Therefore, I say the question of whether or not we shall have an outlet of some kind for the granting of divorce for adultery to people domiciled in Quebec and Newfoundland is not an issue in this debate, nor is it an issue in Parliament. That answers the first question.

My second question: If there has to be a method of dealing with divorce petitions from Quebec and Newfoundland, shall we continue the present method or seek a better one? To my mind, that is purely a question of procedure. In my limited view on these matters, no principle is involved in that question. Assuming that we are going to have petitions for divorce from these two provinces, is it in the public interest that the time of Parliament should be taken up in dealing with them? Honourable senators, look at the Votes and Proceedings in the other house and the Minutes of the Proceedings of this house, and there you will see page after page of divorce petitions recommended by the Senate. The public who read these documents must naturally think that this Parliament of ours is a rather messy place, since parliamentarians seem to spend much time on the scandals of divorce and matrimonial conflicts. It is not good from the public standpoint that that sort of impression should be created. There are already too many attacks on Parliament. Too often we hear the charge that the Government has taken control away from Parliament. Let me say that as long as we have free democracy and a free vote, the control of affairs is in the hands of Parliament, not of the Government. It is time this declaration was made to the people and such attacks were repudiated.

I am a little fearful that one thing which contributes much to the reflection on Parliament is the criticism we receive for our handling of divorce cases: we are criticized not because we handle them poorly, but because we handle them at all. So I say, I think it is in the interest of the public that some other method of dealing with divorce petitions from Quebec and Newfoundland should be adopted.

The first consideration that comes up is one of jurisdiction. One of my colleagues handed me a clipping from a newspaper—I suspect it is from the Globe and Mail—which refers to the introduction of the present bill and goes on to say:

> The Quebec Civil Code contains a section (185) which says that marriage in Quebec shall be dissolved only by the death of one of the partners.

In an interview one of our prominent men in public life is alleged to have said:

> No matter what jurisdiction you set up, so long as that is the law of the province, no divorce could be granted by any court.

That observation, as interpreted by a careful lawyer, may be correct, but read by the average layman it might create a wrong impression.

In the matter of divorce jurisdiction Quebec's position is no different from that of any other province. I have no doubt that this particular section of the Civil Code was part of the law of that province at the time of Confederation. If so, it would of course continue to be the law of that province until the Parliament of Canada saw fit to change it. For instance, in British Columbia, it has not been many years since a wife had limited grounds on which she could seek divorce as contrasted to the rights of a husband. That was the law at the time of Confederation, and it continued to be the law until it was changed by an act of Parliament, and today in that province a wife has the same rights as a husband in the matter of obtaining a divorce.

I should like to make this point clear, not so much for the benefit of the house, because I am quite sure honourable senators understand the situation, but because something I say may be reported in the press and there may be others who would get some enlightenment from my remarks. Sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act broadly divide the federal and provincial jurisdictions. Section 91, which provides generally the federal powers and also enumerates specific fields in which the dominion has authority, reads:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces; and for greater Certainty,—

This is the important part.

> —but not so as to restrict the Generality of the foregoing Terms in this Section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive—

And this I emphasize.

> —the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—

There follow 29 heads or subsections, of which No. 26 is "Marriage and Divorce". Honourable senators will observe that I have already emphasized the word "exclusive", but to put the point beyond any doubt, I will read the concluding paragraph of section 91:

> And any Matter coming within any of the Classes of Subjects enumerated in this Section shall not be deemed to come within the Class of Matters of a local or private Nature comprised in the Enumeration of the Classes of the Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces.

Then we come to section 92 of the British North America Act. Subsection 12 of that section, which confers jurisdiction regarding solemnization of marriage on the provinces, was brought before the Privy Council, where it was decided that that was an exception to the general powers conferred on the dominion as to marriage and divorce. Solemnization of marriage has not a thing in the world to do with the question of divorce. Somebody might suggest that the contractual relations that arise out of divorce are civil rights, and it might be argued that that is true, except for the fact that marriage and divorce are placed exclusively within the jurisdiction of the dominion by section 91, and the closing paragraph of that section states, as I have pointed out, that any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in the section shall not be deemed to come within the class of matters assigned exclusively to the provincial legislatures.

To support the law on that question I am going to confine myself to just one quotation. It is from a decision of the Privy Council, in the case of the Great West Saddlery Company Limited against the King, reported in (1921) Appeal Cases, Volume 2, beginning at page 91. The judgment was given by Viscount Haldane. Quoting from the Privy Council's decision in another case on this point, which has been decided by that tribunal and the Supreme Court of Canada, not once or twice, but several times, Viscount Haldane said, at page 99:

> Their Lordships made reference to the circumstance that the concluding words of s. 91 of the British North America Act, "Any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section shall not be deemed to come within the class of matters of a local or private nature comprised in the enumeration of the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces," render it necessary to do more than ascertain whether the subject-matter in question apparently falls within any of the heads of s. 92; for if it also falls within any of the enumerated heads of s. 91, then it cannot be treated as covered by any of those in s. 92. As is now well settled the words quoted apply, not only to the merely local or private matters in the Province referred to in head 16 of s. 92, but to the whole of the sixteen heads in that section.

There is a declaration of the law by the Privy Council that any matter expressly covered by section 91 is excluded from the jurisdiction of the provinces, even though the language of section 92 may be wide enough to include it in that section but for the wording of section 91. So I say, honourable senators, there is no question that exclusive jurisdiction is vested in Parliament to set up a divorce court for any of the provinces; and when Parliament acts within that jurisdiction it overrides the provisions of any law that existed at the time of Confederation, whether in British Columbia, Quebec or any other province. What I want to emphasize is that this bill would in effect no more interfere with section 185 of the Civil Code of Quebec than the present system of parliamentary divorce does. The bill would only transfer authority to the person or body that is going to exercise it. That is why I think there is no basic question of principle involved in the bill.

Now, while I have said that, I am conscious of what some of my friends in this house who are Catholics have said to me. I have asked them point blank, "What is the difference between having these divorce petitions dealt with by Parliament and having them dealt with by a court of law?" The answer I have received—my honourable friends can correct me later if I have got the wrong idea—was to this effect: "If you set up a court and give a mandate, practically an order, to that court that it shall grant divorce, then you are establishing a principle that goes all down the line; whereas, on the other hand, when Parliament deals with divorce petitions it considers every case individually—the Senate and the House of Commons vote on every case without recognizing any general principle." Others who are more familiar with this point of view than I am, can explain it better, but in general that seems to be the position.

I was impressed by the point raised on Tuesday evening by my honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Vien), who I am sorry is not present at the moment. He asked the sponsor of the bill about the proposed new subsection 4 of section 18 of the Exchequer Court Act, as set out in section 3 of the bill. It will be seen that subsection (4) states, not as does other Canadian law relative to divorces, that if the case is proved the judge "shall" grant the divorce, but that if the evidence is there he "may" grant a divorce. Then there is a proviso, and my honourable friend from De Lorimier suggested that the proviso makes it clear that in cases where certain conditions were not present "may" would really mean "shall". I think he is right. The wording is as follows:

> Provided always that the court shall not be bound to give such judgment if it finds that the plaintiff since his marriage to the defendant has been guilty of adultery, or if the plaintiff has, in the opinion of the court, been guilty of unreasonable delay . . .

I think that the inference from the proviso that "the court shall not be bound" is that otherwise the court shall be bound, and that lawyers could argue with great force that the requirement is mandatory and not merely permissive. It seems to me that the right solution is to strike out that proviso entirely. I would not here and now move that it be deleted because this is not the place to do so; but this morning I discussed the matter with the honourable senator who introduced the bill (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), and if it should pass second reading I think he will be prepared, when the bill goes to committee, to make or support a motion to eliminate the proviso entirely. Its removal from the bill could have no serious consequences. What it would do is to make clear that a judge of the Exchequer Court is not commanded as are judges under other legislation, to grant a divorce, but that he may grant it; and this is exactly the power conferred on our committee. The constitution does not command us in every case where adultery is proven to grant a divorce; all it does is to give us such power if in the exercise of discretion we decide to use it.

The point I wish to make is that if Parliament will delegate its authority to a judge of the Exchequer Court, and will confer on him not an obligatory but a discretionary, power, that is, exactly the power which we ourselves possess. In that event the objection which some of my colleagues seem to have in this connection would be removed, or at least in some considerable degree diminished.

I think I have covered all I wish to say in this matter. If I may repeat myself, I would say that so many questions in which Parliament today is involved are of such importance, both nationally and internationally, that the people of this country are entitled to regard Parliament as something very different from a muck-raking institution, or a body engaged in delving into the waywardness of some men and some women. It was never intended that Parliament should deal with personal cases; its function is to debate and determine broad principles and matters which affect the nation as a whole.

For these reasons I intend to support the bill.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Kinley, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard moved the second reading of Bill V-5, an Act respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company and certain wholly owned subsidiaries.

He said: Honourable senators, as you will find by the explanation which is annexed to it, this bill is to simplify the operations of some thirteen railways. Most of them are small lines, though some are pretty big ones. Since their construction all their properties have been leased, in some cases for 999 years, to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and all of them have been operated by that company. All the outstanding stock and bonds of these railways belong to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

The object of the bill is to simplify the complicated organization which the existence of these companies puts on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to relieve the company of unnecessary incidental expenses. For instance, so long as these various companies are in existence they must hold annual meetings, prepare reports and produce balance sheets each year—all of which is absolutely unnecessary. In some cases these corporations have been operated for the last 50 years by the Canadian Pacific Railway, by whom all their assets and leases are held through purchase.

All these thirteen railways are subject to the provisions of the Railway Act. Ten of them have been incorporated by the federal Parliament, and three by provincial laws; but they all fall within the jurisdiction of the Board of Transport Commissioners and are under the provisions of the Railway Act, because their properties have been leased to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The bill seeks the vesting of all these corporations' properties in the C.P.R., and the dissolution of the ten companies which have been incorporated by Parliament.

As to two companies which were incorporated in British Columbia, being The Columbia and Kootenay Railway and Navigation Company, and The Vancouver and Lulu Island Railway Company, a bill has been passed by the Legislature of British Columbia and now awaits sanction. That Legislature has approved the vesting of these railway properties in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and has agreed to dissolve them because they are of no more use.

In respect of one company, the Midland Simcoe Railway Company, incorporated by the Ontario Legislature, the same procedure has been followed: a bill went through its three readings before the Ontario legislature, and awaits sanction, to the same effect as the present bill, to permit the vesting of all the company's properties in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the dissolution of the Ontario company.

Another purpose of the bill is to prevent unnecessary expenses. The holding of meetings, adopting of financial reports and electing of officers are no longer necessary, because these companies do not own or operate any railway at the present time.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Are there any shareholders at all in these companies?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: All the shares and bonds belong to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. Nicol: Does any tax problem exist?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Not at all. In most cases railways are taxed according to the length of their rail lines, and this bill does not change anything in that respect. The legislatures which incorporated some of these companies have agreed to the vesting of the companies' rights in the Canadian Pacific Railway, and also to the dissolution of the companies.

Honourable senators, if this bill is given second reading I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, where detailed information can be obtained.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Will the passing of this legislation mean the closing down of any of these lines?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: No. As a matter of fact all these railways have been operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway since the leasing of their properties to it. Some have been operated by the C.P.R. for as long as fifty years. This bill will not affect the public in any way. As a matter of fact, it would be impossible for the C.P.R. to close down any line without applying to the Board of Transport Commissioners, which would hear all interested parties before making a decision.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That could be done in any event.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Yes. Application could be made by the companies themselves just as well as by the Canadian Pacific Railway. But there is no intention whatsoever to discontinue the operation of any of these lines. I would point out that except for a very short distance one of these railways is the main line of the C.P.R. between Montreal and Toronto. It was incorporated long ago under another name, and was leased to the C.P.R. for a period of 999 years.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The only thing that concerns me is why this action has been so long delayed. Why was this not done a long time ago?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: That would be pretty difficult for me to answer, but when the Canadian Pacific Railway leases these properties it has to acquire all the shares and bonds. Action on this started last year and, as I understand it, is a pretty big undertaking. The property of each railway being taken over has to be dealt with individually. Last year Parliament passed a bill to the same effect as this with regard to the Fredericton & Grand Lake Coal & Railway Company.

I understand that the simplification in the corporate organization of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in connection with all these other companies, is to take place from time to time, as legislation is prepared for presentation to Parliament. The bill now before us deals with thirteen companies, and the dissolution of other companies will be effected when the necessary documents have been prepared for that purpose.

If there are any other questions honourable senators wish to ask I shall be glad to try and answer them, but I intend to move that the bill be referred to committee, where more detailed information will be obtainable.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Bouffard, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

LA PAIX GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. Bouffard moved the second reading of Bill W-5, an Act to incorporate La Paix General Insurance Company of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, my explanation of this bill will be brief. The company seeking incorporation will be a subsidiary of a large insurance company called La Paix, whose head office is in Paris, France. This French insurance company has been dealing in insurance in Canada for a long time as a foreign insurance company licensee. The intention of the Canadian company, if it is incorporated, is to acquire all the assets and to take over all the liabilities of the French Company in Canada, and to act as a Canadian company.

This bill has been approved by the Superintendent of Insurance. The capital stock of the company will be $1 million, which will have to be subscribed before a general meeting is called for the election of directors. The company will not be authorized to commence any business of insurance until at least $1 million of its capital has been subscribed and paid, together with a contribution to surplus of $500,000.

The company already has in Canada assets to the extent of nearly $1½ million, together with assets over liabilities to the extent of approximately $425,000. It can therefore be seen that this company gives to the Government and to the insured in Canada greater guarantee than that offered by other insurance companies which we have incorporated during the past ten to fifteen years. There will be no purchase of the assets of the French company by the Canadian company unless the agreement is approved by the Treasury Board.

Honourable senators, if this bill is given second reading I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, where the Superintendent of Insurance will be available to answer questions.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Bouffard, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATIVES

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next I will ask the following questions of the Government:

1. Is there any rule governing the number of embassy representatives in Canada?
2. What are the number and names of the various countries that have diplomatic representatives in and around Ottawa?
3. Are diplomatic representatives and others attached to these embassies under any restrictions by the Canadian Government as to travel outside Ottawa or throughout the country? If not, are Canadian representatives abroad allowed the same privilege, including the right to travel freely in the various countries to which they have been assigned?
4. What country or countries, if any, place travel restrictions on foreign embassy representatives assigned to that country?

I may say that I am very pleased with the last question, because apparently there are spies around here reporting for the Russian Embassy, and so they have cut me off their mailing list for literature.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF FINANCE AT CONFERENCE

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators will recall that on two previous occasions this session I tabled certain correspondence in connection with federal-provincial fiscal matters. I have now received a copy of a statement made by the Minister of Finance at the Federal-Provincial Conference held in Ottawa last week, together with certain statistical information.

In view of the fact that previous documents having to do with this subject were made part of our records, as appendixes to Hansard, and the Minutes of the Proceedings, I thought honourable senators would wish this statement to be treated in the same way.

I therefore move, with leave of the Senate, that these documents which I now propose to table appear as an appendix to today's Hansard and the Minutes of the Proceedings.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, may I inquire whether it is intended to table at this time only a statement by the Minister of Finance to the recent conference, without any reply by the premiers?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It is only the statement of the Minister of Finance given at the meeting with the provincial premiers.

Hon. Mr. Haig: And it contains no answer by the premiers?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, it contains no answer by the premiers. As a matter of fact, I do not know if they made their answers in written form or spoke from previously prepared statements.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I presume there were shorthand reporters present to take down what was said. To make the record complete, I think it would be more satisfactory to us and the public if both sides of the picture were put in as an appendix to Hansard. In other words, I do not think a statement by one side means anything. I read in the press that some three or four provincial premiers had something to say, and I think their statements should form part of our record, along with the statement made by the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I believe that any statements made by the premiers were made after the conference adjourned.

Hon. Mr. Horner: My understanding was that statements were made right in the conference by both the Premier of Ontario and the Premier of Quebec. In my view they would have the same bearing on the situation as a statement made by the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Doubtless, there was a discussion after the Minister of Finance made his statement to the conference; but, as honourable senators know, the conference was held in camera. However, I felt that honourable senators would like to know the position the Government took in this matter.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I object to a one-sided statement appearing on the record.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Honourable senators, there was in the press some suggestion that the Prime Minister had unnecessarily invited the premiers of the provinces to this conference. But the other day the Prime Minister produced in the House of Commons the letter he had written the premiers, and it indicates clearly that he did not invite them, but rather suggested that they had better stay home.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I have before me the paragraph of the Prime Minister's letter of February 18 with respect to that matter. It reads as follows:

> Since our federal responsibilities and commitments are now so heavy that we would not be warranted in making any increase in the basic offer we made in January it may be that the provincial Governments generally would not feel that there would be any advantage to be derived from another meeting to discuss fiscal relations.

However, in spite of that some premiers did request another meeting, and the Prime Minister, courteous and gracious as always, told them they could come and he would hear them.

Hon. Mr. Horner: They could, eh? It was a great privilege!

Hon. Mr. Haig: Might I ask His Honour the Speaker if unanimous consent of the house has to be given to do this?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am not pressing the motion. I thought I was giving the house some important information.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I must say candidly that I object; I do not want a one-sided statement of that kind on the record, that is all. If you want to override my objection all right, but I do not think you can.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am not pressing to have the statement placed on Hansard. I thought I was getting information which the house would desire. I find that wherever certain information is put on the record in the other house, but not in the Senate, some honourable senator will rise and ask why I, as the representative of the Government in this house, did not present the same information here. I therefore went out of my way to get this information, which was placed on Hansard in the other house. However, if honourable senators do not want it, far be it from me to try to force it on them.

Hon. Gray Turgeon: Honourable senators, I think without any question the suggestion of the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) should be carried out. All along, since the series of conferences started, we have had official documents put in as appendixes to the various sessional reports. The Leader of the Government does not give us anything that is not official, but what we read in the press may not be taken from official documents. The statement by the Minister of Finance, which the Leader wishes to place on our records, is on the Commons records. Whether we agree with the statement or not is another question, but we should have it in our report of today's sitting.

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: Do you not receive the Commons Hansard?

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Yes, but a lot of people read the Senate Hansard too. We have objected at times because the honourable Leader of the Government has not placed on our record statements that have been placed on the Commons record.

The Hon. the Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent for the motion, does the honourable the Leader of the Government wish to give notice of motion?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not want to force this on honourable senators. If honourable senators do not want the statement on Hansard I am not going to force it.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: We do.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am not forcing this on the Senate; it is up to honourable members whether they want the statement or not.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I hope that the honourable senators of the Opposition will not blame the Government for not giving them information that they do not want to have.

Hon. Mr. Croll: If the honourable Leader is not prepared to give notice of motion, then I will do so. I wish to give notice that I will move that the statement made by the Minister of Finance, which was placed on the House of Commons Hansard yesterday, be placed on the Senate Hansard. That will be dealt with tomorrow I presume.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is that agreeable?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If there seems to be a desire by honourable senators that the statement be placed on our records, I am prepared to give a notice of motion.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, on a question of order: You cannot give a notice of motion to quote here what someone has said in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well that is what you are proposing to do. This statement was presented in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Haig: And you are proposing to quote it in the Senate. We can read it in the House of Commons Hansard and that is all we need. The giving of notice will not change the matter. It has to be done with unanimous consent of this house, and I refuse.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Unanimous consent is necessary only if the motion is to be made tonight.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I now give notice that I will move tomorrow that the statement made by the Minister of Finance at the opening of the Federal-Provincial Conference on Friday last be placed on the Senate records of Wednesday, March 14, 1956.

Hon. Mr. Haig: We will deal with it then, and we will see.

NEW BRUNSWICK POTATO MARKETING BOARD

INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Frederick W. Pirie inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of February 21:

1. Has the audit and investigation concerning the operations of the New Brunswick Potato Marketing Board, under agreement with Her Majesty the Queen, represented by the Minister of Agriculture, dated December 21, 1953, been completed?
2. If so, when may the tabling of the report be expected?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry is as follows:

1. Yes.

2. The matters investigated are now under consideration by the departments of Government and others concerned.

BUTTER

INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of February 23:

1. During the last thirty years, when was the lowest price paid for butter to the producer in Canada and what was such price?
2. During the same period, when was the Customs duty on butter the highest?
3. What was the average price of butter in Canada during the last five years?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry is as follows:

1. June, 1932, wholesale jobbing price for Canada First Grade Creamery Butter, Montreal, 16·46 cents per pound.

2. Since 17th September, 1930, when the British Preferential Rate was raised to 8 cents per pound, however, if the 8 cents per pound is more than 15 per cent ad valorem, there is a discount of 10 per cent from the duty, the Intermediate Rate to 12 cents per pound, and the General Rate to 14 cents per pound.

In 1931 under the Australian Trade Agreements duty on butter from that country was set at 5 cents per pound with certain conditions attached enabling Canadian authorities to control imports in the event of injury to Canadian producers.

The New Zealand Trade Agreements of 1932 provided for the same rate of duty and the same general conditions governing the trade. The duty of 5 cents per pound on Australian and New Zealand butter has remained in effect since 1931 and 1932.

3. Average wholesale jobbing price, Canada First Grade creamery butter, Montreal, 60·93 cents per pound.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

MEETING POSTPONED DURING ADDRESS OF GENERAL GRUENTHER

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, before we proceed with the Orders of the Day I wish to inform the house that the meeting of the Banking and Commerce Committee called for tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock has been adjourned until 2 p.m. so as to enable senators who wish to hear General Alfred Gruenther in the morning to do so. As we have only one bill for consideration we should be able to dispose of it before the Senate meets tomorrow afternoon.

THE LATE SENATOR FALLIS

TRIBUTES TO HER MEMORY

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, on Wednesday last we were saddened to learn of the death of Senator Iva Campbell Fallis.

Senator Fallis had the distinction of being the second woman appointed to this house. She came to the Senate in 1935, at the age of 52 years. At the time of her death she was in her seventy-third year and had been a member of this house for approximately 21 years. Iva Campbell Doyle was born in rural Ontario of a Scottish mother and Irish father. She attended the rural schools, the local high school and the normal school in Toronto, and then taught school in Ontario until her marriage, to Howard Taylor Fallis. The young husband and wife went west, and farmed for about eight years. They returned to Ontario in 1917. Honourable senators will recall that at that time the women of Canada, as a whole, did not have the franchise. Senator Fallis was a proponent of women's rights. She took an active part in obtaining the franchise for women on the same basis as it was possessed by men. She was an outstanding speaker, with an excellent platform presence. She took an active interest in all questions of public concern. She travelled widely across Canada, and was well known. Her greatest interest was in the realm of politics, and she was a splendid spokesman and committee woman for her party. A charming and a gracious woman, her passing will be felt by a host of friends across Canada. She has served her country well. She will be missed by many, but he who will miss her most is her husband; and it is to him, on your behalf, that I extend our heartfelt sympathy.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable members, I had the honour of entering this chamber at the same time as the late Senator Fallis, in February 1936. She and the honourable senator from Rockcliffe (Hon. Mrs. Wilson) were then the only two women members of our body. Our late colleague early obtained the ear of the house and well repaid the women of Canada who made such a struggle for representation of their sex in the Senate, for, as an outstanding advocate of good causes, she demonstrated that what these women advocated was just and right. She was very much liked by every member of this chamber. She was truly a woman's woman. In various departments of life—as a teacher, as a mother in the home, and as a member of the Senate—she represented the best in womankind.

For the last three or four years her state of health compelled her to be absent a good deal, and we missed her very much indeed. There was a time, I may say, when some of us were not too sure whether women would make a success in our public life, but those who have lived to see the work of women like Senator Wilson and Senator Fallis soon came to recognize that such women are quite capable of taking their place beside men in the active political life of this country.

Mrs. Fallis rendered great service to the people of Canada. She always remembered that working mothers and other people in hard circumstances live a life of struggle, and she exerted herself to relieve their troubles in so far as she could, from time to time.

I can only say in conclusion that her husband has my sincere sympathy. Having suffered a similar loss, I know something of what it is. I sympathize with Mr. Fallis very much indeed, and I want him to know that his wife made a contribution to our country which will not soon be forgotten. Nor should the impression she made on her contemporaries in this chamber be forgotten. A good many past and present members of the Senate have been able to tell their families, from personal experience, what a great contribution a Christian woman can make to her country when she is determined to devote her life to this work. Of those who have occupied seats in this house in the past 21 years, 82 whose appointment preceded hers have passed on, and about 60 whose appointments were made later are also no longer with us. We who are left will not fail to remember the causes and the principles for which Iva Fallis stood, and we shall be all the better for having known and heard her.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I should like to add a word to what has been said about the late Iva Campbell Fallis. Although I did not know Senator Fallis until I came to this house, I certainly knew of her, because I have always been interested in the women who have taken part in the public life of Canada. As for many years Senator Fallis was one of the two women members of this chamber, many women throughout Canada have been much interested in her activities. During the war she was widely known for her work with the Committee for Voluntary Registration of Women. That committee, composed of outstanding women from existing national organizations, provided valuable information for the Government before compulsory registration of men and women became the law in Canada.

As many honourable senators here know, Senator Fallis was a faithful member of many standing committees of the Senate. She also served with distinction on a number of special committees. I would like to mention particularly the Joint Committee on Old Age Security, the Special Committee on Salacious and Indecent Literature, and the Joint Committee on the Indian Act. Senator Fallis told me a great deal about the proceedings of these committees when she was introducing me to the sort of work that I might look forward to doing in this house.

In 1921, in this chamber, Senator Fallis argued strongly that more women should be elevated to the Senate; and when, in 1953, three more came here, she gave us a very warm welcome, and reminded us that she had urged such appointments.

I found Senator Fallis a good friend, and also a kind neighbour—her office was next door to mine—and I saw quite a little of her in the short time she has been with us since 1953. I remember with gratitude her many kindnesses to me when I was new to this house; and to her husband, Mr. Howard Fallis, I extend my most sincere sympathy. I feel that Canada is poorer on account of the passing of our distinguished colleague.

Hon. Cairine R. Wilson: Honourable senators, it was indeed a great satisfaction to me when Mr. Bennett appointed Iva Campbell Fallis to the Senate, for prior to that time I had been the only woman member of this august chamber. As we were the only two of our sex in the Senate we were inevitably drawn together, and although we sat on the opposite sides of the chamber we found many points of agreement.

As has already been said, Senator Fallis was always interested in matters of interest to women, and urged women to take a greater part in government activities at municipal, provincial and federal levels. She felt that women had a great contribution to make and that it was regrettable that more of them did not actively support their leaders. I feel Senator Fallis has left a mark in this chamber, and that we shall continue for a long time to miss her very much.

During recent years, owing to the poor health of her husband and latterly of herself, we have not seen nearly as much of her as we should have liked. She was familiar with the many problems faced by women, first as a school teacher, and later as the wife of a man who farmed both in western Canada and in Ontario. She knew much of the life of women on the farm and had spoken to me often about it.

Honourable senators, I know that we all wish to express our sincere sympathy to her sadly bereaved husband, and to the nephew of whom she was so fond.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I should like to add a few words to the eloquent remarks that have already been made. Honourable members have spoken about the useful work done in the Senate by our late colleague and have referred to her knowledge of farm life both in Saskatchewan and Ontario. The honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson) and I attended the funeral of Senator Fallis, at which time we were introduced to some of her friends and relatives. At the service in the beautiful cemetery at Peterborough one of her relatives pointed to a gentleman and said "That is an American who couldn't do enough for Senator Fallis, for it was largely as a result of her endeavours that he was able to establish an industry in Peterborough which now employs 600 people." We were all acquainted with Senator Fallis' splendid contribution to public service in the Senate, and I mention this incident to illustrate that she was also keenly interested in the welfare of her own community.

Our little group on this side of the house have suffered a great loss in the passing of Senator Fallis. I wish to extend sincere sympathy to her husband and other relatives.

HOSPITALITY IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, before the orders of the day are proceeded with may I be permitted to refer to a recent visit I made to New Brunswick? Many people I met there wanted to know if I knew Senator Fergusson and Senator Burchill—I was never asked about anybody else. When I said I knew these distinguished persons I was received with open arms and given a fine reception wherever I went. In fact, a tea was given especially in my honour, and I am sure it was because I knew Senators Fergusson and Burchill. I think the other members from that province had better look to themselves or they will be entirely forgotten. Incidentally, I do not want to mention it out loud, but Manitoba still curls.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

EXCHEQUER COURT (DIVORCE JURISDICTION) BILL

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, March 7, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, seconded by the Hon. Mrs. Hodges, for the second reading of Bill I-5, an Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Hon. John J. Kinley: Honourable senators, in rising to speak on the adjourned debate of the bill now before the house I feel we are in a rather fortunate position in that there seems to be general agreement with regard to the activities and achievements of the Senate's Standing Committee on Divorce. Three members have taken part in this debate so far: the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), the sponsor of the bill; the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges), and the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris). Each has spoken most generously about the Divorce Committee, whose merits seem to be unquestioned. The honourable senator from Vancouver South paid a most eloquent tribute to the work and achievements of this committee and concluded his remarks by saying that in his opinion it is the most efficient and best conducted divorce court in Canada. The honourable senator is a barrister of great distinction, and besides he has an intimate knowledge of general conditions in this country. One certainly must admit that the bill has been supported by three outstanding members of this house.

I also should like to say something about the Senate committee, but after the compliments that have been expressed it might seem like painting the lily if I attempted to say anything more. These compliments were highly pleasing to the members of the Divorce Committee, and to the senate as a whole, I am sure. I was sorry that the honourable senator from Vancouver South did not follow through with his excellent speech, for I believe he could have made an even better speech on the other side of the question. I do not think he was very happy or enthusiastic in his conclusions. Of course, we all agree as to the efficiency of the Divorce Committee, but there is a difference of opinion as to whether this divorce work should be done in the Senate. Some honourable senators, taking all things into consideration, feel that this work of the Senate should be continued, and I am one of those.

Both the sponsor of the bill and the honourable senator from Vancouver South said that in their opinion it was not the intention of the Fathers of Confederation that there should be a divorce court in Parliament. It seems to me that it is a little late to talk about intentions. Actions speak louder than words, and for many years the Divorce Committee has been functioning steadily and well.

I do not like the bill. I think it is the wrong approach. This is a highly controversial question, and a matter of high government policy. When I was appointed to the Senate I understood by my commission that I was summoned to advise and assist "in all weighty and arduous affairs which may the State and defence of Canada concern." It seems to me that in this debate we are not advising and assisting the State, but rather that we want to "carry the ball". However, I think the subject could be approached in a much better way. A more friendly approach would be to petition the Government, or pass a resolution, indicating our thinking and desires on the subject.

In the debate on the Speech from the Throne a number of members, especially new members, made excellent speeches about the functions of the Senate. It was said that the Senate was so constituted, by appointments from different parts of Canada, that there would be a balance and the minority rights of this country would be protected. Well, it seems to me that if we are here to protect minority rights, this is an instance in which protection is needed.

Hon. Mr. Euler: What about the minority in Quebec? Has it not the same rights the other people in Canada have?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: If my friend will bear with me as I go along, I think I can explain to his satisfaction that the minority rights in so far as this subject is concerned are very well looked after. Of course, there is in the province of Quebec a minority of Protestants who naturally, one might think, would favour a divorce court, but I am told by informed people and readers of history that at the time of Confederation the Protestant minority in Quebec did not want a divorce court because it feared influence on mixed marriages and therefore would rather come to Parliament.

The honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) in moving the second reading of the bill quoted from a report made in 1947 by the then Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel of the Senate, Mr. MacNeill. I thought that in doing this the honourable senator left a rather wrong impression. As honourable senators know, and as my honourable friend stated, the annual report of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented to the Senate in 1947, contained the following resolution:

> In view of the fact that the number of applications for divorce has been increasing by leaps and bounds, this year reached an all-time high, and may continue to increase, your committee recommends that Parliament should immediately seek a solution of the problem of dealing with divorce in the province of Quebec by other than parliamentary action.

Upon receipt of that report, the Senate passed this resolution:

> That the subject matter of the final report of the Standing Committee on Divorce be referred to the Parliamentary Counsel of the Senate for consideration and report immediately following the opening of the next session of Parliament.

To quote the Law Clerk seems hardly fair, for he made no recommendations and came to no conclusions; he simply detailed the situation as it appeared throughout Canada. One part of his report that was not quoted at all should, I think, have been quoted for the information of the Senate. It is this:

> In Quebec, there is no divorce law in force and the Civil Code provides by article 185 that marriage can only be dissolved by the natural death of one of the parties; while both live, it is indissoluble. This is a pre-Confederation law continued in force by section 129 of the B.N.A. Act. It can be altered by the Parliament of Canada but since Confederation it has not been so altered except in the case of individuals and the Quebec courts have held that the Parliament of Canada is the only tribunal which can legally grant a divorce to a person domiciled in Quebec. If, therefore, the Parliament of Canada legislates to provide a court to deal with divorce in Quebec it must go further and provide the law that the court shall administer, that is, enact a divorce law for Quebec. What that law is to be is a matter for the consideration of Parilament.

He goes on to say this, and I think it is important:

> None of the proposals so far advanced have been supported by any body of opinion in the province of Quebec. Senators and members of the House of Commons from the province have consistently opposed giving any right, to a person domiciled in Quebec, to apply to a court for a decree dissolving a Quebec marriage.

That prompts me to say that while in a matter of this kind it is not necessary for us to consult the provinces, I think we should defer to those honourable senators who represent the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland in the Parliament of Canada. They live among the people concerned and have a knowledge of their wishes. This matter affects those people principally, and I cannot see how the rest of Canada would suffer by our deferring to the wishes of the senators from those provinces. Newfoundland is a new province and has not yet been infected to any extent with the disease of divorce. I repeat, that in my opinion we should take the advice of the representatives of the provinces concerned in such a matter as this, which is not of national concern.

I listened with interest to the speech of the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris), and in particular to his explanation of section 91 of the British North America Act, which gives the federal authority jurisdiction in marriage and divorce; and section 92, which makes the solemnization of marriage and property and civil rights provincial matters. The honourable senator gave what I thought was a very good argument as to which authority should prevail in the matter of divorce; nevertheless, I think it is of mutual concern to both the federal authority and the provinces. The province of Quebec, by reason of the provisions of the B.N.A. Act, has an interest in such action as the Parliament of Canada takes with regard to divorce.

The honourable senator from Vancouver South said that he thought there was no principle involved in the bill. I think there is. Certainly, there is the question of whether the people of the two provinces should go to the courts or to the Crown in matters of divorce. It has always been said that the people of Quebec more readily go to the Crown than submit to courts. There is a reason for that choice. They do not believe in divorce, and most of them do not want it; but for the sake of harmony in the formulating of the British North America Act, Parliament was given jurisdiction in this matter, and the arrangement has been maintained for a long time. The principle involved is that Quebec wants divorce placed under the control of the representatives of the people, where it can be watched carefully and any discrepancies can be checked.

The honourable senator from Vancouver South, in his praise of the work of the Senate Divorce Committee, had this to say:

> It is not necessary that members should read all the evidence, and of course they do not, but it is available to them. If there is a complaint in any one case from any of the parties involved, if there is any whisper that everything is not just as it should be, there are approximately 100 members in the Senate and 260 members in the House of Commons who can have in their hands a full transcript of the evidence in order to check up and determine what has to be done. Therefore I say that from the standpoint of ability, experience, diligence and records this court of divorce in Parliament is, in my judgment, superior to any other in Canada.

Those who are against divorce feel that it is subject to a greater degree of control in the hands of Parliament than it would be if it were turned over to a court.

The honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), who is an experienced senator, went into considerable detail on the various aspects of divorce procedure in the Senate. I repeat, the senator has had long experience here. When I first came to the Senate I was assigned to the Divorce Committee. It was then presided over by my honourable friend as Chairman, and he was ably assisted by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), who acted as Deputy Chairman. I learned much from both these honourable gentlemen about the things which were necessary in order to be an intelligent member of that committee. The senator from Rosetown, in his remarks on this bill, made an appraisal of some features of the procedure of the committee, which he would naturally do. He went on to complain about the cost to a petitioner of bringing an application for divorce to Parliament. I have looked into the matter of cost, and my information is as follows: Parliamentary fee, including printing, $210; Printing in the Canada Gazette, about $22; newspaper advertisements, an average of $50; bailiff's fees, up to $10. At the outside, that is a total of $292. It should be said that in cases where there is need, the parliamentary fee is reduced to $50, thus bringing the total cost down to $132. Indeed, there have been cases in which there was real poverty, or in which some social agency had interested themselves in the welfare of the parties, and the entire parliamentary fee was remitted.

I should like to remind the Senate that the matter of costs for petitions before this committee is entirely in our own hands. We write the rules of the Senate, and that includes the rules under which the Divorce Committee operates. It should be brought to the attention of the house that last year the work of this committee produced a revenue of $82,280, which of course went into the general revenue fund. I am told that about 50 per cent of the cost is for printing. Our practice has been to print some 400 copies of the evidence, but this has been reduced in recent years because certain senators and members of the other house have indicated they do not require copies. One expense to the applicant which I consider needless is that of employing an agent in Ottawa, at a cost of perhaps from $50 to $100. It is my belief that Mr. Armstrong, the Chief Clerk of Committees, could deal directly with out-of-town solicitors and thus avoid necessity for the employment of an Ottawa agent.

Complaints are made at times about the fee charged by the solicitor to his client. Well, as long as it is a matter between solicitor and client, I am not much exercised about it. But when the solicitor makes application before the committee for a remission of all or part of the fees, then I want to know how much he is charging the petitioner. If we wanted to, I presume we could have as part of our procedure the right to tax costs.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: There were only 24 remissions last year out of 413 cases.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I do not think that an application for remission of fees is ever refused altogether; at least it is rarely done. If a solicitor asks in good faith for a remission it is within the jurisdiction of the committee to grant it, and usually it does.

Now, honourable senators, another feature of this divorce committee work is that it makes possible the full employment of the officials of the Senate, the Hansard reporters, the committee clerks, those who do the extensive paperwork required for each case. This committee provides the extra work required to keep them busy on days when the Senate is not sitting. I always found in my business that an expert technical staff can be built up if one can find enough work for them to do.

Hon. Mr. Haig: What about the rest of us?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Honourable senators, how much will it cost to establish a branch of the Exchequer Court to handle the divorces from Quebec and Newfoundland? The cost will probably run to $80,000 a year, at least. I do not see why the country should have to expend that additional money. The approach to the whole question seems to me to be peculiar. A more logical and proper approach would be to establish a branch of the Superior Court of Quebec to deal with divorce.

My honourable friend from Rosetown said that this work imposed an excessive burden on senators. Well, since the day when he and I worked together as members of the Divorce Committee the procedure has been streamlined and much better organized. At the present time the committee is composed of 22 senators, and some 12 or 13 are present at each meeting. The quorum of a subcommittee is three. Thus four subcommittees can sit at one time and can easily hear 15 petitions a day. If we maintained that tempo the sessional work of the committee could be completed in about 32 or 33 days. It seems to me that it imposes no excessive burden on the senators who remain in Ottawa over the week-ends. As honourable senators know, the committee is largely composed of members from distant parts of the country. The Ontario and Quebec senators go home over the week-ends, but we from the distant parts of Canada who stay in Ottawa are available for the purposes of this court. Personally, I think we serve a very useful purpose.

I will give some figures. In 1950 from the Island of Newfoundland there were four divorce petitions; in 1952 there were three; in 1953, nine; in 1954, eight; and in 1955, one. The Island of Newfoundland is a problem by itself. If the senators and members from that province were to petition for a divorce court, I do not think anybody would be against it. But they have not done so. The setting up of the Exchequer Court to handle divorce petitions would be of no great help to Newfoundland. It is the same distance from Newfoundland to the Parliament Buildings as from Newfoundland to the Exchequer Court—there is a difference of only a few blocks. The expense involved for the parties to come here would be the same in either cases. So, honourable senators, I believe there is no present problem with regard to petitions from our new province, and I think we can safely leave the matter to their representatives in the Parliament of Canada. At least the problem is not serious. The infection has not reached Newfoundland to any serious degree yet, and I hope it will be a long time before it does.

As to the excessive burden which the work of the committee imposes on senators, let me give some of the figures for Quebec:

Year	No. of cases
1950	234
1951	290
1952	309
1953	273
1954	370
1955	406

Now let us make a comparison with the Ontario statistics:

Year	No. of cases
1950	2,228
1951	2,102
1952	2,202
1953	2,774
1954	2,346

I believe it was thought that matters were getting out of bounds in Ontario, and that province has tightened up on its rules. To illustrate this I will quote from Chitty's Ontario Annual Practice, 1955, at page 418, rule 781, which says:

> The statement of claim shall include the following particulars:
> (m) The matrimonial offences alleged or the other grounds upon which relief is sought, the same to be set out fully in separate paragraphs with the name and address of every person with whom a matrimonial offence is alleged to have been committed.

Now, our Divorce Committee deals with cases of adultery committed with persons unknown. It seems to me rather peculiar that we hear petitions involving unknown persons. In cases coming before the courts a plaintiff would be in some difficulty were he to base his action against an unknown third party. But here the petitions in many cases say that the co-respondent is unknown. We are told in explanation that the Senate in its graciousness does not want to disturb families or cause needless trouble by naming co-respondents. Well, honourable senators, I do not think our Divorce Committee exists to protect certain persons; its function is to find the truth in all cases.

Honourable senators, last year Parliament granted 406 divorce petitions from Quebec, and in Ontario the number was 2,346. I think that is the test. Divorce is an evil and we want to keep it down as much as we can. If the handling of divorce by Parliament results in keeping Quebec divorces down to 406 as against 2,346 in Ontario, and similarly high figures in the other provinces of Canada, such as British Columbia, I think one can see immediately the virtue of the system.

The honourable senator who sponsored the bill (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) claims that there is a time lag in the passing of a bill of divorce through the Senate and the House of Commons; he thought it took too long, that there were too many obstacles and too much red tape in the way. Well, honourable senators, the obstacles in the way are rather like plans and specifications for a building to an uninformed person. But to a person who is informed about those matters the plans and specifications do not look so bad. We do not have much trouble getting over the obstacles, because the Senate has perfect confidence in its Divorce Committee.

The honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) complimented the Chairman of the Divorce Committee (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), and truly said he was an outstanding and able man, but that he was working too hard and looked tired. Our chairman is an industrious man; he carries on his law practice; he works in various capacities in the Senate; he is Chairman of the Divorce Committee, although he delegates a good deal of the work, and he finds time for the artistic and the beautiful. In his office you can see evidences of his energy and competence in the field of art. I think he is a man who loves work, and that he would feel badly if he were deprived of it. I do not believe we need fear for his health or that of any member of the committee. I remember that I attended the committee on several occasions when the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) was its chairman. His humane approach to the whole situation was admirable. He discussed with us, who were then uninformed, the work of the committee in a most helpful fashion, and during his chairmanship, though sometimes the proceedings were unpleasant, we came away with the feeling that it was good to have been there, because the associations were valuable and we obtained a great deal of experience.

The honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) complained that it was perhaps a little beneath the dignity of the Senate to have to deal with marriage squabbles; and the honourable senator for Vancouver South went so far as to call the work "muckraking". I can well understand that upon arriving here, a cultured lady, rather new to our situation, might be a little perplexed by the seamy side of the proceedings of the Divorce Committee; but I suggest that these hearings are not so unimportant, for we are dealing with life and a social problem. It is very important work, and although sometimes it is a bit messy it does not affect our dignity. Who in this country enjoy more dignity than the average doctor and nurse, yet few people are called upon to handle messier jobs. They must do them from day to day, and we honour them for doing what they have to do, and doing it splendidly.

Whenever I attend a wedding I get a feeling of inspiration. As I see the bride adorned in all her beauty, and when I hear the words of the ceremony, it seems to me there is in this scene and in this rite a touch of immortality, because through it we are dealing with the future, with the re-creation of the race. Down in the Divorce Committee we may acquire some of the dignity of service as we look into the problems of unfortunate people, and the experience is salutary for us, because we get a knowledge at first-hand of what life is like among those around us. I think the work is valuable. We like to do the big things, to concern ourselves with such high matters as foreign affairs, but I have found that many people who want to be engaged on these big issues are less inclined to help with the little things. Nowadays the world is changing. All of us must share in the drudgery—and you may call the divorce committee's work drudgery if you wish. I believe our committee should be commended because it is doing this work and doing it well. It does not hurt our dignity; indeed, I do not think we could be much better employed. There are enough senators and there is sufficient time to do all the things which should be done in the interests of the country in a big way. This part of our work is, if nothing else, educational, and keeps us in touch with things as they are around us.

It is said that divorce bills from the Senate sometimes run into trouble in the other place. True, but where do such matters not run into trouble? It is not unknown even in the appeal courts. Last year we passed 408 divorce bills, and two or three of them were objected to in the other place by some whose purpose was, I believe, to delay legislation. The fact that so few bills were questioned proves that we have a splendid record and are doing a good job. I believe that if the rules could be changed so that divorce bills were sent over in a bunch, as such, and not as private bills, there would be no incentive to make them an excuse for delaying business; progress would be more rapid and the passage of the bills much easier than it is at the present time.

We are also told that people outside this chamber are criticizing the Senate in this connection. Like the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) I have heard criticism of the Senate for a long time, and I am not concerned about reflections on the Divorce Committee. I have always thought that it was a good thing not to do what your opponent expects or wants you to do. The people who criticize our proceedings and the party in the other house which has sponsored a bill similar to the one before us though with small differences of detail, would, I believe, destroy the Senate if they had the chance. I do not think we need be afraid.

I would be more concerned if, by refusing to operate a divorce court, we exposed ourselves to such remarks as, "The senators are getting so indolent that they do not want to handle these divorces, although they have dealt with them so well for many years."

An article in the Ottawa Journal is headed:

Would Abolish Divorce in Britain

It says:

A judge in Britain's appeal court called last night for the abolition of divorce as "the only solution for the preservation of family life". Lord Justice Hodson, 60-year-old Lord Justice of Appeal since 1951, speaking at a meeting of the local marriage council, said there has been an "enormous flood" of divorces recently.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not think that is the issue here. We are not talking about divorce.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Let me tell my honourable friend that he spoke about the burden upon the committee and to show his inconsistency, the bill he presented last year would have doubled the number of divorce petitions before the Senate, since it would have added other reasons for applying for divorce. He cannot evade the fact that one of his objections to the present procedure is that it is too much of a burden on the senators in committee.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I did not say that at all. That is absolutely incorrect.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Divorces in Britain increased from 596 in 1910 to almost 30,000 in 1953. Divorce jurisdiction was transferred to the courts of the United Kingdom.

The people of Quebec are not the only ones opposed to divorce. There is a host of other people in Canada opposed to it. We all know the stand taken by the Roman Catholic Church, and only recently the Anglican Church in Canada reaffirmed its position on divorce in a very determined way. Generally, churches are opposed to divorce; they are on the side of good and not of evil. The honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) said, in effect, "If you are against divorce why don't you move a resolution or introduce a bill?" I am sure we all agree that the ideal state of affairs would be one where people would not need to seek divorce; but we are realistic and we know that we cannot get along without divorce laws in this country. Nevertheless, honourable senators, if we had to vote "Yes" or "No" on whether divorce in Canada should be continued, I would have to vote "No". I believe that would be the wiser stand to take.

Apparently it has always been acceptable that the people of Quebec who seek divorce should apply to Parliament, and now this is true of Newfoundland also. The manner in which the cases are being handled at present is satisfactory, so why should we change the system. This problem really belongs to the people of Quebec and Newfoundland, and I do not see why we should be so concerned about it. In the report which Mr. MacNeill made to the Senate in 1947 he outlined the history of divorce in Canada, giving details about divorce laws in Nova Scotia and other provinces before Confederation. Those laws still stand and our liberties are not affected. It seems to me that a bill such as we have before us should not be introduced unless it expresses Government policy, and it should not be passed unless Parliament decides that it is in the interests of peace, order and good government of the country.

I recall that the Right Honourable Mr. Mackenzie King, speaking in Westminster on May 10, 1944, said this:

Let us, by all means, seek to improve where we can. But in considering new methods of organization we cannot be too careful to see that, to our own peoples, the new methods will not appear as an attempt to limit their freedom of decision, or to peoples outside the Commonwealth, as an attempt to establish a separate bloc. Let us beware lest in changing the form we lose the substance; or, for appearance's sake, sacrifice reality. I am told that, somewhere, over the grave of one who did not know when he was well off, there is the following epitaph: "I was well; I wanted to be better; and here I am".

Honourable senators, in closing let me say that I feel the Senate Divorce Committee is performing a very important duty in a capable fashion, and that a large section of the people of Canada accept this work as something that is salutary. The committee has reached the height of achievement. There is little real trouble in the other house over divorce bills, and in general the divorce work is carried on in a harmonious manner. For these reasons I propose to vote against this bill.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I would like to ask the honourable senator a question just to clarify something that I do not quite understand. He has criticized the approach made to this question by the bill before us. I understood him to say, although I can hardly believe he meant it, that this matter should be placed under the jurisdiction of the Superior Court of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I thought you did.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I said that it would look better if the bill provided that petitioners apply to the Superior Court of Quebec rather than to the Exchequer Court of Canada, which functions on the Ontario side of the Ottawa River, outside of the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Is that your remedy?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: No, that is not my remedy; that is my criticism.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, for Hon. Mr. Roebuck, the debate was adjourned.

DEBATE PROCEDURE

QUESTION OF RIGHT OF MOVER OF THIRD READING TO REPLY—RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I ask your indulgence to place on our records a ruling on the right of the mover of the third reading of a bill to reply.

Bourinot, 4th edition, at page 344, under the heading "Limitation of Debate", says:

> Senate rule 35 provides that "no senator may speak twice to a question before the Senate, except in explanation of a material part of his speech, in which he may have been misconceived, and then he is not to introduce new matter". And by the following rule 36 "a reply is allowed to a senator who has moved the second reading of a bill or made a substantive motion, but not to one who has moved an amendment, the previous question, an adjournment during debate, a motion on the consideration of Commons' amendments, or an instruction to a committee". In all cases the reply of the mover of the original question closes the debate. But it is the duty of the Speaker to see that every senator wishing to speak has the opportunity to do so before the final reply. The rules of the House of Commons are similar on these points. They may be summarized as follows: (1) No member may speak twice to a question; he may however explain a material part of his speech which may have been misquoted or misunderstood but he is not to introduce new matter. (2) No debate is allowable upon such explanation. (3) A reply is allowed to a member who has moved a substantive motion or the second reading of a bill. (4) But no reply is allowed to a member who has moved an order of the day (not being the second reading of a bill), an amendment, the previous question, an adjournment during a debate, or an instruction to a committee. (5) A reply is allowed to a mover of a substantive motion, although the debate thereon, by being adjourned, becomes an order of the day. (6) In all cases the reply of the mover of the original motion closes the debate. (7) But it is the duty of the speaker to see that every member who wishes to speak has the opportunity to do so before the final reply.

In the debate on Tuesday, March 6, Senator Hayden moved the third reading of Bill H-5, which was an item on the Orders of the Day.

The motion was not a substantive motion within the meaning of that term as it is defined in paragraph "B" of rule 4, which reads as follows:

> Substantive motion—a motion not incidental to a proceeding before the Senate, nor relating to and arising out of an Order of the Day.

He, therefore, after making his motion, had no right of reply.

Under Rule 38, if he had merely moved the Order without speaking to it, he would have been entitled to address the Senate on that Order at a subsequent period of the debate. However he did rise, and move the third reading—and according to the interpretation which Bourinot places on his action, as he in fact did say a word or two, according to a strict interpretation of the rule, he was prohibited from again addressing the House.

May, 14th edition, at page 422, says:

> Formerly a member who had moved an Order of the Day was precluded afterwards from addressing the House upon the same question, or was heard merely by the indulgence of the House, but under present usage the option of speaking at a subsequent period of the debate has been conceded.

Senator Hayden's speech on third reading of Bill H-5 would not have been ruled "out of order" in the House of Lords, since in moving the Order of the Day previously he made no comment or explanation. In view of the practice in the House of Lords, I do not think that Rule 38 should be interpreted too strictly, and accordingly I am of the opinion that in the circumstances Senator Hayden's speech was in order.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TELEVISION PICTURES OF WORKMEN LOADING PLANES FOR SHIPMENT TO EGYPT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). It has to do with an article which appeared in the press the other day describing how a C.B.C. television cameraman was kicked around for taking pictures of workmen loading nine Canadian Harvard training planes aboard the Dutch freighter Wonogiri, which sailed for Egypt shortly after.

My question is: In view of the serious situation in the Middle East, what specific purpose had the C.B.C. in mind for filming of such a controversial subject?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am sure I do not know. Probably some other honourable senator may know.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It is time somebody checked them up.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I can take it, then, that the question is a checking up on the C.B.C. rather than an inquiry.

Hon. Mr. Reid: You can take it that way; you are quite correct.

PRIVATE BILL

WESTERN GOSPEL MISSION—THIRD READING

Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien moved the third reading of Bill F-5, an Act to incorporate the Western Gospel Mission.

EXCHEQUER COURT (DIVORCE JURISDICTION) BILL

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, seconded by Hon. Mrs. Hodges, for the second reading of Bill I-5, an Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, when the senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) told me in the early days of this session that he intended to introduce a bill to give to the Exchequer Court of Canada jurisdiction over divorce applications from the provinces of Newfoundland and Quebec, I felt that I must support such a measure. However, I would point out that that was an off-hand opinion. I hope my honourable friend will not feel disappointed, and certainly not annoyed, when I tell him that, having since given to the bill which he later introduced a most careful and painstaking consideration, I am not now of quite the same opinion as at the time of our interview.

So, without jumping to any final conclusions as to my attitude on the matter, let me say in my opening sentences that I agree, and very heartily, with much that the honourable senator told us in his comprehensive and masterly address upon the second reading of this bill.

I heartily concur in one of the leading propositions advanced by the honourable senator from Rosetown, that the proposed transfer of jurisdiction from Parliament to the Exchequer Court must not and cannot be based upon any imputation that the work which is now being performed is not being well done, or that the cases which come before us from time to time for adjudication are not being conscientiously and capably heard and decided by our Standing Committee on Divorce.

The honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) is a lawyer of wide experience and great independence of both thought and expression. He spoke with real authority when he told us a few days ago that in his opinion the Senate Committee on Divorce is the best divorce court in Canada. With great humility, and such modesty as I can muster on such an occasion, I wish to say that I heartily agree with him. I think—not to speak in superlatives—it is as good a court as can be found in any of the provinces of Canada. I thank the honourable senator heartily for the kind statements he made with regard to my predecessor in this office, the honourable senator from Rosetown, and also with regard to myself, and for the commendation which he extended to the members—the competent and careful members—who do the work of the Divorce Committee.

I would like to think, honourable senators, that we in the Senate unanimously support this proposition—that a transfer of jurisdiction in the matter of divorce petitions from Newfoundland and Quebec to the Exchequer Court of Canada would not result in any better hearings or in any wiser adjudications than are now being had. I say I would like to think that we are unanimous on that subject; I believe we are.

Nor can it be said that the burden on the members of the Divorce Committee who hear these cases is such as to make necessary the change proposed in the bill before us. Though it is true that the number of cases has greatly increased as the years have gone by, it is my judgment that the task is not now nearly so burdensome as it was when the honourable senator from Rosetown was chairman of the committee, and very manfully—and I compliment him most heartily on his work—struggled to carry the entire burden of the docket in one committee, or with the committee divided into two sections.

The reorganization whereby the cases are heard by subcommittees has been, I submit, a great success; it has resulted in the development of a number of most competent chairmen of subcommittees, supported by equally well-informed and capable members. The subcommittees hear the evidence, make the original recommendations and report to the general committee. Points of law, precedure and so forth are frequently discussed in plenary session. The general result is a uniformity in administration, in policy and in procedure which, in my judgment, is highly commendable and very desirable.

This year the committee commenced its labours almost immediately after the opening of the session. Three committees sat simultaneously five days per week for a fortnight, at the end of which time—unfortunately, as I think—all the cases ready for adjudication had been heard. Had lawyers been ready to proceed with cases more promptly, by this time the docket would have been pretty well cleaned up. As a matter of fact, the committee has been sitting two days per week since the first two weeks and has disposed of something of the order of 200 cases. I may tell the Senate on behalf of the committee—and I am sure my colleagues will support me in this statement—that we can dispose of divorce applications as fast as the cases are brought to us by the solicitors in charge of them, and we can do so without undue strain upon ourselves.

It is, of course, reasonable to expect that as the years go by the number of these cases will increase; they may even be doubled; but I will say on behalf of the committee that if such an increase does occur, by a little reorganization we shall be equal to the task no matter how great the task may grow. The question is one of organization and management; these being attended to, we can handle just as many cases as it can be reasonably expected will come to us.

It is true, as the honourable senator from Vancouver South kindly stated, that my colleagues and I sometimes come from the hearing of a long, protracted and contested case thoroughly exhausted. I may add that not infrequently we come from a hearing disturbed and concerned because of the human factors involved in our decision. But, honourable senators, what of it?

The honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) mentioned the reluctance with which she listens to—I quote her words—"these sorry recitals of alleged marital infidelity." The honourable senator has a facility in making condensed and cryptic statements of that kind. I assure her that I agree with her in that statement. The long succession of tawdry stories of marital inharmony and the inelegant details of illicit sexual relations are neither elevating nor entertaining. But these are not the things that enter our minds when we listen to divorce cases. We hardly hear them from that point of view. Let it not be forgotten that the real interest of the members of the Divorce Committee lies in the plight of the poor humans who come before us with their broken marriages and frustrated lives. Many of these poor people who appeal to us for our assistance have been deeply hurt, not just in an external way but in the inner man, if I may so express it, beneath the hide, and we do what we can to assist them. Our minds are occupied, of course, in the conduct of the trials, the application of the rules of evidence, and in the prospective decision which it is within our authority to make.

The poet Pope once said that the proper study of mankind is man; and of course he included in that the study of women, though that is a little more abstruse today than it was in Mr. Pope's day. I assure you, however, that the work of the Divorce Committee is not without its human appeal.

It is true that I frequently begrudge the time I spend on divorce work, as I would of course prefer to expend such energy and vitality as I possess on subjects of more general significance. But this is work to be done, and we on the Divorce Committee feel that so long as this duty is required of us we are prepared to perform it, and as gracefully and cheerfully as possible. Certainly, honourable senators, the relief of the members of the Divorce Committee, under all those circumstances, is no reason for the change proposed in this bill.

Let me summarize the points I have already made. Firstly, in my judgment—and I think it is concurred in by most of those who hear my voice at this moment—the proposed transfer would not improve the soundness of the hearings nor the wisdom of the decisions in these divorce cases. Secondly, the work of the committee is not unduly burdensome. Thirdly, the committee can handle these cases as they come and can expand its organization to meet the requirements of any reasonably anticipated growth. Fourthly, in my judgment the members are rendering—and once again I think you will agree with me—a necessary public service, and I can say on their behalf that they are prepared to continue giving this service so long as is necessary.

Somebody might reasonably ask me why, under these circumstances, at first blush I expressed myself as in favour of this bill. I can explain this, and I think I should do so. The honourable senator from Vancouver South has assured us that the British North America Act gives to the Parliament of Canada complete jurisdiction over both marriage and divorce excepting only the solemnizing of marriage, which is reserved by that act to the provinces. In my opinion the word "divorce" in the British North America Act includes those things which are incidental to divorce, or, as the lawyers say, ancillary to divorce. I refer to such matters as the care and custody of children, the division of common marital property, maintenance or alimony, and so forth. When these matters are associated with divorce and are consequent upon the granting of divorce, they are ancillary to divorce and come within the meaning of the word "divorce" in the British North America Act.

In my opinion, the Senate has a constitutional authority over these matters ancillary to divorce as well as over divorce itself, but we have never exercised this authority. I think the reason is plain—we have no machinery at all for carrying out judgments in such matters. It is like the difference between the old courts of common law and the courts of equity. The common law courts could give judgments in damages, but it took the courts of equity to give judgments in matters such as the care and custody of children, specific performance, and so forth. The courts of equity had all the king's horses and all the king's men, which the common law courts did not have. We are in the latter position. The general courts of our country have the machinery with which to carry out their decrees and enforce them, and we have nothing of that sort. In addition to this, the local courts of the various provinces, including Quebec and Newfoundland, have been doing this work ever since Confederation, and thus they have relieved us in this house of the necessity for doing it ourselves. Yet, honourable senators, would it not be a good thing if the whole matter of divorce, including the dissolution of marriage, the disposition, care and custody of children, the division of common marital property, the problems of maintenance and alimony, and all those things incidental or ancillary to divorce, were dealt with by one tribunal? That is how divorce is handled in the superior courts of the provinces.

Honourable senators, I felt at first blush that the Exchequer Court would have the ability, as well as the jurisdiction, to handle these broader questions that are involved in divorce, and in consequence that I should support the bill. However, on more mature consideration, I have come to the conclusion that if the transfer of jurisdiction in these matters in petitions from Quebec and Newfoundland is in fact desirable, the Exchequer Court of Canada is not the court that should receive that jurisdiction.

Let me give you some idea of what the Exchequer Court of Canada is in character, and let me indicate in the broadest terms the nature of its jurisdiction. Broadly speaking, the Exchequer Court was constituted to deal with: (1) claims against the Crown; (2) controversies between Canada and the provinces, and between the provinces; (3) matters concerning interprovincial railways; and (4) cases relating to the dominion railways. The Exchequer Court interferes between subject and subject, generally speaking, only in such cases where patents, copyrights and trademarks are concerned. It is not a court constituted for the trial of ordinary litigation between person and person, as are the courts of the provinces.

The senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) said that she favours the bill because —and I will use the honourable lady's own words, for I like to quote her—

> . . . it offers a less expensive process for those who are seeking legal rescue from marriages which have already foundered on the rocks of incompatibility.

Isn't that nicely stated? Well, if it offers a less expensive process, that is certainly an argument in its favour. But would it result in a decrease in the expense of divorce? Would the process in the Exchequer Court be any less expensive than the processes of the parliamentary committees which now handle it?

Section 3(6) of Bill I-5, which is the bill under discussion, says:

> The divorce jurisdiction conferred upon the Court shall be exercised only at the City of Ottawa.

Note the words, "only at the City of Ottawa." That is to say, the Exchequer Court, if given the jurisdiction would hear divorce cases in the City of Ottawa, just as we do now in the Senate divorce committee; in other words, the litigants in divorce, if this bill became law, would find it necessary themselves to come to the City of Ottawa, to bring their lawyers and their counsel, and their witnesses, from various places in Newfoundland or Quebec, just as at present. The change in tribunal would not, therefore, affect the expense of doing what is the major expense in any law suit, and certainly the major expense in divorce cases necessarily heard in the city of Ottawa. The bringing to Ottawa of all the persons connected with the trial—witnesses, lawyers and litigants and so forth—is, I think, the major expense involved in divorce applications to Parliament, and this proposal to transfer jurisdiction from Parliament to the Exchequer Court would not affect that expense in the least degree.

The senator from Victoria also pointed out that litigants in the courts may refer to taxing officers the lawyers' bills which they receive. May I say to her that the taxing officer goes over the bill, scales it down, or up, as he sees fit, and his certificate of a lawyer's bill is the equivalent of a judgment upon which execution may issue. That is a very ready and quick method of decision as between the litigant and his lawyer. However, unfortunately at the present moment, I am quite unable to say that the fees allowed by the taxing officer of the Exchequer Court would be any less than the fees now charged by lawyers before the Senate Committee on Divorce. I say this for two reasons. First: I have no real knowledge what the taxing officer might in the future allow. I have some little knowledge of what he allows in analogous cases, and it is not a small amount. I have very sketchy knowledge indeed as to what is now being charged by the lawyers who appear before the Senate committee. But I am certain of this, that the likelihood of reduction in the lawyer's fees as a result of a change from what now exists to the supervision of the taxing officer of the Exchequer Court is not so sure as to warrant the transfer of jurisdiction from our tribunal to that of the Exchequer Court.

It is also true, as I think someone has pointed out, that the Exchequer Court would have authority to set its own fees, just as we have done, and that those fees might be less than the $210 which is charged for a private bill. But Parliament also has the power to reduce its charges to persons seeking divorce, if it feels it is desirable to do so, and I am quite sure that were a resolution introduced in this house to reduce our charges in the ordinary run of cases considerable discussion would result.

In fact we are now reducing the amounts which the applicant for divorce has to pay, and we readily do so when the financial circumstances and conditions of the applicant justify it. At the last two sittings of the committee we reduced the fees in certain cases to $50. This amount, I may say, is perhaps even less than that which an applicant for divorce in the Exchequer Court or in any of the high courts of the provinces would have to pay. Before either of those courts a plaintiff would have disbursements for the issuing of a writ, the filing of a statement of claim and other documents, examinations for discovery and so forth, which would easily amount to $50. So if it is desirable that the fees for parliamentary divorce be reduced, we, with the consent of the other house, can readily reduce them.

Honourable senators, it is very difficult for me to say—and equally difficult for anyone to say—that the proposed transfer of divorce jurisdiction from Parliament to the Exchequer Court would result in any real reduction in costs to the applicant. After thinking this question over—and in particular the two points as to the type and purpose of the court, and the likelihood of any relief in costs to the litigants—I have come to the conclusion that if it is desirable to remove from Parliament divorce applications from these two provinces they should be transferred to the Superior Courts in the provinces in question, and not to the Exchequer Court of Canada. This course was followed with respect to Ontario and other provinces.

If this were done, the trials would take place in the area where the parties reside, before judges used to person-to-person contests and to giving judgments on evidence as presented to them and according to law. Also, were this done, undoubtedly the travelling and other expenses of divorce hearings would be substantially reduced. But while I think that greater advantage would be gained by transfer of this divorce jurisdiction to the local Superior Courts than to the Exchequer Court, it does not necessarily follow that were this bill altered to transfer the jurisdiction to the Superior Courts I would be prepared out of hand to vote for it.

I have listened with interest to the speakers who have preceded me in this debate—with the exception of my honourable friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Hon. Mr. Kinley), whom I did not have the pleasure and advantage of hearing last evening—and able though their speeches were, they seemed to me to deal with only half of the subject. The other half, which to my mind is perhaps the more difficult part, was scarcely mentioned.

May I interrupt my remarks at this point to reminisce a little? I recall reading with pleasure many years ago a little book entitled A Slow Train Through Arkansas. I see around me some smiles, indicating that others too read and enjoyed the book. It was full of wit, fun and wisecracks. It contained a quip about an ambitious town in the west, through which the railway ran without stopping, as did most trains. One bit of humour comes to mind about a conversation between a lady passenger and the conductor. Said the lady passenger: "Can't you go faster than this?" The conductor replied: "Why certainly, madam, I can go faster, but I don't want to get ahead of my thain."

In matters of legislation, as in railroading, it is very important that we do not "get ahead of our train".

There may be advantages in the transfer of divorce jurisdiction from Parliament to the courts, but, honourable senators, I have still to hear any demand for it from the provinces most intimately concerned. On the other hand, there has been most definite and long-standing objection from the province of Quebec to such a proposition.

I am no authority on why the leaders, religious and otherwise, in the province of Quebec are so definitely opposed to the establishment of a divorce court. They may be wrong in their stand, but who are we to presume that we know more about what is good for them than they know themselves, or, having determined what is good for them, that we should force it upon them? There are suggestions that the leaders of Quebec's public opinion are illogical in their objections. Perhaps they are, but who am I to set myself up as one wiser than they in their own affairs? Moreover, honourable senators, logic is not the last word in human affairs. Consistency has been called by someone in the past the bane of small minds. The great Lord Halsbury, the editor of the Encyclopedia of the Laws of England, is quoted as saying that some lawyers make the mistake of thinking the law is logical. It is not. The law is as you find it. And I may conclude this bit of philosophizing by saying that human thought is much too complex to be measured by a slide rule.

If I may reminisce again about things I have read: A. A. Milne, the writer of delightful child verses, who died just recently, tells us of the king who merely wanted a little bit of butter for his bread and who resisted manfully the efforts of his household to substitute a little bit of marmalade instead, notwithstanding that his household urged upon him that the marmalade was tasty if very thickly spread. Well, like the king in Milne's story, most of us want what we want when we want it; we are not going to have our wants channelled in the likes and dislikes of others; we are going to have what we want, whether it be logical or illogical or whatnot. And for some reason satisfactory to itself, though perhaps obscure to some of the rest of us, the province of Quebec does not now want and has not in the past wanted a divorce court.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question? Does he think that the minority in the province of Quebec should have the same rights as the people of the other provinces?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I will discuss minorities in a moment, if the honourable senator will permit me. I was just now saying that for reasons satisfactory to itself the province of Quebec does not now want and has not in the past wanted a divorce court. And are we, the members of this chamber, to force one upon that province, even if we think it would be for its own good?

All my life long I have espoused the cause of minorities; it just seems natural for me to be on the side of the underdog; and I submit that while I have few other qualifications, this is sufficient for a senator, to be on the side of the underdog and in support of minorities.

Now, as my honourable friend has just indicated, majorities have their rights. We in this country rule by the word and power of the majority, but so too have minorities their rights, and I say to you that in any well-governed country the majority carefully refrains from the exercise of arbitrary power over the minority, to the very extent that it is possible to do so and still carry on. Both have their rights. The rights of the majority, of course, are superior to those of a minority, but wise governments and wise people will be very slow indeed in arbitrarily exercising rights to which a minority strongly objects.

The prime purpose of the Senate when it was constituted by the British North America Act in 1867 was the protection of minorities—protection of minorities in their rights and in their freedoms. I might go a little further than that and say protection in even their legal whims—yes, even in their prejudices. And in the past the province of Quebec has felt secure in the minority position which it holds in Confederation because it has relied upon the Senate to protect it against the arbitrary rule of a majority. And may I point out to my fellow members of this house that during all these troubled years—troubled for the Senate since 1867—the Senate's best friend has been the province of Quebec.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: And shall we now, honourable senators, at long last forget the role in which we were cast in Confederation and indulge in what the province of Quebec will certainly consider arbitrary legislation? To do so would, in my judgment and in my submission to you, be to reverse almost everything good for which we in this chamber stand. Are we to sacrifice now at this long last, after 80 or 90 years of experience, the esteem, the friendship, the regard and the confidence of large sections of the people of Quebec for the supposed advantage of a mere procedural measure? I think not.

Somebody might say to me, "Did you not support the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill last session?" I did. But observe this, honourable senators, that the two provinces affected by the bill before us were specifically exempted from the bill of last session. That bill applied only to those provinces which had divorce courts. Moreover, there was certainly a demand, according to my judgment, from a large number of people in those provinces, for the substantive changes provided in last session's bill, whereas there is no manifestation of any desire for the bill now before us. Finally, the bill of last year affected the substantive law of divorce, and I felt it my duty to those who might be affected by the law of divorce to vote for that bill. But how utterly different is this.

This bill would have no effect upon the law of divorce, but only divorce procedure. And there is no demand for the bill from the two provinces which would be affected by it.

So I say to the senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) and to other kind senators of this chamber who agree with him, let us be patient. If there is a general, material advantage in the change of procedure outlined in this bill, or some other such change of procedure, can we not rely upon the good sense of the province of Quebec not only to tolerate it, in time, but actually to come here and ask for it? If it is worthwhile and does not meet with the objections to which the people affected are wedded, will they not in due season come here and request it? And would that not be the time for us to act, rather than prematurely forcing something upon them which they do not desire? Is not the little suggestion that I took the liberty of making—Let us not get ahead of our train—applicable here?

And so, honourable senators, after the most careful consideration that is within my power, and with some regrets that I could not go along with the sponsor of this bill—who has undoubtedly performed a useful service in bringing this measure before this house—with some regrets but with perfect confidence now, so far as I am concerned, in the soundness of my position, I feel that I must vote "no" to this bill.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I think I should say in the first place that if the honourable gentleman who introduced this bill (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) wanted to find a good reason why it should have been introduced, the speech which has just been made would probably justify everything that he has done. It is, I feel, one of the most remarkable speeches that we have heard in this chamber for a long time; and in my opinion the same description applies to the other speeches, including that of the sponsor of the bill, which have been made in the course of this debate.

It seems to me that the introduction of the bill raises, as the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) has said, a fundamental question for this chamber. But that question is not, in my opinion, the question of divorce. It is inevitable, of course, that divorce enter into the discussion. But whether honourable senators are for divorce or against it, two entirely different considerations must, I think, ultimately determine this issue, and—again like the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity—as I see these considerations they are, first, the question of civil rights within a province; and second, the position of a minority before this chamber and before Parliament. If this view is right, and I shall submit that it is, it becomes important for the Senate, because of its special position in our parliamentary organization, to give that aspect of the problem special and serious consideration.

The avowed purpose of the bill, in its practical result, is to end parliamentary divorce in Canada, and to substitute for it a limited divorce jurisdiction in a federal court, the Exchequer Court of Canada. If the bill should pass, the judicial function now exercised by our Standing Committee on Divorce would practically disappear. This may be a good thing, but it is not, I think, the important matter in this issue.

I do not propose to discuss this measure particularly from the point of view of the province of Newfoundland, although some of the things which I say may bear upon the situation in that province. Most of our divorce applications come from Quebec, and I intend to direct my remarks primarily to the situation in respect of that province.

I, of course, am a senator not from Quebec but from Ontario, and I am a member of the bar of Ontario. But perhaps I may be justified in speaking upon this aspect of this problem because my early training in law was obtained in a law school of Quebec, and I retain my membership in the bar of that province. I would not have any honourable senator suppose for a moment that I am an authority on the law of the province of Quebec, but perhaps, because of this training, I have some competence in that field.

It is not suggested in the bill that some provincial court should be clothed with authority to assume divorce jurisdiction, as was done in the case of Ontario when, in 1930, Parliament passed a Divorce Act for that province. No doubt a federal court was selected in this instance because the provincial law of Quebec does not recognize divorce. Accordingly, the transfer of a power now exercised by Parliament to a provincial court in Quebec would raise thorny and difficult legal problems. I think it can be assumed also that there is little prospect of Quebec law being changed in a way which would acknowledge divorce. It therefore appears reasonable to assume that the change contemplated in this bill is proposed to be made without any request or consent on the part of the authorities or of the people of Quebec, but unilaterally by the federal Parliament. Thereafter the hearing and determination of petitions for divorce from residents of Quebec would be transferred from Parliament to the Exchequer Court, which for the handling of divorce cases would sit only at Ottawa.

The first question which arises in my mind—and it arose also in the mind of the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris)—is this: Has Parliament the authority to pass this bill? Has it the authority to pass it without the consent of the province concerned, and, perhaps, even in the face of opposition from either Quebec or Newfoundland?

Section 91 of the British North America Act of 1867 reads in part as follows:

> . . . it is hereby declared that . . . the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated;

Then follows subsection 26:

> Marriage and Divorce.

From this portion of the legislation it will be clear that, in the literal meaning of the statute, the power to pass this bill is vested in the Parliament of Canada; and I would think that if the bill were passed, and if later its validity were questioned in the courts, and assuming that the courts applied the ordinary and normal rules for the interpretation of statutes, the legislation would be held to be valid. In this conclusion I concur not only with the honourable gentleman from Vancouver South, but as well with the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity, and I say at once that to agree with them on a proposition of this kind is like being against sin: you cannot be wrong.

It is true, of course, that under subsection 13 of section 92 of the British North America Act general legislative jurisdiction is vested in the provincial legislature for matters touching property and civil rights in a province. It will be acknowledged that divorce, which so basically affects the social organization in a community, is in the field of "civil rights", as these words are generally understood. In other words, the manner of handling divorce is a function of the civil law. But at the time of Confederation the legislative jurisdiction in matters of divorce was not conferred upon the provincial authority but was explicitly conferred upon the federal Parliament. In other words, the subject-matter of divorce was lifted by the Imperial Parliament out of the general body of powers given to provincial legislatures in matters of civil rights, and was deposited among the powers over which the federal authority would exercise exclusive jurisdiction.

Let me put it in another way. In 1930, when Parliament passed the Divorce Act (Ontario), the federal authority did not relinquish to that province its power to legislate upon divorce. Rather, that act declared that the divorce law which would run in Ontario thenceforth would be the law of England as of a certain date. From this declaration it followed that in Ontario thereafter, for the administration of justice in matters of divorce, resort could be had to the courts of Ontario. The validity of that act has not been successfully questioned. I doubt if it could be successfully questioned, and I think the same could be said of this bill if it becomes effective. Perhaps I should add that pursuant to the authority vested in Ontario in 1930, that province proceeded in 1931 to enact the Matrimonial Causes Act. This Ontario legislation deals with such matters as maintenance, alimony, custody, and the settlement of property rights between the consorts. There are no such provisions made by the bill now before the Senate, and so it can be assumed that jurisdiction over these matters—which and perhaps here I disagree slightly with the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), I think are matters of property and civil rights within the province —should remain in the courts of the provinces to which this bill applies.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Would the honourable senator permit me to interrupt to ask a question? I am not familiar with the history of the establishment of the Senate Divorce Committee, but I take it that the committee was set up for the benefit of certain minorities. Were the people of Quebec consulted when the Senate undertook to handle divorce petitions?

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Would the honourable gentleman allow me to continue with my remarks? I had proposed to discuss that very problem later on, and if I do not do so to his satisfaction perhaps he would ask a further question at that time.

Honourable senators, while the competence of Parliament to pass this bill is important, I do say it is not the only factor to be considered. It may be of value to touch upon some aspects of the history of divorce applications in England as we consider this bill. For centuries in England the ecclesiastical courts exercised jurisdiction in matrimonial matters. Divorce, as we know it, was not granted by those courts. But Parliament in Britain, which is a unitary state, is, of course, omnicompetent. While the British Parliament did not in the early days set up courts with a divorce jurisdiction, that Parliament could and did pass special bills dissolving marriages. And those special acts of Parliament issuing from the highest legislative authority in England were, before the law of that country, valid divorces. This was the practice in England for 150 years from the time of the early 1700's. Divorce applications were made to Parliament; but by 1857, as the demand for divorce grew, the jurisdiction to hear divorce petitions was removed from Parliament to the courts, and there it has remained. That was done in 1857, just ten years before Canada's Confederation.

In Canada, between 1840 and 1867, what is now Ontario and Quebec were governed under the provisions of the Act of Union of 1840. There was a single legislature with an Upper and a Lower House. There were no divorce courts and the parliamentary practice in use in England until 1857 was used in Canada for divorce matters. The approach of the members of the legislature of that time to bills of divorce was the same as that which obtains in the Parliament of Canada today. The Roman Catholic members voted against the bills, but there was a sufficient number of favourable votes to enable the bills to pass.

During the discussions which led to Confederation, the question of handling divorce became important. Under Confederation Canada was to have a federal scheme of organization. Under this federal scheme jurisdiction in matters of property and civil rights was to be one of the principal powers of the provincial authority. If some special treatment had not been given to the question of divorce, the subject-matter of divorce would have fallen into the general category of powers described as "civil rights". The provincial legislature would have had control of such matters.

If this had been done it might not have raised a problem in three of the four original provinces—Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. But it did raise a problem in Quebec, and perhaps not so much because of the Catholic majority as because of the minority who were not Catholics.

The plan of Confederation proposed to set up provincial legislatures for each of the provinces. It was a foregone conclusion that the vast majority in the Quebec Legislature would be Catholics. Their practice had been to vote against divorce bills. If, then, jurisdiction in respect of divorce became a prerogative of the provincial power, the minority in Quebec who were not Catholics, it was assumed, would have been precluded from obtaining parliamentary divorce from the Quebec Legislature. It goes without saying also that it was not to be expected that the law of Quebec would be changed after Confederation to enable the courts of Quebec to grant divorce. It became apparent that unless something were done to subtract divorce from the provincial powers over civil rights, which were proposed to be given to the provinces, no resident of Quebec could have divorce.

In the circumstances the solution proposed was that divorce jurisdiction should reside in the federal authority. That is why it is here now. Thus the parliamentary practice which prevailed in England until 1857, and in Canada since 1840 and before, could be continued. This was the solution adopted.

I would think that, viewed in the perspective of the years, the Quebec representatives in the Confederation discussions should be commended for this decision. They recognized that an injustice would have been inflicted upon a Quebec minority if they had acted otherwise, and they acted to prevent that injustice. The Confederation debates contain many passages which bear this out.

Edouard Remillard, the member for Bellechasse in the Union Parliament, declared himself in this way:

> It would have been an act of injustice to endeavour to force our opinions on this subject (divorce) on the English and Protestant population of Lower Canada; and if an attempt had been made to do so, Confederation would have probably failed, because the majority of the members of the conference would have maintained their claims and this would have been sufficient to prevent confederation . . . Our public men have made a compromise.

John Scoble, the representative from Elgin West in Upper Canada, made this plea:

> Protestants at large regard marriage as a civil contract only and consequently dissoluble on cause shown.

I do not necessarily say that is right, but I am quoting.

> This view ought not to be offensive to the judgment or the conscience of our Catholic friends for it will not and cannot interfere in the slightest degree either with the form or the continuity of their marriages; and surely they will grant to us, the non-Catholic section of the province, that liberty of conscience in this matter which they claim to enjoy themselves . . . I rely rather on the good sense and good feeling of Catholics themselves, and above all, on the religious liberty secured to us in this province.

It is obvious from these extracts, and from others which could be cited, that the representatives in the Assembly at the time of Confederation were anxious not to deprive a religious minority in Quebec of a right to which they felt themselves entitled and which might have been denied them if jurisdiction in matters of divorce were to be vested in the local legislature. However, there were some fears expressed in many quarters.

A. A. Dorion, from Hochelaga, said:

> But suppose that the federal Parliament were to enact that there should be divorce courts in each section of the province . . . and who is to prevent the federal legislature from establishing a tribunal of this kind in Lower Canada if they are established elsewhere . . . The explanation of the Solicitor General does not in the least prove that the federal Parliament had not the power to establish divorce courts in all the provinces.

Felix Geoffrion, a member of the Assembly from Vercheres, said this:

> We are told that our institutions and our civil laws will be fully protected, and that . . . our civil laws (are) placed beyond its—> reach. If this provision relating to marriage and divorce be adopted what will be the effect upon our civil laws?

That is, the federal Parliament's—

While the French Canadians of that time were willing, in the interests of fairness to a religious minority within their province, to surrender to the federal authority some of the power over civil rights, they were anxious also to preserve the principles of their civil law. Under the laws of their church, as well as under their civil law, divorce was prohibited. They were concerned lest there should be any encroachment upon this position.

It had not been easy for them to preserve the integrity of their laws and customs. They thought of them when they were under the British guns at Quebec in 1759, and in the Articles of Capitulation of that city the victors promised the people the right to the exercise of their Catholic religion. The promise was repeated in the terms of the Capitulation of Montreal the following year. The same guarantees were contained among the terms of the Treaty of Paris between France and England in 1763.

In 1774 the Imperial Parliament passed the Quebec Act. Again the guarantee of freedom for the exercise of the Roman Catholic religion was invoked; and it should not be forgotten that this concession was made over half a century before Catholic emancipation became law in England. But the Quebec Act contained more. It provided also that in matters relating to property and civil rights in French-speaking Canada, the law of Canada as it existed at the time of the cession should prevail. This law was based upon what is known as La Coutume de Paris—the customary law of Paris in the form in which it had been in force in Canada in 1759. This was an amazing and a prophetic provision. It was unprecedented, so far as I have been able to ascertain, in the history of British colonial affairs. Here, and here alone, within the Empire, were the British recognizing the validity of laws other than their own. By this legislation Britain acknowledged that customs, a language and a religion foreign to those which prevailed in Britain, might prevail in one part of the King's dominions. It was an act of magnanimity on the part of Britain. It was a recognition of a basic minority claim.

Perhaps it might be as well to say that the man who carried much of the burden for that enactment was General Guy Carleton, later

Lord Dorchester. And wherever minority rights are respected his name will be revered. It was he who recommended the legislation after four years as Governor at Quebec. It was he who faced Burke and Fox and Lord North in the committee of the British House of Commons and defended the legislation successfully. Examination at the hands of such distinguished parliamentarians and constitutionalists could have been no easy task for a soldier. We do not often remember that the Ontario county in which this capital city is located is called for him, the County of Carleton. Perhaps this should serve as a reminder of the respect that should always prevail in this county and city, and in this Parliament, for the position of the many minorities of which Canada is composed.

It was part of the law of Canada in 1759 that marriage was indissoluble during the lifetime of the consorts. This was the Church law and it was the law of the State, and the British Parliament decreed in 1774 that both were to be preserved. The same principle is embodied in article 185 of the Quebec Civil Code today. This article reads as follows:

> Marriage can only be dissolved by the natural death of one of the parties, while both live it is indissoluble.

That provision is based upon La Coutume de Paris, just as the Code is based upon La Coutume de Paris, and not, as misunderstood in many quarters, upon the Code Napoleon.

It may be argued that parliamentary divorce today in fact frustrates that provision of the Quebec Code. It may be argued that this bill will simply change the place where divorce petitions are to be heard and determined. It could be argued that Quebec cannot be heard to object now, because in 1865 its rights to legislate in this branch of the field of civil rights were surrendered. In a court of law such argument would be valid. But in dealing with the customs and the desires of a people, are we in the Parliament to apply only the cold rules for the interpretation of statutes when we are to decide what is to be done? Are we to consider only convenience or efficiency as we handle the hopes and aspirations of some of our own people?

It seems to me that if the problem is viewed in its historical prospective, it was not in contemplation in 1865, when the compromise was made in the interests of a religious minority within Quebec, that a federal court or any court should be empowered to adjudicate in a manner completely at variance with article 185. It may be that the granting of parliamentary bills of divorce to residents of Quebec does in fact subtract from the integrity of the French law of 1759. But there is some logic if you say that each such bill is but an exception to the general rule. And it occurs to me, at least, that you go much farther along the road—do you not really abrogate the Quebec law of the indissolubility of marriages?—if you establish a court, the rule of which overrides the rule contained in article 185.

Now, I know that 400 exceptions per year begin to weaken the rule. However, 400 exceptions a year viewed against the marriage rate of the province and against its population, may still be the exceptional situation. No doubt—and I think honourable senators will agree—if the jurisdiction were transferred from Parliament to the court there would be a great many more exceptions than obtain through parliamentary divorce.

The honourable gentleman from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) suggested that discretionary power be vested in the court. That suggestion is, I think, a helpful one. I have discussed the matter briefly with him in an informal way. However, I wonder whether the vesting of a purely discretionary power in the court would not ultimately be exercised as if it were a mandatory power. I believe that, as time went on, the question of whether it was mandatory or discretionary would in practice make very little difference.

This bill proposes that the Exchequer Court in its hearing of divorces from the two provinces concerned should sit only in Ottawa. But who is to say that at some later date it might not be empowered to sit for that purpose elsewhere? Fears were expressed at the time of Confederation that courts which could override the Quebec law might be established. From what I have been able to learn, such a court as this was not wanted then and is not wanted now. The preservation of the integrity of the civil laws of Quebec has been close to the hearts of the people of Quebec from its earliest days. I do not propose to embark upon an explanation of the reason for that situation: I desire only to draw to the attention of the Senate the suggestion that to pass this bill might infringe upon a provincial claim, upon a minority claim; it might unilaterally violate a compromise; and perhaps considerable regard should be had for the views of those who were necessary parties to the agreement when it was made, in 1865.

As the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) has said, if this is the issue we in the Senate have a very special function to perform. When Sir John Macdonald discussed the function of our Upper House at the time of Confederation, he said this:

> In order to protect local interests . . . it was found requisite that the three great divisions into which British North America is separated should be represented in the Upper House on the principle of equality.

And later, he said:

> To the Upper House is to be confided the protection of sectional interests.

And in another place, he said:

> We will enjoy here the great test of constitutional freedom—we will have the rights of minorities respected. In all countries the rights of majorities take care of themselves, but it is only in countries like England, enjoying constitutional liberty, . . . that the rights of minorities are regarded.

The Earl of Carnarvon, who had the carriage of the British North America Act in the House of Lords in 1867, when discussing the Senate had this to say:

> The fundamental principle upon which the Senate is constructed is the representation and promotion of sectional interests. The principle upon which the House of Commons is founded is that of representation in accordance with population.

Macdonald and the other Fathers of Confederation not only hoped for the respect of minority rights, but they conceived this interest as a special responsibility of the Senate.

Honourable senators, there is one more point upon which I should like to touch briefly. It is said that the hearing of applications for divorce is not a proper function of a legislative body, and that a judicial function like the one discharged by our divorce committee should be severely separated from the legislative power. This principle was recognized when the Constitution of the United States was drawn. But it is not necessarily a proper view to apply to the institution of parliament as we know it.

The Right Honourable Arthur Meighen used to refer often to "the High Court of Parliament", and for this description he has a great body of valid precedent to support him. Parliament originally was a court, and exercised a judicial function. Sir John Macdonald said of the proposed Constitution:

> It was in the main formed on the model of the Constitution of Great Britain, adapted to the circumstances of a new country . . . I am strongly of the belief that we have in a great measure avoided in this system which we proposed for the adoption of the people of Canada, the difficulties which time and events have shown to exist in the American Constitution.

In many respects the Canadian Senate was patterned as to constitution and functions upon the House of Lords. Indeed, Lord Carnarvon, in the same speech to which I have referred, said of the House of Lords, "This House is generally assumed to be the model for the Canadian Upper House." As honourable senators know, the House of Lords exercises a most important appellate jurisdiction in the United Kingdom. It is the final court of appeal in that country, and in the British judicial organization it occupies the same position as the Supreme Court of Canada occupies in our Canadian system. While most members of the House of Lords are hereditary Peers, the Government of the day is entitled to the appointment of nine Lords of Appeal in Ordinary to assist the House of Lords to discharge its judicial function. These men are created Barons for life and they are paid an indemnity of £9,000 per annum, even though other peers receive no indemnity. The Law Lords sit under the chairmanship of the Lord Chancellor, who is as well their Speaker and head of the judiciary of the country. Although there are more than 850 members in the Lords, the quorum for that body is three.

The reason for this quorum is: until most recently each morning of the week the House sits at 10.30 for judicial business. When it assembles, the mace is brought in and prayers are said before the doors are opened. Thereafter the Lord Chancellor leaves the Woolsack and sits near the bar before which counsel appear. The other Lords of Appeal sit on the front benches on either side of him. The house functions as a court until about four o'clock in the afternoon, when the regular session begins.

The judicial business of the House of Lords is not delayed during the time Parliament is in recess after prorogation, because by an order of the House the Law Lords are empowered to continue to sit, and even after dissolution the Crown can and does authorize the Law Lords to sit.

When the judgment of the house on a case at the bar is delivered, the Lord Chancellor reads his speech to the house and the other Law Lords do likewise, in order of precedence. The Chancellor then takes up his position on the Woolsack and puts the question, which is resolved either for or against the appellant, as the majority decision determines. Only the Law Lords participate in that part of discussion in the house.

I may interject here that since 1947 the argument of appeals has been transferred to a committee. This was done to facilitate hearings when the Palace of Westminster was being rebuilt after the war damage. However, the house itself is the forum in which the speeches of judgment are given and in which the decision is rendered.

This recital of the judicial procedure in the House of Lords is not new to any member of the Senate of Canada. I mention it only to point up the fact that the Second Chamber in the Parliament of the United Kingdom—the chamber upon which the constitution and functioning of this Senate had been modelled—does discharge a judicial function and works under an elaborate but practical procedure to enable it to do so. And I think from this it can be inferred that the discharge of a judicial function is not foreign to a parliamentary body.

Now, honourable senators, I would like to relate this discussion to the functioning of the Standing Committee of the Senate on Divorce. Last year I was criticized, but mildly, for arguing against the bill to extend the grounds for divorce, but at the same time commending the work of the members of the Divorce Committee. I make no apology for the view which I then expressed. In spite of unfounded and ill-informed criticism outside this chamber, and to which the honourable member from Vancouver South spoke so well the other night, it is my view that the Senate Committee on Divorce operates in the highest and best traditions of our judicial organization in Canada. The work is tedious, the work is exhausting, just as it is for the members of the courts which exercise jurisdiction in this field in some of our provinces. The committee now has and has had as its chairman eminent counsel learned in the law, and many of its members have been distinguished members of the legal profession. In addition, honourable senators who are not lawyers serve upon the Divorce Committee with a knowledge and an experience of the judicial processes in respect of these causes no less complete than that of their legal colleagues. The chairman and members of the committee perform a service to this house, to Parliament and to Canada, which is incalculable. I wonder if enough people think of the contribution which honourable members have made to national unity, because in a loyal way through many years they have carried out the spirit of the Confederation agreements in respect of divorce.

For the various reasons that I have assigned, honourable senators, I shall not be able to support this measure.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Ross, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN PROVINCIAL INSURANCE COMPANY —ORDER FOR SECOND READING STANDS

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill R-6, intituled: "An Act to incorporate the Canadian Provincial Insurance Company."—(Hon. Senator Bouffard).

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Honourable senators, may I propose that second reading of this bill stand until the first sitting after the Easter recess?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: The order stands.

CRIMINAL LAW

JOINT COMMITTEE ON CERTAIN QUESTIONS —SENATE MEMBERS

The Senate proceeded to consideration of a message from the House of Commons regarding the appointing of a joint committee of both houses of Parliament to inquire into and report upon the questions whether the criminal law of Canada relating to (a) capital punishment, (b) corporal punishment or (c) lotteries should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved, with leave:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a joint committee of both Houses of Parliament to inquire into and report upon the questions whether the criminal law of Canada relating to (a) capital punishment, (b) corporal punishment or (c) lotteries, should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent;

That the following senators be appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the said joint committee, namely, the Honourable Senators Aseltine, Bouffard, Farris, Fergusson, Hayden, Hodges, McDonald, Roebuck, Veniot and Vien;

That the committee have power to appoint, from among their members, such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable or necessary; to call for persons, papers and records; to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate and to report from time to time;

That the minutes of the proceedings and the evidence of the special committees appointed at the last two sessions to inquire into and report upon the foregoing questions, together with all papers and records laid before them be referred to the said committee;

That the committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee for the use of the committee and of Parliament and that Rule 100 of the Senate be suspended in relation thereto;

That the committee have power to engage the services of counsel;

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that house accordingly.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I direct a question to the honourable Leader as to whether this committee intends to complete its findings at this session? It has already been functioning for two sessions, and I am wondering how long it can carry on. Perhaps there are too many lawyers on it to arrive at early findings.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Or not enough lawyers.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sorry but I am not a member of that committee. No doubt the committee will conclude its work as soon as it feels it has investigated the question thoroughly.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think I can give the honourable senator the information: At the end of last session all of the evidence had been taken, and in the interval an index was being prepared. That has been finished, and

I understand that all that has to be done now is the writing of the report.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The committee has to agree on it first.

The motion was agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Next sitting.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See pp. 279-81, 292)

STATEMENT MADE BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE AT THE OPENING OF THE FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE OF MARCH 9, 1956

At our October meeting the federal Government put forward certain suggestions in broad outline. These were discussed quite fully at that time and later both in conversations and correspondence. They were then developed into definite proposals in the Prime Minister's letters of January 6 and February 18. We have circulated a statistical paper to indicate how these proposals would operate in the first year of the proposed arrangements, that is, in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1958. No one can foretell accurately either the level or the provincial distribution of population, incomes and profits one or two years hence, but we believe that the assumptions on which this table is based are reasonable.

Last October I suggested three principles or objectives that we ought to have in mind—

(a) to assure as far as possible, to both the federal and provincial Governments, access to revenues consistent with their responsibilities;

(b) to develop and maintain fiscal arrangements that will contribute to high and stable levels of employment and that will tend to moderate rather than exaggerate the ups and downs in economic activity;

(c) to promote simplicity, economy and equity in the tax system as a whole and in the machinery of tax collection.

The system of tax rental agreements, which is about to enter its tenth and final year, went a long way toward meeting these objectives, but experience has shown that it has not succeeded in meeting all the considerations to which the members of this Conference attach importance. The proposals now before you are designed to reconcile as much as possible the various views represented around this table.

These proposals go just as far as we can go at this time in providing fiscal need grants and in reducing the extent to which we are occupying certain tax fields. On the assumptions we have made, our proposal will make available to the provincial Governments $640 million in the first year of the new arrangements. This is $108 million or 20 per cent more than would be available to them if the present tax rental agreements were renewed and all the provinces took full advantage of them. The $640 million is made up of:—

(a) Unconditional equalization grants	$152 million
(b) Revenues from the personal income, corporation and succession duty fields, either by rental agreements or collection agreements, or by direct provincial imposition and collection without any extra burden on the taxpayer	465 "
(c) Removal of the tax on insurance premiums from the definition of special corporation taxes	23 "
	$640 million

We believe that revenues of these magnitudes from these tax fields are consistent with the actual responsibilities at this time and what seems likely to develop in the next five years. Any province that considers that it requires larger (or smaller) revenues from these tax fields is, of course, entirely free to impose and collect whatever rates it deems proper; but if a provincial rate exceeds the standard rate it will not entitle the taxpayer to any additional credit or rebate from the federal treasury.

On our side, we cannot at this time make any further material concessions that would adversely affect our revenues. Defence expenditures have been stabilized in the past year or two at a high level (nearly $1,800,000,000). We can hope that they will not go higher, but we cannot be sure; neither is it wholly within our control, that they may not have to go up again quite sharply. Many of you will have noticed that defence estimates in both the United Kingdom and the United States have gone up this year.

During the past 15 years, with the consent, often at the urging of provincial Governments, we have taken on very large new classes of expenditures in the field of social welfare—unemployment insurance, family allowances, old age pensions and assistance, and other measures—which this year are costing the federal treasury not far short of $900 million, and are normally growing at a rate which will bring them over one billion dollars within five years. During the past year our total disbursement in these fields (including unemployment insurance benefits) was in fact over one billion dollars. All these payments have contributed to the maintenance of levels of income which have undoubtedly relieved the provincial Governments of a great load of welfare claims that would otherwise have been pressed upon them and their municipalities. They have also had important beneficial effects on provincial revenues from all forms of taxation. They have been good and constructive expenditures, but their bearing upon the balance of revenues and responsibilities must not be overlooked.

Since we met last April the federal Government has undertaken, subject to negotiated conditions, to assume costs in relation to unemployment assistance which in a year like 1954-55 would amount to about $25 million. We have also agreed in principle to assume additional costs of about $180 million a year in the field of health insurance. Now we are proposing arrangements which in the first year of operation and on the assumptions we have made will benefit provincial government treasuries by $108 million over and above the amounts already available to them under the tax rental agreement system. This, I assure you, is the practical limit of our capacity in these fields and at this time, having regard to all our other responsibilities, some of which, as in defence, are, in the last analysis, unlimited.

Our proposed stabilization payments are designed to give to the provincial Governments an assurance of relative stability in these three tax fields. In effect we are offering every province unconditionally a guarantee that its annual revenues from equalization payments plus the yield or rental of the standard taxes will not fall below the higher of (a) its per capita rental available in 1956-57 multiplied by the current population, or (b) 90 per cent of its average actual revenues from equalization and stabilization payments and standard tax yields in the two preceding years. This is an offer of an unconditional floor in these tax fields, and a floor that keeps rising with our expanding ecenomy. In the table before you, only Prince Edward Island and British Columbia benefit from this guaranteed minimum in 1957-58. We can all hope that the steady growth of our country is such that the floor will not often come into operation; but the insurance policy is none the less there.

The responsibility of promoting simplicity and economy in the whole field of taxation belongs to all levels of government. As a federal contribution to this objective we are offering two alternatives—tax rental agreements and tax collection agreements.

We are prepared to offer each province a tax rental agreement covering all or any of these three tax fields for the five year period April 1, 1957 to March 31, 1962. The rental to be paid to the province will be the estimated total tax liability of taxpayers in that province at the standard rates of tax. The renting province need pass no taxing statute and will incur no administrative costs. It will, however, be bound for five years.

Alternatively, in the case of a provincial government having enacted and undertaken to maintain a taxing statute that in the opinion of the federal Government does not differ from time to time in any material respect from the comparable federal statute and imposes the standard rates, the federal Government is prepared to enter into an agreement to collect the tax for the provincial Government. The federal Government would remit periodically to the provincial Government the amounts collected less a fee to cover the cost of collection. The fee we have in mind is 2 per cent of the amounts collected, providing the accounting procedures can be kept reasonably simple. A collection agreement would have to be for a period of, say, three years; or if for two years the fee would probably have to be 3 per cent. The cost of redesigning our collection machinery would not jutsify entering into agreements on a one-year basis. Notice to extend or terminate a collection agreement would have to be given not later than about the last day of April preceding the year to be affected.

While there seems to have been a general acceptance of the principle of equalization, there is, I realize, some conflict of views on the manner in which it has been applied. Some provinces with very substantial taxable capacity feel that their responsibilities are such that they should be accorded still more room in these tax fields. Other provinces, where taxable capacity is below the average, press for still larger equalization or fiscal need grants. The federal Government is squeezed between these conflicting views.

If we were to raise the standard rates and lower the level up to which we equalize, we would find it impossible, except at a quite unacceptable cost to the federal treasury, to establish a formula which would not reduce the payments to most of the provinces to amounts below those available under the current rental agreements. It has been suggested that we should meet this by supplementary grants on a straight fiscal need basis.

While I would like to come as close to meeting all points of view as possible, I do not believe that experience with fiscal need payments, based on a sort of periodic means test, has been such as to encourage us to use them when the more objective approach that we have adopted is available to us.

Other ideas have been put forward and I assure you that they have all been given careful consideration. The co-operative use of these tax fields and the elimination of conditional grants have been suggested. The periodic collective determination of tax policies and an agreed division of the total yield does not seem to me to be a practicable policy. If there is any real support for this suggestion we would, of course, be prepared to study it after we have had some experience with our present proposals. As for conditional grants, it has been a tendency over the years for Finance Ministers and Provincial Treasurers to disapprove of them in principle, but their spending colleagues seem to keep pressing for new or expanded conditional grants.

Our proposals as now set out before you are an earnest effort to meet the differing and sometimes conflicting interests of the various provincial Governments and at the same time maintain fully the strength of the federal Government to meet its wide ranging and vital national responsibilities. Our proposals are not entirely new, but are, we think, a constructive adaptation of our past experience to our present problems. We have tried to meet adequately and sympathetically the needs of those provinces which have been having difficulty in providing standards of service which modern societies consider to be essential. But we have also had to keep in mind the preservation of the national interests of our peoples. The national interests and national security must be preserved if provincial autonomy is to have any real meaning.

THE SENATE

Thursday, March 15, 1956

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I move that when this house rises today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Would the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) care to indicate what business will be dealt with next week?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There are a number of items on the Order Paper. It is the practice of the Senate to arrange its business so that the various items before the house are given proper consideration. I understand that the discussion initiated last week by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) will be continued, if any honourable member who wishes to speak is prepared to go on.

The motion was agreed to.

NEW BRUNSWICK POTATO MARKETING BOARD

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate a question with respect to the answer given on Tuesday to an inquiry by the honourable senator from Victoria-Carleton (Hon. Mr. Pirie)? The inquiry was as follows:

1. Has the audit and investigation concerning the operations of the New Brunswick Potato Marketing Board, under agreement with Her Majesty the Queen, represented by the Minister of Agriculture, dated December 21, 1953, been completed?
2. If so, when may the tabling of the report be expected?

The answer was:

1. Yes.
2. The matters investigated are now under consideration by the departments of Government and others concerned.

I would like the honourable leader to tell me if Senator Pirie is included in the "others concerned". I think the honourable senator is perhaps as vitally concerned as anybody, inasmuch as he was the one who made the inquiry.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not know, and as Senator Pirie is not present just now I am afraid I cannot answer the question.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I cannot see what his absence has to do with it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not know who the others are, or whether Senator Pirie is concerned.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I have already stated that I think he is concerned.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

JOINT COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION—SENATE MEMBERS

The Senate proceeded to consideration of a message from the House of Commons regarding the appointing of a joint committee of both houses of Parliament to review and report upon the progress and programs of the Federal District Commission in developing and implementing the plan for the national capital.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a joint committee of both houses of Parliament to review and report upon the progress and programs of the Federal District Commission in developing and implementing the plan for the national capital;

That the following senators be appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the said joint committee namely, the Honourable Senators Aseltine, Cameron, Connolly (Ottawa West), Connolly (Halifax North), Dessureault, Lambert and Reid;

That the said committee have power to call for persons, papers and records; to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate and to report from time to time;

That the said committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee and that Rule 100 of the Senate be suspended in relation thereto;

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that house accordingly.

He said: Honourable senators will observe that the purpose for which this joint committee is proposed is to review and report upon the progress and programs of the Federal District Commission in the development of the national capital plan. This subject is of great interest to all honourable senators.

Ottawa is the county town of the County of Carleton; it is also the capital city of the Dominion of Canada. The question of building Ottawa and the surrounding district into a great community of which all Canadians will be truly proud has for many years received consideration by Prime Ministers and leaders of all parties in the country. In 1899 Sir Wilfrid Laurier established what was known as the Ottawa Improvement Commission. In so doing it was his hope that he might establish here a national capital, the development of which would express national hopes and aspirations. Apparently he had in mind that eventually there might be established here a capital such as Paris, London or Rome, all of which manifest the ambitions and cultural development of their respective countries. However, he chose a North American model, hoping to make Ottawa the Washington of the north.

Successive Prime Ministers have given impetus and direction to that plan. Sir Robert Borden visualized a fully integrated plan for streets, parks and public buildings and set up a special committee to co-operate with the Ottawa Improvement Commission.

As all honourable senators know, the plan for a greater Ottawa was very dear to the heart of the late Mackenzie King. Let me quote briefly from a speech made by him in the House of Commons in 1944, in which he expressed his ambitions for a national capital. Here is what he said:

> I have one other thought in mind to which I should like to give expression, and it is this. The sacrifices of the men and women of Canada who served in the last war have been memorialized by a national war memorial in the heart of this city. It would be difficult, if not impossible, to create another memorial which could pay tribute to the service and sacrifice of those men and women of Canada who will have served in the present world conflict. What finer memorial could there be than a capital city which would serve as a model of community planning for all the other cities of Canada and which would be symbolic of the world-wide effort of Canada in the present war, and the significant place we hope our country will occupy in the world of the future—a national capital which would be not only the pride of Canadians but also an object lesson to other cities and to other countries? The national war memorial of the last war is in the heart of Ottawa. Might not the national war memorial of the present war find noble expression, carefully planned, in a federal district as the site of the Canadian capital, through the heart of which would flow the Ottawa river?

Now, honourable senators, the interest and the support of the national capital plan is no less dear to the heart of our present Prime Minister. May I quote from a speech which he made in the House of Commons, in a former session. He said:

> Parliament has already recognized the importance of creating a national capital which will be a source of legitimate pride and inspiration to all Canadians, a sort of focus and symbol of those ties which now unite us as a young but already quite a vigorous nation. The recognition of the importance of the capital has been tangibly demonstrated by the action Parliament has taken in establishing the Federal District Commission and placing at its disposal the resources necessary to develop, in co-operation with others, the physical aspects of our capital in keeping with the role that most Canadians wish it to play in our national life.

Indeed, honourable senators, there have been few issues in this country on which there has been such unanimity of opinion as the development of and need for a national capital plan. If honourable senators followed the debate on this matter this week in the other house, they will recall that the Leader of the Opposition joined with the Prime Minister and the leaders of the other two groups in the house in expressing the wish that Canada shall have a great national capital.

This national capital plan is not a scheme of amateurish visionaries, but one involving the most careful planning and requiring the advice of professional and expert men in that particular field.

May I deal in some detail, though briefly, with the background of the present organization? I said earlier that the Ottawa Improvement Commission was established in 1899. In 1903 Frederick C. Todd, a landscape artist, submitted a report outlining his views on this matter. In 1915 Sir Herbert Holt was appointed by Sir Robert Borden as chairman of the Holt Commission, which submitted a broader report, and in 1922 Noulan Cauchon, a planning consultant of the City of Ottawa, submitted an unofficial report, having in mind the function of a national capital plan. This was somewhat more comprehensive than the report of the old commission, and went so far as to suggest the creation of a district commission by providing for the control of physical features and public utilities within Ottawa and the surrounding territory, but leaving all other provincial and municipal prerogatives undisturbed.

In 1927 the Ottawa Improvement Commission was reorganized and re-named the "Federal District Commission". That was done by Act of Parliament. Also at that time permission was given to extend its operations into the hitherto excluded city of Hull and the Hull area. That commission has continued to carry out park works of vast scope, extension of driveway systems and construction of bridges, and has gone further afield in initiating acquisition and development of the Gatineau Park, as well as maintaining all federal Government grounds in the capital area.

In 1937, as honourable senators will recall, a world-renowned city planner, in the person of Jacques Greber, of Paris, was retained, and within two years he developed a comprehensive capital plan. One of his first achievements was the creation of the National War Memorial area, with which honourable senators are all so familiar. The memorial was unveiled by the late beloved George VI during his visit to Canada in the spring of 1939.

In 1944 the Federal District Commission was reorganized and its powers and duties enlarged and extended. This extension was of a nature intended to give a national character to the commission. At that time it was decided to extend the membership of the commission in such a manner as to include one commissioner from each province in Canada, together with ten members chosen by the Government, as well as the mayors of Ottawa and Hull, making a total of 22 members and achieving a national representation in this body.

Perhaps honourable senators would be interested in the names of the present members of the Federal District Commission. They are:

Chairman: Major General Howard Kennedy, C.B.E., M.C., B.Sc., F.E.
Commissioners:
Charles Camsell, C.M.G., LL.D., F.R.S.C.

Miss Charlotte Whitton, C.B.E., M.A., D.C.L., LL.D., Mayor of Ottawa, representing the City of Ottawa.
Thomas Moncion, K.S.G., Mayor of Hull, representing the City of Hull.

The members of the commission are all distinguished and outstanding citizens of Canada.

Here, I think, it might be appropriate to pause and pay tribute to the eminent Canadians who have occupied the post of Chairman of the Federal District Commission. I recall the Honourable Thomas Ahearn, Mr. W. E. Matthews and the Honourable Frederick E. Bronson, P.C. And, as I have said, the present Chairman is Major-General Howard Kennedy. In this work they have demonstrated an unselfish devotion to public welfare and to their native land. The beautiful parks through which we may walk and the scenic driveways which are the object of so much admiration on the part of residents and tourists alike are truly monuments to their initiative and their vision of the most beautiful possible national capital. Their purpose was that of Mr. King, "a national capital which would be not only the pride of Canadians but also an object lesson to other cities and to other countries".

In addition to the Federal District Commission, there is operating what is known as the National Capital Planning Committee, which which was set up in 1946 by the commission. This is a permanent planning committee comprising experts and others, but it is concerned more with the practical and utilitarian features of the national capital plan. The committee concentrates more on architectural adaptability, and such important aspects as water pollution and other practical problems facing the development program. Not only must the national capital plan provide a well-ordered and beautiful capital, but its development involves many problems relative to the actual living and well-being, dignity and orderliness of both residents and visitors. It is with the latter feature that the National Capital Planning Committee is chiefly concerned. In other words, it is a working committee which devotes itself to the practical aspects of development and the adoption of a utilitarian plan for this area.

I might add that in 1944, when the Federal District Commission was reorganized, the act setting it up provided for an annual vote of $2½ million. For the past twelve years the commission has operated on that vote, and it is now felt that the time has come for Parliament to review the operation and functions of the commission, having in mind consideration of its future work and its present function. It is felt that we need to inform ourselves periodically on what is being done and planned, and to express our views in such detail as is appropriate. During the sittings of the joint committee, officials of the Federal District Commission will be available to advise members of the committee in detail not only as to the work which has been accomplished but what is proposed in the future. For this reason I think all honourable senators will agree that it is desirable for the committee to proceed as quickly as possible with this very important aspect in our national development, and I commend the matter to you.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Honourable senators, before the motion is carried—

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) rose first.

Hon. John J. Connolly: I do not know whether the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) wishes to speak.

Hon. John T. Haig: I am afraid that if I do my remarks will not be very flattering to the Federal District Commission.

Honourable senators, I would just like to know who is responsible for "Confusion Square" in front of the east entrance to the Parliament Buildings grounds. I have been in every city in Canada and I have never seen any place more difficult to get around than this square. If you want to go by automobile to the Chateau Laurier from the Parliament Buildings you have to drive down blocks and blocks, then turn around and come back. This is also true if you want to get to the Lord Elgin Hotel. Although I do not know who is responsible for this situation, I recall that I was here when the commission had certain buildings removed in order to build the square.

I think it is a disgrace to have such a confusing entrance to the Parliament Buildings grounds. Coming west along Wellington street, a driver may find the red light against him, yet he can drive right through the entrance to the grounds. And after eight or nine o'clock in the evening if one drives away from the building he finds no lights at all; it is dark and dismal on the way out to the main street; in fact, there is scarcely as much light as would come from a candle to help him. I suppose that is the responsibility of the commission. It appears that there is lots of work for the commission to do.

No one else is responsible for my ideas on this matter. I may be wrong—I hope I am—but I do not know why we, with a population of 15 million, have extravagant ideas and ape the United States, with its population of 165 million people. Why should we depend upon the United States for our protection and spend money crazily? Before we go forward with a scheme like this, I think the questions of unemployment and health insurance should be given consideration. I believe the honourable leader said we were spending $12½ million a year.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: $2½ million.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, that is bad enough. I don't know what was spent, but it was a lot of money. They built the Laurier bridge, which is very helpful to Ottawa, but is not helpful to the rest of Canada. In my city, as in Toronto and any other city except Ottawa, the government builds its own buildings.

Hon. Mr. Horner: You mean the municipal government?

Hon. Mr. Haig: The municipal government. The government in Ottawa seems to think that the rest of Canada should maintain this city for its benefit. I know the newspapers will give me a scorching tomorrow morning, and I hope they do. That will give me some publicity. My people at home will say that at least I am alive.

Honourable senators, I think that before we start on plans of this kind we should do something for the people who need medical assistance, and for the support of the unemployed and old people.

I do not mind what this committee does or does not do, so long as it does not spend the money of the people of Canada for the benefit of Ottawa only. We give Ottawa large sums in lieu of taxes. We don't make grants to Winnipeg, or Vancouver, or Montreal. The business of Ottawa benefits because Parliament is located here, yet we pay the city a large amount of money annually to help it maintain its civic services. Why? Because this is the capital city, you say. A line should be drawn somewhere. I am not in favour of this idea. I may be the only one who is opposed to this extravagance, but after driving around the city during the last few months I have become annoyed to find that in order to drive from the Parliament Buildings to the Chateau Laurier I have to go away down a side street, turn around and come all the way back again, pausing at two or three stop lights and waiting until they change before I get through. When my grandson was here he said, "Do you know what they call that part of the city between the Chateau and the Union Station? They call it 'Confusion Square'." That was his first impression of the centre of the city, and it is the impression of most visitors. A number of old buildings were torn down in the centre of the city, and I think that was a good idea. Also I admit that the building of the new post office at the corner of Sparks and Elgin was a good idea, but why were not roads laid out at the same time in such a way that people west of Elgin street could conveniently get to the Chateau Laurier?

I read in the paper the other day that the Union Station is going to be removed to the suburbs of Ottawa. This means that we who come here for the session will have to hire a taxi on arrival to get to the downtown section where we live. It seems to me that the persons responsible have lost their perspective as to what a city means. We are getting to the position where we can spend lots of money on projects like that, but I think that the ordinary people should have some further say about these matters.

Honourable senators, I admit that the Senate members of the joint committee do good service, and could not do better. I cannot speak for the members appointed from the House of Commons. But the impression is left by my honourable friend that the commission members from Manitoba and other provinces give good service. What do they do? They give a few days' service down here and help to spend $2½ million. That is not very important service, and it is not very beneficial to anybody at all. Plans and discussions have been going on in Ottawa to my personal knowledge as long as I have been coming here, and I can see no change toward beautification of the city, except in so far as Government buildings are concerned.

I will not say that I am against the resolution, but I am against this kind of extravagance and expense until we are ready for it. We have a long row to hoe. Let us have the dollars to spend first.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, in the first place, perhaps, I should apologize for intruding on your time, after having spent so long as I did in debate yesterday afternoon. However, I felt that it might be appropriate for someone from the Ottawa area to speak on this resolution. I am sure that if the senior senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) were in his place today he would have a good deal to say about the work the Federal District Commission is doing in this area. He has done a good deal to further the work of that body in the development of the national capital plan.

While it is appropriate that a member of this chamber who was born in Ottawa and lives here should speak, and perhaps have views on this subject, I would like to think also that there is generally a personal interest by honourable members in the work of the Federal District Commission. When one thinks about the lengthening of sessions of Parliament and the fact that members of both houses spend some seven or eight months each year in this city—perhaps more time than they spend in their own home localities —one might say that they are really citizens of Ottawa, in almost a literal sense. In a very special sense Ottawa is becoming the home town, or at least one of the home towns, of honourable members of the Senate. Perhaps members of the other place are not in that position; they may be "birds of passage", and their stay here may be conditioned pretty well on the vagaries of political fortune. In that respect they may resemble the early explorers and discoverers who passed by this place but did not linger. So I would like to think that honourable members of this chamber have a more abiding interest in the development of the national capital area.

Last fall the Canadian Bar Association held its annual meeting in Ottawa. There were here lawyers from all over Canada. They thought Ottawa was a place of great natural beauty. Of course the confluence here of three rivers, the canal and the Laurentian hills, and if I may say so, the majestic setting of the Parliament Buildings, impressed them all very much. Ottawa for them was somewhat of the embodiment of the beauty of central Canada. To each one of them who so expressed himself to me, I replied: "Well, it is very nice to hear it, but I want you to remember that this city is not only the city of people who happen to live here; in a very real sense it is your city, because money collected by the federal treasury is paying a good deal of the cost involved in establishing a national capital at this place."

Comparisons, of course, are difficult and perhaps fruitless things to make. There are many beautiful cities in this country: all of us have been greatly impressed with the magnificence of the mountains and of the sea in Vancouver. I think perhaps there is no Canadian city which has a more magnificent setting. Certainly, I think there is no city on the west coast that can compare with it in magnificence and natural setting. The Prairie cities too, with their wide horizons, vigorous climate and bright skies, have a distinctive beauty. And farther east are the metropolitan areas of Central Canada. They are commercial and industrial, but many of them are established on rivers, or in some instances on the Great Lakes. There is about them a quality of natural beauty, and I think too a beauty of utility, which gives each a very distinctive character.

Going still farther eastward, across the Ottawa River to the old cities of Quebec, one finds an old world French atmosphere that has a charm which is unique on this continent. Perhaps it is rivalled only by the somewhat similar charm of some of the cities in the Caribbean area and in Mexico, where the Spanish influence prevails. And thence to the Maritimes, to cities which combine so much of a history that is almost as old as the history of Quebec, and yet having everything that is implied in the words "the spell of the sea".

During the war it was a great experience for many Canadians to go to the Maritime ports of Saint John, Halifax and St. John's, Newfoundland. This was particularly so for Navy personnel. In the magnificent harbour of Halifax a vital facility was provided, not only for warships but for merchant vessels which were carrying very necessary supplies. May I say the same for the rugged but wonderful little harbour of St. John's, Newfoundland, with its gate as narrow as the gate of any harbour anywhere, its two sentinel rocks as great as at Quebec, and a wall of rock on the south side of the harbour to protect it from the open sea and from the enemy.

Honourable senators, a good deal of federal money is spent in connection with matters such as those under the control of the Federal District Commission. A very notable debate took place in the other house last week on the question of conservation. The problem before that chamber was how to preserve and conserve natural resources of all kinds, and a good deal of explanation was given by people responsible for work that was being done to that end. It has a most utilitarian aspect, but it also involves the preservation of the natural beauty of this country.

We spend, too, a great deal of money to promote the work of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board. I hope that that work will continue to be done in all sections of our country. It brings to various localities an understanding and appreciation of their history.

In passing I must mention also the work being done on behalf of the National Parks throughout Canada, in both the east and west. The parks in the west, which were the original ones, are magnificent conceptions, which not only do credit to the people who established them and are a great satisfaction to Canadians, but are also an attraction for tourists.

Last year Parliament passed a bill to provide additional moneys for cities other than the capital in which there was a concentration of government-owned property which had been more or less tax exempt. The formula for such municipal grants was devised some ten years ago, and was called the "Abbott formula". It has been studied and I think improved to such a point that in some municipalities where there is a concentration of publicly owned property, much of the old burden upon the municipality has been relieved.

Honourable senators, every city in this country has its points of interest. But here in Ottawa, as the honourable Leader of the Government has mentioned, all political parties, and perhaps all parts of the country, seem to be unanimous in their desire to develop that kind of national capital which will be distinctively Canadian and symbolic of national aspirations: a capital that will be to Canada what London is to England, what Paris is to France, what Dublin is to Ireland and what Washington is to the United States.

The speech of the Honourable Leader of the Government has indicated the continuity of the work of four successive Prime Ministers—Laurier, Borden, King and St. Laurent, all of them great men. I personally would like to add to that list the name of another Prime Minister and a former distinguished member of this chamber, who was for a time also a member of Sir Robert Borden's government. I refer to the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, who had a hand in a good deal of the work that went on when he was a member of the executive.

Perhaps it would not be inappropriate to mention in this chamber, as I did once before, the fact that a former member of this house, Senator Sir Richard Scott, was the man I think responsible for the decision that this city should be the capital of the new country.

The quotations that the Leader of the Government used from speeches of Mr. King and the present Prime Minister, indicate the high level of the concept that has inspired the work done by the Federal District Commission. However, it might be most appropriate to say a special word about the contribution made by Mr. King.

Mr. King was not a native of Ottawa. He came from one of the great parts of this country, southern Ontario, which is so well represented in this chamber by the honourable gentleman from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler).

Hon. Mr. Euler: He came from Kitchener.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Yes, he did. Mr. King was one of Ottawa's most eminent citizens. My authority for that statement is a publication of this city which was not always too kind to him politically, the Ottawa Journal.

He was tremendously interested in the work of the Federal District Commission. He supplied much of the inspiration for it, and it was through his efforts that Mr. Greber came here to advise the commission. But it was not only in the city of Ottawa that he was interested. He was interested in the countryside to the north, because he lived there and knew the people in that area. In his will he emphasized his interest in both branches of the work of the commission. He left his city home to the nation and he left the rolling acres of Kingsmere as well, as an addition to the national park there.

There is much to be done both in the city and in the country parts under this plan. There are buildings to be designed and located, there are zoning problems, and transportation problems. There are serious traffic problems like the one the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) has already mentioned. There are water problems and pollution problems like the problem referred to a year or so ago by the senior senator from Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: And fire problems too.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: There are fire problems, unfortunately—serious fire problems.

This work, honourable senators, is not going to be cheap work, but it cannot—and I agree to this extent with the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig)—it cannot be done lavishly, it cannot be done wastefully, it cannot be done extravagantly. However, we must remember this; we are building a capital for the future. We should remember also that the annual vote of the Federal District Commission must come before Parliament each session. That has been a feature of recent developments, and the vote has become before us every year since the reorganization of the commission. I would think that honourable senators, whether they are on the committee or not, would gain much benefit by reading the report of the National Capital Planning Committee which was issued in 1950. It contains a great deal of thought and a record of thought going back, as the Leader of the Government has said, to the early part of the century. It contains much inspiration. It is not a product, as he has said, of immature idealists, but it has been compiled as a result of the advice of professionals skilled in this kind of work.

A good many honourable senators know what was done in Williamsburg, Virginia, by the Rockefeller Foundation to restore monuments of colonial days in America, and what has been done in the nearby towns of Jamestown and Yorktown.

I think, too, many honourable senators will know of the development of the field of Gettysburg, the monuments there to that classical battle of the Civil War, and, what is perhaps more significant still, the monument to an address, the Gettysburg Address of Lincoln. But it is in Washington, in the nation's capital, that the United States keeps its title deeds. There are the heroic bronzes and stones which record the story of its great men. I would hope that we could develop in this country, through this national plan, something of the spirit and the national pride which inspired the Americans to do what they have done in Washington. I hope that we can here provide our people with inspiration for a national consciousness which so many of the Prime Ministers of this country were anxious to develop as they encouraged the work of the Federal District Commission.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, I rise to say a few words on this resolution before it passes. I do so particularly because I had the privilege of serving on the previous committee set up by Parliament in the year 1944; and may I remind the honourable leader that some of us at least think there has been too long a delay, 12 years, in the setting up of this committee. I am one of those who believe we should have a continuing committee of this nature.

I first came to Ottawa in 1930, and ever since then I have taken quite a keen interest in the affairs of the city and its development. I have not always been at peace with the municipal authorities, and many times I have been critical, but I want to remind honourable senators who live in Ottawa, and the people of Ottawa in general, that perhaps those of us who come here from outside parts, and especially from far-off provinces, picture things more clearly than those who live in the city. As you all know, you may go to a beautiful park anywhere in the country and say, "Oh, what a lovely view", but if the person who is taking you around is not as enthusiastic about the view as you are it may be because he has lived in the place all his life and its beauty has become commonplace to him. I think the people of Ottawa and members of Parliament who live in Ottawa should take a kindlier view of criticism from those of us who live here only five or six months of the year and who voice our opinions, not in a critical way, but in the hope that note will be taken of them and that perhaps something done to improve the city.

The honourable leader spoke about the various Prime Ministers who in the past have taken an interest in the development of this city as a national capital. Now I want to give my view. It is my candid opinion that the vision which Mackenzie King had has been dimmed a little. I am not finding fault with anyone, I am not casting any aspersions, but it seems to me that the vision which he had of the building up of Ottawa as a great capital has not been maintained since his passing. Maybe I am wrong, but that is what I think.

Now, I am wondering just what was the idea in changing the set-up of the committee as it existed in 1944 to what is now proposed. The terms of reference of the 1944 committee read as follows:

> That a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons be appointed to review the special problems arising out of the location of the seat of Government in the city of Ottawa and to report on the relations between the federal Government and municipal authorities of the said city and their relative responsibilities in respect of such problems, with power to inquire into the matter and things therein referred to.

Will the powers outlined in the resolution now before the Senate allow the committee to deal with those matters? If not, the committee will be restricted in its work. It is all very well to interest ourselves in what the Federal District Commission—a body for whose work I have nothing but praise—has done and how it spends the money allocated to it. But the real problem in this matter is that there is, on the one hand, the City of Ottawa, which needs all the money it can get from the federal Government to carry on its affairs; and, on the other hand, the Federal District Commission and its requirements.

Although I have been criticized for saying that some thought should be given to what has taken place in the city of Washington, I do not want to be misunderstood. I am not in favour of building another Washington, but of developing a distinctively Canadian capital. However, when I visit Washington I hear no complaint because of the fact that it is under the jurisdiction of the United States federal authority. And I cannot see how progress can be made in the establishment of a great Canadian capital so long as administration is carried on by two bodies, one civic and one federal. Frankly, I should like to see Ottawa placed under federal control. I know that this course is not likely to be welcomed by the mayor and council, who, by such an arrangement, would lose their positions and functions. But the city administration has responsibilities which do not come within the purview of a national planning commission. The great expansion in the outlying districts has raised problems of taxation. There are many things the city council would like to do which it is unable to do because of lack of adequate funds.

I hope that before this motion is passed the leader will inform us whether it would authorize us to call in the city representatives for a closer study of how they and the Federal District Commission can co-operate in the building of a national capital. It cannot be expected that the city should assume the burden of the expense of removing old buildings as well as providing for the needs of the new districts.

The honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) remarked that among the proposals in the Greber plan was the removal of the railway station. It is true that this was recommended, but those who occupy or who own the station have so little expectation that the idea will be carried out in our time that they have recently added another story to the building.

I shall not refer at length to the monument on Confederation Square, as I have dealt with it on previous occasions, but let me state plainly my conviction that, if there is to be another war memorial, the place for it is on Parliament Hill. I believe that those who died on behalf of Canada have as much right to a prominent place of remembrance on Parliament Hill as—or perhaps more right than—some of the statesmen who have gone to their reward. At present one can hardly get near the monument on Confederation Square because of the volume of traffic, and the place has been well-named, I think, "Confusion Square". We have joked about this before, but, of course nothing can be done about it.

One question to which I have never found an answer is, why should we engage someone from another country to plan the building of our capital? In London and in Paris one may see and admire buildings hundreds of years old. They look wonderful where they are. But what is to be gained by inviting persons living in a country where old streets and buildings are preserved because of their historic value, to undertake the layout of a capital city in a young, new country like our own?

I do not know that I have anything to add, but I would reiterate that I have not been critical of the handling of affairs in the city of Ottawa. I know what great burdens are placed on those who have to do with its administration. But if the setting-up of the council were in my hands, I would at least add to it some members appointed by Parliament. I do not approve of handing out, without some right of representation, large sums of money to Ottawa. It is true that once or twice a year ten representatives from the various provinces visit Ottawa, look over the city, and make known their views as to its development under the Federal District Commission. That, I think, is all to the good, in spite of the criticism we have heard from the honourable Leader of the Opposition.

I should like the honourable Leader of the Government to state why a change has been made in this year in the set-up of the committee, and whether the committee will have power to go as far as the 1944 committee did.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, as one who many years ago shared responsibility for naming the square of which we have heard today, I am naturally interested in this subject. The honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly), at the beginning of his eloquent address on the beautification of Ottawa, remarked that many members of the Senate and of the other place are spending six or seven months of the year here, and, presumably, stand to benefit by the extension of the program. May I tell him that the people back in our districts think we are doing very well by ourselves as things are, without adding to their tax burden by authorizing heavy expenditures on the development of the capital. Canada is still a young country, and I do not think we should embark on an expensive program while there is so much to be done all over the Dominion. Consider, for instance, the difficulties of those who live near some of our beautiful rivers. When the streams are frozen solid, one can drive across them, and when the water is running in the summer, one can ferry across, but for two or three months of the year there is no means of passage other than by flying or by making a circuit of perhaps hundreds of miles; and this handicap, in cases of sickness and disaster, can be very serious. In connection with this plan for Ottawa, there is talk of the necessity for another bridge, but it seems to me, when many improvements are urgently needed all over the country, we should go very slow on large commitments for the benefit of the capital.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable members, if the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) speaks, he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure we are all pleased that so many have taken part in this debate. One of the members who spoke lives in Ottawa, while the others come from widespread points throughout Canada. This indicates a considerable interest right across the country in the development of the national capital. I have no doubt that every Canadian wishes to have a truly Canadian capital of which he can be proud.

The honourable member from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) asked me why the terms of reference of this committee are different from those of the joint committee that was set up to deal with this problem in 1944. The reason is that financial relations with the City of Ottawa have been greatly altered since then as a result of the enactment of and recent amendment to the Municipal Grants Act. This act provides that the federal Government may authorize the payment of grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal properties.

As to the powers of the committee, I can only refer the honourable gentleman to the first paragraph of the motion before the house:

> That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a joint committee of both houses of Parliament to review and report upon the progress and programs of the Federal District Commission in developing and implementing the plan for the national capital.

I do not think any of us feel there should be no further beautification of Ottawa until all social welfare legislation imaginable can be put on the statute books. I think the Leader of the Opposition (Honourable Mr. Haig) went so far as to suggest that, but I am doubtful if he believes it himself. My honourable friend referred to the difficulty encountered in getting around Confederation Square in Ottawa. But what Canadian municipality is without a serious traffic problem? Ottawa is facing up to this problem, but I fear it is one that will appear from time to time.

The joint committee will serve a most useful purpose and, in spite of some of the comments made this afternoon, I am sure we are all very proud of our splendid capital.

The motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators, before the orders of the day are proceeded with I should like to ask the Leader of the Government (Honourable Mr. Macdonald) if he can give the house any information about the Easter recess? The matter is of importance to those of us who live at a considerable distance from Ottawa, for the obtaining of sleeping accommodation on trains is somewhat problematical. If we were to adjourn at the end of next week, that would be of assistance to many of us.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have no information. No one could have definite information on the matter at this time. It will be realized that we cannot adjourn for the Easter recess until the appropriation bills covering interim supply and supplementary estimates have been given Royal Assent. If those bills should come to us by the end of next week it would be possible to adjourn at that time. I shall secure what information I can and keep the house informed. I realize the difficulty that members have in making transportation plans. I am also aware that a number of senators from the western and eastern provinces have been very faithful in their attendance in the Senate, and I am sure the rest of us will do what we can to make it possible for them to get away ahead of us.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: It should not be difficult to make arrangements with respect to these appropriation bills. I know from my long experience in Ottawa that this has been possible for many years: it is a simple matter. I realize the Interim Supply Bill has to be passed before we can adjourn, but as it covers a period of only two months there is usually no objection to its passage. The same is usually true of the supplementary estimates. I wish to emphasize that the information asked for is of considerable importance to those of us who come from far away: we do not want to be kept here for the greater part of a week after the adjournment, waiting for sleeping-car accommodation.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY—THIRD READING

Hon. William H. Golding, for Hon. Paul H. Bouffard, moved the third reading of Bill V-5, an Act respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company and certain wholly owned subsidiaries.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

DIVORCE BILLS

CANADA SHIPPING BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris moved the second reading of Bill H-7, an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

He said: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I am glad that honourable members are applauding now. I doubt if they will do so when I get through, for this is not a very exciting subject for discussion.

The bill, as we have to deal with it, is divided into two parts. First, there are some 26 or 27 sections which it is proposed to amend. In the second place, Parliament has to consider the question of approval, in some form or another, of an international convention for the prevention of the pollution of the sea by oil.

I ask honourable senators to consider the second part first. There are two questions with respect to it. First: Do we want to approve of the convention? Secondly: if so, in just what manner should we approve of it? Let me consider the first of these questions, that is, whether Parliament is in favour of this convention. The articles of the international convention begin on page 10 of the bill and continue for several pages. As far as we are concerned, it is a question of "take it or leave it". The convention in its present form was prepared by the plenipotentiaries of some 21 nations, including Canada, the United Kingdom, France, the United States and Russia. I have a memorandum from the department explaining what has been done perhaps better than I could explain it in any other form. The memorandum says in part:

> In recent years waste oil discharged into the high seas by ships plying the North Atlantic has been carried onto the shores of Ireland, Great Britain and the mainland of Europe by the Gulf Stream, ruining many bathing beaches and killing large numbers of seabirds. It is the opinion of some that such oil also ruins spawning beds of fish.

My honourable friend from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) will take note of that. The memorandum continues:

> The British Government endeavoured to obtain agreement from all nations attending the conference on measures embodying the recommendations of the Faulkner report, but were not successful in obtaining unanimous assent to all the proposed measures. The convention therefore was a compromise, and can only be considered as the first concrete step towards dealing with the nuisance of oil pollution on an international basis.
> Canada is not yet troubled by waste oil discharged from ships on the high seas owing to the comparatively small amount of shipping off our coasts and to the fact that apart from the Japanese current there are no strong ocean currents setting in toward our shores. The waste oil which is being carried onto the beaches of northern Europe can hardly be blamed on Canadian shipping to any appreciable extent because among other things, there is an extremely small amount of Canadian tonnage now plying the high seas. The Canadian delegation to the conference, however, having discussed the matter with representatives of the Canadian shipping industry, supported the resolutions adopted at the conference and the convention was duly signed by Canada, subject to ratification.

I emphasize that.

> This course was dictated by the feeling that Canada should play the part of a good neighbour in this matter and support this international method of aiding the nations that were suffering from this nuisance in ridding themselves of it, even though we cannot be held responsible for it to any extent, and notwithstanding that our own shores are at present not being polluted by waste oil dumped on the high seas.

At least our shores are not being polluted to any appreciable extent.

The provisions of this convention run from page 10 of the bill to page 19. I do not know if honourable senators want me to take it up section by section and point out the provisions. The bill, together with the convention, unquestionably will have to go to committee, for there are some very important questions to be considered. However, I will indicate as briefly as I can what is outlined in the provisions.

Article I says:

"Oil" means crude oil, fuel oil, heavy diesel oil and lubricating oil, and "oily" shall be construed accordingly.

Article II:

The present convention shall apply to sea-going ships, registered in any of the territories of a contracting Government, except

(i) ships for the time being used as naval auxiliaries;

(ii) ships of under 500 tons gross tonnage;

(iii) ships for the time being engaged in the whaling industry; . . .

And other provisions of that nature.

Article III, on page 11 of the bill, makes provision with respect to oil waste, from tankers. Those provisions are self-explanatory, and I am sure hourable senators would not wish me to read them.

Article IV provides:

(1) Article III shall not apply to:

(a) the discharge of oil or of an oily mixture from a ship for the purpose of securing the safety of the ship, preventing damage to the ship or cargo, or saving life at sea . . .

And other sensible provisions of that nature.

Penalities are dealt with and provided for in article VI:

The penalties which may be imposed in pursuance of article III under the law of any of the territories of a contracting Government in respect of the unlawful discharge from a ship of oil or of an oily mixture into waters outside the territorial waters of that territory shall not be less than the penalties which may be imposed under the law of that territory in respect of the unlawful discharge of oil or of an oily mixture from a ship into such territorial waters.

The bill provides the dates for the operation of this convention.

Articles XIV and XV have reference to the second branch of my argument on this question. I call attention to article XIII, which reads:

Any dispute between contracting Governments relating to the interpretation or application of the present convention which cannot be settled by negotiation shall be referred at the request of either party to the International Court of Justice for decision unless the parties in dispute agree to submit it to arbitration.

I think that is an important matter to consider, because in my opinion the International Court of Justice is potentially of great importance to the world. It is unfortunate that more matters are not now being referred to the court, for it is bound to play a great part in the peaceful adjustment of international problems.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Pardon me. Do I understand my honourable friend to say that that court will impose the penalties provided in this act?

Hon. Mr. Farris: No; I think the court will only interpret them.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Who will impose the penalties?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Each country will impose the penalties. I have already referred to article VI, on page 12 of the bill, but perhaps if my friend will allow his question to stand until I discuss the second branch of my argument, the matter will become a little clearer.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I interrupt my honourable friend to ask why this measure contains no reference to the Pacific Ocean, the United States or Canada?

Hon. Mr. Farris: The United States and Canada are mentioned.

Hon. Mr. Reid: But the Pacific Ocean is not.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I would ask my friend to look at page 17 of the bill, where the government of Canada appears in fourth place in the list of signatures; and also at page 19, where provisions is made for a signature on behalf of the Government of the United States of America.

Hon. Mr. Reid: But the zone of the Pacific Ocean, the Atlantic Ocean, Canada and the United States, are not mentioned.

Hon. Mr. Farris: That is true. However, as I said in my opening remarks, it was not possible to get complete unanimity on everything that Canada felt desirable; our choice with respect to this convention is that we can "take it or leave it", but—and I will mention this again when I discuss the question of what the Governor in Council may do under this measure—there is nothing to stop Canada from extending more drastic provisions with respect to territory over which Canada has jurisdiction. In fact, the bill contains an express provision that nothing in this act shall limit the power that any individual nation may otherwise have.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Article VI does limit the power, because it says that the penalties which may be imposed under the law of the territory in question ". . . shall not be less . . .". I am sorry. I do not seem to have expressed myself correctly. I understand you are taking this point up later?

Hon. Mr. Farris: I do not grasp the point my friend is making. The article reads:

> The penalties which may be imposed in pursuance of article III under the law of any of the territories of a contracting Government in respect of the unlawful discharge from a ship of oil or of an oil mixture into waters outside the territorial waters of that territory shall not be less . . .

That refers to penalties outside the territorial waters of that territory.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Who will impose those penalties?

Hon. Mr. Farris: There is no limit to the power that Canada may exercise within its own territory. With regard to the other question my friend asked, I should like him to reserve it until we meet in committee, where he can ask it of someone more qualified to answer.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say in regard to the question of whether we should give our approval to this convention in its present form. Our only alternative to accepting it is to refuse it. As my honourable friends from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) and New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) have suggested, a lot of things one would like to see in the bill are not there. But that is not a good reason for refusing to take what we have been offered, in the hope of receiving something better in the future. The bill makes provisions for amendments. In those circumstances it seems to me logical that a half loaf is better than no bread. Especially is that so, because the time may come when we can have the whole loaf, properly prepared.

I come now to my second point, a matter which I as a lawyer have found most interesting, and on which I have spent considerable time with officials of the Department of Transport, our own Parliamentary Counsel, the draftsman of the bill from the Department of Justice, and officials of the Department of External Affairs, which naturally has to do with the final acceptance of the treaty. Upon first reading the bill I was rather unhappy about it, but a good many of my objections were removed by discussions that I have had.

I would refer honourable senators to section 26, which appears at the bottom of page 8 of the bill. It reads:

> 26. The said act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after part VII thereof, the following part:
> PART VIIA
> Oil Pollution
> 495A. The Governor in Council may make regulations
> (a) to carry out and give effect to the provisions of the International Convention for the Prevention of Pollution of the Sea by Oil, 1954, set out in the Fourteenth Schedule;
>
> (b) for regulating and preventing the pollution by oil from ships of any inland, minor or other waters of Canada; and
> (c) prescribing a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or imprisonment not exceeding six months or both fine and imprisonment to be imposed upon summary conviction as a penalty for violation of a regulation made under this section.

Section 30 of the bill, which adds the convention as the 14th schedule, in itself does not mean very much. It only identifies the convention, but does not give it any force or effect.

Now, as I understand it, under international law treaties are not made by Parliament. As far as Great Britain is concerned, and as far as Canada is concerned, a treaty is made with a foreign country by Her Majesty or by the Governor General of Canada. Internationally, Her Majesty or the Governor General can bind Canada to a treaty obligation without the sanction of the cabinet or of Parliament, but of course under the conventions of the constitution Her Majesty would not do that.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The power is historic.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Yes. But the practice is that in important treaties the Government will not recommend His Excellency the Governor to implement a treaty by its acceptance without the sanction of Parliament, but will ask the two houses of Parliament to give their approval to ratification of the treaty by resolution or by statute. However, in international law that is not necessary. It is only a convention under our constitutional form of Government that that is good practice.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is to get the agreement carried out after it has been made.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I am coming to that now.

The next thing I wish to point out is this, that although in international law a treaty is binding when made, under our constitution it is not the law of the land. That is the distinction, and that is what my honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) has in mind. Our law in this respect is distinguishable from the United States law. In the United States all treaties require ratification by, I think, a two-thirds majority of the Senate of the United States, and when that is done the treaty becomes part of the law of the United States, and in that way is binding on every citizen of that country.

But that is not so in Canada. Here a treaty becomes law in one of two ways. The one with which I am most familiar, because of some other statutes I had to consider, is a straight declaration by an act of Parliament that it shall become the law of Canada.

I recall—I have not got the document here, so I am speaking from memory—that the International Waterways Treaty made by Great Britain before the enactment of the Statute of Westminster provided for the control of rivers flowing along the boundary line between Canada and the United States, or of rivers which flow from Canada into the United States and have their outlet in that country. The Columbia, which flows from Canada and has its outlet at the city of Portland, Oregon, is such a river. After Great Britain had made that treaty the Parliament of Canada recited it in full in a statute and declared it to have the full force of law in this country.

There are many examples of that. One that I have here is chapter 40 of the Statutes of Canada 1951, "An Act respecting an income tax convention between Canada and France, signed at Paris on the 16th day of March, 1951". Section 2 provides:

> The convention entered into between Canada and France set out in the schedule to this act, is approved and declared to have the force of law in Canada.

That is one standard practice, but men who are dealing with these matters in the departments and who, I think, know full well what they are talking about, tell me that another practice has grown up to accomplish the same purpose. It is illustrated in this bill, but I certainly do not recommend to this house that the proposed new section 495A (a) and (b), on page nine of the bill, shall remain in its present form. However, that is a matter for the committee. My suggestion is that when second reading is given the bill should be referred to the appropriate committee, which I take to be the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and that there be present there for consultation and advice the Parliamentary Counsel of the Senate, the Counsel who advises the Department of Transport, a representative of the Department of External Affairs, and from the Department of Justice the Assistant Deputy Attorney, who I understand has drafted this bill. It is desirable that we interrogate and co-operate with them in getting the formal approval in its best form.

Let me indicate what I was concerned about. I feel I have helped in the thinking that has gone on, and I certainly have learned something too from the discussion. Now, in the first place, I think we ought to have an express provision approving the convention. That ought to be done in fairness to the Government. I think the Government should ask for it, and that it should not continue the practice, if there ever has been the practice, of having approval by implication. Rather it should continue the practice of seeking by statute or resolution the express approval of Parliament before advising His Excellency to give formal acceptance to a treaty. It might be said that even when Parliament passes a bill in the form of the present bill there is approval by implication, but it is not good sense or sound practice to leave to an implication what ought to be said openly and simply. I think you will find that in committee all these gentlemen I have mentioned will agree that amongst other provisions in this section 495A there should be an express provision that Parliament approves of the convention.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Do I understand that the crown has already accepted this convention?

Hon. Mr. Farris: No it has not been accepted.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Is it usual to have a treaty attached to a bill?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Oh, yes. I can refer my honourable friend to the International Waterways Treaty, which I mentioned. The whole convention or treaty was recited in a bill, as was the income tax convention with France. There are many other examples. I think that is the way it might be done here.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: But there are other internal provisions in this bill.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I am coming to those in a moment.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: But they are in the same bill, and it seems peculiar.

Hon. Mr. Farris: As I say, this bill is divided into two distinct parts. One part is an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act—I have not touched that as yet—and the second gives some form of approval to this international convention. It is only the second part that I am discussing at the present time.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: You are discussing the bill. It seems strange that this bill should have attached to it forms of certificates to be signed by masters and engineers in our own country.

Hon. Mr. Farris: It may appear strange to my honourable friend, but I cannot see anything particularly embarrassing in it.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I think it is.

Hon. Mr. Farris: When this bill reaches the committee honourable members could reject every proposal I have made for amendment of the bill, if they wish to do so. Every section should be considered there and the parties asking for it should be interrogated about it. I will leave that until I come to the second part, for I do not want to get the two parts mixed up.

I suggest that the first thing that ought to be done with this part of the bill is to declare in express language that Parliament approves of the convention. The Government has no right whatever to advise His Excellency to approve of this if Parliament disapproves of it, and certainly the Government would not do so.

The second point is the matter of implementing the treaty by making it binding on Canada, if we accept it. I have indicated one way in which this can be done, namely, by declaring that the provisions of the convention have the force and effect of law in Canada. What is suggested here is an alternative, and I shall be very much interested in having the draftsman of this legislation present in committee so that there may be a full discussion of the form of the declaration and the reasons it is presented in that form. Under the terms of the bill as they appear on page 9, the Governor in Council may make regulations—

(a) to carry out and give effect to the provisions of the International Convention for the Prevention of Pollution of the Sea by Oil, 1954, set out in the Fourteenth Schedule;

(b) for regulating and preventing the pollution by oil from ships of any inland, minor or other waters of Canada;

When I first read that section I thought that, by implication, it was intended that the Governor in Council should have the power to declare the convention part of the law of Canada. I understand, however, that that is not the thinking of the learned gentleman who prepared it in this form. His thinking is this, that instead of Parliament giving the Governor in Council power to declare this to be the law of Canada, the Governor in Council should be empowered to implement the treaty by making a law of Canada which will cover the requirements under the treaty.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is better.

Hon. Mr. Farris: To a man who is not a lawyer this distinction may seem a little subtle, but when one thinks about it there seem to be reason and sense behind it, and the department has put those considerations in a form which, to me, is convincing. The reasons advanced are: it seems that the provisions of the convention have not been drafted so as to be self-executing. They speak of acts that "shall be prohibited" and of provisions that "shall apply" or that "shall not apply", which suggests that further provisions are required to give them effect. Therefore, instead of simply saying the convention is the law, the Government is given the power to do, as part of the law of Canada, not as part of the law under the convention, those things that will give effect to the convention.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why transfer to the executive a power which is primarily that of the Parliament of Canada Why not give it in a statute?

Hon. Mr. Farris: This is a question I would like my honourable friend to ask the learned counsel from the department, because I have asked the same question and have weighed the matter in my own mind for two days while I have been inquiring about it. My honourable friend's question will be better answered by departmental counsel. In committee we shall have power to decide just how this purpose can be made effective, and if we decide it should be done by express declaration of Parliament, the bill can be sent back for that purpose.

Also, it is suggested that frequently when conventions of this kind are being implemented, it is found that the language is poor. Counsel does not say so to us in this case but, speaking of the general practice, he states "the language . . . . is poor and does not correctly or exactly state what is intended." When you get twenty plenipotentiaries together, each one with different ideas, it is quite possible that conclusions will be embodied in language which, if adopted as the law of Canada, would prove an awkward way to do what it is intended to do. If regulations can be made to carry them into effect, those regulations can be so framed as to correctly state the law. That is to say, all Parliament is required to do is to take such steps as may be necessary in order that other countries cannot complain that Canada is not carrying out her obligations under the treaty. One way of doing so is to make the treaty the law of Canada. The objection to that course is that it may not be the best way to do what has to be done. But if it is left to the executive to deal with these points as they arise, it can make a law under the authority of Parliament which will become the law of Canada, and thereby give full sanction to our obligations under the treaty.

I am fairly well convinced that in this respect the department's viewpoint is sound, but I am no less convinced that what I am saying or what any other honourable senator may say at this time on the question should not be accepted as conclusive. I think the proper thing to do, once you come to the conclusion that the convention is worth while, is to send the bill to committee, call departmental counsel before it to present their views, and then determine how we want the treaty to be made effective.

Hon. John J. Connolly: The point which the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) has raised is most interesting, especially to lawyers. But if the language of the treaty is not appropriate for the purpose of administering the law in Canada, and if we modify that language by regulation or in some manner so that it would be properly and efficiently enforceable here, are we substracting from the value of the treaty, and may not other parties to the convention complain or have cause to complain that we are not doing what in fact we are expected under the treaty to do?

Hon. Mr. Farris: I will do my best to answer the honourable senator. His question emphasizes the fact that on a matter of this kind, the draftsman of this legislation, who I understand has had considerable experience and possesses a great deal of ability in this regard, should be asked to elucidate the matter. My answer, which is a second-hand answer, is that the idea of delegating this authority is, not to "chisel" on it, if honourable senators will permit that word, or to do less than the treaty requires us to do, but that, in giving effect to the treaty, we shall use our best judgment to make sure that the regulations give full effect to the spirit of the treaty. We may go further than the treaty requires; but there is no objection to that. That is the best answer I can give, except to re-emphasize that the thinking of every senator-lawyer indicates how important it is that this bill go to committee, where all these questions can be dealt with fully. Unless there are other questions on this convention, that is all I wish to say about it.

Honourable senators, the Canada Shipping Act is comprised of 734 sections, and this bill undertakes to amend about 27 of them. The amendments divide themselves into two parts, most of them being formal and merely seeking to make the act more workable and practicable. I do not think we need worry about them. However, in my judgment two or three of the amendments are contentious and should be thoroughly threshed out in committee. As I see it, the principle involved at this stage is whether the amendments are of sufficient import and contain enough sense and reason to warrant their consideration in committee? Otherwise we would be passing on them without having the benefit of important information obtainable in committee. Assuming this bill is given second reading, and, inasmuch as these amendments can be rejected entirely or supported in their present form or further amended in committee, I feel there is little to be gained by interrogating me at this time or by having other members express their views here. The place to do that is in committee.

As sections 3 and 28 of the bill are somewhat contentious I propose to leave them for the moment, but I may say that I expect to hear a lively discussion in committee before section 28 is approved. I am not sure that I support all its provisions, but that does not embarrass me in my duty of urging that the bill be sent to committee.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Would the honourable senator care to explain the provisions of section 28 now?

Hon. Mr. Farris: I would rather deal first with what I consider to be the formal or less important sections. As an example of one of these less important sections I would refer to section 19, which reads in part as follows:

> Section 477 of the said act is amended by adding thereto the following subsections:
> "(3) Where any barge, scow or like vessel carries a crew but not passengers, and is towed by a steamship and is not moved by sails or oars, such barge, scow or like vessel, if making a voyage more than fifteen miles from land, is subject to inspection and to the regulations . . .

And so on. In short, the hulls of these vessels are to come under full inspection. Tragedies have occurred at sea when ships have broken in two, and the fact that these ships do not carry passengers should not preclude their full inspection, which might save the lives of many crews. That is the principle underlying the extension of these inspection regulations. Incidentally, I do not want to be bound too much by my explanation of these provisions, for their exact details should be considered in committee. At that time we shall be able to go over the bill clause by clause with Captain F. S. Slocombe, Chief of the Nautical Division of the Department of Transport, and departmental lawyers and others.

Section 3 of the bill amends section 95 of the act, which deals with the measurement of ships and the reduction of gross tonnage to net tonnage. The net tonnage of a ship, as it appears in the registry, is the tonnage upon which harbour dues and other charges are based in most seaports of the world. Great Britain has had a section similar to our present section 95, and the difficulty she encountered is that with modern machinery reduction of gross tonnage to net tonnage has not been as large as it ought to be.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is it upon the net tonnage that a ship pays when going into a port?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Yes. A ship entering several harbours in a year is at an unfair disadvantage in the reduction of her net tonnage from her gross tonnage. The expenses are very much increased. I recall that only a few days ago a gentleman by the name of Mr. Hees, I think, spoke in Vancouver, and he was bemoaning the great loss to shipping in Canada, stating that we were no better off than Switzerland, and more or less blaming the Government. Now, here is one item. It is not the largest item—because the largest item is labour—in the difficulties of shipping and in the operation of ships under Canadian registry, but it is one thing that has a very material effect. I have before me a memorandum, which says in part:

> In recent months Canadian Vickers Limited, Imperial Oil Limited, and the Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing Association, have made representations to the department in this matter, recommending that modifications similar to those in the British tonnage measurement regulations be made in the Canada Shipping Act. It is pointed out that the difference in the rules places Canadian ships at a disadvantage as compared with ships registered elsewhere, not only in the case of motor propulsion, but also in the case of Great Lakes vessels which, although propelled by steam, have small engine rooms in comparison with their size.

These provisions as to the differences in formula between the gross tonnage and the net tonnage were worked out when steam was used for big engines and boilers. The displacements could then be measured and the exact reduction between net tonnage and gross tonnage could be arrived at on that basis, but today when we have types of engines and methods of propulsion which do not require these large displacements the formulae that had been in existence do not give just the distinction between the old system and the new one. The result is an apparent unfair net tonnage. The memorandum gives some illustrations and states that the net tonnage of the Scott Misener under the present United Kingdom rule is 9,151, while the net tonnage under the present Canadian rule is 10,328.

To give a second illustration, the Baie Comeau has a net tonnage under United Kingdom rule of 1,476 and the net tonnage under present Canadian rule is 1,634.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable member a question? If the modern methods of propulsion have reduced the space taken up by the engine, have they not thereby increased the carrying space of the ship?

Hon. Mr. Farris: They may have done so, but is that any reason why, when we come to pay our harbour dues, we should travel all over the world at a disadvantage with other countries? If that were the issue my honourable friend might have a point that would be difficult to answer, but I say that the issue here is, can we by changing our method of determining net tonnage go out of these ports with the same liability as competing ships of other nations.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: But do our regulations cover the measurements of the ship when we go into a British port?

Hon. Mr. Farris: No; the net tonnage is determined under section 95.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Of our own act?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Yes, of our own act.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Even in a foreign port?

Hon. Mr. Farris: That is right. At every port we go into we have to pay harbour dues and other charges of a similar nature on the basis of our own measurements, and the measurements of ships from other countries are made under their own laws.

The memorandum before me gives a third illustration: the Sept Iles, an ocean-going vessel. Under British registry her net tonnage is 11,691; under Canadian registry, by section 95 as it now exists, it is 13,631.

Those are illustrations of comparison, and the companies which operate these ships are concerned that this matter should be corrected and that we should amend our rules to conform to the amended section in Great Britain. I can find no argument as to why that should not be done. In fact, Mr. Hees might have a point against us if we did not do it.

The only other matter I want to deal with is section 28, which does three things; actually it does two things, because one of them is already in existence. It enlarges the area as to which regulations controlling the speed and safe operation of motor-driven vessels shall apply. The section as it now stands applies only to inland or minor waters, and inland and minor waters are both defined in the present Shipping Act. I am told that in many places where tourist camps and tourist homes are operated, people using the beaches are in great danger from the reckless operation of motor boats. My honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) may be familiar with the fact that the Toronto Harbour Commissioners have jurisdiction over the waters in Toronto and have passed regulations as to the speed of motor boats in certain areas there and against their reckless operation, no matter what the speed is, because even a low speed might amount to reckless operation if children were swimming, for instance. Their regulations are practical, comprehensive, and drastic, and I am sure are completely satisfactory to the people of Toronto.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Most necessary.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Section 28 of the bill says:

The Governor in Council may by order or regulation provide

(a) for the government and regulation of any part or parts of the inland, minor or other waters of Canada.

The words "other waters" completely revise subsection 4 of section 645 of the act. If that becomes law the Governor in Council will have power to do exactly what the Harbour Commissioners are doing in Toronto, where it is found these dangers exist.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Does that not apply to all National Harbour commissions?

Hon. Mr. Farris: I do not know.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I think it does.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I doubt it, though.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Yes, of course.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Does this provision anticipate the licensing of ships?

Hon. Mr. Farris: I am coming to that point. The section I am now discussing does not deal with licensing. For instance, the Toronto Harbour Commission has been able to deal with this question, apart from the requirements for the licensing of motorboats; regulations are provided by Order in Council, but they are presently confined to minor waters.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: If my honourable friend does not mind, I should like to ask him whether the addition of the word "other" with respect to "waters of Canada", according to the rule ejusdem generis, really changes this section? In other words, will it not be "minor" and "inland" waters, notwithstanding the addition of "other"?

Hon. Mr. Farris: I am pleased to hear my friend ask that question, because it occurred to me right at the outset. I am in sympathy with the question, and I should like my friend to put it to the draftsman of this legislation.

The honourable Leader of the Government has just pointed out to me that it is proposed to amend the regulations by adding two words, "inland" and "other", with respect to waters of Canada, and that the provisions today apply only to minor waters as defined in the Canada Shipping Act. I say to my honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity, (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) that that is a further question we shall have to consider when the bill is in committee. We do not want to kill this provision here because, properly interpreted, it is a good one.

A further question is that of jurisdiction under "other waters", assuming the department intends to give it its widest application, namely, as to the waters of Canada over which Parliament has jurisdiction. That jurisdiction might extend to tidal waters or it might be something which could be regulated by the provinces in the same way as property and civil rights having to do with motor cars are regulated under the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: But we never leave that to the executive.

Hon. Mr. Farris: That may be so. I am not arguing now from the standpoint of whether or not it should be left to the executive, but rather that it is a question of jurisdiction, and one which should be raised in committee, as to what the proper wording should be. I agree with the point raised by my honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity; and if I were defending a man for a violation on the ocean within the three-mile limit, the first point I would make would be whether, applying either the noscitur a sociis rule or the ejusdem generis rule, the part of the ocean in question included "inland, minor or other waters of Canada". This is a rather peculiarly worded section, in that it is more common to have the general proposition stated first and then to add words to the effect that, notwithstanding the generalities thereof, in paricular it should include certain other things.

These are matters, honourable senators, which do not justify our turning down this convention in the form in which it comes to us, but rather make it necessary that we should give it most careful consideration in committee. Certainly, I should not like to see this bill go to the House of Commons without having received most careful scrutiny from the legal members of this house.

Honourable senators, I think I have been as helpful as I can in explaining this bill. I have frankly indicated to the house—and my friend from Toronto-Trinity has assisted me—the problems that should be considered in committee, and there is little more I can say in an off-hand manner to the house.

I come now to paragraph 4(b) of section 28, which empowers the Governor in Council to provide:

—for the licensing of operators of vessels on such waters.

I understand that section to mean that the Governor in Council will have power to license every motorboat, even a little outboard.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: That would include all fishing boats, no matter how small?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Yes, this section gives the Governor in Council power to do that. I do not think for a moment that the Government would want to make the application of its power that wide, but Parliament is being asked to give this power.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, and in doing so we might prevent the provinces from doing it, because we would be occupying the field.

Hon. Mr. Farris: That is so. But by giving this bill second reading we are not committing ourselves to accept the provisions of that paragraph when it reaches committee; however, if we delete it now we will preclude ourselves from the opportunity of a full and intelligent discussion on it. I should like to have the views of the witnesses who will be present on the constitutional question of jurisdiction, and also with regard to the matter of the licensing fee. I understand that the persons who will appear before us will urge that the Government should have the licensing power asked for. I am quite sure the honourable Leader of the Government would not commit himself as to whether the Government woud choose to exercise that power; nevertheless, the possibility of its being used must be considered.

I may say that in 1950 the question of the licensing of operators of motorboats came up in the House of Commons. There was considerable discussion of it at that time, and my friend the leader can tell you better than I what happened. I think Mr. Howard Green, Mr. Herridge and some others discussed it. All I am saying now is that in my view the great bulk of these amendments will in all likelihood be passed in committee with little or no discussion. However, some time may have to be spent on section 28, because it is directed to the safety of those who enjoy the use of our waters. It would be most unfortunate if because of the wording of that section as it comes before us we killed the bill.

I urge on the house that the bill be now given second reading. May I say that for personal reasons only I should like to see it passed next week; however, if any honourable senator wishes to adjourn the debate on second reading, it is his privilege to do so.

Hon. Mr. Smith: Honourable senators, I move adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Before the debate is adjourned, may I be allowed to make a few comments?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I see no objection to this bill being debated on Tuesday afternoon next, and if convenient honourable senators could consider it in committee on Wednesday morning, at which time the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) would still be here.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I think some further time should be allowed for discussion of the bill. It is an interesting subject to the people of Canada, particularly persons engaged in the construction of ships, and to captains, engineers and so on. We should have some idea of their reaction to this proposed measure.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Honourable senators, may I be allowed to make a suggestion? No doubt a good many honourable senators would like to give further consideration to the bill before it goes to committee. We have listened to a most remarkable and able explanation of the bill by the senator from Vancouver South, and everyone would agree, I am sure, that when the bill goes to committee the honourable senator should be there to give us the benefit of his knowledge of and familiarity with its various provisions. So, with the unanimous consent of the house, I would suggest that we get the bill to committee quickly enough to allow the honourable senator from Vancouver South to attend.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I have consulted with my friend from Vancouver South, and he assures me he could attend a committee meeting Wednesday morning next. I agree entirely with what the senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) has said. The senator from Vancouver South has given us a very fine explanation of this difficult and complicated bill and we are grateful to him.

Honourable senators, I said earlier this day that on Tuesday afternoon we could proceed with the motion of the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll). The honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson), who adjourned the debate, probably might forgo her rights and let us proceed with this bill on Tuesday afternoon.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that when the debate is adjourned, on motion of the honourable senator from Queens-Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Smith), this bill be put on the Order Paper as the first order of business for Tuesday afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Smith: Honourable senators, may I say a word on that point? One of the reasons why I made the motion was to give honourable senators representing the Maritime provinces a chance to have a look at the bill. I myself saw it this morning for the first time, and I find in the bill some things that are going to be rather contentious. Now, if the bill goes to committee next week there will not be enough time for me to ascertain from the people in my part of the country whether there are sections in this bill that they like or do not like. I would rather see this bill put off for three weeks, which means until after the Easter recess.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Smith, the debate was adjourned.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

SECOND, THIRD AND FOURTH REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the 2nd, 3rd and 4th reports of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

On motions severally moved by Hon. Mr. Macdonald, Chairman of the Committee, the reports were adopted.

PRIVATE BILL

PENSION FUND SOCIETY OF THE DOMINION BANK—SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill G-7, an Act respecting The Pension Fund Society of the Dominion Bank.

He said: Honourable senators, I need detain the chamber for only a few moments in connection with this bill, which should be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for investigation. The reason for this bill arises mainly from the fact that on February 1, 1955, the Dominion Bank and the Bank of Toronto were amalgamated. Each bank had a pension scheme. The Dominion Bank's pension scheme was incorporated by an Act respecting the Pension Fund Society of the Dominion Bank. The society was incorporated in 1887 and an amendment was made to the statute in 1899.

The Bank of Toronto also had a pension fund, which was not incorporated; it was managed and held by trustees.

When the banks were amalgamated it was decided that the pension fund of each bank should be fused into one organization. Now it is proposed that the name of the company which operates the pension fund should also be changed to "The Pension Fund Society of the Toronto-Dominion Bank".

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: All they ask for is a change of name?

Hon. Mr. Connolly: A change of name.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 20, at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN COMMONS GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourabble senators, on March 17, 1931, the then Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable P. E. Blondin, issued and distributed to honourable senators the following instructions regarding the use of the Senate Gallery in the House of Commons on budget night:

Upon the occasion of the delivery of his Budget Speech by the Finance Minister, none but senators will be admitted to the Senate Gallery of the House of Commons. This step is taken for the purpose of providing accommodation in the gallery for as many senators as possible.

In past years many senators have been excluded from the gallery upon similar occasions on account of many of the places being occupied by relatives and friends of senators.

This practice has been followed ever since by succeeding Speakers.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

JOINT COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION—SUBSTITUTION OF COMMONS MEMBER

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a message has been received from the House of Commons in the following words:

Resolved that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours that this house has substituted the name of Mr. Harkness for that of Mr. Fulton on the Special Joint Committee of both houses of Parliament on the Federal District Commission.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 176 to 212, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

PAINTINGS IN SENATE CHAMBER

INQUIRY

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, would the honourable leader tell us if the eight depressing paintings adorning this chamber are on loan from the National Gallery of Canada?

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, it is my impression that the eight paintings are on loan from the National Gallery. However, I will obtain definite information as to that and let the honourable senator know.

TRADE AGREEMENT WITH RUSSIA

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR APPROVAL OF RATIFICATION

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I wish to give notice of the following motion for tomorrow, with leave:

That it is expedient that the Houses of Parliament approve the ratification by Canada of the agreement on trade between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, signed at Ottawa on February 29, 1956, and that this house do approve the same.

Although I am giving notice for tomorrow, I do not intend to proceed with this motion until after the Easter recess.

PUBLIC BILLS

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR SUSPENSION OF RULES

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I also wish to give notice that I would like to move tomorrow, with leave:

That from this day until the end of the Easter adjournment Rules 23, 24 and 63 be suspended in so far as they relate to public bills.

A similar motion which is passed at about this time every session, the purpose being to enable us to give a bill more than one reading in one day.

EMERGENCY SITTINGS

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR AUTHORITY TO CONVENE SENATE DURING ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have a third notice of motion for tomorrow, the purpose of this one being to authorize His Honour the Speaker to call honourable members back during any adjournment, if an emergency should arise. It also is a usual motion. Do honourable members wish me to read it? It will appear on the Order Paper tomorrow.

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

JOINT COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION—ADDITION TO SENATE MEMBERS

Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien moved, with leave:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Gershaw be added to the list of senators serving on the Joint Committee on the Federal District Commission; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that house accordingly.

The motion was agreed to.

FINANCE COMMITTEE

ADDITION TO MEMBERS

Hon. Mr. Beaubien moved, with leave:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Howden be added to the list of senators serving on the Standing Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATE RULES

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR NEW RULE AUTHORIZING DIVORCE COMMITTEE TO DIRECT EVIDENCE OF OFFENCE TO LAW-ENFORCEMENT AGENCY

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I wish to give notice that with the leave of the house I shall move tomorrow the following resolution:

That the Rules of the Senate of Canada be amended by inserting therein immediately after Rule 143 a new Rule 143A as follows:

143A. The Standing Committee on Divorce, whenever in its opinion there has been disclosed in any evidence given before it or any of its subcommittees an offence against the Criminal Code of Canada or the violation of any other law in force in Canada, may direct that such evidence, or a part thereof, be drawn to the attention of such law-enforcement or other agency in Canada as the Senate Committee may deem appropriate, for such action as such agency may deem requisite.

With consent, I shall move that tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: I would draw the attention of the honourable senator to the fact that, except with leave, two days' notice is required.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Except with leave, yes. I thought that, with consent, I might move it tomorrow; otherwise, of course, I give two days' notice now.

Hon. Mr. Haig: As I understand the motion, it provides that the committee itself can bring evidence to the appropriate law officer of the Crown. I would think that that would have to be done with the consent of the house.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: We are asking the consent of the house to do that very thing.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I know, but to bring evidence to the attention of some other agency cannot be done in any particular case without the consent of the house.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I suppose that should be debated when the motion is put. If I might deal with the point: you cannot make public a proposed prosecution before, say, a Crown Attorney, has passed upon it. This resolution provides only that you can refer the evidence to a Crown Attorney or other appropriate officer, such as the Attorney General. You cannot ask for power in a specific case prior to having the opinion of the Crown Attorney in your hand.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is understood that the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) must give the required two days' notice.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: If that is the ruling of the Chair, I now give two days' notice.

NEW BRUNSWICK POTATO MARKETING BOARD

DISCUSSION ON ANSWER TO INQUIRY— NOTICE OF FURTHER INQUIRY

Hon. Frederick W. Pirie: Honourable senators, on Tuesday last, March 13, during my absence from the Senate the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) answered an inquiry I made pursuant to notice of February 21. It took the Government three weeks to reply to my inquiry, which consisted of only two questions; and, in fact, my second question was only partially answered. I do not think these questions were contentious, at all. With permission of the house I would like to read again the notice of inquiry I gave on February 21:

1. Has the audit and investigation concerning the operations of the New Brunswick Potato Marketing Board, under agreement with Her Majesty the Queen, represented by the Minister of Agriculture, dated December 21, 1953, been completed?

2. If so, when may the tabling of the report be expected?

Surely the Government should not have to take three weeks to answer two simple questions like those. On February 28 I inquired of the Leader of the Government if he could give any indication as to when I might expect an answer to my inquiry, and he was frank to say that he did not know but that he would try to get the information as soon as possible.

Honourable senators will remember that almost a year ago I submitted similar questions and that I received much the same answers as I did the other day. On Thursday last, March 15, the honourable Leader of the Government's reply to the first question as to whether the audit of the investigation had been completed, was "Yes." His answer to the second question was:

The matters investigated are now under consideration by the departments of Government and others concerned.

As I have said, I think that is only a partial answer to my second question. On Thursday last my honourable friend from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) made an inquiry, and if I may be permitted I will read it.

The Hon. the Speaker: I think the honourable senator should confine himself to the answers to his questions.

Hon. Mr. Pirie: Well, I submitted an inquiry here on what I am speaking about. If I am out of order, I will certainly bow to the Speaker's ruling.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, the honourable senator from Victoria-Carleton (Hon. Mr. Pirie) has started to speak on this subject, and so far as I am concerned I have no objection to his continuing.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the house agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Pirie: Thank you.

Last Thursday the honourable senator from Vancouver South asked this question:

> May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate a question with respect to the answer given on Tuesday to an inquiry by the honourable senator from Victoria-Carleton (Hon. Mr. Pirie)? The inquiry was as follows:

I will not quote the inquiry, because I have already done so. The honourable senator from Vancouver South read the inquiry, together with the answers given by the honourable Leader of the Government, and went on to say:

> I would like the honourable leader to tell me if Senator Pirie is included in the "others concerned". I think the honourable senator is perhaps as vitally concerned as anybody, inasmuch as he was the one who made the inquiry.

The following comments concluded the discussion:

> Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not know, and as Senator Pirie is not present just now I am afraid I cannot answer the question.
>
> Hon. Mr. Farris: I cannot see what his absence has to do with it.
>
> Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not know who the others are, or whether Senator Pirie is concerned.
> Hon. Mr. Farris: I have already stated that I think he is concerned.

Well, honourable senators, I am vitally concerned. Anything that represents upwards of a million dollars of the taxpayers' money going down the drain concerns me, and I have reason to believe that practically a million dollars have gone—where, nobody knows, apparently, up to this time. I would like to find out, therefore, why the report of the investigation is not tabled, because I am reliably informed that the information in the report has seeped out to a great many others who are concerned in this whole affair. It seems to me that it would be a very simple matter for the Government to tell me why this report cannot be tabled at the present time. Sometimes I think that people on the street can get more information than I am able to obtain from departments of Government. I have interviewed certain departments that should be concerned about this matter, and I have been brushed off from time to time. Had the information been such that they wanted to hold back for any specific reason, I should think they could give me some justifiable reason why they could not table the report, and I would be perfectly willing to accept it. When the report is tabled, I do not believe that 10 per cent of the racketeering, the graft, and the falsifications of the records will appear in it. I have requested that the Government investigate all of that scandal under the Public Inquiries Act, or by a Royal Commission. I believe it had upwards of a dozen to fourteen down in the community seeking to gather information by going out in the country and asking somebody a few questions. Well, in my opinion it will never get any information by going around and asking a few simple questions. In connection with a matter so serious as this I think the Government should appoint a Royal Commission or a commission under the Public Inquiries Act, who would subpoena and bring in witnesses and put them under oath. That is what I asked the departments of government concerned to do two years ago, but they did not see fit to do so.

Now, what does the Auditor General say about this affair? I think that is important. I will read his statement from the Public Accounts of Canada for 1955, Volume 1:

> An agreement with the New Brunswick Potato Marketing Board also covers the 1953 crop. A final settlement has still to be made as Treasury investigations indicate falsifications of some inspection and delivery records. The Government of Canada has paid out $2,200,000, but the settlements have been restricted to transactions not in controversy.

I do not know just when that report was published, but this comment is dated 1955. In the light of that report alone I should think the Government would be interested in getting its toes into the sand and doing something about this matter.

Let me refer to what the Minister of Agriculture said in reply to a letter from a Roman Catholic priest down in the country I come from. The priest had written the minister criticizing the way this matter was handled, and referring to the fact that half of the money disappeared between New Brunswick and Ottawa. I take my quotation from the Grand Falls Cataract—a very important sheet down in our country—from which I will read only a short paragraph of the minister's letter in reply to the priest. The minister said, in part:

> As you suggest,—

That is, as the priest suggests.

> —they did attempt to set up an organization of that kind in New Brunswick two or three years ago, and you suggest it cost the Government a lot of money and really go further and suggest that somebody between Ottawa and there got half the money. I think we should face the facts if we are going to correct the situation—the trouble with the administration of the board's activities—

That is the New Brunswick Potato Marketing Board's activities.

—was right in New Brunswick, and some of it brought about by persons who were presumed to be working for the farmers. Ottawa has nothing to do with that excepting to prosecute persons who steal money no matter who they happen to be. There might even be some question as to whether a police force is the proper authority to teach people not to steal.

All this came out of the agreement which the Government made through the Department of Agriculture with the New Brunswick Potato Marketing Board. That agreement, which is rather poorly drawn, gives the marketing board the opportunity to do what they did. In many instances the agreement was not carried out; in other words, they got around the agreement. The fault lies with the Department of Agriculture, because the agreement came out of that department.

Honourable senators, I have a good deal of evidence, but I am not going to submit it here today. However, I do have a further inquiry to make. And may I say that I hope it will not take three weeks to get an answer. It is a simple question, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I give notice now:

That on Thursday, March 22, I will inquire of the Government what departments of governments and others were concerned in the investigation concerning the operations of the New Brunswick Potato Marketing Board under agreement with Her Majesty the Queen represented by the Minister of Agriculture, dated December 21, 1953?

Honourable senators, I will have a good deal more to say about this subject when the report is tabled. I am anxious to see the report, and I think it is up to the Leader of the Government in the Senate to press for its tabling in this house.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure you would not expect me to be in a position to reply this afternoon to the remarks of the honourable senator from Victoria-Carleton. I have not seen the report, nor has my honourable friend; his imagination leads him to think it contains something that it may not contain. I do not know what is in the report; indeed, I am frank to admit that I do not know very much about potatoes.

I shall endeavour to get the information asked for under the present inquiry as soon as possible. I may say that it will have to be obtained from various departments, and I am not at all hopeful that I will have the information available by Thursday next. I assure my honourable friend that I will do my very best to obtain it quickly.

DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATIVES

INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Mr. Reid inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of March 13:

1. Is there any rule governing the number of embassy representatives in Canada?
2. What are the number and names of the various countries that have diplomatic representatives in and around Ottawa?
3. Are diplomatic representatives, and others attached to these embassies under any restrictions by the Canadian Government as to travel outside Ottawa, or throughout the country? If not, are Canadian representatives abroad allowed the same privilege, including the right to travel freely in the various countries to which they have been assigned?
4. What country or countries, if any, place travel restrictions on foreign embassy representatives assigned to that country?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry is as follows:

1. No.

2. There are 47 foreign and Commonwealth missions in Ottawa representing the following countries:

Embassies: China, Netherlands, Germany, Greece, Turkey, Norway, United States of America, France, Indonesia, Israel, Peru, Italy, Ireland, Egypt, Brazil, Yugoslavia, Venezuela, Belgium, Japan, Denmark, Argentina, Costa Rica, Portugal, Dominican Republic, Mexico, Colombia, Chile, Cuba, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Spain, Uruguay, Haiti.

Legations: Switzerland, Iceland, Austria, Lebanon, Sweden, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Luxembourg, Finland.

High Commissioners' Offices: United Kingdom, Pakistan, India, New Zealand, Australia, Union of South Africa.

3. In Canada, as in most countries, there are certain establishments which foreign diplomats and even Canadians can only visit under special authority. Apart from these restrictions diplomatic representatives in Canada, with the exception of members of the Soviet Embassy, are free to travel when and where they wish throughout the country. Members of the Soviet Embassy are required to give full details of their itinerary at least 48 hours before they intend to travel beyond a 75 mile radius of Ottawa, and if their proposed journey is not approved they are notified accordingly. Travel regulations affecting Soviet diplomats were first introduced in 1952 by Canada and most other NATO countries in retaliation for the restrictions imposed by the Soviet Government on foreign diplomats in Moscow. Canadians and other diplomatic representatives in Moscow are required to notify the Soviet authorities 48 hours in advance of any trip to be taken beyond a 40 kilometer radius of Moscow and are forbidden to travel in certain designated areas of the Soviet Union.

4. The Soviet Union is the only country which places travel restrictions of a general character on Canadian diplomatic representatives.

CANADA SHIPPING BILL

CORRECTION OF STATEMENT

On the Order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Honourable Senator Farris, seconded by Honourable Senator McDonald, for the Second Reading of Bill (H-7) intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act".—(Honourable Senator Smith).

Hon. Mr. Smith: Stand.

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris: Honourable senators, in my speech of last Thursday on this subject I gave the house some information that is not quite accurate, and I wish now to be allowed to correct it. In reply to a question asked of me I said I understood that the Harbour Board in the city of Toronto did not license small craft in that city. I have since received from the authorities in the department a copy of the bylaws of the Toronto Harbour Commissioners, and apparently they do license small craft. But I am puzzled about their authority for doing so. I have in my hand a memorandum that I received in connection with this question. The Toronto Harbour Commissioners are incorporated under a statute cited as the Toronto Harbour Commissioners Act, 1911. The Harbour Commissioners' powers to make bylaws and regulations are granted to them under section 21 of that act, which reads:

21. The corporation may from time to time make bylaws not contrary to law, nor to the provisions of this act, for the following purposes:

Then paragraph (h) is the only one that seems material:

(h) For regulating and controlling the operation and use of all canoes, sailing boats, row boats, motor boats and other kind of craft within the limits of the area over which the corporation has jurisdiction.

That does not appear to me to cover licensing.

There may be other provisions; I have not had time to look at the statute to find out. However, I find this:

No bylaws shall have force or effect until confirmed by the Governor in Council and published in the Canada Gazette.

Thus they have power to regulate and control the operation and use of canoes, motor boats and so forth, and I think those things are quite within their jurisdiction.

The commissioners' bylaw No. 7 covers the licensing of power vessels; and a power vessel is defined as meaning "any vessel which uses machinery in whole or part for its propulsion or which is equipped with such machinery".

Part I of that bylaw provides that

No person shall operate any power vessel or sailing vessel within the port and harbour of Toronto until the owner thereof has licensed or registered such vessel with the Chief Officer of customs at some port or place in Canada.

It further goes on to say:

No person under the age of 14 years shall be licensed to operate nor shall such person operate a power vessel within the port and harbour of Toronto,

Another provision is:

No person shall be licensed to operate nor shall any person operate a power vessel until such person shall have passed a satisfactory examination by the Harbour Master or by some other person designated by the Commissioners as to his capability as an operator, which examination may include a test of the knowledge on the part of such person of the mechanism and operation of a power vessel and of the bylaws of the commissioners and other marine regulations in force.

Part III of bylaw No. 7 contains this provision:

No person shall operate any vessel or craft in a negligent manner nor operate any vessel or craft which is not seaworthy or safe; . . .

Honourable senators, I merely call attention to this matter now because I understand the bill will not be referred to committee until after the Easter recess and some honourable senators may wish to make further inquiries on the point in the meantime.

EXCHEQUER COURT (DIVORCE JURISDICTION) BILL

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, March 14, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, seconded by Hon. Mrs. Hodges, for the second reading of Bill I-5, an Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Hon. George H. Ross: Honourable senators, since the honourable member from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) introduced this bill I have given it some consideration. I am anxious to see the taking of evidence in divorce actions transferred to the courts, but I do not think it is necessary to give the Exchequer Court authority to hear divorce actions. In my opinion more satisfactory results can be had by changing the rules of the Senate.

Under the new rules that I am about to suggest, a person seeking divorce should first take proceedings in the Superior Court of his province praying for separation as to bed and board on the ground of adultery on the part of the respondent. If the petitioner succeeded in his action he would file with the Senate a petition for divorce, accompanied by a certified copy of the final decree of the Superior Court, and the Senate would act on that without hearing any witnesses or taking any evidence. In other words, we would take the Superior Court's finding as final.

To bring about these changes the rules of the Senate would have to be amended in some respects. In the first place, I suggest the rules should provide that no petition for divorce should be received by the Senate unless accompanied by a certified copy of the judgment of the Superior Court of the province granting separation as to bed and board on the ground that the respondent has been guilty of adultery.

Secondly, I suggest the rules should provide that the Senate should not take action in any case until the expiry of at least three months from the date of delivery of judgment by the Superior Court. This time lapse would enable the Attorney General of the province to intervene if there was any allegation of connivance, collusion, condonation or perjury, in which event further inquiry could be made by the Divorce Committee of the Senate.

Furthermore, the rules would have to be amended to provide that no evidence shall be taken by the Divorce Committee in cases of this kind. The findings of the Superior Court should satisfy us as to the adultery of the respondent.

Then, honourable senators, once a year or thereabouts the Senate's Parliamentary Counsel or the Divorce Committee itself might check all petitions and certificates of petitioners, and a single statute could be passed to cover all approved cases. It would not be necessary for us to deal with each case separately in the form of an individual bill.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I do not like to interrupt, but may I ask my friend a question? He suggests, and I am in agreement on this, that the evidence be taken before the Superior Court in the province concerned.

Hon. Mr. Ross: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Euler: What would be gained by having the decision given by the Senate? Why not have it included in the court's judgment, as is done in other provinces? What would be gained by bringing each case here and prolonging it?

Hon. Mr. Ross: I will deal with that later.

It is not uncommon for one court to hear the evidence and make a finding on the facts in a case and for another court to grant relief. In England, until quite recently, the Chancellor sitting in Equity would hear affidavit evidence read to him. But he would not hear viva voce evidence. If a dispute as to the facts of a case came before him he would refer the action to the Common Law side of the court to have the facts determined. On the facts so found he would adjudicate.

Under our present procedure we bring witnesses to Ottawa, hear their evidence and decide whether or not adultery has been proved. As exclusive authority over property and civil rights is by section 92 (13) of the British North America Act assigned to the provinces, it is often necessary to take another action in the province. Thus there often have to be two highly expensive actions and the rehearing of many witnesses in order to determine the rights of the parties. But under the procedure which I suggest, property rights as among the spouses and their children could be better dealt with in a single action.

The honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) said that if the Exchequer Court were given power to deal with divorces it would also have incidental power to deal with property rights between husband and wife and children. Many lawyers are of the same opinion. Others disagree with this view. But whatever the law may be, I do not think that the Exchequer Court, if vested with power to grant divorce, should have any jurisdiction to settle property rights. I believe Quebec and Newfoundland are doing excellent work in that field. It should be left with them.

The act granting a divorce should expressly state that the divorce was not intended to affect property rights in any way, but that it merely authorized the parties to remarry. I suggest this because lawyers appearing before the Divorce Committee have made the statement that, by granting the wife a divorce, we release the husband from family responsibility; that not only is the wife affected, but the children as well; that the husband has no further obligations as far as they are concerned. I can understand that the husband would be relieved of marital responsibility upon a decree of annulment, since in such a case there never was a marriage; but I cannot understand how this principle would apply to a valid marriage. On one occasion I asked a lawyer who held that the passing of a divorce bill relieves the husband from responsibility whether it was his view that this resulted from the wording of the act which granted the divorce, or whether it was due to the law of Quebec. I could not obtain a satisfactory answer to that question.

Possibly the House of Commons would be glad to get rid of these divorce actions. If so, the Senate and House of Commons Act might be amended to provide that upon the Senate passing a divorce bill, it could receive the Royal Assent without the concurrence of the House of Commons, whether or not we continue to deal with divorce actions as at present. I think it highly desirable that the statute should be amended so that the House of Commons would not have to spend time in reviewing the evidence.

By the British North America Act, section 92 (14), the administration of justice is assigned, not to Parliament, but to the courts. The administration of justice surely includes the hearing of witnesses and the finding of facts from the evidence adduced. I respectfully submit that by hearing evidence in divorce actions we are usurping the functions of the courts.

In my opening remarks I said that I thought it would be more satisfactory to revise our procedure in the manner I have suggested than to transfer divorce jurisdiction to the Exchequer Court, or to some other legal tribunal, as was suggested by the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler). If we amended the rules in the manner I have proposed, we would not antagonize a large proportion of the people of Quebec and Newfoundland by forcing upon them a court to deal with divorce, which is contrary to the religious convictions of the majority in those provinces. I think that is a very important consideration.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The relief proposed in the bill is for a minority only. It does not affect the others at all.

Hon. Mr. Ross: We are here to defend the rights of minorities.

Hon. Mr. Euler: But the honourable senator is not defending the rights of the minority in the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Ross: By doing what I suggest, we shall not oppress the minority in the province of Quebec, and we shall be protecting minorities throughout Canada.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Let me ask the honourable senator a question: were this bill to pass, if I, in Manitoba, married again and wanted a divorce, could I obtain a divorce in that province?

Hon. Mr. Ross: Surely.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The only provinces affected by the bill are Quebec and Newfoundland.

Hon. Mr. Ross: That is so.

Hon. Mr. Haig: If I were a member of the minority in Quebec I could have this relief; if I were a member of the majority I would not be affected at all.

Hon. Mr. Fournier: The minority in Quebec has never complained about the treatment it receives in relation to conditions in the other provinces.

The Hon. the Speaker: May I remind honourable members that it is not in order to carry on a series of speeches at the same time? The honourable senator from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Ross) should not be interrupted without his consent.

Hon. Mr. Ross: If the proposal which I suggest were adopted it would not work any hardship on the minority in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask another question?

Hon. Mr. Ross: Surely.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Is it not so that the only people who would be affected by this bill are members of the minority? Members of the majority can, if they choose, apply for relief. We are not doing anything to stop them. All we wish to do is to give members of the minority the choice of applying for relief either to Parliament or to a court.

Hon. Mr. Ross: If the rules were amended as suggested we would rid the Senate of a duty which it should not have to perform—the hearing of evidence and examining of witnesses hour after hour, day after day.

Further, we would greatly reduce the costs of divorce to needy litigants.

I do not see any necessity for this bill. I would suggest that its sponsors withdraw it and have the matter referred to a committee —perhaps the Divorce Committee—to recommend changes in the rules so that divorces may be granted in future according to what was obviously the intention of the framers of the British North America Act; or perhaps it would be considered preferable to have a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons set up to revise the rules for that purpose. If action were taken without delay, the matter might yet be dealt with during the present session.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, for Hon. Mr. Bouffard, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

PENAL REFORM

DISCUSSION CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Monday, March 5, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Croll calling to the attention of the Senate the present position with respect to penal institutions in Canada and in particular discussing the need for further reforms in the Canadian penal system.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, one subject that receives very little attention in this country is women prisoners—that is, women who have been convicted of crime in our courts and sentenced to a term in jail. I would like to bring to your attention today some points in regard to the situation of these women who, except for the visits and help of the loyal and devoted members of the Elizabeth Fry Society, might well be called the forgotten women of Canada.

Fortunately the number of women convicted and imprisoned in Canada is not large, but in a democratic and Christian country, where each individual is considered of prime importance, because the number of women convicts is few is certainly no reason why they should not be given every possible opportunity to become good citizens.

In a series of excellent talks over the CBC our well-known woman commentator Ann Francis recently gave what to many were very surprising facts and information about the women in our local and provincial jails and in the federal penitentiary at Kingston. The large number of people who have expressed to me an interest in those talks has surprised me very much. If our people heard more about women prisoners I think they would take greater interest in them.

Honourable senators, for obvious reasons I will today deal only with the women in the federal prison at Kingston, Ontario, where women are sent who have been sentenced in any province in Canada, except Newfoundland, to a term of two years or more. In 1949, when Newfoundland came into Confederation, it was part of the arrangements that women convicted and sentenced in that province to two years' imprisonment or more should spend their term of imprisonment in Newfoundland jails, but that of course their maintenance would be paid by the federal Government, whose responsibility they are.

Women who are sentenced to a term of two years or more, anywhere between Halifax and Victoria, must be taken to Kingston to serve their term of imprisonment. Their transportation, including that of the guards, is very expensive. Formerly, one wing of the penitentiary at Dorchester, New Brunswick, known as the Maritime penitentiary, was reserved for women prisoners from the Maritimes, but in 1923 it was closed and its inmates were transferred to Kingston.

Honourable senators, in early days the purpose or objective of society in placing offenders under detention was to visit on them revenge for an injury done to society, or it was an attempt to force offenders to make retribution for offences committed against society. As we become more civilized those ideas of revenge and retribution are gradually being abandoned, and more and more it is being recognized that the purpose in keeping offenders under detention is not revenge or retribution, but the protection of society. That is achieved by keeping dangerous criminals out of circulation, and also by rehabilitating reformable criminals, so that on their release they will no longer break the law and be a danger to society. Some women, but very few, are really dangerous and completely incorrigible.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Perhaps honourable gentlemen think that a great many of us are dangerous. It is true, of course that some women commit really serious crimes and cause people to fear for their lives or property, but the number of such women is small. They must be kept strictly under lock and key, but the larger proportion of women prisoners do not require to be so carefully guarded. However, all of them require educating, training, counselling and guiding, so that when they are released they will find a place in society and make a worth-while contribution to it rather than become misfits and prey on other people. I would remind honourable senators that a very large percentage of the total number of prisoners in Canada are released at some time and could play a useful part in their communities. I am sorry that I do not have the actual percentage figure.

Hon. Mr. Gershaw: It is 95 per cent.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Thank you. That is to say, 95 per cent of the prisoners are released and again mix with society. As I have indicated, it is necessary to train those people while they are in prison so that when they are released they will become good citizens and make a worth-while contribution to society, rather than be a drag on it.

Ever since Victor Hugo brought so vividly to the attention of society the case of Jean Valjean in his book Les Misérables, society has more and more accepted a belief in its obligation to provide the offender who returns from prison a fair opportunity to live a natural life without interference because of his past.

In 1936 and 1937 the Archambault Commission studied prison conditions, and in its report of April 1938 it recommended in general that there should be classification, segregation and job training amongst prisoners; and that members of prison staffs should be trained. As we all remember, war broke out shortly after the report was issued, and as a result very little action was taken until after the appointment, in 1946, of Commissioner Gibson. Since that time considerable progress has been made along the lines of the recommendations of the Archambault report.

Honourable senators, I have visited the penitentiaries at Kingston, Collin's Bay and Dorchester. In each institution I found classification officers such as were recommended, who interview men prisoners, classify them according to their aptitudes and try to help them with personal problems, especially with post release plans. The work carried out by these classification officers is very valuable. My only criticism is that there were far too few of them in proportion to the number of prisoners to be served, so that the heavy case loads placed upon each officer make it impossible to work effectively with every case.

I also visited the Women's Prison at Kingston, but there I found no classification officers at all to help the prisoners with their problems and to discover their aptitudes so that they might be put on work at which they would be most useful and, if possible, given the training they require. Likewise, of course, there was no one to help them with their post-release problems.

I have recently learned, honourable senators, that plans are under way to appoint a social worker for the women's prison, who will carry on work similar to that done by the classification officers in the men's penitentiaries. I trust that these plans will soon bear fruit and that an appointment will be made. Because of the relatively small number of women prisoners, such a social worker would have a much greater opportunity to work with individual prisoners.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Will the honourable senator permit me to ask how many women prisoners there are?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: In the Women's Prison there are usually about 100; at the moment I think there are about 78. The number does not exceed 100 at any time.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Thank you.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Because of the smaller number of women prisoners and the greater opportunity to do individual work among them, a social worker might well develop very successful methods which might later be adapted to the training of men prisoners. In other words, it might work as a sort of pilot project.

In this respect, honourable senators, the federal prison is not as advanced as are some provincial prisons. Some provincial institutions have had for some time and still have social workers; indeed, I believe posters are now up advertising three vacant positions for social workers in provincial prisons. It is time the federal prison at least did as well as some provincial prisons are doing.

I should like to speak also about the teaching and vocational training carried on in penitentiaries, a development that has taken place since General Gibson's appointment. This is of course in keeping with the philosophy of giving prisoners who are reformable a training that will enable them to earn an honest living when they return to society. Many prisoners, because of bad home influences and perhaps for other reasons, have never had an opportunity of learning a trade by which they could earn their living.

At Dorchester Penitentiary I saw men who were learning to become plumbers, bricklayers, carpenters and upholsterers, and very good work they are doing. Honourable senators may be interested to know that in my own province of New Brunswick the training these men receive is recognized and the years they spend in working at a trade in the penitentiary are accepted and credited on their apprenticeship to that trade.

At Collin's Bay Penitentiary I saw men learning carpentry, electric machine shop practice, motor repair, plumbing, heating and several other trades. Vocational training in the penitentiaries for men is given during the normal work hours. The local municipal authorities recognize the training received at Collin's Bay, and I understand considerable progress is being made towards its recognition by other authorities as well. I know that similar work is being carried out at the Federal Training Centre, but as I have not visited that institution I shall not speak about it.

Honourable senators, these activities cannot be too highly commended, for the man who goes out from prison properly equipped to make his living honestly is much less liable to return to prison than if he had received no special training. Money spent in providing such training is profitably invested if it prevents a man from returning again and again to prison and eventually becoming a permanent public charge.

An article in last week's issue of Weekend Magazine stated that of the men at Collins Bay who took the vocational training, only 30 per cent have committed further offences, and about 70 per cent went straight.

When I visited the Women's Prison last year I did not find there such progressive vocational training to equip women prisoners for their return to society. Opportunities have been provided for women prisoners to improve their education; but from what I could observe, it appeared that the educational matron had a great many other responsibilities, and did not have adequate time to do the teaching that should be done in such an institution. It is true that inmates may receive training in hairdressing, stenography and take certain correspondence courses, but the studying had to be done outside of work hours. After a woman has spent the day working in a steamy laundry, hot kitchen or sewing room, it takes a great deal of ambition and persistence for her to devote her leisure hours to self-improvement. Despite the fact that there are only a small number of women in the prison I believe it would be worth while to set up a program that will give reformable women the same opportunities during their work hours as are given to men for becoming proficient in a trade for which they may have an aptitude and by means of which they may earn a living on release. The money spent on providing such opportunities might well prevent the return of many women to prison in the future. No one doubts it is better to spend $50 a day for treatment of a patient in hospital that may result in a cure, than to continue to pay $5 a day to maintain him in a hospital without treatment, through lack of which he may become an invalid and even a chronic invalid. The same idea, I think, applies to treatment for prisoners.

The number of men in federal penitentiaries in Canada is 5,000; but, as I mentioned, the number of women in the Women's Prison is 100 or less. According to the report of the Commissioner of Penitentiaries for the year 1954-55, which is his latest report, 38 women were admitted during that year.

Now, honourable senators, in view of the greater number of men than women prisoners, it is quite understandable that the first experiments regarding classification and vocational training should have been made in the men's prisons, but now that these experiments are proving so successful women are demanding that women prisoners receive similar treatment.

Hon. Mr. Davies: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Are the women in federal penitentiaries segregated or not?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Not at present. I am going to refer to that later, Senator.

The present federal Women's Prison is a maximum security building, inside a high stone wall. The prisoners are lodged in cell blocks, and the cells have no outside windows. It is basic in the most elementary penology, I think, and it is most important for rehabilitation that first offenders should be kept separate from hardened criminals who might influence them toward a life of crime. These cell blocks do not permit of such segregation, so at present no segregation is provided for women prisoners.

The Archambault report of 1938 states that women are not a custodial problem and that detention of them in a maximum security institution is unnecessary and undesirable. The Commissioners also stated that in their opinion the number of women prisoners did not justify the erection of that building for women prisoners, which was commenced in 1925 and finished and occupied in 1934. The report recommends that women prisoners could be better dealt with in provincial institutions and that arrangements might be made with the provinces to have the province where a woman is convicted provide for her custody and maintenance. That of course would have to be at the expense of the federal Government, whose responsibility such women are.

Honourable senators, there are a number of arguments in favour of this recommendation. One is that prisoners who are in detention far from their homes, such as those from the east coast, the west coast and the Prairies, seldom see any relative during the period of their imprisonment. It seems cruel to take women prisoners so far from family and friends for so long. Students of modern penology advocate the breaking down of the wall of isolation that used to be erected between the prisoner and the outside world. That isolation very often resulted in the prisoner being at a complete loss on release from detention and unable to adjust himself or herself to normal living.

Honourable senators, the shortest term for which a woman is sent to Kingston is two years, and a two-year absence from friends and family is a break that cannot easily be overcome. It may well mean that the woman is cast adrift entirely from home ties, and if so she undoubtedly would be much more susceptible to bad influences on release. If a woman were imprisoned in her own province there is a much greater chance that during her prison term her family would visit her, keep in touch with her, and receive and help her when she came out of prison. Statistics show that about half the inmates of the Women's Prison are drug addicts and many are alcoholics. There is no provision for treatment of these persons in the federal prison. Among the recommendations made last session by the Senate Special Committee on the Traffic in Narcotic Drugs, after its excellent work under the chairmanship of the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid), was this one, which is to be found in the committee's report at page xix:

> . . . the penitentiary authorities might give further consideration to the particular problems presented by criminal addicts in terms of possible segregation, treatment including specialized training and rehabilitation and other measures necessary in view of the special problems which addiction superimposes.

In view of the small number of women addicts, an experiment along those lines might well be carried out at the Women's Prison in Kingston.

If there are no plans to implement this recommendation—and although I have made inquiries I cannot find that there are—it might be of very great advantage if arrangements could be made with the Province of British Columbia so that women prisoners convicted in that province would be imprisoned there, as in that case they would receive the benefit of the clinics which British Columbia is establishing for the treatment of criminal drug addicts.

And if arrangements could be made with the Province of Ontario that women convicted in the province be imprisoned in provincial jails, those who are alcoholics might have the advantage of care and treatment which, I believe, from reading reports, Ontario, proposes to provide for women prisoners in their provincial jails, namely, treatment similar to that provided for men prisoners at the Alex. G. Brown Memorial Clinic at Mimico.

Even if such arrangements could only be made with some individual provinces, it might be well worthwhile, because of the facilities for treatment in some of our provinces. The making of separate agreements with provinces to have women convicts imprisoned in their respective provinces is not without precedent, for as I mentioned at the beginning of my talk, women convicted in Newfoundland are not sent to Kingston Penitentiary but remain in prison in Newfoundland at the expense of the federal government.

It is obvious that some provinces do not have the facilities to take care of such women prisoners, much less to give them treatment. This is particularly true of the Maritime provinces where ordinarily the number of women in the jails is small, and there are no facilities, so far as I know, for the treatment of drug addicts or alcoholics. On the other hand, few if any of our women prisoners come within these categories. The honourable senator from Halifax-Dartmouth (Hon. Mr. Isnor) says that the women down there are good women. The number of women sentenced to imprisonment for two years or more is even smaller. Usually there are not more than one, two or three from any of the individual Maritime Provinces in the federal prison at Kingston at one time, and sometimes there are none at all. However, it is quite possible that through agreements between the provinces and the federal Government arrangements could be made for the provinces which are better equipped in this respect to take care of the few women federal prisoners from provinces not equipped to do so. Such an arrangement to look after the prisoners from their own province, even if made with only a few of the better equipped provinces, would result in a large number of women prisoners spending their prison terms near their families and their friends, even though all might not be able to do so. This would bring about a drastic reduction in the cost of transporting prisoners from all parts of Canada to Kingston. Also it would reduce the population of the Women's Prison and, consequently, the cost of operating it. If the provinces which are equipped to do so would accept responsibility on behalf of women prisoners from their own area, the number whom it would be necessary to care for at Kingston could be accommodated in much smaller quarters than the present jail.

I understand that in 1947 the provinces indicated they were not prepared to accept this responsibility, as recommended by the Archambault Commission, for the custody of women prisoners sentenced to two years or more. However, great strides forward have been made by some of our provinces in the treatment of provincial prisoners and in the types of accommodation provided; and it might be well, at this time, to ascertain from each provincial Government whether it is prepared to provide custodial care and treatment for women prisoners in this category. Since in most cases the prisoner, after serving her term, will return to the province where she was convicted, it is as much to the interest of that province that she be reformed, rehabilitated and made into a good citizen as it is that suitable reformative treatment be given to those sentenced to terms under two years, and therefore, of course, incarcerated in the provincial jails.

It would seem advisable that before any more costly penitentiaries solely for women are created, the provinces should at least be consulted to ascertain whether they are prepared to assume responsibility for custodial care and treatment in their own areas, at the expense of the federal Government, of their women citizens who are sentenced to terms of over two years.

I understand that plans for a new women's prison have been drawn up. There seems to be some conflict of opinion as to what progress has been made. However, the proposed building will be near the Collin's Bay penitentiary. It will be a large institution, without high stone walls such as guard the existing prison, but will be surrounded by high wire fences. It is not a maximum security building, but it could be designated as a medium security institution. There will be windows in the cells. These will have small steel sashes through which escape could not be made but which will eliminate the bars we traditionally associate with prison. I am told that the part of the building in which the prisoners will live will be in the form of three wings radiating from a central kitchen unit, at which prisoners will get their food and take it on trays to their respective wings. This allows much more segregation than is possible in the present prison.

The new plans have another advantage in that they provide space to carry on vocational training, for which the present building is inadequate.

There is no doubt that if the proposed building is constructed it will be a great improvement on the existing prison. But many people who have studied this matter believe that a more open type of prison, conforming to the cottage design which is being adopted in other countries, would provide for better treatment, improve the chances of rehabilitation, and cost much less. Those who have had considerable institutional experience are convinced that satisfactory group segregation cannot be achieved in one building, particularly when work projects are shared. This, of course, is one of the arguments for the cottage type of building. If such a design were adopted, one or more cottages could provide the maximum security necessary for the small number of women prisoners who need it; and the other inmates would benefit greatly and be in a much better condition to return to normal life after their release if they were confined in this more modern type of prison.

It has been argued, I believe, that the Canadian people are not prepared to accept a development of this kind, which has been adopted with great success in England and the United States. But I would remind honourable senators that some such cottages have been built and are in use at Oakalla Prison in British Columbia. The cottage school for girls at St. Bruno, Quebec, which takes offenders between the ages of 12 and 18—and at 18 girls are women—is of this type, and the security measures are much less severe than, in view of the physical plans, may be expected in the proposed jail for women. In British Columbia and Saskatchewan there are completely open forestry camps; Salmonier, in Newfoundland, has been an open institution for years; and New Brunswick is building an open jail farm. It would therefore appear that the Canadian public is not too strongly opposed to open prisons of these types.

As I have remarked, it has been the experience of other countries that cottage and open type prisons invariably operate to reduce the rate of recidivism much below the rate resulting from the older type of high security institutions.

If it is impracticable at this time for Canada to implement the recommendations of the Archambault report and return women prisoners to their own provinces, because of the experience of other countries we should experiment with these newer types of institutions which, as I have said, have proved very successful, particularly in Great Britain and the United States.

There are one or two other points I would like to mention. One is that in all our prisons there should be staffs trained not only to control prisoners but to aid in their rehabilitation. The Staff Training College at Kingston is a great step forward. Men and officers come to it from all over Canada and through it are learning much about prison management and administration, and treatment of prisoners. When I visited Kingston last year I was very disappointed to learn that the matrons of the Women's Prison had not participated in these training courses. I understand now that one of the matrons has since taken one of the courses, and it is to be hoped that others will have that opportunity soon.

In talking to honourable senators today I have dealt only with the prison for women, but I am well aware of the need in Canada to make greater use of probation so that first offenders are given a second chance without having to be sent to prison. As the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) has told us, a large proportion of first offenders placed on probation in Ontario never get into trouble again. The proportion of first offenders sent to reformatories, penitentiaries or prisons who do not get into trouble again is only about one-third as large. We must realize, of course, that those placed on probation are probably better prisoners, better risks, than the ones sent to jail; so the figure of one-third is perhaps not fair. However, there certainly is no doubt that the proportion of first offenders who are placed on probation and return to crime is smaller than the proportion of first offenders who are sent to jail and return to crime.

The Archambault Commission, in dealing with women prisoners, stated on page 145 of its report:

> Your commissioners believe that it is especially important to avoid committing girls to institutions except in extreme cases, and that the policy of probation, as recommended for men, should be applied even more generously to female offenders.
>
> With reference to female offenders, the report of the Young Offenders Committee in England emphasizes this principle in the following words:
> "Both in the public interest and the welfare of the young offender concerned, it appears to us to be the duty of the legislature and of the courts to see that so far, at any rate, as persons under twenty-one are concerned, imprisonment is abandoned as far as practicable and is only used when no other means can suitably be applied."

There is a footnote that the English report referred to is that of the Departmental Committee on the treatment of Young Offenders.

The latest report of the Commissioner of Penitentiaries shows that some of those admitted to the Women's Prison during the year 1954-55 were under twenty-one.

Honourable senators, I do not feel that too much praise can be given to the Elizabeth Fry Society of Kingston, which is doing a very fine job with inmates of the Women's Prison. One of the volunteer members is a social worker who talks with the prisoners and tries to help them plan their future. Members of the society are allowed by the authorities to take prisoners, about to be released, on pre-release outings so that they can again become accustomed to the hazards of everyday, life such as crossing streets. During their imprisonment the women forget how to use a street car or bus and a telephone, and how to buy in a store. They are frightened and jittery and need to be taught these things all over again. One hundred and thirty-five years ago Elizabeth Fry, a wealthy Quaker woman, devoted herself to prison reform for women and she advocated classification, segregation, education and a hostel for women when they first came out of prison. The Elizabeth Fry Society branches in Ottawa, Toronto, Kingston, Vancouver and Winnipeg are still working for these objectives.

At the Fifth Canadian Penal Congress, held in Kingston in 1949, Miss Henrietta Addition, Superintendent of the Westfield State Farm of New York, stated, as shown at page 69 of the report:

> By and large, women's institutions in the United States have a reputation of being somewhat better off than the men's institutions.

Honourable senators, that cannot be said of Canada when we compare the Women's Prison with the men's penitentiaries. There are still a large number of improvements that should be made in the penitentiaries for men, but Canadian women feel that the women prisoners should as soon as possible have at least the same advantages as men prisoners now have.

We believe that classification officers or social workers should be provided in the Women's Prison. We believe that vocational training during regular work hours and on the same basis as is provided for men should be provided for women. We believe that if it is at all possible women should be imprisoned in the province in which they are convicted, and if that is not practicable at this time and it is necessary to build a new women's prison, it should be of the modern cottage type of construction. We believe that there should be as much training of the staff in the Women's Prison as in the men's prisons. And altogether, women demand that the same opportunities be provided for women prisoners as are now provided for men.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, I wish to discuss very briefly one class of criminal, the psychopath. For many years psychopaths were regarded as insane and were treated with inhuman severity. They were kept in closets, stalls, cages and cellars. They were chained, beaten and lashed into obedience. The situation was sad indeed. In addition to this, the other prisoners had to listen to the ravings of these mad people night after night. It was a type of punishment so demoralizing that no one should have been subjected to it, and it was not recognized by the law even at that time.

As has been said, one purpose of imprisonment is to protect society. Ninety-five per cent of prisoners are at some time released. During their imprisonment they are taught regular habits and a trade or occupation, and the uneducated are taught to read and write. They are treated for whatever physical ails they may have and, as a general rule, they have good advisers and sensible guards. All these things help to keep a prisoner occupied and serve to make him contented. But they do not strike at the cause of criminal action; they do not get to the underlying factors which have caused people to become criminals. The suggestion is made that instead of the punishment fitting the crime—that is, instead of the period of confinement being fixed by the court —it should be unspecified, particularly in the case of psychopaths, including sexual perverts. They should be kept confined until they are cured. That may take a short time or their lifetime, but it is the only way in which society can be protected from these offenders.

Since the Middle Ages, of course, great progress has been made in reforming and rehabilitating prisoners, but little has been done in the way of accurately diagnosing and outlining a course of treatment for psychopaths—people who are not insane but have some mild, mental defect. Research, which has done a great deal for body ailments, could be used in this mental field to produce real results. For instance, a foundation might be set up—of course it would cost a great deal of money—to get all the information possible, to assemble statistics and so on, about the structure of the brain. Is the cause to be found in the blood chemistry, alcoholism or drug addiction, for instance? The heredity of the person might be looked into—and I shall have something more to say about that later—and also his environment. Or is there some strange decision on the part of the individual, and if so what makes him decide in that way? Slum housing, broken homes, mental weakness, comic strips, bad books, poor nursing, are all subjects to be inquired into.

The particular class of criminal I wish to bring to the attention of honourable members is the psychopath, that is, the mentally sick person, the one who gives most trouble in prison and whose actions are at the base of a great deal of criminal behaviour. These are the prison wolves. I suppose most prisoners are a little weak-minded and misfits in society. The type of which I am speaking are not insane and would not be sent to a mental hospital, yet they are unstable, hostile, unpredictable and dangerous; they lack the brakes which keep most of us a little closer to the straight and narrow path; they commit crimes without a cause, and they disregard the feelings of others. The most important fact is that once that condition is crystallized in the human brain, cure seems to be hopeless.

Honourable senators, may I give a brief case history of one of these psychopaths? Earl Ward was born in 1924. He is a handsome man, five feet eleven in height, and weighs 188 pounds; has wavy, black hair, full face, and narrow-set eyes. He is not insane or mentally defective, but there is something wrong with him which has not been cured up to the present time. He is unstable, unreachable, emotional. He was a model child until 5 years of age, when he fell and injured his head. He then became spiteful and revengeful and thought that his father punished him more than his older brother, and he began to hate both his father and brother. When 11 years old he had a long sickness, during which he was pampered and doted on, and received everything he asked for, yet in spite of that treatment he was overbearing and ungrateful. He started to school and gave the teachers a lot of trouble. Finally, after breaking all the thermostats in the school he was expelled. Then he became a problem at home; he would go away and stay for long periods of time; he was morose and melancholy, and would not say where he had been. At 15 years of age he ran away from home. One day he was hitchhiking, and a kindly gentleman gave him a ride in his big automobile. In some way or another this boy got into the driver's seat, and he drove that high-powered car at 80 miles an hour. That was a characteristic of his make-up—he did things without a cause. Of course, he got into the hands of the police at that time. Later he was sent to several reform schools, one after another, and he worked at short intervals. When he reached the age of 25 he was arrested for armed robbery and peddling narcotics, and was imprisoned. In penitentiary he behaved badly, and boasted that he stabbed one of the guards to death. He was sentenced to solitary confinement, but did not stay there, for he gouged his flesh and feet with his fingers until gangrene set in and he had to be sent to hospital. On his return to jail he organized a revolt with great ability and succeeded in imprisoning some of the guards as hostages, and was able to negotiate with the officers while the guards were held. This man is still in prison and his condition is not cured.

Honourable senators, that is a typical case. It may be said that unless early treatment is given and preventive measures are taken the outlook for this class of prisoners, which comprises about 30 per cent of all prisoners in the penitentiaries, is very bad. The national health grant given by the Government to promote mental hygiene and to prevent mental breakdown is a movement in the right direction. Many school boards establish separate classes for mentally defective children; that also is a step in the right direction. And I cannot speak too highly of public school teachers and Sunday school teachers who devote themselves to the welfare of their pupils and are doing great work in starting these youngsters along the right path. These teachers have their hearts and souls in that work and are deserving of great credit.

Good food, good reading material and useful work are important, but good parents are more important than anything else. I want to say here that I think there is nothing wrong in the sterilization of some parents in selected cases. It is done in quite a few mental institutions.' I happen to know of two families in which the parents are mentally defective. They have six children, not one of whom is anywhere near normal. I feel that in some cases sterilization is a step which can be taken in the best interests. As we all know, the child from a broken home has two strikes against him to start with.

In closing, I should like to say that work is being done to try to solve this problem. Psychiatric associations everywhere are devoting a lot of time to its study; and, superintendents of mental hospitals are doing good work in trying to get a firmer basis for a diagnosis distinguishing between nervous diseases and mental diseases. It must be recognized too that religious teaching is playing a great part in many cases. Last session I served on the Senate's special committee investigating the narcotic drug problem. We heard details of drug addict cases that were almost hopeless; yet, a Salvation Army representative came forward and gave convincing evidence that two or three such persons had been cured through religious teaching.

Another device for helping these unfortunate people is surgical operation, called lobotamy, or the taking out of an affected lobe of the brain. The use of electric shock and insulin shock have changed the lives of many unfortunate people. More recently some of the newer drugs have been found to have a good effect in curing disorders within the brain. Of course, these disorders are usually difficult to treat. But after all, what a great accomplishment it is to lift one such person up into the sunshine where he can enjoy thought and living and meet his responsibilities, instead of spending his whole life with a twisted mentality, doomed to the dark shadowy land of despair and disillusion.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Reid, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

FELLOWSHIP OF EVANGELICAL BAPTIST CHURCHES IN CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. John A. McDonald moved the second reading of Bill F-7, an Act incorporating The Fellowship of Evangelical Baptist Churches in Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, so that I may be the more certain of not saying anything which would cause dissension, may I stick pretty closely to my notes? If after my explanation this afternoon, the house approves of the bill receiving second reading, I shall then move that it be referred to a committee where I shall be pleased to endeavour to give any additional information honourable senators may require.

In the year 1927 a controversy arose regarding the Professorship of Theology at McMaster University among members of some churches in the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec, which resulted in about 80 churches and missions, with a membership of about 5,000, leaving that Convention. The Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec plus the Convention of the West and the Maritimes have about 1,400 churches, with a membership of 150,000 in round numbers.

Some of the churches that left the parent organization at that time formed "The Union of Regular Baptist Churches of Ontario and Quebec" and some remained independent for a number of years. In due course the independent churches formed "The Fellowship of Independent Baptist Churches of Canada". This bill results from the action taken by these two groups of churches in amalgamating by resolution on October 21, 1953, and now asking to be incorporated as "The Fellowship of Evangelical Baptist Churches in Canada". I have here a copy of this resolution duly signed and witnessed. There is also available a copy of their Constitution.

Basically there does not seem to be any difference in faith between The Fellowship of Evangelical Baptist Churches in Canada and The Baptist Federation of Canada, although the former is not a member of the Baptist Federation. Members of The Baptist Federation of Canada are not opposing this Bill F-7, except that various officers of the federation and of the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec, through their spokesman, Dr. T. B. McDormand, General Secretary-Treasurer of the Baptist Federation of Canada, have objected to the use of the adjective "evangelical" in the designation of the body seeking incorporation. In this connection Dr. McDormand explains their objection in the following words:

> I should like to request that you apprise the Senate of Canada, in connection with further readings of this bill, that the adjective in question suggests a distinction between the body using it and other Baptist bodies in Canada which, in fact, does not exist. The Baptist Federation of Canada believes that it is comprised of evangelical Baptist Churches. It believes that the historic Baptist body which it represents has always been evangelical in policy and practice, and that it is to this day. Accordingly, it views as unfortunate the use of the definitive adjective in the title of the body seeking incorporation through Bill F-7, such use implying a distinction from other Baptist bodies which dose not exist, and warranting certain inferences on the part of the public which would be unjust to other Baptist bodies, including the Baptist Federation of Canada, the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec, and others. Will you, therefore, inform the Senate that all Baptist bodies in Canada are traditionally, and continue to be, evangelical without regarding it necessary to air the fact in titles.

Hon. Mr. Davies: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Will this proposed new organization take in that group of people led for many years by Dr. T. T. Shields in Toronto?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: It will. Most of the churches which were formerly under Dr. Shields' leadership are now in the group requesting incorporation. However, there still remains a group of about 18 churches that call themselves "The Conservative Baptist Association", which represents the remnant of Dr. Shields' original group.

Dr. McDormand continues:

On the other hand we should like you to advise the Senate that representatives of the Baptist Federation of Canada and of the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec have conferred on this matter with Rev. W. N. Charlton, Rev. John Boehmer, and Rev. J. R. Armstrong, officials of the body seeking incorporation. The conference was amicable, and the last three mentioned gentlemen assured the Baptist Federation and Convention officials that no unfavourable reflection on other Baptist bodies was intended in the choice of the adjective "evangelical" in their title, and that they would be happy to subscribe to the publication in the Baptist press of a statement carrying this assurance. They stated that their body had canvassed other possible names, and had concluded that, since, in the nature of the case, some distinguishing adjective was inevitable, the one chosen was the most acceptable to their people and less likely than other alternatives to be objectionable to other Baptist people.

The Baptist Federation and Ontario-Quebec Convention officials present at the conference accepted this assurance from the open "Fellowship" representatives, and agreed to enter no formal objection to the passage of Bill F-7 by the Senate of Canada, resolving only to ask you to make clear to the senators that we withdraw our formal objections only in view of the agreement of the "Fellowship" officers present at our conference at 190 St. George street, Toronto, March 16, 1956, that we publish in our Baptist press a statement as to the awkwardness of the adjective in their title when viewed in the light of the traditional and ongoing evangelical position of all Baptists in Canada.

In closing, honourable senators, I would like to express my appreciation, and I am sure that of all honourable members, to Dr. McDormand and all who met with him representing both groups, for the help they have given us and the good example of how best to settle differences. May I also be so bold as to humbly suggest my hope that there might evolve from this a reunion of these churches, which I trust would result in even greater accomplishments in the great service in which they and all churches are engaged.

May I also express my thanks to our leader for the great services he rendered during the correspondence carried on with the sponsors of this bill in trying to get it drafted into proper form.

I would also like to thank our Parliamentary Counsel for the great amount of work he did in drafting the bill. He now assures me that it is in proper form.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask the honourable sponsor of the bill if he intends to proceed with this bill before Easter or to defer it until the house convenes after the Easter adjournment?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators, I would like to have this bill read the second time today, and if that is done I would suggest that it be referred to committee. I would be prepared to move that Rule 119 be suspended in so far as it relates to this bill, so that we could have it heard in committee tomorrow, and afterwards third reading could be given and the bill sent over to the House of Commons before the Easter recess. I ask this in view of the facts that the bill has been on our Order Paper for over a week and that both sides have finally come to an agreement. One reason why I asked that second reading be delayed for a comparatively long time was that the attempt to reach agreement was being made. I can assure honourable senators now that there is no objection by either side to passage of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Davies: I do not know whether the honourable senator heard my question, but I did not hear his answer.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I answered in the affirmative.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I rise to protest against this bill being put through in a hurry. Personally, I would like to have more information about it. I have just received an air mail letter from a person in British Columbia in which he advises that there is some objection to the word "Evangelical" in the name of the organization. In the past number of years five or six different Baptist organizations have received charters from Parliament, and now two unincorporated organizations are coming forward to be incorporated under the name in which the word "Evangelical" is included. I do not see any reason for the bill being put through before Easter.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Could the honourable senator not deal with that in committee?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Honourable senators, there is no disposition on my part to act hurriedly. The bill has been on the Order Paper now, as I say, for over a week, and there has been correspondence back and forth between both sides. I myself have had several long distance telephone conversations with Toronto, and can assure honourable senators that there is no opposition. However, the bill is in the hands of honourable senators and if it is the wish to hold it over I have nothing more to say. I only thought that it would be well to pass it before Easter, since it has been with us now for so long a time.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I do not want to raise any great objection, but having received a communication from this man I would like to discuss it with him during the Easter recess. Some doubt seems to have been raised in British Columbia Baptist circles.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I wonder if the honourable senator could not talk with him—

Hon. Mr. Reid: What is the hurry?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: There is no particular hurry.

Hon. Mr. Reid: If there is no hurry, that is all right.

The Hon. the Speaker: The question, honourable members, is on the motion of the honourable member from Kings (Hon. Mr. McDonald) for second reading of Bill F-7, an Act to incorporate The Fellowship of Evangelical Baptist Churches in Canada. Is it your pleasure to pass the motion?

Hon. Mr. Reid: On division.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Reid: After Easter.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

APPENDIX

(See p. 335)

Letter of March 19, 1956, from the Prime Minister to all Provincial Premiers

(A similar letter was sent to the Premiers of all the Provinces. The letter to the Premier of Quebec was in the French language.)

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER
CANADA

OTTAWA, March 19th, 1956.

The Honourable Leslie M. Frost,
Premier of Ontario,
Toronto, Ontario.

My Dear Premier:

Since our meeting on March 9th, my colleagues and I have given further consideration to the principal points raised there. A further review of our prospective budgetary position during the period contemplated has confirmed our view that substantially larger payments to the provincial governments, or greater tax abatements in those provinces where the provincial governments prefer to levy their own taxes in the three fields under discussion, would likely require the federal government to find additional revenues from other sources in order to make such payments and still maintain a sound federal budget. Federal taxation is already at a high level and we do not believe that the interest of this country would be best served by further increases of federal taxes for provincial purposes.

Several Premiers have referred to the possible inadequacy of our proposed stabilization payments. It was suggested that the "floor" should be, not 90 per cent, but 100 per cent of the average of the two preceding years. There was also some criticism that under certain circumstances the new formula might yield lower revenues than the existing pattern of rental agreements upon which our proposals are designed to be an improvement.

We attach considerable importance to the stabilization feature of these proposals and consider they will be of great value should our present prosperity falter in any significant measure.

On further consideration, therefore, we are prepared to meet these provincial suggestions on this feature to a substantial extent. We do not think it would be wise or proper to give a guarantee of 100 per cent, because there is inevitably some fluctuation from year to year in corporation profits taxes and succession duties. We are prepared, however, to amend our proposal respecting stabilization payments by substituting "95 per cent" for "90 per cent" in numbered paragraph 2 (b) of my letter of January 6th. We are also prepared to add as a new sub-paragraph (c) immediately after 2 (b) "the tax rental that would have been paid or available to the provincial government in that year had the tax rental system of 1952-57 been continued without change". This last provision will make abundantly clear that no province can under any circumstances suffer financially by the change from the present to the new system.

In the course of his statement relating to possible tax collection agreements, the Minister of Finance said that the fee we had in mind was 2 per cent. This was an approximate figure based upon the ratio of the expenses of the Income Tax Division of the Department of National Revenue to the total revenue collected by that division, adjusted for such items of cost as office accommodation, etc., which are borne elsewhere in our accounts, and with a further allowance to cover the costs of altering our administrative processes as the result of the requirements of collection agreements. It is, of course, recognized that it costs less per $100 of revenue to collect corporate income tax than personal income tax, and accordingly the appropriate charge might well vary in the different tax fields.

If your government is interested in a collection agreement, our technical officials will be glad to confer with yours to ascertain as accurately as possible what those costs would be. As I said at our meeting, we have no intention of making a profit out of collection agreements, but we would expect to recover the additional costs to the federal treasury which they involve.

We are preparing now legislation to place before Parliament, which would authorize us to implement the proposals which this government has made and which have been amended in various respects following consultation with the provincial governments. We believe that under such legislation it will be possible for us to introduce a new organization of federal-provincial fiscal relations which will retain many of the best features of the tax rental system developed in the past, while providing a new flexibility in provincial finance appropriate to the nature of the period to which we all look forward.

Reference will be made to these matters by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech on Tuesday evening, and I propose to table a copy of this letter on Wednesday.

Yours sincerely,
(Sgd) Louis S. St-Laurent

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 206, an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1957.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, this is the interim supply bill, and with the consent of the Senate I am prepared to proceed with second reading of it now.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, this is an interim supply bill of the kind that comes to us annually about this time of year. As you are aware, it is to finance the public service for approximately the first two months of the new fiscal year, which begins on April 1.

The bill contains proportionate amounts of the total sums set out in the estimates for the fiscal year 1956-57. In a few items additional amounts have been requested because expenditures are heavier with respect to those particular items during the early part of the year. No part of this bill votes the total amount of any item in the estimates. I wish, therefore, to give the usual undertaking that passage of this bill will not in any way prejudice the right of any honourable senator to discuss or criticize the items when the estimates come before a committee of this house or before the house itself.

In particular the bill provides for one-sixth of all the items to be voted in the main estimates for the fiscal year 1956-57, and is in the amount of $528,819,279.84, as set out in section 2 of the bill. It will be observed that six times the sum asked for is somewhat less than the total amount of supply required. The reason is that certain expenditures which are statutory are not covered by specific votes.

In addition to this one-sixth of the total, certain additional amounts are required because expenditures are heavier during the early part of the year. In section 3, therefore, $479,979 is required to defray the items set out in Schedule A of the bill. These include grants to the Department of Labour for transfer of labour to and from places of employment, where it is available, and expenses incidental thereto in accordance with the regulations of the Governor in Council. This item must initially finance the cost of certain movements which, under agreement with labour-seeking companies, is later recovered. The seasonal character of labour movements also contributes to the higher than average expenditures which must be incurred in the early months of the year. Also included in this section are the expenses relating to Parliament, including the general administration of both the Senate and the House of Commons, which are greater owing to the heavier expenses incurred during the session of Parliament in the early part of each fiscal year.

Section 4 provides for a grant of $714,781.42, which is an additional one-twelfth of certain items in the estimates and which are particularly set out in Schedule B. These include an amount for the Department of Agriculture in respect of experimental farms, where heavier expenses are incurred in connection with spring cropping operations. The other item in this schedule is a grant to the Department of Trade and Commerce which would provide additional funds for electricity and gas inspection services and weights and measures inspection services. Additional appropriations are required at this time owing to the fact that the major part of their work is carried on in the spring and summer months, when inspectors are able to travel more freely.

As I said at the outset, no part of this bill votes the total amounts of the main estimates and passage of it will not prejudice the right of any honourable senator to discuss or criticize the items when the main estimates reach us.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I wish to raise one point on which I am a little mystified. I suppose the only thing that could restrict us in the discussion of these financial items when the main estimates come before us is something in the rules with regard to debate. If that is so, I wonder by what authority the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) can waive the rules or give an undertaking with regard to application of the rules. By what authority does the honourable leader say that we shall or shall not be allowed to discuss items in the main estimates at a later date?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, in reply to the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), I would point out that I am merely giving an undertaking that this bill will not in any way prejudice the right of any honourable senator to discuss or criticize any item when the estimates come before a committee of this house or before the house itself. I am not saying anything about what might happen because of the rules; that is another question.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Do I take it, then, that we have no guarantee as far as the rules are concerned?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Well, I am not discussing the rules at the present time.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, the honourable leader is not attempting to waive any rules. The rules do not enter into the question at all. During subsequent debate His Honour the Speaker might say that an item has been discussed and voted on, and in that event the general rule would apply. I think the leader can feel sure that the majority of this house will support him in his stand, and if there has to be a vote on it, we can vote now. Every session I ask if passage of the interim supply bill will limit my right to discuss any item later on, and the honourable leader assures me that it will not. If there is any objection to his undertaking, now is the time to state it, and a vote can be taken to decide whether his undertaking is to be accepted or not. As Leader of the Opposition, I am willing to accept his undertaking that if I wish to discuss any of these items later he will raise no objection, or allow anybody else to raise any objection—that he will compel the house to listen to me. That is what his undertaking really means.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I can assure the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity that so far as I am concerned I will not object if any honourable member wishes to raise a question with regard to any of these items later on. I agree with what the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) has said. My point is that this bill does not dispose in full of any item in the estimates; therefore, at a later date any honourable member may discuss any item in the estimates, including the one-sixth that is being discussed today. The main point is that no item in the estimates is being disposed of today.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: So that there will be no misunderstanding, may I say that I have no reason to object and do not intend to object. I only raise a philosophic question as to the power of the Leader of the Government to give an assurance with regard to the rules of the house. I thank the Leader of the Opposition for the explanation which I think is contained in his speech. I may have misunderstood him, but I take his explanation to be that should anybody raise a question on the rules prohibiting debate—if there are such rules—and should His Honour the Speaker enforce those rules, the Leader of the Government will stand by his undertaking on behalf of the majority in this house, that he will overrule His Honour the Speaker.

Well, this discussion is probably academic, but it is in order. Certainly it is illuminating to me.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I do not go as far as the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity has suggested. I do not propose that the house should overrule the Speaker. Speaking from personal experience, I say the Speaker should always be sustained.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

PAINTINGS IN SENATE CHAMBER

ANSWER TO INQUIRY

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, on March 20 the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) asked the following question:

> Would the honourable leader tell us if the eight depressing paintings adorning this chamber are on loan from the National Gallery of Canada?

At that time I replied that my impression was that the paintings were on loan from the National Gallery, but that I would obtain definite information on the matter. I am now informed by officers of the National Gallery that the eight paintings form part of the Canadian War Records collection deposited with the National Gallery, but that they are not regarded as part of the National Gallery's permanent collection. The paintings are part of the Government-owned war records.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask a supplementary question? Are there other paintings of a similar character, size or dimension besides the ones that we have seen here for the last many, many years?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I can only give the same answer to the honourable member from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), that my understanding is that there are a number of other paintings similar to these.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Where?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: However, I shall be glad to get accurate information.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I be allowed one question in regard to the pictures? Are they not part of a gift to the National Gallery of 28 paintings from some peer or knight in Great Britain? At least, that is the information I received.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That may be correct. I did endeavour to get more information today than I have given to the house, but I was not able to do so in the short time at my disposal. However, I will cause further inquiries to be made to ascertain if more information can be obtained.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Will the honourable gentleman tell us where the other paintings are, so that we may see them?

Hon. Mr. Davies: Honourable senators, I am under the impression that these paintings were donated by Lord Beaverbrook. I rise to suggest that it would be a good idea to think about having them framed if they are to be here permanently.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Honourable senators, I would like to make quite a different suggestion. I have an impression, and it is only an impression, that at the time when the Parliament buildings were completed and those pictures were placed where they now are they were regarded as rather appropriate, because we had just come through a war. But if I remember rightly it was then thought that they were to be kept here only temporarily—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Euler: —and that ultimately we would have something a little more appropriate and a little more cheerful. I would like to suggest that these pictures be replaced by others more in keeping with what we desire now, the peace of the world.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Honourable senators, I was not going to speak in this debate, but I feel I must say a few words.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I think the debate is quite out of order. An answer to an inquiry is not a matter for general debate.

NATIONAL GALLERY PAINTINGS

NUMBER ON LOAN TO DEPARTMENTS —VISITORS TO GALLERY AND PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS —NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary inquiry, but before giving notice of it I wish to express my appreciation of the interest which honourable senators are showing in the pictures that they have discovered, after so many years, on the walls of this chamber.

My inquiry is as follows:

1. How many pictures and paintings belonging to the National Gallery of Canada are on loan to the various departments of the Government of Canada?

2. During the last five years what was the yearly average of visitors to (a) the Parliament Buildings and (b) the National Gallery of Canada?

EASTER RECESS

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the house, that when this house rises for the Easter recess it stand adjourned until Wednesday, April 18, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators, I should like to comment on this motion. The House of Commons will adjourn on March 28 and will reassemble on April 9, which is a Monday. I have heard that the Commons intends after the recess to continue with the budget debate, which, under the amended rules of that house, will occupy its time until Friday April 13. If the practice of former years is maintained the members will on Monday, April 16, commence debating the budget resolutions. Now, we are asked to come back on Wednesday of that week. I do not object at all to being here if the Senate has work to do. I have had occasion before to mention in this house the fact that those of us from a distance are anchored in Ottawa when the house is sitting. This session we have been meeting regularly on Tuesday evening and adjourning on Thursday afternoon.

Now, I would suggest to the leader that some consideration be given to those of us who come from a long distance. If there is work here to be done we should be here, but I say there is no sense in reassembling on Wednesday, April 18, sitting that day and adjourning on Thursday afternoon until the following Tuesday evening. I therefore suggest to the leader that he consider extending the adjournment to Tuesday, April 24.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I also make an observation? The honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) has spoken on behalf of those who live a great distance away. My home is only as far distant as Toronto, but I am in Ottawa over a good many week-ends, carrying on the work of the Divorce Committee and other committees. If the Senate were to resume on April 18 and sit also on the 19th, it would be in recess until at least the following week. Why need we resume before, at earliest, the Monday following? Nothing will be done on the 18th and 19th which could not be done on the 23rd. It does seem unnecessary to bring us back earlier. It had been my intention to drive to this city on Sunday, April 22, or perhaps Monday, the 23rd. The Divorce Committee will sit on the 24th, and there will be plenty of time to carry on the work to which I am assigned if we do not reassemble before Monday, the 23rd.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I make a suggestion? I believe that on other occasions when doubt was expressed as to the date on which our business should be resumed, a motion was passed providing that if necessary His Honour the Speaker could call us together at an earlier date than that set in the motion for adjournment.

Hon. Mr. Howard: That has already been done.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Then why not adjourn until the 23rd or 24th of April, on the understanding that if necessary we shall be called back a week earlier?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I would like very much to meet the wishes of all honourable senators, but may I observe that all those who have spoken on this matter have expressed different views, and were others to follow there probably would be as many different opinions as speakers. I try to arrange the work of the house to suit the convenience of the great majority, and I think I can flatter myself that in this respect I have been fairly successful. It is not always easy to carry out the wishes of even a majority of honourable senators, and frequently I must disregard my own wishes, too.

I have given the matter careful consideration and have discussed it with the Government. I have no assurance that after the Commons reassembles the debate on the budget will go on continuously. There are enough items on our Order Paper to occupy the Senate for probably three or four weeks. For instance, there is the Canada Shipping Bill, explained by the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris), which may occasion a good deal of discussion. There is a bill to amend the Citizenship Act, in which many honourable senators are interested. There is a bill to amend the Post Office Act, and although it is a simple measure a number of honourable senators have intimated that they want to speak on it. There is a bill to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act and a bill to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, and I have been asked to hold over discussion of these bills in order that some honourable senators may consider them during the Easter recess. Also there is the bill introduced by the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) to amend the Exchequer Court Act. In addition, there is before us the discussion initiated by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) with respect to reform of our penal institutions; and we have yet to consider a bill to amend the Livestock and Livestock Products Act. So it is evident that a good deal of work remains to be done.

I should like to be able to accommodate honourable senators who have suggested an adjournment until April 24, but I find it impossible to do so. While there is no need to compare the length of adjournments of this house with the length of the Commons' adjournments, it will be noted that the recess proposed for the Senate is approximately four weeks, and for the House of Commons ten days.

Let me add that I appreciate the faithful attendance of honourable senators throughout the session. Some of our number come from long distances, and I know to what inconvenience they have been put. That is one of the reasons I have suggested that we shall reconvene on the Wednesday instead of, as is usual, on Tuesday.

In view of what I have said, I trust that the motion will be adopted.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Is it the intention of the honourable Leader of the Government that, if we return here on April 18 the Senate shall sit on the following Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, and in the ensuing week from Monday to Friday inclusive?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As yet I have not given consideration to that matter. If it is the view of honourable senators that sittings of this house should be held on days other than those upon which we have been meeting during the last two or three months, the subject could be raised when we reassemble after Easter.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: May I suggest by way of compromise—not for any personal reason—that the honourable leader might suit everybody's convenience by fixing Monday, April 23, as the date. This would enable us to make up for any time which would be lost if we did not return on the previous Wednesday.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I appreciate the suggestion of the honourable senator, but April 18, the date set in the motion, is itself a compromise, and one which, I hope, honourable senators will accept.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

COMMITTEE EMPOWERED TO CONDUCT INQUIRY

Hon. A. Neil McLean moved:

That the Standing Committee on Canadian Trade Relations be empowered to inquire into and report on

1. What, in their opinion might be the most practical steps to further implement article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty whereby the signatories to that document agreed that "They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them".

2. That notwithstanding the generality of the foregoing, the committee be instructed and empowered to consider and report upon how, in their opinion, (a) any project for developing economic collaboration specifically between the countries which are signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty, can be co-ordinated with the trade policies of other countries of the free world; (b) any project for developing economic collaboration between the countries which are signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty, might have the same degree of permanence that is contemplated in the twenty year military obligation under article 5 of the treaty whereby "the Parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all".

3. That the committee be empowered to extend an invitation to those wishing to be heard, including representatives of agriculture, industry, labour, trade, finance and consumers, to present their views, and that the committee also be empowered to hear representatives from business interests or individuals from any of the NATO countries who might wish to be heard.

4. That the committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records, and to secure such services as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry.

He said: Honourable senators, I might say it is not proposed to hold any further hearings in connection with this resolution. Since the resolution was introduced we have held 16 committee meetings dealing with the subject and we have had representatives of 19 organizations appear before us. A great deal of interesting matter in briefs and oral evidence has been presented. The hearings cover 363 pages of the verbatim report of the committee proceedings. Representatives came from three countries outside Canada: the United States, Great Britain and Italy.

New members on the committee would do well to read the verbatim report of the committee proceedings, if they can spare the time. I know they would find it very informative. We have had considerable difficulty in getting outside help to aid us in summarizing the evidence so that a report can be prepared. We were unable to get the assistance of such a person as an economist from any of the different departments of government. The Department of External Affairs was kind enough to give us the names of several persons they thought would be of help. However, nearly all professors, economists and analysts of large universities have had their time taken up in connection with Government commissions working throughout Canada. Two professors of the University of New Brunswick were highly recommended and have consented to give our committee the needed assistance. I propose to have one of these gentlemen come to Ottawa, in due course, to meet with our committee members. We have plenty of evidence to work on and I think our committee will be able to prepare a fairly good report.

Quite a few changes have taken place in the set-up of NATO since our committee started work. New countries have been added and some of the members have become associated with other countries by treaties, but the latter has been more along military lines than economic.

In fact, during the past years great stress has been placed on the military clauses of the NATO treaty and most of the efforts put forth to weld NATO nations together have been of a military nature, while economic and political phases have been kept, to a great extent, in the background. A solid military foundation in connection with the treaty is, of course, necessary, but it is not simply a military alliance, for the treaty has both economic and political obligations. Within the last year or so weaknesses have shown up in the military set-up of NATO and statesmen of the NATO nations are now openly saying that NATO countries must get closer together both economically and politically. The President of Italy was quoted as stressing the economic clauses of NATO when he visited America some weeks ago, and I noticed in one of this morning's daily newspapers that Lord Attlee, former Prime Minister of England, points out some of the weaknesses of the military set-up of NATO.

France, a strong NATO nation, has had serious trouble in Indo-China and Africa and has had to withdraw a substantial portion of her NATO troops from Europe and transfer them to Africa. Then again there are serious difficulties in Cyprus which are the cause of hard feelings between Great Britain and Greece and also between Greece and Turkey. All these are NATO nations. There is also serious trouble in the Middle East and Asia, where minor cold wars are giving NATO nations a great deal of worry. Sometimes they find it very hard to reach a common policy in dealing with the military aspect of the situation.

These weaknesses are obvious to the Iron Curtain countries which, on the other hand, during the last year or so have been following a flexible policy. They now offer economic aid even without a military pact. In this way they are gaining influence throughout many parts of the world without a system of military alliances.

Taking these grave conditions into consideration, I think the work and study of the Senate Canadian Trade Relations Committee during the last year or two has been worth while and fully justified, for at the hearings we were able to gather a great deal of valuable information regarding what might be done to weld the NATO nations closer together from an economic standpoint, and such collaboration might well spread throughout the free world. We have only to read the statements of political leaders and political writers of the NATO nations to realize there has been a great change in public opinion, and now these leaders realize that the NATO nations must have much stronger economic and political ties if the NATO treaty is to be the success it should be.

I am sure the meeting in Paris last year of parliamentarians from the different nations has started a good work, for their efforts will be directed toward economic collaboration between NATO nations. When General Gruenther was here recently he commended the work of this association in which our honoured Speaker has taken a prominent part. It is obvious that the member nations of NATO have to put forth their utmost efforts toward securing a far better economic and political atmosphere throughout the NATO Treaty nations than there is at present, or has been for some time past.

Speaking of the nations which belong to NATO, I would like to refer to a recent visit I made to the International Fair in the Dominican Republic. At this fair I saw some of the finest displays of manufactured goods I have ever seen. France, the United States, Germany, Holland, Italy and Canada, all NATO nations, had wonderful displays of their wares at this great fair. These nations spent millions of dollars on buildings in order to show their goods. Of course, many other nations were well represented, but the NATO nations had top places.

The European NATO nations are out for trade, especially dollar trade, and are looking toward the western hemisphere. In going into this great fair in such a big way I do not think they have made any mistake, for there are plenty of dollars with which to buy goods in this progressive republic where everyone is working. The people are working long hours in order to develop their fine natural resources, and every year thousands of Spaniards migrate from Spain to the Dominican Republic in order to help with the development that is going on. The Government of the republic is carrying out a very large housing program and building many fine hotels to take care of the growing tourist trade. I was told, on the best of authority, that a Canadian Mining Company is preparing to invest $10 million in this republic.

The Fair grounds and buildings and so on cost $50 million. Forty million dollars was put up by the Dominican Government and about $10 million by outside governments to house their displays. The fair is a very courageous effort on the part of two and a half million people.

The country has no internal or external debt and has an annual favourable trade balance of several million dollars. This republic is a natural market for Canada, as their products do not come into competition with what we produce. But we have plenty of competition for their trade, and I was glad indeed to see Canada, through our Department of Trade and Commerce, join with so many other NATO nations in supporting this great international fair.

We are represented in the Dominican Republic by Mr. M. B. Bursey, Chargé d'Affaires, who is doing a fine job and is very highly regarded by all business interests.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATE RULES

PROPOSED RULE AUTHORIZING DIVORCE COMMITTEE TO DIRECT EVIDENCE OF OFFENCE TO LAW-ENFORCEMENT AGENCY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Burchill:

That the Rules of the Senate of Canada be amended by inserting therein immediately after Rule 143 a new Rule 143A as follows:

143A. The Standing Committee on Divorce, whenever in its opinion there has been disclosed in any evidence given before it or any of its subcommittees an offence against the Criminal Code of Canada or the violation of any other law in force in Canada, may direct that such evidence, or a part thereof, be drawn to the attention of such law-enforcement or other agency in Canada as the Senate Committee may deem appropriate, for such action as such agency may deem requisite.

Honourable senators, the object of the resolution is obvious and, of course, highly commendable. I was instructed by unanimous decision of the members of the Senate Divorce Committee to bring this matter before the house, and I have done so in the form of this resolution. The resolution was drawn by the Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel of the Senate, Mr. Hopkins, who has been in consultation with the Department of Justice, so the matter has been reasonably considered by the proper authorities. I am sure it is clear to all the members of the Divorce Committee. However, an explanation is due to honourable senators who are not members of that committee and therefore have not had an opportunity to follow the course of events.

It is obvious that a committee which hears between 400 and 500 petitions each session should occasionally have drawn to its notice matters which require attention. For instance, on many occasions the committee deals with the custody and care of children. It has no power to legislate or make orders with regard to the children—at least, if it has that jurisdiction it has never exercised it—but evidence with regard to children comes before the committee from time to time, and it may reveal conditions which ought to be brought to the attention of a children's aid society, a welfare organization, or perhaps the minister of the department of health and welfare of some province or another. When such matters are brought to the attention of the minister, it should be done, not publicly, but privately, for his consideration and action.

I am sure that honourable senators have heard it suggested many times that divorces are obtained before our committee on perjured evidence. It may be that from time to time the committee receives indications of that kind. Not long ago two investigators were arrested and charged and convicted in court for fabricating evidence for presentation to the Senate Divorce Committee; they launched an appeal, and the convictions were quashed by the Ontario Court of Appeal on the ground that the Senate Divorce Committee did not constitute a judicial proceeding under the Code as it was drawn at that time. The new Code makes the fabricating of evidence for presentation to our Divorce Committee a criminal offence. Then, of course, there are possibilities of conspiracy to mislead by fraudulent means a judicial proceeding, such as our Divorce Committee. In the past we have always considered that we had the right to bring such matters to the attention of the proper officials. I am not sure whether that has ever been done in the history of the committee's operations, but nevertheless the committee always felt it had that right. I still think it has that right, notwithstanding the law that I shall call to the attention of honourable members.

Quite recently Mr. Hopkins, who is most industrious and co-operative, and a very learned and capable counsel, drew to the attention of the committee some clauses in the Criminal Code which, it seems to us, make this resolution, if not actually necessary, at least desirable. May I first read Section 248(1) of the Criminal Code on the subject of defamatory libel:

> A defamatory libel is matter published without lawful justification or excuse that is likely to injure the reputation of any person by exposing him to hatred, contempt or ridicule or that is designed to insult the person of or concerning whom it is published.

Honourable senators, a distinction must be drawn between civil libel and defamatory libel. Civil libel, which gives a person the right to bring an action for damages must, of course, result in damages, and is quite a different offence from defamatory libel as defined by the Code. Defamatory libel is the criminal side of the law. To be guilty of a defamatory libel it is merely necessary that the libel injure the reputation of any person, exposing him to hatred, contempt or ridicule, or designed to insult the person concerning whom it is published.

The fact that the statements complained of are true is not a defence, as is the case in civil libel.

There are many provisions in the Code, but I will read only the cogent ones. Section 248(2) reads as follows:

> A defamatory libel may be expressed directly or by insinuation or irony.

And then, by section 249, the defamatory libel is published if a person:

> (c) shows or delivers it, or causes it to be shown or delivered, with intent that it should be read or seen by the person whom it defames or by any other person.

I have got this far, honourable senators, that any document, true or otherwise, which is likely to injure the reputation of an individual and is shown to a person in order that it may be read or seen by that person constitutes a published defamatory libel. Sections 250 and 251 provide certain penalties:

> 250. Every one who publishes a defamatory libel that he knows is false is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years.
> 251. Every one who publishes a defamatory libel is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

That is to say, one is liable to imprisonment for two years for publishing a defamatory libel even though he believes it to be true.

The Code goes on to make provision for relieving members of Parliament and of provincial legislatures. Section 256 reads:

> No person shall be deemed to publish a defamatory libel by reason only that he . . .
> (b) publishes by order or under the authority of the Senate or House of Commons or of a legislature, a paper containing defamatory matter . . .

There we have the broad umbrella of protection so far as Parliament is concerned. So long as publication of a paper containing defamatory matter is made by order or under the authority of the Senate or House of Commons, the one who publishes it cannot be prosecuted.

Before I read subsection (2) of section 257, which the committee finds troublesome, let me read subsection (1):

> No person shall be deemed to publish a defamatory libel by reason only that he publishes in good faith, for the information of the public, a fair report of the proceedings of the Senate or House of Commons or a legislature, or a committee thereof, or of the public proceedings before a court exercising judicial authority, or publishes, in good faith, any fair comment upon any such proceedings.

That is to say, the Code specifically exempts a fair report or fair comment upon proceedings of the Senate or the House of Commons, or of any judicial proceedings. That, I submit, is the law as we have understood it, and under which both houses of Parliament have acted for many years.

I come now to the troublesome subsection, which reads:

(2) This section does not apply to a person who publishes a report of evidence taken or offered in any proceeding before the Senate or House of Commons or any committee thereof, upon a petition or bill relating to any matter of marriage or divorce, if the report is published without authority from or leave of the house in which the proceeding is held or is contrary to any rule, order or practice of that house.

That provision is to prevent the wide distribution of the evidence heard or other matters which take place in camera in the Senate Committee on Divorce. Application of that provision could go rather far, unless the house acts on the suggestion contained in the motion and gives the necessary authority.

Of course, it was never intended by Parliament, I suggest, to prevent a committee—or for that matter this house—from protecting itself against abuses of an organized conspiracy to mislead or to fabricate evidence presented to a committee, or the commission of perjury before a committee. Yet, if a committee of this house acts without authority from the house, the members of the committee, and the officials who act on its instructions, may be liable to attack by the laying of an information against them for a defamatory libel.

So, I do not think much advocacy in support of the resolution is required, beyond an explanation of the situation. Surely there is nobody who would want to leave the members of the committee liable to prosecution for a defamatory libel through the mere carrying on of the duty which this house has placed upon their shoulders; nor, would I expect that anyone would wish to prevent the Divorce Committee, or any other committee of the house, from protecting itself against being charged with a criminal offence for simply bringing facts, as they are revealed in evidence before the committee, to the attention of a crown attorney. I should think nobody would want to put the committee or the officials who act upon its instructions in that position.

Personally, I would like to see this resolution embodied in the rules of the house, because unfortunately there has grown up in our community a feeling that the Divorce Committee may be played with in these matters with impunity. If this resolution is passed, I can assure honourable senators that it will be sent to the solicitors who practice before the Divorce Committee, informing them that it will be a dangerous procedure for their clients to indulge in any of these criminal practices, because the committee has authority to call the attention of the crown attorney to their actions. I think it would be very salutary indeed to have it thoroughly understood by the members of the legal profession and by the public at large, as far as it is within our power to make it understood, that when members of the public come before the Divorce Committee they are as open to prosecution for conspiracy to mislead, fabrication, perjury or any other offence of that kind, as they are when they appear before the courts of our land. Therefore, I trust honourable senators will pass this resolution.

Hon. Nancy Hodges: Honourable senators, I rise to support the resolution moved by the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) because, as a member of the Divorce Committee, I believe it to be desirable that the committee be empowered to refer to the proper law-enforcement authority any evidence which indicates that a criminal offence or any other violation of the law has been committed by parties or witnesses in any case coming before the committee.

I do not intend to deal with the provisions of the Criminal Code, to which the honourable chairman of the committee has referred, because a repetition of them would not strengthen the case. Reference was made to the fact that the Code contains a clause which requires authority or leave from the Senate before evidence given before the committee can be released to the proper authorities.

It is my opinion that the Divorce Committee should be armed with a general authorization along the lines suggested in the resolution, for two reasons: First, to ensure that justice may be done in an individual case as expeditiously as possible; and second, because the possession of such authority would have a salutary and deterrent effect upon those who might otherwise be tempted to mislead the committee, either by perjury, fabrication or evidence or conspiracy.

As a member of the Divorce Committee I know from personal experience that the committee would unhesitatingly refuse to recommend a divorce on any evidence known to be perjured or fabricated, but it seems to me that we might go further and strengthen the hands of the committee, in the manner suggested; namely, that the committee be provided with the power to take appropriate action in any case in which the evidence reveals an attempt to obtain a divorce by improper means, such as I have outlined.

In my opinion the adoption of the motion sponsored by the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity would enhance the prestige and effectiveness of the Standing Committee on Divorce.

Hon. John T. Hackett: Honourable senators, I think that the suggestion of the honourable member from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) is worthy of every consideration. I am somewhat reluctant, however, to impose upon or impart to that committee the duty of communicating its impressions and findings to, for instance, the authorities of a province. It seems to me that if the committee comes to a decision that a crime has been committed it should send its findings to, shall we say, the Minister of Justice, or to the Senate itself. There is a channel, a well-known channel, of communication between the federal Government and provincial Governments, and although we sometimes have difficulty in adjusting our points of view I think it would be unfortunate and expose the Senate to difficulty if we authorized our committee, efficient and admirable as it is, to enter into correspondence with and make suggestions to enforcement agencies in the provinces.

Now, it may be that my honourable friend interprets the words "law-enforcement or other agency" in his resolution to include the Minister of Justice and wishes the communication to follow this well-accepted channel. If so, it would be easy enough to insert a direction to that effect, and not leave the matter in its present condition, which might embroil the committee with other agencies that might not entirely share the views of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Honourable senators, I wish to ask the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) one question. Does the court which hears divorce cases in Ontario have authority to do what the Senate Committee is asking in this resolution?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The answer is yes, very decidedly so. A judge in the Supreme Court or in any court before which an offence is committed, and where there is evidence of that offence, may call it to the attention of the local Crown Attorney and the Attorney General.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Of that province.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Of that province.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The publication of evidence in divorce cases is not prohibited in provincial courts.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Before the honourable senator makes his reply, which I take it will conclude the debate, I would like to say a word.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I was about to answer a question.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: I am not going to discuss the legal aspect of the matter at all. As a layman and as a member of the Divorce Committee, I want to support in a very few words what the Chairman of the Divorce Committee has said, and also the views expressed by the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges).

I was shocked to learn the other morning that the Divorce Committee did not have the power which we understand the resolution would give us, that we were sitting in committee listening to evidence, fabricated as it might be, with no power whatever to take action if we thought it advisable. I repeat that, as a layman, I was simply aghast to learn of that condition, and I support this resolution wholeheartedly.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, I share the view of the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett). This resolution has implications which are not easily seen. I am wondering if there is any urgency about the matter and if it cannot be allowed to stand over the Easter recess during which time we can give it further consideration. It occurs to me on some reflection that there are a great number of honourable senators who object to bringing divorce before a court or what appears to be a court, and there is reason for supporting their view. But if we are going to cloak ourselves with judicial powers, then are we a committee or are we a court? I think we ought to give the matter further consideration before we take this step. I would like the sponsor of the resolution (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) to be so good as to let the matter stand.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Then you should move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I do not wish to move the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is the only way the matter can stand.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I presume it can stand at the request of the honourable gentleman who moved it (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). I leave it up to him, with the suggestion that this matter ought to be looked at by a very much larger number of senators than are present today. It ought also to be looked at by the Leader of the Government, who should discuss it with some appropriate officials. For that reason I ask the sponsor to let the matter stand until after the Easter recess.

Hon. Mr. Golding: Honourable senators, this matter was brought to the attention of the Divorce Committee a few days ago, where it was thoroughly discussed, and my honourable friend from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) voted to have this resolution referred to the Senate for its confirmation.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Consideration, not confirmation. It is receiving consideration now.

Hon. Mr. Golding: All right, we will let it go at that, but I took it that my honourable friend was supporting the resolution.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I did not say I was not supporting it. I want it to be given further consideration.

Hon. Mr. Golding: You voted for it anyway—it was a unanimous vote.

In a case before the Divorce Committee some years ago a witness was charged with having perjured himself. I find that in the prosecution of that witness the action was not taken by the Divorce Committee or by the Senate, but by one of the parties. In any event, it resulted in a conviction.

Now, our situation at the present time is that we have witnesses coming before the committee in cases where there are glaring examples of fabricated evidence and we are helpless to do anything about it. If the Senate will endorse the proposal to refer evidence of this nature, the appropriate department or other authority can look it over, and if they decide that the evidence warrants some action against persons who have perjured themselves or conspired to bring about the divorce, they can take the necessary proceedings. What we ask is the right, not to render judgment, but to pass along the evidence for consideration by the appropriate officials. For the life of me I cannot see why honourable senators should object to that course. I voted for this motion in committee and I am supporting it here.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I did not hear the discussion which took place in the Divorce Committee, but it seems to me than an amendment of this nature could be very far-reaching. I hope that we shall not adopt it hurriedly. Certainly it could stand until after the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Then the honourable senator should move adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I so move.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I would ask that the original motion stand until I have added a word or two. I was in the committee when this resolution was discussed, and finally we all agreed to it. However, it was preceded by quite a discussion as to whether it should be given retroactive effect, and on this issue we divided evenly. The chairman did not vote. I agree with the resolution in principle; but the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) has raised a point which seems to me important, namely, that the channel of communication should be to the Minister of Justice. It would also appear that the committee is not a court. I understand than an objection was successfully made in one of our courts on the ground that false evidence given before this committee is not perjury.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is not so now.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I am not well-informed on the point, but I read the statement in the press. I suggested in committee that action in this matter should be delayed. However, the chairman demurred, and he was so insistent that I did not press the matter further. I thought that his reason for expediting action was that he wanted the suggested change of rules to be applied in a case which has been already heard, and the issue before the committee was whether the change in the rules should have retroactive effect. I think the motion could very well be deferred until after Easter, so that in the meantime it could have the mature reflection of honourable members.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I know that a motion to adjourn is not debatable. But this motion has been advocated by two honourable senators, and that throws it open to discussion. The honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) argued in favour of the adjournment before he moved it.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I did not advocate adjournment. I said the matter could very well stand over.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: At all events let me say this. I shall not be long.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) is not entitled to speak on a motion to adjourn. He can vote against it if he wants to.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is it the ruling of the Chair that I may not discuss the question of adjournment?

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes. A motion to adjourn is not debatable. The only motion before me is that of the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner).

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I will only say that I am opposed to an adjournment, and I could give reasons if I were permitted to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker: The question is on the motion of the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) that the debate be adjourned. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Carried.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I ask for the "Contents" and "Non-Contents".

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Can there not be agreement about this?

The Hon. the Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say "Content".

Some Hon. Senators: Content.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those against, "Non-content".

Some Hon. Senators: Non-content.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the Contents have it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Let us have a recorded vote.

The motion of Hon. Mr. Horner was negatived on the following division:

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I am not certain whether I have the right to speak again and to move an amendment. I ask the Chair for permission.

The Hon. the Speaker: As the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) has already spoken, he can move an amendment only with the consent of the house.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is, unanimous consent.

The Hon. the Speaker: Unanimous consent.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I ask for consent.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the honourable senator the unanimous consent of the house?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No. I cannot consent unless I know what the amendment is.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I would move that all the words after "attention of" be struck out and the following words be substituted: "the Minister of Justice, that he may act as he deems wise in the circumstances".

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I will consent to that motion—not that I am in favour of it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, has the honourable member from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) the unanimous consent of the house to move his amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I move that all the words after "attention of" in the proposed Rule 143A be struck out and the following words substituted therefor: "the Minister of Justice, that he may act as he deems wise in the circumstances".

Hon. Mr. Croll: How would it read then?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: It would read:

> The Standing Committee on Divorce, whenever in its opinion there has been disclosed in any evidence given before it or any of its subcommittees an offence against the Criminal Code of Canada or the violation of any other law in force in Canada, may direct that such evidence, or a part thereof, be drawn to the attention of the Minister of Justice, that he may act as he deems wise in the circumstances.

As I said in the few words I addressed to the house earlier, the purpose of my amendment is to make certain that the ordinary and usual channels of communications be respected.

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable senator must furnish me with a written copy of his amendment so that I may put it to the house.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I voted in favour of an adjournment because I thought it would not do any harm to give the matter consideration over the Easter recess. I am hopeful that the Senate will adjourn tonight, and in that case anything we may do today in connection with this matter cannot be put into effect until after the recess. Now that the honourable senator from Victoria has moved an amendment, I am convinced more than ever that the matter should stand over. That would not harm anyone, and this house has the reputation of giving all questions that come before it sober second thought.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it has been moved by the Honourable Senator Hackett, seconded by the Honourable Senator Haig that the words after "attention of" in the proposed Rule 143A be struck out and the following words substituted therefor: "the Minister of Justice, that he may act as he deems wise in the circumstances". Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, I propose to move a subamendment. In virtue of the British North America Act the administration of justice is in the hands not of the Minister of Justice but of the Attorneys General of the provinces. If an offence against the Criminal Code is committed in Ottawa, notice of such offence must be directed to the attention of the Attorney General of Ontario. I therefore move as a subamendment that the words "the Minister of Justice" be struck out of the proposed amendment and that the words "the Attorney General of the province of Ontario"—the province in which Parliament sits—be substituted therefor.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, in view of what the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has just said, and the general confusion that seems to have arisen over a very simple matter, I move adjournment of the debate. The subamendment that has just been proposed does not answer the question, because the offence may not have been committed in Ontario. Also, it is not always the Minister of Justice to whom you appeal, but perhaps sometimes the Minister of National Health and Welfare or some other minister. Under all these circumstances, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

PENSION FUND SOCIETY OF THE DOMINION BANK—THIRD READING

Hon. David A. Croll, for Hon. John J. Connolly, moved the third reading of Bill G-7, an Act respecting The Pension Fund Society of the Dominion Bank.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I have just been informed that item No. 556, of the supplementary estimates, which is an item in the Finance Department's estimates, is under consideration now by the House of Commons. When the items for that department have been completed there will still be quite a number of votes to be considered, under for instance: Fisheries, Justice, Legislation, Mines and Technical Surveys, National Film Board, Northern Affairs and National Resources, Public Works, Transport, and Loans, Investments and Advances.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: It does not seem likely that they will be finished today.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It does not appear so, although of course it is possible.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I suggest that the house adjourn until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Why not meet this evening, and, if necessary, adjourn again?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: After the non-success of the former motion to adjourn, I hesitate to suggest this, but if it would not inconvenience honourable senators too much we might adjourn now and reassemble at 8 o'clock this evening.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Then with leave of honourable senators, I move that the Senate rise now, to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 8 o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received a communication from the Secretary to the Governor General, acquainting him that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, would proceed to the Senate Chamber this day at 9.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving the Royal Assent to certain bills.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 2

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 207, intituled an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1956.

The bill was read the first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be read the second time now.

As honourable senators know, the practice since Confederation has been to present at the end of the fiscal year the final supplementary estimates for the year and to table the main estimates for the coming fiscal year. Also, after the commencement of the fiscal year and before Parliament prorogues, supplementary estimates are brought in and tabled, and in each instance bills covering those estimates are passed. To make the explanation a little more clear, I might remind the house that before March 31 last year the main estimates were tabled for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1955, and extending to March 31, 1956.

Hon. Mr. Reid: In other words, this bill cleans up the 1955-56 estimates?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It cleans up the 1955-56 estimates. Between the tabling of the main estimates in 1955 and this date, supplementary estimates were tabled and passed.

Honourable senators will observe from the schedule that these are designated "Supplementary Estimates (2)". That they are further supplementary estimates. There were small supplementary estimates passed during the current fiscal year on account of an item that had been left out of the regular supplementaries.

The supplementaries now before us were tabled in this house on Tuesday last, and honourable senators have no doubt had an opportunity to look over them. They involve no change in Government policy in connection with any of the payments. I trust honourable senators will give approval to this bill.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Could the honourable leader tell us what is the total amount of the 1955-56 supplementary estimates, including these items now before us?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not have the total before me. If my honourable friend has the amount of the estimates passed at the conclusion of the last session he can calculate the total by adding to it the estimates now before us and a small additional sum having to do with the Fisheries Department, which had been overlooked in the regular supplementaries.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I do not intend to delay the house by speaking generally on this bill. I had these estimates in my hands about a week ago and I went through them very carefully. As to any items which I did not understand clearly I wrote the honourable Leader of the Government and received a full explanation.

However, I should like to make one comment by way of criticism of the system under which the Government pays taxes to certain municipalities. If honourable senators will look at the bill before us they will see a vote for a supplementary payment to municipalities of about $530,000. I think the total amount paid to municipalities for this purpose was $12 million, of which Ottawa got about $2·7 million. What I complain about is that other cities, such as Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal, and Victoria, get nothing.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Does not the Government automatically, if I may use that term, pay local improvement taxes? Perhaps they are outside the figures you are discussing.

Hon. Mr. Haig: It does pay local improvement taxes. What I am objecting to is the formula by which the contributions are made. I think cities should exempt certain buildings from taxes, such as the legislative buildings in the provincial capitals. But some federal Government buildings are semi-commercial or almost completely commercial, because the Government is getting into various fields. As the formula stands, unless a city has Government buildings whose value is in excess of a certain percentage of its total assessment, it does not benefit under the Municipal Grants Act. I think the City of Ottawa's share is about 22 per cent of the total amount paid to municipalities.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Perhaps the honourable Leader of the Opposition would tell us what is the formula for making contributions?

Hon. Mr. Haig: I cannot explain it in detail, but I know it is based on a certain percentage of Government property in relation to the total assessment of a municipality.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: If a city qualifies the Government pays a certain percentage towards the municipal taxation.

Hon. Mr. Haig: It will allow the regular taxes to that extent.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: But the same formula applies to all cities, including Montreal.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Montreal is not granted a cent. Your city of Halifax gets $880,000.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: And it is entitled to it.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But the dear old city of Winnipeg is not granted a 50-cent piece, nor is Victoria, nor Vancouver.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: In order to qualify I think a city has to have public buildings to the value of 4 per cent of its total assessment.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Three per cent.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Very well, but I still think it is too high.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It was 4 per cent and was later reduced to 3 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I do not think that is a proper formula by which the federal Government should make payments to municipalities. My criticism is not of the payments, but of the system by which they are paid. I am not just saying this to direct criticism at the City of Ottawa, though I know they do not like me here—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Why do you say that?

Hon. Mr. Haig: The fact is that Ottawa gets a lot of money besides that, but I am only dealing with the grant. Ottawa is getting the most of any city in Canada, away over and above what any other city receives. I forget the city that comes next, but, as I have said, Halifax gets about $880,000. Now, I am hoping that some day some Progressive Conservative Government in this country will say to municipalities of Canada, "No matter how few Government buildings there are in your district, we will pay taxes on them just as everybody else pays taxes on his property." Of course, an exception to that might be the Parliament Buildings and some other special buildings. Buildings owned by the Government require the same civic services and protection as anybody else's building does. If a fire occurs in a Government-owned building, let us say, in my home town of Winnipeg, the fire brigade turns out. The firemen do not stay in the station and say, "It is a Government building, let it burn". If a robbery occurs in a Government building, the police department attempts to apprehend the culprits. I think a totally unfair situation exists in regard to payments to municipalities.

Honourable senators, the rest of the supplementary estimates are along the same lines as the main estimates, and any honourable senator who has any objections to items in the main estimates can go into details before the Finance Committee. My complaint at the moment is about the unfairness with which some municipalities are treated with respect to taxation on Government buildings. For instance, there are many public buildings on Portage Avenue in Winnipeg—buildings taken over and now owned by the Government—for which the city receives no tax relief at all. The result is that the rest of the taxpayers in that city have to carry the load.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government what happened in the House of Commons this afternoon with regard to the commission which was paid to the agent who purchased the famous paintings for which the Government paid $885,000. As the Ottawa evening papers were going to press, the Committee of the Whole in that house was considering an amendment to reduce the item by $35,000, the amount of the commission, to which objection had been made by some members. I would like to know whether anything was done there in regard to reducing this item by the amount of the commission.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The item covering that is, I believe, No. 548. I take it the honourable senator is not inquiring as to the pictures themselves.

Hon. Mr. Davies: No, just the commission.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There were four pictures purchased, and a commission of $35,000 was paid on their purchase. I am informed that that is the custom of the trade. A very reliable firm in London, England, known as Thomas Agnew and Sons, Limited, made the purchase. They specialize in that work. The regular commission charged by that company in connection with purchases of this kind was paid to the company. I think honourable senators will understand that experts must be employed in this type of transaction because there are very few of us who are qualified to judge pictures. This payment was a regular payment such as any person would pay in commissioning this firm to purchase a picture.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Honourable senators, I am very much inclined to agree with the opinion of the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) with regard to the payment of municipal taxes on Government buildings. I cannot for the life of me see why an arbitrary percentage such as 3 per cent should be taken. If Government properties are receiving municipal services it does not make any difference whether the proportion of their assessment to the total assessment in the municipality is 3 per cent of the total or 4 or 5 or 10 per cent, they ought to be taxed as other properties are. I do not see why any distinction at all should be made.

I rose chiefly to ask whether the leader could give a little clarification of the special item on the first page, vote 542, amounting to $5,757,483. I was wondering if that has to do with subsidies paid on commodities the Government purchased and sold at a loss, as butter, for example.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, the honourable senator is correct. This is the loss incurred on account of the purchase by the Government of such commodities as butter, shell eggs, canned pork and potatoes.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Could the leader tell us what the Government paid and what it received for these commodities, and how much butter, say, is still on hand?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I could mention an amount in round figures but I would not like to do so. There is a substantial amount of butter on hand, but it is not much more than was on hand at this time last year.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: We are holding our own!

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes. There are about 5 million pounds more on hand this year than there were at the same time last year.

Hon. Mr. Euler: What did we pay for it?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: We would pay the the floor price.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Fifty-eight cents a pound, was it not, for the butter?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, approximately 58 cents.

Hon. Mr. Euler: And it was sold at what price?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It would be sold at a considerable loss.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: From 37 cents to 40 cents a pound.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes. I have not got the figures.

Hon. Mr. Euler: And that makes up the total of $5 million?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That makes up the total. As the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) reminds me, there are other items in it. There are shell eggs, canned pork and potatoes. Butter, however, is the big item.

I might point out that there is a credit, that we did make a little money on apples and beef, but of course we lost more money than we made.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Does the butter sale to Czechoslovakia appear in this item?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, some of the butter would have been sent there.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, if you will allow me, I will revert to the subject of the works of art that we have been discussing. There is in the estimates an item of $885,000 for some works of art which were purchased for the National Gallery. I have no objection to their purchase, but I wonder why these beautiful paintings should be hidden in the National Gallery of Canada, where visitors are very few. Almost everyone who visits Ottawa comes here to see the Parliament Buildings, of which the Senate wing is a part.

The work of the Senate is admirably done; and I, who have been sitting here and learning a lot since January 10, when I was sworn in as a member, must express my appreciation. But I find that its work is not well enough known nor is it sufficiently appreciated. And when the throngs of visitors who come to this chamber see the ugly pictures we have on the walls they receive a sad impression. For instance, facing me is a howitzer, which is aimed at the House of Commons. I wonder why it is there. And if one looks behind these pictures one sees the walls are very dirty; they should be cleaned. But how can they be cleaned so long as these pictures are in the way? I think they should be removed.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: The walls should be cleaned. And how better could the Government show its appreciation of the wonderful work which has been performed by the Senate since Confederation than by hanging on our walls $885,000 worth of paintings to replace those ugly productions which face us and are on the right and left of the Honourable the Speaker?

Honourable senators, I make this suggestion for the purpose of trying to boost the Senate and giving visitors a more cheerful impression of our chamber. I may have another opportunity to speak on this matter.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill read the third time, and passed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

LIGHTING OF SENATE CHAMBER —SENATE POSTMARK

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege to ask for sunlight in this chamber. It may seem unusual, but since I have been a member of the Senate I have noticed that the windows of this chamber are painted on the inside in a muddy pink and another dirty colour that is impossible to describe. I appreciate the fact that the artificial lighting has been improved in the offices of members of the Senate. But here we have to rely on artificial lighting which is so bad that it is impossible to read Hansard for a certain period of time, and it destroys the sight of members. I hope, therefore, that the matter will be remedied at the earliest possible opportunity, by removing the paint from the windows in order that we may have a little bit of sunshine in this chamber. It does not seem an extravagant request. I make it not only on my own behalf, I make it pro bono publico, so that we may enjoy the rays of the sun in this chamber. I hope that sooner or later there will be a meeting of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, where this important matter can be discussed.

I rise on another question of privilege, with regard to the stamping machine in the Senate Post Office. On the correspondence that we receive and that goes out from the Senate, the stamp is blurred. The House of Commons has a new machine which prints clearly an outline of the Parliament Buildings, the date on which the letter was mailed and the words "House of Commons". I do not see why our mail should be stained and blurred by the use of an old stamp that dates back to Confederation days. I have been told that it was the only piece of equipment that was saved in the Post Office at the time of the great fire in 1916. All I am now asking is, on a question of privilege, that the mail of the members of the Senate should give the same good impression as that of the members of the House of Commons. If a new machine has been bought by the House of Commons, I do not see why we should continue to use a relic of olden times to blot our mail.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, with regard to the lighting in the Senate chamber, I wish to inform my honourable friend from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) and other honourable senators that earlier this session the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee considered this matter and subsequently reported its findings to the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts. That committee at its last meeting requested the Chairman of the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee to make further inquiry. I have been informed by him that a survey of the lighting in this chamber has been made by the Department of Public Works, and that although it may not be possible to improve the lighting this session it will be improved before we reassemble next session.

NEW BRUNSWICK POTATO MARKETING BOARD

INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Frederick W. Pirie inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of March 20:

What departments of governments and others were concerned in the investigation concerning the operations of the New Brunswick Potato Marketing Board under agreement with Her Majesty the Queen represented by the Minister of Agriculture, dated December 21, 1953?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry is as follows:

Department of Finance; Department of Justice; Department of Agriculture; New Brunswick Department of Agriculture; New Brunswick Attorney General; New Brunswick Potato Marketing Board; the institution which loaned the funds under the agreement.

IRON ORE EXPORTS—STEEL IMPORTS

INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Thomas Reid inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of March 21:

1. Did Canada export any iron ore during the calendar years 1953, 1954 and 1955?

2. If so: (a) to what countries was iron ore exported, and (b) what quantities of iron ore were exported in these three years, and from what province?

3. What were the total importations of steel during the three years, 1953 to 1955, and from what countries was any steel imported?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry is as follows:

1. Yes.

2. (a) and (b). Exports of iron ore (Statistical Classification 5010), by province from which exported and by country to which consigned, are shown in the following statement. (It should be noted that the province shown is that in which the ore was cleared by Customs for export, and not necessarily the province in which the ore was produced.)

CANADA SHIPPING BILL

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 15, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Farris for the second reading of Bill H-7, an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, may I first express my thanks to you for allowing the debate on this bill to be adjourned until after the Easter recess. The time that has intervened has provided all concerned with an opportunity for a much closer examination of the terms of the bill. I am very grateful for the favour extended to me.

In moving the second reading the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) remarked that the bill is divided into two separate parts. He also pointed out that the bill contains 27 amendments to the Canada Shipping Act. These amendments concern shipping regulations. Because of the nature of them they would be of great interest to all the provinces by the sea. It is in this part of the bill that my chief interest lies and I shall return to this phase of the bill shortly.

The second part, you will recall, gives legislative effect to the provisions of the international convention for the prevention of pollution of the sea by oil. This convention was negotiated in 1954 and has already been signed on behalf of 12 nations, including Canada. Some mention was made of this particular subject by the honourable senator from Vancouver South, but it seems to me that his remarks and interjections which were made at the time raised legal entanglements, in which I do not wish to get involved. I must say the impression which was left was that this subject is of no great value to Canada. The speaker placed on the record a memorandum on the matter from the Department of Transport, which contained this statement:

> Canada is not yet troubled by waste oil discharged from ships on the high seas owing to the comparatively small amount of shipping off our coasts and to the fact that apart from the Japanese current there are no strong ocean currents setting in toward our shores.

That may be so in general, but there have been many instances which I can recall where the effects of oil on the sea have been rather serious, particularly in relation to sea ducks, of which we have large numbers on our coast, and which perhaps in the province of Newfoundland are of more importance from a food supply point of view than they are from a sporting standpoint.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Does the act apply to the Great Lakes? We have experiences of the dumping of oil there.

Hon. Mr. Smith: I have no knowledge of conditions on the Great Lakes. No doubt the honourable senator knows more about them than I do. It is just a coincidence, but on the day when this subject was first brought before the house there appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald a Canadian Press item, dated March 15, 1956, from St. John's Newfoundland, from which I wish to quote a sentence or two:

> Oil scum, possibly waste discharged by vessels far out on the Atlantic, is killing thousands of sea-birds along the south coast of Newfoundland.
> Dominion wildlife officer Les Tuck said Wednesday he had counted an average of 250 dead seabirds to every mile of coastline on Placentia Bay. The same condition probably exists on other south coast bays, he said.
> Murres—

They are what in Nova Scotia we call "noddies", and they appear to be getting more numerous all the time.

> —seemed especially attracted by the oil waste and were worst affected, Mr. Tuck said. Murres are a good sized sea-bird that Newfoundland fishermen have called turrs and eaten for centuries.
> There is not much that can be done to remedy the situation. The installation of equipment in vessels to destroy the oil and bilge waste would have to be an international thing. Oil pollution is just a modern hazard to sea-birds that is difficult to solve.

I would repeat that, by such means as the convention that has already been supported by Canada, something could be done about that condition. I want to remind you again of the effect on sea-birds. Mr. Tuck said he had counted an average of 250 dead sea-birds to every mile of coastline on Placentia Bay. Anybody who knows Newfoundland realizes, of course, that this bay has many miles of coastline; and when it is stated in this dispatch that thousands of sea-birds are being killed along the south coast, I am quite prepared to believe that this is not an exaggeration.

I also had an opportunity to check on the source of the information that appeared in the paper, and I am sure there is real substance in it. In the first place, not only is the Halifax Chronicle-Herald a most dependable and outstanding newspaper, but the accuracy of the dispatch is unquestionable, in my opinion, for another reason. It comes from the desk of a young Canadian Press reporter whom I have known in my home town for most of his life. His name is Gerald Freeman. I commend to your attention anything written under his by-line, and predict that he will earn a national reputation before many years. He has already won three Canadian Press awards during his short tenure of office in this organization. I hope I shall be forgiven for this little personal aside, but I was interested in the dispatch. I checked with the federal Wildlife Service, and had some correspondence during the Easter recess. I will read one paragraph from the report I received:

> The area where harm to aquatic birds by oil pollution is most frequent and serious is the southeastern part of Newfoundland, including the Avalon Peninsula and Placentia Bay. Other critical areas include the Straits of Belle Isle, the north shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and the lower St. Lawrence River. Less frequent incidents are reported from the Atlantic coast of Nova Scotia and the coasts of British Columbia.

There is no mention there of the area to which my honourable friend referred a few moments ago.

The report was interesting in its discussion of this subject, and the information even includes a remedy for cleansing those ducks which have been threatened with death by being covered with oil. It is a rather complicated remedy with quite a number of ingredients, and I note at the end it is stated that ordinary butter is probably as good as, if not better, than those complicated remedies which were devised by the National Research Council. I suppose that over in Newfoundland, where the scourge is greatest, these people would be using margarine instead of butter, because margarine is in more general use there. I just wanted to make reference to that subject to show that it is of some concern to us, and particularly to those of us who are a little worried about the conservation of our wildlife in general.

I notice that on page 20 of the bill there is reference to the fact that the zones which are to be established may be extended. Under Annex A, paragraph (3):

> Any contracting Government may propose:
> (i) the reduction of any zone off the coast of any of its territories;
> (ii) the extension of any such zone to a maximum of 100 miles from any such coast . . .

This, I think, is something which the Canadian people should be quite interested in. Perhaps this particular convention can be extended in the near future. There is some doubt in my mind that any part of our coast is actually going to receive much benefit from the convention in its present form.

I will now return to the shipping regulations. Some provisions in the bill are of a technical nature, and probably are not contentious. They are like the "tidying-up" measures, as they are sometimes referred to.

Some reference has already been made in the opening speech of the debate to the proposals for licensing all power boats and for changing the method of calculating the net tonnage of Canadian ships.

I come now to several amendments which are of real concern to me. It was because of their presence, which I hastily noted before the Easter adjournment, that I desired to have further discussion of the bill postponed until this time. One of these is a proposal to amend section 8 of the Canada Shipping Act, in order to exempt from registry under the act ships not exceeding 15 tons register tonnage. At present only ships not exceeding 10 tons register tonnage are exempted. In some ways this proposal may be welcomed by fishermen who own small boats. It would eliminate the nuisance of surveying and measuring and making visits to customs offices where the vessels must be registered. But, at the same time, if I interpret the effect of the proposal properly, it will mean the removal of the benefits under the Sick Mariners service. If this is so I urge that another means of qualification for this medical service be made available other than the payment of tonnage dues. This service has for many years been of great value to fishermen, most of whom are in the low income class.

May I now turn to the amendment which, in the view of those engaged in the fishing industry in Nova Scotia, is most contentious. This is a proposal for certification of masters and mates on fishing vessels. The honourable senator from Vancouver South made no reference to this proposal, and I assume that the west coast fiishing industry would find it acceptable.

Under the Canada Shipping Act as it is at present ships not exceeding 150 tons which are solely or principally engaged in fishing are not required to carry masters and mates holding certificates of the proper grade and class as are other classes of ships. This is provided in Section 114(1)(b) of the act. It has been a sensible exemption and I think it has been generally recognized as such, even by some of the officials of the Department of Transport.

Recently there came into my hands a publication entitled Annual Review and Program of Fisheries Council of Canada. This issue, which was printed in connection with the annual meeting of the council held in Ottawa on April 9, 10 and 11 of this year, contains an article entitled "Progress in Steamship Inspection", by Alan Cumyn, Chairman, Board of Steamship Inspection, Department of Transport, Ottawa. I understand the author has had some experience with the department in the Maritime provinces. He has learned a good deal about our particular problems and is fully conscious of the natural qualities of seamanship and particular circumstances in the operation of the fishing fleet on the east coast. He makes what I think is a rather interesting comment for a civil servant who perhaps would seem to be far removed from the actual scene of operations. This is what he says, on page 18:

> There are, however, basic differences in operation that must be taken into account by those responsible for the drawing up of standards for safe operation. Among these are the facts that fishermen are, generally speaking, sailormen familiar with the vessels they sail in and the waters in which they ply. Furthermore, their vessels are not operating on time schedules and they can, therefore, to a greater extent than do cargo vessels, choose their weather.

It is now proposed under section 6 of the bill to empower the Governor in Council to make regulations requiring masters and mates of fishing vessels to hold certificates of competency, as prescribed by regulations. It is apparently the intention of the department administering the act to proceed gradually, and in co-operation with the fishing industry, to introduce a system of certification specially designed for fishing boats. It is also indicated that the development of this program will be made in conjunction with an educational program. This is, of course, a new and perhaps worthwhile approach to the problems concerned with safety at sea and efficiency of operation. But opinions are held in some quarters that the educational program should be put into effect for some time before such a change is made in the regulation-making powers.

I am reminded here of something which happened a few years ago when we received a copy of a bill to amend the Fish Inspection Act. The bill contained a proposal to compel all fishing boats to have a certain kind of equipment in order to pass inspection, such equipment to be determined by regulations to be set up. Some of us were able to persuade those sponsoring the bill that they had better go slowly and get the fishermen themselves to realize the value of this kind of thing. We pointed out that when most of the fishermen were ready to accept it, it would not have to be forced on them. I think that point is now being reached in the fishing industry, and I expect that before long a similar bill will be introduced in Parliament for the purpose of putting into effect some of the things which were considered as being forced on the fishermen when the original bill was introduced.

The same situation may exist here, and perhaps it would be wise to postpone giving powers to make regulations until the fishing industry itself is ready to accept those regulations. If the proposal now under discussion in this bill is adopted it may have a serious effect on the operation of long-liners. Incidentally, I am sure that those from the west and east coasts are familiar with the term "long-liners", and I would like to give credit to the people of the west coast for taking the initiative in developing this type of fishing operation. We are very grateful to them, for it has proven to be one of the greatest things that has happened to our industry. Our fishermen are able to make wonderful catches by using the long-liner method. Just today I read in a Halifax newspaper that the record catch by this method is something over 53,000 pounds in one setting of three to four days.

The development of the long-liner type of fishing boat, encouraged and assisted by the federal Government, has resulted in a significant improvement in the fishing industry. In this method of fishing, baited trawls or lines are placed and retrieved by power from the deck of the boat. This has replaced the older method of setting and hauling each trawl by hand from a dory launched from the deck of the vessel. These long-liners are not large at all, but range anywhere from 40 to 60 feet in length and perhaps in tonnage from 15 to 50 registered tons. To make drastic regulations in connection with the certification of their captains and mates may have a discouraging effect on the modernization of the fishing methods. I have found no support from anyone in the industry in favour of such a move, and full consideration of their views must be given when the bill is in the Committee on Transport.

The regulation would also affect other kinds of fishing boats. It would affect the operation of draggers, which vary from 50 to 125 net tons, and of beam trawlers—the largest of which I have knowledge of as fishing out of Nova Scotia ports would be somewhat under 150 tons. These are larger types of boats, and the largest of them may already have regular captain's papers.

The long-liner is a smaller type of boat, however, and the apprentices on this type of vessel have no chance to go to school to study mathematics and pass examinations. The skippers on these smaller types of boats have learned their business through a long apprenticeship from boyhood. Their strength lies in experience, natural or inborn seamanship and good judgment. Their navigation has been by dead reckoning and is uncannily accurate. It is now aided by modern Loran equipment and the use of echo-sounders—both adapted from wartime developments. The development of the echo-sounder device has enabled the fisherman to tell at a glance when he is on the peak of a ridge, or in the valley of the bottom, alongside large quantities of fish during certain months of the year, and also when he is in other places. By the use of echo-sounders the fisherman knows exactly where to go, and that is one of the reasons the catches of fish have been greater in the past few years.

I do not know why it should be necessary for these men to pass examinations or have to qualify for them. If it is proposed to make certification of such fishermen automatic, that will serve no useful purpose. I do not believe it necessarily follows, especially in fishing, that the man who qualifies for an examination is therefore a competent person to place in charge of a vessel. One never, or at least very seldom, hears of a fishing vessel getting into trouble because of the incompetence of its captain, but many examples of incompetence on the part of those who hold high certificates of qualification have been prominent in marine circles. Honourable senators may remember that four or five years ago a very large Government-owned vessel grounded, in broad daylight, practically on the shore bordering the golf course at White Point beach, near the town in which I live. That was not a very good example of competency to the fishermen. Those responsible had the highest qualification, but they certainly lacked judgment on that occasion. At another time a very large ferry boat ran on the rocks not very far from the coast—also near my town. Fishermen do not often do things like that. I repeat that, because a captain has papers, they do not necessarily prove that he is a particularly good captain of a fishing vessel.

The co-operation of the industry with Government departments in making available courses in navigation is, however, a good thing, and the programs which have been undertaken in Nova Scotia under the sponsorship of the provincial government have been valuable. A new program of technical education in the field of service and repairs to engines used by fishermen, which has been instituted by the provincial Government of Nova Scotia, will be of great value and importance. I think every consideration should be given by all governments to this kind of program. It is recognized that engine trouble at sea presents some of the worst hazards of fishing, other than stormy weather.

Having made these remarks, I hope every consideration will be given to the views I have expressed, as I believe they are the views of the fishermen whom I have the great honour to represent in this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John J. Kinley: Honourable senators, I congratulate my colleague from Queens-Shelburne, who is also from a part of the riding in Nova Scotia that I represent, on his first speech in this chamber. He has made a splendid presentation, and I am confident that he will be a great asset to the Senate, on account of his debating ability, especially in matters of a technical nature concerning the fisheries of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: The honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Bishop) has reminded me that 11 years ago today he and I, with others, were summoned to the Senate. It is good to be reminded of the anniversary of our appointment. We, too, once made our first speeches here.

In the debate on the motion for second reading of a bill it is usual to discuss the principle of the bill. I think the only principle of the bill before us has to do with pollution of the sea. Although I am going to vote for the second reading, I will do so with some reservation. I think the bill should be very carefully considered in committee, because of its technical features, for it contains points of more significance than appear on the surface.

In order that the bill can be discussed intelligently in committee, I wish to refer to certain sections here, although that is not usually done on second reading. Section 2 increases the tonnage of vessels exempt from registry from 10 to 15 tons. The section is worded in a rather peculiar way. It says:

> Ships not exceeding fifteen tons register tonnage . . . wherever employed or operated are exempted from registry under this act.

Well, are they prohibited from registration or not? I take it that, being exempted, vessels under 15 tons do not have the privilepe to register.

That brings me to one or two questions, particularly with regard to the Sick Mariners and Marine Hospitals, under the Canada Shipping Act. These provide a good service to the fishing industry in Nova Scotia for a small sum of money. In order for the crew of a vessel to be eligible for this service the vessel must be registered in Canada. I do not have the statistics on this question, but if we now raise the tonnage from 10 to 15 tons we will, I believe, deprive a lot of boats of the benefits they now have by way of hospital care and medical service under the act. I cannot see why the department would want to increase the tonnage. That question will have to be answered in committee.

Further, there is the matter of the fishermen's bounty. Speaking from memory, I think the regulations provide that vessels of from 10 to 80 tons shall be paid bounty according to their tonnage.

There is the further question of the shore fisherman who gets paid a bounty if he catches 2,500 pounds of fish within three months. I have no doubt that the Department of Fisheries can change the regulations, and perhaps in a way that will help the small fisherman to qualify for the bounty. Under these proposed provisions it would seem that the situation is going to be disturbed anyway, and it is a matter that should be looked into very carefully. I think reference should be made to the Canada Shipping Act, Part V, section 316, with respect to hospital benefits, if the smallest ship to be registered is 15 tons.

Section 3 of the bill is new, and in my opinion it is too technical to go into on second reading. It has to do with cargo space in a ship, and how it shall be computed as regards gross tonnage and net tonnage; I suppose it also has reference to harbour dues and pilotage dues, and to the amount of space a vessel can use for cargo with a certain amount restricted for the purposes of accommodations, engine room and that sort of thing. The section carries this explanatory note:

> The purpose is to provide for engine room space allowance similar to that provided for in the United Kingdom Merchant Shipping Act.

Now, is that good enough? If it is to the benefit of Canada, it is good enough, but I have a notion that it may not be our benefit. When we get into matters related to the British act, we are dealing with provisions affecting people who are keen competitors. We have given away about all our privileges under the Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement. Therefore, we should look very closely at anything that is done just because it complies with the British act.

I come next to the proposed amendment dealing with masters' certificates. Heretofore masters of fishing vessels were not obliged to have certificates. A fishing skipper is a peculiar and unique character. He starts out perhaps as a man who throats the fish, as it is said—that is, he cuts their throats; he may later become a header; later still he spends some time in a dory, and he only wins his way to the top by merit. He must be a good businessman, industrious and able to lead and handle a crew of 30 or 40 men under the difficult share system. When men are fishing under the share system everybody takes note of what the other fellow is doing, because they share alike.

The captain of a fishing vessel is a highly regarded man. I have been taking shares in fishing vessels all my life. My father was a fishing skipper, like my grandfather before him, and later became a master mariner. When we take a share in a fishing vessel we are not so much concerned with where the vessel was built or how much she cost, but we always ask who is the skipper. If you have a good skipper, you are all right. He is the man who manages the affairs on the sea and the land; he also deals between the owners and the men. Unless a fisherman is superior to his fellows he does not become a skipper. I would point out that a skipper has been known to make $10,000 a year, which is not regarded as too high a return. When it comes to making money, he puts the college lad to shame. He has learned his job and has become proficient by practice. For instance, one does not learn to run an automobile or fly an airplane by reading a book, but rather by getting into these machines and doing the actual job. Similarly, a skipper must get his experience on a ship. True, there is the problem of navigation; but as my honourable friend from Queens-Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Smith) said today, there are all kinds of devices for navigating, finding depths, taking cross-bearings and so on. This is all done by instruments. I think there is not much more reason why a master should be certified now than in former years. If you will look at the record of disasters on the coasts of Canada during the past 20 years, you will see that fishermen have not suffered serious disasters. While we have every respect for the man who has an educational background and carries a certificate, we believe that the practical man, the man who came up, as they say, through the hawse-pipe is after all the man we rely on.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask my friend a question? I consider that I know as little about fishing as anyone in this chamber. My friend spoke of skippers earning $10,000 a year. Do these men share in the bonuses which he said are paid by the Government?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: No, they do not share in the bonuses.

As I have said, the skipper is an exceptional man. You don't find his like in many places outside Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I was wondering whether he makes $10,000 and gets the bonus as well.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: The 60-foot boat is supposed to get a subsidy.

I find among the labour unions and some other people in my province that there is a difference of opinion as to the need of a certificate for masters. Some people feel that there should be a compromise, that the small fellow with a boat under 60 feet should be left alone, but that when it comes to the big trawler, an expensive and complicated fishing vessel, the skipper of a ship like that might be required to have a certificate. The situation is one that should be very carefully considered by the committee.

The boat under 60 feet is a small vessel. Men who operate these boats do not need navigation certificates. They can navigate by rule and tell where they are; and they make soundings on the bottom of the ocean. Fog does not bother them, and they do not even need to look at the sun or stars.

Now, honourable senators, I think the section about engineers is quite a serious matter. Among fishermen the number of engineers who can operate diesel-powered boats is small; very few know much about it. In order to do a little to overcome the shortage of diesel-engine operators we ran a course for General Motors last summer in our plant. That company was very eager to have this done, because it had installed expensive engines in fishing boats, and an inefficient operator can easily destroy a valuable piece of machinery. It is all very well to say that the captain is the man who is in command and responsible for the ship's safety. However, if he gets into any trouble he can throw out his anchor and telephone ashore, but if anything happens to the engine and an unqualified operator is in charge, it can turn out to be an expensive breakdown.

I really think that the field of engineers is one where real progress is desired. I know that in our plant we lose good men because the fishermen want them for engineers on diesel boats. There has been practically no place where diesel-engine operators can be trained, but the Government of Nova Scotia is now providing facilities for training by means of a travelling school.

This bill provides that in the fishing industry, which is the one which we are mostly interested in, if the engine of a boat is not of over 15 nominal horsepower an additional engineer to the first engineer need not be certified. I think there is reason in that. We can very well go along with some progress in calling for certificates for chief engineers.

With respect to the provisions regarding skippers, section 119 of the present act limits the validity of a home-trade waters certificate to a vessel of 150 tons; that is to say, skippers in possession of a home-trade waters certificate are entitled to act as masters of a boat not exceeding 150 tons. By the proposed amendment the upper limit is being raised to 350 tons; but on the other hand, it is also proposed to include all the small registered boats, down to 15 tons, and to require certificates for skippers of all registered vessels. My impression is that instead of raising the limit to 350 tons, which might be all right as far as the beam trawler is concerned, the department should leave the 60-foot boat alone. The change now proposed is a drastic one.

Now, I wish to say a few words about the part of the bill dealing with oil pollution. My honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) asked if the bill applied to the Great Lakes. Well, this part of the bill is largely the outcome of an international convention for the prevention of the pollution of the sea by oil. It does not make much reference to the waters adjacent to Canada, except that the Governor in Council will have the power to make regulations to prevent the pollution by oil from ships of any inland, minor or other waters in Canada, including the Great Lakes, the St. Lawrence River, Lake Winnipeg and other places. The purpose of this part of the bill is to give the Governor in Council power to deal with the problem as he sees fit, by regulation.

Honourable senators, this bill was well explained by the senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris). He always does a good job. However, I do not think he laid enough stress on these things that are technical and have a special significance on our coasts. Therefore, when the bill is under consideration in committee we should see that departmental officials come before us and state the reasons for all the proposed changes. Then we shall be able to judge independently what should be done.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck, the debate was adjourned.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill B, an Act to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to make legislative provision for a certain number of hard cases which were not anticipated at the time when the act was amended a few years ago. Honourable senators will recall that the amendments made at that time were so extensive that they constituted a completely new act. The amendments which are brought forward today have become necessary on account of circumstances that have taken place since that act was passed. I may put it this way: this is a bill that we find necessary after experiencing the results of the act which was passed in 1953.

Now, honourable senators, this is another case where it is difficult to state a principle and just talk on the principle of the bill. It is a bill which amends various sections, and as the honourable senator from Queens-Lunenburg (Hon. Mr. Kinley) said a moment ago in connection with the bill he was considering, it is not possible to consider it without referring to the sections.

I think the amendments can be divided into two classes. First, there are those clauses which are procedural, dealing with the mechanics of acquiring citizenship; and secondly, those clauses which deal with the substance of citizenship. Probably if I deal with them in those two divisions rather than in the order in which they appear in the bill, it might be more helpful.

The clauses which are procedural are numbered 1, 5, 6, 7 and 8. Clause number 1 refers to the Clerk of the Court. It is necessary to amend the word "clerk" to include representatives of persons who have been appointed to hear citizenship applications. At the present time applications for citizenship generally are heard by a judge in a court. By an amendment which was passed, if my memory serves me correctly, last year, certain individuals can be appointed in different places throughout Canada to hear applications. I think that at the present time, in the City of Montreal, there is such an appointee.

Hon. Mr. Gouin: That is so.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Also in the city of Toronto; and in some sections of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon individuals have been appointed to hear these applications. It is necessary to amend the word "clerk" to include the clerks of these individuals who are sitting more or less in the capacity of judges on these applications.

Likewise, the word "court" must necessarily be amended to include any person designated to hear these applications.

That sufficiently explains, I think, the necessity of amending the interpretation clause with respect to the words "clerk of the court".

I come now to clause 5. This is a change in mechanics. The existing section reads:

An application . . . for a certificate of citizenship shall be made to the court in the judicial district . . .

This relates only to cases of applicants for citizenship who have come from a foreign country and have resided here for five years. But, as honourable senators will recall, the wife of a naturalized person can obtain a certificate of citizenship through the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, so the words which apply to a court have been made applicable only in the case of subsection (1) of section 10 of the act.

Probably I should interrupt myself here to say that it is my intention to recommend to the house that, if this bill should receive second reading, it be referred to the Committee on Immigration and Labour. I am sure honourable senators will want to ask detailed questions of the minister himself, if he attends, or his representative.

The next procedural clause is number 6. Its purpose is to enable applications to be filed in accordance with regulations which will be made by the department. That is an unusual provision, but I may remind you that, under the act, a designated person can hear applications. So long as the court was hearing all the applications it was natural that they should be filed in the court. But if an application is made by someone living far away, as in the Northwest Territories, or at a place where it is difficult to file such an application, he cannot file it in a court; so it is proposed that regulations be made to enable that person to file the application with as little inconvenience as possible.

The next clause dealing with procedure is number 7. The act provides that the effective date of citizenship is to be the date when the oath of allegiance is taken. Now it has happened that an applicant has had his application rejected by a judge and has then taken his oath of allegiance, but the certificate was not issued until some time later. The act is being amended so that regulations shall be made as to when the oath of allegiance will be taken and when the certificate shall be presented. It is the intention, of course, that these two acts shall take place at the same time.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Will that provision be retroactive, to amend past oversights?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am afraid that the wording of the agreement is not wide enough to cover what has happened in the past. It might be possible to do so. That is a matter which, I suggest, the honourable senator could take up with the minister when the bill is in committee.

The next procedural clause is number 8, the first part of which reads:

Paragraph (b) of subsection (2) of section 34 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

(b) designate any court or person in any part of Canada to act as a court for the purposes of this act and any court or person so designated shall be deemed to be a court for all purposes under this act . . .

This amendment, as I think I have already explained, refers to the appointment of designated persons to hear applications. For the purpose of the act, when they sit to hear these applications they will be deemed to be sitting in a court.

The second part of clause 8 relates to applications which are made by members of the armed forces outside of Canada. The provision there is that an officer of the Canadian forces outside of Canada can act as a court for the purpose of dealing with applications under subsection (1) of section 10.

I have now mentioned all the clauses which I consider to be procedural. There remain sections 2, 3 and 4, which deal with the substance of citizenship.

Clause 2 provides for the citizenship of children, and is, I think, self-explanatory. A person is considered to be a natural-born Canadian citizen if at the time of that person's birth:

(A) if born in wedlock, his father was a Canadian citizen,

(B) if born out of wedlock and his parents have not intermarried, his mother was a Canadian citizen, or

(C) if born out of wedlock and his parents have intermarried, either his mother or his father was a Canadian citizen.

Hon. Mr. Euler: What is meant by intermarried?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I suppose that means they marry each other. If the parents married other people they could hardly be intermarried together.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: I do not think the explanatory note at the top of the page opposite page 2 covers subparagraph (B). Perhaps the honourable leader could throw some light on that.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Subparagraph (B) provides that a child is a Canadian citizen if he is born out of wedlock and his parents have not intermarried, if at the time of his birth his mother was a Canadian citizen.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: The explanatory note reads:

> The purpose of the amendment is to provide that where a child is legitimatized by the marriage of the parents the requirements of this subparagraph are satisfied if either the father or the mother is a Canadian citizen.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That refers to subparagraph (C).

Hon. Mr. Lambert: I thought it referred to the whole section, but it certainly does not cover subparagraph (B).

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The explanatory note does not refer to either subparagraph (A) or subparagraph (B).

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Does it mean anything at all?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: A child born in wedlock is a Canadian citizen if his father was a Canadian citizen.

Hon. Mrs. Wilson: Then the mother does not have the same rights?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If a child is born in wedlock and the father is a Canadian and the mother is of some other nationality, the child is a Canadian.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable leader a question? Does this not provide an advantage for a person being born out of wedlock, for if you are born out of wedlock you can be a Canadian citizen if either your mother or father—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Oh, yes. If either your mother or father was a Canadian citizen and they later intermarry, then you are a Canadian citizen; but if you were born in wedlock, then it must be your father only who was a Canadian citizen. Your mother does not count. So I say there is an advantage in being born out of wedlock.

Hon. Mr. Power: Under subparagraph (B) a boy's best friend is his mother.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: We have been referring to "marriage" and "wedlock". Are these words to be accepted as marriage and wedlock under Canadian law? I understand some people come from countries where a gentleman may legally have several wives, and children by several wives. I would like to know what proof is required of wedlock in order to gain the status referred to in the bill?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I suppose the proof would have to be the same as the proof required by a wife who claims that she is the legal wife.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I am assuming the lady was a legal wife in the country in which she had residence. I do not know whether the same rules apply in other provinces, but in the province of Quebec, where parties are in good faith, children are legitimate even though proof establishes they are born out of wedlock. Their legitimacy is beyond attack.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I can see the difficulty to which the honourable senator refers, but I am afraid I cannot answer his question.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I cannot either.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I realize in some countries polygamy is legal and if a man, a Canadian citizen, had children by a number of wives in another country I take it that all those children would be little Canadians.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Has that point not been decided in the Supreme Court?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think so.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: May I interrupt the honourable leader to ask a question? Subparagraph (C) of the bill reads:

> If born out of wedlock and his parents have intermarried, either his mother or his father was a Canadian citizen . . .

Accordingly, if an unmarried woman who is a red-blooded Canadian citizen has children, they become Canadian citizens, even though the father of these children may be of another nationality. Therefore, according to this provision of the law, a woman who is a Canadian citizen could behave badly with men of various nationalities and have children by them who would be Canadian citizens. I find this amazing. According to present law the children have the nationality of their father. The provision before us is absolutely new. I have looked after the welfare of Indian children, and when the mother has been an Indian and the father has not, it has been impossible to get benefits from the Department of Indian Affairs. When the father was an Indian and the mother a white woman, then the children could get anything.

The Hon. the Speaker: I must point out that the honourable gentleman should confine himself to asking a question.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but these are prelegomena to my question. My question is obvious. What is the meaning of this provision?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think the honourable senator is correct when he says that if an unmarried woman is a Canadian, then no matter how many children she has they are all little Canadians. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What else could they be?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not see how they could be of any other nationality. It is suggested they might take the nationality of their father, but it might be rather difficult to prove who the father is.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: If I may be permitted I would suggest that this provision should be in the Immigration Act and not in the Citizenship Act, for the children would be born of a foreigner.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Well, if it affects their citizenship it would have to be in the Citizenship Act.

I think it was the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) who asked a question about the phrase "born out of wedlock". I suppose the wording should be, "born when the parents were not legally married". However, may I suggest that he ask that question of officials, if the bill goes to committee.

If honourable senators have no further questions to ask, may we return to clause 3? The purpose of this clause is to make provision for people who have long resided in Canada but for whom no provision regarding entry has been made: as, for instance, Indians or Eskimos who may have originated in Alaska. Under clause 3 any such resident is deemed to be a Canadian citizen if that person:

(a) had a place of domicile in Canada on the 1st day of January, 1947, and

(b) on the 1st day of January, 1956, had resided in Canada for more than ten years.

Clause 4(1) provides that a person may obtain Canadian citizenship if:

he has adequate knowledge of either the English or the French language, or, if he has not such adequate knowledge, he has resided continuously in Canada for more than twenty years and makes his application before the 1st day of January, 1961.

To put it more simply, after 1961 an applicant for citizenship must have an adequate knowledge of either English or French.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Who is to decide if the knowledge is adequate?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The judge or official designated to hear the application.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Decisions as to what is adequate might vary.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is true.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: That is true in all cases where there are courts of appeal.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, I suppose so.

Hon. Mr. Euler: A judge hearing an application can exercise discretion as to whether he will grant the application or not, and his decision might differ from another's.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, different judges might have different opinions as to who should be deemed Canadian citizens.

The purpose of clause 4(2) is to permit application by a guardian or other responsible person. This amendment will also enable the mother as well as the father to make the application. At the present time only the father may make application. The new clause also embodies a change in the meaning of "responsible parent". At present "responsible parent" means the father, but if the father is dead, or if the custody of a child has been awarded to its mother by a court of competent jurisdiction, or if the child is born out of wedlock and is in the custody of its mother, the responsible parent is the mother. The amendment will allow regulations to be made authorizing the mother to make the application, in cases where the mother has the custody of the child, or where the child is under the care of a de facto guardian.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What would happen if both the father and mother were dead?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Then the guardian could apply.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Does the bill say so?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, that is the purpose of this amendment.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It says "responsible parent".

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, or "a person authorized by the regulations."

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I refer back to the first part of clause 4? The present section 10 of the act says, I think, that if a person has resided for 20 years in Canada he can be naturalized even though he cannot speak English or French.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes. This will change the act so that after 1961 an applicant for citizenship must have an adequate knowledge of either English or French.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: A person becomes naturalized after he has been in the country for five years?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, after he has been in the country for five years. It is considered that there are ample facilities now for a person to learn English, and the department is spending about $200,000 a year to establish schools throughout the country so that newcomers can learn English. Of course, that money is being spent in co-operation with the provinces. By 1961 it is felt that applicants should have a knowledge of one of our official languages.

Clause 4(3) is a new provision. Prior to the 1953 act a person who had five years' residence in Canada but had not been a landed immigrant could apply for citizenship and receive a certificate of citizenship one year after he or she had been admitted as a landed immigrant. That provision was amended in 1953 to provide for a term of five years to run from the time a person is admitted as a landed immigrant. Honourable senators will realize that from time to time people come to Canada as visitors, or as employees with other branches of government here, who are not landed immigrants, but sometimes decide to remain in Canada. At the present time, in order to become Canadian citizens such persons must have been here for five years before they become landed immigrants. This has brought hardship to a certain number of citizens, although not a great many. For instance, in 1945, after the war, a number of Polish people came to Canada under an arrangement whereby they would work on a farm for two years, and if they did so they could make application for citizenship at the end of three years thereafter. That would give them five years in Canada. A number of the newcomers fulfilled their obligation to stay on the farm for two years, but never made application for citizenship. Under the present provision they would have to apply now to become landed immigrants and wait for five years. The amendment would enable them to take advantage of the provisions of the act as they were prior to 1953.

Subclause 9 of clause 4 refers to soldiers who marry abroad. Under this proposed amendment if a soldier marries abroad and if at that time his wife passes the necessary medical and other examinations in order to get a visa, she may then come into Canada when her husband is returned, without further examination. If during the interval they have children, the children will come in without further examination.

I think I have roughly covered all the provisions set forth in the bill. It is a housekeeping bill, intended to clear up the difficulties and do away with certain injustices which have arisen since the act was passed in 1953. I am sure honourable senators will agree that the bill, upon receiving second reading, should be referred to the Standing Committee on Immigration and Labour. I propose to make a motion to that effect at the appropriate time.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I look with some doubt on the limitation of time for making application for citizenship, being January, 1961, as it applies to citizens who do not have an adequate knowledge of either the English or French language. It is all very well to say that we are spending a good deal of money on teaching the two official languages, but there are people in Canada who could not possibly learn to speak either official language. It is all right for those who live in towns and cities where they can attend schools, but in the rural districts, particularly in the remote areas, there are people who have little or no opportunity to use either of the official languages, and whose ability as students is exceedingly limited. To place a limit of that kind on the coming generations would not be so bad, but as it applies to the present generation I feel it is going to debar from citizenship some perfectly good people who have resided in Canada a long time, but who, in the nature of things, just cannot learn one language or the other.

I know the difficulty of learning a language out of a book. I have tried it myself, not very successfully; and there are others within hearing of my voice who know the difficulties. We have no definition of what is an adequate knowledge of either language. So I believe that this provision requiring applicants for citizenship to have an adequate knowledge of either language will do unnecessary hardship to certain people in our country.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: The provision gives them five years to acquire the knowledge.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: True, it gives them five years, but there are certain people—some of whom may not live long—who could not acquire an adequate knowledge of either language in any given time. I would be perfectly satisfied to have it apply to people born in this country.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Of course, they are automatically Canadian citizens.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is true, but why discriminate against the older people?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Do you not think that some people who come to Canada are too persistent in continuing to use the language of their native country?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Perhaps they are too persistent, but I am sure that if I were to go to a country with a different language from mine it would take me quite a while to learn that language, student though I am. I know there are many people who come here who do not speak either of our languages.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: And many do not try to learn it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It is practically impossible for some to learn a new language, because they do not circulate amongst the English or French speaking people. Therefore, I look with some doubt upon this provision.

However, I am glad to see an improvement in the provisions with respect to landed immigrants; that is to say, some consideration will be given to the cases of people who have lived here for a considerable time but have not been given landing. I have in mind one case in which the health of the individual was under consideration, and the department has declined to give permanent landing. That person has been here now for perhaps five or ten years, and through no fault of his own, has not been given landing.

Citizenship has a practical value these days in that unless you are a citizen and hold a certificate you have difficulty in getting across the border. I am pleased to see a loosening up of the much too stereotyped rule of the past.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, what strikes me in this legislation is that it contains a complete change with regard to hereditary citizenship. By virtue of the provisions on our statute books, citizenship is given by the head of the family, the father, to his children.

Another factor which counts considerably in the matter of citizenship is birthplace. Whoever is born in Canada is a Canadian citizen and has the right of option on obtaining his majority. Therefore, subparagraphs (A), (B) and (C) of subparagraph (i) of section 2 of the bill are unwarranted and uncalled for. Subparagraph (A) repeats what is now the law. The whole section is apparently uncalled for, and there is no reason why it should not be struck out of the bill. This is my first impression. I believe it is just as well to leave things as they are with regard to hereditary citizenship. We know that the father gives his nationality to his son; the son does not acquire the nationality of his mother; if his father is unknown, as in the case of some circumstances described in this provision, the child is not denied citizenship. Being born in Canada, he has the option to become a Canadian citizen at the age of 21, or to take another citizenship of his choice.

The matter is clear. I cannot see why it is that some officers of departments torture their minds to give the impression of profound knowledge by repeating commonplace findings in an effort to make the law more difficult to understand. We have a good law as it is. Why should we change it? Why should we leave the door open to another kind of citizenship? This is no reflection upon women, for whom I have the greatest of respect. The law of the land is that a child has the nationality of its father. If it is to be changed so that a child will have the nationality of its mother, that will create a very different situation. Should we vote for such legislation blindly?

Now that I have more time to scrutinize the legislation which comes before us I will take every opportunity, when I have the leisure to do so, to show how silly are some of those who draft legislation in the various departments of Government. I make an exception of the staff of the Senate—they are above reproach! I speak of the various departments outside Parliament. I will see what the fate of this provision will be when the bill comes before the Committee on Immigration and Labour. If that provision remains in the bill when it is reported to the house I will then move that it be struck out.

Honourable senators, another thing about citizenship, as was remarked by my distinguished and honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), is that it is a great honour for all of us Canadians who are proud of their country. At present we have an act which is double-faced. Who ever heard of a country having two citizenships? Only Canada is in that class. Here in Canada one is at the same time a British subject and a Canadian citizen. I am proud to be a British subject as much as I am of being a Canadian citizen, but the time will come when the newcomers from outside, whether they come from the United Kingdom or from somewhere else, will have to take out Canadian citizenship in order to have public rights in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: They do now. A person cannot be a lawyer or a doctor in the province of Quebec, even though he be a British subject, unless he has Canadian citizenship.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Neither can he vote.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I agree with my honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett). And I will add what I repeatedly stated in the House of Commons, that a large number of good Canadians who were not born in this country are very often better Canadians than some of those who were born here. I am not afraid to say so; but on the other hand, in the not too distant future, whoever comes here to stay, from the United Kingdom or from any other country, should have to take out Canadian citizenship in order to enjoy public rights in Canada. Then we shall have only one citizenship, which will be Canadian citizenship. We will be loyal to Her Majesty the Queen of Canada just the same, we will be proud to be her subjects, but we will be Canadian citizens and nothing else. Then we will be united, and there will be understanding in Canada.

Referring to what my honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) has said, I would point out that there are many people who came here from the United Kingdom or other parts of the British commonwealth and enjoy public rights without taking Canadian citizenship. Whoever heard of that anywhere else, that people coming from outside could enjoy public rights? They should be entitled to all the private rights, as they are at present, but not to public rights. To enjoy public rights they should have to become Canadians and show their intention to stay in Canada. I do not speak of the immigrants who came to Canada before the Citizenship Act was passed. What I mean is that in the future the Citizenship Act could be further amended.

Canada will become a truly sovereign country on the day when we have one and only one Canadian citizenship, and one flag, truly distinctive of Canada, with one national emblem, the maple leaf.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: If the honourable the Leader of the Government speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, two very interesting points have been raised. The honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) questioned whether an applicant for citizenship should be required to have an adequate knowledge of either English or French. That is no doubt a debatable question, and I agree with him that it should receive more careful consideration when the matter is before the committee.

The point raised by the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) is also an interesting one. I neglected to state when I was explaining this bill that clause 2 refers to children born outside of Canada. A child born out of wedlock to a Canadian woman outside of Canada is, under the present act and also under the proposed amendment, considered to be a Canadian citizen. There is no difference in principle in that respect. The honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) referred to the explanatory note, which says:

> The purpose of the amendment is to provide that where a child is legitimatized by the marriage of the parents the requirements of this subparagraph are satisfied if either the father or the mother is a Canadian citizen.

That is not so at present. Subparagraph (C) provides that a child born out of wedlock to parents, one of whom is a Canadian citizen and subsequently marries, is considered to be a Canadian citizen. Subparagraphs (A) and (B) were previously in effect. The note on the side of the page refers only to (C). There has been just a change in the wording with respect to (A) and (B). If a child is born out of wedlock in a foreign country to a Canadian mother the child is a Canadian citizen; and if a child is born out of wedlock in a foreign country, and his parents have intermarried, and either the father or the mother was a Canadian citizen, then the child is considered to be a Canadian citizen.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Is there not a distinction, a fundamental distinction, between the two classifications, involving the marriage of the parents? One completely ignores any marriage of the parents and regards the child as legitimate for purposes of Canadian citizenship; the other says they must be married before the child can be so regarded. It does not make sense to me.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In the first instance the child is a Canadian citizen only if the mother was a Canadian citizen.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: I can read that.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Well, I am trying to explain it. In the second instance the child is a Canadian citizen whether the mother or the father was a Canadian citizen.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: They must be married.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: They must be married. So it is necessary to have both (B) and (C) to provide that a child born out of wedlock from a Canadian father who subsequently marries becomes a Canadian citizen. That seems more involved than it actually is, but that is the situation. However, I have no doubt that a representative from the department, or the minister himself, will be able to explain this more carefully when the bill goes to committee. I suggest that it should receive second reading.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Immigration and Labour.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN PROVINCIAL INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard moved the second reading of Bill R-6, an Act to incorporate The Canadian Provincial Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, I shall be very brief. The bill contains clauses similar to those which appear in all such measures.

The capital to be subscribed before the business can be commenced is $500,000. When so subscribed, and paid, the company may go into certain specified classes of business; and if it wants to add to these operations, more money must be subscribed. It is the purpose of the company to take over an English corporation which is now doing business in Canada, and to assume both its liabilities and its assets. The enabling clause is number 8, and no agreement for this purpose can become effective until it has been submitted to and approved by the Treasury Board of Canada. The company is otherwise subject to the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

I do not think there is anything else to which I need draw attention. If the bill receives second reading I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Is the British company to which the honourable senator has referred operating in Canada at the present time?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: It is.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: What is the name of it?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Monument Insurance Company. As appears in the bill:

> The company may acquire by agreement to insure or otherwise the whole or any part of the rights and property within Canada and may assume the obligations and liabilities within Canada of Monument Insurance Company Limited, having its head office at Stramongate, Kendal, England, hereinafter called "Monument".

This is the company whose assets it is intended to acquire, and which is now doing business under licence of the Department of Insurance. The new company intends to take over the assets and liabilities of the Monument company and continue insurance business as a Canadian company.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: But where is the Monument company operating in Canada at the present time?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: It is operating throughout the country. It has an office in Montreal.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Bouffard, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

SENATE CHAMBER—UNFINISHED CONDITION

INQUIRIES AND ANSWERS

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have two inquiries to make. The first one is: How many rooms in this building have been unfinished since the building was constructed, and what are they?

My second question is: How many rooms in this building have gilded ceilings, and what are they?

I would be very thankful to the Government if it would explain why the room or rooms has or have been unfinished, and if it is the walls that have been unfinished, or any other part of the room or rooms.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I will endeavour to obtain the information for the honourable senator. No doubt some of the officials of this house could make the necessary inspection, and probably the honourable senator might assist them in doing so.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I thank the honourable leader, and I will answer my questions right now. The only room that has been unfinished in this building is the Senate chamber. In the second place, the only room that has a gilded ceiling is this very chamber. Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I must thank the honourable senator for the answers.

TRADE AGREEMENT WITH RUSSIA

MOTION FOR APPROVAL OF RATIFICATION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved:

Resolved, that it is expedient that the houses of Parliament approve the ratification by Canada of the agreement on trade between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, signed at Ottawa on February 29, 1956, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Honourable senators, on February 29 last Canada entered into an agreement on trade with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. It now comes to us for ratification. There are doubtless many who will have mixed feelings upon our entering into a trade agreement with a country whose political ideologies are so vastly different from those which we hold in this country. Nevertheless, it is the policy of this Government to extend our trade lines as vigorously as possible and on the best possible terms into any market that develops.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Groundwork for the present trade agreement was laid by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Right Honourable C. D. Howe, and by the Honourable Lester B. Pearson, Secretary of State for External Affairs, during his visit to Russia last year. At that time, in response to requests for a trade agreement, the possibilities were explored. It is a great tribute to both of these men, and to their able assistants, particularly the Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mitchell Sharp, that this agreement in matters of trade has now been reached.

Honourable senators will note that this agreement contains the words "most-favoured-nation treatment" in reference to the exchange of goods between the two Governments. This is a terminology which merely puts our trade relationship on a basis comparable to that which we have with most other countries. It merely means that imports from a particular country will be treated no less favourably than those from any other country. It is a reference merely to tariffs and other matters in trading fields and commercial policies. It does not give another country special advantages, but guarantees that that country will not be discriminated against in trade matters.

Imports into Canada from the U.S.S.R. are now admitted under the provisional application of this agreement at the rates of the most-favoured-nation tariff schedule. Here I must pause a moment to point out that most-favoured-nation treatment does not involve the application of British preferential rates of duty to imports from the U.S.S.R.

In approaching this problem it must be remembered that our trade is conducted under private auspices, and decisions regarding purchases and sales abroad are made by private individuals. The role of the Government in assisting this exchange is to expedite, and sometimes to regulate by tariff policy and other means, this important phase of our economic expansion. In so far as possible it is the Government's policy that the people of Canada should be as free as possible in deciding what and from whom they will buy.

In negotiating such a trade agreement as this with the U.S.S.R., or any other country, the Government, therefore, does not attempt to stipulate what shall and what shall not be imported into Canada. Canada does not, therefore, agree to buy any specific goods from the U.S.S.R. but merely gives an undertaking that imports from that country may compete equally with imports from other countries in the most-favoured-nation category.

Canada in turn receives most-favoured-nation treatment from the U.S.S.R. This is notwithstanding the vast differences in our trading set-up. Whereas in that country Soviet purchases and sales abroad are made by state trading organizations, our trading, as I have said, is carried on by private individuals. The agreement provides Canadian exporters with the opportunity of competing for sales to these trading organizations of the Soviet Government.

There are certain escape clauses comparable to those contained in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Is Russia a party to GATT?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am not sure. However, I will get definite information as to that and let my honourable friend know at the earliest opportunity.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What was the question?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Whether Russia was a party to GATT? As I said, I will get information and let honourable senators know.

I may say that I have spoken with the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) and he has kindly consented to adjourn this debate today, in order that some senators who are not here this afternoon but who might like to take part in the debate will have an opportunity of doing so at a later sitting.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Would the honourable leader say if there is any period within which this treaty must be ratified?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes. There is a provision in the agreement which says it must be ratified within 90 days from the date on which it was entered into, which was the 29th of February.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask my friend whether it is intended to refer this matter for consideration to a standing or special committee?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It had not been my intention to do so. If from discussion in the house it appears advisable, I shall be pleased to make the necessary motion.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is the treaty itself before us?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes. It was tabled here on the 29th of February, and appears as an appendix to our Hansard of that date.

I was saying that there are certain escape clauses in this agreement, comparable to those contained in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. There is a provision for the imposition of import restrictions in the event of balance of payment difficulties. The Canadian Government also reserves the right to establish values for export duty if any Russian products should enter Canada in sufficiently large quantities to cause serious injury to domestic producers. This provision, which is contained in a letter from the Canadian Government forming part of the agreement, is similar to the multilateral escape clause in GATT, and is also contained in our agreement with Japan.

The agreement, of course, will not affect our strategic export controls. Security interests are protected at all times and either Government may apply restrictions for that purpose. This provision would take precedence, if necessary, over any other provision of the agreement.

The agreement also touches on the treatment of merchant ships. It gives to the ships of the U.S.S.R. access to our seaports, under the same conditions as ships of other countries. This is no departure from the treatment which has been available to ships of U.S.S.R. registry all along.

The agreement contains provisions respecting the legal status of persons, access to courts and arbitration. There is nothing unusual in these conditions, and they are merely to assist traders and trading organizations in both countries. There is nothing in the agreement that might force Canadians to go before Russian courts rather than to Canadian courts. nor to force them to choose arbitration for the settlement of disputes. This particular agreement is substantially the same as those which we have with many other countries.

For some years we have had most-favoured-nation treaties with Poland and Czechoslovakia, which treaties still continue, notwithstanding the fact that these countries have been taken over by Communist governments. No difficulty has been experienced in implementing the treaties and they continue to be of value to our country. Similarly, there are a considerable number of trade agreements comparable to this one between the Soviet Union and other western countries, including the United Kingdom, France, Italy, Austria and the Scandinavian countries. Although the United States does not have such a treaty at present, the administration is now seeking congressional authority to dispose of surplus agricultural products to the Soviet Union.

It is in this field that we are going to enjoy the greatest advantage as a result of the trade agreement. For some time it has been widely known that the production of foodstuffs in Russia is far below that country's requirements. The living standards of the Russian people are much lower than those of the western world, and one of the fields in which we can develop our trade is the export of foodstuffs from our country to theirs. It is a great tribute to our way of life that, as our fishermen and farmers are free to note, the per capita production in Canada far exceeds that in Russia, where it is state controlled. Here we have a country, with a population of less than 16 million, not only producing food for its own people but able to export foodstuffs to Russia, a country of 225 million people with even greater resources than ours.

This agreement should, therefore, be of great value to our western farmers, for under it the U.S.S.R. guarantees to purchase and take delivery from Canada, during the three years of the agreement, a total of between 44·1 million bushels and 55·1 million bushels of wheat, in annual lots of between 14·7 million bushels and 18·4 million bushels. The exact amounts to be purchased in the second and third years will be determined by the Government of the U.S.S.R., taking into account the volume of Soviet goods sold to Canada. The total for the three years, however, is guaranteed to be not less than 1,200,000 tons and the amount in any individual year will not be less than 400,000 tons. The Russian purchases of wheat are to be made at the prices and on the terms at which the Canadian Wheat Board is making sales to its major customers at such times as the Soviet purchases take place. Already the U.S.S.R. has purchased more than 400,000 tons for delivery this year. Although the agreement is to terminate at the end of three years, the two Governments could agree to extend it at that time, depending on the experiences during that period.

As I said, this will be of great value to our country, and I am sure it will be agreed that neither our political nor economic interests will suffer thereby. We are not, for example, putting ourselves into a position which would make us unduly dependent on the Soviet market for our wheat. That would be a very dangerous thing to do; and it would create uneasiness if this market were too large in proportion to our total sales. As I have already pointed out, our commitment in any one year amounts to between 15 and 18 million bushels, which compares with our exports to Belgium or to the Federal Republic of Germany. We shipped 31 million bushels to Japan last year.

We must develop our trade lines in every possible direction and into any market that develops; safeguarding, of course, above and beyond anything else, our national interests, and avoiding export of any strategic material. We are not giving to the U.S.S.R. anything which we have not already given to many other countries, and this agreement will be of immense value to us, particularly in disposing of surplus wheat. For the Russians it is also a good business deal, because it is much cheaper to ship wheat across the Pacific to the far eastern part of their country than to transport it overland from the wheat-growing areas in Western Russia.

While the emphasis is on wheat, the agreement may encourage the development of more trade with the U.S.S.R. in non-strategic goods which that country needs. Our countries unfortunately produce many of the same types of commodities, and the market for Canadian goods in Russia may be somewhat limited. However, the agreement opens a door to new trade channels through which many of our exporters may wish to pass and take advantage of this new development. I think it will be of mutual benefit to both countries and I trust it will find approval with all members of this house.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: What are the chief commodities that Canada would purchase from Russia?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The trade has not developed as yet, but there will doubtless be some trade in furs, and possibly some in certain forms of metal. This is for the future to determine. As I have said, Canada gives no undertaking to purchase any specific goods from Russia. The only undertaking is on the part of Russia to purchase wheat from us, and she has given no undertaking to purchase any other form of goods. The agreement will be in effect for three years, during which time we will have an opportunity of observing the trade that develops. There are safeguards in this agreement, should trade develop unfavourably for Canada in any particular line of goods.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, before the debate is adjourned may I have the indulgence of the house for two or three minutes to make a few comments on the agreement before us? I do not rise at this time to oppose the agreement, for I do not feel that anyone could conscientiously oppose such an agreement. At the outset of his remarks the honourable leader said the fact that we are dealing with a country which has a different kind of political government than ours should be no reason for us to refuse to trade with them. If that were entirely the case I would let it go, but I think it should be forcefully pointed out to the people of Canada that it is not just a matter of different forms of political government. The Soviet Union would not like to see even a communistic system of government in Canada, unless Russia was in control of it. That country is out for world domination, and I think we should be practical and recognize that fact.

However, it is all to the good to have this trade between the two countries, particularly when we have a surplus of wheat. I would like to suggest that our overseas broadcasting service inform whatever listeners in Russia this service may have of our great sources of food supplies in Canada. It should broadcast to these people that Canada will be providing them with millions of bushels of wheat. I feel sure that if the shoe was on the other foot and Russia was supplying us with wheat, she would certainly tell the world about supplying this food commodity to a "decadent western nation".

We can take pride in our accomplishments but the ordinary people in Russia will never know what is being done. Reliable reports from well-known former Russian people are to the effect that Russia cannot feed her great population and so needs more food.

Honourable senators, I want to protest against one article which Canada is now importing from Russia. I thought there were enough alcoholics in this country, something like 100,000, but I am told that we are now importing vodka from Russia. If we are going to trade our good wheat for Russian vodka let's tell the people that we are forced to sell our wheat. In future our law enforcement authorities are going to have more difficulty in dealing with intoxicated motor car drivers, for it is said that when a person has become intoxicated with vodka it cannot be smelled on his breath. However, I would leave this problem to the legal authorities who will be prosecuting these cases.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Perhaps it could be tried out.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Well, I will not say that I would like to try it out. I might be able to find some honourable senators to form a committee and give it a test, but I would not be among them.

I was perturbed to hear that Canada, having 100,000 alcoholics, is importing vodka from Russia. If it is not, I think the honourable leader should contradict the statement. Of course, Russia will be delighted to supply vodka to us, so long as she is getting good wheat in return. Perhaps the overseas radio station in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia might broadcast to the Russian people the good news we have heard, and tell them we have such an abundance of wheat that we are not only able to sell it but to give it away. It might cause them to think that, after all, free countries like Canada are rather worth while.

Honourable senators, I have misgivings about Russia; that country will not be content unless and until it can get world control. The Soviet has never lost the hope of world domination. As I know from delegates, the Russian representatives at the United Nations, although they speak in nice terms, are nevertheless putting it all over us.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Referring to my friend's concern about the importation of vodka, it occurs to me that perhaps vodka might displace the beverage of his native land.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Well, I do not know of any better alcoholic beverage than that manufactured in Scotland.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: May I ask a question before the debate is adjourned? I would like the leader to explain briefly the general principle underlying the most-favoured-nations agreements.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There are, shall I say, three divisions of our tariff. The first is the general tariff. That rate applies to certain countries including Russia—at least, it did before she entered into this agreement. Secondly, there is a lower tariff that is granted to certain countries. That is done by agreement, and such countries give Canada the benefit of their lower tariff rates. That class of countries is known as the most-favoured-nation class. The third division is the British preferential tariff, which is lower again than the most-favoured-nation tariff.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: And it is reciprocal?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It is granted under a reciprocal arrangement, with specific reference to certain articles, all of which are mentioned in the agreement.

Prior to this agreement Russia came under the general list, but now in its dealings with Canada that country must get the same tariff consideration as any other country which is entitled to most-favoured-nation treatment. Commonwealth countries, however, come under the British preferential tariff.

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: It must give and get.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It must give and get, as my honourable friend has said.

Commonwealth countries come under the British preferential tariff.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Is the honourable leader in a position to state what class the United States comes under?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The United States comes under the most-favoured-nation agreement.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Then Russia would be on a par with the United States?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As far as tariff is concerned, yes.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: The honourable leader referred to shipping privileges under the treaty, and I think he said that we grant shipping privileges similar to those granted to other countries. Does he mean all other countries?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not think we discriminate against the ships of any country. It may be that we have an agreement with the United States concerning certain ports. However, I prefer not to make a statement on that at the present time. I will look into the matter and give the information to the house when I reply later on.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hackett, for Hon. Mr. Haig, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY—FIRST READING

Hon. James A. MacKinnon presented Bill Q-8, an Act respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: With leave, next sitting.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TELEVISION PICTURES OF WORKMEN LOADING PLANES FOR SHIPMENT TO EGYPT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). On March 14, before the Orders of the Day were proceeded with, I directed a question to the leader regarding C.B.C. television. My question has remained unanswered. The C.B.C. refused to answer, and I said there will be a showdown with them unless they do answer. It is almost five weeks since I first put the question, and I am wondering if the honourable leader could obtain an answer.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am sorry I was not able to get in touch with the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) yesterday, but I gave the information then.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Thank you.

CANADA SHIPPING BILL

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Farris for the second reading of Bill H-7, an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, it is not my intention, nor indeed am I competent at the moment, to review this bill in detail, as has been done by the honourable senators who have preceded me in the debate. I perhaps am unfortunate in that my father and grandfather were not captains of sea-going ships, as in the case of the honourable senator from Queens-Lunenburg (Hon. Mr. Kinley). Nor have I had the particular knowledge which was yesterday exhibited so acceptably by the honourable senator from Queens-Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Smith). I wish to congratulate him on his maiden speech; it was full of information, eloquently delivered, and showing that quality of the student and the man of affairs which means so much in this chamber.

So I have no intention of going through the details of the bill or of making a long speech at this time. There is, however, a most important and interesting subject in the bill which I would like to discuss, and perhaps I can give some information which would be useful on this and other occasions. I refer to Part VIIA of the bill, headed Oil Pollution, and the new section 495A, which reads:

> The Governor in Council may make regulations (a) to carry out and give effect to the provisions of the international convention for the prevention of pollution of the sea by oil, 1954, set out in the fourteenth schedule; . . .

That is to say, we are asked to give power to the executive to carry out the terms of a convention, treaty or agreement by order in council.

This section raises some interesting questions, which were discussed with great effect and wide knowledge by the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) when he explained the bill and moved the second reading.

I should like to discuss the question of treaty making, which comes before us not only in this bill but in other measures which we frequently have to deal with. For instance, earlier this afternoon we discussed a resolution for the ratification of a trade treaty. In the present bill we are dealing with a treaty made with a foreign state.

It is a curious thing, honourable senators, that the great legal authority in Canadian law on the matter of treaties was a judgment of the Privy Council, delivered before we abolished appeals to that body, on a case in the argument of which both the senator from Vancouver South and I took part. Shortly before the Government under the late Prime Minister Bennett went to the country, in 1935, it brought before Parliament a number of measures of doubtful constitutional validity. They were passed, and after the Liberal Government took office, these acts were referred first to the Supreme Court of Canada and later, on appeal, to the Privy Council. I think the leading appeal was by the Province of Ontario; at all events, Ontario led in the argument, because that province has, as honourable senators know, number one precedence.

I should like to refer to a judgment of the Privy Council which is reported in 1937 A.C., 326, intituled: the Attorney General for Canada, appellant, and the Attorney General for Ontario and others, respondents. That judgment settled the question with regard to treaties and how they should be handled by legislatures, and as well the position of the provinces in the matter of treaties.

May I point out that the matter is one of great antiquity. In England,—and in Canada we have the common law of England—treaties were made by the King without reference to Parliament, if any was in existence at the time. When a treaty was signed by the King, and the King was the last word in the making of the law and the law was the word of the King, the treaty was the law of the land. But, as constitutional developments took place, and the King was no longer able to make laws without the consent of Parliament, a new situation arose. The King was still in a position to make a foreign treaty, but if he wished to have it implemented by an alteration in the law of the land, the King had to come to Parliament for such legislation. There is no power in the English law, or in any of the countries having parliamentary procedure, for either the executive in the name of the King, or the King himself, to change the law of the land by entering into a treaty. If the executive or the monarch enters into a treaty with a foreign country which involves a change in the law, he takes the chance of being able to carry it out.

In the United States, a treaty to become effective must be ratified by a two-thirds majority of the Senate. When the executive in the United States enters into a foreign agreement, everyone concerned knows that it does not become law until it is so ratified by the Senate.

In our own country, when our executive enters into an agreement, such as the one which was placed before us earlier today, or the one at present before us, or scores of others which I might name, the parties know that any proposed changes in the law is subject to the will of Parliament, and that Parliament is not bound by agreements of that kind, but is perfectly free to pass or not to pass the legislation implementing the obligations set forth in the agreements. Furthermore, Parliament can revoke a law of the kind, or from time to time amend it, as it sees fit, without any violation of rights or good faith. That is the rule with which all diplomats are familiar.

The great authority on this question so far as Canada is concerned is the case to which I have already referred. In that case an agreement was entered into at Geneva by a number of countries with regard to the Weekly Rest in Industrial Undertakings Act, the Minimum Wages Act, and the Limitation of Hours of Work Act. These three acts, you will notice, are with respect to labour questions, and were passed by Parliament prior to the election of 1935 in order to implement the Government's treaty obligations.

The Privy Council decision of 1937 says:

> There was no existing constitutional ground for stretching the competence of the dominion Parliament so that it became enlarged to keep pace with enlarged functions of the dominion executive. If the new functions affected the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92 legislation to support the new functions was within the competence of the provincial legislatures only . . .

That is to say, honourable senators, the Dominion of Canada through its executive cannot enter into an agreement which changes the law set forth in section 92, which sets forth the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of our provinces. As the Privy Council put it:

> The dominion could not, merely by making promises to foreign countries, clothe itself with legislative authority inconsistent with the constitution which gave it birth.

And then again:

> Lastly, in totality of legislative powers, dominion and provincial together, Canada was fully equipped to legislate in performance of treaty obligations, but the legislative powers remained distributed, and if in the exercise of her new functions derived from her new international status Canada incurred obligations, they must, so far as legislation was concerned, when they dealt with provincial classes of subject, be dealt with by the totality of powers—by co-operation between the dominion and the provinces.

In the argument I spoke for the Province of Ontario and I was in a rather difficult position. I did not wish to oppose that labour legislation and I argued that the conventions were validly entered into and the enactment of legislation to perform the obligations was the function of the Parliament of Canada because, I argued, the legislation in question affected the general well-being of Canada and came within the overriding class of subjects in section 91. I did not argue it too strongly. I said I was not arguing that the dominion had the right to enter into an agreement affecting the provincial jurisdiction, but rather that the provincial jurisdiction was set aside because of the importance of the subject. I said that I was unfortunate in that I was called upon to deal with a bad principle in connection with a good measure.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Did you win?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, I am glad to say I did not.

The honourable senator from Vancouver South, who was Mr. Farris, K.C. at that time, representing British Columbia, would have none of it and he said, as reported at page 338 of the case:

> British Columbia also wishes to dissociate itself from the submissions of Ontario supporting the legislation on the ground that it is intra vires the dominion Parliament under the power conferred by s. 91 to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada.

That was his submission.

Lord Atkin delivered the judgment of the court, and I would like to call attention to what he said, at page 347:

> Within the British empire there is a well-established rule that the making of a treaty is an executive act, while the performance of its obligations, if they entail alteration of the existing domestic law, requires legislative action. Unlike some other countries, the stipulations of a treaty duly ratified do not within the empire, by virtue of the treaty alone, have the force of law.

That is a very important statement; it is fundamental common law and applies to Canada and all other self-governing dominions.

Hon. Mr. Reid: What year was that?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: 1937. Fairly recently. The judgment continued:

> If the national executive, the Government of the day, decide to incur the obligations of a treaty which involve alteration of law they have to run the risk of obtaining the assent of Parliament to the necessary statute or statutes. To make themselves as secure as possible they will often in such cases before final ratification seek to obtain from Parliament an expression of approval. But it has never been suggested, and it is not the law, that such an expression of approval operates as law . . .

Let us remember that.

We are asked by this bill to approve an agreement or convention for the prevention of the pollution of waters. Our expression of approval of the convention will not make it law. We have to pass it in the usual way if it is to be law.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask my friend a question, for the sake of clearness? I am not quite sure what he is objecting to, but I understood him to say this treaty does not come into effect until it is ratified. Is that it?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: An expression of approval by us will not pass a law to prevent pollution of waters.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Would ratification constitute the law as you have it in mind?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. Euler: On page 17 of the bill it is stated that the convention was signed for the Government of Canada by Alan Cumyn, "subject to ratification". That means subject to ratification by Canada. Is that not sufficient to satisfy the ideas of my honourable friend?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, I do not think so. I do not think mere ratification or approval of the treaty passes a law under which somebody may be prosecuted and fined for doing something denounced in the treaty.

Hon. Mr. Euler: What form would the law have to take?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It ought to be in an Act of Parliament. If we are going to subject our people to prohibitions, the enactment should be in form such as the Criminal Code or other such prohibiting statutes. We should not attempt to make convention into statutory law, and I will give the reasons later on.

I will continue reading the passage from the Privy Council's judgment, at the point where I digressed:

> But it has never been suggested, and it is not the law, that such an expression of approval operates as law, or that in law it precludes the assenting Parliament, or any subsequent Parliament, from refusing to give its sanction to any legislative proposals that may subsequently be brought before it. Parliament, no doubt, as the Chief Justice points out, has a constitutional control over the executive: But it cannot be disputed that the creation of the obligations undertaken in treaties and the assent to their form and quality are the function of the executive alone. Once they are created, while they bind the state as against the other contracting parties, Parliament may refuse to perform them and so leave the state in default.
> In a unitary state whose legislature possesses unlimited powers the problem is simple. Parliament will either fulfil or not treaty obligations imposed upon the state by its executive. The nature of the obligations does not affect the complete authority of the legislature to make them law if it so chooses. But in a state where the legislature does not possess absolute authority, in a federal state where legislative authority is limited by a constitutional document, or is divided up between different legislatures in accordance with the classes of subject-matter submitted for legislation, the problem is complex. The obligations imposed by treaty may have to be performed, if at all, by several legislatures; and the executive have the task of obtaining the legislative assent not of the one parliament to whom they may be responsible, but possibly of several parliaments to whom they stand in no direct relation. The question is not how is the obligation formed, that is the function of the executive; but how is the obligation to be performed; and that depends upon the authority of the competent legislature or legislatures.

Then their Lordships differentiate between the cases to which I referred, by saying that legislative subjects are taken out of section 92 and brought under the general powers of peace, order and good government only in very special circumstances; and they call attention to such phrases as "abnormal circumstances", "exceptional conditions", "standard of necessity", "some extraordinary peril to the national life of Canada", "highly exceptional", "epidemic of pestilence" and so on. Those phrases are worth carrying in our minds when we discuss that same question as to whether we have jurisdiction, by reason of "the general benefit of Canada". Their Lordships conclude the judgment with this statement:

> . . . if in the exercise of her new functions derived from her new international status Canada incurs obligations they must, as far as legislation be concerned, when they deal with provincial classes of subjects, be dealt with by the totality of powers; in other words, by co-operation between the dominion and the provinces. While the ship of state now sails on larger ventures and into foreign waters she still retains the watertight compartments which are an essential part of her original structure.

Now, turning to the subject in question in this bill, we find, in section 495A, that:

> The Government may make regulations
> (a) to carry out and give effect to the provisions of the International convention for the prevention of pollution of the sea by oil, 1954, set out in the fourteenth schedule;
>
> (b) for regulating and preventing the pollution by oil from ships of any inland, minor or other waters of Canada; and
> (c) prescribing a fine . . .

I think I have made it perfectly clear that Parliament is not under any obligation to honour any agreement which is entered into by the executive. We may do just as we please in that regard, and everyone knows that to be the fact.

I am opposed to one of the methods we sometimes employ, that of passing a bill ratifying a treaty and in that way making it the law of Canada. I object to that method for this reason: the phraseology of treaties, conventions and understandings is not the phraseology of legal documents—of bills and acts of Parliament. Treaties are usually the result of long negotiations, and in an endeavour to satisfy this party and that, and not with the sole object of stating in the clearest possible terms the law which it is expected the citizen will observe and follow. So I do not like legislation which simply ratifies a treaty and calls it law. Whenever we pass legislation in pursuance of a treaty entered into by the executive, we should implement the treaty in detail by act of Parliament.

I do not approve of the compromise of allowing the executive to implement the treaty by order in council. In view of the historic implications of this subject, I am of the opinion that we should not pass this particular bill in that form. The honourable senator from Vancouver South is by no means strongly favourable to the course followed in the bill. I asked him some questions, and he suggested that I hold them over until we go into committee. Seemingly he was not strongly favourable to the passing of a bill which gives the executive power to carry out an executive agreement. That is a function we in Parliament should reserve for ourselves, with the right at any time to change the law which we pass.

I thought it worth while to make these remarks because of the nature of this subject-matter. It is so important, when we are dealing with treaties, to understand the fundamental law upon which we act, for we must preserve the rights of Parliament at all times. It is all right to give approval to the general principle of a treaty, but when it comes to enacting the detail and making it the law of the land, we should insist, I believe, that this be done by Parliament, not by the executive. The executive has gone far enough when it enters into such an agreement without taking to itself the making of the law to carry out the treaty obligations.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

SENATE RULES

NEW RULE AUTHORIZING DIVORCE COMMITTEE TO DIRECT EVIDENCE OF OFFENCE TO LAW-ENFORCEMENT AGENCY

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 22, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck:

That the Rules of the Senate of Canada be amended by inserting therein immediately after Rule 143 a new Rule 143A as follows:

"143A. The Standing Committee on Divorce, whenever in its opinion there has been disclosed in any evidence given before it or any of its sub-committees an offence against the Criminal Code of Canada or the violation of any other law in force in Canada, may direct that such evidence, or a part thereof, be drawn to the attention of such law-enforcement or other agency in Canada as the Senate Committee may deem appropriate, for such action as such agency may deem requisite."

and on the amendment the said motion proposed by Hon. Mr. Hackett:

That all the words after "attention of" in the proposed Rule 143A be struck out and the following words substituted therefor "the Minister of Justice, that he may act as he deems wise in the circumstances".

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, this matter was debated at some length prior to our adjournment for the Easter recess. However, it may be there are some in the house now who were not present at that time, and with your indulgence I should like to make a few comments about the general motion which is sought to be amended in the terms that you have just heard read.

First of all, what does the motion itself mean? Section 248(1) of the Criminal Code reads as follows:

A defamatory libel is matter published, without lawful justification or excuse, that is likely to injure the reputation of any person by exposing him to hatred, contempt or ridicule, or that is designed to insult the person of or concerning whom it is published.

So it will be observed that prima facie were the Senate committee to send a report on a case to the crown attorney of a district or to the Attorney General of a province, or were it to take action with regard to some child of which it gets knowledge, or something of that nature, it would run the risk of committing a defamatory libel. I do not suppose, of course, the risk is very grave as far as we ourselves are concerned. This is not a great matter we are arguing now, but merely an attempt to make legal what we do in that regard.

According to section 249(c) of the Criminal Code a person publishes a libel when he:

Shows or delivers it, or causes it to be shown or delivered, with intent that it should be read or seen by the person whom it defames or by any other person.

Section 250 provides that:

Every one who publishes a defamatory libel that he knows is false is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years.

And section 251:

Every one who publishes a defamatory libel is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

There is this saving clause in section 256 (b):

No person shall be deemed to publish a defamatory libel by reason only that he

(b) publishes by order or under the authority of the Senate or House of Commons or of a legislature, a paper containing defamatory matter . . .

Observe the words "publishes by order or under the authority of the Senate or House of Commons or of a legislature".

Honourable senators, I am asking on behalf of my committee that we be given a certain authority so that a defamatory libel will not be committed by us. There are other provisions in the Code which will protect the members of the committee. We are not afraid, but none of us desire to be guilty of a criminal libel, even though we could avoid it by showing that it was published bona fide, with just cause and excuse. We do not want to be guilty of a criminal libel, and we should not be placed in this position.

Let me say that this matter was first brought to our attention by our Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel, who drafted the proposed new rule after consultation with other Senate officials. The matter was then thoroughly discussed with leading authorities in the Department of Justice. We feel the proposed new rule will give us the protection we require, and we would like to have it adopted. We would then send copies of it to the solicitors who practise before us, so they will know that if their clients are concocting false statements, fabricating evidence, or conspiring to mislead us, they had better look out. They will know we may refer the matter to the Crown Attorney of the district.

The amendment to the motion is to the effect that the committee should not have the right to refer evidence to a crown attorney or other law-enforcement agency, but only to the Minister of Justice. Well, I can say with a good deal of assurance that the Minister of Justice has no desire to be involved in trivialities of this kind. He has nothing to do with law enforcement. It has been argued that we can refer evidence of any offence to this house. In order to do that we must try the case first, and that is not our function. If perjury has been committed it is the responsibiilty of the crown attorney and the courts to deal with it; it is not our responsibility. We do not wish to refer it to the house prior to the proper authorities passing upon it, and we do not wish to refer it to the Minister of Justice, because he should not be asked to assume the responsibility.

It has been argued in connection with the amendment that we should proceed through the proper channels; that is to say, in communicating between governments we should adopt the usual protocol. However, this is not a communication between governments. The Province of Ontario provides a service in the crown attorney who administers not a provincial but a dominion act. The various provinces provide many services; for instance, Ontario provides a railway service into the north. When we propose to use that service there is no communication between governments; there is merely the use of a service. Schools are a municipal service. If it were imaginable that the committee had a child to send to school, the committee would not go through the Secretary of State. It would send the child to a school. Putting it on the other foot, the Dominion of Canada provides many services for its people, such as the post office service. A person in the government of a province proposing to make use of the dominion postal service would not go through the Secretary of State or the Solicitor General to buy a postage stamp. He would simply use the post office service. That is all. The office of the crown attorney is a service that anyone may use. I do not have to ask permission of this house to go to the crown attorney or the Attorney General. I can supply either with any information I desire and nobody can stop me from doing so. It is my right of common law as well as statutory law. But I do not want to place myself in the position—even though I do so without great risk—of having committed a defamatory libel which is contrary to the Criminal Code.

I am sure nobody desires the members of the committee to be embarrassed in the carrying on of their work, or that they should not have the greatest of freedom in protecting themselves against perjury, the fabrication of evidence, or other shenanigans of that kind. We should be very strict about it, and when there are indications of wrong-doing of that nature we should be quite free to hand over the responsibility to the official who is appointed for the purpose, and let him bear the responsibility of whether there should be a prosecution or not.

I am opposed, therefore, to the limitation contained in the amendment. I will speak to the motion later.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, I happen to be a member of the Divorce Committee, and have been for years, although I have not attended regularly for the past two years because I asked to be excused from the committee—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You usually attend if your services are required.

Hon. Mr. Euler: If it is necessary, yes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) is far too modest, for he attends frequently, and always when he is asked to do so.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I attended for years.

There is a question I wish to ask. The proposed rule would authorize the committee itself to direct that evidence may be drawn to the attention of such law-enforcement or other agency in Canada as the Senate committee may deem appropriate. If the rule is not adopted and the committee so acted, would it make itself liable as a committee or would the members individually be liable?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I think the liability would be individual.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Even though perhaps a member of the committee was not present?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Oh, yes. Supposing we sent an officer to the crown attorney with evidence and asked him to read it—

Hon. Mr. Euler: Would you say that every one of the 25 members on the committee might be liable to a charge of criminal libel?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I am just asking for information.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The whole committee might be accused of conspiring with the officer whom they sent to the crown attorney to commit an offence against the Criminal Code, if they did that without the authority of the house.

Hon. Mr. Euler: As a matter of fact, I think they ought to hold the chairman liable, if anybody!

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Of course.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the question is on the amendment of the honourable Senator Hackett, seconded by the honourable Senator Haig:

That all the words after "attention of" in the proposed Rule 143A be struck out and the following words substituted therefor "the Minister of Justice, that he may act as he deems wise in the circumstances",

Those in favour of the amendment will please say "Content."

Some Hon. Senators: Content.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those against, "Non-content".

Some Hon. Senators: Non-content.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the Non-contents have it.

The question now is on the motion of the honourable Senator Roebuck, seconded by the honourable Senator Burchill:

That the Rules of the Senate of Canada be amended by inserting therein immediately after Rule 143 a new Rule 143A as follows:

"143A. The Standing Committee on Divorce, whenever in its opinion there has been disclosed in any evidence given before it or any of its sub-committees an offence against the Criminal Code of Canada or the violation of any other law in force in Canada, may direct that such evidence, or a part thereof, be drawn to the attention of such law-enforcement or other agency in Canada as the Senate Committee may deem appropriate, for such action as such agency may deem requisite."

Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have something to say. I have listened with a great deal of interest to this debate. In the first place, I must tell the honourable the Chairman of the Divorce Committee (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) that he has the admiration of the house for the splendid way in which he performs his exacting duties on the committee.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: The same can be said of his confrères—and there is no dissenting voice about it. The chairman has the satisfaction of having accomplished his duty in every case. That is the greatest satisfaction that a man can enjoy.

As the chairman knows and realizes, the Divorce Committee is a committee of this house, and acts only on the instruction of the house itself. After the members of the committee have performed their task they cannot report outside of the Senate; they report to the Senate itself, through the chairman. I have every sympathy for my honourable colleague, but if this rule were adopted it would be the first instance where a committee was asked to report to someone other than the house that has instituted it. I hope I make myself clear.

The proposal is the more extraordinary because the administration of justice in virtue of the Criminal Code does not belong to the Divorce Committee, does not belong to the Senate, does not belong to the Minister of Justice and does not belong to the Government of Canada; it belongs to the provincial government, it belongs to the Attorneys General of the provinces, in virtue of the Constitution itself. This is my second point. Therefore, although I have every sympathy for the members of the Divorce Committee, I am inclined to think that what they are asking now is in contradiction of the provisions of the Constitution itself.

I hope honourable senators will pardon my use of this valuable flashlight that I have in my hand. My sight is not very poor, but I want to be sure I can read what is on this paper.

Hon Mr. Reid: You are just throwing light on the subject?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Yes. The suggested new rule reads as follows:

143A. The Standing Committee on Divorce, whenever in its opinion there has been disclosed in any evidence given before it or any of its sub-committees an offence against the Criminal Code of Canada or the violation of any other law in force in Canada, may direct that such evidence, or a part thereof, be drawn to the attention of such law-enforcement or other agency in Canada as the Senate Committee may deem appropriate, for such action as such agency may deem requisite.

That is quite different from the provisions of the British North America Act itself. There may be violations of the Criminal Code or some other law by persons who appear before the Divorce Committee, but I wonder how the committee or any members of it could designate themselves to draw a matter to "the attention of such law-enforcement or other agency in Canada as the Senate Committee may deem appropriate". The members may be confronted with a shocking situation at times, but they have their recourse, which has not been used but which is in their hands, without any amendment of the rules. They can ask the Clerk of the Senate to put the names of the Attorney General of each of the 10 provinces of Canada on the mailing list for the evidence of the Divorce Committee. It is just as simple as sunlight at noon, except in this chamber.

If the honourable gentleman who has just spoken is ready to withdraw his proposed amendment to the rules, the Clerk of the Senate can be asked to put the names of the 10 provincial Attorneys General on the mailing list for the reports of the proceedings of the Divorce Committee, and they will be informed, just as well as it can be done, of what has occurred in the proceedings. It will be up to them to decide whether action should be taken, and against whom. The solution is just as clear, simple and practical as it can be.

There is one matter that I find hard to understand. I give credit to all those who served on the committee for the revision of the Criminal Code. They did their best to improve the functioning of the law and to make the provisions of the Code clearer, and they deserve credit for it. But, on the other hand, there is a wind of folly that goes around the world. It is the folly of human rights and fundamental freedoms. Everybody claims human rights and fundamental freedoms, without thinking of their own responsibilities; and there is the Civil Liberties League, which floods the country with pamphlets and articles of every description claiming liberty.

What has happened in this case? It is in order to give more liberty, freedom and human rights to scoundrels that the members of the Senate Divorce Committee are afraid of being arrested for libel and slander because of sending reports of the proceedings of their committee to a law-enforcement agency. It is unbelievable. But evidently it is on account of changes made in certain sections of the Criminal Code, changes due to the pressure of the Civil Liberties League and all the people who forget that those who have public duties to perform must have the right to act independently, as they have done since the time of King John.

There will be no libel and no slander against anyone if the Clerk of the Senate sends the reports of the proceedings of the Divorce Committee, which are printed by the Queen's Printer, to the various Attorneys General. Under that simple procedure the honourable chairman and the members of the committee would be relieved in knowing that they have no more responsibility with regard to the action to be taken against those who have violated the Criminal Code or any other law of the land. It will then be in the laps of the Attorneys General of the provinces, who must have in their offices an organization good enough to take cognizance of such important matters. The decision would be left to them who, by virtue of the Constitution, have the right to take whatever action they think necessary.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, my experience as a member of the Divorce Committee is relatively short, and I have not had the advantage of being trained in the law as have some of my honourable colleagues. But in the short time that I have had the opportunity of sitting as a member of the committee, the suggestion has been made on more than one occasion that some of the evidence submitted seemed to be of an improper order; in other words, that it might be fabricated. A number of us have been concerned about this situation.

The suggestion has been made in the public press, and has been bandied about in discussions with a view to discrediting this activity of the Senate, that after all the senators are being hoodwinked continuously with fabricated evidence.

Now, I for one would be very unhappy and would feel that I was wasting my time on the committee if we did not have some authority to initiate disciplinary action against people who are guilty of fabricating evidence. I am not competent to discuss the constitutional aspects of the question, but as a person who tries to bring honesty, integrity and common sense to discussion, I feel that what we are asking for in this amendment is not a tremendous thing. It is the kind of authority that should accrue to this committee under any circumstances. It seems to me that if this committee of the Senate is to continue to function as a Divorce Committee or court it must have all the authority necessary to assure it that proper standards of honesty and truth are observed by those who come before it.

This is something with which we are all concerned. As to the legal means of bringing about desired results, I would have to leave that to others more competent than I; but I feel very strongly that if we are not to have the kind of protection which I understand this resolution asks for, we have no business whatever to function as the Divorce Committee of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: If the honourable senator speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: If nobody else wishes to speak, perhaps I will say the few words I have to say. First of all, I wish to thank the honourable senator from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Pouliot) for the very kind remarks he has just made. He has been a great addition to our debating force and to the personnel of the Senate. I welcomed him when he came here; and I am pleased to have his friendship.

The honourable gentleman has raised two points. One is that we should send copies of the divorce evidence to the Attorneys General of the various provinces. Well, I think there is something to be said in favour of that, because it would certainly provide them with plenty of nice Sunday reading. I do not know how thankful they would be for the flow of copies, some 500 this session, I think.

Hon. Mr. Reid: They would not read them.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: They could not, even if they tried.

There is something else, however, more serious than that. It would require a change in the rules of the house to enable the Clerk to mail the evidence. The committee cannot instruct the officials of our house to do that, because they are faced with Rule 135, which reads:

> Evidence taken before the committee shall be printed apart from the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate, and only in sufficient numbers for the use of senators and members of the House of Commons, that is to say, one copy for distribution to each senator or member, 10 copies for the parties and their counsel, and 25 copies to be kept by the Clerk of the Senate for purposes of record and reference.

So far as the committee itself is concerned, we take the greatest of care, honourable senators, that these reports do not get into general circulation. I know we are not completely successful, but only this last session we had our officials write to all members of the House of Commons and to all senators asking them if they wished to receive these reports because we felt that they should not be kicked around in the offices of the members and used perhaps for salacious purposes. In any event, without going back to the Senate and asking for a change in the rules such as we are making now, we could not do what my honourable friend suggests, even if it were wise to do so.

Now the next point was that we should report, not to somebody else, but back to the Senate. I think that is a good point and it shows a fundamental grasp of Parliamentary procedure. The Senate Divorce Committee is a creature of this house and can only do what it is directed by this house to do, and its direction, as found in the rules, is to hear these cases and report back our recommendation to the house. Under the present rules our only recourse, in the circumstances I have described, is to report back to the house and then leave it to open debate and the record of the house. It is to remedy that very situation that this motion is before you. It proposes that the committee may direct that the evidence be drawn to the attention of the proper authorities. If the motion is passed, the commitee, which is the creature of the house, will get that power from the house.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Through the motion?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes. The motion, if passed, would give us authority to do the very thing that we are proposing to do, but we would retain our authority to report back to the house in any circumstances, if we so wished.

The motion was agreed to, and the rule was adopted.

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, earlier in the day the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) asked me about an inquiry that he had made concerning the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and I stated that I had answered it yesterday. Upon looking at yesterday's Hansard I do not find the answer to that question, but I see the answer to another one by my honourable friend. I am in further difficulty in that I cannot find on the Order Paper the inquiry to which my honourable friend refers.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It is in Hansard of March 14.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It was not a written question?

Hon. Mr. Reid: No.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I apologize to the honourable senator for saying I had answered the question. I will look it up in Hansard and obtain the answer as soon as possible.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 24, at 8 p.m.

ANSWER TO INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with may I refer to a question that was asked of me on March 14 by the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid). He brought to the attention of the house the fact that the C.B.C. television cameras had covered the loading at Halifax of nine Canadian Harvard training planes destined for Egypt, and he inquired:

In view of the serious situation in the Middle East, what specific purpose had the C.B.C. in mind for filming of such a controversial subject?

The answer is that the C.B.C. thought that this matter was of considerable public interest because it was being discussed at that time in the House of Commons.

PENAL REFORM

DISCUSSION CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, March 21, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Croll calling to the attention of the Senate the present position with respect to penal institutions in Canada and in particular discussing the need for further reforms in the Canadian penal system.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, I am very pleased indeed to have the opportunity of taking part in this debate, and I am glad that the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll) is present on this occasion, because I intend before I close my remarks to deal with certain statements contained in his speech of March 5. It is quite true that I was not present to hear it, but I have read it two or three times. In my opening remarks I want to put first of all the following statement on record:

The modern prison as we know it has been established only in the past 150 years. Between the twelfth and the twentieth centuries western "civilization", so-called, inflicted forty different kinds of torture on human beings, death being always in those times the ultimate aim in view. In 1780 there were in England 240 offences punishable by death, among them such trivial acts as fishing in the wrong stream, pickpocketing, prostitution and stealing bread. During the reign of Henry VIII some 72,000 persons were executed, and in the same period waves of unprecedented lawlessness occurred. In 1820 the number of capital offences had shrunk from 240 to 160, and history records that lawlessness had decreased proportionately. As late as 1847, fifteen offences carried the death penalty in the United States. There are now, of course, no galley slaves. The penalty of death by boiling, burning, branding or mutilation was abolished in the year 1790. In 1808 the British Parliament abolished the death penalty for pickpocketing because, it was stated, of the fact that at the festivities during the executions so many pickpockets picked so many pockets by way of protest against the execution of pickpockets.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Two years later, in 1810, the death sentence for prostitution was abolished, for, it has been said, a similar reason.

Even as late as 1947 there existed on the statute books of the 48 states to the south of us some fifteen offences carrying the death penalty. We have, however, progressed a long way in Canada and have put into effect many humane improvements. We may have to be careful, though, not to make a prison too desirable a place for certain classes of violators. Dr. George Stevenson, in commenting on this matter, has said that many drug addicts do not mind going to jail; indeed, that some welcome it because of the security it offers. He said that drug addicts are basically a happy people and some of them are glad to get away from the rat race of their street life and into prison with its security and good food.

I now come to the speech made by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina. Some of his statements were rather remarkable. He presented figures in comparing Canada's penal system with that of Great Britain. Well, figures can be misleading. Honourable senators who were members of last session's special committee on the traffic in narcotic drugs in Canada will recall that we had this same type of comparative figures thrown at us. Witnesses from Vancouver compared what was being done in Canada with what was being done in Great Britain in handling the traffic in drugs. They pointed out that Great Britain, with a population of some 45 million, had only 300 drug addicts; whereas Canada, with a population of from 15 to 16 million, had some 5,000. Even today some people around Vancouver are saying: "Why don't you use the British system in handling this drug problem? If you did, you might have only 300 addicts instead of 5,000."

Such statements are very misleading. If the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina had dug a little deeper when securing figures on convictions in Canada and Great Britain he would have found that a great number of the convictions registered in Canada were for infractions of motor vehicle acts, which are not what we consider to be really criminal offences.

At one point the honourable senator stated:

> To judge from the record, we have only barely heard of the probation system.

I cannot quite agree with that remark. To be fair I think he might have added that a committee appointed by the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Mr. Garson, has been studying this very problem. On January 20 the following question was put to Mr. Garson:

> Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Will the minister tell us when he expects to have the report of the Fauteux commission on correctional services which last July he hoped might be made in October, and will he lay on the table the documents containing the terms of reference of that commission?

May I say that the terms of reference of that committee are very wide. I have here the letter setting out its duties. The committee is quite a competent one. It has been sitting and carrying on its studies since 1953, and the other day the minister said he expected to have a report in two weeks.

The minister replied to the question as follows:

> I wish to thank my honourable friend for giving me notice of this question. So far as the presentation of the report is concerned, I was talking to Mr. Justice Fauteux recently, and I think that the best I can say, conservatively, at the present time . . . is that it will be made during the present session of Parliament.

I would remind honourable senators that that statement, made on January 20 of this year, fits in with the statement made the other day, that the report could be expected in two weeks.

The minister continued:

> With regard to the instructions, perhaps the quickest way to deal with that question is to read into the record my letter to Mr. Justice Fauteux, the chairman of the committee.

The letter, dated December 11, 1953, reads in part as follows:

> This will confirm the arrangement under which you have been good enough to undertake to act as a member of an informal committee established to investigate and report upon the principles and procedures followed in the remission service of the Department of Justice in connection with the exercise of clemency and to recommend what changes, if any, should be made in those principles and procedures.

I do not want to take time this evening to read the whole of the letter, but merely to point out that if one were to read the speech of the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina carefully he perhaps would not realize that Canada is really moving ahead in the remission service. I am very hopeful, and I am sure the honourable senator will be, too, that when that report is made our best hopes will be met in regard to certain transgressors who are incarcerated in some jail or penitentiary.

I would point out here that the Commons Hansard of March 20 contains tables dealing with tickets of leave granted in Canada from 1950 to 1955.

If the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina had been fair in putting the whole matter before us I think he could very well have explained to the house that in Canada one of the great difficulties arises from the fact that prisons are administered by provincial governments, while penitentiaries are administered by the federal Government. I think the honourable member mixed up prisons with penitentiaries. As far as the general public is concerned, when a man is in prison he is thought to be in the penitentiary, but honourable members of the Senate and the House of Commons realize that jails or prisons are provincial, while penitentiaries are federal institutions.

I have before me a copy of the Report of the Royal Commission to investigate the penal system of Canada, issued in 1938, and I think honourable senators would be interested in hearing what the report says on this very question. I am reading from page 339:

> Section 3 of the 1842 statutes is the earliest provision to be found fixing the two-year period as a dividing line. That statute was passed for the "better proportioning of punishment to the offence in certain cases, and for other purposes therein mentioned".

I would like to place the following statement also from the report on the record. I am reading from page 340:

> There is no doubt in the minds of your commissioners that uniformity of administration and the application of scientific principles to such administration, if made applicable to all those who are incarcerated in penal institutions in the dominion of Canada, would provide a better penal system and one to which the recommendations of your commissioners could be most fittingly applied. It is obvious, for example, that if different treatment than that recommended by your commissioners is given to the prisoners in provincial institutions, if classification and segregation are not uniformly instituted, if a different discipline is in effect, and the administration is not supervised by the same authorities, the success of the system recommended by your commissioners would be jeopardized, and the evils discerned in the antiquated treatment at present in existence would be permanently extended. The federal authorities would be handicapped in the proper treatment of those who come to federal institutions already stamped with the imprints of the multiple provincial institutions.

At that time there were 22 adult reformatories, 7 penitentiaries, and 118 county jails.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Are you reading from the Archambault report?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Yes. I think that in fairness this matter should be placed on the record. It is one thing to condemn what has been done, but when criticizing one should make sure to what the criticism is being directed. In a moment I am going to show the advance that has been made since 1932 in the treatment of prisoners in our penitentiaries.

I wonder how many honourable senators have visited penitentiaries. I have made it my special business or duty to visit them once or twice a year ever since I first entered Parliament, in 1930. I did so because I wanted to see what is going on, although I realize that one cannot see all that is going on in an institution by just walking through it. However, as one who is in public life and responsible to the people, I have always felt that it did something for the prisoners themselves to see their member of Parliament passing through. It showed that he had an interest in them, and it seemed to me that a little morale might be instilled by the visit. On any occasion when I have visited a penitentiary I have never warned the warden of my arrival, but have just dropped in. Last fall I had the pleasure of welcoming the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) to New Westminster and I had the honour and privilege of going through the penitentiary with him. I believe he travelled from Newfoundland, visiting the various penitentiaries from coast to coast. No doubt in this debate he will tell us something about what he saw.

There is, as I say, a distinction between prisons and penitentiaries, and to classify them all as one, as was done by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina, is not, in my opinion, exactly fair. In prisons in the province of Ontario perhaps some stern methods are used, but I am speaking of the penitentiaries, about which I know something.

The honourable senator spoke about a second volume of the Archambault report. I do not know just what he means by that. Since I first same to Ottawa it has seemed to me that it might be worth while for the Senate to look at some of the reports of past commissions, find out what they recommended, and ascertain how many of the recommendations have actually been carried out. Now I think I can safely say, without fear of successful contradiction, that many if not all of the recommendations contained in the Archambault report, which I hold in my hand, have been put into effect. There may be some not yet in effect, and if so I stand subject to correction.

I have already mentioned that the Senate last year appointed a special committee to look into the narcotic drug traffic in Canada. The committee wrote a report of which its members can, I think, be justly proud, and I shall have something more to say about it in a moment. My present point is that the Archambault report as it relates to drug addicts almost parallels the report of our special committee. It lays the problem directly before us, for as far as we know there has not so far been found a complete solution. The Archambault report says:

> It is simple to give these prisoners all the medical treatment they require. They are "weaned" from the drug in a short time, and almost invariably gain in weight and general physical condition during the period of their confinement. Although they are "weaned" as long as they are confined in prison and cannot get access to drugs, we can find no evidence that they are ever cured.

Perhaps our committee's report did not use exactly the same language, but certainly we expressed doubt as to how many addicts had been cured, including even those who were treated at that great institution at Lexington, Kentucky, which has been functioning for many years.

One further word about the report of the special committee, the issuance of which I consider was very timely. I suspected there was something wrong with police administration in Vancouver, and I know some of the members of the committee wondered why we were in a hurry to extend our sittings to that city. But our report helped to blow the lid off the drug or crime situation there, and coincided with an attempted suicide by a city policeman. True, the report was criticized by quite a number of persons, and even some newspapers were not too friendly, but in the light of what ultimately happened we can take pride that the work of the committee did contribute to cleaning up Vancouver. At least, I hope so.

Our report pinpointed the city of Vancouver, when we said that in our opinion the lack of police enforcement was one of the great causes for the large number of drug addicts in that area. That statement in the report resulted in increased activity in the apprehension of drug addicts around the city of Vancouver. I was telephoned and asked if I thought the reason for this activity was the report of the committee. I came right out and said that I knew of no reason other than the report, which blamed the lack of police enforcement for drug and crime conditions.

I had expectations that, as chairman of the special committee, I might be called before the commission investigating the police in Vancouver. In that investigation, as everyone knows, the main witness, Police Chief Mulligan, disappeared, and now the whole matter is left in some doubt. I lay some blame on the Attorney General of British Columbia for allowing the Chief of Police to get out of the province. Mr. Tupper, who presided over the investigation, should have had the chief placed under subpoena to prevent his leaving the province. It is hard to understand how a man who was under indictment for graft and corruption was able to procure a landing certificate to allow him entry into the United States. The American authorities are for the most part very careful about granting landing certificates. Yet this man, faced with many accusations of graft, was able to secure a landing certificate, and is now in the south enjoying his ill-gotten gains. There are still some divided opinions as to whether he was innocent or guilty. But, as I have always said, an honest man has nothing to fear: A really honest man can stand before the world and say, "Let them bring on all the inquiries they want to". The fact that Mr. Mulligan has fled to the United States lends credence to my belief, at least, that there was considerable guilt on his part.

Before I leave this matter of the report of the committee on drug traffic, I should like to place a few figures on the record. In 1954 there were 214 drug addicts, and in 1955 some 256 addicts. The increase in numbers followed our report having reached Vancouver. May I say to the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) that I hope before this session concludes he will be in a position to give us some assurance that the recommendations made by our committee will be carried into effect. As those of you who have read the report will have observed, we place certain phases of responsibility on the provincial governments and certain other aspects of it on the shoulders of the federal Government.

I understand the province of Ontario has already taken steps to put in a small treatment plant—I use that term in its widest sense—to take in, I think, some 15 or 16 drug addicts in an effort to find out if they really can be cured. From inquiries I have made of the federal authorities, they have no information as to what the province of British Columbia has done, if anything, by way of establishing a pilot institution for the treatment of drug addicts. I do warn the federal Government that we need heavier sentences, as proposed in our report.

Since coming east I was amazed to learn of an incident concerning a drug seizure in the city of Montreal, where a man was picked up for having in his possession 442 ounces of heroin, which represented 800,000 doses, valued it is said at $10 million. Yet, on his conviction, this man was given only five years' imprisonment. I think the Minister of Justice should take note that some judges, it would seem, do not have the intestinal fortitude—I could use stronger language—to give the sentences which the law or crime demands or requires. Such a convicted person should not be let off with less than fourteen years. It was said to me the other day that the provincial authorities of Quebec have challenged the sentence, and that something may be done about it. For my part, I say it is a scandal. I hope, as I have said, that the honourable Leader of the Government will be able to tell us during this session what the Government intends to do regarding the recommendations contained in our committee's report. I assure honourable senators that the report was made in all seriousness; a great deal of time and effort was spent on it, and it contains provisions which the federal Government could and should carry out.

I come back now to the speech by the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll)—I thought I had better get in my remarks about the drug committee before it was too late. He said, with regard to prison reform, that we are 50 years behind the times. That is a very strong statement. In fact, with respect to our federal penitentiaries, it is not correct; as to the provincial prisons or jails, we may agree to disagree.

The Archambault report of 1938, which I read from, made a large number of recommendations regarding prisoners and parole, and since that time many improvements have been carried out in the penitentiaries. I wish to cite one or two from my own knowledge. Up to 1932 prisoners in penitentiaries were put on what was called the silence file, which was pretty tough treatment. Canada is one of the nations, as I suppose all honourable senators know, which keeps prisoners singly in cells, and that is done for a reason; it is a much better system than that employed in the United States, where two or three are lodged in a cell. Before 1932 prisoners were not allowed to speak, they were paraded in single file to the penitentiary yard for half an hour, and if a man dared to speak to his neighbour either behind or before him he was severely reprimanded. That treatment began to disappear in 1932, and today, I think, the treatment accorded prisoners could hardly be criticized—at least not honestly, shall I say. One might criticize the fact that segregation has not reached the point it should have reached. In this respect, I was amazed by what the warden of a penitentiary told me—in effect it is a condemnation of the youth of today—that because of complaints received from the older prisoners they are separated from the younger men. The general public have the idea that younger prisoners should not be forced to associate with older ones in case the young ones should become contaminated, but now the older prisoners are complaining that they cannot stand the boldness and badness of the young ones. Of course, something further has to be done about segration, but what is being done is proceeding nicely. There is hardly a penitentiary you can visit now but you will find there that throughout the day, apart from their work, prisoners are allowed one to two hours' exercise together, when they can play volley ball, football, or other sport, or lie down on the grass, or walk around, speaking freely to one another. Absolute freedom prevails. The guards have no guns.

Now I wish to say a few words in regard to employment. Prisoners in penitentiaries are being taught trades. Some men are learning to be carpenters, some to be cabinet makers; some are learning plant engineering, others electrical work; and if they are confined for a reasonable length of time they leave prison fairly proficient in the trade they took up. However, I have one criticism to voice to the public, because after all the public have a responsibility, of which I want to speak of a little later. A man who has been in penitentiary for from four to ten years, and who has become thoroughly proficient in his trade, whether it be that of electrician, cabinet maker or draughtsman, for instance, is not given credit by the unions for the time he has spent in being trained in the penitentiary, as qualifying him for a journeyman. Now, if the public are to have nothing at all to do with released prisoners, but say to the Government, "They are entirely your responsibility", it is going to be a relatively hard task for any government to carry out. I met one man after his release—in fact just before I came here after the Easter recess—and he said to me: "What would you do, Senator Reid? I have been around ten plants looking for work. They asked me where I had been, where I had worked, and when I told them I was just out of the pen they said to me 'No job'." So it is extremely difficult for these men to become rehabilitated. You can talk about ticket of leave, and about doing everything for the men—or the women, for that matter—inside the penitentiary, yet when they are released after having paid their debt to society, what can be done for them if they are denied the right to honest work?

Hon. Mr. Hackett: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Did you come across any restrictions placed upon trades being plied in the penitentiaries? At one time boots and shoes were made for other civil servants, at another time binder twine was manufactured, but these activities were restricted and later stopped because the trades objected to continuation of them.

Hon. Mr. Reid: What the honourable senator has said is true. There was a time when these articles were made in the penitentiaries, but protests came from industry and the unions, to the effect that inmates of the penitentiaries should not be employed in making articles similar to those manufactured in industrial fields. I maintain that as the taxes paid by the public are maintaining these people in the penitentiaries, they surely should be allowed to make furniture and other supplies solely for Government institutions. At present penitentiary inmates are confined to making mail bags, and in the British Columbia provincial jail they make licence plates for motor cars. Governments right along have always been chary about running against the criticism of organized labour, which refers to penitentiary labour as cheap labour and state labour. That is the reason, I think, why the making of shoes and binder twine in penitentiaries, as mentioned by the honourable senator, has been stopped.

I come back to the many improvements that have been made in penitentiaries. While there is room for many more, still those that have so far been made have been a great advance. Most of these have been put into effect since General Gibson became Commissioner of Penitentiaries.

I happened to pick up an article by news reporter Stanley Handman—and I suppose all honourable senators have seen it—that appeared a short time ago in Weekend Magazine dealing with the penitentiary at Collin's Bay. I ask all honourable senators, and especially the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina (Hon. Mr. Croll), to read that article. It contains a splendid account of the treatment given to the prisoners within the penitentiary at Collin's Bay. The other day the Minister of Justice intimated that the Government is building a model farm a few miles out from Kingston and that Kingston Penitentiary is going to be reserved for incorrigibles, where they will be treated. I have long held, since I began to make visits to the penitentiaries, that perhaps not more than 10 per cent, if that many, of the inmates of our penitentiaries require armed-guard supervision. Of course, there is a hard core of incorrigibles who will have to be kept under close custody. We have built our institutions of solid concrete and masonry, and at the four corners of the establishments you will find a guard with a rifle, and guards with rifles at certain other spots. I maintain that many men could be left to work in the fields and kept industrious without the presence of any armed guards.

I do object, however, though I give this only as a personal view, to an article which appeared in a Kingston Penitentiary publication; and I am glad that the honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies) is present to hear this:

> One of Kingston Penitentiary's inmates, masquerading under the pen name of "Schlemiel", set down a few pointers on bank robbing in the latest issue of The K.P. Telescope.

He there outlines in great detail how to go about holding up a bank. For instance he tells them "never to use their finger stuck in their pocket—a gun is best".

Hon. Mr. Hayden: How to rob a bank unsuccessfully—in his case.

Hon. Mr. Reid: But he was unsuccessful only once.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Anyway, he is an authority.

Hon. Mr. Reid: While the article makes interesting reading, and would not of course tend to corrupt any honourable senator or member of Parliament, it might influence someone, because the procedure is all laid down in some detail. Although I never held up a bank, after I read that article it gave me a good knowledge of how to do so if one felt like it.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: The paper would not be circulated outside the penitentiary, would it?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Yes; I believe copies are sent out to friends of inmates.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is not the article a travesty? Is it not just a joke? I think I read it some time ago. It is not seriously stated, nor does it profess or appear to be serious.

Hon. Mr. Reid: The honourable senator may be right, but I took the story rather seriously, for the information, whether given by way of a joke or not, appeared pretty fully as a news item. We, of course, might take it as a travesty or a joke, but the case might be different if it fell into the hands of certain persons—

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Senators!

Hon. Mr. Reid: Perhaps youthful senators—if such there be. It might give them ideas.

Hon. Mr. Davies: I should like to ask the honourable senator whether this article appeared anywhere except in the penitentiary paper itself. Was it copied in papers outside?

Hon. Mr. Reid: What I have read is a press item, circulated by the British United Press.

Hon. Mr. Euler: What paper did it appear in?

Hon. Mr. Reid: It was circulated right across Canada. I think it appeared first in the Ottawa Citizen.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: It appeared simultaneously in a good many papers. Other honourable senators, no doubt, have read it.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I took it as a news item coming from the east.

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: You are right.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I thought I was right in taking it seriously when I read it, and it occurred to me at the time that if the warden of the penitentiaries had passed it he should look at such articles more carefully, because they could do harm. That, however, is my own view. On the same principle, the committee on the drug traffic took the stand that information as to how to use narcotics should be withheld from children.

But, returning to the matter of rehabilitation: at the Collin's Bay Penitentiary, it is said, the prisoners are happy in learning useful occupations. What is troubling them, however, is the fact that the public generally might not want them to work at the trades they have learned.

This supports the statement I made a few minutes ago that a man who learns a trade and becomes very proficient has difficulty, upon his release, in making a living at it, because the unions take note of where he obtained his training. From information I have, there are some wonderfully efficient teachers of trades in our penitentiaries.

The honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina remarked that no one was born a criminal. Of course not; and not all are born good. From time immemorial there have been bad as well as good parents, and no doubt heredity is an important factor. Dr. Alvarez, an emeritus consultant in medicine, has said that many psychiatrists follow the fad of never taking heredity into consideration. To those who pin all their faith to psychiatry, let me quote Dr. Alexander Paterson, the British expert who put into effect the Borstal system, remodelled British prisons and received a knighthood for his services: He says:

> There is a mistaken tendency to regard the study of human conduct as an exact science, to describe and define with too great a facility and accuracy subject matter that is incapable of such exactitude. This leads to the illusion that when every offender has after examination been relegated to a type, a problem has been solved, and the task of dealing with him will be made easier because a phase has been discovered to explain his guilt.

Dr. Elliott Emmanuel, of McGill, writing in The Canadian Medical Journal, blames psychiatrists for overselling their specialty, and advises them to modify their claims based on grandiose fantasies of reforming the world. There is a tendency today to put members of this profession on a high pedestal and to assume that their methods will solve most of our social ills. They may help, but I repeat that, in my opinion, the heredity factor must be taken into account. Bear in mind that some men and women are incorrigible: they cannot be reformed. In my opinion there are two classes of criminals. In one class are those who have made up their minds that they will not work and that the holding up of banks or other forms of robbery will be their means of livelihood. This class poses a very serious problem. There is another kind of criminal, which may be said to have fallen by the wayside and will profit by being allowed out on probation. For instance, there is the man who, in a moment of weakness, perhaps when he is "up against it", has embezzled funds. To keep such an offender in jail for five to ten years may do him great injustice, for he cannot be classed with those who, in Canada and elsewhere, have resolved to live by thuggery or the exercise of their wits.

Juvenile delinquency is one of our great problems; it is also a problem in Russia, and from much the same cause. I am told that because of the large number of women who are required to work in industrial plants, children are allowed to run loose. Delinquency is, of course, no new problem. The ancients knew how to control it; and when I quote a passage from their recorded wisdom I can expect to have a number of letters from those slobbering sentimentalists who, perhaps by way of covering up their own weaknesses or sins, affect to think that the day of the strap has gone. Let me cite Holy Writ. First may I say without fear of successful contradiction that, to my mind, the human race has not changed a particle during the past five thousand years. It has the same weaknesses and strengths, faults and virtues. Oh, people now have cars and airplanes and all kinds of electrical gadgets, and are living a fast life, but they themselves have not changed. I say to those slobbering sentimentalists who decry punishment for disobedient children that if they ever go to church they should think about what the Bible says, in the Book of Proverbs, chapter 19, verse 18:

> Chasten thy son while there is yet hope, and let not thy soul spare for his crying.

And in chapter 13, verse 24:

> He that spareth his rod hateth his son: but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes.

It is often put in another way: "Spare the rod and spoil the child" .

This sort of teaching has been taken away from our schools. I expect to receive letters from people telling me that I am a barbarian and that I talk as though I were living in the Dark Ages. Well, I stand by what I have said. Human beings are just the same as they always were, and if you do not discipline them when they are young you cannot expect to cure them when they reach the age of fourteen and fifteen. That is far too late.

Honourable senators, I am going to close with a quotation from Sir Alexander Paterson's book on prisons. Sir Alexander was an outstanding authority on prisoners and prison reform. He said:

> In order to afford anything in the nature of permanent protection, either the prison must keep the offender within its walls for the term of his natural life, or it must bring such influence to bear upon him while in custody that he will, on the day of his discharge, be an honest, hard-working and self-controlled man, fit for freedom and no longer an enemy of society. Public opinion still revolts from the idea of life-long imprisonment, save in exceptional cases. It is a sentence of living death, beside which a speedy end on the scaffold would usually be a more merciful alternative. It remains, therefore, the duty of a prison administration to secure permanent protection for society by the reformation of the offender. Can the murderer of thirty be taught in the course of years to control his temper? The answer is a hopeful affirmative. Can the middle-aged thief, who has avoided prison for fifteen years and has now been laid by the heels for the first time, or the hardened failure of all the reformatory and training schools be trained for the humdrum life of an honest labourer by a long period of imprisonment? The answer is less hopeful. But whether the prospect is hopeful or not, common sense suggests that if the prison administration is designed to protect society against its dangerous and mischievous elements, its first duty, after securing the safe custody of the offender, is to ensure at least that a man or a woman on emerging from prison is not more depraved than when he entered it. Within his cell he may degrade himself, within the walls he may be degraded by others. Prison can so easily become an unhealthy little cesspool. It is unnatural that men should live apart from women and children, unnatural that they should be solitary for so many hours in so small a space, that their movements should be so confined and their daily doings so minutely routined.

Incidentally, the latest custom in the New Westminster Penitentiary is to allow the inmates to do handicraft work and attend night schools in the penitentiary.

Sir Alexander continues:

> In such an artificial surrounding it is difficult for men to develop or retain a normal social habit and attitude of mind. They may well become more hardened and anti-social, and return to the freedom that must come some day firmly pledged to prey rather than co-operate.

That word is prey, not pray. Perhaps they do not pray very much.

> In some well-ordered prisons a more insidious process operates. The man who comes in as a criminal is made into a prisoner. All initiative and self-reliance are lost, obeying every order given him he comes in time to wait for an order. He develops a desire to please, which makes him furtive and sycophantic. In the external show of order and cleanliness his conduct is model, but in the inner things that matter he may be at heart still a thief and a waster, actually more useless and dangerous because he has cloaked dishonesty with the paint and plaster of a well-behaved inmate of an institution.
> Furthermore, prison may well do an infinity of harm to the casual beginner in crime by forcing him day by day into an association he cannot escape with men whose very speech at times is vile. It will not be long before he learns their slang, adopts their scale of values, and is infected with their attitude towards authority within and society without the walls. Once he is accepted as a member of a gang, only a miracle will regain him from their clutches.
> The prison administration, therefore, that hopes to reform its criminals, has to start well "behind scratch"; it has a great deal to do before it can be reasonably sure that by the ordinary operation of cause and effect its men are not growing steadily worse every month they spend in prison. To counter the natural consequences of imprisonment, the administration must insist upon as close a classification as is humanly possible. Ideally it should be the case that no man meets in a prison any other more depraved than he is himself. Separation by sex is axiomatic, separation by age is nearly everywhere made in civilized countries, but the importance of separation by degree of criminality is not yet sufficiently recognized by the prison administrations of the world.

Honourable senators, in conclusion I have one more statement by Sir Alexander Paterson, which it is just as well to remember: Man is not primarily sent to prison in order to be reformed. Were that the case the court might send there numbers of wealthy and important citizens in need of such training.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Davies, the debate was adjourned.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill 214, an Act to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the act which this bill purports to amend was passed in 1949 and came into effect on the 10th day of December of that year. The act originally provided for the completion of the highway within seven years. In other words, the act expires on December 9, 1956. The proposed amendment would extend the period for completion of the highway from seven to eleven years, that is to December 31, 1960. The road is well under construction and is being built by all the provinces except Quebec under a federal-provincial agreement. The federal Government is not invading provincial jurisdiction, and the road is considered to be the direct concern of the provincial governments. I might point out that each province is building that part of the Trans-Canada Highway which runs through its boundaries, which part will remain the property of and be maintained by the province. The highway is to conform to standards of construction mutually agreed upon by the provinces and the dominion Government.

The original act and agreements provided that the federal Government would make contributions of 50 per cent of the construction costs over a seven-year period and pay one-half of the cost of a highway constructed prior to that date which could qualify for inclusion in the Trans-Canada Highway. I should point out that this was not to be one-half of the actual construction costs but one-half of the fair value of the expenditure made on that part incorporated into the highway. As honourable members will understand, it has required a lot of negotiation between the federal and provincial governments to determine that value. Incidentally, the agreements being entered into now to take effect from the end of this year do not provide for any further payments for highway that was constructed prior to 1949. All the provinces have agreed to this.

Under the federal-provincial agreement provisions were made respecting terms and conditions for inviting tenders and determining routes. Each province suggested the route through its boundaries and the federal Government either agreed or disagreed with it. There are also provisions respecting standards and inspection.

Honourable senators will be interested to learn that the length of the highway through the nine provinces which have entered into the agreement is to be 4,497 miles, together with 83 miles in the national park, making the total length 4,580 miles. Up to date, 2,850 miles have been paved, but the equivalent of only 1,600 miles, or 35 per cent, has been constructed to Trans-Canada standards. Approximately 1,545 miles of the highway are unpaved, although some work has probably been done on it, and there are gaps totalling 185 miles on which no work of any kind has been done.

I have a table which shows the breakdown by provinces of the length of the highway, together with the distances now paved, the equivalent mileages that have been built to Trans-Canada highway standards and the distances for which there is no road of any kind. With permission of the house I should like to place this table on Hansard instead of reading it.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: To what province does the table refer?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: To all the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: What about the 185 miles?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The gaps on which no work of any kind has been done are in only two provinces: Newfoundland, 50 miles, and Ontario, 135 miles.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Is that mileage in the western part of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I understand it is in northern Ontario.

I indicated earlier that the estimated cost of the original highway was $300 million, of which the federal Government would be required to pay $150 million.

Hon. Mr. Haig: If my honourable friend would read out those distances, which are short, it would help us, because they are very important.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: To make myself clear, I will go back to my statement that there are 185 miles on which no work has been done. In Newfoundland the length of the highway is 610 miles. Of that mileage, 70 miles have now been paved and 216 miles have been graded according to Trans-Canada Highway standards. There are 50 miles on which no work at all has been done so far. Do honourable senators wish me to read the figures as to all the provinces? If not, may I now place them on the record? The figures can be explained and elaborated on in committee.

—	Length of highway	Distances now paved	Equivalent mileages built to trans-Canada highway standards		Distances with no road of any kind
			Grading	Paving
	miles	miles	miles	miles	miles
Newfoundland	610	70	216	—	50
Prince Edward Island	74	55	55	52	—
Nova Scotia	310	268	33	19	—
New Brunswick	388	370	67	60	—
Ontario	1,412	781	417	351	135
Manitoba	305	231	152	154	—
Saskatchewan	414	330	367	305	—
Alberta	292	242	214	196	—
British Columbia	692	497	204	177	—
Totals	4,497	2,844	1,725*	1,316*	185

* Note.—The equivalent of approximately 1,600 miles constructed.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask a question? What is the nature of the pavement, grading and so on?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have a copy of the original agreement which I could table or, if honourable senators prefer, I could have it made an appendix to today's Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Euler: In the general sense, is it a hard-top pavement?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, hard top.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Not concrete?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: This is a rather long and somewhat technical agreement. Perhaps I should place it on Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes, have it published as an appendix.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: For your information, honourable senators, this is the original agreement under the Trans-Canada Highway Act, 1949, between the Government of Canada and the Government of the province in each case. The agreements with every province is the same.

See appendix to today's Hansard, pp. 418-23.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: Is it your intention to move that the bill be referred to a committee?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think honourable senators would like to have an opportunity to discuss it in committee.

May I refer back to a question asked by the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler)? I now find that the provisions with regard to construction of highway calls for a 24-foot pavement of either concrete or asphalt.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Is the width uniform throughout the various provinces?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, the width is uniform. In addition there is to be a 10-foot shoulder.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Does the agreement recite anything about the base of the road?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, it is in the agreement itself, which I have now handed over to Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Do the standards require a 10-foot shoulder on each side of the pavement?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, on each side.

From what I have said, I think it will be obvious to honourable senators that the Trans-Canada Highway will not be completed by the end of 1956. Among the reasons given for the delay were lack of engineers, and the encountering of unfavourable weather conditions that were not anticipated when the period in which the road was to be built was set at seven years. It must also be recalled that the Korean War interfered to some extent by causing a labour shortage, and that certain physical obstacles were more serious than had been expected.

I should also say that some provinces have proceeded with their local highway work rather than construction of the Trans-Canada Highway.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Who has the say as to which project is to take precedence?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Under the original agreement all work on the Trans-Canada Highway was to have been completed by the end of the current year.

Hon. Mr. Euler: But who takes the initiative as to what work is to be done, the provincial or the federal authorities?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The provincial authorities.

Hon. Mr. Euler: So if the authorities in a particular province had not chosen to proceed with the Trans-Canada Highway work, there might not have been anything done on the highway in that province?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: But that is not the case.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is not the case. The nine provinces have done quite well. It is quite understandable that some provinces would feel it necessary to serve first the areas adjoining big cities to and from which people have to travel in the course of their work. And if in certain rural districts there were very bad roads the province concerned might feel it was more necessary to spend its money there than on the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway. It is for reasons such as these that the provinces did not complete their work. One might say that in no province does the gap exceed 10 per cent of the total mileage of the road within the province's boundary. The federal Government's aim is to encourage the provinces to close up these gaps as soon as possible, so that people will be able to travel across Canada on a paved highway; and although there is no suggestion that we should depart from agreed standards it is considered advisable that a through highway should be in existence, even if not every mile of it measures up to those standards.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: But the intention is that it shall measure up finally, I presume?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: This agreement will expire at the end of 1960. Any province which by that time has a highway without gaps going through it as part of the Trans-Canada Highway and on which all the new construction accords with Trans-Canada Highway standards will receive the benefits of this bill.

As to what will happen after 1960 I cannot say. This bill would extend the period of time for completing the highway from December 9, 1956, to December 31, 1960, with five months additional for the purpose of receiving accounts and so forth. The work, however, must be completed by 1960.

Now, honourable senators, a very interesting feature of this bill is that it provides an increased contribution to the province for highway construction, the higher payments being limited to 10 per cent of the provincial mileage. The formula is that the federal Government will pay not only 50 per cent of the cost of the construction of the highway, but an additional 40 per cent, that is a total of 90 per cent, of the cost of a portion of the highway limited to 10 per cent of the total provincial mileage. On this basis the federal Government will pay 90 per cent of the cost of approximately 449 miles of highway. The mileage on which the various provinces will be paid 90 per cent of the cost is as follows:

Newfoundland	61 miles
Prince Edward Island	7 miles
Nova Scotia	31 miles
New Brunswick	39 miles
Ontario	141 miles
Manitoba	31 miles
Saskatchewan	41 miles
Alberta	39 miles
British Columbia	69 miles

Hon. Mr. Euler: Will the federal Government share in the maintenance of the highway?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The federal Government will not share in the maintenance once the highway is built. It must be maintained by the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Before the honourable gentleman proceeds further would he permit a question? He stated that the total mileage of the proposed Trans-Canada Highway is 4,580 miles, less short gaps in two provinces, Newfoundland and Ontario. May I be told if any mileage in the province of Quebec is included in the total mileage of 4,580?

Mr. Macdonald: No, mileage in Quebec is included. The total comprises the mileage given in proposals submitted by the provinces, and as Quebec has submitted no proposal there is no mileage included for that province.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: No payment has been made to the province of Quebec for roads it has constructed across that province?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No payment has been made to Quebec under an agreement with that province pursuant to the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: When did the Trans-Canada Highway first come into existence?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In December of 1949.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What is the distinguishing principle by which 90 per cent of the cost rather than 50 per cent is paid by the federal Government?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There are certain sections of any highway which are probably more costly to build than other sections, and in order to encourage a provincial Government to complete the highway across those gaps the bill provides that the federal Government will pay 90 per cent of the cost. Of course, that is limited to a comparatively small mileage. Selection of a section to which the 90 per cent formula will apply must be approved by the federal Government, and each section must be at least five miles in length. There might be a very short section of a highway which has not been built because, let us say, a bridge is required in that section; and if this five-mile provision were not in the bill the federal Government would be called upon to pay for the cost of building the bridge. The provision of a five-mile limitation is made so that there will not be gaps over portions of the highway difficult or costly to build.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: Can the honourable gentleman state why the limit is set at five miles?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That was considered to be a reasonable length. It could have been seven miles or three miles, but the provinces, sitting in conference with the dominion Government, were prepared to accept the five-mile proposal.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: Can the honourable leader tell us if bridges will be taken into account in the cost of constructing these gaps —bridges costing as much as $3 million and even more?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Bridges come into the cost of the construction of the highway, but the form of the bridges and the nature of their construction must be approved by the federal Government.

The provincial Government concerned will be responsible for the construction of portions in respect of which they get 90 per cent, in the same way as for other parts of the highway, and this provision will remain in effect until December 31, 1960. In order to take advantage of this formula of increase, the provincial Government must agree that its section of the route will be completed by that date, which is also the date of expiration of the present measure.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Are progress payments made or must the work be completed before anything is paid?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Progress payments are made. Later on I propose to put in a table showing what payments have been made.

I indicated earlier that in 1949, when the Trans-Canada Highway Act was passed, the estimated cost of the highway was $300 million, of which the federal Government was to be required to pay $150 million. As of April 14, 1956, the nine participating provinces had awarded contracts totalling $227,231,-474.85 for construction work. Of this amount the federal Government's share was $113,615,-737.43, and up to April 24 it had paid claims in the total of $78,934,163.95.

The honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) asked me about progress payments. I have a table which, with the consent of the house, I should like to place on Hansard. It shows the total commitment in respect of each province, and the claims paid.

Province	Total commitment	Claims paid
Newfoundland	$19,797,411.05	$ 7,343,009.96
Prince Edward Island	5,126,620.24	1,625,910.87
Nova Scotia	4,780,615.00	309,903.60
New Brunswick	9,533,934.14	3,577,757.77
Ontario	76,146,801.70	22,785,104.94
Manitoba	18,466,371.91	6,820,576.17
Saskatchewan	21,336,039.85	9,008,746.43
Alberta	25,307,306.93	10,029,209.42
British Columbia	46,736,374.03	17,433,944.79

There are always claims outstanding, because some have not been put in, and in other instances contracts have been made but the work has not been completed.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Has the federal Government any say with regard to the letting of contracts, or is that done entirely by the provinces?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The provincial Government lets the contract. Although the contract is exhibited to and must be approved by the federal Government, it is the provincial government that lets the contract and determines the cost.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Did the estimated cost of $300 million include provision for any construction in the province of Quebec? I am willing to wait for an answer.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: My information is that it did not include the estimated cost of any construction in Quebec. My reason for saying so is that Quebec was not represented when the dominion and the provinces were considering the construction of a trans-Canada highway, and the estimate was confined to the requirements of provinces which were likely to participate in the agreement.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The Manitoba portion of the highway runs in part from Winnipeg straight west for about 56 miles on the north side of the Assiniboine River. Because flooding occurs every spring in that area, and owing to other conditions east of Winnipeg, the provincial Government decided to construct a highway half a mile south of the Assiniboine River and run it straight to the Ontario border. That involves the building of a new highway 56 to 60 miles long. I assume that the provincial Government was paid many years ago for the road on the north side. If it builds another highway on the south side will it be paid for that road too?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Was the original highway built before 1949?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Oh, yes, 25 years before.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The provincial Government would not be paid for the cost of any part of that highway if it is not incorporated in the Trans-Canada Highway.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The fact is that right up to now it has formed part of the Trans-Canada Highway, because it is the number one highway, and it is so shown on the map. But as I have mentioned, because of flood conditions and engineering difficulties the main highway has been transferred half a mile south of the river and about one mile south of the earlier road. The land to the south is higher, suffers less from flooding, and permits the straight-line construction. On the north side the road weaves in and out along the Red River. From an engineering standpoint, and generally, I admit that the construction of the new road is one of the best things which has been done in our province, but my concern is whether it will be aided by the federal Government.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am not an expert in this matter, but I would think that, if the route of the highway has been changed—

Hon. Mr. Haig: It has.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: —the province will be paid for any new work it may do.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is what I thought, but I was not sure.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is my off-hand opinion; I am not speaking as an expert. Probably it would be a matter of negotiation between the provincial and the federal Governments.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The federal Government's commitments on approved highway projects have been approximately $20 million a year. With the application of the 90 per cent formula this figure will be increased by $10 million to $15 million each year for the next five years. Construction costs have also increased during the past six years, requiring a revision of the total cost of construction, so that the federal Government's share is now estimated to be $250 million. The different basis takes into consideration changed costs of labour and material and, probably, purchases of land and other things. In any event there will be a considerable increase, and the federal Government's share has been raised under this bill from $150 million to $250 million.

I am sure there is unanimity in this chamber that this project should be encouraged, and completed as soon as possible. The highway will serve all those Canadians who drive in automobiles. It will serve all of Canada as a means of transportation in times of peace and, if necessary, in times of national emergency.

I have no hesitation in commending the bill to honourable senators for their approval.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I understand the proposed increased cost to the federal Government is from $150 million to $250 million. Is this based on an estimate of the various costs in the different provinces and from time to time? Could the honourable leader give the house a breakdown as to costs of labour and material?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am afraid I am unable to do that, but doubtless there are officials in the department who can. The figure is only an estimate and the work being done for which the federal Government is paying 90 per cent might well prove to be more costly than anticipated. It involves construction work on the most difficult sections of the road in each province. As I say, the figure is only an estimate but it has been calculated by representatives of the provincial and federal Governments, all of whom are specialists in this line of work.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, in rising to take part in this debate I want to deal first with the situation in Manitoba. I have nothing but praise for the work done by the Manitoba engineers. I have no criticism to make at all. In fact, I heartily approve of building the highway south of Winnipeg straight east to Ontario. It will be more convenient and will shorten that part of the road by some seven to ten miles.

I do not want to get into any dispute or discussion that will lead us nowhere, but I am hopeful that Quebec will eventually enter into the Trans-Canada Highway plan.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Before I finish I shall state why I entertain this hope. I feel that this Trans-Canada Highway bill is one of the finest pieces of legislation to come before us for a very long time. I do not question whether the road costs are too high in some places or whether sections of the road will prove to be substandard. I approach this question from a national viewpoint. The Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) said that the highway will serve Canadians who drive automobiles. I think it will do far more than that. It will mean, for instance, that people from Manitoba can drive to the Maritime provinces or other parts of Canada. During the past winter I visited New Brunswick and Nova Scotia and was delighted to find that the people there were just as nice as the people of Manitoba. It did me good to find this out, and I am prouder than ever of being a Canadian.

I presume that that part of Ontario where the road is not built is east of Fort William around Lake Superior. That section has great scenic beauty for Canadian travellers and tourists alike and should not be neglected. Hundreds of thousands of American tourists will be travelling the highway every year. This is not just guesswork. The park in Manitoba has drawn the second largest attendance of any park in Canada for the last number of years. Our province is known for its waterways and many Americans visit it every year.

The construction of the Trans-Canada Highway will help the people from the west and east to visit each other's part of the country. That is why I want Quebec to come in. Quebec is part of Canada and the rest of this great nation wants the predominantly French-speaking province to join in this project. Our Constitution protects minority rights and I have never seen any indication that one section of Canada has been unwilling to give another a fair deal. If Quebec comes into the agreement it will make it easier for other Canadians to visit the wonderful historic sights of French Canada. I just read in the Monthly Letter of the Royal Bank of Canada about the outstanding historical sites in Quebec, places once occupied by famous figures of Canadian history. I know it would be educational for my grandchildren to visit, for instance, the house where Montcalm lived and the old building where many early political meetings were held. Those were some of the starting points in Canadian history.

It is sometimes difficult to overcome political differences, but we should do everything we can to get the people of the various sections of Canada to mingle with one another. We members of the Senate are better off for being able to meet with each other; we have a far wider appreciation of Canada as a nation than we otherwise would have had. I may not have too long to live but I hope to see the day when Quebec enters into this agreement. I do not care what the terms might be, but I think the federal Government should go a long way to induce Quebec to take part.

Honourable senators, for the reasons I have outlined I am strongly in favour of this bill. I know a good deal about highways, for this subject has always been of extreme importance in Manitoba. We have two main rivers, one flowing north and one flowing east, and all highway traffic has to be diverted to the southern part of the province because of the many lakes in the north. I read that a member of the other house has claimed there should be two Trans-Canada highways through the west—one starting at Portage la Prairie, about 60 miles west of Winnipeg, and running through Edmonton, and the other running straight west from Winnipeg through Calgary. I do not suggest that the federal Government should attempt to build these roads now because I do not believe that to be feasible, but we should lay our plans on the basis that some day we will build a branch of the highway from Portage la Prairie through Edmonton, along the route of the Canadian National Railway, to Vancouver.

I do not think we can estimate how wonderful it will be to have large numbers of people from the great nation across the border—a nation with a population of 162 million or 163 million, which will probably increase to 200 million in the future—coming to visit our new northern country. Most tourists come by automobile and they want good roads. On one occasion I drove with some people through Manitoba to The Pas, on the way to Flin Flon. The trip was an inspiration to me. Among our party were an American couple and they were delighted with the beauty of the country. They said, "We didn't know you had such scenery in Manitoba." I told them that we were not noted for scenery in Manitoba, that we felt it was a plain province, but that it did have some beautiful points. The man replied, "Well, this trip has been one of great happiness to both my wife and me—I think it is a lovely part of Canada."

American tourists spend money here. Our stores in Winnipeg have increased their business from tourists for years. If these people come and find that our roads are poor they will not bother to come back. We want them to come back every year, and to bring their friends with them too.

Honourable senators, in supporting this bill I have two hopes to express. The first is that this project will be pressed by the Government. It is now in the hands of the Department of Public Works. I intend no criticism of former ministers when I say I know that the present minister will push the undertaking in an endeavour to have the present gaps eliminated and the highway completed across Canada. My second hope is that some influence such as patriotism will move Quebec to rise above politics in this matter. I realize it is hard to do that kind of thing—at least, it is in my own province. However, for the sake of uniting Canada by a great highway system, and in addition attracting many thousands of tourists travelling by motor—most of them never travel any other way—I hope the obstacles will be overcome.

I am entirely in accord with the provisions of this bill and I congratulate the Government on introducing it. I know a little about this highway business, because Manitoba has been very much mixed up in it for years and years. A good start has been made. The cost to the federal Government is always governed by the fact that each province concerned has to pay half of it. I cannot speak for other provinces, but in Manitoba great care is always exercised in the letting of a contract, because, as the honourable leader has said, it often happens that municipalities want a road somewhere else than along the route of the Trans-Canada Highway. In Manitoba the provincial Government was supported not only by the Opposition but by the reeves and councillors of the municipalities in having roads built as economically as possible, and good contracts were let under the direct supervision of provincial engineers for construction of a proper highway through our country. We are happy, especially in the eastern part of Manitoba, that the route was moved south of the river. That will cost a little money, but it will be very much more convenient, especially for my own city of Winnipeg. Ordinary traffic does not need to go through Winnipeg at all now, but can go south now if it wants to.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable member a question?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The honourable gentleman has made a plea to Quebec to enter into the agreement. Can he inform the house why that province has not already done so?

Hon. Mr. Haig: I think the honourable leader explained why. The municipalities are pressed to build roads to the local markets. The Trans-Canada Highway would meet that need for some of the people, but not for the majority. If you were a farmer living five or six miles out of town, having to travel there over an earth road, and saw a good highway going in the other direction, you would say: "Why does the Government spend all this money for tourists, instead of for the farmer? He pays taxes as well". There may be political motives mixed with all this, but I want to get above that for the sake of the country as a whole. In our province we have benefited greatly by the highway, and we have found through the highway development that money has flowed in from the tourists. For instance, a highway was built from Winnipeg to Emerson—it is about 65 miles in length—an extremely good highway. Of course, everybody said it was far too expensive for a province to build. Well, we built it, and I think it has paid for itself already by the influx of tourist traffic. However, the local farmers objected strenuously, because they wanted a highway alongside their farms.

Honourable senators, I hope second reading will be given and that the bill will go to committee, where I am sure officials of the Department of Public Works will be able to explain to us the whys and wherefores of the various provisions.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: May I ask the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) if he is aware that there are first-class highways across the province of Quebec at many points?

Hon. Mr. Haig: So I understand; but I want Quebec also to get the benefit of this 50 per cent contribution. I think the people of that province should have it in common with the rest of us, for they pay taxes too. I want them to have a highway standard which fits in with the Trans-Canada system. We have it in Manitoba, and Saskatchewan and Alberta have it. Around Edmonton that is what is wanted. The Trans-Canada Highway will attract more tourists to the various provinces.

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor: Honourable senators, I think we are all very pleased to have this measure supported by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig). Like him we are all anxious to see Quebec enter into this agreement, so that we may have a highway linking up our country from the extreme east to the extreme west.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: The link is constructed already.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: In Nova Scotia we are anxious to have people from the other provinces travel over a Trans-Canada highway, especially from the thickly populated centres of Quebec and Ontario, to enjoy the beauties of our province. Since 1914 Nova Scotia has been fortunate to have a good system of highways; I think it is generally recognized throughout Canada by tourist associations and others, and especially by American tourists, that our highways are almost at a point of perfection. We hear repeatedly how glad people are to leave certain provinces for Nova Scotia, knowing that they will enjoy travelling on our good highways.

There are two reasons for the bill. The first is the extension of time, as already stated, over which we have no control, and the second is the authorization of an additional expenditure of $100 million by the Government. I think we are all in accord with the plan of linking up the different parts of Canada by a highway. Although it has not been stressed, one of the important functions of the highway will be to permit Canadians to travel across the country without having to drive south through certain sections of the United States.

Notwithstanding what the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) has said as to the connecting link in his province, it is unfortunate that Quebec has not chosen to take part in this agreement. I am sure its participation would have resulted in better feeling, and the province would have benefited financially.

For tourist purposes, I think the construction of this highway is a fine move. I recall very well when the Trans-Canada Highway bill was introduced in this house in 1949. In that connection I should like to correct an impression that may have been in the mind of the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) as to the minister in charge of the project at that time. The bill was presented by the present Minister of Public Works, then the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. I think I am correct on that point.

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: I introduced the bill in the other house.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Thank you. I hasten to compliment the honourable gentleman for having initiated this project, which has since been carried on in a most efficient manner. The agreements between the provinces and the federal Government have to a large extent been supervised by the present Minister of Public Works, and he has done an exceptionally fine job. The whole project is a very desirable one.

I am particularly interested in the part being played by the federal Government in the building of a road through the national parks. For my part I should like to see a paved road through every park, for I believe it would draw still greater traffic to the area. I regard this bill as somewhat in the class of national housing legislation: it is not an expenditure, but an investment of money on which we shall have a return as the years go by.

With that brief expression of my thoughts on the subject, I repeat that I am happy that the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), without injecting any political thoughts into the discussion, has approved the principle of this bill.

Hon. John T. Hackett: Honourable senators, I am happy to concur in the passage of this bill. I should like it to be quite clear—and there is a healthy representation from my province in this house to contradict me if I err—that the roads in the province of Quebec are good, there are plenty of them and they are of high-class construction. One may travel to the eastern and western extremities of the province, on both sides of the St. Lawrence, or north to the region of the snows, in comfort and safety.

Roads are provided in Quebec in a large percentage of cases on a per capita basis.

They are thoroughly and frequently travelled by the denizens of the province and by people who come from a distance to view its beauty and enjoy its hospitality. I repeat that the roads of Quebec are good. As I understand it, that subject is not under debate at the moment.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask my friend a question? I do not know much about roads in Quebec, but the Leader of the Opposition has commented on the fact that that province has failed to join with the other provinces in the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway. In my friend's opinion is the reason for Quebec's failure to join the other provinces that all its highways are already sufficiently good to make participation in this project unnecessary? Does Quebec think the expense of participating in the Trans-Canada Highway scheme is not warranted because its people regard the present highways as safe and adequate for their needs? I should like to have my friend's opinion on that.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: I am quite willing to answer the question.

I am pleased to give such support as I can to the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway. But I am very loath to have go abroad a belief that Quebec is a sort of Indian reserve in which there are no highways. There are excellent highways in the province of Quebec, they are of good construction, they have been paid for by the province and they are travelled by many millions of people. When it is said that highways are lacking in Quebec, I feel that a motion for particulars might embarrass the gentlemen who, out of goodness of heart, have intimated that because moneys have not accrued from one source they have failed at another.

I merely reiterate that roads in Quebec have been built at strategic points; they traverse the province east and west, north and south; they connect the province with the United States at many points, and many people travel between the two countries.

Hon. Mr. Euler: If I may say so, my friend has not quite answered my question. In view of the fact that, as he says, there are excellent highways in the province of Quebec, why does that province not come into the Trans-Canada Highway scheme? If he knows the answer, will he tell us?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I guess it doesn't need the money.

Hon. Thomas Vien: Honourable senators, I had no intention of taking part in this debate. I am now prompted to do so because many references were made to the province of Quebec and her contribution to the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway.

I concur in the wish expressed by so many honourable senators that the province of Quebec may be induced to fall in line and participate in this project. I think that wish will be fulfilled shortly after June 20 next.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Vien: According to public rumour, that is the date fixed for provincial general elections in Quebec.

I agree with the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) that the province of Quebec has a creditable network of good roads, built during the past forty years. I recall being in Paris in 1911 when Sir Lomer Gouin, then Prime Minister of Quebec, visited les Chateaux de la Loire. On his return he remarked to a group of people, of whom I was one, that he would cause a bill to be introduced in and enacted by the Legislature of Quebec enabling him to start construction of a system of good roads in that province. At the session of 1912, an act was passed, and since then Quebec has constructed a network of good roads, of which we are justly proud. However, some political upheavals have occurred in the province which have had the effect of slowing down the progress made in that direction.

The Trans-Canada Highway is a national undertaking; it should follow a course as straight as possible so as to provide the best and shortest means of highway travel from coast to coast. Honourable senators, I am not here to discuss provincial politics, but we have been asked why the Trans-Canada Highway is not being built in Quebec. Well, it has been emphatically stated in the Legislature of Quebec that the present Government will not build a highway in or through a county which is not represented by a member who belongs to the National Union party.

Honourable senators will agree, I am sure, that we could not very well urge the federal Department of Public Works to build the Trans-Canada Highway so as to follow the winding course determined by the political allegiance of the people of a region, namely, the boundaries of the counties represented in the Legislature by National Union members.

Under the present Quebec administration contracts for road building, bridges, etc., are given, without tenders being called for, to people who had never built roads before, and according to specifications which do not provide for proper foundations or adequate drainage. The specifications for construction of the Trans-Canada Highway should not be different in Quebec from those in other provinces. When the cost of this important public work is finally figured out, it may well amount to $400 million or $500 million. It must be a highway of which the whole of Canada will be proud and which, first and foremost, will promote travel from one part of Canada to the other and attract a multitude of tourists as well.

I am sorry to say, honourable senators, notwithstanding what the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett) has said, that some of our highways recently built are not a credit to the province of Quebec or to Canada. I invite my honourable friend to drive by motor car from Montreal to Quebec along the north shore of the St. Lawrence. After that experience, I am sure, he will speak more reservedly than he has done this afternoon on the quality of some of our roads and their state of maintenance.

There are numerous bridges on these highways; some of them have collapsed. There are roads that break up every spring because their drainage is faulty, because they were not given a proper foundation, and the frost causes the surface to heave, or because some of the contractors had no other road-building qualifications than being friends of the present administration. The specifications were not properly studied; the contracts were awarded without tenders; the execution of the work was not properly supervised, and a lot of money was wasted. We do not want anything of that sort on the Trans-Canada Highway. The present provincial Government will not agree to a federal system of highways from Halifax to Vancouver to be built in the provinces by the Highways Department of each province according to proper specifications, under proper supervision, and after tenders have been called and contracts given to men of experience and ability, who will "deliver the goods".

Honourable senators, that is my answer, given in a hurry, to the questions which have been raised here this afternoon. I share with honourable gentlemen who have spoken the hope that conditions will change. But if they want their desires to be something more than pious wishes they will come and assist us to clean up the Augean stables and give the good old province of Quebec a better and more progressive provincial administration that will co-operate with our federal Government in the development of a great country for a great Canadian people.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Honourable senators, may I just be permitted to interject a remark? I merely wish to thank my honourable friend for giving an answer to the question I asked, as apparently one could not be obtained from the senator from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Hackett).

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I have heard that the Prime Minister of Quebec is suffering from fallen arches. Would that be the explanation?

Hon. Mr. Vien: Well, I hope the health of the present Prime Minister of Quebec will improve and that he will be able to enjoy a very long life in a well deserved retirement.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: This is getting very political!

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the honourable Leader speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sorry that I did not realize when I introduced this bill this afternoon that the original Trans-Canada Highway Act was introduced into Parliament by our colleague the honourable senator from Edmonton (Hon. Mr. MacKinnon), when he was Minister of Mines and Resources. I assure honourable members that had I realized that I would have asked him to explain the bill, and thus have saved myself several hours of labour in trying to become familiar with the details. We all congratulate the honourable gentleman on his success in piloting it through the House of Commons.

The honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) asked about the specifications of the Trans-Canada Highway. Since then I received copies of the general specifications. I do not intend to read them all, but they will be included in the agreement which is to form an appendix to Hansard of today. Perhaps I should mention the provision with regard to the right of way, about which a question was asked. The specification in this regard reads as follows:

> The minimum width of the right of way shall be 100 feet. Where the highway runs through densely populated areas, thus involving heavy expenditures, a minimum initial width of 66 feet will be acceptable.

The provision as to pavement reads as follows:

> The width of pavement shall be a maximum of 24 feet and a minimum of 22 feet. The pavement shall be a bituminous-mineral type generally described as a bituminous hot plant-mix with graded aggregate. The compacted thickness of the bituminous-mineral pavement shall be three inches. Where it is desirable to lay concrete pavement, the thickness and type customarily used by the provinces will be acceptable.

The honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) asked about the shoulders. Here is the provision in the specifications:

> The width of the shoulders on each side of the pavement shall be 10 feet where it is economically possible to construct to this width. Lesser widths will be acceptable to a minimum of 5 feet where terrain and/or economy makes this necessary.

There is also a provision as to obstructions.

Provision is also made for a stone base course, the gradient of the road, and sight distances.

An honourable senator asked about the bridges. As I said, the cost of the bridges does form part of the cost of the highway. Some of the provisions with regard to bridges are: The overhead clearances for full width between curbs, will be 14·6 feet. For length of bridge of 30 feet or less, the roadway between curbs shall be the aggregate width of pavement and shoulders. For length of bridge over 30 feet and up to 100 feet, the minimum roadway between curbs shall be 27 feet and the minimum width of curbs on each side shall be 18 inches, or the deck design shall provide equivalent clearance. Finally, for length of bridge over 100 feet, the minimum width between curbs shall be 24 feet, and the minimum width of curbs on each side shall be 18 inches, or the deck design shall provide equivalent clearance.

There are further details here, and also a number of schedules which describe the route of the Trans-Canada Highway in each of the provinces. If it is the wish of honourable senators I will have them also included with the agreement which is to form an appendix to Hansard.

See appendix to today's Hansard, pp. 423-6.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Can the honourable leader tell us whether there is any provision for four-lane highways to the entrance of cities?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am posing today almost as an expert, and I can give that information. There is no provision for four-lane highways. If they are to be provided it must be by the municipalities in conjunction with the provincial Government.

I wish to thank honourable members for the interest they have shown in this bill. We are unanimously in favour of it. I am sure it will receive second reading, and if it is the wish of the house I shall then move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. The passing of the bill is a matter of some urgency, for spring weather is coming throughout Canada and the Highway Departments of the various provinces would like to start work as soon as possible. Therefore it has occurred to me that if the arrangement will suit the convenience of honourable senators the bill might be considered tomorrow in committee, and if it is returned without amendment the house could then consider whether it shall receive third reading tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Agreed.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

TRADE AGREEMENT WITH RUSSIA

On the order for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of honourable Mr. Macdonald:

Resolved: that it is expedient that the houses of Parliament approve the ratification by Canada of the agreement on trade between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics signed at Ottawa on February 29, 1956, and that this house do approve the same.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I would like to have this matter taken up as the first order tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Very well.

The Hon. the Speaker: The order stands.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—
SECOND READING

Hon. James A. MacKinnon moved the second reading of Bill Q-8, an Act respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

He said: Honourable senators, in reading the bill that is before us you can see that if one deals only with the construction of the 20 miles of railroad in western Canada which is proposed, a very short explanation is all that is needed, but I think the whys and wherefores of the construction of this road, the industrial development and the improvement of the economy of Canada, as well as the specific industrial benefits to Alberta, should be given some consideration at this time. With the permission of honourable senators I would like to present that information.

The purpose of this bill is to grant authority to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to build a branch line of railway a distance of approximately 20 miles from a point near Brocket, Alberta, southerly to a property in the southwest quarter of section 23, range 29, township 4, west of the 4th meridian, Alberta. Brocket is on the secondary main line of the Canadian Pacific between Vancouver and Medicine Hat. This is the line which runs through the Crowsnest Pass. The branch line will be built in a southerly direction to a property owned by Canadian Gulf Oil Company, where, at the present time, a plant is in course of erection to process the natural gas developed from the Pincher Creek field by Canadian Gulf Oil Company.

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company must come to Parliament for authority to build this branch line, because, by section 183 of the Railway Act, it is not entitled to construct a branch line longer than six miles without such authority.

It is estimated that the cost of constructing the branch line would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $1,500,000. It is not expected that the construction of the line will create any great difficulty. Part of the territory is fairly level. There is some rolling country in the southerly section. There will be one stream crossing, over Fishburn Creek, approximately 17 miles south of Brocket. I understand that it was necessary to make arrangements with the Peigan Indian Council, over whose lands the first five miles of the new branch line will pass. This has been satisfactorily arranged with the Indian band.

At Brocket there are business tracks, and a railway employee is in charge of the station and other facilities for handling traffic there. Each day two or three freight trains, I am told, pass through Brocket travelling both east and west.

Honourable senators will be particularly interested in the purpose for which the line is required. One of the significant sources of natural gas in Alberta is in the Pincher Creek field in the southwest portion of the province of Alberta. This field was discovered and has been developed by the Canadian Gulf Oil Company. The gas at Pincher Creek is a sour wet gas. It contains approximately 10 per cent hydrogen sulphide. In the formation the pressures are in the order of 5,000 pounds per square inch. Because of these pressures and because of the large percentage of hydrogen sulphide which the gas contains the gas is very corrosive.

In its natural state this gas cannot be placed in transmission lines for sale as a fuel. It must first be purified. Purification means removing all the hydrogen sulphide, almost all of the carbon dioxide, and a large percentage of the liquefiable hydrocarbons. From the process of purification the following products will be obtained: sulphur; propane; butanes; and natural gasoline.

The removal of these products requires the installation of a plant of considerable magnitude, and involves the installation of precision equipment. As a matter of fact two plants must be built. One will recover the stabilized condensate, and the hydrogen sulphide. When these products are removed, the other plant will recover from the material taken from the hydrogen sulphide gas, the elemental sulphur.

I should point out to honourable senators that if the Trans-Canada project for the sale of gas in eastern Canada were in existence, the purified gas thus obtained could then be sold to the Trans-Canada system. However, since Trans-Canada is not yet in being, Canadian Gulf must re-inject the purified gas into the formation from which the sour gas was obtained.

Construction of the Gulf plant at Pincher Creek began on April 1, 1956. It is hoped that the plant will be completed by September 1 of this year. The cost of the facilities which I have described, including the two plants, the gathering system and the facilities to re-inject the clean gas, will be approximately $7 million.

It is expected that the stabilized condensate to be recovered from the Pincher Creek wells will be shipped to the Calgary refineries for blending purposes to make gasoline for commercial use.

I perhaps can say that the important purpose of establishing the plant now at Pincher Creek is to recover the elemental sulphur. A company known as Northwest Nitro-Chemicals is now completing a plant at Medicine Hat, Alberta. This plant will produce a fertilizer with an ammonium base. To produce this fertilizer sulphuric acid will be required. The acid will be manufactured from the elemental liquid sulphur supplied by Canadian Gulf Oil. This elemental sulphur will be shipped in a liquid state, in tank cars, from the Pincher Creek plant to Northwest Nitro-Chemicals at Medicine Hat.

The sulphur will be produced at the rate of 225 long tons per day. The sulphur is 99·5 per cent pure by weight. The stabilized condensate will be produced at the rate of 2,190 barrels per day, or to put it another way, at the rate of 76,650 imperial gallons per day. This condensate, as I have said, will be shipped to the refineries at Calgary.

While the immediate customer for sulphur is the new fertilizer industry established at Medicine Hat by Northwest Nitro-Chemicals, there will be a market for the additional sulphur produced by Gulf in the pulp and paper industry to the west and to the south of Pincher Creek. Northwest Nitro-Chemicals plant will be in production, it is expected, by about September 1 of this year.

The only feasible way to ship the volume of by-products from the Pincher Creek gas field is by rail. If trucks were to be used, trans-shipment at the secondary line of the Canadian Pacific would be required and the multiple handling of these products would be more expensive. Moreover, climatic conditions in Canada can affect the roads, and sometimes road bans are imposed when the frost is leaving the ground. As a result there would be interruptions in the trucking service, which could not be accepted by the sulphur supplier.

By way of additional information only, honourable senators might be interested in a little more discussion about the Pincher Creek gas field. During the period being discussed in connection with this application, the daily volume of gas that will be processed in the projected plant is some 60 million cubic feet per day. As I have explained, after the by-products are removed the purified gas will be re-injected into the wells and then it will mix with the sour gas.

When the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines project comes into being the facilities at Pincher Creek will require to be expanded to process 130 million cubic feet each day during the first year, and 240 million cubic feet each day during the following years. The estimated reserves in the field are 2·9 trillion cubic feet. Before the gas can be put into the Trans-Canada system most of the liquefiable hydrocarbons and sulphur will have been removed and the residue will then be sold to Trans-Canada.

I have a small table which I would like to place on Hansard for the information of honourable senators, if I could have unanimous consent to do so.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: This table shows the amount of gas that will be sold to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines in the first year of that company's operation, as well as the amount of butanes, propanes, natural gasoline, condensate and sulphur. The table will also show the volume of gas and the by-products to be produced in the years after the first year of the operation of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines.

	First year of Trans-Canada's operation	Following years
Residue Gas (cu. ft./day)	100,000,000	170,000,000
Butanes (Imp. gal./day) ..	25,679	46,575
Propane (Imp. gal./day) ..	25,589	45,205
Natural Gasoline (Imp gal./day)	19,370	37,000
Condensate (Imp gal./day)	160,400	265,329
Sulphur (Long tons/day) .	450	800

All of this production, I am told, will come from the Pincher Creek field. In 1953 Canada consumed approximately 352,000 long tons of sulphur. The production of sulphur from the initial stage at Pincher Creek will be approximately 82,000 long tons per annum, or approximately 23 per cent of the Canadian requirement for sulphur in 1953. It should be remembered that sulphur is merely a by-product of the Pincher Creek gas. This is another example of the tremendous resources in the petroleum industry being developed in western Canada, more especially Alberta. The Shell plant at Jumping Pound, west of Calgary, now produces approximately 15,000 long tons of sulphur per year. The Royalite plant at Turner Valley, south of Calgary, produces approximately 10,000 long tons of sulphur per year.

The economics of the building of the proposed branch of railway line of some 20 miles as contemplated by this bill are based upon markets for the by-products of the Pincher Creek gas only. In turn one only of these by-products will supply the important ingredient for the fertilizer plant, a new industry now being established by Northwest Nitro-Chemicals at Medicine Hat. The production of these by-products will be tremendously increased when it becomes possible to produce the Pincher Creek gas through the operation of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines.

I have said that in the initial stage the sulphur production at Pincher Creek will be approximately 23 per cent of the total Canadian requirement for sulphur in 1953. This is the last year for which figures are available to me. When the Trans-Canada pipe line is set up, from the Pincher Creek gas field alone 83 per cent of the 1953 requirement for all of Canada will be produced.

I am sure that this project will commend itself to the members of this chamber as an important economic project for all of Canada. I propose that if this bill is given second reading it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. Representatives of the railway would be present there to explain further details of the project, and representatives of Canadian Gulf Oil Company would be able to answer other questions which might occur to the members of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Did the honourable senator say that the length of the line is to be 20 miles?

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Davies: In the district which will be served by this new branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway are there any potential coal mines? I ask that question because three or four years ago large advertisements appeared in many newspapers in Ontario signed by some syndicate—

Hon. Mr. Croll: Brown.

Hon. Mr. Davies: That is right. It said there was plenty of western coal that could be brought down cheaply to Ontario provided a railway ran in there. Is that in this district at all?

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: I think the honourable senator has reference to Mr. Vern Brown, formerly of Medicine Hat and latterly of Toronto, whom I knew very well. He represented coal interests. In answer to the question, I would say this gas field is 50 miles west of Lethbridge, where there are coal deposits being mined. It is approximately southwest of Fort Macleod. I do not believe coal is mined in this area in extensive quantities. Then, of course, there is coal in our county in the Crowsnest Pass.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. MacKinnon, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

(b) that the Highway shall be completed on or before the ninth day of December, 1956; and

(c) that on completion the Highway shall conform to the general specifications set out in Schedule B annexed to this agreement except to the extent that the Minister, in any case where he has expressed in writing the opinion that compliance with a specification in respect of a part of the highway would entail excessive expenditure, has authorized a deviation therefrom, provided the deviation does not prejudice the construction of a highway of high standard across Canada.

Provincial Contracts and Arrangements

3. (1) Except as otherwise provided in this section, the Province will arrange for the construction of the Highway by awarding contracts pursuant to tenders invited by public advertisement.

(2) Where in the opinion of the Minister and the Provincial Minister any part of the construction of the Highway is so small an undertaking that it would be unsuitable to award a contract therefor pursuant to public advertisement and tender, the Province may, with the prior consent in writing of the Minister, award a contract for that part of the construction pursuant to tenders invited from not fewer than two persons designated by the Minister and the Provincial Minister.

(3) Where the Minister, on the certificate of the Director of Special Projects of Canada, and the Provincial Minister are of the opinion that it is, for reasons of economy or efficiency, expedient to undertake any item of work by day labour, the Province may, with the prior consent in writing of the Minister, undertake that work by day labour employed by the Province.

(4) Where a part of the Highway is to be constructed within a municipality the Province may arrange with the municipality, on terms previously approved in writing by the Minister, for the construction of that part of the Highway pursuant to a contract awarded by the municipality or by the Province, and the Province shall be responsible for the satisfactory completion of the work.

(5) In approving the terms of an arrangement between the Province and a municipality mentioned in subsection four, the Minister shall have regard to the previous practice of the Province with respect to contributions to that municipality by the Province for the construction of highways, and the Province will disclose to the Minister all existing or previous agreements and records relating to those contributions and will otherwise assist the Minister in determining the practice of the Province with respect thereto.

4. Notwithstanding anything in this Agreement, Canada shall not be liable to make any payment in respect of a contract mentioned in section three unless

(a) before tenders were invited the form of advertisement for tenders, the tender forms and the specifications, plan and profiles and the proposed terms of that contract were approved in writing by the Minister;

(b) that contract has been awarded pursuant to tenders invited in the manner provided in section three;

(c) at the time when that contract was entered into the contractor was a resident of Canada or if the Contractor is a corporation, it was for a period of at least one year immediately prior to that time, incorporated and carrying on business in Canada;

(d) the construction to be performed under that contract is to be paid for either at a lump sum price or unit prices or both;

(e) it is a term of that contract that the contractor and any sub-contractor of the contractor will, in respect of the construction to be carried out under that contract,

(i) employ only residents of Canada, and

(ii) in employing persons, refrain from discriminating against any person by reason of his race, religious views or political affiliations;

(f) entry into that contract was agreed to in writing by the Minister before it was entered into; and

(g) the Provincial Minister has certified and the Minister is satisfied that the work in respect of which the payment is to be made has been completed in accordance with that contract.

Program of Construction

5. (1) The Minister and the Provincial Minister shall forthwith determine the construction that is necessary to complete the highway along the route and in accordance with the general specifications in Schedules A and B.

(2) Unless it is otherwise agreed in writing between the Minister and the Provincial Minister in respect of a specified part of the Highway, the Province will complete the construction of those parts of the Highway that are not paved at the date of this Agreement before beginning to construct those parts of the Highway that are paved.

(3) No work shall be done that affects a portion of existing Highway that is to form part of the highway until the cost of prior construction in respect of that part of the highway has been determined.

Contribution by Canada

6. (1) Subject to this Agreement, Canada will pay to the Province

(a) one-half of the cost of new construction, and

(b) in respect of each designated highway, an amount, not exceeding one-half of the cost of prior construction of the designated highway, to be determined in accordance with subsection two.

(2) Subject to this section the amount payable by Canada in respect of a designated highway shall be determined as follows:—

(a) Where the designated highway conforms to the general specifications in

Schedule B and becomes part of the Highway without alteration or addition, the amount will be one-half of the cost of prior construction of the designated highway;

(b) where paragraph (a) does not apply, the amount will be determined in accordance with the following principles:—

(i) where surfacing, base course or fill is used as such in completing the Highway, the amount is one-half of the cost of prior construction of the surfacing, base course or fill, as the case may be;

(ii) where surfacing is used as base course or fill in completing the Highway, the amount is one-half of the amount that would have been the cost of prior construction of the surfacing if it had originally been used as base course or fill, as the case may be, in constructing the designated highway; and

(iii) where surfacing or base course is used as fill in completing the Highway, the amount is one-half the amount that would have been the cost of prior construction of the surfacing or base course if it had originally been used as fill in constructing the designated highway.

Cost of Construction

7. Subject to this Agreement, the cost of new construction in respect of which Canada will contribute shall be the amount determined as the aggregate of expenditures, in the following classes, incurred by the Province during the construction period:

(a) payments made pursuant to contracts for construction of the Highway entered into by the Province with contractors in accordance with this Agreement;

(b) payments in respect of construction materials purchased by the Province that are necessary for the construction of the Highway and are furnished to a contractor and used in constructing the Highway pursuant to the contract between the Province and the contractor, to the extent that the cost thereof to the Province does not exceed the aggregate of the current market price of those materials prevailing in the locality where and at the time when the Province acquired them and the actual cost to the Province of delivering these materials to the place at which they are used by the contractor for construction of the Highway;

(c) payments to a municipality, pursuant to an arrangement approved by the Minister in accordance with section three in respect of the construction of that part of the Highway that is within the municipality;

(d) payments in respect of wages and salaries of members of the engineering staff employed by the Province while they are engaged in field engineering operations in connection with the construction of the Highway and their necessary transportation and living expenses while so engaged if those expenses are paid in accordance with the established practice of the Province;

(e) where the Province undertakes work by day labour employed by the Province pursuant to subsection three of section three;

(i) payments in respect of the wages and workmen's compensation claims of the day labour forces engaged in that work,

(ii) payments in respect of the normal operating, maintenance and transportation expenses incurred by the Province for equipment owned by the Province that is used to perform that work including allowance for depreciation at generally approved rates if that equipment is brought to the work in good repair, or payments for the use of such equipment based on a schedule previously approved by the Minister and representing the over-all expenses incurred by the Province for normal operation, maintenance, and depreciation,

(iii) payments in respect of the rental of equipment not owned by the Province in accordance with terms and rates of rental that have been previously approved in writing by the Minister, and

(iv) payments in respect of materials, other than materials obtained from property owned by the Province prior to the date of this Agreement, and furnished by the Province and used in constructing the Highway;

(g) payments in respect of the restoration and repair of real property destroyed or damaged in the course of constructing the Highway and in respect of the construction of walls and other works necessary for the protection of the Highway or adjacent property;

(h) payments in respect of the inspection and testing of materials used in the construction of the Highway if, in the opinion of the Minister, the inspection and tests were necessary and were not required in connection with any other use.

8. (1) Subject to this Agreement, the cost of construction of a designated highway shall be the amount determined as the aggregate of expenditures, in the following classes, incurred by the Province in the construction of the designated highway:

(a) payments pursuant to contracts for construction of the designated highway entered into by the Province with other persons;

(b) payments in respect of construction materials purchased by the Province that were necessary for and used in constructing the designated highway, to the extent that the cost thereof incurred by the Province did not exceed the aggregate of the current market price of these materials prevailing in the locality where and at the time when the Province acquired them and the actual cost to the Province of delivering those materials to the site of construction;

(c) payments to a municipality in respect of the construction of the designated highway within the municipality;

(d) payments in respect of wages and salaries of members of the engineering staff employed by the Province while they were engaged in field engineering operations in connection with the construction of the designated highway and their necessary transportation and living expenses while so engaged.

(e) where construction of the designated highway has been undertaken by employees of the Province,

(i) payments in respect of the wages and workmen's compensation claims of the day labour forces while they were engaged in the construction of the designated highway, and

(ii) payments in respect of the normal operating, maintenance, and transportation expenses incurred by the Province for equipment owned by the Province that is used to perform that work including allowance for depreciation at generally approved rates if that equipment is brought to the work in good repair; or payments for the use of such equipment based on a schedule previously approved by the Minister and representing the overall expenses incurred by the province for normal operation, maintenance, and depreciation.

(f) payments in respect of the removal of obstructions such as power, telephone and telegraph lines, buildings, trees, brush, debris and the like, that was necessarily incidental to the construction of the designated highway;

(g) payments in respect of the restoration and repair of real property destroyed or damaged in the course of constructing the designated highway, and in respect of the construction of walls or other works necessary for the protection of the designated highway or adjacent property; and

(h) payments in respect of the inspection and testing of materials used in the construction of the designated highway, if in the opinion of the Minister, the inspection and tests were necessary and were not required in conection with any other use.

(2) Notwithstanding anything in this section, where in the opinion of the Minister

(a) the accounts and other information furnished by the Province are insufficient for the purpose of determining the true expenditures by the Province in respect of a designated highway, or

(b) the expenditure by the Province in respect of the construction of a designated highway, by comparison with market costs prevailing when the construction was undertaken, are excessive, the Minister and the Provincial Minister shall cause an appraisal to be made of the cost of the construction in question at the time when the construction was undertaken and that appraisal shall form the basis of the determination of the cost of construction of the designated highway.

(3) Notwithstanding anything in this section, the cost of prior construction of each component of a designated highway shall not exceed the amount that it would have cost the Province at the time substantial construction of that component was last undertaken, to construct it to the specifications to which it then conformed as though it had not previously existed, taking into account costs prevailing when the construction was undertaken corresponding to the classes of expenditures specified in subsection one.

9. Notwithstanding anything in this Agreement, the cost of new construction and of prior construction shall not include expenditures by the Province in respect of

(a) wages, salaries and expenses of officers or servants of the Province, except those specified in sections seven and eight;

(b) the acquisition of land or any interest in land in connection with the construction of the Highway including compensation or damages for the compulsory taking thereof or for injurious affection of other lands;

(c) fencing the Highway or installing gates in existing fences;

(d) a designated highway or a component thereof, that cannot be incorporated to advantage or in accordance with good engineering practice, in the Highway or does not reduce the cost of the construction that is necessary to bring the Highway into conformity with the general specifications in Schedule B;

(e) the amount of any payment made by the Province in respect of the construction of the Highway that, in the judgment of the Minister, exceeds the amount that was necessary, in respect of the matters for which the payment was made, for the purpose of constructing a two-lane highway in accordance with the general specifications in Schedule B;

(f) water works, sewers, electrical conduits and other public utilities installed for the province or a municipality;

(g) highway signs and highway marking devices; and

(h) any matter, to the extent that the Province is reimbursed from any source in respect of that matter.

10. The cost of new and prior construction shall be determined in accordance with the Trans-Canada Highway Act, Chapter 40, of the Statutes of Canada 1949.

Presentation and Payment of Provincial Claims

11. When the Minister and the Provincial Minister have determined the program of construction in accordance with section five they shall forthwith agree upon an estimate of the total cost of new construction and of the total cost of prior construction, and shall from time to time revise these estimates as may be necessary.

12. (1) The Province may, after the end of each calendar month, submit to the Minister a claim for a payment on account of the cost of new construction incurred by it before the end of that month for which no claim has previously been made by it.

(2) A claim by the Province shall be for one-half of the cost of the new construction in respect of which the claim is made and shall be accompanied by such statements of accounts certified by the Provincial Auditor, in such reasonable form as the Comptroller of the Treasury of Canada may from time to time require.

13. (1) Subject to this section, when the Minister receives a claim for a payment to the Province on account of the cost of new construction, Canada will make an interim payment to the Province equal to the amount of the claim.

(2) No payment will be made pursuant to this section in respect of any item of cost that is not specified in section seven and that is not properly supported by vouchers and other documents, and that has not been incurred in respect of work certified by a representative of the Minister as satisfactorily performed.

(3) From an amount payable to the Province pursuant to this section the Minister may cause to be held back until satisfactory completion of the part of the Highway to which the claim relates, an amount not exceeding ten per cent of the amount payable in respect of each item of cost for which a claim is made.

14. The Provincial Minister shall, as soon as may be after the program of construction has been determined in accordance with section five, submit to the Minister a statement of the cost of prior construction in respect of each designated highway for which the Province intends to claim a contribution by Canada, accompanied by statements of accounts and such other information in such reasonable form as the Comptroller of the Treasury of Canada may require.

15. (1) Where a part of the Highway has been completed and accepted by the Minister as conforming to the route and general specifications in Schedules A and B, the Province may submit a claim to the Minister in respect of a designated highway that has been incorporated in that part of the Highway and subject to this section, Canada will thereupon pay to the Province an amount in respect of the designated highway determined pursuant to section six.

(2) Where a payment is made pursuant to this section in respect of a designated highway, there shall be deducted from the amount that would otherwise be payable, the amount of any payment by Canada to the Province subsequent to the thirty-first day of March, 1928, and prior to the date of this Agreement, in respect of that designated highway.

(3) The total amount paid by Canada to the Province in respect of the cost of prior construction shall not, at any time, exceed the amount that, at that time, is in the same ratio to the total cost of prior construction estimated in accordance with section eleven as the total of the payments made by Canada to the Province at that time in respect of the cost of new construction is to the total cost of new construction estimated in accordance with section eleven.

16. (1) When the Minister is satisfied that the Highway has been completed in accordance with this Agreement Canada will pay to the Province the balance of the amount payable in respect of the cost of new construction and of prior construction for which a claim has been made by the Province.

(2) If Canada pays to the Province an amount that exceeds the amount payable pursuant to this Agreement, the Province will refund the excess, and Canada may, in addition to any other recourse, recover any such amount from amounts payable by Canada to the Province on any account.

17. Notwithstanding anything in this Agreement, no claim for payment in respect of the cost of construction of the Highway may be made by the Province after one year has elapsed from the end of the construction period, or any extension thereof.

Records, Inspections and Disputes

18. (1) The Province will maintain full records of all expenditures relating to the cost of construction of the Highway incurred by it together with all proper documents and vouchers relating thereto and will make all or any of such records, documents or vouchers available to the Minister for examination and audit and will give the Minister all reasonable assistance with his examination and audit.

(2) The Province will keep intact for a period of five years from the end of the construction period all records, documents and vouchers specified in subsection one.

19. (1) The Minister may appoint representatives of Canada to report on all phases of construction of the Highway and they may make any inspections, enquiries and tests that they consider necessary to assist them in reporting on construction and determining the cost of construction of the Highway, and may discuss with the appropriate representatives of the Province any matter concerning the completion of the Highway in accordance with this Agreement.

(2) Where, in order to give effect to this Agreement, the Minister considers it necessary to inspect or appraise any lands or works, the Minister may cause such inspections and appraisals to be made as he deems advisable and the Province will afford the Minister and his representatives every facility for the purpose.

(3) The approval of the Minister of any engineering or construction matter involving expenditure of Federal funds under this Agreement shall be a condition precedent to such expenditure of Federal funds by Canada.

General

20. This Agreement shall not be construed so as to vest in Canada any proprietary interest in the Highway.

21. The maintenance of the Highway shall be the responsibility of the Province.

22. The Province shall indemnify and save harmless Canada against all claims of whatsoever nature arising from or out of or in connection with the construction of the Highway.

23. All expenditures by the Province in the construction of the Highway shall be made in legal tender or by cheque or other instrument drawn on a chartered bank.

24. Payments of contributions by Canada under this Agreement are hereby excepted from the operation of Section 5 of the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act, 1935, and it shall be the responsibility of the Province to see that all persons employed in the construction of the Highway are paid fair wages, and the hours of work to be observed shall be those from time to time determined by the Province but shall be generally those covering similar work undertaken by the Province in the district.

SCHEDULE "B"

(See p. 414)

GENERAL SPECIFICATIONS OF THE HIGHWAY

1. Right of Way

The minimum width of the right of way shall be one hundred (100) feet. Where the highway runs through densely populated areas thus involving heavy expenditures, a minimum initial width of sixty-six (66) feet will be acceptable.

2. Pavement

(a) The width of pavement shall be a maximum of twenty-four (24) feet and a minimum of twenty-two (22) feet.

(b) The pavement shall be a Bituminous-Mineral type generally described as a Bituminous Hot Plant-Mix with graded aggregate.

(c) The compacted thickness of the bituminous-mineral pavement shall be three (3) inches.

(d) Where it is desirable to lay concrete pavement, the thickness and type customarily used by the provinces will be acceptable.

3. Shoulders

The width of the shoulders on each side of the pavement shall be ten (10) feet, where it is economically possible to construct to this width. Lesser widths will be acceptable to a minimum of five (5) feet where terrain and/or economy makes this necessary.

4. Obstructions

The minimum distance between the edge of the pavement and any obstruction on the shoulders shall be one (1) foot less than the width of the shoulders.

5. Stone Base Course, Sub Base, Elevation of Water Table Level

The construction of the stone base course, the sub base and the drainage system controlling the elevation of the water table level shall be constructed in such a manner that combined, they will produce a roadway having a load bearing capacity for a repeating 18,000 pound axle load.

6. CURVATURE

The curvature of the centre line of pavement shall not exceed six (6) degrees, except where terrain does not permit this with reasonable economy. Where possible, it is considered desirable to reduce the maximum curvature to three (3) degrees.

7. GRADIENT

The maximum gradient on the highway shall not exceed six (6) per cent, except in cases where this is not economically feasible, where seven (7) or eight (8) per cent will be acceptable for short distances.

8. SIGHT DISTANCES

Where terrain permits, the minimum horizontal sight distance, and the minimum vertical sight distance, shall be six hundred (600) feet. This means that a driver of a vehicle will be able to see an object six inches high on the pavement ahead of him at a distance of 600 feet, when his eyes are four (4) feet six (6) inches above the pavement.

9. BRIDGES

(a) Loading H20-S16.

(b) Overhead clearances, for full width between curbs, 14 feet 6 inches.

(c) For length of bridge of 30 feet or less, the roadway between curbs shall be the aggregate width of pavement and shoulders.

(d) For length of bridge over 30 feet and up to 100 feet, the minimum roadway between curbs shall be 27 feet and the minimum width of curbs on each side shall be 18 inches, or the deck design shall provide equivalent clearance.

(e) For length of bridge over 100 feet, the minimum width between curbs shall be 24 feet, and the minimum width of curbs on each side shall be 18 inches, or the deck design shall provide equivalent clearance.

Routine proceedings.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. W. D. Euler, Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the report of the committee on Bill 214.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to whom was referred the Bill (214) from the House of Commons intituled: "An Act to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act", have in obedience to the order of reference of April 25, 1956, examined the said bill and now beg leave to report the same without any amendment.

The report was adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Euler: With consent of the house, I move the third reading now.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: Honourable senators, I was unable to attend this morning the committee meeting at which this bill was considered, as I was busy on another committee, so I wish to ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) a question. In Prince Edward Island there remains to be completed a ten-mile stretch of the Trans-Canada Highway, including a bridge, which will cost in the vicinity of $2 million to $3 million. Will the cost of this bridge be included under the bill before us?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable senator from Prince (Hon. Mr. Barbour) was good enough to give me notice of this question. I have just received certain information from the Department of Public Works with respect to the Hillsboro bridge, to which he refers. Prior to any consideration of the suggestion that the federal Government should bear 90 per cent of the cost, the Province of Prince Edward Island and the federal Government made an agreement whereby the latter would pay two-thirds of the cost of the bridge. Since then there have been certain negotiations looking to the suggested increase to 90 per cent, but up to the present time no change has been made.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: The agreement for payment of two-thirds of the cost was not in effect in 1949, when the first agreement was signed. Was this agreement made at a later date?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The agreement for the two-thirds payment by the federal Government was entered into some time subsequent to 1949 but prior to consideration of the 90 per cent payment.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Like the honourable senator from Prince (Hon. Mr. Barbour) I was unable to attend the committee meeting dealing with this bill, having had to attend another committee meeting. May I ask the honourable leader if the total payment of 90 per cent will apply to all work from now on?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No. It will apply to not more than 10 per cent of the roadway in any province.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Ten per cent of the unfinished road?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No. The bill provides for an increased contribution to the provinces for highway construction, the higher payments being limited to 10 per cent of the provincial mileage. The 90 per cent will apply only to those sections on which no construction has taken place or where construction is difficult and might not be completed on account of the cost.

Hon. Mr. Hackett: Could the honourable leader tell us if the suggested payment of 90 per cent will supersede the agreement made with the provinces on the two-thirds basis?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No. I take it the agreement for 66⅔ per cent would prevail where agreement was entered into prior to the suggested 90 per cent. The honourable senator from Prince raised that question. Prince Edward Island made an agreement with the federal Government some time ago whereby the latter would pay two-thirds of the cost of the Hillsboro bridge. That agreement is still in effect. However, negotiations are going on between the provincial and federal Governments as to whether there can be some change.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few remarks with reference to some things that were said in this debate yesterday afternoon. In Quebec, in my former constituency of Temiscouata, from Rivière du Loup to the boundary of New Brunswick, through Notre Dame du Lac, Cabano and other places, the highway is narrower than the standard width established for the Trans-Canada Highway. At Notre Dame du Lac part of the highway, though narrow and winding, is beautiful. Any honourable senators who have travelled from Montreal to Quebec City along the north shore of the St. Lawrence will have noticed that in many of the municipalities in the County of Portneuf, and near Three Rivers and other places, the highway is very, very narrow. The cost of expropriating the houses and other buildings which are close to the highway would be enormous, and it occurs to me that perhaps this is one reason why the federal proposals for construction of the Trans-Canada Highway were not acceptable to the Province of Quebec.

However, I invite my colleagues to visit eastern Quebec, where they will find very good roads, narrow in some places, but mostly wide enough. In the County of Temiscouata particularly the highway is standard in most places, and my honourable friends would enjoy their trip very much.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN PROVINCIAL INSURANCE COMPANY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard, for Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the report of the committee on Bill R-6.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom was referred the Bill (R-6) intituled: "An Act to incorporate The Canadian Provincial Insurance Company", have in obedience to the order of reference of April 18, 1956, examined the said bill, and now beg leave to report the same without any amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: With leave of the Senate, I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 248 to 253, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Wednesday next.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate I move that when this house rises today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The motion was agreed to.

INQUIRIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, with reference to inquiries I have made, may I ask the honourable Leader of the Government if it will be possible for him to give information next week as to whether the pictures and paintings in this chamber will be removed, and if so what will replace them? Further, what will be done with respect to the unfinished condition of this chamber when the pictures are removed? I understand the walls behind the pictures are just canvas. Also, when will the paint on the inside of the windows of the chamber be cleaned off, and when will the artificial lighting be improved?

I should like also to ask whether the Post Office Department will supply the Senate with a postmark which will be as good as the one which the honourable leader purchased for the House of Commons when he was Speaker of that house, and if the imprint of the postmark will be in red, the Senate colour.

And when will the worn-out red carpet on the floor of this chamber be replaced?

Finally, if I am permitted under the rules I will ask permission to amend Inquiry No. 2 on the Order Paper by adding a third question, as follows:

What pictures have been loaned by the National Gallery of Canada to institutions other than various departments of the Government?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, the question of whether these pictures should be taken down and replaced by other pictures or by murals or other objects of art, is a question which would first have to be considered by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy. That answer applies also to the honourable senator's question regarding the green and pink colour on the upper windows, and as to the rug and the Post Office stamp. I can assure him I will see that these subjects are brought to the attention of the committee at its next meeting. As he knows, they will receive very careful consideration there.

The honourable senator referred to the lighting of the chamber. I believe I mentioned once before that the honourable senator from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Dessureault) has already spent considerable time on that question, and is at present in consultation with an official of the Department of Public Works. The matter having been referred to the honourable senator from Stadacona, it is in very capable hands, and I am sure we will receive a report soon.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I thank the honourable leader warmly and I much appreciate what he has said. Unfortunately, I forgot to mention the very bad acoustics of this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is also a question that has been referred to the honourable senator from Stadacona.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Thank you.

TRADE AGREEMENT WITH RUSSIA

APPROVAL OF RATIFICATION

The Senate resumed from Thursday, April 19, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald:

Resolved, that it is expedient that the houses of Parliament approve the ratification by Canada of the agreement on trade between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, signed at Ottawa on February 29, 1956, and that this house do approve the same.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I do not intend to delay the house this afternoon by a lengthy discussion of this subject. I made a similar remark yesterday with regard to the Trans-Canada Highway Bill and we got into a whole afternoon's debate. I hope that will not happen today.

I have had read to me the agreement made between the Government of Canada and the Soviet Government published in Hansard of February 29 last, together with the letters exchanged between our Secretary of State for External Affairs and the First Deputy Minister for Foreign Trade of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in Ottawa, which set out the whole matter of the agreement.

I wish to say only a word or two about it at the moment.

The important thing, of course, to a person like myself who comes from western Canada is the provision in the agreement whereby the Russian Government will buy a certain quantity of wheat from Canada. The provision is not quite as clear as I would like to see it. In the second and third years of its operation the agreement will be partly conditional on the volume of our purchases of Russian goods. That is something we should not forget.

However, I want first to congratulate the Government upon any trade agreement with the Soviets. I am persuaded that the agreement will not have the great results that we Canadians would like to see, because I think Russia's products, certainly its natural products, are much the same as our own, and that therefore it will be difficult to build up a large trade between the two nations. Be that as it may, I for one am going to support the agreement. I think it is a step in the right direction, and I hope that before I finish my remarks this afternoon I shall have convinced any doubting member of this house that that is so.

In the first place, I am pleased that we have got to the stage of making at least an agreement with the Soviet Government. But more particularly I support the agreement because I believe, and strongly, that the best way to reach Russia or the people of the Communist nations is by trade.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: We probably could reach them with guns or war planes, though I hope we are never driven to that, and I think we should use all avenues of negotiation to prevent that from happening at any time.

Honourable senators, I think this is the first time since I entered this house that I have been able to see a dim ray of light penetrating the Iron Curtain behind which the Russian nation and its satellites live. I sincerely hope that this agreement will prove a successful effort by a western nation to make at least an approach toward better relations with Russia.

Trips that I have made to various parts of my own country, to the United States and to Europe have taught me that there is much to be gained by visiting your friends. May I be permitted to make a personal reference?

I visited New Brunswick this past winter for the first time. True, I had once before passed through Saint John, but on this occasion I had a comparatively long visit in Moncton. I saw the people of that city at play, at church services, at business and other places, and I tell you I felt very proud that New Brunswick was a part of Canada and I was a Canadian. Personal visits are equally helpful in international affairs. It is probable that this trade agreement will provide an opportunity for Canadian business people to go to Russia and meet the Russian people. Likewise, it may result in business people of Russia coming to Canada and seeing how we do business. Such visits would be all to the good. I doubt if the visits of a group of farmers or professors of one country to the other mean very much, but I do believe that visits by representative groups of our business people would produce excellent results.

We of the western nations have a Christian civilization. We speak of it as that. I am not now trying to say that we are all that we should be. The communists can pick out many faults in our civilization. They can point to dishonest men and women among our people, some of whom are not a credit to our country. But by and large the people of Canada and of the western world believe that the Christian nations, by reason of their belief in the teachings of Christ, have something that no other nations have to offer to the world. Make no mistake, the Christian story must be "got over" to Russia if we are to make any impression on its people. I may be asked, "How can Christianity be preached through trade channels?" At least, now we are able to get to Russia, and its people will see how a Christian nation does business. I do not doubt that some Canadian businessmen will make mistakes; some may even engage in shifty transactions; but if Russians meet Canadian businessmen in Russia or over here they will discover not a few high-class people, proud to be Canadians, proud to be Christians. It is through men and women of our faith, exhibiting that type of character, that Russians may be influenced. I do not pretend that the fate of the world hangs on what we can do, but I am persuaded, and very deeply persuaded, that along these lines the most effective contacts will be made. Indeed, I know of no other way by which we shall reach mutual understanding. The Russians do not seem to know that the practice of Christian doctrines gives men and women something they can get from no other source.

I cannot forget the kind of life to which the peoples of Poland and the Ukraine are subject, behind the Iron Curtain. Manitoba contains a large population whose origins are either Polish or Ukrainian. We in that province are very proud of the young men and women, born in our country of Ukrainian parentage, who, having gone to our schools and universities, are taking part in public life. For the most part they are imbued with the same spirit of fair play and the same love of humanity as are Canadians of other stocks, and they cannot forget that forty million people of their own blood and lineage are still suffering under the yoke of the Soviet regime. Some say that that system is breaking down. I do not know; but I am convinced that by means of trade we can get an entrance to the Ukraine which is impossible in any other way. True, this is a development beyond the scope of the agreement before us, but it may come about before very long.

What I have said of the Ukrainians applies also to the Poles and Czechoslovaks. Many Czechs and Slovaks live in our province; I know quite a number of them, and there are no nicer or better people. But if I ask them about life in the old land, they say: "Mr. Haig, we don't want to speak of it. It is so awful that words fail to describe what our people over there are suffering. We wish they had the freedom we have in Canada."

In this treaty I see, for the first time in eleven years—since the end of World War II —some hope of making an impression on the Soviet nations. I attended the first meeting of the United Nations Assembly in 1946, at New York, and came away disappointed with the organization; but after thinking further about it I realized that what troubled me was not the Assembly itself but the attitude of the Russian representatives there. I think they offended through ignorance. They have not seen our side of life; they do not know what we can do. The history of the past two months shows us how Soviet officialdom behaves abroad: first when a former premier, Mr. Malenkov, visited Britain, and now during the visit there of Premier Bulganin and party secretary Krushchev. There is no doubt that the first visitor showed up in a much better light than the others, who are the kind of fellows I met at the United Nations gathering in 1946—the ones who made me very downhearted over the situation at that time.

We in Canada have a tremendous task. I am reluctant to repeat what has been said a dozen times before; but it is true that today Canada has a unique place in the world. We should not take undue credit to ourselves on that account. We are a nation of only 15 or 16 millions, living beside a nation of over 160 millions; but we are also a part of the British Commonwealth of Nations, whose members are scattered all over the world. Even India, when she became a republic, decided to retain her membership in the commonwealth; and other countries are making the same decision. There must be something in our position which inspires others with confidence.

I have mentioned this incident before, but I will tell it again. In 1946 the U.N. had its headquarters out in the green meadows, not in the big building it occupies now. A young delegate from Iran had lunch with me in a nearby cafeteria. When he learned that I was a Canadian he asked me if we could have a talk. There was ample time during the two-hour lunch interval, and I said, "Yes." Then he asked, "What do you think of the United States?" "Well," I replied, "What do I think of my brother, of my neighbour, of the man who lives in the province west of mine? I think they are all good Canadians. And as far as the Americans are concerned, we Canadians regard them in the same way. Sometimes they do things we do not like; sometimes we object to some act or policy of theirs; but by and large we feel they are the same sort of people as we are, and that is true also of the peoples of Great Britain and the British Commonwealth of Nations generally." My point is that this young man from Iran did not direct his inquiries to Americans or to Britishers. Why did he pick out a Canadian? He did not know me. He had never seen me before; the only way he could identify me was by the badge I wore. We had never met, for we were not on the same committees; I was serving on the legal committee, and he was with the foreign affairs group. But he felt that if he could meet a Canadian alone he would get a fairly honest opinion as to what Canada, a relatively small nation, thinks of the American people and how the two countries react to each other.

Now that is the kind of thing we hope for in relation to Russia; and perhaps it is why Russia approached us, ahead of any other nation outside her union, to make an agreement. So ours is an opportunity which no nation in modern times has had before, and if we make a serious mistake probably few nations will have a similar opportunity. I trust that our Government and our officials will appreciate the terrific responsibility which rests upon them to make a success of the agreement, not primarily in terms of money returns, but by having the Russian people feel that they are dealing with men and women who are honest and want to make a fair deal under equitable conditions. One only has to read the agreement itself and the letters which follow it—two of them written by the Minister of External Affairs and two by the Russian representatives—to understand how very clear Mr. Pearson has made the meaning of the agreement. He took no chance as to a misinterpretation of the legal term in the document, for he incorporated a letter explaining exactly what he understood the legal terms to mean. That is all to the good.

Honourable senators, I hope this agreement will establish a new basis which will enable the ordinary people of our two countries to meet and judge each other for themselves. The Russians will be able to see just what kind of people we are; they will be able to judge whether Christianity really means anything to us. If we maintain our relatively high standard of living we will be able to convince the Russian people that our system of government is superior to theirs; that it allows freedom and liberty of conscience to individuals of all classes, from the highest to the lowest.

Honourable senators, for the reasons stated I have much pleasure in supporting this agreement.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, I am particularly pleased to hear the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) support this agreement. His reasons are almost the same as my own. First of all, I believe it to be in the best interests of our country to trade as much as possible with as many nations as possible.

I am especially pleased that an agreement has been made with Russia, for it will help to relieve the tensions under which the world, and Canada in particular, has been labouring. I hope it will create an atmosphere leading to relations with Russia that will be beneficial to everyone, and remove to some extent at least the fears and uncertainties that have been bedevilling the world.

A slogan used in a general election in this country quite a number of years ago was "No truck or trade with the Yankees". I do not believe we should have in our minds the thought "No truck or trade with the Russians". It is my opinion that the commonsense thinking of the Canadian people is getting us gradually away from that sort of sentiment.

I do not expect any startling results from this agreement from the point of view of trade. However, trade is always important to us, for our prosperity is largely dependent upon our exports.

If I may make a personal reference here I might mention that I visited Russia in 1936, just twenty years ago, when I was connected with the Department of Trade and Commerce. The purpose of my visit was to make some sort of trade agreement. An agreement was effected but it had no great degree of significance. As the honourable leader opposite has suggested, there is not much Canada can sell to Russia or purchase from her, because the two countries produce the same kind of commodities. My relations were largely with two officials, the Commissar for Foreign Trade, Mr. Rosengoltz, and Mr. Kristinsky, the Deputy of the then Foreign Minister, Mr. Litvinoff.

My visit to Mr. Kristinsky was satisfactory to a degree, although I was not received with warm enthusiasm. He claimed that we had been responsible for cutting off all trade relations with Russia, and he said "Now you are coming here trying to make a trade arrangement with us." As no politics are involved in this I will be pardoned, I am sure, for repeating what I said to him. I replied, "Those relations were cut off when we were under another government, but we are now coming to you as representatives of the present Government of Canada." Mr. Kristinsky then said, "Yes, but you waited nearly a year before coming to see us." He was not particularly friendly, but anyway my dealings were principally with Mr. Rosengoltz.

The agreement we then made had to do mostly with the importation of anthracite coal from Russia. We were in need of the coal at the time and we agreed that Russia could export to us something like 200,000 tons. Not much came of this agreement, because of World War II. In passing, I might add that Mr. Rosengoltz and Mr. Kristinsky were among twenty persons who in 1938, just two years after my visit, were lined up and shot during a purge in Russia. On the cessation of war Russia and Canada embarked almost immediately on a cold war and have had practically no business relations since.

I am glad that we are entering upon an agreement to sell Russia some of our wheat. I do not think it will be anything but a temporary arrangement, for I cannot imagine the Russians buying our wheat in perpetuity. They have wheat-growing lands in the Far East, and perhaps in the not too distant future they will be able to supply all their own needs. But we have broken the ice and that is a good thing.

What I like about this treaty is that it opens the door to good relations with a country with which we must live. In a speech in the Senate last year I said that there were just three courses that we could choose from. I think that not everyone agreed with me at the time. The first course was to continue the cold war, spend our money, our treasure, and remain under all sorts of restraints, fears and uncertainties. We can still do that. The second course open to us was to engage in a real shooting war which, if the hydrogen bomb is all it is claimed to be, would be universal suicide. To my mind that is unthinkable, and I do not believe we shall have another war. I might say, however, that when the First World War threatened I did not believe it would come. I thought that the peoples of the earth would not be foolish enough to make war, but they were. After that I felt they had had their lesson and there would be no Second World War, but we had it nevertheless. Now I do not believe we shall have a Third World War, but I might be wrong again.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I hope not.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Surely the western nations and Russia and her satellites must realize that with the modern instruments of hydrogen and atomic warfare no one could win a war, that war now would destroy civilization as we know it.

I have no sympathy with the philosophy or policy of carrying a country to the brink of war and then avoiding it. The boast of such a policy reminded me of a story I heard in my boyhood, before there were any automobiles. A gentleman desirous of hiring a coachman interviewed three applicants, to each of whom in turn he put the question: "How near can you drive to a precipice in safety?" The first man replied he could drive to within three feet of it; the second one said he could drive to within one foot; but the third one declared he would stay as far as possible away from it. He got the job.

The third course that I said last year was open to us was to continue the cold war, with the risk of its developing into an actual war, or else to get along as well as possible with the communist countries. I think the latter is the only course that can be followed. Some people do not like the word "co-existence", but we must co-exist. We could not wipe out the Russian countries completely, even if we were to try. Surely, then, even if some people feel we cannot trust them entirely, the best thing we can do—and this trade agreement is the entering wedge—is to get along with them in a spirit of good will and as much confidence as possible, rather than to be constantly designating them as liars and proclaiming that we cannot trust them, and all that sort of thing. There may be some truth in the belief that we cannot trust them, but an old saying admonishes us, "Always tell the truth, but do not always be telling it."

During the course of my previously mentioned speech of last session I stated that two events would have a tremendous influence upon the course of civilization and the progress of world affairs. The first was the invention of the hydrogen bomb, which it seemed to me would make war absolutely impossible. The other was the death of Stalin, and as to this I think I was somewhat prophetic. Most of the tragedies and difficulties that hindered world progress—the creation of the Iron Curtain, and so on—occurred when Mr. Stalin was in control. Since his death there has been, at least apparently, an entire reversal of policy on the part of the Russians. This was first exemplified at the Geneva meeting, where at first a very good impression was created but later a coolness developed because of remarks made by the Soviet leaders. That conference was followed up by visits to Russia of Canadians, including Mr. Pearson, and also Mr. Duncan, a prominent business man. That was all to the good. And now, during the last few days, two Soviet leaders have been in Britain. Their visit, which is just drawing to its end, does not seem to have been so successful as that of Mr. Malenkov was a little earlier, but I hope some good may come out of it and that there may be no friction to make the situation worse instead of better. Since the reversal of Stalin's policy the attempts of these leaders to come to improved relations with the west appear to be sincere. I am bold enough to say that we cannot afford to ignore those attempts and should go at least half way to meet them. "Keep your powder dry," if you like, but let us use every opportunity of trying to remove the friction that has existed between the peoples living on either side of the Iron Curtain.

I support this agreement, mainly, because I hope that out of it may come a succession of visits and treaties, a renewal of good relations, and perhaps even friendly relations later on. Our enemy of today may be our friend tomorrow. Only a few years ago when Germany was at war with us the hatred engendered toward that country and its people seemed permanent and unchangeable. Yet, as I more or less predicted, we have again become friends of Germany and now welcome her assistance.

Honourable senators, we do not know what may happen nowadays, for changes are inevitable. Anything we can do, either through trade or in some other way, to replace international friction by good will, to remove the threat of war and restore to our people a sense of security, will certainly be in the best interest of Canada and the whole world.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, it is a pleasure to say that I find myself in almost complete agreement with my colleague and deskmate (Hon. Mr. Euler), because from past experience I have found that when I am in disagreement with him I am usually wrong.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: "Honest confession is good for the soul"—and so I make mine. I am equally in agreement with the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig). There are two reasons why it appears to me that we should have no hesitation in ratifying this agreement. About a hundred years ago there was a school of political thought in Britain which advocated that the way to promote peace and harmony in the world was to remove trade restrictions and let the individuals of various nations trade as freely as possible with one another. That philosophy has always appealed to me as very sound, because through trade people get to know one another. Ignorance is the basis of a great deal of misunderstanding in the world. Although I am not optimistic that this agreement will produce any great increase in the volume of our trade, nevertheless, I do think it is a move in the right direction.
